The Global Expansion of Authoritarian Rule

by Sarah Repucci and Amy Slipowitz

Global freedom faces a dire threat. Around the world, the enemies of liberal democracy—a form of self-government in which human rights are recognized and every individual is entitled to equal treatment under law—are accelerating their attacks. Authoritarian regimes have become more effective at co-opting or circumventing the norms and institutions meant to support basic liberties, and at providing aid to others who wish to do the same. In countries with long-established democracies, internal forces have exploited the shortcomings in their systems, distorting national politics to promote hatred, violence, and unbridled power. Those countries that have struggled in the space between democracy and authoritarianism, meanwhile, are increasingly tilting toward the latter. The global order is nearing a tipping point, and if democracy's defenders do not work together to help guarantee freedom for all people, the authoritarian model will prevail.

The present threat to democracy is the product of 16 consecutive years of decline in global freedom. A total of 60 countries suffered declines over the past year, while only 25 improved. As of today, some 38 percent of the global population live in Not Free countries, the highest proportion since 1997. Only about 20 percent now live in Free countries.

During this period of democratic decline, checks on abuse of power and human rights violations have eroded. In the decades after World War II, the United Nations and other international institutions promoted the notion of fundamental rights, and democracies offered support—however unevenly—in their domestic and foreign policies as they strove to create an open international system built on shared resistance to totalitarianism. After the fall of the Berlin Wall, leaders of countries in transition felt compelled to publicly embrace the same ideals in order to win acceptance in the international community, even if their commitment was only skin deep. Governments that relied on external economic or military support had to stage at least superficially credible elections and respect some institutional checks on their power, among other concessions, to maintain their good standing.

For much of the 21st century, however, democracy's opponents have labored persistently to dismantle this international order and the restraints it imposed on their ambitions. The fruits of their exertions are now apparent. The leaders of China, Russia, and other dictatorships have succeeded in shifting global incentives, jeopardizing the consensus that democracy is the only viable path to prosperity and security, while encouraging more authoritarian approaches to governance.

Countries in every region of the world have been captured by authoritarian rulers in recent years. In 2021 alone, Nicaragua's incumbent president won a new term in a tightly orchestrated election after his security forces arrested opposition candidates and deregistered civil society organizations. Sudan's generals seized power once again, reversing democratic progress made after the 2019 ouster of former dictator Omar al-Bashir. And as the United States abruptly withdrew its military from Afghanistan, the elected government in Kabul collapsed and gave way to the Taliban, returning the country to a system that is diametrically opposed to democracy, pluralism, and equality.

At the same time, democracies are being harmed from within by illiberal forces, including unscrupulous politicians willing to corrupt and shatter the very institutions that brought them to power. This was arguably most visible last year in the United States, where rioters stormed the Capitol on January 6 as part of an organized attempt to overturn the results of the presidential election. But freely elected leaders from Brazil to India have also taken or threatened a variety of antidemocratic actions, and the resulting breakdown in shared values among democracies has led to a weakening of these values on the international stage.

It is now impossible to ignore the damage to democracy's foundations and reputation. The regimes of China, Russia, and other authoritarian countries have gained enormous power in the international system, and free countries have seen their established norms challenged and fractured. The current state of global freedom should raise alarm among all who value their own rights and those of their fellow human beings. To reverse the decline, democratic governments need to strengthen domestic laws and institutions while taking bold, coordinated action to support the struggle for democracy around the world. In less free countries, democrats must unite to resist the encroachment of unchecked power and work toward expanding freedom for all individuals. Only global solidarity among democracy's defenders can successfully counter the combined aggression of its adversaries.

Popular demand for democracy remains strong. From Sudan to Myanmar, people continue to risk their lives in the pursuit of freedom in their countries. Many others undertake dangerous journeys in order to live freely elsewhere. Democratic governments and societies must harness and support this common desire for fundamental rights and build a world in which it is ultimately fulfilled.

WHAT IS DEMOCRACY?

Fundamental to the restoration of democracy is a correct understanding of what it is. The word democracy has been applied, rightly or wrongly, to states of all types, from the “Democratic People’s Republic” of North Korea to the freest polities in Scandinavia. A December 2021 joint op-ed by the Russian and Chinese ambassadors to the United States called both of their dictatorships “democratic.” Misappropriation of the word is a testament to democracy’s widespread appeal. Yet this unfortunate practice has generated confusion, allowing opponents to simultaneously claim democratic credentials and argue that actual democracies are ineffective or hypocritical.

Moreover, it has contributed to a misperception that all democracy requires is the regular performance of elections. Democracy means more than just majority rule, however. In its ideal form, it is a governing system based on the will and consent of the governed, institutions that are accountable to all citizens, adherence to the rule of law, and respect for human rights. It is a network of mutually reinforcing structures in which those exercising power are subject to checks both within and outside the state, for example, from independent courts, an independent press, and civil society. It requires an openness to alternations in power, with rival candidates or parties competing fairly to govern for the good of the public as a whole, not just themselves or those who voted for them. It creates a level playing field so that all people, no matter the circumstances of their birth or background, can enjoy the universal human rights to which they are entitled and participate in politics and governance.

Democracy is also more than just an ideal. It is a practical engine of self-correction and improvement that empowers people to constantly, peacefully struggle toward that ideal. When one part of the system falters, the others can be used as tools to repair and strengthen it. This unique and inherent capacity for self-correction is what makes democracy so successful at delivering long-term stability and prosperity. No democracy in the real world is perfect, and those demanding democracy in places like Cuba and Hong Kong are not demanding perfection. What they desire are the freedoms and the institutions that will allow them to create a better life and a more just society over time.

THE PROMOTION OF AUTOCRATIC NORMS

Autocrats have created a more favorable international environment for themselves over the past decade and a half, empowered by their own political and economic might as well as waning pressure from democracies. The alternative order is not based on a unifying ideology or personal affinity among leaders. It is not designed to serve the best interests of populations, or to enable people to improve their own lives. Instead it is grounded in autocrats’ shared interest in minimizing checks on their abuses and maintaining their grip on power. A world governed by this order would in reality be one of disorder, replete with armed conflict, lawless violence, corruption, and economic volatility. Such global instability and insecurity would have a significant cost in human lives.

The Chinese Communist Party (CCP) plays a leading role in promoting autocratic norms. Citing its self-serving interpretation of state sovereignty, the party strives to carve out space for incumbent governments to act as they choose without oversight or consequences. It offers an alternative to democracies as a source of international support and investment, helping would-be autocrats to entrench themselves in office, adopt aspects of the CCP governance model, and enrich their regimes while ignoring principles like transparency and fair competition. At the same time, the CCP has used its vast economic clout and even military threats to suppress international criticism of its own violations of democratic principles and human rights, for instance by punishing governments and other foreign entities that criticize its demolition of civil liberties in Hong Kong or question its expansive territorial claims.

In 2021, the CCP further extended the scope of speech it would not tolerate, employing economic and technological leverage to pressure governments, international institutions, and the private sector to echo its preferred narratives. Although new evidence indicated that party leader Xi Jinping and other top officials had a hand in planning and implementing widespread crimes against humanity and acts of genocide against ethnic minority groups in Xinjiang, many foreign actors, including some democracies, toed the CCP line. A Marriott hotel in the Czech Republic declined to host a November 2021 World Uyghur Congress gathering, arguing that it preferred to observe “political neutrality.” New Zealand’s Parliament refrained from identifying Beijing’s actions in Xinjiang as a genocide after the trade minister voiced concerns that such language would hinder economic relations with China. Such threats are credible given Beijing’s past reprisals against foreign companies and nations, including the imposition of tariffs on Australian exports after Canberra called for an independent investigation into the origin of COVID-19.

DROPPING THE PRETENSE OF COMPETITIVE ELECTIONS

Elections, even when critically flawed, have long given authoritarian leaders a veneer of legitimacy, both at home and abroad. As international norms shift in the direction of autocracy, however, these exercises in democratic theater have become increasingly farcical.

In the run-up to Russia’s September 2021 parliamentary elections, the regime of President Vladimir Putin dispelled the illusion of competition by imprisoning opposition leader Aleksey Navalny and tarring his movement as “extremist,” which prevented any candidates who were even loosely associated with it from running for office. The balloting itself was marred by irregularities and restrictions on independent observers, and technology firms were forced to remove a Navalny-backed mobile app meant to inform opposition voters about the strongest candidates in their area. A law on “foreign agents” was also expanded ahead of the elections, restricting the activities of independent media as well as individuals who were critical of the regime.

The November 2021 presidential election in Nicaragua was similarly uncompetitive. President Daniel Ortega’s authoritarian government refused to implement electoral reforms recommended by the Organization for American States, including measures that would have made the Supreme Electoral Council more independent, established more transparency in the voter-registration and vote-counting processes, and allowed independent and credible international electoral observers to monitor the polls. Instead, during the preceding year, the government passed laws designed to target the opposition, including a “foreign agents” law inspired by the Russian legislation. The regime also canceled the registration of nearly 50 organizations, effectively quashing independent civil society, and arrested at least seven potential opposition candidates on charges including treason.

The December 2021 Legislative Council elections in Hong Kong underscored Beijing’s success in dismantling the territory’s semidemocratic institutions. Like Putin and Ortega, the CCP and its allies in the Hong Kong government laid the groundwork for a tightly controlled process, enacting an electoral “reform” that sharply diminished direct suffrage and allowed authorities to exclude candidates based on political criteria, arresting and detaining opposition leaders under the draconian National Security Law, and forcing independent media outlets to shut down. It therefore surprised no one when pro-Beijing candidates dominated the new legislature, despite a long history of robust voter support for prodemocracy candidates.

A PROLIFERATION OF COUPS AND POWER GRABS

In another sign that international deterrents against antidemocratic behavior are losing force, coups were more common in 2021 than in any of the previous 10 years. The first took place in February in Myanmar, just before a new parliament was due to be sworn in following flawed yet credible November 2020 elections in which the military’s preferred party was soundly defeated. The military, which had continued to play a significant role in politics under the 2008 constitution it drafted, declared that fraud had rendered the elections invalid, and installed commander in chief Min Aung Hlaing as acting president. An initial one-year state of emergency has since been extended by two additional years. Civilian political leaders have been arrested en masse, over a thousand people have been killed as security forces crack down on prodemocracy protests, and thousands of others have been thrown in jail and tortured. The military authorities imposed curfews, repeatedly shut down the internet, raided universities, and searched for human rights defenders and prodemocracy activists to arrest. As a result of these developments, Myanmar experienced the world’s largest contraction in freedom last year.

In Sudan, weeks before the transitional government was scheduled to come under full civilian control after a 2019 coup, the military seized power in October 2021 and declared a state of emergency. Though civilian prime minister Abdalla Hamdok was later reinstated, the military retained control over the government and suggested that elections would not be held until 2023. Massive protests against the coup and the terms of Hamdok’s reinstatement have continued, and a violent response by security forces has killed scores of people. Under pressure from political groups and ordinary citizens who saw his participation as a surrender to the military, Hamdok resigned in early January, leaving the government in the control of the armed forces.

West Africa, until recently a region characterized by democratic gains, suffered further setbacks in 2021. The leaders of a September coup in Guinea claimed to be upholding democratic principles, as they deposed President Alpha Condé after he amended the constitution to run for a third term the previous year. But with Guineans left under the rule of entirely unelected officials, political rights declined, and the country dropped from Partly Free to Not Free status. Mali experienced its second military coup in less than a year in May 2021, after the transitional president and prime minister attempted to form a new government that excluded key military officers. Meanwhile in Chad, already an authoritarian state, the military intervened after the April 2021 death of longtime president Idriss Déby Itno and installed his son as the new leader.

Some power grabs during the year were carried out by incumbent civilian leaders rather than the military. In 2014, Tunisia had become the only country to emerge from the Arab Spring with a Free designation, casting off its dictatorship and building a promising democracy. Yet it plunged to Partly Free status in 2021 after President Kaïs Saïed, spurred by protests against the faltering economy and surging coronavirus cases, unilaterally dismissed the prime minister and indefinitely suspended the parliament in July in order to rule by decree. Turning his back on democratic norms, Saïed further expanded his executive authority in September, including by disregarding certain parts of the constitution. Although greater international support might have bolstered the efforts of the Tunisian people to secure their freedoms in the years since 2014, the world's democracies largely ignored the warning signs and failed to make the country a priority as it descended into crisis.

THE ROT WITHIN DEMOCRACIES

As authoritarians continue to extend their reach, often facing little more than rhetorical denunciations from governments that declare their support for human rights, there is increasing evidence of homegrown illiberal streaks within democracies. Undemocratic leaders and their supporters in democratic environments have worked to reshape or manipulate political systems, in part by playing on voters' fears of change in their way of life and by highlighting the very real failures of their predecessors. They have promoted the idea that, once in power, their responsibility is only to their own demographic or partisan base, disregarding other interests and segments of society and warping the institutions in their care so as to prolong their rule. Along the way, the democratic principles of pluralism, equality, and accountability—as well as basic stewardship and public service—have been lost, endangering the rights and well-being of all residents.

In a curious contrast to authoritarian regimes' attempts to impose a façade of electoral credibility, leaders who fear losing power in a democratic system have taken to sowing distrust in elections. The assault on the US Capitol was the culmination of a months-long campaign by outgoing president Donald Trump to cast Joe Biden's victory as illegitimate and fraudulent. Although Trump allies have spread false and conflicting theories that the attackers were acting spontaneously or were deliberately provoked by Trump's enemies, investigators have revealed a well-organized effort to block the certification of election results that involved dozens of state and local officials from the Republican Party and was promoted by the then president himself. Though the insurrection was ultimately unsuccessful and a peaceful transfer of power took place, the same forces continue to exert significant influence on the US political system. Many of the prominent Republicans who had initially condemned the events of January 6 went silent or aligned their remarks with Trump's over the subsequent weeks, while those who refused to display loyalty to the former leader faced political marginalization, severe intraparty pressure, and outright threats of violence.

Trump and his supporters have continued to push the message that fraud tipped the balance toward Biden in the 2020 election, despite multiple recounts and consistent court rulings against all claims of widespread fraud. Far from a good-faith effort to uncover abuse, the stolen-election lie is undermining public confidence in the US electoral system ahead of the 2022 midterm and 2024 general elections, which are expected to be close contests for control of the legislative and executive branches. The trend is especially dangerous in the US context, where state legislatures, particularly those dominated by Republican leaders, have considerable leeway to declare that irregularities took place in the voting process.

In fact, by December 2021, 17 states had passed legislation that threatened the integrity of elections and election administration, and hundreds of additional such bills were introduced across 24 states. Intimidation or violence by nonstate actors, including Trump supporters, poses another risk to the forthcoming elections. Already, election administrators have resigned in unprecedented numbers amid a rise in threats and harassment.

As Brazil prepares for its October 2022 general elections, President Jair Bolsonaro has echoed Trump by preemptively claiming that the vote will be fraudulent. Having pinned his allegations on a groundless assertion that the electronic voting system is unreliable, Bolsonaro pushed for a constitutional amendment, ultimately rejected, that would have provided printed ballot receipts. Experts noted that the measure would have given credence to unsubstantiated claims of fraud and could actually increase the potential for voter intimidation and vote buying. Bolsonaro also alleged electoral fraud years ago, while still on the margins of Brazilian politics. Today such claims have become normalized.

Elsewhere in the Americas, El Salvador's decline has accelerated since President Nayib Bukele took office in 2019. After his allies won a legislative supermajority in 2021, Bukele's government has systematically undermined democratic institutions intended to check executive power. Authorities have abused anticorruption mechanisms to arrest former officials without credible evidence, and the government has attempted to dismantle public oversight systems. Bukele used his control over the legislature to replace magistrates from the Constitutional Chamber of the Supreme Court and nearly 200 other judges across the country. The altered court then overturned a constitutional ban on presidential reelection, allowing Bukele to run in future contests. The government's proposed foreign agents law, which could severely constrain civil society, is similar to the new law in increasingly autocratic Nicaragua.

Democracies in other parts of the world also continue to decline under the influence of freely elected leaders who have embraced illiberal politics. India, which has suffered a series of setbacks to political rights and civil liberties since Prime Minister Narendra Modi's reelection in 2019, showed no signs of reversing course, as notable opposition figures faced arrest and surveillance. Since taking power in 2015, Poland's Law and Justice party has undermined the rule of law by packing the country's top courts with loyalists who reliably uphold its policies and decisions. In October and November 2021, the Polish constitutional court threatened to further subvert international and regional legal standards by ruling that it can ignore European Union (EU) legislation and judgments.

Authoritarian powers have taken careful note of fractures in and among democracies and moved to widen them whenever possible. During 2021, the regime in Belarus facilitated the passage of thousands of migrants—the vast majority of them from Iraq—into Minsk and then to the borders of EU countries that had given shelter to exiled Belarusian opposition figures. The mass arrivals led to militarized responses, illegal pushbacks, and violations of asylum procedures by the governments of Poland, Latvia, and Lithuania. Thousands of migrants became stranded in the border area in harsh weather conditions, contributing to a number of deaths. The Polish government took measures to legalize its pushbacks, in violation of both EU and international law. At the end of the year, the European Commission proposed new rules that would allow longer processing times for asylum applications, which could lead to prolonged detention and other rights violations. In short, the pressure applied by Minsk encouraged democracies to act in contradiction with their values, opening them to charges of hypocrisy and driving a wedge between critics and defenders of the response. Other regimes on Europe's periphery, including those of Morocco and Turkey, have used similar tactics to extract concessions and break democratic solidarity in the EU. But their efforts would have been futile if not for existing weaknesses in the democracies themselves.

The United States and Its Peers

The United States has fallen below its traditional peers on key democratic indicators, including executive elections, freedom from improper political influence, and equal treatment of minority groups.

ANTIDEMOCRATIC ALLIANCES

Authoritarian leaders are no longer isolated holdouts in a democratizing world. Instead they are actively collaborating with one another to spread new forms of repression and rebuff democratic pressure. While many democracies have continued to respond to sham elections and coups with measures like sanctions and the withholding of aid, the impact has been diluted by autocratic alliances.

In some cases the authoritarian assistance is largely economic. For example, the governments of Russia, China, and Turkey have provided trade and investment to the Venezuelan regime, offsetting sanctions imposed by democracies for its rigged elections and crack-downs on the opposition. But in other instances the support is much more direct: During the 2020 protests against fraudulent elections in Belarus, the Kremlin dispatched Russian propagandists to take the place of striking Belarusian journalists, and offered its security forces to bolster the Belarusian authorities' violent dispersal of demonstrations. Election observers from Russia had already deemed the vote credible, despite the jailing of opposition candidates and severe censorship campaigns against independent media. Meanwhile, allies like the Cuban government defended the Belarusian regime at the UN Human Rights Council, where 68 percent of current members are Partly Free or Not Free countries.

Similarly, despite the egregious violence associated with the 2021 military coup in Myanmar, Beijing prevented the UN Security Council from issuing a stronger condemnation of the power grab, and Moscow has sought to strengthen economic ties with the junta. The coup leaders in Sudan have also been able to rely on their autocratic friends for diplomatic and other support, with Chinese and Russian envoys working to water down the response at the United Nations.

In addition to pushing back against international pressure, authoritarian governments have cooperated when using transnational repression to silence their own exiled dissidents through tools like detention, rendition, Interpol abuse, coercion by proxy, and digital surveillance. While threats or physical attacks against dissidents living in the United States and Europe have received the most attention, the majority of transnational repression cases involve collaboration between the host and origin states. Security agencies often work together to detain and render targeted activists, and courts and migration agencies fulfill requests to extradite or expel them. For instance, there is evidence that the Kyrgyzstani government assisted Turkish intelligence services in the May 2021 kidnapping of Orhan İnandı, which delivered him to Turkey to face terrorism charges. İnandı had founded a school network in Kyrgyzstan that was aligned with the Gülen movement, which Turkish president Recep Tayyip Erdoğan blames for a 2016 coup attempt.

Other types of collaboration between authoritarians can put entire ethnic groups at risk. Turkey was once a haven for China's persecuted Uyghur population, whose language and culture are akin to those of the Turkish people. But Erdoğan, faced with an ailing economy and estrangement from Turkey's traditional democratic allies, has increasingly shifted his stance to meet Beijing's demands. Turkish authorities have made it harder for Uyghurs to obtain and keep permanent residence permits, and several hundred of them have been detained in deportation centers.

Antidemocratic figures within more democratic countries have begun to engage in international cooperation as well. Eduardo Bolsonaro, the son of Brazil's president, is a member of a far-right nationalist group founded by Steve Bannon, an adviser to former US president Trump. Far-right US television personality Tucker Carlson spent a week in Hungary in 2021, warmly introducing his millions of American viewers to Prime Minister Viktor Orbán's xenophobic propaganda, contempt for democratic principles, and rejection of international human rights standards. Meanwhile, Orbán has lent support to multiple European counterparts who share his views, shielding them from possible EU sanctions. The beneficiaries include Milorad Dodik, a Serb nationalist leader in Bosnia and Herzegovina who has suppressed domestic dissent and pushed for the Serb-dominated Republika Srpska to secede from the multiethnic Bosnian state.

FAILURE IN AFGHANISTAN

The rapid US military withdrawal from Afghanistan—negotiated between the Taliban and the Trump administration without the involvement of the Afghan government, and completed by the Biden administration in 2021—dealt a powerful blow to international confidence in the ability of democracies to protect their partners and help foster free societies in difficult terrain.

The 20-year US engagement in Afghanistan started as a joint effort by the United States and its allies to destroy the safe haven that the Taliban had provided for the organizers of the September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. Over the years, Washington both pursued its narrowly defined security interests in the country and committed billions of dollars and significant effort to supporting local civil society and the development of a democratic Afghan state. While many Afghans experienced real change and felt hope for a better future, the Afghan government and the United States consistently failed to address worsening corruption and governance problems. Finally, the ill-planned withdrawal triggered a rapid collapse of the institutions that had been built and a complete takeover by the Taliban.

The debacle has renewed false impressions within existing democracies that supporting democracy abroad is a doomed enterprise, that it involves imposing "Western" ideals on unwilling populations, that it requires the open-ended use of military force, or that it is a disingenuous pretext for the use of military force. For those still struggling for freedom in repressive environments, the US withdrawal may be seen as a warning that their democratic partners could abandon them at any moment.

Meanwhile, thousands of Afghan people have rushed to flee the country since the Taliban eliminated representative rule and nullified the constitutional rights of women and ethnic and religious minority groups. Many ethnic Hazara communities have been evicted from their land, and Taliban forces have hunted down, abducted, or executed scores of police and intelligence officers from the former government. Human rights defenders and independent journalists have faced persecution as their hard-won achievements are rapidly reversed. The United States and most other established democracies have compounded their earlier failures by being slow or reluctant to assist those seeking refuge, many of whom remain stuck in Afghanistan or in nearby countries where they lack basic rights protections.

CAUSE FOR HOPE

Even in a year dominated by disturbing setbacks to democracy, people around the world demonstrated its continued appeal and capacity for renewal.

Ecuador's democracy was trampled for a decade by former president Rafael Correa, who stepped aside for handpicked successor Lenin Moreno in 2017 on the assumption that he would retain control through the ruling party. But Moreno struck out on his own and reformed parts of the system, supporting a new judicial appointment process that helped weed out partisan judges, reducing state control over the media, and pardoning human rights activists so that they could continue their work. Ecuador has consequently seen a steady expansion of freedom over the past five years, moving from Partly Free to Free this year after credible general elections resulted in a peaceful transfer of power to an opposition presidential candidate. These improvements have persisted despite Correa's continued efforts to exert influence from outside government.

In Chile, already one of the better-performing democracies in the Americas, the political system responded to massive protests in 2019 by authorizing the election of an inclusive constitutional convention that will now work to replace the 1980 constitution—originally inherited from the dictatorship of Augusto Pinochet—and address deep socioeconomic disparities. In Montenegro, an opposition coalition came to power in late 2020, ending three decades of rule by the Democratic Party of Socialists. The new government imposed fewer obstacles to political competition and gave the public broadcaster more independence, and its narrow parliamentary majority allowed the legislature to provide greater oversight of the executive branch.

People in Côte d'Ivoire have proven their desire to steer their nation toward full democracy since the end of an armed conflict in 2011. While the country experienced a vast expansion of freedom over the past 10 years, its democratic momentum faltered in 2020, as President Alassane Ouattara circumvented constitutional term limits and secured a third term in voting that was marred by candidate disqualifications, an opposition boycott, and widespread political violence. But parliamentary elections in March 2021 featured significant improvements, with several opposition candidates freely registering and participating. The elections were less affected by violence, and Ivorians had more freedom to express themselves and participate in public assemblies.

In Myanmar, despite the military's well-earned reputation for brutal violence, the February 2021 coup immediately sparked widespread resistance across the country. By the end of the year, protests were continuing even in the face of live ammunition and systematic reprisals, and a civil disobedience movement—including a general strike—had brought the economy and public services almost to a standstill, with participation by health workers, civil servants, educators, bank workers, and many more. Civilians have also boycotted military-affiliated products and services, from the national lottery to the electrical power utility. In December, people across the country engaged in a silent strike against military rule, closing down shops and staying off the streets. The resistance to the military regime has denied it legitimacy and crippled its ability to function as a government, reflecting both the people's commitment to democracy and the power it gives them to shape events.

Pushback against CCP influence is gaining traction. During 2021, democratic governments and private actors devoted greater attention to the moral, human rights, and national security implications of integration with a regime in China that has become more repressive at home and more aggressive abroad over the past decade. Lithuania was the first country to announce a diplomatic boycott of the 2022 Winter Olympics in Beijing, setting the stage for other countries including the United States, the United Kingdom, Canada, and Australia to take a stand against CCP abuses in Xinjiang and elsewhere. Separately, sacrificing significant revenue to defend human rights principles, the Women's Tennis Association suspended all tournaments in China after player Peng Shuai was forced to recant her allegations of sexual assault by a high-ranking CCP official. And in a variety of open societies, media outlets have been cutting ties with Chinese state media services, regulators have scrutinized rule violations by such services, and scholars have spoken out against pressure to self-censor on China-related topics.

The migration and refugee crisis that has so preoccupied many democracies is an outgrowth of the authoritarian expansion of the past 16 years. But in another sense it is an emphatic endorsement of democracy as the preferred system of government, as millions of people flee repressive regimes or antidemocratic militants and seek to live in free societies. The rate of migration out of Hong Kong spiked following the Beijing-backed authorities' crackdown on prodemocracy protests. Tens of thousands of people have fled Nicaragua since 2018 demonstrations were brutally suppressed, as have millions of Venezuelans suffering under the regime of Nicolás Maduro. Rather than attempting to deter migrants and refugees with daunting border infrastructure and harsh asylum systems, governments in democratic destination countries should recognize their shared interest in the struggle for freedom.

BUILDING A MORE DEMOCRATIC WORLD

The displacement of global democratic norms by authoritarian powers and other antidemocratic actors can still be reversed. But success will require a bold, sustained response that establishes support for democracy and countering authoritarianism at the heart of each democracy's foreign policy, national security strategy, and domestic reform agenda. It must also entail the participation of both governments and an engaged and active citizenry. Rather than longing for a bygone era of expanding freedom, democratic leaders need to confront the problems caused by their past mistakes and address weaknesses in the international system that authoritarians have been able to exploit.

Effective democracy support should not be subordinated to a free country's short-term economic, military, or geopolitical interests, all of which would actually be best served by a long-term rollback of authoritarian practices. Nor can democracy be imposed by forces outside a given country. International assistance and solidarity are crucial to countering the tactical advantages and many forms of collaboration enjoyed by autocrats. At the same time, it is local and diasporic human rights defenders, grassroots civil society organizations, and empowered electorates that must chart the course and ultimately determine their own country's future.

In the drive to restore democratic values and human rights standards to their proper place in the international system, President Biden's Summit for Democracy—held in December 2021 with 110 invited governments, to be followed by a year of action—represents a promising first step. Those governments must now go beyond rhetorical commitments and seek civil society input on implementation.

Developing a set of coordinated international policies grounded in democratic principles, while strengthening their own domestic governance systems, will ultimately make all participating countries safer, more prosperous, and more just. Democratic nations share interests in fair trade and security, and since they are more likely to adhere to agreements and norms, they make more reliable partners in both fields. Their institutional and popular support for accountability and the rule of law also make them more predictable and rewarding environments for public and private investment. No democracy is perfect, but they all benefit from the basic ability to adapt to changing circumstances, make policy corrections, and bring in fresh leadership—with minimal disruption to the system as a whole.

Despite the clear arguments in favor of democracy, the past 16 years have shown in stark terms that neither the prevalence of democratic ideas around the world nor the certainty of global progress toward democratic governance can be taken for granted. Autocrats remain determined to keep and expand their power, and they will continue to make gains so long as democracy's proponents let them. It is time for everyone who understands the stakes to rebuild and improve upon the international norms that democracies long championed, and push the reprehensible practices of authoritarians back to the margins of human experience where they belong.

Improving Transparency, Empowering Citizens

Ecuador's Fundación Ciudadanía y Desarrollo

In a year when 60 countries suffered democratic declines and 25 made gains, Ecuador beat the odds.

In a year when 60 countries suffered democratic declines and 25 made gains, Ecuador beat the odds: it was one of just two nations that not only made progress, but also ascended from Partly Free to Free status in Freedom in the World 2022. Mauricio Alarcón Salvador, executive director of the Ecuadorian prodemocracy organization Fundación Ciudadanía y Desarrollo (Citizenship and Development Foundation, or FCD), is determined to keep it that way.

Since 2009, Mauricio and his colleagues at FCD have fought to expose corruption in the Ecuadorian government. They believe that greater visibility into the state's workings and the impact of voting would allay public skepticism and increase voter turnout, ultimately creating a freer and fairer country for all.

Although Ecuador has been considered a democratic republic since the 1980s, its people have weathered political volatility, ethnic discrimination, and economic inequality. More recently, as president from 2007 to 2017, Rafael Correa oversaw attacks on judicial independence, press freedom, and other civil liberties.

Civic activism is no casual pastime in Latin America, which was recently named the most dangerous region of the world for human rights defenders. But when incumbent president Lenín Moreno—who had eased Correa's restrictions since 2017 despite having served as his vice president—announced that he would not be seeking reelection in 2021, Mauricio knew that FCD could not miss the opportunity to push Ecuador even further toward a more stable and inclusive democracy.

The stakes could hardly have been higher in 2021. One leading candidate, Andrés Arauz, was allied with Correa, while the second, longtime opposition figure Guillermo Lasso, represented another step in the transition away from Correa's repressive legacy. In an interview with Freedom House, Mauricio called the election a choice between “authoritarianism and restriction of rights, and the alternative in favor of democracy and the rule of law.”

Knowing this could be the best opportunity for a long time to shift the tides of history and make a lasting impact on their country, FCD launched an all-out campaign to help Ecuadorians understand the choice in front of them, turn out young voters, and bring together young activists and community leaders to create policy proposals for candidates. During the vote itself, FCD published easy-to-understand explanations of election rules, making the process more accessible.

Separately, on the national stage, a coalition of political adversaries banded together to support Lasso, who went on to secure the presidency with 52.36 percent of the final vote. But while democracy won the day in Ecuador, the story is far from over.

Corruption and weak rule of law are the two most significant long-term challenges facing Ecuador's democracy, Mauricio told Freedom House, and the activists at FCD are more determined and motivated than ever to continue the struggle. They have worked alongside Transparency International toward the implementation of government-wide integrity and transparency regulations, trained officials to uphold democratic standards, and empowered citizens by teaching them how to thwart corrupt authorities' attempts at antidemocratic chicanery.

Since its inception, FCD has striven to build trust between citizens and their government, explicitly aiming to lay a foundation for future generations of democracy activists and engaged voters in Ecuador. Its spirit of cooperation and solidarity is vital to human rights efforts around the world—particularly as authoritarians increasingly support one another.

As Mauricio put it, "The most important thing is that we never lose sight of the importance of empathy, of supporting our colleagues, of teaming up and joining forces to face problems together."

- FREE (dark gray)
- PARTLY FREE (medium gray)
- NOT FREE (light gray)

The map shows that North America, Western Europe, and several countries in South America and Asia are categorized as 'FREE'. Russia, China, and several countries in Africa and Asia are categorized as 'NOT FREE'. Many countries in Africa, Asia, and South America are categorized as 'PARTLY FREE'.

AFRICA

Citizens mobilize for change amid coups, crackdowns on dissent

AFRICA: STATUS BY POPULATION

AFRICA: STATUS BY COUNTRY

Political crises and power grabs further compromised the struggle for democratic progress in Africa, most notably through the resurgence in military coups that affected Chad, Guinea, Mali, and Sudan. An attempted coup in Niger nearly sabotaged that country’s first-ever democratic transfer of power, which ultimately took place after the alleged perpetrators were arrested.

In a number of other countries, opposition figures faced increased obstacles as governments deployed a slew of new “antiterrorist” measures that effectively suppressed dissent. In Ethiopia, a state of emergency granted broad powers to the security forces, allowing the arbitrary detention of anyone suspected of cooperating with terrorist groups. Members of the ethnic Tigrayan minority, whose home region is at the center of the country’s ongoing civil conflict, were often targeted. Democracy in Benin continued to decline as opposition presidential contenders Joel Aivo and Reckya Madougou were sentenced to lengthy prison terms on charges of financing terrorism. Such politicized prosecutions and other legal tactics were used to prevent a total of 17 out of 20 candidates from running in the country’s presidential election. In Tanzania, where Vice President Samia Suluhu Hassan rose to the presidency after years of crackdowns on the media and civil society under her late predecessor, hopes for reform were dashed as opposition leader Freeman Mbowe and several of his allies were detained and charged with conspiracy to commit terrorism.

Similar charges of terrorism and “incitement” were used to undermine press freedom across North Africa, with multiple Algerian and Egyptian journalists detained for their reporting. In Senegal, a new antiterrorism law broadly defined “disturbing public order” as a form of terrorism, impeding freedom of assembly for ordinary citizens. The space for critical speech significantly diminished during the year due to restrictions on the internet and social media. At least 10 African countries faced internet shutdowns or social media blocks in 2021, including in Uganda ahead of its general elections, in parts of Ethiopia where the conflict has reportedly led to severe human rights abuses, and in Eswatini and Sudan, which experienced large prodemocracy protests.

Despite these headwinds, citizens across Africa repeatedly seized on elections as an opportunity for democratic change. The territory of Somaliland held long-delayed parliamentary and local elections that were deemed relatively free and fair, resulting in a peaceful transfer of power from the ruling party to an opposition coalition. In Côte d’Ivoire, the parliamentary elections represented a marked improvement over the 2020 presidential contest, with greater opposition participation and less violence. South African voters supported more opposition candidates in recent municipal elections, registering their discontent with corruption and poor economic performance. And Zambians shocked the continent by turning out in huge numbers to vault opposition leader Hakainde Hichilema to the presidency. In doing so they overcame major barriers intended to benefit the ruling party, including social media blackouts, assembly restrictions attributed to COVID-19, and violence by security forces.

AMERICAS

As some cast ballots for new leaders, others vote with their feet

AMERICAS: STATUS BY POPULATION

AMERICAS: STATUS BY COUNTRY

Elections in the Americas served as an inflection point, with some countries adopting electoral reforms that enabled changes in leadership, and others suffering as incumbents sought to entrench themselves in office. In many cases, residents of states where democracy was lacking chose to migrate abroad in search of better conditions.

A 2019 special election in Honduras increased the participation of opposition parties in election management, and the so-called Project Identify Yourself improved voter registration systems. In 2021, these reforms plus a large voter turnout resulted in the defeat of President Juan Orlando Hernández, who had been implicated in corruption and drug-trafficking scandals. Ecuador also strengthened its electoral framework in the years leading up to the 2021 election, passing reforms that allowed minority parties to gain seats in the legislature and applying recommendations from the Organization of American States. The well-organized contest contributed to the country's status change from Partly Free to Free.

Meanwhile, authoritarian leader Daniel Ortega secured a new term in Nicaragua's presidential election by overseeing the arbitrary arrests of opposition candidates, Venezuela's Nicolás Maduro continued to prioritize his grip on power over the population's socioeconomic well-being, and Cuban security forces violently repressed protests calling for democratic freedoms. Unsurprisingly, all three countries generated large numbers of migrants and political exiles during the year, as did Haiti, where President Jovenel Moïse's assassination underscored long-standing problems including a broken electoral system, corruption, and organized crime. These migrants have reported facing discrimination and other abuses during their journeys and in destination countries, but they continue to leave as governance in their home countries deteriorates.

ASIA-PACIFIC

The walls close in on political opposition and free speech

ASIA-PACIFIC: STATUS BY POPULATION

ASIA-PACIFIC: STATUS BY COUNTRY

Political rights and civil liberties declined across the region as authoritarian forces moved to consolidate their power. The trend was most dramatic in Afghanistan and Myanmar, where elected civilian leaders were forced from office by the Taliban and the military, respectively.

The space for opposition forces to operate narrowed in many other settings. In Hong Kong, prominent prodemocracy politicians were arrested at the beginning of the year for participating in primary elections designed to unify the democratic opposition, then remained behind bars during the tightly controlled Legislative Council balloting in December. India's ruling Bharatiya Janata Party also tried to limit the opposition's ability to compete through various methods, including by pursuing selective corruption investigations. A small but notable exception in the Asia-Pacific region was Samoa, where an opposition party won enough seats to form a government for the first time in four decades, and the courts compelled the ruling party to accept defeat.

Crackdowns on political dissent in Asia also affected journalists and civil society movements, particularly in countries whose democratic institutions were already under attack. Singaporean authorities forced one of the city-state's few remaining independent news outlets to shut down by suspending its license. In Thailand, where a prodemocracy protest movement grew more active in the middle of the year, authorities issued a broadly worded regulation to expand their ability to prosecute individuals for distributing news deemed to incite fear in the public. In China, one of the world's most restrictive media environments, journalists faced heightened scrutiny and rigorous political indoctrination when attempting to renew their press licenses, and even individuals who engaged in solitary forms of protest were punished with prison sentences.

EURASIA

Democracy stalls in the Kremlin's shadow

EURASIA: STATUS BY POPULATION

EURASIA: STATUS BY COUNTRY

Democratic forces struggled in 2021 as Vladimir Putin's regime in Russia exerted its authoritarian influence throughout Eurasia. Within its borders, the Russian government used expanded "foreign agent" laws to sideline human rights groups and activists, culminating in an order to close the widely respected organization Memorial. The regime placed its neighbors—and much of the world—on alert at year's end by amassing troops near Ukraine's eastern border. Meanwhile, despite improvements in freedom of assembly, domestic politics in Ukraine were bogged down by stalled efforts to uproot corruption and the controversial prosecution of former president Petro Poroshenko.

From Kyrgyzstan to Belarus, incumbent leaders turned to the Kremlin as a model for authoritarian laws and tactics. Kyrgyzstan's government enacted legislation to impose onerous restrictions on nongovernmental organizations that receive funding from abroad. The country's parliamentary elections were also marred by accusations of fraud and inadequate adjudication of disputes, exacerbating a rapid deterioration in political rights. In Belarus, authoritarian president Alyaksandr Lukashenka sought greater integration with Russia and oversaw the liquidation of more than 200 civil society organizations as he attempted to extinguish political opposition and independent civic activism.

Elsewhere in the region, incremental progress was offset by democratic erosion or dismal repression. Armenia, still reeling in the aftermath of its 2020 war with Azerbaijan, approved reforms to the electoral code that will improve transparency and fairness. The political system appeared to stabilize somewhat after snap parliamentary elections, though criminal cases against local opposition figures late in the year raised concerns that the country's democracy remained on shaky ground. Freedom in Georgia, one of the top-performing countries in Eurasia, suffered as journalists, LGBT+ people, and opposition supporters faced growing intimidation and violence. In Turkmenistan, the autocratic government continued to completely deny the presence of COVID-19 in the country—part of a broader lack of transparency in Eurasian governments' pandemic responses.

EUROPE

Open societies struggle to ward off illiberal pressure

EUROPE: STATUS BY POPULATION

EUROPE: STATUS BY COUNTRY

Although Europe remained the best-performing region in Freedom in the World 2022, established democracies endured a deepening crisis of faith amid a rise in illiberal practices across the European Union (EU).

In Slovenia, the government withheld funding from the independent Slovenian Press Agency and targeted the financing of nongovernmental organizations as part of a broader effort to silence its critics. In Hungary, the parliament dealt a blow to the rights of LGBT+ people by adopting legislation that bans the portrayal or promotion of homosexuality to minors in media content and schools. The law, reminiscent of similar measures in Russia, was swiftly condemned by the European Parliament and many EU member states. The Polish government continued its assault on judicial independence, in part by defying an order from the European Court of Justice to disband a flawed new disciplinary chamber in Poland's Supreme Court. The Polish constitutional court's ruling against the primacy of EU law, meanwhile, set the stage for further clashes with the European Commission.

Outside the EU, there were some examples of uneasy progress, as with the improvements under Montenegro's fragile new coalition government. On balance, however, anti-democratic forces appeared to have the upper hand. In Turkey, which once again ranked as the least free country in the region, authorities responded violently to a student protest movement centered on Boğaziçi University and separate demonstrations by advocates of equal rights for women and LGBT+ people. Ankara's undue political influence in Northern Cyprus continued to grow, and the functioning of the territory's parliament was disrupted by opposition boycotts.

MIDDLE EAST

Authoritarians prevail a decade after the Arab Spring

MIDDLE EAST: STATUS BY POPULATION

Total population
262.2 million

MIDDLE EAST: STATUS BY COUNTRY

The 10-year anniversary of the Arab Spring uprisings passed quietly in 2021, with democratic progress largely stalled across an almost uniformly authoritarian Middle East.

A number of highly repressive states held elections that were neither free nor fair. Iran's presidential election featured record-low turnout as voters rejected a tightly managed process in which all significant challengers to the regime-backed candidate were disqualified by the unelected Guardian Council. Syrian president Bashar al-Assad won reelection with a purported 95 percent of the vote in balloting that also lacked any meaningful competition. While Iraq's parliamentary elections were genuinely competitive and had fewer irregularities than in the past, due in part to the presence of independent observers, there were still reports of vote buying, intimidation, and media suppression. Legislative elections were held for the first time in Qatar, but the contest was highly circumscribed by the emir's government, and thousands of Qataris were excluded from voting under restrictive eligibility rules.

Already limited space for civic activism continued to shrink in the region. In the occupied West Bank, Israeli authorities designated six Palestinian human rights groups as terrorist organizations. Months earlier, protests that began in East Jerusalem in response to the displacement of Palestinian residents spread to Israeli cities and towns and touched off discriminatory police violence, vigilantism, and intercommunal strife. Though protests are infrequent in the repressive Persian Gulf monarchies, peaceful protesters in Bahrain staged a sit-in at a prison to highlight inhumane treatment and lack of medical care for detainees, and security personnel used excessive force to disperse the gathering. More positively, when Oman experienced rare demonstrations against poor economic conditions, the reaction from authorities was mild compared with past crackdowns.

WORLD: STATUS BY POPULATION

WORLD: STATUS BY COUNTRY

Economic exploitation of migrant workers and refugees continued to drag down human rights standards in the Middle East. The economic crisis in Lebanon has led to an increase in forced child labor, particularly among the Syrian refugee population, and a similar trend has been ongoing in neighboring Jordan. Exploitation is especially problematic in countries with kafala (sponsorship) systems that give employers undue control over migrant workers, and some governments have taken incremental steps to reform these laws. In 2021, Saudi Arabia began allowing foreign workers to leave the country without approval from their sponsors, but government approval is still required, and key categories of workers were excluded from the change.

Countries in the Spotlight

The following countries featured important developments in 2021 that affected their democratic trajectory, and deserve special scrutiny in 2022.

- Chile: Elections for a constitutional convention and the presidency proceeded with few problems and high levels of legitimacy, bucking a trend of polarization and gridlock that has thwarted reforms in other democracies in recent years.
- Iran: Hard-line candidate Ebrahim Raisi won the presidency after the unelected Guardian Council disqualified all of his major opponents, and record-low turnout signaled voters' frustration with the tightly controlled process.
- Iraq: Iranian political influence dwindled as pro-Iran parties with links to militia groups experienced defeats in parliamentary elections that featured fewer irregularities than past contests.
- Myanmar: The military seized power in a coup to prevent the sitting of a newly elected parliament after its favored party was defeated, then used lethal violence to suppress a determined prodemocracy protest movement.
- Nicaragua: President Daniel Ortega ensured his own reelection by escalating his government's attacks on civil society and overseeing the arrest of several opposition candidates.
- Russia: President Vladimir Putin's regime expanded its crackdown on political opponents and civil society organizations, thwarting any genuine competition in the September parliamentary elections.
- Slovenia: The country suffered a significant decline in civil liberties as Prime Minister Janez Janša's populist government increased its hostility toward civil society groups and the media and continued to undermine independent institutions and the rule of law.
- Sudan: A military coup blocked the country's transition to full civilian rule and democratic elections, leading the "March of Millions" movement to demand change in defiance of bloody crackdowns.
- Thailand: As youth-led protests calling for constitutional reform continued, the government, headed by leaders of the most recent military coup, ramped up prosecutions of demonstrators for violating lèse-majesté laws.
- Zambia: Highly motivated voters turned out to ensure victory for opposition presidential candidate Hakainde Hichilema, overcoming obstacles that included social media shutdowns, restrictions on movement, and political violence.

Freedom in the World 2022

Status Change Explanations

Ecuador: Ecuador's status improved from Partly Free to Free because the year's presidential and legislative elections did not suffer from the types of abuses seen in previous contests, such as the misuse of public resources, and resulted in an orderly transfer of power between rival parties.

Guinea: Guinea's status declined from Partly Free to Not Free because military commanders seized power in a coup, removing President Alpha Condé and dissolving the legislature.

Haiti: Haiti's status declined from Partly Free to Not Free due to the assassination of President Jovenel Moïse, an ongoing breakdown in the electoral system and other state institutions, and the corrosive effects of organized crime and violence on civic life.

Peru: Peru's status improved from Partly Free to Free because the successful election of a new president and Congress served to ease, at least temporarily, a pattern of institutional clashes between the executive and legislative branches that had disrupted governance for a number of years.

Tunisia: Tunisia's status declined from Free to Partly Free because President Kaïs Saïed unilaterally dismissed and replaced the elected government, indefinitely suspended the parliament, and imposed harsh restrictions on civil liberties to suppress opposition to his actions.

Introduction

The Freedom in the World 2022 survey contains reports on 195 countries and 15 territories. Each country report begins with a section containing the following information: population, capital, freedom status (Free, Partly Free, or Not Free), and an “electoral democracy” designation. Each territory report begins with a section containing the same information, except for the capital. The population figures are drawn primarily from the 2021 World Population Data Sheet of the Population Reference Bureau.

The political rights and civil liberties ratings range from 1 to 7, with 1 representing the most free and 7 the least free. The status designation of Free, Partly Free, or Not Free, which is determined by the average of the political rights and civil liberties ratings, indicates the general state of freedom in a country or territory. A brief explanation of status changes is provided for each country or territory as required. Any improvements or declines in the ratings since the previous survey are noted next to the relevant number in each report. For a full description of the methods used to determine the survey’s ratings, please see the chapter on the survey’s methodology.

Following the section described above, each country and territory report is composed of three parts: an overview, bullets on key developments, and an analysis of political rights and civil liberties. The overview provides a succinct, general description that explains the country or territory’s place on the 0–7 rating scale; bullets on key developments summarize key events that took place in 2021; and the section on political rights and civil liberties analyzes the degree of respect for the rights and liberties that Freedom House uses to evaluate freedom in the world. This section is composed of seven parts that correspond to the seven main subcategories in the methodology and justify a country or territory’s score for each indicator. The scores for each indicator, subcategory, and category, along with any changes from the previous year, are noted next to the relevant subheading.

Country Reports

Afghanistan

Population: 39,800,000

Capital: Kabul

Freedom Status: Not Free

Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: Afghanistan's elected government, which had been undermined by an insurgency waged by the Taliban as well as violence, corruption, and flawed electoral processes, nevertheless offered a wide range of individual rights before its collapse in 2021. Since overthrowing the elected government, the Taliban have closed the country's political space; opposition to its rule is not tolerated, while women and minority groups have seen their rights curtailed by the new regime.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- In April, US president Joe Biden announced that US military personnel would be withdrawn from Afghanistan by September 11. In July, President Biden accelerated the withdrawal, with the US military presence in Afghanistan ending in August.
- In August, the Islamic Republic of Afghanistan's elected government was deposed by the Taliban, which led a renewed offensive against it beginning in May. Provincial capitals fell in August and Kabul was overrun on August 15, the same day President Ashraf Ghani fled the country. The Taliban named a cabinet in September, with members coming from its upper echelons.
- Afghans sought to flee their homes and the country in large numbers as the civil conflict concluded. Several countries managed an airlift to allow their citizens and Afghans to depart, with over 122,000 people being evacuated by the United States between late July and the end of August. Some 700,000 people were newly displaced within Afghanistan by year's end.
- After deposing the elected government, the Taliban restricted personal and political freedoms. In September, it reconstituted a Ministry of Vice and Virtue (MVV), which had enforced their interpretation of Sharia (Islamic law) under their previous regime. The new regime has also violently suppressed demonstrations, restricted private discussion perceived as critical of its rule, limited educational opportunities for female students, and targeted supporters of the former government.
- The Islamic State Khorasan Province (IS-K) militant group engaged in violent attacks throughout the year. The IS-K claimed responsibility for an August bombing near Kabul Airport that killed over 170 civilians and 13 US military personnel. IS-K activity continued after the Taliban took power; over 135 people were killed in two mosque attacks in October, while at least 19 were killed when the IS-K attacked a military hospital in Kabul in November.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 1 / 40 (-12)

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 0 / 12 (-3)

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4 (-1)

The Taliban overthrew the elected government in August 2021, after launching a renewed offensive in May. In September, the Taliban declared the formation of the Islamic Emirate of Afghanistan (IEA) and installed an unelected cabinet. Mohammad Hasan Akhund, the head of the movement's Rehbari Shura (Leadership Council), was named prime minister. Haibatullah Akhundzada, the movement's leader, was named the IEA's supreme leader.

Prior to the Taliban takeover, the president was directly elected for up to two five-year terms and could appoint ministers with parliamentary approval. The last republican president, Ashraf Ghani, was declared by the Independent Election Commission (IEC) to have won reelection in September 2019 presidential contest with 50.6 percent of the vote.

Score Change: The score declined from 1 to 0 because the elected president was deposed by the Taliban, who appointed an unelected prime minister.

While Afghans were previously represented by a parliament, no popularly elected body functions under Taliban rule.

Under the 2004 constitution, the National Assembly consisted of the directly elected lower house, the 249-seat Wolesi Jirga (House of the People), and the 102-seat Meshrano Jirga (House of Elders), the upper house. Two-thirds of upper-house members were elected by provincial councils, while the president appointed the remaining third. Ten Wolesi Jirga seats were reserved for the nomadic Kuchi, including at least 3 women, and 65 of the chamber's general seats were reserved for women.

The parliament that was effectively dissolved in 2021 was elected in 2018. Half of all registered voters participated, though the elections were affected by fears of violence, technical issues, and long lines at polling stations.

Score Change: The score declined from 1 to 0 because the elected legislature ceased functioning after the Taliban deposed the country's elected government.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 0 / 4 (-1)

Under the republic, elections were administered by the IEC and disputes adjudicated by the Electoral Complaints Commission, though candidates questioned their independence and competence. Elections were also affected by fraud. While the Taliban did not immediately rule elections out, it abolished both electoral bodies in December 2021.

In late September 2021, the Taliban announced that they would enforce parts of the 1964 constitution that did not contradict their interpretation of Sharia, rejecting the 2004 constitution used by the republic.

Score Change: The score declined from 1 to 0 because the unelected Taliban have not committed to holding new elections since taking power.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 0 / 16 (-7)

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 0 / 4 (-2)

Political parties do not compete for power under Taliban rule. Parties that were active effectively ceased operations after the elected government fell.

Political parties represented a wide range of traditional, Islamist, and liberal views before the republic's collapse. However, they did not consolidate mass support; major parties were defined by relations to prominent figures or factions.

Score Change: The score declined from 2 to 0 because political parties have effectively ceased electoral activities after the elected government was deposed.

Those who oppose the Taliban do not have the opportunity to gain power peacefully. No opposition or nonaligned individuals were included in the cabinet announced in September 2021.

In principle, the opposition had the potential to gain power during the republic's rule, though the aftermath of the 2019 presidential election left their practical ability to do so under question. The 2014 swearing-in of Ashraf Ghani as president represented the republic's only peaceful transfer of executive power.

Score Change: The score declined from 2 to 0 because political opposition is not tolerated under the Taliban.

Some Taliban officials, including at the local and provincial levels, are reportedly open to lobbying and some level of consultation. Afghans who are not Taliban members can sometimes informally petition Taliban using kinship or tribal links. However, no formal method of political participation exists. Political decision-making is opaquely made by Taliban officials.

Under the republic, Afghans' individual political choices were undermined by the Taliban, who sought to undermine elections and intimidate citizens as they waged their insurgency. Individual choices were also influenced by military commanders, who had emerged as local power brokers, as well as civil administrators and moneyed elites.

Score Change: The score declined from 1 to 0 because individuals who are not Taliban members have no opportunity to engage in meaningful political participation.

Women are unable to seek political rights or electoral opportunities under the Taliban. The Taliban included no women in its cabinet in September 2021.

Most Taliban members are ethnic Pashtuns, who are believed to represent 42 percent of the Afghan population. However, members of other ethnic groups also support it. Ethnic Pashtuns dominated the government announced in September 2021, though a deputy prime minister, Abdul Salam Hanafi, is an ethnic Uzbek. Some Taliban members who are not part of the Pashtun ethnic group reportedly hold civil and military posts.

LGBT+ interests are not considered by the Taliban, who declared they would not respect LGBT+ rights in an October 2021 statement.

The republican constitution recognized multiple ethnic and linguistic minorities and provided more guarantees of equal status to minorities than historically available in Afghanistan. Women and traditionally marginalized Shiite Muslims, including most ethnic Hazaras, enjoyed increased levels of political representation and participation. Presidential tickets had included vice-presidential candidates from minority ethnic groups to broaden their appeal. Through this tradition of coalition building, Tajiks, Hazaras, and Uzbeks all had a stake in electoral contests.

Score Change: The score declined from 2 to 0 because political rights for women, ethnic minority groups, and LGBT+ people have been largely suspended under the Taliban.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 1 / 12 (-2)

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 0 / 4 (-1)

The Taliban appointed an unelected government in September 2021. The elected executive and legislative branches of the republic ceased functioning after its August collapse.

The republic's president was charged with setting government policy, assisted by a cabinet and subject to parliamentary oversight. However, the republic's ability to govern was affected by its economic and military reliance on the United States and its allies. During US-Taliban talks, US-led diplomats applied intense pressure on the Ghani administration to accept their favored negotiated compromise. The elected government had no role in those negotiations, which concluded in 2020 with a US commitment to withdraw troops from Afghanistan, despite the agreement's implications for its future.

Score Change: The score declined from 1 to 0 because the country's elected national representatives were deposed by the unelected Taliban.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 1 / 4

Corruption was endemic under the republic, despite the 2016 creation of the Anti-Corruption Justice Centre. Law enforcement agencies and the judiciary were compromised by graft and political pressure.

In November 2021, the Taliban created a commission under the Defense Ministry responsible for removing members "of bad character." In late December, a Taliban spokesman reported that the commission had removed nearly 1,900 Taliban supporters over their conduct, including provincial officials.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 0 / 4 (-1)

The Taliban are not transparent in their decision-making. Official spokesmen selectively release information about government proceedings. The Taliban have initially retained the procurement structure established in 2014 but have not indicated what transparency standards they intend to apply.

Score Change: The score declined from 1 to 0 because the Taliban do not offer transparency in their decision-making processes.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 9 / 60 (-5)

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 4 / 16 (-2)

D1. Are there free and independent media? 1 / 4 (-1)

While Afghanistan had a vibrant media sector during the republic, media freedoms are severely restricted under the Taliban.

Journalists were subjected to violence while the republic was in power in 2021. In March, three Enikass Radio and TV employees were killed by unidentified gunmen. In June, Ariana News anchor Mina Khairi died in a car bomb explosion along with her mother and two other passengers in Kabul. The Taliban have also used force against journalists since taking control of Afghanistan, with journalists being detained and attacked by Taliban for covering demonstrations. The Taliban detained at least 32 journalists since deposing the elected government.

The Taliban instituted restrictions on artistic and media activity since taking power. In October 2021, the MVV reportedly banned live music in some public places. In November, it banned broadcasts of programs featuring female actors, while ordering female news presenters to wear “Islamic hijab,” a term they did not specifically define. The MVV also imposed other guidelines, including a ban on broadcasts showing images of the prophet Muhammad.

The media sector has severely contracted since the collapse of the republic. In late December 2021, Reporters Without Borders (RSF) and the Afghan Independent Journalists Association reported that 231 media outlets closed since the Taliban took power, while 84 percent of female journalists have lost their jobs. Nearly all independent outlets operating outside Kabul have shuttered. Tolo News, an independent outlet, has continued to function and employs female presenters, however.

Score Change: The score declined from 2 to 1 because journalists face reporting restrictions, harassment, and physical violence under the Taliban, and media outlets have closed since the group assumed power.

Religious freedom, which was hampered by violence and discrimination under the republic, has been heavily curtailed by the Taliban. In September 2021, the Taliban reconstituted the MVV, which had previously been used to enforce their interpretation of Sharia. The current ministry is reportedly less strict in its enforcement than under the regime that was deposed in 2001, however.

Members of religious minority groups have faced restrictions and violence from the Taliban and armed groups. Salafists have accused the Taliban of closing houses of worship and detaining and killing members. Afghan Christians sought to leave the country after the Taliban’s takeover, with Taliban reportedly killing Afghans believed to adhere to Christianity.

Hazaras, most of whom practice Shia Islam, have been targeted by the IS-K. The IS-K claimed responsibility for attacking a mosque in Kunduz in October 2021, killing at least 72 people. It also assumed responsibility for an attack on a Kandahar mosque that month, killing at least 63 people. Hazaras have also been targeted by the Taliban; in late August, Taliban fighters reportedly killed 13 Hazaras, many of them former government soldiers, in Daykundi Province. In September, reports surfaced of Taliban forcibly evicting Hazara families from their homes.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 1 / 4

Education in Afghanistan was disrupted by the republic’s collapse. Public universities remained shuttered at year’s end, while some university faculty and students fled the country. Some private universities reopened in mid-September 2021.

The Taliban have focused on segregating the Afghan educational system since taking power. In September 2021, for example, the regime announced the reopening of primary and secondary schools for male students, but not for female students. Girls have been able to attend schools operated by a nongovernmental organization (NGO).

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 1 / 4 (-1)

Afghans cannot freely engage in private discussion without risking offline and online surveillance. Criticism of the new regime or its moral code are grounds for arrest, as are sympathetic statements towards the National Resistance Front (NRF), an armed group that has resisted Taliban rule in the Panjshir Valley. The Taliban also rely on individuals to inform them of neighbors' activities. Taliban search mobile phones for social media comments criticizing the regime.

Score Change: The score declined from 2 to 1 because political discussion is more dangerous for Afghans under the Taliban.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 3 / 12 (-1)

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 1 / 4 (-1)

The Taliban suppress demonstrations and use violence to disperse them when they do occur. Unapproved protests are banned. Female protesters have resorted to live-streaming small-scale indoor demonstrations since the Taliban assumed power.

In a September 2021 briefing, the Office of the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights reported that the Taliban used whips, batons, and live ammunition to disperse protesters. On September 7, two protesters were killed by Taliban in Herat, while Taliban physically attacked female protesters holding an event in Kabul that same day.

Score Change: The score declined from 2 to 1 because the Taliban have violently dispersed protests since taking power.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 1 / 4

Many NGOs suspended operations, closed offices, and sought to evacuate staff when the elected government collapsed. However, NGOs and agencies have since continued to operate in Afghanistan, especially those providing economic and humanitarian support.

While Taliban have attacked and killed NGO workers in the past, they have broadly tolerated a continued NGO presence since taking power, instructing groups to continue the established practice of registering with the Economy Ministry. However, there are no effective protections for NGO staff, who face harassment and arbitrary arrest by Taliban who typically seek to interfere in the distribution of aid.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 1 / 4

Under the 2004 constitution, Afghan workers had broad constitutional protections. However, labor rights were poorly defined and no effective enforcement or dispute-resolution mechanisms were in place. Unions were largely absent from the large informal and agricultural sectors. The rise of the Taliban had no immediate effect on labor rights.

F. RULE OF LAW: 0 / 16 (-2)

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 0 / 4 (-1)

The Taliban installed a judiciary in the areas they controlled during their insurgency. After deposing the elected government in August 2021, the Taliban took complete control of the country's judicial system, appointing judges to civil and military courts. Judges who served under the republic, especially female judges, are unemployed; a significant number went into hiding.

Under the republic, informal justice systems, employing variants of both customary law and Sharia, were widely used to arbitrate disputes, especially in rural areas. This remains the case, though the Taliban have sought to control some local dispute-resolution practices since taking power.

Score Change: The score declined from 1 to 0 because the Taliban have begun installing judges with no transparency over appointment or accountability.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 0 / 4

The Taliban judiciary does not recognize international due process norms. Their judges are supposed to operate under Hanafi jurisprudence. Due process in prosecutions has been further weakened by the abolition of the republic's police force and its criminal investigation organs, which have been replaced by Taliban fighters. Judges and prosecutors rely on confessions and uncorroborated witness testimony.

The Afghan population was acutely vulnerable to armed conflict and violence during 2021, before and after the Taliban takeover.

US forces and the Taliban largely refrained from direct conflict after concluding an agreement in 2020, under which the United States committed to a conditional withdrawal timetable. The Taliban continued to fight the republic's forces, however. In April 2021, US president Biden announced that US troops would be withdrawn by September 11 (in July, Biden accelerated the timetable, with the US military presence being fully removed by the end of August). The Taliban launched a renewed offensive against the government in May, engaging in fierce fighting for control of some district centers. Provincial capitals fell to the Taliban in rapid succession in August. On August 15, Taliban fighters entered Kabul and took control of the city. The UN Assistance Mission in Afghanistan (UNAMA) reported 1,659 civilian deaths and 3,524 injuries during the first half of 2021. The Afghan army's former chief of staff, meanwhile, estimated that 1,000 military personnel were killed and another 1,000 went missing in the final weeks of fighting, with 92,000 service personnel killed throughout the war.

The Taliban engaged in retaliatory violence after their campaign. Some 47 members of the deposed government's security forces were either executed or disappeared between the middle of August and the end of October 2021 according to Human Rights Watch (HRW). In December, the United Nations claimed that over 100 people had been extrajudicially killed by the Taliban for their ties to the former government.

Afghans face the death penalty under the Taliban. In September 2021, Nooruddin Turabi, a founding member, said that the Taliban would carry out executions as well as amputations.

Other armed groups were active during the year. The IS-K engaged in violent activity throughout 2021; UNAMA reported that the IS-K claimed responsibility or was believed responsible for 77 attacks in the first four months of the year. The IS-K also claimed responsibility for a bombing near Kabul Airport in August, which killed over 170 civilians and 13 US military personnel. IS-K activities continued after the elected government collapsed; in November, the IS-K attacked a military hospital in Kabul, killing at least 19 people.

In August 2021, the Taliban fought the NRF in the Panjshir Valley. The Taliban claimed victory in September, though the NRF vowed to continue its operations.

The Taliban removed previous legal and institutional guarantees of equal treatment after deposing the elected government. Women who had worked in government, education, and the media were dismissed. The MVV has restricted women's ability to travel on public transport or without a chaperone.

While the Taliban offered amnesty for those who worked for the deposed government in August 2021, former military personnel, civilian employees, and perceived supporters were subjected to harassment and discrimination. Perceived opponents were excluded from state employment and humanitarian assistance. The Taliban have also engaged in discrimination against members of ethnic minority groups, particularly Tajiks, Hazaras, and Uzbeks.

There is no legal protection for LGBT+ people, who face societal disapproval and discrimination from the Taliban. In a July 2021 interview, a Taliban judge advocated for the execution of men who engage in same-sex activity.

Score Change: The score declined from 1 to 0 because Taliban policies reject protections for ethnic and religious minority groups and women.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 2 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 0 / 4

The Taliban impose few direct restrictions on freedom of movement within the country. However, intrusive checkpoints, designed to ensnare suspected opponents and enforce Taliban codes, can make movement hazardous.

Freedom of movement for women is restricted, with the MVV restricting how far they can travel unaccompanied. Women who do not wear clothing that abides by the ministry's guidance can be prohibited from entering vehicles.

The civil conflict restricted movement and compelled Afghans and citizens of other countries to flee their homes or the country altogether during the year. The Office of the UN High Commissioner for Refugees reported that 700,000 people were newly displaced within Afghanistan during 2021; by the end of the year, 3.4 million were internally displaced by civil conflict. Several countries evacuated residents as the conflict between the republic and Taliban concluded. The United States alone evacuated 122,000 people between late July and the end of August, including US citizens.

Outside of the framework of the organized evacuation program, opportunities for Afghans to seek refuge abroad were curtailed in recent years, as the European Union (EU) attempted to reinforce its external border and member states increased deportations of failed asylum seekers, Iran and Pakistan compelled hundreds of thousands of refugees to return home, and the United States decreased the number of refugees permitted annually. Despite these preexisting barriers, people continued to flee the country after the elected government fell; over 300,000 people entered Iran between September and the end of November 2021 according to the Norwegian Refugee Council. Over 80,000 Afghans applied for asylum within the EU in the first 11 months of the year, many of them doing so after being evacuated from Afghanistan.

The Taliban have historically promised to respect existing property rights and provide enough security to allow for investment. However, the Taliban have forcibly expropriated weapons and armored vehicles since deposing the elected government, showing little regard for whether they were privately owned. There were also multiple reported incidents of burglaries conducted by armed men styling themselves as Taliban during 2021. In November, the Taliban announced that they would investigate property titles issued under the republic.

The Taliban ended the limited formal protections from domestic violence offered by the republic. Shelters for survivors of gender-based violence (GBV) were closed by the Taliban, with some residents reportedly being sent to prisons. Individuals who were convicted of GBV were among those released by the Taliban during their takeover.

The Taliban have explicitly sought to restrict women's freedoms, including control over appearance.

Under the republic, women's choices regarding marriage and divorce were restricted by custom and discriminatory laws, a situation which has been aggravated by the effective loss of protection mechanisms. The forced marriage of young girls to older men or widows to their husbands' male relations was a problem, and many girls were married before the legal age of 16. The courts and the detention system were used to enforce social control of women.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 1 / 4

The economic crisis associated with the Taliban takeover has left Afghans vulnerable to dire economic circumstances and exploitation. Reports of Afghan families selling children into marriage to avoid starvation surfaced after the republic's collapse.

Under the republic, debt bondage was a problem, as was child labor. Most human trafficking victims in Afghanistan are children trafficked internally to work in various industries, become domestic servants, settle debts, or be subjected to sexual exploitation.

Albania

Population: 2,800,000

Capital: Tirana

Freedom Status: Partly Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Albania has a record of competitive elections, though political parties are highly polarized and often organized around leading personalities. Religious freedom and freedom of assembly are generally respected. Corruption and organized crime remain serious problems, and the intermingling of powerful business, political, and media interests inhibits the development of truly independent news outlets.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- General elections were held in April with a voter turnout of 46.3 percent, and saw the ruling Socialist Party (PS) maintain its parliamentary majority after taking 49 percent of the vote; incumbent prime minister Edi Rama retained his position for a third term following the election. International election monitors reported numerous electoral irregularities, including allegations of widespread vote buying and the improper use of state resources by the PS.
- In June, the Assembly voted to impeach President Ilir Meta for allegedly violating the constitution during the April elections. Meta, who denied the charges, remained in office at year's end, pending a Constitutional Court ruling on the legality of the impeachment.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 28 / 40 (+1)

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 9 / 12 (+1)

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 3 / 4

The president is the head of state and is elected by the parliament for a maximum of two five-year terms; the office does not hold executive power, though the president has some authority over the judiciary and the armed forces. The prime minister is the head of government and is designated by the majority party or coalition. Because both the president and prime minister are selected by lawmakers, their legitimacy is generally dependent on the conduct of parliamentary elections.

In April 2017, Ilir Meta, the head of the Socialist Movement of Integration (LSI), was selected as president. In June 2021, 104 of the 140 members of the parliament voted to impeach Meta for allegedly violating the constitution, including by “inciting violence against” the PS during the April elections. Meta denied the charges and condemned the impeachment vote as illegal. He remained in office at year’s end, pending a Constitutional Court ruling on the legality of the impeachment.

PS leader Edi Rama retained his position as prime minister for a third term following the April 2021 parliamentary elections, in which the PS won 49 percent of the vote. The elections were considered competitive by international observers, but featured a number of irregularities, including the misuse of administrative resources by the incumbent PS.

Albania is a parliamentary republic. The unicameral, 140-member Kuvendi (Assembly) is elected through proportional representation in 12 regional districts of varying size corresponding to administrative regions. All members serve four-year terms.

Parliamentary elections were held in April 2021 with a voter turnout of 46.3 percent. The ruling PS maintained its parliamentary majority, winning 49 percent of the vote to take 74 of the 140 seats in the Assembly. The opposition Democratic Party (PD) won 39 percent of the vote, taking 59 seats, while the LSI took just 4 seats.

The 2021 parliamentary elections were administered under electoral reforms that had been adopted the previous year, ensuring the participation of opposition parties, including the PD, which had boycotted previous elections. International election observers reported that the elections were well-organized and competitive. However, the elections were also marked by numerous irregularities, including allegations of widespread vote buying and media bias that allowed the PS to “derive significant advantage from its incumbency.” Despite such flaws, the election results were widely accepted by stakeholders.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 3 / 4 (+1)

Elections are administered by the Central Election Commission (CEC). In January 2020, the parliament established the Political Council, comprised of representatives of the three largest parties, to create a plan to address needed electoral reforms recommended by the OSCE. The parliament adopted several provisions of the Council’s plan throughout 2020 to gradually depoliticize election administration, introduce electronic identification of voters where technically possible, and restructure the CEC, among other changes.

The April 2021 elections were administered by the newly restructured CEC, and were the first polls affected by the numerous electoral reforms adopted the previous year, which required the launch of several new processes, such as electronic voting and counting, creating additional responsibilities for the CEC. Despite concerns about the ability of the CEC to manage the 2021 polls after the parliament’s “extremely hasty” adoption of the electoral amendments the previous year, international observers reported that the April elections proceeded smoothly, and were competently and transparently administered by the commission.

Score Change: The score improved from 2 to 3 because reforms to the electoral process from the previous year resulted in general elections that observers deemed well organized and that stakeholders accepted.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 12 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 3 / 4

Albanian citizens generally have the right to organize in political parties. The two main parties, the PS and the PD, are sharply polarized and given to personality-driven rivalry. Candidates for legislative elections who do not belong to a party currently seated in the parliament must collect a set number of signatures in order to run.

Albania's multiparty system provides ample opportunity for opposition parties to participate in the political process, and elections have resulted in the rotation of power among parties. The PD and LSI boycotted the June 2019 local contests, leaving fewer options for Albanians who voted.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 3 / 4

While individuals are generally free to make their own political choices, powerful economic actors can also shape the political sphere through their media holdings and influence on electoral campaigns. Criminal organizations are also known to influence Albanian politics.

In the runup to the April 2021 general elections, an independent online news outlet reported that the PS had created a database listing the personal information of more than 900,000 voters, including their voting history and "likely voting preferences." Critics, including members of the opposition, have accused the PS of stealing the data from official government websites and using it to "intimidate" voters. The party has repeatedly denied that the database was created or used illegally.

Albanian law guarantees political rights for citizens regardless of their ethnic, racial, lingual, or religious identity.

Roma and other marginalized people remain vulnerable to political exploitation. OSCE monitors noted that Romany individuals faced difficulty registering to vote in 2021 due to a lack of a permanent address.

Though women are underrepresented in the Assembly, a record 12 women were appointed to the 17-member Cabinet in September 2021.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 7 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 3 / 4

Since coming to power in 2017, the PS government has largely been able to formulate and implement policy, though its ability to do so was somewhat impacted by the February 2019 opposition boycott.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 2 / 4

Corruption is pervasive, and the EU has repeatedly called for rigorous implementation of antigraft measures, particularly for corruption within the judiciary. In 2016, constitutional reforms established Albania's Special Anticorruption Structure (SPAK), which is tasked with investigating and prosecuting high-level corruption. In a process monitored by EU and US experts, the government has been vetting judges and prosecutors since 2018, so as to identify and prevent corruption in the justice system. An October 2021 European Commission report praised Albania's anticorruption efforts, specifically noting the success of the vetting mechanisms in reducing judicial corruption.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 2 / 4

A robust law on access to information is not well implemented. Public procurement processes and public finances are frequently opaque, though parliamentary procedures are more open.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 39 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 13 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 2 / 4

While the constitution guarantees freedom of expression, the intermingling of powerful business, political, and media interests inhibits the development of independent news outlets; most are seen as biased toward either the PS or the PD. Reporters have little job security and remain subject to lawsuits, intimidation, and occasional physical attacks by those facing media scrutiny. Print media has continued to experience declining revenue, which has driven down journalists' salaries.

The constitution provides for freedom of religion, which is generally upheld in practice.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 3 / 4

The government typically does not limit academic freedom, though teachers in several districts have faced pressure ahead of elections to participate in political rallies. Access to higher education is affected by corruption.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 4 / 4

There are no significant restrictions on free and open private discussion, including for online blogs and social media.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 8 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 3 / 4

Freedom of assembly is generally respected. Demonstrations by opposition parties and civic groups are common.

In 2020, the government banned public gatherings as a part of the COVID-19-related state of emergency. Despite the ban, several large demonstrations were held throughout the year, and sometimes turned violent.

Several demonstrations against gender-based violence took place during 2021, with thousands of protesters demanding that the government increase official efforts to combat domestic violence in the country. Other protests were also held throughout the year, including some political rallies that turned violent. In January, demonstrators throwing stones and attempting to storm the headquarters of the PD were forcibly dispersed by police using tear gas and water cannons, leading to several injuries.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 3 / 4

Nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) generally function without restriction but have limited funding due to dependence on foreign donors and policy influence.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 2 / 4

The constitution guarantees workers the rights to organize and bargain collectively, and most have the right to strike. However, effective collective bargaining remains limited, and union members have little protection against discrimination by employers.

F. RULE OF LAW: 9 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 2 / 4

The constitution provides for an independent judiciary, but the underfunded courts are subject to political pressure and influence, and public trust in judicial institutions is low. Corruption in the judiciary remains a serious problem, and convictions of high-ranking judges for corruption and abuse of power are historically rare.

In March 2021, the Assembly adopted amendments to 10 laws in an effort to strengthen the efficiency of the judiciary. The reevaluation of all judges and prosecutors, in line with the new judicial vetting mechanisms introduced in recent years, continued throughout 2021, and received praise from several international governance bodies for its effectiveness. All priority cases had been reviewed by September; more than 60 percent of all cases reviewed have resulted in dismissals “due to unexplained assets.”

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 2 / 4

Constitutional guarantees of due process are upheld inconsistently. Trial procedures can be affected by corruption within the judicial system and are sometimes closed to the public. Legal counsel is not always provided to those that cannot afford their own; however, a number of local NGOs offer free legal aid to those unable to access legal services through the state.

Reports of police abuse of detainees continues. Prison inmates suffer from poor living conditions and a lack of adequate medical treatment. Drug-related crime remains a problem, as Albania is a transit country for heroin smugglers.

Tribal law is practiced in parts of northern Albania, and sometimes involves revenge killings.

Roma face significant discrimination in education, health care, employment, and housing. A 2010 law bars discrimination based on race and several other categories, including sexual orientation and gender identity, and a 2013 reform of the criminal code introduced protections against hate crimes and hate speech based on sexual orientation and gender identity. However, bias against LGBT+ people is strong in practice. Women are under-represented in the workforce. Women living in rural areas have fewer opportunities for employment and education.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 9 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 3 / 4

Albanians generally enjoy freedom of movement, though criminal activity and practices related to historically predominant honor codes limit these rights in some areas. People are generally free to change their place of residence or employment.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 2 / 4

Numerous property-restitution cases related to confiscations during the communist era remain unresolved. Illegal construction is a major problem, as is bribery linked to government approval of development projects.

The government generally does not place explicit restrictions on social freedoms. No progress has been made to recognize same-sex marriages.

Domestic violence is widespread. Police are poorly equipped to handle cases of domestic violence or spousal rape, which is often not understood to be a crime. According to UN Women, 52.9 percent of Albanian women have experienced domestic violence in their lives. In the first nine months of 2021, 16 women were killed by their partners.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 2 / 4

Albania has relatively robust labor laws but lacks the capacity to enforce workplace safety and other protections. Conditions in the manufacturing, construction, and mining sectors are often substandard and put workers at risk.

While Albania continues to struggle with human trafficking, authorities are becoming more proactive in addressing the issue. In recent years, the government has cooperated with civil society leaders, creating the Advisory Board of Victims of Trafficking and increasing victim assistance in criminal proceedings with a new Development Center for Criminal Justice for Minors.

Algeria

Population: 45,100,000

Capital: Algiers

Freedom Status: Not Free

Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: Political affairs in Algeria have long been dominated by a closed elite based in the military and the ruling party, the National Liberation Front (FLN). While there are multiple opposition parties in Parliament, elections are distorted by fraud, and electoral processes are not transparent. Other concerns include the suppression of street protests, legal restrictions on media freedom, and rampant corruption. The rise of the Hirak protest movement in 2019 has put pressure on the regime, leading it to crack down on dissent in the following years.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- Abdelaziz Bouteflika, the longest-serving president in Algerian history, died in September. Bouteflika resigned in 2019 after his efforts to serve a fifth term sparked the Hirak and after the armed forces withdrew their support.
- The ruling FLN and the allied National Democratic Rally (RND) were the two largest parties in the lower house of Parliament after elections were held in June. The Islamist Movement of Society for Peace (MSP) and El Binaa Movement said the polls were marred by fraud, while the Hirak boycotted the contests. Turnout stood at 23 percent.
- Hirak protests, which were suspended in 2020 due to COVID-19, resumed in February. The Interior Ministry banned unauthorized rallies in May in an effort to stop the ongoing protests. The authorities also responded with mass arrests; over 1,000 people were arrested for appearing at nationwide rallies held on May 14.
- In May, the government declared the Movement for the Self-Determination of Kabylie (MAK) and the Rachad—which counts members of the banned Islamic Salvation Front (FIS) among its members—terrorist organizations. The government blamed the MAK for causing forest fires that affected several provinces in August and went on to arrest MAK members as the year progressed.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 10 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 3 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 1 / 4

The president, who is directly elected for up to two five-year terms, remains the dominant figure in the executive branch, though some authority was shifted to the prime minister under constitutional reforms adopted in 2020. In 2008, term limits were removed, allowing Abdelaziz Bouteflika to serve four terms, but they were reinstated in 2016 when Parliament passed a constitutional reform package. Bouteflika's decision to seek another term, which would have been his fifth, sparked the Hirak protests in 2019. Bouteflika resigned that April after losing the support of the armed forces.

Bouteflika ally Abdelkader Bensalah, the head of Parliament's upper house, served as interim president during a transitional period, and a presidential election was held in December 2019. Former prime minister Abdelmajid Tebboune won in the first round with 58 percent of the vote, defeating four other candidates. Abdelaziz Belaïd, a 2014 presidential candidate and the only contestant who had not served in cabinet posts under Bouteflika, won 7 percent. The Constitutional Council reported a turnout of just under 40 percent, and one outside expert suggested a figure as low as 20 percent. Protesters called the election a sham and orchestrated a boycott. Outside observers were not allowed to enter the country to monitor the poll.

The president nominates the prime minister after consulting with the parliamentary majority. Abdelaziz Djerad, who became prime minister in 2019, resigned in June 2021. Tebboune named Finance Minister Ayman Benabderrahmane as Djerad's successor later that month.

The 407 members of the National People's Assembly, the lower house of Parliament, are directly elected to five-year terms, which can only be renewed once under the 2020 constitutional reforms. Parliament was dissolved in February 2021 and early elections were held in June. The ruling FLN won 98 seats, while the allied RND won 58. The MSP won 65 seats, the Future Front won 48, and the moderate Islamist El Binaa Movement won 39. No other party won more than 10 seats, though 84 independent lawmakers were elected.

The MSP and the El Binaa Movement alleged that the elections were marred by fraud, while the Hirak boycotted the polls. Nationwide turnout stood at 23 percent. Preliminary turnout figures in Bejaïa and Tizi Ouzou stood at under 1 percent. The Independent National Authority for Elections (ANIE) reported that over 360 polling facilities were shuttered nationwide due to looting and other disruptions.

The president appoints one-third of the members of the upper house, the Council of the Nation, which has 144 members serving six-year terms. The other two-thirds are indirectly elected by local and provincial assemblies. Half of the chamber's mandates are renewed every three years. The FLN secured 29 of the 48 indirectly elected seats at stake in December 2018, with the RND and smaller factions or independents taking the remainder. Upper-house elections due in December 2021 were delayed to 2022.

Local and regional elections were held amid low turnout in late November 2021. The FLN and RND won the most town-hall seats and a plurality of regional-assembly seats, while the El Binaa Movement and the MSP did poorly.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 1 / 4

Algeria's elections, which were previously administered by the Interior Ministry, were often subject to government interference, but pressure from protesters in 2019 forced the government to establish the ANIE. However, the slate of presidential candidates that was ultimately announced ahead of the December 2019 presidential election was dominated by Bouteflika-era officials, raising doubts about the efficacy of the electoral reforms. The absence of international election monitors drew criticism from Algerian civil society.

Constitutional reforms were approved by voters in a 2020 referendum that was marred by low turnout. Reform-package opponents, including Hirak activists, had called for a boycott after being prevented from campaigning for a "no" vote or airing their views on state media.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 4 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 1 / 4

The Interior Ministry must approve political parties before they can operate legally. Parties cannot form along explicitly ethnic lines. The FIS, which swept the 1990 local and 1991 national elections that preceded Algeria's decade-long civil war, remains banned. Since the Hirak emerged in 2019, the authorities have intensified their repression of opposition groups, especially parties espousing separatism, Islamist groups, and parties perceived as closely aligned to the Hirak.

In April 2021, the Interior Ministry accused the opposition Union for Change and Progress of operating without its sanction and petitioned the courts to suspend it in May. That same month, the government sought to provisionally suspend the Socialist Workers' Party. Both parties, which have supported the Hirak, remained active at year's end.

In May 2021, the High Security Council declared the Rachad, an organization that includes former FIS members, and the MAK terrorist organizations. The same body accused the Rachad and the MAK of involvement in the August murder of activist Djamel Bensmail. In September, the National Gendarmerie announced that 30 people, including 7 MAK members, were detained during an investigation into forest fires that affected several provinces in August; the government ultimately blamed the MAK for causing those fires. Also in September, police arrested 27 MAK members in Kherrata and Beni Ourtilane, accusing them of “attempting to sow discord and terror.”

Opposition parties play a marginal role in Parliament, and their campaigns are regularly curtailed by the government. Election boycotts by opposition groups are not uncommon.

Opposition leaders have also been subject to detention and prosecution. Karim Tabbou of unrecognized Democratic and Social Union was briefly detained ahead of the June 2021 elections. Later that month, Democratic and Social Movement leader Fethi Ghares was arrested for insulting the president and disseminating information that could “undermine public order.” Ghares remained in pretrial detention at year’s end.

B3. Are the people’s political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 1 / 4

Since Bouteflika’s resignation, the military has maintained its long-standing influence on decision making, with General Ahmed Gaïd Salah playing a key role until his death in 2019. The military has since remained the most influential political actor in Algeria, thanks to its lack of accountability and vast resources.

Allegations and scandals involving corruption and financial influence in the selection of political candidates, as well as vote-buying during elections, have surfaced in recent years. After Bouteflika’s resignation, Gaïd Salah initiated an anticorruption campaign targeting entrepreneurs and officials linked with the former administration, which he claimed was aimed at reducing the improper influence of these groups on domestic political decisions.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 1 / 4

No specific ethnic or religious group dominates the main state institutions, which tend to include both Arabs and Amazigh (Berber) officials. Kabylie-based parties associated with the Amazigh community, like the Rally for Culture and Democracy and the Socialist Forces Front, have controlled a handful of municipalities, but their activities are often curtailed by the military, and some ethnic Berbers have been targeted by the authorities for mobilizing in support of their political interests.

Women remain reluctant to run for office, are often unable to secure meaningful influence within Parliament, and are more likely to lose intraparty debates. Women won only 8 percent of lower-house seats in the June 2021 elections.

LGBT+ people are politically marginalized and have little practical ability to advocate for their political interests.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 3 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 1 / 4

The military has historically served as the ultimate arbiter of policy disputes in Algeria, and elected leaders have relied on its support to maintain office. The loss of military backing played a significant role in Bouteflika's resignation. The army chief of staff continues to wield considerable influence under President Tebboune.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 1 / 4

Inadequate anticorruption laws, a lack of official transparency, low levels of judicial independence, and bloated bureaucracies contribute to widespread corruption at all levels of government. The anticorruption investigations that do occur are often used to settle scores between factions within the regime. The constitutional reforms passed in 2020 included provisions for an Authority for Transparency and for the Prevention of and Fight against Corruption, as well as a ban on combining roles in public office and private business.

Bouteflika's former political and economic allies received harsh prison sentences after his 2019 resignation as part of Gaïd Salah's anticorruption campaign. In January 2021, an Algiers court upheld corruption-related prison sentences issued against former prime ministers Ahmed Ouyahia and Abdelmalek Sellal in 2019. Ouyahia and Sellal reportedly received additional prison time in September 2021 but received effective reductions in December.

In August 2021, Mohamed Abdellah, a former border guard, was extradited from Spain on terrorism charges; Abdellah accused the Algerian authorities of targeting him for denouncing corruption within the border patrol before fleeing to Spain in 2018.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 1 / 4

Algeria lacks access-to-information legislation. There is considerable opacity surrounding official decision-making procedures, the publication of official acts is rarely timely, and rules on asset disclosure by government officials are weak and poorly enforced. The 2020 constitutional revision introduced a requirement for all appointed and elected officials to declare their assets at the beginning and end of their terms, and obliges the public administration to justify its decisions within a time period to be determined by law. While the revised constitution nominally guarantees the right to access information, it includes vague exceptions for "the rights of others, the legitimate interests of businesses, and the requirements of national security."

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 22 / 60D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 6 / 16*D1. Are there free and independent media? 1 / 4

Although some newspapers are privately owned and some journalists remain aggressive in their coverage of government affairs, most papers rely on government agencies for printing and advertising, encouraging self-censorship. Authorities sometimes block distribution of independent news outlets that are based abroad or online. In 2020, for example, the websites of Maghreb Emergent, Radio M, and Interlignes became unavailable to Algerian users. Viewers can access unlicensed private television channels located in Algeria but legally based abroad, though these are subject to government crackdowns. In August 2021, the Communications Ministry ordered privately owned Lina TV to stop broadcasting, saying the station was unaccredited.

In 2020, Parliament approved a law criminalizing "fake news" that undermines public order and security; offenders can receive one- to five-year sentences. Under a 2020 decree, news sites must be directed by Algerian nationals and based physically in Algeria, report income sources, and keep an archive of at least six months. Websites in French or other foreign languages must be approved by a special authority for online media.

Authorities use these and other legal mechanisms to restrict media activity. Journalists and bloggers are frequently subjected to brief detentions, short jail terms, suspended sentences, or fines for offenses including defamation and “undermining national unity.” In addition, journalists covering demonstrations or who are close to the Hirak have been arbitrarily arrested and interrogated. In May 2021, Radio M and Maghreb Emergent editor in chief Ihsane El Kadi was placed under court supervision over charges including “undermining national unity.” In June, El Kadi was briefly detained ahead of that month’s legislative elections. In September, journalists Hassan Bouras and Mohamed Mouloudj were placed in custody over their alleged links to the Rachad and the MAK.

Foreign outlets are also subject to government interference. In June 2021, the government withdrew France 24’s authorization to operate in Algeria, alleging that the outlet engaged in “repeated hostility” towards national institutions. In July, the Communications Ministry revoked the accreditation of Saudi outlet Al Arabiya.

Algeria’s population is overwhelmingly Sunni Muslim. Members of religious minorities, including Christians and non-Sunni Muslims, suffer from state persecution and interference. Authorities have cracked down on the small Ahmadi minority, claiming that its members denigrate Islam, threaten national security, and violate laws on associations. Religious communities may only gather to worship at state-approved locations.

Accusations of nonbelief or blasphemy can draw criminal punishments. In early 2021, Hamid Soudad, a Christian, was sentenced to five years’ imprisonment and a 100,000-Algerian-dinar ($740) fine for “blasphemy.” In April, Saïd Djabelkheir, an expert on Islam, was sentenced to three years’ imprisonment for commenting on Islamic texts. Djabelkheir remained free as he sought an appeal.

Proselytizing by non-Muslims is illegal. In March 2021, an Oran court upheld a prison sentence and a fine against a Christian pastor and his friend for proselytizing.

Authorities have engaged in a crackdown on the Algerian Protestant Church (EPA) since 2017, though the EPA had been legally recognized in 1974. In June 2021, a court in Oran ordered the closure of three Protestant churches.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 2 / 4

Authorities generally do not interfere directly with the operations of universities, but debate is circumscribed in practice due to restrictive laws that limit speech more broadly. Academic work is also affected by state censorship of domestically published and imported books. Student organizations were active in the Hirak, with members calling for political reforms. The authorities occasionally resorted to violence to suppress these demonstrations.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 2 / 4

Private discussion and the public expression of personal views are relatively unhindered when they do not focus on certain sensitive topics, but social media users are subject to prosecution for critical comments that touch on the government or religion. The government monitors internet activity in the name of national security and does not disclose information about the program’s targets or range, which is thought to be extensive.

The authorities are known to prosecute social media users, particularly Hirak supporters. In January 2021, activist Walid Kechida received a three-year prison term and a 500,000-dinar

($3,700) fine for posting satirical content on Facebook. In August, two Facebook users were arrested for aiming to espouse pro-Rachad views on the social network. In October, Mohad Gasmi, a HIRAK supporter and activist for the unemployed, was sentenced to five years' imprisonment over his social media activity; Gasmi had been charged with "praising terrorism."

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 3 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 1 / 4

Legal restrictions on freedom of assembly remain in place but are inconsistently enforced. HIRAK protests were sometimes tolerated by the authorities, though they used force and engaged in arbitrary arrest to preempt or disrupt some rallies.

HIRAK organizers suspended their activities in March 2020 as the novel coronavirus spread worldwide, but protests resumed in February 2021. In May, the Interior Ministry banned unauthorized rallies and required that permits include start and stop times for protests as well as the names of organizers. The government also used terrorism charges to impede the HIRAK; in April, the public prosecutor in Oran charged 15 supporters, including journalist Saïd Boudour, with terrorism. The case against four of the defendants was moved to an antiterrorism court in Algiers in September.

Police also engaged in mass arrests as protests continued, with officers regularly arresting scores of people during events. The National Committee for the Liberation of Detainees (CNLD) reported that over 1,000 people were arrested for participating in nationwide protests held on May 14. While many protesters were quickly released, some remained in detention for long periods; in November, the CNLD reported that protesters and activists were among the 231 people who remained in detention.

The 2012 law on associations effectively restricts the formation, funding, and activities of nongovernmental organizations (NGOs). Permits and receipts of application submission are required to establish and operate NGOs, but organizations often face considerable delays and bureaucratic obstacles when attempting to obtain such documents, leaving them in a legally precarious position.

In May 2021, the Interior Ministry moved to dissolve the Youth Action Rally, an NGO that has supported the HIRAK, citing its alleged violation of the law on associations. In October, an administrative court ruled in favor of its dissolution.

NGOs must notify the government of staffing changes and submit detailed reports on their funding; those that accept foreign funding without government approval risk fines or imprisonment.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 1 / 4

The country's main labor federation, the General Union of Algerian Workers, has been criticized for its close relationship to the government and for its failure to advocate for workers' interests.

Workers require government approval to establish new unions, and this is difficult to obtain in practice, leaving many unions without legal status. Authorities routinely clamp down on independent unions. The Autonomous National Union of Electricity and Gas Workers, an independent union that represents workers at the National Society for Electricity and Gas, a public utility, has been repeatedly harassed by the authorities in recent years. In June 2021, Ramzi Derder, a National Federation of Informal Workers member, was arrested on charges including terrorism.

F. RULE OF LAW: 6 / 16F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 1 / 4

The judiciary is susceptible to pressure from the civilian government and the military. Judges are appointed by the High Council of the Judiciary (CSM), which is headed by the president, although the 2020 constitutional reforms removed the justice minister and attorney general from the body. Two representatives of the judges' union and the chair of the National Human Rights Council were added.

Concerns regarding the judiciary's independence persist despite these reforms. In May 2021, the CSM expelled Sadedin Merzoug, a Hirak supporter, from the judiciary for obstructing justice and violating his duty of confidentiality.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 1 / 4

The lack of judicial and prosecutorial independence often erodes the due process rights of defendants, particularly in politically sensitive trials against former officials or civic activists. Lengthy delays in bringing cases to trial are common. Prosecutors' requests to extend pretrial detention periods are typically granted. Security forces frequently conduct warrantless searches and engage in arbitrary arrests and short-term detentions.

A 2006 reconciliation law gave immunity to Islamist and state perpetrators of serious crimes during the civil war, while compensating families of those who were subject to such crimes, which included forced disappearances. The reconciliation law also criminalized public discussion on the fate of the disappeared.

Allegations of torture have decreased since the civil war's end, but human rights activists still accuse the police of using excessive force and abusing detainees. In February 2021, Walid Nekiche, a student, accused security officers of sexually assaulting and torturing him after his 2019 arrest, prompting prosecutors to open a preliminary investigation. In May, Nekiche criticized the investigation's pace.

Prison conditions are poor; in 2020, the online outlet Algérie Part reported that inmates at Algiers' Harrach prison faced significant overcrowding and poor hygiene.

Terrorist groups, including Al-Qaeda in the Islamic Maghreb (AQIM) and the Islamic State militant group, continue to operate in Algeria. However, attacks have grown less frequent in recent years. In January 2021, five people were killed and three were injured by a roadside bomb in Tébessa Province. AQIM reportedly claimed responsibility for placing the explosive but denied targeting civilians.

Officials have made gradual efforts to address the Amazigh community's cultural demands. Tamazight, the Berber language, became a national language in 1995, allowing it to be taught officially in schools serving Amazigh areas. Tamazight received the status of an official language nationwide through a 2016 constitutional amendment, meaning it could be used in administrative documents. The 2020 constitutional revisions made it impossible to change the status of Tamazight as a national language. However, Arabic remains the prevailing language of government.

The constitution guarantees gender equality, but women continue to face both legal and societal discrimination. Many women receive lower wages than men in similar positions, and there are few women in company leadership positions. Sexual harassment, while punishable with fines and jail time, is nevertheless common in workplaces. NGOs dedicated to women's rights have become more vocal as part of the Hirak, calling for a renewed commitment to the constitutional promise of gender equality.

LGBT+ people face discrimination and violence, and many LGBT+ activists have fled the country. Same-sex sexual activity is punishable with prison sentences as long as two years. While prosecutions for such acts have declined in recent years, LGBT+ Algerians face mistreatment at the hands of police and discrimination by health providers and employers. In 2020, 2 people received prison terms and another 42 received suspended sentences after they were arrested at a clandestine gay wedding in Constantine.

About 175,000 Sahrawis from Western Sahara live in refugee camps in the Tindouf area, near the border with Morocco. The camps have been present since 1975, in a remote desert region with limited job opportunities. About 90,000 of the residents are considered "vulnerable" by the Office of the UN High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR), as they rely on humanitarian assistance for food, water, and education.

Sub-Saharan African migrants, including refugees and asylum seekers, are subject to racial discrimination in Algeria and are often arbitrarily arrested and deported from the country—or simply abandoned at the southern desert borders—without being given the opportunity to challenge the actions in court. In the first quarter of 2021, Algeria sent nearly 3,800 West African migrants to areas near the border with Niger. Algerian authorities sent scores of migrants to the border with Niger after it reopened in July. In September, as diplomatic tensions rose between Algiers and Rabat, Algeria deported about 40 Moroccan migrants to Morocco.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 7 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 2 / 4

While most citizens are relatively free to travel domestically and abroad, the authorities closely monitor and limit access to visas for non-Algerians. Men of military draft age cannot leave the country without official consent. The land border between Algeria and Morocco remains closed. Police reportedly limit the movement of sub-Saharan African migrants attempting to reach the Mediterranean coast. Married women younger than 18 must obtain the permission of their husbands to travel abroad.

In response to the COVID-19 pandemic, the authorities imposed significant restrictions on domestic and international freedom of movement in 2020 and 2021; curfews and other controls fluctuated along with the rates of infection.

The government plays a dominant role in the economy, leaving little room for private competitors. Cronyism is also a major obstacle to private enterprise, with businesspeople who are not aligned with the regime often facing harassment by the authorities. Numerous regulations and their flawed implementation make Algeria one of the most difficult environments in the world in which to establish and operate a business. Inheritance rules favor men over women.

Women do not enjoy equal rights in marriage and divorce under the family code, which is based on Islamic law. Among other provisions, women must obtain a male guardian's permission to marry, and the father is the legal guardian of his children. No law addresses spousal rape.

Domestic violence is common, and the laws against it are weak; for example, cases can be dropped if the victim forgives the alleged abuser. Women's rights groups report that between 100 and 200 women are killed in domestic abuse incidents each year. In late January 2021, public-television journalist Tinhinane Laced was killed by her spouse in their Algiers home.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 1 / 4

The weak rule of law, government involvement in the economy, and bureaucratic obstacles pose major barriers to economic opportunity and social mobility. Laws against unsafe or abusive working conditions are poorly enforced.

A 2009 law criminalized all forms of trafficking in persons, and Algeria reported its first conviction under the law in 2015. In recent years, the government has made an effort to enforce the ban through prosecutions and has provided protection for victims, though not systematically. Undocumented sub-Saharan African migrants are particularly susceptible to labor exploitation, including through the practice of debt bondage, as well as sexual exploitation.

Andorra

Population: 80,000

Capital: Andorra la Vella

Freedom Status: Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Andorra has a parliamentary system of government and regularly holds free and fair elections. Political rights and civil liberties are generally respected. However, the country has strict naturalization criteria, and more than 50 percent of the population consists of noncitizens who do not have the right to vote. Among other outstanding concerns, abortion remains completely prohibited, and there is a notable wage gap between men and women. The small Muslim and Jewish communities lack dedicated cemeteries, and the country has no recognized mosque.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- In June, authorities dropped slander charges against Vanessa Mendoza Cortés, the leader of the women's rights organization Stop Violence and a significant advocate for legalizing abortion. She had been charged in July 2020 for ostensibly slandering the co-princes and state institutions by testifying before a UN body in 2019 about conditions for women in Andorra and the abortion ban.
- In December, Parliament approved a transparency law that requires its members to report conflicts of interests and declare their assets. The law also requires authorities to provide information on the remuneration of civil servants and senior officials, as well as on public tenders and contracts.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 38 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 12 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

Andorra has a parliamentary system, with a prime minister elected by and accountable to the legislature. The legitimacy of the prime minister, usually the head of the party with the most seats, rests largely on the conduct of parliamentary elections, which have historically been competitive and credible. Xavier Espot Zamora, the new leader of the ruling Democrats for Andorra (DA) party, became prime minister in 2019 following that year's elections.

Two "co-princes," the French president and the Roman Catholic bishop of La Seu d'Urgell, Spain, serve jointly as Andorra's ceremonial heads of state.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

Members of the unicameral, 28-member Consell General are directly elected every four years through a mixed voting system. In the 2019 elections, the DA led with 11 seats, followed by the Social Democratic Party (PS) with 7, the Liberals of Andorra (LA) and the new conservative party Third Way (TV) with 4 each, and the new social-liberal party Committed Citizens (CC) with 2. The LA and CC joined the DA in a governing coalition. The polls were considered competitive, credible, and well-administered.

The Electoral Law, which was last changed in 2014 to introduce regulations on campaign finance, provides a sound framework for free and fair elections. The Electoral Board supervises elections impartially. However, the law does not provide a formal role for international or citizen observers.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 15 / 16B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 4 / 4

Political parties may form and operate freely, and there are a number of active parties in Andorra. Two new parties, TV and CC, made their debut in the 2019 elections.

The country has experienced multiple democratic transfers of power between rival parties, most recently in 2011, when the DA replaced a government led by the PS. Opposition parties are well represented in the Consell General and deprived the DA of its outright majority in the 2019 elections.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 4 / 4

Citizens and political figures are generally able to make political choices without undue interference from external forces.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 3 / 4

More than 50 percent of the population consists of noncitizens—mostly from nearby states—who do not have the right to vote in national elections or run for elected office.

Under Andorra's restrictive naturalization criteria, one must marry a resident Andorran or live in the country for more than 20 years to qualify for citizenship. Prospective citizens are also required to learn Catalan, the national language.

No specific policies encourage the political participation of women, but women are active in politics, and after the 2019 elections they held 50 percent of the seats in the legislature. LGBT+ people are also free to participate in politics, and several parties advocate for their interests.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 11 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 3 / 4

Elected representatives generally exercise their powers without improper influence from unelected or nonstate actors. However, in recent years the Vatican has threatened to force the bishop of La Seu d'Urgell, Joan-Enric Vives i Sicília, to resign as co-prince if the Andorran government were to decriminalize abortion, a move that would likely cause a constitutional crisis. Similar threats were made in 2009 by the other co-prince, former French president Nicolas Sarkozy, who stated that he would resign if Andorra failed to reform its banking system. Neither co-prince is elected, directly or indirectly, by Andorran voters.

Government corruption is not viewed as a pressing issue in Andorra. Over the past several years, the government has made progress on financial-sector reforms designed to prevent abuses of the country's banking system that could facilitate domestic or transnational corruption. Nonresidents must make certain disclosures about their bank accounts. In 2019, the parliament adopted legislation to strengthen existing safeguards against money laundering and terrorist financing. In December 2021, Parliament approved a transparency law that requires its members to report conflicts of interests and declare their assets.

Nevertheless, the Council of Europe's Group of States against Corruption (GRECO) expressed in a December 2021 report a lack of progress with other anticorruption legislation, finding that only 5 of their 13 prior recommendations had been satisfactorily addressed.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 4 / 4

The government operates openly in practice. Among other resources, it publishes a regular bulletin, accessible online, that documents government activity, budgetary processes, public procurement, and asset disclosures. Since 2017, the Ministry of Territorial Planning has sponsored a participatory budget process, allowing members of the public to help set spending priorities. The parliamentary rules of procedure were amended in 2019, obliging Parliament to inform the public about its activities. The December 2021 transparency law also requires authorities to provide information on the remuneration of civil servants and senior officials, as well as on public tenders and contracts.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 55 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 14 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 3 / 4

There are several daily and weekly newspapers, and the country's only domestic television station is operated by the public broadcaster Ràdio i Televisió d'Andorra. Residents have access to a variety of foreign media services. While press freedom is generally respected, criminal defamation laws remain on the books, and business, political, and religious interests have historically influenced media coverage; reporting on the activities of Andorra's banks has been particularly difficult. The biggest media outlets are dependent on state advertising, which limits their opportunities to criticize the government.

Freedom of religion is generally upheld, but the Roman Catholic Church enjoys a privileged position that allows it to draw on some state support and bypass some bureaucratic processes that other faith groups must adhere to.

Despite years of negotiations between the Muslim community and the government, there is no recognized mosque for the country's roughly 2,000 Muslims. The government has organized meetings with Jewish and Muslim communities to discuss the possible establishment of a special cemetery where those groups could conduct burials according to their customs and beliefs, but little progress has been made.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

There are no restrictions on academic freedom, and the educational system is free from indoctrination.

There are no significant constraints on personal expression or freedom of private discussion. Authorities are not known to illegally monitor private online communications. However, authorities drew up slander charges activist Vanessa Mendoza Cortés in 2020, who advocated for safe abortions, which Amnesty International and other international human rights groups called an attack on freedom of expression. The charges were dropped in June 2021.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 11 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

Andorran law provides for freedom of assembly, and the government respects this right in practice. Demonstrations against government policies and in response to other social and political controversies take place on occasion. Authorities imposed temporary restrictions on large gatherings during 2020 to limit the spread of COVID-19. In 2021 protests against the prohibition on abortion drew hundreds of participants.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 4 / 4

Various nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) function without restriction. Human rights groups are generally able to publish their findings and advocate for improvements without repercussions.

However, Vanessa Mendoza Cortés, leader of the women's rights organization Stop Violence, was charged in July 2020 with slandering the co-princes and state institutions by testifying in 2019 before a UN body about conditions for women in Andorra and the abortion ban. The maximum penalty for slander is four years in prison. In June 2021, authorities dropped Mendoza Cortés's slander charges.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 3 / 4

The right to unionize is protected by law and the constitution, and a new labor law that took effect in 2019 established regulations for collective bargaining and the right to strike.

However, unions and the political opposition characterized the law as a setback, arguing in part that it placed unnecessary constraints on the right to strike and increased job insecurity. There are no laws in place to penalize antiunion discrimination.

In 2018, Andorra experienced its first major strike in 85 years, when civil servants walked out to protest reforms to their contracts proposed by the Martí government.

F. RULE OF LAW: 15 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 4 / 4

The judiciary is impartial and independent and is generally free from pressure from the government. Judges are appointed and supervised by the Higher Council of Justice; the two co-princes, the speaker of parliament, and the prime minister each select one of the council's five members, and the fifth is elected by judges and magistrates.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 4 / 4

Defendants enjoy the presumption of innocence and the right to a fair trial, and due process is generally upheld in the criminal justice system. The constitution prohibits arbitrary arrest and imprisonment, but police can detain suspects for up to 48 hours without charge.

Andorra is free from war and insurgencies, violent crimes rates are low, and law enforcement agents are not known to use excessive force against civilians. Prison conditions are adequate.

Though the 2019 law on equal treatment and nondiscrimination focused primarily on combating gender discrimination, it includes comprehensive protections against discrimination based on race, ethnicity, age, disability, sexual orientation, gender identity or expression, and other such categories. The legislation provided enforcement mechanisms, including fines, and also sought to address a persistent gender pay gap, estimated at 22 percent and as high as 40 percent in some sectors. A report published by a women's rights organization in 2020 described ongoing problems including discrimination in the labor market and gender-based violence (GBV).

Andorra provides temporary protection and services to refugees and asylum seekers, but no law allows the government to grant asylum or refugee status.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 15 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

There are few restrictions on freedom of movement, and people are generally free to change their place of residence, employment, and education. The government imposed temporary restrictions on travel and internal movement during 2020 in response to the COVID-19 pandemic.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 4 / 4

The legal and regulatory framework is generally supportive of property rights and entrepreneurship, and there are few undue obstacles to private business activity in practice.

Personal social freedoms are generally respected, though there are some restrictions for same-sex couples, who can form civil unions but not marry or adopt children. A government-sponsored bill to legalize same-sex marriage was under parliamentary consideration in 2021. Domestic violence is prohibited by law and punishable with prison sentences; the government pursues domestic violence cases and provides resources for victims. Nevertheless, such violence remains a serious problem, and sometimes involves violence against children. The Council of Europe's 2020 report on Andorra's implementation of the Istanbul Convention—a treaty on preventing and combating violence against women and domestic violence—listed a number of shortcomings in the collection of data and the support system for victims of sexual violence.

Andorra remains one of the few countries in Europe where abortion is completely prohibited, with penalties for both doctors and patients who undergo the procedure. Abortion is relatively accessible in neighboring France and Spain, though this option can be expensive for Andorrans.

Andorran laws provide protections for most workers, including migrant workers. However, temporary workers must leave the country when their employment contract expires, exposing those with expired contracts to potential abuse by employers. The Labor Inspections Office is proactive in addressing violations of workers' rights.

A 2019 report from the Council of Europe's Group of Experts on Action against Trafficking in Human Beings (GRETA) found that Andorra had made legislative and policy progress on combating trafficking but called on authorities to scrutinize high-risk sectors for possible victims and raise awareness of the threat among law enforcement bodies. Confirmed cases of trafficking have been rare in practice.

Angola

Population: 32,500,000

Capital: Luanda

Freedom Status: Not Free

Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: Angola has been ruled by the same party since independence, and authorities have systematically repressed political dissent. Corruption, due process violations, and abuses by security forces remain common. An initial easing of some restrictions on the press and civil society, following President João Lourenço's election in 2017, has been backtracked and challenges persist.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- A January crackdown by Angolan security forces against protesters in Lunda Norte province left at least a dozen protesters dead and several more missing, though local human rights groups have suggested that the true number of those killed is significantly higher. Two senior officers implicated in the crackdown were later dismissed.

- Throughout the year, rights activists and members of the press frequently protested against the government's repression of political dissent in the country. Several instances of arbitrary arrest and physical assault of journalists and protesters by police reportedly took place during these events; in some cases, activists and youth leaders were physically prevented from leaving their homes to take part in such demonstrations by security forces.
- In November, the ruling Popular Movement for the Liberation of Angola (MPLA) used its parliamentary majority to pass amendments to the law on general elections. The opposition and civil society organizations criticized the legislation, which includes provisions that centralize vote counting, saying that the law undermines electoral transparency and failed to implement antifraud mechanisms.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 10 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 3 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

The 2010 constitution abolished direct presidential elections. Instead, the head of the national list of the political party receiving the most votes in general elections becomes president, without any confirmation process by the elected legislature. The constitution permits the president to serve a maximum of two five-year terms, and to directly appoint the vice president, cabinet, and provincial governors. In December 2021, the ruling MPLA announced that President João Lourenço would again be the party's presidential candidate in 2022. Lourenço was first elected to the presidency in 2017, succeeding former president José Eduardo dos Santos, who had been in power for 38 years.

Angola's 220-seat, unicameral National Assembly, whose members are elected to five-year terms by proportional representation, has little power, and most legislation originates in the executive branch.

In the 2017 legislative polls, the MPLA won 61 percent of the vote and 150 seats, while the opposition National Union for the Total Independence of Angola (UNITA) took 27 percent and 51 seats, and the Broad Convergence for the Salvation of Angola–Electoral Coalition (CASA–CE) won 9 percent and 16 seats. Two smaller parties won the remainder. Though an African Union (AU) monitoring mission noted that polling preparations and processes were better organized than in past elections, the prevalence of biased progovernment media, deficiencies in voter registration processes, and the MPLA's use of public resources in its campaign disadvantaged the opposition. There were also reports of postelection violence in some locations.

Alleging grave irregularities at the National Election Commission (CNE), including manipulation of the vote count, opposition leaders called the 2017 polls fraudulent and jointly disputed the results. The Constitutional Court dismissed their claim, citing a lack of evidence. Opposition figures elected to the National Assembly ultimately took their seats, prompting intense criticism from their political base.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 1 / 4

The law states that the makeup of the CNE should reflect the disposition of power in the National Assembly, which gives an advantage to the MPLA. The political opposition, in its challenge of the 2017 election results, cited serious misconduct and a lack of transparency on the part of the CNE.

The opposition rejected the February 2020 nomination of the new CNE president, citing a lack of independence from the MPLA, past cases of corruption, and alleged fraud committed during the process of his appointment. He was later confirmed by the MPLA-led National Assembly; opposition protesters defied a ban on demonstrations in Luanda to oppose the confirmation, and were met with violence by police.

In 2021, President Lourenço unexpectedly initiated a constitutional review, proposing more than 40 constitutional amendments. Civil society groups and the opposition have criticized many of the proposed amendments, saying that the opposition and wider Angolan society have not been adequately consulted. However, the MPLA majority in the parliament is sufficiently large to amend the constitution without the support of any opposition parties, and the bill remained under consideration at year's end.

In September, the parliament unanimously passed amendments to the voter registration law, including provisions allowing Angolan citizens living abroad to vote in the upcoming 2022 elections. The National Assembly also voted to amend the law on general elections. The bill, which includes provisions that would centralize vote counting, was rejected by the opposition, but was passed by the MPLA majority in September. The opposition considers the amendments to constitute "electoral fraud," saying that its provisions reduce electoral transparency. President Lourenço sent the draft law back to parliament later that month, but subsequent changes to the bill were deemed insufficient by the opposition and civil society organizations. Lourenço signed the amendments into law in November after the National Assembly passed the bill a second time.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 5 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 1 / 4

While there is a multiparty system in place, competition is limited. The process for creating new political parties is fraught with bureaucratic obstacles and attempts at cooptation, factors that severely hinder public confidence in new parties.

Citing irregularities in the process, in August 2020 the Constitutional Court rejected the legalization of a new opposition party, PRA-JA Servir Angola, led by Abel Chivukuvuku. The decision also placed bureaucratic limits on the ability of Chivukuvuku and the party's other promoters to attempt to establish a new, different party in the coming years. Chivukuvuku appealed the court's decision, but PRA-JA Servir Angola had still not been granted legal status as a party by the end of 2021.

In 2021, PRA-JA Servir Angola and opposition parties UNITA and the Democratic Block (BD) announced that they had formed a coalition, the United Patriotic Front (FPU), to contest the 2022 elections.

In October, the Constitutional Court ruled that the 2019 election of Adalberto da Costa Jr. as UNITA party leader was illegal. UNITA reelected Costa as party leader in December with over 96 percent of the vote.

There is little space for the opposition to increase its parliamentary representation, much less gain power through elections. Angola has never experienced a transfer of power between rival parties. Nevertheless, opposition parties have been building public support in recent years, particularly in and around the capital, Luanda.

No municipal elections are held in the country for opposition parties to contest, though the national government has been working to change this since 2015. However, citing delays in voter registration, in September 2020 authorities announced the postponement of local elections set for later in the year. The elections were postponed again in 2021. Some analysts have attributed the delays to government reluctance to relinquish the power to appoint subnational officials.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 1 / 4

MPLA-aligned economic oligarchies nurture a system of dependency and patronage that can subvert candidates' and voters' ability to freely express their political choices.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 2 / 4

While societal pressures can discourage women from active political participation, women's rights advocates have an increasingly vocal presence in political life.

Government and state institutions are controlled by the MPLA, which draws much of its support from the Kimbundu ethnic group, while the Ovimbundo and Kikongo ethnicities are predominant, respectively, in UNITA and the National Liberation Front of Angola (FNLA).

Discussion of issues affecting LGBT+ people have historically been considered taboo, and such topics have been absent from political debate. This has changed somewhat with the parliament's adoption of a new penal code that decriminalized same-sex relations in January 2019.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 2 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 1 / 4

The country has been ruled by the MPLA since independence in 1975, and the president is expected to consult routinely with the party's political bureau.

Executive powers are broad and varied, leaving the parliament to act largely as a rubber stamp in approving the president's policies. Like his predecessor, President Lourenço frequently adopts legislation by presidential decree.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 1 / 4

After decades of MPLA rule, corruption and patronage have become entrenched in nearly all segments of public and private life. President Lourenço has repeatedly stressed his willingness to fight endemic corruption since his 2017 election campaign, and a few high-profile dos Santos-era officials have been convicted of corruption, including, in 2020, José Filomeno dos Santos, the son of the former president. The Supreme Court upheld his conviction on appeal in November 2021. His sister, Isabel dos Santos—who has been accused of siphoning public funds from the state oil firm, Sonangol—was ordered to return $500 million in shares to Sonangol by an international arbitration court in July.

Other figures under judicial inquiry and facing seizure of assets include two close aides of the former president, Manuel Hélder Vieira Dias "Kopelipa" and Leopoldino do Nascimento. Carlos São Vicente, the former head of Sonangol, the epicenter of corruption during the Santos era, has been detained on charges of corruption since late 2020. However, prosecution of high-profile individuals not directly connected to the family of former president dos Santos has seldom led to trial.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 0 / 4

Government operations are generally opaque. In 2018, the government announced the formation of the National Oil, Gas, and Biofuels Agency (ANPG) to oversee the industry beginning in February 2019. However, its leadership has been sourced from Sonangol.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 20 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 7 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 1 / 4

The Angolan state owns most media in the country, and state-owned media report favorably on the government and rarely carry critical coverage. Most ostensibly private outlets also act as mouthpieces of the regime. However, foreign news outlets, including Portuguese news agency Lusa, French news agency RFI, and Voice of America (VOA), are widely read.

In 2020, the government privatized a number of outlets they said were owned by members of the political and military elite but funded by the state. Journalists' groups expressed concern about a lack of transparency regarding the privatizations, and afterward, about claims that reports critical of the government had been censored at several of those outlets.

Insult and defamation are both considered criminal offenses. The criminal code also includes "abuse of press freedom," a charge that can be levied against those accused of engaging in incitement, hate speech, defense of fascist or racist ideologies, or "fake news."

In September 2021, the Provincial Court of Luanda convicted the editor of an online news outlet on charges of "criminal defamation, injurious denunciation, and violating press freedom." In response, the Committee to Protect Journalists (CPJ) called on Angolan authorities to stop pursuing criminal defamation cases against members of the press. Several other journalists were targeted throughout the year with lawsuits brought by government officials accusing them of slander and defamation; many independent journalists have denounced such action as "persecution" by the authorities.

The constitution guarantees religious freedom, but the government imposes onerous criteria on religious groups for official recognition, which is required for the legal construction of houses of worship. Notably, many Pentecostal churches—which have had a profound social impact in Angola—remain unregistered.

There are no registered Muslim groups, though Muslim communities have been vocal in their demands for recognition and the right to worship freely.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 2 / 4

Academics must maintain a façade of agreement with the MPLA's preferred narratives and refrain from open criticism of the party, or risk losing their positions. Those who voice dissent are often monitored by security services.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 2 / 4

Fear of retribution for expressing criticism of the government or controversial opinions in private conversations persists in Angola. Self-censorship is common, fueled by concerns that a perceived intent to organize against the government could result in reprisals. Known surveillance of civil society groups, journalists, and academics can leave people reluctant to speak out. The government actively monitors online activity.

The results of an Afrobarometer poll, released in August 2020, indicated that 32 percent of individuals surveyed considered themselves “not at all free” to express their political views, and another 16 percent said they felt “not completely free.” Together, this was greater than the percentage of individuals who said they considered themselves totally or partially free to express such views.

Opposition party youth organizations claim that repression of political dissent has increased in recent years, citing several instances of arbitrary arrests and intimidation of government critics by state security forces.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 5 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 1 / 4 (-1)

Constitutional guarantees of freedom of assembly are poorly upheld. While the Lourenço administration initially showed more tolerance for public demonstrations than its predecessor, peaceful marches are still frequently met with violence and arrests by the security forces. Throughout 2020, police violently dispersed and made arrests at protest marches, at times resulting in several unlawful killings by security forces. Separatists in the oil-rich Cabinda region were also targeted by the government.

In January 2021, security forces launched a violent crackdown on a peaceful protest organized by the Lunda Tchokwe Protectorate Movement (MPPLT) in Angola’s Lunda Norte province. At least a dozen protesters were killed by police, though local human rights groups have suggested that the true number of those killed is significantly higher; several other activists reportedly “disappeared” following the incident. Videos circulated on social media allegedly show police forces using indiscriminate force against fleeing protesters and several who had been detained. Two senior officers implicated in the crackdown were later dismissed.

Score Change: The score declined from 2 to 1 because of continued violent crackdowns on peaceful protesters by security forces using indiscriminate and lethal force.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 2 / 4

Nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) working on human rights and governance are closely monitored. The MPLA traditionally made vocal attempts to discredit their work and sometimes threatened such groups with lawsuits and outright closure, prompting many to curtail their activities. However, the environment for NGOs has improved since 2018, with reduced interference and a greater willingness on the part of the government to engage in dialogue with civil society groups.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 2 / 4

Certain employees who provide services considered essential—including prison guards and firefighters, but also workers in the oil sector—may not legally strike. Unions not associated with the MPLA have faced interference and harassment. However, the government has allowed more strikes to proceed without interference or repression in recent years.

F. RULE OF LAW: 5 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 1 / 4

The president appoints Supreme Court judges to life terms without legislative input. Corruption and political pressure from the MPLA contribute to the judiciary's general ineffectiveness and undermine its independence.

A constitutional review, proposed by President Lourenço in March 2021 and initiated in August, contains provisions for amendments that would elevate the Supreme Court over the Constitutional Court, which critics say threatens to weaken the judicial system and jeopardize its independence. Manuel Aragão, the former chief of the Constitutional Court, strongly opposed these amendments, and resigned his position in August. Lourenço appointed then secretary of state Laurinda Cardoso, an MPLA official, to the role; opposition figures have expressed concern that her appointment has allowed the MPLA to exercise increased control over the courts.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 1 / 4

Constitutional guarantees of due process are poorly upheld. Many defendants are unable to afford legal counsel, and the state largely fails to provide qualified legal aid to those who need it. Arbitrary arrest and lengthy pretrial detention remain problems.

Legal representatives for several leading political activists in Cabinda who were detained in 2020 claimed violations of judicial procedures by local authorities and courts. Shortly after the crackdown on MPPLT protesters in January 2021, MPPLT's leader, José Zecamutchima, was arrested. Zecamutchima, who was accused of rebellion and conspiracy, remained in detention at year's end; in September, his lawyer claimed that more than 400 people allegedly involved in the January protests also remained in police custody.

Security forces enjoy impunity for violent acts, including torture and extrajudicial killings committed against detainees, activists, and others. Angolan prisons are reported to be overcrowded, unhygienic, lacking in necessities, and plagued by sexual abuse. According to government statistics, violent crime, including robberies, assaults, and homicides, has increased in Luanda in recent years.

The low-level separatist insurgency in the isolated Cabinda region continues to pose a security threat. The Front for the Liberation of the Enclave of Cabinda (FLEC) claims to have engaged in guerrilla activity against Angolan soldiers, but the government has not verified these claims.

Women face discrimination in the workplace that makes it difficult for them to rise to senior positions. There have been reports of abuse of women and children accused of practicing witchcraft.

Same-sex relations were banned in Angola until January 2019, when the parliament adopted a new criminal code that did not include a historical "vices against nature" statute. Lawmakers also banned discrimination based on sexual orientation the same month.

Seminomadic Khoi and San tribes in southern provinces have been particularly hard-hit by a prolonged drought, which has been largely ignored by the government. The crisis was further aggravated by the COVID-19 pandemic.

Security forces allegedly harass and abuse immigrant communities, and the government has failed to adequately protect refugees and asylum seekers. UN representatives expressed concern about the forced expulsion of Congolese migrants in 2020, suggesting it violated international directives on the treatment of refugees.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 3 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 1 / 4

Several organizations have been working to remove land mines that were placed during Angola's 1975–2002 civil war. Land mines inhibit agriculture, construction, and freedom of movement, particularly in rural areas.

There have been reports by local NGOs that the authorities and private security groups that guard Lunda Norte Province's diamond mines restrict the movements of local residents.

The process for securing entry and exit visas remains difficult and mired in corruption. Bribes are frequently required in order to obtain employment and residence.

Restrictions on movement and other activity enacted in response to the COVID-19 pandemic were often violently enforced, with Amnesty International and local NGOs reporting at least 7 resulting deaths in 2020.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 1 / 4

Predatory elites tend to either disrupt or coopt emerging new businesses. Authorities have at times expropriated land and demolished homes without providing compensation. Customary law practices can leave women with unequal inheritance rights.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 1 / 4

Domestic violence is widespread in Angola, and perpetrators are rarely prosecuted. Child marriage remains common, particularly in rural areas.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 0 / 4

Public oil revenues are not equitably distributed or used to benefit the entire population. Rural regions in particular have inadequate infrastructure and access to services, leading to inequities in economic opportunity.

Child labor is a major problem, and foreign workers are vulnerable to sex trafficking and forced labor in the construction and mining industries. The authorities have failed to effectively investigate human trafficking or prosecute offenders.

Antigua and Barbuda

Population: 100,000

Capital: St. John's

Freedom Status: Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Antigua and Barbuda is a democracy that holds regular elections. Corruption in government is a concern, and women and LGBT+ people are underrepresented in politics and experience some discrimination. In 2017, Hurricane Irma devastated Barbuda: the entire island was evacuated, and many residents lost their livelihoods; some have yet to return home as house rebuilding continues. The government has sought to weaken the island's longstanding system of communal land rights.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- In March, the Barbuda People's Movement (BPM) won all five seats on the Barbuda Council. The vote illustrated the deepening divisions between Barbudan people and the national government of the Antigua and Barbuda Labour Party (ABLP), which have been at odds since a 2016 law removed communal land ownership of Barbuda from the Barbudan people.
- In June, Indian-born Mehul Choksi, who had previously purchased Antiguan citizenship through the Citizenship by Investment Programme (CIP) and has been wanted on fraud charges in India since 2018, was arrested in Dominica after entering illegally from Antigua. Critics raised questions about the level of due diligence the Antiguan government gave when granting him citizenship, as well as the legal impediments to revoking it.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 33 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 12 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The country's 1981 constitution establishes a parliamentary system, with a governor general representing the British monarch as ceremonial head of state. The prime minister is the head of government and is typically the leader of the majority party elected to Parliament. ABLP leader Gaston Browne maintained his position as prime minister after his party won a majority in the 2018 parliamentary elections.

The bicameral parliament is composed of a 17-seat Senate, whose members are appointed by the governor general, and the House of Representatives, whose 17 members are directly elected in single-seat constituencies, by means of a simple majority; representatives serve five-year terms.

The governing ABLP took 59 percent of the total vote and won 15 constituencies in the 2018 elections. The main opposition United Progressive Party (UPP) took 37 percent of the vote, but only one constituency. The BPM won the Barbuda constituency. Observers deemed the polls generally competitive and credible. Turnout was high, at 76 percent. The Barbuda Council also holds regular elections, most recently in March 2021, when the BPM won all 5 seats.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 4 / 4

Electoral laws are generally fair and are implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies. However, since 1984, the electoral boundaries of Antigua and Barbuda have shifted only slightly, which has created a significant disparity in the range of constituency sizes: from 1,138 (St. Phillip South) to 4,878 (St. George).

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 13 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 3 / 4

Political parties can organize and operate freely. While there are several small political parties in the country, elections have been won by either the ABLP or the UPP since 1994.

There are realistic opportunities for opposition parties to increase their support or gain power through elections. Power has alternated frequently between the ABLP and UPP.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 3 / 4

People's political choices are generally free from the influence of nondemocratic actors. However, a lack of transparency for party and campaign financing has given rise to concerns about the potential influence of unknown domestic and foreign interests over political candidates. The most significant case was that of R. Allen Stanford, a United States citizen, who was an influential figure in Antigua and used the country to run a multibillion-dollar Ponzi scheme. Separately, the Brazilian multinational Odebrecht SA purchased Meina Bank (Antigua) Ltd in 2010 as part of its scheme to bribe government officials in various countries.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 3 / 4

Women are underrepresented in politics, and only two women were elected to the House of Representatives in 2018. LGBT+ people are marginalized and face discrimination, impacting their ability to engage fully in political processes.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 8 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 3 / 4

The elected prime minister, cabinet, and parliament determine government. There are some concerns about the influence of businesses on policymaking.

Tensions between the central government and residents and representatives from Barbuda have grown since the 2016 dissolution of the Barbuda Land Act of 2007, which guaranteed that land on Barbuda was communally owned by Barbudans and that their consent was required for its purchase and development. The 2016 law allows privatization without communal consent. The Council has resisted the Browne government's plan to build a multimillion-dollar resort on the island due to concerns over potential environmental damage. The rising tensions led to the Council calling for the secession of Barbuda in August 2020. The next month, the government accused the Council of treason and threatened to remove it from the country's constitution by means of a referendum. Relations remained difficult throughout 2021.

Government corruption remains a concern, and anticorruption laws are enforced unevenly. Authorities have been criticized for doing little to investigate local official wrongdoing in the case of R. Allen Stanford. Several other company officials have faced justice, but only in the United States. Similarly, few prosecutions have emerged from the Odebrecht corruption scandal.

Antigua's Citizenship by Investment Programme (CIP) and Permanent Residence Certificate (PRC), in which individuals can be granted citizenship or residency in exchange for a sizable business investment or contribution, have been heavily scrutinized in recent years.

In June 2021, Indian-born Mehul Choksi, who had previously purchased Antiguan citizenship through the CIP and was wanted on fraud charges in India since 2018, was arrested in Dominica after entering illegally from Antigua. Critics raised questions about the level of due diligence the Antiguan government gave when granting him citizenship, as well as the legal impediments to revoke it. In October, journalists uncovered that a Nigerian couple at the heart of a sizeable Ponzi scheme in Nigeria had obtained Antiguan citizenship and passports through the CIP.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 3 / 4

The government of Antigua and Barbuda has gradually improved its accountability structures. The Public Accounts Committee can expose governmental improprieties and wrongdoings, but historically has not functioned effectively. The auditor general has several times submitted its yearly report after lengthy delays. Public officials must disclose all income, assets, and personal gifts received in their official capacity in a confidential report to the Integrity Commission. Resource deficiencies have impeded the commission's ability to investigate corrupt individuals. Despite the Procurement and Contract Management Act of 2011, concerns remain about public procurement in relation to the expertise of officials in positions mandated by the law, the completeness of documentation, and that some applications are made retrospectively, with often a waiver being requested.

Accountability for elected officials has increased somewhat in recent years. In January 2020, Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Barbuda Affairs Dean Jonas was suspended for six months after allegations that he mistreated staff.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 52 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 15 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 3 / 4

Press freedom is generally respected in Antigua and Barbuda. Criminal defamation was abolished in 2015. However, under the Sedition and Undesirable Publications Act, seditious libel is a criminal offence punishable by a maximum of two years in prison and a maximum fine of $5,000. Critical journalists remain at risk of libel suits from unhappy politicians. The prime minister has characterized the frequently critical Observer as “fake news” and a threat to the country.

Most media outlets are concentrated among a small number of firms affiliated with either the current ABLP government or the UPP.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 4 / 4

The constitution provides for freedom of worship as well as the right to practice and change religion, and these freedoms are generally respected. A law outlawing blasphemous language is not enforced.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

Academic freedom is generally respected.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 4 / 4

Individuals are generally free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 10 / 12E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

Freedom of assembly is guaranteed under the constitution, and the government generally respects these rights in practice. In August 2021, riot police dispersed demonstrators protesting the government's COVID-19 vaccination policy requiring public sector workers to be vaccinated or take a test every fourth night. Authorities claimed that the protesters had not been issued the necessary permit; other political demonstrations were allowed to proceed.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 3 / 4

The country's few nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) are active, though inadequately funded and often influenced by the government.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 3 / 4

Labor unions can organize freely and bargain collectively. Workers providing essential services must give notice two weeks before intent to strike. However, the International Labour Organization (ILO) has described the list of essential services as excessively broad. Strikes are rare. The introduction of a mandatory vaccination program for the public and parts of the private sector in September 2021 provoked significant opposition from labor unions. The government subsequently loosened COVID-19 related restrictions.

F. RULE OF LAW: 14 / 16F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 4 / 4

The constitution provides for an independent judiciary, which is generally respected by the government. In 2018, voters rejected in a referendum the adoption of the Caribbean Court of Justice as their highest appellate court. Thus, the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, based in London, retains that role.

In recent years, the courts have increasingly asserted independence from the ABLP government—which had a history of manipulating the judicial system—with the support of the Eastern Caribbean Supreme Court. The High Court of Justice has issued several rulings that have slowed government-backed development plans for Barbuda. In October 2020, the Court of Appeal ruled that the Privy Council should decide whether the Antiguan government or the Barbuda Council controls land sales on Barbuda.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 3 / 4

Constitutional guarantees of due process are mostly upheld. However, prisoners on remand often remain in jail for an average of three to four years before their cases are heard.

Residents of Antigua and Barbuda do not face any significant security threats. However, there were 16 homicides in 2021, a significant increase from the 9 in 2020. Prisons are severely overcrowded, and conditions within them are poor.

The 2005 Equal Opportunity Act bars discrimination based on race, gender, class, political affinity, or place of origin. There are no specific laws prohibiting discrimination against people with disabilities, or LGBT+ individuals. Societal norms discourage participation of women in some sectors of the economy, and few women hold leadership positions in businesses. Further, violence against women remains a significant problem.

Same-sex sexual activity remains criminalized under a 1995 law; however, the law is not strictly enforced. In March 2021, a constitutional challenge was launched against Antigua's law criminalizing anal sex, which has been used to target gay men, as part of the defense of two men accused of sexually assaulting a woman.

Mental health services require improvement and people with physical disabilities are stigmatized and underemployed.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 13 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

Individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education.

Many Barbudans forced to evacuate the island due to Hurricane Irma in 2017 opposed moves by lawmakers in Antigua to eliminate the communal land ownership system that governed the island for almost two centuries, and instead establish private land ownership. The government argues that the change is necessary to assist Barbuda's recovery.

The development of a multimillion-dollar private resort on Barbuda, led by the Peace Love and Happiness partnership, has driven tensions between the Browne government and Barbudan population and their representatives, who are concerned about the environmental impacts of the development. The Browne government has threatened those who attempt to obstruct the plans with jail time.

The Domestic Violence Act of 2015 strengthened punishments for perpetrators of domestic violence and laid out a process for victims to obtain an order of protection. However, domestic violence remains a serious problem. Same-sex marriage and civil partnerships are not recognized. In November 2020, local advocacy groups called for the Minister of Gender Affairs Dean Jonas to resign after he suggested that girls who are still legal minors could consent to having sex with older men.

In October 2021, activists called for an evaluation of reporting mechanisms for sexual violence.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 3 / 4

Antigua and Barbuda is a destination and transit country for the trafficking of men, women, and children for the purposes of forced labor and sexual exploitation. Government efforts to address the problem are inadequate, but progress is being made, according to the US State Department's 2021 Trafficking in Persons report. Compulsory labor is prohibited by law.

Argentina

Population: 45,700,000

Capital: Buenos Aires

Freedom Status: Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Argentina is a vibrant representative democracy with competitive elections, lively media and civil society sectors, and unfettered public debate. Economic instability, corruption in the government and judiciary, and drug-related violence are among the country's most serious challenges.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- The center-right Together for Change (JxC) bloc performed well in the November legislative elections, winning more at-stake seats than the ruling Front for Everyone (FdT) bloc of President Alberto Fernández in both houses. However, the FdT maintained pluralities in both houses after the polls.
- Media outlets came under physical attack during the year. In February, the offices of Río Negro were ransacked by a crowd that included members of a labor union; the newspaper had covered a sexual-harassment case against the leader of one of a union branch. In November, the Buenos Aires headquarters of the Clarín Group was firebombed, causing minor damage.
- In December, former president Mauricio Macri faced charges for allegedly ordering the surveillance of family members of sailors who died in a 2017 submarine sinking. Macri denied the charges, calling them politically motivated.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 35 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 11 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

Argentina is a federal republic with a presidential system. The president serves up to two four-year terms. Candidates can be elected in one round if they obtain at least 45 percent of the vote, or earn more than 40 percent with a 10-point lead over the second-place contestant.

The October 2019 election was deemed free and fair by domestic and international observers. Center-left candidate Alberto Fernández won in the first round with 48.2 percent of the vote, defeating incumbent Mauricio Macri, who obtained 40.3 percent. Fernández was viewed as benefiting from having former president and Peronist Cristina Fernández de Kirchner (no relation) as his vice presidential candidate.

The National Congress consists of a lower house, the Chamber of Deputies, and an upper house, the Senate. The Chamber of Deputies has 257 members elected for four-year terms, while the Senate has 72 members elected for six-year terms. Half of all deputies and a third of senators are up for election every two years through a proportional-representation system with closed party lists. Legislative contests are generally free and fair.

The FdT did poorly in the November 2021 legislative elections, the results of which represented an end to a decades-long majority for Peronist-led coalitions. The FdT won 50 at-stake lower-house seats, while the JxC won 61; the FdT maintained a narrow lower-house plurality. The JxC won 14 at-stake Senate seats, while the FdT won 9; after the elections, the FdT held a total of 35 Senate seats, while the JxC held 31. The FdT notably lost ground in Buenos Aires Province, while the left-wing Workers' Left Front and the far-right Freedom Advances did well nationally.

Argentina has a clear and relatively fair framework for conducting elections. There is universal suffrage: Voting is compulsory for people between 18 and 70 years old, and voluntary for people between 16 and 18, or older than 70.

However, the system suffers from shortcomings including inconsistent enforcement of electoral laws and campaign finance regulations. An outdated electoral system mandates that each party print and distribute its own paper ballots on election day, providing opportunities for abuse and favoring larger parties.

Aspects of election management fall under the purview of the executive branch; National Electoral Chamber works in conjunction with the National Electoral Directorate, a department of the Interior Ministry.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 16 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 4 / 4

Argentina has competitive political parties that operate without encountering undue obstacles. Primary elections are mandatory for presidential and legislative elections, and only party candidates that obtain 1.5 percent of the national vote in primary elections can contest general elections.

Argentina's multiparty system affords opposition candidates the realistic opportunity to compete for political power. Opposition parties command significant popular support and hold positions in national and subnational government. The center-right JxC bloc performed well in the November 2021 polls, though the ruling FdT maintained legislative pluralities.

The 2019 presidential election marked a return of Peronism; former president Macri was the only non-Peronist to complete a presidential term since 1928.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 4 / 4

Argentiniens' political choices are generally free from domination by democratically unaccountable groups. However, political choices are influenced by voter intimidation and clientelism, particularly in poorer regions.

Members of ethnic and religious minority groups have full political rights in Argentina. The constitution mandates gender equality in political-party and elected positions. A Ministry of Women, Genders, and Diversity (MMGD), which promotes equality and combats gender-based violence (GBV), was formed in 2019. In practice, poorer Argentiniens, ethnic minorities, and Indigenous people have limited access to political power.

All National Congress party lists must respect full gender parity by law, with men and women alternating. After the November 2021 elections, women held 44.8 percent of lower-house seats and 43.1 percent of upper-house seats.

Women are poorly represented in the cabinet. Only two women serve as ministers, including the MMGD minister. Men dominate national-level judicial and political positions. Only 2 of Argentina's 24 provinces are led by female governors.

LGBT+ people are well represented in Argentina. Legal protections for LGBT+ people are robust. Argentina was the first country in the Americas to legalize same-sex marriage.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 8 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 3 / 4

Elected officials are duly installed without interference. However, the political system is characterized by a powerful executive, with the president having authority to implement some policies by decree, bypassing the legislative branch. Provincial governors are also powerful and tend to influence national lawmakers representing their provinces.

Vice President Fernández de Kirchner is the driving force behind the electoral coalition that brought President Fernández to power, and handpicked him as the presidential candidate. Several ministers and lawmakers answer personally to her.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 2 / 4

A weak institutional framework hampers anticorruption efforts. For instance, the country's main anticorruption agency is part of the executive. Further, many politicians hold immunity in connection with their elected posts, and are thus protected from legal consequences for corrupt behavior.

The judiciary system is widely considered to be politicized, especially at the provincial level. Convictions against members of the political class who were accused of malfeasance in recent years remain rare.

Vice President Fernández de Kirchner faces numerous investigations for alleged corruption during her 2007–15 presidential term and has been indicted on several occasions. The government has attacked the Supreme Court and the judiciary for adjudicating corruption cases involving the vice president and other kirchnerista officials.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 3 / 4

An agency to guarantee access to public information was created by law in 2017 but is not independent from the presidency. Adherence to and enforcement of public-asset disclosure regulations is inconsistent. The health emergency declared in March 2020 relaxed procurement regulations, reducing transparency in government purchases.

The national government has endeavored to digitize records and procedural documents, but local and provincial governments have been slower in this work.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 49 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 15 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 3 / 4

The law guarantees freedom of expression and bans official censorship. There is a robust and lively media environment. However, media ownership is concentrated among large conglomerates that frequently favor a political grouping, and state-advertising allocation tends to favor government-friendly media groups. Journalists face occasional harassment and violence, especially when covering LGBT+ issues, corruption, and drug-related criminality. Some journalists have faced charges in connection with their investigative work.

In February 2021, the Committee to Protect Journalists (CPJ) reported that authorities in Formosa Province regularly harassed, detained, and intimidated media workers during the pandemic-related lockdown.

Media offices were physically targeted during 2021. In February, 100 people, including members of the Argentine Workers' Central Union, ransacked the offices of Río Negro. The newspaper had reported on a sexual-harassment case against the leader of a union branch. In November, the Buenos Aires headquarters of the Clarín Group was firebombed, though only minor damage was reported.

Freedom of religion is constitutionally guaranteed and enforced in practice. The population is largely Roman Catholic but public education is secular, and religious minorities express their faiths freely.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

Academic freedom is guaranteed by law and largely observed in practice.

Private discussion is vibrant and largely unrestricted. However, the government has been known to monitor social media activity; it launched “cyberpatrols” to combat COVID-19-related disinformation in 2020.

In December 2021, former president Macri was charged with ordering the surveillance of the family members of 44 sailors who died when their submarine sank in 2017. Macri denied the charges, calling them politically motivated.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 11 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

Freedom of assembly is generally respected, and citizens frequently organize protests.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 4 / 4

Nongovernmental organizations generally operate without restrictions. Civic organizations, especially those focused on human rights and abuses committed under the 1976–83 dictatorship, play a major role in society, although some fall victim to corruption.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 3 / 4

Organized labor is dominated by Peronist unions, and union influence remains significant, although it has decreased in recent years. Most labor unions have been controlled by the same individuals or groups for decades, and internal opposition to union leadership has been limited by fraud and intimidation.

F. RULE OF LAW: 10 / 16F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 2 / 4

The Supreme Court is relatively independent and has resisted executive overreach during the Fernández de Kirchner, Macri, and Fernández administrations. However, lower and province-level courts have close ties with political actors and engage in corrupt practices. Since taking office, President Fernández and Vice President Fernández de Kirchner have attacked the judiciary for its alleged bias and proposed legal reforms that, if enacted, could diminish judicial independence.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 3 / 4

The right to due process is constitutionally protected and generally upheld. However, security officers and some judges are suspected of maintaining criminal ties. Prisons are overcrowded and inmates live in unsuitable conditions. Some are permanently held in police stations; in April 2021, the Supreme Court ordered a provincial court to address the issue in Buenos Aires Province. Pretrial detainees represented 44.6 percent of the country's prison population in 2020.

In June 2021, the attorney general's office reported that a total of 1,030 convictions for crimes committed during the 1976–83 dictatorship were attained.

In March 2021, President Fernández reversed a decree signed by Macri in 2017 that allowed for the deportation of foreigners who were subject to criminal legal proceedings.

Argentina's murder rate is low compared to other Latin American countries, but violence from criminal groups and from the security forces remains a serious issue. International criminal organizations use Argentina as both an operational base and a transit route; the northern and central regions are particularly affected. The port city of Rosario has been at the center of a spike in drug-related violence and unrest that has featured armed attacks against courts and intimidation of public officials.

Police misconduct, torture, and brutality against suspects in custody is endemic. Arbitrary arrests and abuses by police are rarely punished in the courts, and police officers commonly collude with drug traffickers. Enforcement of the coronavirus-induced lockdown led to a rise in cases of excessive force, especially against the poor.

Argentina has robust antidiscrimination laws, but enforcement is uneven outside well-off urban areas. Indigenous peoples, who comprise approximately 2.4 percent of the population, face government neglect, disproportionate levels of poverty, and poor access to services, all of which were aggravated by pandemic-related lockdowns. Displays of xenophobia against migrants and race-based discrimination are common. Women enjoy legal equality, but continue to face economic discrimination and gender-based wage gaps.

Argentina's LGBT+ population enjoys full legal rights, including marriage, adoption, and the right to serve in the military. In July 2021, a presidential decree recognized nonbinary identities by allowing a third gender option in national identification documents. At the same time, LGBT+ people face some degree of societal discrimination, and occasionally, serious violence.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 13 / 16G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 3 / 4

The government generally respects citizens' constitutional right to travel both inside and outside of Argentina. People are free to change their place of education or employment.

Argentina implemented one of the world's strictest and most prolonged COVID-19 lockdowns. Bans and restrictions on domestic and international travel were sometimes arbitrary and gave way to abuses; security officers used disproportionate force to enforce measures. Authorities in Formosa Province were especially strict, with travelers forced into quarantine under wide-ranging measures. A strict national lockdown was imposed for part of May 2021. In September, the government ended most pandemic restrictions, including border controls.

Citizens generally enjoy the right to own property and establish private businesses. However, cumbersome regulations, bureaucratic abuses, and corruption affect the private sector at all levels.

Approximately 70 percent of the country's rural Indigenous communities lack titles to their lands, and forced evictions, while technically illegal, still occur. Indigenous communities continue to struggle to defend their land rights and reclaim traditional lands.

Argentines enjoy broad freedom regarding marriage and divorce. Same-sex marriage and adoption by same-sex couples were legalized in 2010. A 2012 gender-identity law allows people to legally change their gender.

GBV remains a serious problem, which worsened when COVID-19 measures were imposed. Calls to a government hotline rose by 18 percent during the March-to-October 2020 period compared to the same period in 2019; calls increased 13 percent in the first quarter of 2021 over the first quarter of 2020.

In 2020, the National Congress legalized abortions up to the 14th week of pregnancy, a development with few precedents in Latin America.

Argentines face high poverty rates, which worsened due to lockdown restrictions. The poverty rate stood at 40.6 percent in the first half of 2021; 10.7 percent of people lived in extreme poverty.

Forced labor of Argentinians and citizens of neighboring countries is high in sectors such as garment and brick production, agriculture, domestic work, and street vendors. Half of the Argentinian workforce is informally employed and lacks legal protections. Sex trafficking is a serious concern, and efforts to combat it have been hindered by corruption and the complicity of some officials according to the US State Department's Trafficking in Persons Report 2021.

Armenia

Population: 3,000,000

Capital: Yerevan

Freedom Status: Partly Free

Electoral Democracy: No

Note: The numerical scores and status listed above do not reflect conditions in Nagorno-Karabakh, which is examined in a separate report. Freedom in the World reports assess the level of political rights and civil liberties in a given geographical area, regardless of whether they are affected by the state, nonstate actors, or foreign powers. Disputed territories are sometimes assessed separately if they meet certain criteria, including boundaries that are sufficiently stable to allow year-on-year comparisons. For more information, see the report methodology and FAQ.

Overview: Armenia is in the midst of a significant transition following mass antigovernment protests and elections in 2018 that forced out an entrenched political elite. The new government has pledged to deal with long-standing problems including systemic corruption, opaque policymaking, a flawed electoral system, and weak rule of law. The country continues to be seriously affected by the 2020 conflict with Azerbaijan, which saw several months of fighting over control of the territory of Nagorno-Karabakh.

- In February, the Armenian military demanded the resignation of Prime Minister Nikol Pashinyan following the dismissal of the country's top military officer, leading to widespread antigovernment protests. Pashinyan initially refused to resign, and accused the army of attempting a coup, before resigning in April to trigger snap elections.
- Snap parliamentary elections were held in June, following a months-long political crisis sparked by the defeat of Armenian forces in the 2020 Nagorno-Karabakh conflict. Pashinyan remained in his post as prime minister when his Civil Contract Party (KP) won a parliamentary majority; two new electoral blocs, both under the leadership of former presidents, filled the remaining parliamentary seats.
- In May, Azerbaijani forces advanced across the border into Armenia, reigniting the conflict and creating serious security concerns in the border regions. In November, large-scale hostilities broke out along the border, resulting in more than a dozen casualties from both sides, and the capture of 32 Armenian soldiers.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 23 / 40 (+1)

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 7 / 12 (+1)

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 2 / 4

In 2015, voters approved constitutional changes that, among other things, transformed the country from a semipresidential to a parliamentary republic. The president, who had been directly elected for up to two five-year terms, would henceforth be chosen by the parliament for a single seven-year term, and most executive power would shift to the prime minister, who would also be chosen by a parliamentary majority. In 2018, the parliament elected diplomat Armen Sarkissian to the presidency.

Executive elections held before 2018 were dominated by the Republican Party (HHK), with incumbent elites benefiting from the abuse of administrative resources and severe limitations imposed on opposition candidates. However, Pashinyan swept the December 2018 parliamentary elections, which were markedly freer and fairer than elections in previous years.

In June 2021, Pashinyan's Civil Contract Party won a majority of seats in the snap elections, allowing him to retain his position as prime minister. Though Pashinyan's win was contested by the opposition, the Constitutional Court upheld the election results, and international observers considered the elections to be free and fair.

The National Assembly consists of a minimum of 101 members elected for five-year terms under a newly adopted closed list proportional representation system, simplifying the previous two-tier proportional representation system. Up to four additional seats are reserved for ethnic minority representatives, and further seats can be added to ensure that opposition parties hold at least 30 percent of the seats.

In April 2021, Pashinyan resigned as prime minister, in order to trigger snap parliamentary elections that June. Three parties gained seats in the June parliamentary elections, with Pashinyan's Civil Contract Party winning a stable majority of 71 seats with 53.9 percent of the vote. The new Armenia Alliance, lead by former president Robert Kocharyan, gained 29 seats with 21.1 percent of the vote. Another new bloc, the I Have Honor Alliance, was founded by former president Serzh Sargsyan, and gained 7 seats in the parliament after receiving 5.2 percent of the vote. Though party alliances are required to meet a 7 percent electoral threshold, the threshold was waived for Sargsyan's alliance, as Armenian law mandates that legislature must be composed of no fewer than three parties.

Local and international observers deemed the elections to be competitive, well organized, and fairly administered.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 3 / 4 (+1)

Members of the Central Election Commission (CEC) are recommended and then confirmed by the parliament for six-year terms. According to international observers, during the June 2021 elections, the CEC conducted its work in a transparent and efficient manner, meeting all legal deadlines and enjoying a high level of confidence in its capacity to deliver its mandate.

In April 2021, the parliament amended existing electoral laws to reflect recommendations made by the Venice Commission and the OSCE's Office for Democratic Institutions and Human Rights (ODIHR). The June 2021 snap elections were successfully administered under the reformed system, which eliminated territorial lists, simplifying the existing electoral system. The amendments enjoyed broad support by political forces and civil society; further reforms were adopted in May 2021, and are set to take effect in 2022.

Score Change: The score improved from 2 to 3 because the parliament approved electoral code amendments that addressed a number of weaknesses, in keeping with recommendations from international experts.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 10 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 3 / 4

Political parties and opposition groups have been able to operate in a much freer environment since 2018.

In January 2021, amendments to the Law on Parties took effect, tying public funding of political parties to female and nationwide representation and capping individual donations.

An unprecedented number of political entities (22 political parties and 4 alliances) took part in the June 2021 snap parliamentary elections.

Before 2018, elections were highly flawed; the HHK had been the main ruling party since 1997, and opposition groups had little chance of winning power. However, that year's election transformed the political landscape, and elections have become significantly more competitive.

International and local observers deemed the June 2021 snap elections, which saw two opposition alliances gain parliamentary seats, to be competitive.

In April 2021, the parliament adopted amendments calling for heavier penalties for vote buying, election-related violence, and disrupting the electoral process, and criminalized the obstruction of pre-election campaign activities.

Though the 2021 elections saw a decline in such practices, international observers reported allegations of election disruption, including isolated incidents of vote buying and the misuse of administrative resources.

A system introduced as part of the 2015 constitutional reforms mandates the inclusion of up to four members of parliament representing ethnic minorities; all four must be elected on a party list. In 2021, Civil Contract won three minority seats representing ethnic Russians, Yazidis, and Kurds, while the Armenia Alliance won one seat representing ethnic Assyrians.

No openly LGBT+ people have run in elections or been appointed to a public office in Armenia. Women remain underrepresented in politics and government, and most parties do little to address women's interests aside from meeting the gender quota on candidate lists.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 6 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 2 / 4

Through its significant majority, gained in a free and fair election, the Civil Contract Party controlled parliamentary decision-making after the June 2021 snap elections.

Though Pashinyan promised to loosen the influence of business over policymaking, two wealthy businessmen entered the parliament from his party list. Some opposition parliamentarians also maintain close ties to businesspeople.

Since facilitating the November 2020 cease-fire agreement ending the conflict over Nagorno-Karabakh, Russia wields increased influence in Armenia as the main mediator in Armenian-Azerbaijani negotiations.

In February 2021, the Armenian military demanded the resignation of Pashinyan's administration following the dismissal of Tiran Khachatryan, the military's deputy chief of the general staff. In response, Pashinyan accused the army of attempting a coup, though the military took no further action.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 2 / 4

Relationships between politicians, public servants, and businesspeople have historically influenced policy and contributed to selective application of the law. Though such relationships persist, the government has made steady progress in investigating past wrongdoing and fortifying anticorruption mechanisms.

In April 2021, the parliament adopted legislation providing for the creation of an anticorruption court. The government also established a new agency to investigate cases of corruption; the Anti-Corruption Committee (ACC) began operating in October.

However, despite such developments, international bodies, including the UN Human Rights Committee (OHCHR) and the Council of Europe's anticorruption monitoring unit, the Group of States against Corruption (GRECO), have found that serious shortcomings remain in the government's anticorruption strategies; as of 2021, GRECO has deemed the Armenian government's compliance with global corruption prevention standards unsatisfactory.

While law enforcement agencies have initiated a number of high-profile corruption investigations, such cases are slow to progress. In 2021, several high-level corruption cases were initiated, including cases against former president Serzh Sargsyan; Armen Gevorgyan, a former official allied to ex-president Robert Kocharian; former prosecutor general Aghvan Hovsepyan; former police chief Vladimir Gasparyan; and former minister of defense David Tonoyan.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 2 / 4

Transparency has historically been limited, and enforcement of asset-declaration rules for public officials has been weak. In 2020, the parliament made strides in enhancing transparency, including by strengthening asset-declaration requirements, though a lack of transparency and accountability persists.

In July 2021, local NGOs spoke out against proposed amendments that would curtail existing freedom-of-information laws, voicing concerns that such amendments would lead to an increase in corruption.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 32 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 9 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 2 / 4

Independent and investigative outlets operate relatively freely in Armenia, and generally publish online. Small independent outlets often provide robust coverage challenging the narratives of state broadcasters and other establishment media. By comparison, most print and broadcast outlets are affiliated with political or larger commercial interests.

The government imposed several new restrictions on journalistic freedoms in 2021, including limiting the free movement of journalists in the parliament and in parts of the Syunik region. These measures have been widely condemned by local and international organizations, and local media organizations have called for an end to government obstruction and harassment of the media.

Violence against journalists also increased in 2021; the Committee to Protect Freedom of Expression (CPFE), a local nongovernmental organization (NGO), counted nearly two dozen instances of violence against members of the media as of October.

In July, the parliament criminalized the act of directing serious insults towards officials and public figures; journalists' associations and human rights NGOs have raised concerns that the law can easily be abused to curtail free expression and to direct political pressure against media organizations that criticize politicians.

Article 18 of the constitution recognizes the Armenian Apostolic Church as a “national church” responsible for the preservation of Armenian national identity; 94 percent of the population identifies as Armenian Apostolic. Religious minorities have reported some discrimination in the past.

In 2020, the National Security Service (NSS) opened an investigation into Yazidi activist Sashik Sultanyan after he publicly stated that Yazidis experience discrimination in Armenia; international human rights nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) have criticized the investigation as retaliatory and unlawful.

Although the constitution protects academic freedom, administrative and accreditation processes remain open to political influence. There is some self-censorship among academics on politically sensitive subjects.

In March 2021, the parliament issued an executive order allowing the government to appoint most members of the boards of trustees for three of the country’s leading state universities, which enables the authorities to exercise more control over the universities’ key decisions, including the election of university rectors.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 3 / 4

Private discussion is relatively free and vibrant. The law prohibits wiretapping or other electronic surveillance without judicial approval, though the judiciary lacks independence and has been accused of excessive deference to law enforcement agencies requesting consent.

In July 2021, the government criminalized defamation, leading to at least 9 criminal cases being opened against people accused of insulting public figures, including Pashinyan, raising concerns regarding citizens’ ability to fully exercise their right to freedom of expression.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 8 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 3 / 4

The right to assemble is legally guaranteed but inconsistently upheld in practice.

Frequent antigovernment protests took place throughout the country in the run-up to the 2021 parliamentary elections. Despite some violent interference by police and the temporary detention of protesters, demonstrations were mostly allowed to proceed without undue obstacles.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 3 / 4

Outspoken NGOs operate in Armenia, with most of them based in Yerevan. These NGOs lack significant local funding and often rely on foreign donors. Despite this impediment, civil society was active in the 2018 protests, and has consulted with the government on policy matters, most notably on electoral, constitutional, and anticorruption reform.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 2 / 4

The law protects the rights of workers to form and join independent unions, strike, and engage in collective bargaining. However, these protections are not well enforced, and employers are generally able to block union activity in practice.

F. RULE OF LAW: 6 / 16F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 1 / 4

The courts face systemic political influence, and judicial institutions are undermined by corruption. Judges reportedly feel pressure to work with prosecutors to convict defendants, and acquittal rates are extremely low. The government published a five-year judicial-reform strategy in 2019; reforms continued to be enacted in 2021, though progress has been slow.

In 2021, the parliament adopted a new Criminal Code and a new Criminal Procedure Code; the codes were drafted based on recommendations issued by the Council of Europe, and are intended to better guarantee the protection of citizens' human rights and improve trust in the judicial system. Both Codes will take effect in 2022.

In March 2021, the Constitutional Court dismissed the case against former president Kocharyan on grounds that the charges against him were unconstitutional; Kocharyan had previously stated that the charges he was facing were based on political retaliation by Pashinyan.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 1 / 4

Authorities apply the law selectively, and due process is not guaranteed in civil or criminal cases. Lengthy pretrial detention remains a problem, and the Armenian judiciary is largely distrusted by the public.

The raft of corruption investigations aimed at HHK elites and allies have prompted concerns about the ability of the country's judicial and investigative mechanisms to ensure fair application of the law.

Reports of police abuse of detainees and poor conditions in prisons persist. After the change in government in 2018, law enforcement agencies renewed dormant investigations into past cases of physical violence by police.

Conditions in areas adjacent to Azerbaijan and Nagorno-Karabakh, an ethnic Armenian-majority territory that previously gained de facto independence from Azerbaijan in 1994, have declined following the 2020 military conflict in the region. Civilians in the region remain at risk of experiencing physical violence.

Azerbaijani forces have continued to occupy areas along the border since late 2020; in May 2021, Pashinyan alleged that Azerbaijani troops had crossed into Armenian territory to provoke further military clashes. In mid-November, large-scale hostilities erupted on the eastern border of Armenia resulting in at least 13 casualties and the capture of 32 Armenian soldiers. Dozens of Armenian prisoners of war reportedly remained in Azerbaijani custody in 2021. Some were reportedly tortured while in detention.

Women reportedly face discrimination in employment and education, despite legal protections.

Although same-sex sexual activity was decriminalized in 2003, LGBT+ people continue to face violence and mistreatment at the hands of police and civilians, and no antidiscrimination legislation exists to benefit this group.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 9 / 16 (-1)

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 2 / 4 (-1)

The law protects freedom of movement and the rights of individuals to change their place of residence, employment, and education. In practice, access to higher education is somewhat hampered by a culture of bribery.

Effects of 2020 conflict over Nagorno-Karabakh persisted throughout 2021, continuing to constrain freedom of movement along some border areas. After the November 2020 cease-fire, Azerbaijani forces took control over a 21-kilometer (13-mile) stretch of the Goris-Kapan highway, the only major road connecting the Syunik region to the rest of Armenia, partitioning villages and affecting residents' ability to move freely. In November 2021, Azerbaijani forces built new checkpoints along the road, further curtailing Armenian residents' freedom of movement in the region.

Azerbaijani forces have continued to occupy Armenian territory throughout 2021, and have frequently acted to impede the internal movement of Armenian residents, using threat of force against civilians to exert control. In August, Azerbaijani servicemen erected roadblocks along an interstate highway, blockading a number of Armenian villages for several days. Several further cases of roadblocks and military checkpoints being used to restrict Armenian residents' freedom of movement have been reported; according to the office of the Armenian Human Rights Defender (Ombudsman), there are no viable alternative routes for residents to avoid such interference.

Score Change: The score declined from 3 to 2 because Azerbaijani forces impeded internal movement, in part by occupying Armenian territory and erecting roadblocks.

Economic diversification and simpler regulations have increased the ease of doing business in recent years, but a lack of transparency and persistent cronyism created unfair advantages for those with ties to public officials during the HHK government's tenure. However, much of this has subsided since the 2018 change in government.

Armenian law adequately protects property rights, though officials have not always upheld them in the past.

In 2021, the Ombudsman reported that Azerbaijani military occupation continues to prevent the return of lawful residents to their homes in Armenian border communities, violating their property rights.

The constitution defines marriage as a union between a man and a woman. Domestic violence is common and not adequately prosecuted, and services for victims are inadequate. A new law on domestic violence that took effect in 2018 placed an emphasis on "restoring family harmony," raising concerns that it would deter victims from leaving dangerous situations. In October 2019, the government introduced amendments to remove that reference and expand the definition of what constituted domestic violence. In early January 2020, a women's rights activist reported that police became more responsive to domestic violence cases after the law's introduction.

The HHK government signed the Istanbul Convention, a Council of Europe (CoE) document that binds participating countries to bolster their efforts to combat violence against women, in 2018. While the government has not yet ratified the Istanbul Convention, the parliament did approve the ratification of the Lanzarote Convention, a CoE document that requires signatories to address sexual violence against children, in May 2020.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 2 / 4

Legal protections against exploitative or dangerous working conditions are poorly enforced, and about half of workers are employed in the informal sector, where they may be more exposed to such conditions. Armenians are subjected to sex and labor trafficking abroad, and some children in the country work in agriculture and other sectors. Children residing in care institutions face a particularly heightened risk of trafficking. According to the US State Department, the government has made efforts to address trafficking in persons in recent years, in part by raising awareness of the problem and training law enforcement authorities, but it has done little to identify victims proactively, and the number of successful prosecutions remains small.

Australia

Population: 25,800,000

Capital: Canberra

Freedom Status: Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Australia has a strong record of advancing and protecting political rights and civil liberties. Challenges to these freedoms include the threat of foreign political influence, harsh policies toward asylum seekers, discrimination against LGBT+ people, increasingly stringent checks against the press, and ongoing difficulties ensuring the equal rights of First Nations Australians.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- In February, former Liberal Party staffer Brittany Higgins publicly alleged that she had been raped by a colleague in then Defense Minister Linda Reynolds's office in 2019. Higgins also accused the Liberal Party of covering-up the story and leaking her personal information to journalists in an attempt to undermine her credibility.
- Also in February, the Australian Broadcasting Corporation (ABC) published allegations that an unnamed senior minister had raped a fellow high school student as a teenager in 1988. Federal Attorney General Christian Porter identified himself as the subject of the allegations in March and commenced defamation proceedings against the ABC, which were later discontinued in May. Authorities declined to press charges against Porter owing to his accuser's death by suicide in 2020, and the limited prospects of a conviction.

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS 12 / 12A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The Australian government is a parliamentary democracy under a constitutional monarchy. The leader of the popularly elected majority party or coalition is designated as prime minister, and serves as head of government. Scott Morrison, the head of the Liberal Party, became prime minister in 2018 after successfully challenging Malcolm Turnbull for the leadership. Morrison's ascension continued a pattern in which prime ministers failed to serve full terms due to "leadership coups," which have drawn criticism for failing to reflect the will of the electorate. Morrison won a new term as prime minister when the Liberal Party and its coalition partner, the National Party, won a free and fair election in 2019.

A governor-general, appointed on the recommendation of the prime minister, represents the monarch of the United Kingdom (UK) as head of state. The powers of the monarchy are extremely limited. David Hurley was appointed governor-general in 2019.

The bicameral legislative branch consists of a 151-member House of Representatives and 76-member Senate. Lower house members are elected through a ranked-choice ballot, and serve three-year terms. Senators are elected through a ranked-choice ballot and serve staggered six-year terms.

The Liberal-National coalition won 77 seats in the House of Representatives in the May 2019 election, earning a one-seat majority over all other parties. The Labor Party won 68, while the Greens won 1. Independents took the remaining 5 seats.

Forty seats in the Senate were filled in the same contest. The Liberal-National coalition won 19 of the seats up for reelection, while Labor won 13, the Greens won 6, and 2 were won by independents. Turnout for the election stood at 91.9 percent.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 4 / 4

Australian electoral laws and procedures are generally fair and impartial. The Australian Electoral Commission (AEC)—an independent federal agency—coordinates all federal elections and referendums, draws seat boundaries, and keeps the electoral rolls. Voting is compulsory, and a registered voter's failure to vote may result in a small fine, which if unpaid can increase and ultimately lead to a criminal conviction.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION 15 / 16 (-1)B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 4 / 4

Australians may organize political parties without restrictions. Registration and recognition as a political party requires a party constitution and either one member in Parliament, or at least 500 members on the electoral roll.

Power rotates between parties frequently, traditionally alternating between the Labor Party and the Liberal-National coalition. The Greens and smaller left-leaning parties tend to ally with Labor, while rural-oriented and conservative parties often ally with the Liberals.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 4 / 4

Political participation in Australia is largely free from undue domestic influence. The UK's monarch remains the Australian head of state, but the monarchy's power is strictly limited by the Australian constitution and legal precedent.

Concerns about foreign interference in politics, particularly from China, have persisted for several years. Chinese actors have allegedly funded candidates and parties, and a 2020 Australian Federal Police (AFP) foreign interference investigation named some Chinese consular officials in their warrants. The government banned foreign donations to political parties, independent candidates, and other political campaign groups in 2018. Additionally, the Foreign Influence Transparency Scheme, which came into force that year, requires people who engage in political activities, such as lobbying on behalf of a foreign government or other entity, to register publicly.

In September 2021, Attorney General Christian Porter revealed he had accepted an undisclosed sum from an anonymous donor to fund a portion of his legal fees for defamation proceedings against the ABC. Porter indicated that he was not aware of the donor's identity, raising concerns about whether the donors "expected to get anything in return" for their assistance. Porter resigned from politics at the end of the year.

Political rights and electoral opportunities are granted to all Australians. However, the interests of women are inadequately represented. Only 47 seats in the lower house are held by women, representing 31.1 percent of the body; 40 of Australia's 76 senators are women (52.6 percent). The opposition Labor Party employs an internal quota specifying that 40 percent of its candidates must be women; this quota will rise to 50 percent by 2025. The governing Liberal Party also aims for equal gender representation by 2025 but does not use a quota system, despite increasing calls to do so.

Women in Parliament have reported being intimidated and harassed by their male colleagues. A November 2021 report by Sex Discrimination Commissioner Kate Jenkins found one in three federal political staffers had experienced sexual harassment at work.

A series of high-profile sexual assault allegations emerged in early 2021, corroborating the commissioner's report and highlighting the misogyny and physical endangerment women in politics face. In February, former Liberal Party staffer Brittany Higgins alleged she was raped by a colleague in Defense Minister Linda Reynolds's office in 2019. Higgins also accused the Liberal Party of covering-up the story and leaking her personal information to journalists in an attempt to undermine her credibility. Reynolds called Higgins a "lying cow," while the Labor Party accused Prime Minister Morrison of misleading Parliament after he failed to disclose that an internal inquiry into the allegations had been discontinued.

Also in February 2021, public broadcaster ABC published allegations that an unnamed senior minister had raped a fellow high school student as a teenager in 1988. Attorney General Porter identified himself as the subject of the allegations in March and commenced defamation proceedings against the ABC, which were later discontinued. Authorities declined to press charges against Porter owing to his accuser's death by suicide in 2020, and the limited prospects of a conviction. Prime Minister Morrison declined to investigate the matter further. Porter, who denies the accusations, resigned from politics in December 2021.

Some voting restrictions—including the requirement that voters hold a fixed address and a ban on voting by prisoners serving long sentences—disproportionately affect Indigenous Australians. Draft legislation that was withdrawn from Parliament in December 2021 would have required voters to present photographic identification before voting in Federal elections, which critics claimed could result in deterring Indigenous voters.

Indigenous Australians are also underrepresented in Parliament. The lower house's first Aboriginal man won a seat in 2010, and the first Aboriginal woman won a seat in 2016. The Australian government has considered reforms to strengthen Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people's political voice, including a proposed representative body that would advise Parliament on policy matters that affect them.

LGBT+ representatives have served in Parliament since the 1990s, when Greens senator Bob Brown became the first openly gay member of the upper house. The first openly gay member of the House of Representatives was elected in a 2016 by-election.

Score Change: The score declined from 4 to 3 due to recent cases of sexual violence and a culture of misogyny experienced by women in politics.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT 12 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 4 / 4

The freely elected government is generally able to develop and implement policy.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 4 / 4

Laws against official corruption are generally well enforced, but the absence of a federal anticorruption body makes enforcement more difficult. All states and territories operate local anticorruption bodies, with Queensland creating the first state-level agency in 1989.

Prime Minister Morrison has faced increasing pressure from independent legislators and the nongovernmental organization (NGO) Transparency International to create a federal anticorruption body. Despite Morrison's proposal for a Commonwealth Integrity Commission (CIC) in late 2018, no significant developments towards its creation occurred in 2021.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 4 / 4

Government operations are characterized by a high degree of transparency, and political affairs are openly discussed in Parliament and in the media. Parliamentary records and commissioned reports are readily available. The Freedom of Information Act allows people to access a wide range of government documents, though some government agencies have been criticized for long delays and unnecessary refusals of freedom of information (FOI) requests.

The Labor-National coalition has been accused of disproportionately directing public funds to districts they represent. For example, in June 2021, the Australian National Audit Office (ANAO) claimed that the Liberal-National coalition had allegedly misappropriated A$660 million (US$495 million) toward infrastructure upgrades ahead of the 2019 national election. The ANAO report found that none of the projects awarded (of which 77 percent were in Coalition-held seats) had been chosen through transparent means, nor were they selected based on their merit.

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF 15 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 3 / 4

Though the constitution does not explicitly protect press freedom, journalists scrutinize lawmakers and the government, covering controversial topics generally without serious obstacles or risk of harassment or violence.

However, the AFP conducted controversial raids of the ABC Sydney office and the home of Sunday Telegraph editor Annika Smethurst in 2019 after both published stories based on leaked materials outlining military misconduct and the government's spying powers. The ABC sued to block the review of the seized documents, though their case was dismissed in February 2020. However, in April 2020 the High Court of Australia ruled that the warrant relied upon by the AFP in the Smethurst raid was invalid, though it declined to prohibit the evidence produced by the search from use by prosecutors. The AFP did not pursue charges against Smethurst.

Members of the press have also been constricted by the use of judicial suppression orders while covering criminal cases. A judge in the state of Victoria issued a suppression order to limit reporting on the trial of Cardinal George Pell, an Australian Vatican official convicted of sexual assault in 2018. Victoria state prosecutors threatened nearly 100 journalists reporting on the Pell case with contempt of court charges in a 2019 letter. Some staff members of publications that covered the case received these letters even though they did not report on the case themselves. Prosecutors filed charges against 36 individual journalists and organizations in 2019, and a trial commenced in the Victorian Supreme Court in November 2020. In February 2021, prosecutors dropped all charges against individuals involved, allowing 12 media outlets to plead guilty to breaching the suppression orders. In June, the outlets were fined a combined AU$1.1 million (US $825,000).

In February 2021, the government passed the News Media and Digital Platforms Bargaining Code, which established a mandatory arbitration regime for digital platforms, such as Facebook and Google, to negotiate with and ultimately pay news outlets for using their content. The Code has been criticized for potentially weakening media diversity.

The constitution explicitly prohibits laws that would either impose or restrict religious expression, and individuals are generally able to express religious beliefs or nonbelief.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

Academic freedom is generally respected. However, federal officials have in the past warned of Chinese attempts to monitor Chinese students in Australia, and to question academics in Australia whose views differed from those of the Chinese government. Some students have expressed fears of foreign surveillance, prompting them to wear masks to protect their identities while protesting Chinese government actions. Some universities receive significant amounts of foreign funding, particularly from China, which has further raised concerns over Beijing's influence on curriculums and university governance.

Generally, people in Australia may freely discuss personal views on sensitive topics, though the government has passed several laws in recent years increasing its surveillance powers. A data retention law requires telecommunications companies to store users' metadata for two years and has raised concerns about the government's ability to track mobile and online communications. In 2019, the AFP disclosed that it accessed Australians' metadata nearly 20,000 times and reviewed the metadata of journalists 58 times during its 2017–18 reporting period.

The 2018 Assistance and Access Act requires technology companies to provide law enforcement agencies access to encrypted communications, on grounds that include preventing terrorism and crime. Civil rights groups criticized the new law's broad reach, relative lack of oversight, and steep fines for companies that do not comply. Vault Systems, an Australian provider of cloud services, warned in 2019 that multinational companies were increasingly housing their data in other countries because of the legislation.

Additionally, in 2019 the High Court ruled against Michaela Banerji, who sued the government for her dismissal from the Department of Immigration and Border Protection in 2013 in connection with a pseudonymous Twitter account she used to criticize government policies on immigration and the treatment of detainees.

Public figures, including politicians, regularly sue journalists or members of the public for defamation for publishing unfavorable stories or other content about them, particularly online. For example, in April 2021, Minister of Defense Peter Dutton was awarded A$35,000 (US $26,200) in damages and legal costs in a defamation case against refugee activist Shane Bazzi who called Dutton a "rape apologist" on Twitter. Bazzi appealed the decision in December.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS 12 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

Freedom of assembly is not explicitly codified in law, but the government generally respects the right to peaceful assembly. There are some limited restrictions meant to ensure public safety, and some incidents of police using excessive force against protesters have been reported. In March 2021, demonstrations were held across the country against misogyny and sexism in response to the Higgins and Porter allegations of sexual misconduct within Parliament.

A series of violent protests against vaccination mandates and lockdown restrictions occurred in the country's two largest cities, Sydney and Melbourne, in the second half of 2021. Analysts claimed the presence of far-right extremist groups amid the demonstrators likely provoked the violence.

NGOs are generally free to form, function, and receive funding. A 2018 bill intended to limit foreign interference in the political sphere also sought to limit donations to certain charities from foreign entities, which raised concerns that it would severely impact the ability of NGOs to function. However, after pressure from the Labor and Green parties, the bill was amended to specify that it does not apply to charities and advocacy groups.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 4 / 4

Workers can freely organize and bargain collectively, and trade unions actively engage in political debates and campaigns. However, strikes are only allowed when negotiating new union agreements, and may only pertain to issues under negotiation. In 2017, a High Court ruling prohibited organizations that had previously violated orders from the Fair Work Commission from holding strikes during negotiations. The court described the right to strike as a "privilege."

In September 2021, the Melbourne offices of the Construction, Forestry, Mining and Energy Union (CFMEU) were stormed by protestors demonstrating against a two-week ban on construction work during that city's sixth lockdown.

F. RULE OF LAW 15 / 16F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 4 / 4

The Australian judiciary is generally independent. However, a lengthy investigation in 2019 by independent media outlet Crikey revealed that the Liberal-National government consciously worked to install individuals affiliated with the Liberal Party—including former candidates, donors, and party members—to the Administrative Appeals Tribunal (AAT), a body that reviews the merits of administrative decisions by government agencies.

In March 2021, Jacqueline Gleeson was appointed to the High Court of Australia, the highest court in the country. Gleeson is the daughter of a former chief justice of the High Court, which prompted some concerns about fairness and impartiality in judicial appointments. Members of the judiciary, particularly in the higher-level courts, tend to lack diversity, and many appointed judges come from prominent legal families.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 4 / 4

The right to due process is generally respected. Defendants and detainees are presumed innocent until proven guilty and can only be held for 24 hours without being charged for a crime, with exceptions for terrorism cases.

People living in rural areas, and in particular Aboriginal people, face significant barriers to accessing the justice system. Judges, lawyers, and prosecutors must be flown into remote communities, providing little time to prepare cases or be briefed by clients. Courtrooms are often in ad hoc, repurposed buildings, and lengthy case dockets are a prominent issue. Judges traveling these circuits work large caseloads due to understaffing and underfunding, which could impact their health and their court decisions. Significant case backlogs cause individuals to wait years for their cases to be heard, which can place some, like those who have experienced domestic violence, in further danger.

Authorities shifted court proceedings to be held online during the COVID-19 pandemic, which has led to increased availability of court and registry services and resources. The greater flexibility offered by virtual hearings and services has, to a degree, increased access to the justice system in rural areas.

Australia provides protection from the illegitimate use of force, and Australians have means to seek redress for harm. Prison conditions mostly meet international standards. However, conditions at numerous juvenile detention centers are substandard. Some children have instead been detained in adult prisons. In 2019, an ABC investigative program reported on the practice of placing minors in “watch houses,” maximum security facilities usually reserved for violent adult offenders.

The use of solitary confinement has become controversial, with the Victoria state ombudsman calling for the end of its use in 2019. The ombudsman noted that children and adolescents were sometimes placed in solitary confinement.

First Nations Australians continue to lag behind other groups in key social and economic indicators; suffer higher rates of incarceration; and report routine mistreatment by police and prison officials. Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander children are placed in detention at a rate 22 times higher than that of non-Aboriginal children. Additionally, people with disabilities make up almost one-third of the prison population, and face harassment and violence in prisons.

Men and women have the same legal rights, and discrimination based on sexual orientation or gender identity is prohibited. In practice, women and LGBT+ people experience employment discrimination and harassment.

Religious exemptions within the Sex Discrimination Act of 1984 allow for the expulsion of students and dismissal of teachers on the basis of their sexual orientation. While this power is rarely exercised, this act has sometimes been used to discriminate. Prime Minister Morrison has faced pressure from rights groups to remove the exemptions, and from religious groups to retain and bolster them. In response, Morrison unveiled a bill at the end of 2018, aimed at protecting LGBT+ students from discrimination.

The Liberal-National government spent much of 2019 drafting a bill meant to limit religious discrimination in Australian society, which remained under consideration at the end 2021. LGBT+ rights advocates objected to the draft legislation, warning that the bill would allow health providers to deny treatment to LGBT+ patients for religious reasons.

Australia's harsh asylum and immigration policies continued to be enforced in 2021. The government announced in October it would cease detaining asylum seekers in Papua New Guinea (PNG) by December, transferring the refugees there either to the other offshore detention facility in Nauru—which is characterized by poor living conditions, inadequate safety for women and children, and a lack of sufficient healthcare and education services—or to the Papuan government. As of the end of December, approximately 112 refugees were in detention on Nauru, and 105 were in PNG, though the government ended their tracking of data for asylum seekers there. Asylum seekers can wait years for their applications to be processed; in one severe case, a man seeking asylum from Sri Lanka who fled to Australia in 2009 was still being held in immigration detention through at least the end of 2020. The United Nations special rapporteurs on migrant rights criticized the lack of medical care on Manus Island and Nauru, warning that the detention of refugees there amounted to cruel and inhuman treatment. Despite this, Parliament repealed a law allowing offshore detainees to seek emergency medical care in Australia in 2019, ten months after it was enacted.

The coronavirus pandemic exacerbated the difficulties faced by asylum seekers and other temporary visa holders, who were denied access to the government's welfare packages for those affected by the coronavirus. As a result, many temporary visa holders, including refugees, were forced to rely on food banks and charities to survive. Advocacy groups criticized their exclusion from the government's coronavirus relief that placed temporary visa holders at greater risk of homelessness and destitution. In August 2020, Multicultural Affairs Minister Alan Tudge said the government would "make no apology" for prioritizing Australian citizens and residents over temporary visa holders in allocating welfare.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS 14 / 16 (-1)

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 3 / 4 (-1)

The government respects freedom of movement, and neither state nor nonstate actors interfere with the choice of residence, employment, or institution of higher education.

In response to the coronavirus pandemic in 2020 and 2021, some state and territory governments closed their internal borders at different times during the year. The process to obtain an exemption for traveling between states was difficult and often significantly delayed. Some people who rely on services including employment or health care across state borders, were unable to access these services due to the closures. In December 2020, the border between Victoria and New South Wales was closed with the public given just over a day's warning, stranding many cross-border travelers who had visited family for the holidays. Some states with lower rates of COVID-19 transmission, particularly Queensland and Western Australia, maintained a hardline stance on internal borders throughout 2021, despite low transmission rates of the virus and nearly 80 percent of the population being fully vaccinated. Promises by state governments to reopen throughout the year were repeatedly delayed.

Score Change: The score declined from 4 to 3 because state governments continued to impose disproportionate and arbitrary COVID-19-related restrictions on movement during the year.

With an open and free market economy, businesses and individuals enjoy a high level of economic freedom and strong protections for property rights.

The government generally does not restrict social freedoms. In 2017, Parliament legalized same-sex marriage following a nationwide, nonbinding postal survey in which more than 60 percent of participants favored legalization. Same-sex couples have also won the right to adopt children at the state level, with the Northern Territory becoming the last state or territory to legalize LGBT+ adoption in 2018. Discrimination based on gender identity was prohibited under a 2013 amendment to the Sex Discrimination Act of 1984.

Gender-based violence (GBV) remains a national concern, particularly for Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander women. In addition, women who kill domestic abusers in self-defense are often jailed, with Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander women representing the majority of this incarcerated group. In 2019, the attorney general pledged that the government would pass legislation facilitating defendants' ability to claim and submit evidence of self-defense in court. Following the brutal murder of a Queensland woman, Hannah Clarke, and her three children by Clarke's estranged husband in February 2020, there were multiple calls to criminalize coercive control to combat domestic and intimate partner violence.

Abortion law is decided by state and territory governments. New South Wales was the last state to decriminalize abortion in 2019. In some states women have no access to abortion through public health systems despite its legality, forcing women in those areas to seek assistance from private providers.

Australians generally enjoy robust economic opportunities and freedom from exploitation. However, Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people continue to face economic hardship; census data from 2016 revealed that employment rates in remote areas declined since 2006, impeding their upward social mobility.

In 2018, Parliament passed the Modern Slavery Act, requiring large businesses to be more transparent about potential slavery in their supply chains and to make efforts to address the problem. While the law has been largely viewed favorably, some critics have noted that it fails to impose penalties for noncompliance.

Austria

Population: 8,900,000

Capital: Vienna

Freedom Status: Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Austria has a democratic system of government that guarantees political rights and civil liberties. The country has historically been governed by grand coalitions of the center-left Social Democratic Party of Austria (SPÖ) and the center-right Austrian People's Party (ÖVP). In recent years, the political system has faced pressure from the Freedom Party of Austria (FPÖ), a right-wing, populist party that openly entertains nationalist and xenophobic sentiments.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- Several leading ÖVP and FPÖ politicians were investigated in connection with corruption and embezzlement cases throughout the year, including then chancellor Sebastian Kurz and finance minister Gernot Blümel. Kurz resigned as chancellor in October, and stepped down as ÖVP party leader in December; Blümel also resigned in December.
- Foreign minister Alexander Schallenberg became chancellor following Kurz's resignation in October, but also stepped down from the role after Kurz left politics in December. ÖVP party officials chose interior minister Karl Nehammer to become chancellor and to replace Kurz as party chair; he was appointed to the chancellorship in December, but was still awaiting confirmation of his ÖVP leadership position at year's end.
- Following years of investigations by the Public Prosecutor's Office for Combating Economic Crimes and Corruption (WKStA), former FPÖ leader Heinz-Christian Strache was found guilty on charges of corruption in August. He received a 15-month suspended sentence.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 37 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 12 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

Executive elections in Austria are generally free and fair. The president is elected for a six-year term and has predominantly ceremonial duties. The president does, however, appoint the chancellor, who also needs the support of the legislature to govern. President Alexander Van der Bellen, former Green Party leader, prevailed in 2016 after a close and controversial poll that featured a repeat of the runoff between Van der Bellen and FPÖ candidate Norbert Hofer. The runoff was repeated after the Constitutional Court (VfGH) established that there had been problems with the handling of postal ballots.

Following snap elections in 2019, an ÖVP–Green Party government took office in January 2020, marking the first time the Green Party has participated in a national government. Sebastian Kurz of the ÖVP, who led the previous ÖVP–FPÖ coalition, returned as chancellor.

In October 2021, Kurz was forced to resign the chancellorship over allegations of corruption; after Kurz's resignation, then foreign minister Alexander Schallenberg was appointed chancellor. However, after Kurz announced he planned to leave the ÖVP leadership—and politics altogether—in December, Schallenberg also stepped down. After Schallenberg's resignation, ÖVP party officials chose then interior minister Karl Nehammer to become both party leader and chancellor. Nehammer was sworn in as chancellor in December, but had yet to be confirmed as party chairman by year's end.

Legislative elections in Austria are generally considered credible. The National Council, the lower house, has 183 members chosen through proportional representation at the district, state, and federal levels. Members serve five-year terms. The 61 members of the upper house, the Federal Council (Bundesrat), are chosen by state legislatures for five- or six-year terms.

Snap National Council elections took place in September 2019, after the Ibiza gate affair triggered the previous ÖVP–FPÖ coalition's collapse. The ÖVP was the clear winner with 71 seats, though it did not win a parliamentary majority. The Green Party returned after a two-year absence from parliament, winning 26 seats. Support for the FPÖ collapsed, with the party losing 20 seats and holding 31. The SPÖ won 40, while the liberal New Austria and Liberal Forum (NEOS) claimed 15.

Austria's electoral laws are fair and implemented impartially by the relevant bodies.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 15 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 4 / 4

Austria has competitive political parties that form and operate without encountering undue obstacles. Recent years have seen the rise and fall of various competing parties and coalitions through democratic processes.

Opposition parties have a realistic opportunity to gain representation. Until recently, Austria has often been governed by grand coalitions, a trend that has fostered some public disillusionment with the political process. An ÖVP–FPÖ government, which collapsed in 2019, was succeeded by an ÖVP–Green Party coalition in January 2020.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 4 / 4

Austrians are generally free to make their own political choices without pressure from any groups that are not democratically accountable.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 3 / 4

The participation of Slovene, Hungarian, and Romany minorities in local government remains limited. There is little minority representation in the legislature. The number of people who have been naturalized has fallen since the establishment of a more restrictive national integration policy in 2009. Individuals must have lived in Austria for 10 years, 5 of them as a permanent resident, to qualify for naturalization.

Several parties include support for gender equality in their platforms. In the 2019 elections, 39 percent of the members elected to the parliament were women, a slight increase compared to 2017. The country's first majority-female cabinet was appointed in January 2020.

Non-Austrian EU citizens are entitled to vote in municipal elections as well as in European Parliament elections.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 10 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 4 / 4

The freely elected president and legislative representatives work with the chancellor, vice chancellor, and cabinet ministers to determine the policies of the government.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 3 / 4

Public-sector corruption is problematic, and the political class is widely perceived as corrupt. The Council of Europe's (CoE) Group of States against Corruption (GRECO) has criticized Austria for weak party-finance legislation and for failing to regulate lobbying and prevent corruption. Austria has seen an increase in indictments for, and rising costs of, corruption in recent years.

A petition for a referendum against corruption was launched by several prominent politicians in June 2021. The petition was submitted to the Interior Ministry in December.

Investigations into IbizaGate—which began with the 2019 release of a video of then FPÖ leader Strache offering state contracts in exchange for donations and favorable media coverage—continued in 2021. In July, a parliamentary inquiry committee concluded its IbizaGate investigation; opposition leaders believe the committee's findings point to misconduct within the FPÖ and ÖVP. Strache was found guilty of corruption in August, and given a 15-month suspended sentence.

Further investigations into allegations of bribery and corruption involving senior FPÖ and ÖVP politicians, including then chancellor Kurz, continued throughout the year. In October, Kurz resigned as chancellor, and in December, stepped down as ÖVP chairman. Finance minister Gernot Blümel also resigned in December, following a months-long investigation into allegations of his involvement with a high-profile corruption case involving several FPÖ and ÖVP politicians. He denied any wrongdoing, and had not been criminally charged at year's end.

Austria's government has frequently been criticized for inadequate transparency. Official secrecy remains enshrined in the constitution, and Austria's overall legal framework on access to information is weak.

In February 2021, the ÖVP–Green Party government agreed on a draft Freedom of Information Act, which would provide for the end of official secrecy; the draft was presented to the National Council later that month and passed to the Federal Chancellery in April, where it remained at year's end. The draft legislation has been criticized as weak and overly narrow by information rights groups.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 56 / 60D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF 14 / 16*D1. Are there free and independent media? 3 / 4

The federal constitution and the Media Law of 1981 provide the basis for free media in Austria. However, libel and slander laws protect politicians and government officials, many of whom—particularly members of the FPÖ—have filed defamation suits in recent years. Media ownership remains highly concentrated, particularly in the provinces, and the government exerts some influence on the state broadcaster, the Austrian Broadcasting Corporation (ORF).

Media outlets are eligible to receive government funding through advertising and in the form of press subsidies intended to ensure media diversity. In recent years, independent media outlets have expressed concern that government spending on media—which amounted to nearly 70 million euros in 2020—lacks efficient oversight, allowing funds to be distributed arbitrarily and without transparency.

In 2021, several ÖVP politicians resigned over allegations that they had purchased favorable news coverage during the 2017 elections.

While there is no official censorship, Austrian law prohibits any form of neo-Nazism or antisemitism, as well as the public denial, approval, or justification of Nazi crimes, including the Holocaust.

Religious freedom is constitutionally guaranteed. Austrian law divides religious organizations into three legal categories: officially recognized religious societies, religious confessional communities, and associations. Many religious minority groups allege that the law impedes their legitimate claims for recognition and demotes them to second-class status.

Foreign funding for Muslim houses of worship and imams is prohibited by a 2015 law; Orthodox Christian and Jewish groups with similarly strong links to communities abroad face no such restrictions. The FPÖ has been criticized for stoking anti-Muslim sentiment through controversial advertising campaigns. In recent years, antisemitic and anti-Islamic tendencies have become more prevalent.

In May 2021, a progovernment organization published a controversial map showing the locations of more than 600 Islamic religious institutions throughout Austria. The map has been criticized by religious organizations and opposition politicians, who fear that it stigmatizes Muslims and could lead to an increase in anti-Islamic hate crimes.

Academic freedom is generally upheld, and the educational system is free from extensive political indoctrination.

In July 2021, numerous amendments were made to the Universities Act, which regulates the administration of Austria's public universities. University governing bodies have criticized the legislation, citing concerns that the amendments will jeopardize the autonomy of public universities.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 4 / 4

Private discussion in Austria is generally free and unrestricted. However, there have been some difficulties related to the balance between ensuring freedom of speech and enforcing legal prohibitions on hate speech. A debate surrounding more extensive online surveillance through state authorities is ongoing.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 12 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

Freedom of assembly is constitutionally protected and respected in practice. However, since March 2020, the government has instituted several lockdowns in response to COVID-19 outbreaks; when lockdown measures are in place, assemblies are subject to strict regulation. In December 2021, the government lifted most restrictions for people who are vaccinated against COVID-19.

Despite COVID-19-related restrictions on public gatherings, large protests against lockdown measures—including the November announcement of a vaccine mandate—continued throughout 2021.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 4 / 4

Nongovernmental organizations operate without restrictions.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 4 / 4

Trade unions are free to organize and to strike, and they are considered an essential partner in national policymaking. According to government statistics, some 1.4 million workers are members of trade unions.

F. RULE OF LAW: 15 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 4 / 4

The judiciary is independent, and is generally held in high regard among Austrians. The Constitutional Court examines the compatibility of legislation with the constitution without political influence or interference.

Austrian judges are appointed by the executive instead of a politically independent body, which the CoE has criticized as an insufficient separation of the state government from the judicial system. Additionally, in July 2021, a European Commission report found that government officials have repeatedly engaged in public criticism of WKStA prosecutors during anticorruption investigations, which has negatively affected public perception of judicial independence.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 4 / 4

Due process generally prevails in civil and criminal matters. However, scandals involving Austria's intelligence apparatus in recent years raised concerns about the potential politicization of the justice system, and respect for due process.

People in Austria are generally free from the illegitimate use of physical force, war, and insurgencies. However, terrorist threats are a concern. In November 2020, 4 people were killed and 23 were injured in Vienna by an assailant who was then killed by police. The government disclosed that the assailant was previously imprisoned for attempting to travel to Syria to join the Islamic State (IS). An independent inquiry into the attack found that counterterrorism agencies “lack sufficient capacity” to adequately address existing terrorism risks.

In December 2020, Austrian authorities arrested five individuals accused of participating in a far-right group and confiscated over 70 weapons. Then interior minister Karl Nehammer reported that the weapons cache may have been meant for a “far-right militia,” and noted that the unnamed suspects were known neo-Nazis.

Conditions in prisons generally meet high European standards.

Some groups face difficulty exercising their human rights before the law. Strong rhetoric has been directed against refugees and migrants in recent years. Some asylum seekers can be deported while appeals are pending. In 2019, the Office of the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights (OHCHR) said the Austrian asylum system did not meet international standards. The ÖVP–Green coalition espoused a strict stance on asylum in its January 2020 coalition agreement, vowing to preemptively detain asylum seekers who are deemed dangerous. Deportations continued during the COVID-19 pandemic, leading to conflict between the coalition partners in 2021.

LGBT+ people face some societal discrimination. Hate crime legislation prohibits incitement based on sexual orientation. However, no law prohibits service providers from denying services on that basis.

Despite some improvement, gender equality remains an issue in Austria. According to Eurostat, the gender wage gap in Austria is among the largest in the EU.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 15 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

Austrian citizens enjoy freedom of movement. However, Austrians periodically faced strict limits on movement starting in March 2020 under COVID-19-related measures.

Roma and other ethnic minorities face discrimination in the labor and housing markets. The Labor Ministry has sought to promote integration of younger immigrants by providing German-language courses and job training.

Austrians may freely exercise the right to own property and establish businesses.

Same-sex marriage became legal in Austria in 2019. Restrictions on same-sex couples adopting children ended in 2016.

The 2009 Second Protection Against Violence Act increased penalties for perpetrators of domestic violence and authorized further punitive measures against chronic offenders. However, gender-based violence remains a problem, and Austria has one of the highest rates of femicide in the EU: according to official government data, 350 women were killed between 2010 and 2021.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 3 / 4

A 1979 law guarantees women’s freedom from discrimination in various areas, including the workplace.

Media reports in 2020 and 2021 highlighted the exploitation of seasonal workers, who often lived in poor conditions and did not receive the minimum wage.

Azerbaijan

Population: 10,200,000

Capital: Baku

Freedom Status: Not Free

Electoral Democracy: No

Note: The numerical scores and status listed above do not reflect conditions in Nagorno-Karabakh, which is examined in a separate report. Freedom in the World reports assess the level of political rights and civil liberties in a given geographical area, regardless of whether they are affected by the state, nonstate actors, or foreign powers. Disputed territories are sometimes assessed separately if they meet certain criteria, including boundaries that are sufficiently stable to allow year-on-year comparisons. For more information, see the report methodology and FAQ.

Overview: Power in Azerbaijan's authoritarian regime remains heavily concentrated in the hands of Ilham Aliyev, who has served as president since 2003, and his extended family. Corruption is rampant, and the formal political opposition has been weakened by years of persecution. The authorities have carried out an extensive crackdown on civil liberties in recent years, leaving little room for independent expression or activism. Azerbaijan won control of a third of the territory of Nagorno-Karabakh along with some adjacent land during a weeks-long conflict with Armenia in 2020, at the cost of over 2,700 soldiers.

- In January, Aliyev created a new media body, the Media Development Agency (MEDIA), via a presidential decree. In December, the parliament passed a bill authored with MEDIA's involvement that would impose a number of restrictions on media outlets, including requiring journalists to register with the authorities. The bill awaited Aliyev's signature at year's end.
- Two political parties were created during the year as a result of political dialogue between the government and the opposition. Opposition figures have criticized the process, which began in 2020, saying that no meaningful changes have been made to allow genuine opposition parties to form or operate.
- New legislation requiring people wishing to divorce to first seek mediation came into force in January. Critics say that the law, which effectively lengthens the time-frame of many divorce proceedings, limits access to divorce for vulnerable people and for those who may lack access to official mediation services.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 2 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 0 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

The president is directly elected for seven-year terms. There are no term limits. Since the early 1990s, elections have not been considered credible or competitive by international observers. A February 2018 presidential decree moved that year's presidential election, originally planned for October, up to April. President Ilham Aliyev—who succeeded his father, Heydar, in 2003—won a fourth term with some 86 percent of the vote amid evidence of electoral fraud and a boycott by the main opposition parties. Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE) observers found that the election lacked genuine competition due to a restrictive political environment in which the seven nominal opposition candidates did not openly confront or criticize the president.

In 2017, President Aliyev appointed his wife, Mehriban Aliyeva, as vice president. The post had been created via constitutional changes that were pushed through in 2016 without meaningful parliamentary debate or public consultation.

The prime minister and cabinet are appointed and dismissed by the president. In October 2019, Prime Minister Novruz Mammadov—in office since April 2018—was replaced by Ali Asadov.

The 125 seats in Azerbaijan's unicameral Milli Mejlis, or National Assembly, are filled through elections in single-member districts, with members serving five-year terms.

Aliyev dissolved the parliament in December 2019, and snap elections were held in February 2020. The ruling New Azerbaijan Party (YAP) won 70 parliamentary seats, while independents won 41 and the remainder were won by smaller parties; contests for 4 seats were not immediately decided. Turnout stood at 46.8 percent. A major opposition alliance, the National Council of Democratic Forces, boycotted the elections. OSCE monitors criticized the conduct of the poll, noting procedural and tabulation concerns and ultimately questioning "whether the results were established honestly."

The electoral laws and framework fall short of international standards and do not ensure free and fair elections. The nomination process for members of electoral commissions places the bodies under the influence of the ruling party. Commission members have been known to unlawfully interfere with the election process and obstruct the activities of observers. Complaints of electoral violations do not receive adequate or impartial treatment.

Election observers have repeatedly condemned restrictions on freedom of assembly, the inability of candidates to obtain permission to hold rallies or appear on television, political interference with courts investigating electoral violations, and noncompliance with past European Court of Human Rights (ECHR) decisions on election issues. OSCE monitors present during the February 2020 parliamentary elections noted pervasive electoral misconduct, including verbal and physical abuse directed against candidates' representatives and monitors.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 2 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 1 / 4

The political environment in Azerbaijan is neither pluralistic nor competitive. The ability of opposition parties to operate and engage with the public is limited by the dominance of the YAP. A number of laws restrict candidates' efforts to organize and hold rallies, and the opposition has virtually no access to coverage on television, which remains the most popular news source. The regime has cracked down violently on any Islamic political movement that reaches national prominence.

Political dialogue between the government and the opposition began in 2020, resulting in the creation of new political parties for the first time since 2011. Another two parties were registered in 2021 as part of the process, which has been presented by the government as a “new political configuration.” However, critics say that the new parties are not genuine opposition groups and that the dialogue has been dominated by the government.

The Aliyev family has held the presidency since 1993. The biased electoral framework and repressive media and political environment effectively make it impossible for opposition parties to gain power through elections. The traditional opposition parties boycotted the most recent parliamentary, presidential, and municipal elections rather than take part in an unfair process.

Opposition politicians and party officials are subject to arbitrary arrest on dubious charges, physical violence, and intimidation. In October 2021, Niyameddin Ahmedov, a member of the opposition Popular Front Party of Azerbaijan (AXFP), was sentenced to 13 years in prison for financing terrorism, a charge his lawyers called politically motivated. He had been jailed since April, when he was arrested for allegedly violating pandemic restrictions. AXFP member Saleh Rustamli was arrested in 2018 and later received a seven-year sentence for money laundering, a charge he called politically motivated. In November 2021, Rustamli began a hunger strike, though he ended it in December.

The authoritarian system in Azerbaijan excludes the public from any genuine and autonomous political participation. The regime relies on abuse of state resources, corrupt patronage networks, and control over the security forces and criminal justice system to maintain its political dominance.

The political system does not allow women or minority groups to organize independently or advocate for their respective interests. There are no meaningful mechanisms to promote increased representation of women and ethnic or religious minorities. The government has worked to stifle public expressions of ethnic Talysh and Lezgin identity, among other targeted groups.

Internally displaced persons (IDPs) who left Nagorno-Karabakh and settled in other parts of Azerbaijan after the 1994 cease-fire have been unable to participate in municipal elections where they subsequently settled and are instead directed to vote for their former districts. IDPs have not historically pursued office in Azerbaijan since the 1994 cease-fire.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 0 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 0 / 4

Neither the president nor members of parliament are freely or fairly elected, and the parliament is unable to serve as a meaningful check on the powerful presidency. Lawmakers and lower-level elected officials essentially carry out the instructions of the ruling party.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 0 / 4

Corruption is pervasive. In the absence of a free press and independent judiciary, officials are held accountable for corrupt behavior only when it suits the needs of a more powerful or well-connected figure.

Investigative reports published by foreign media in recent years have revealed evidence that the Aliyev family used their positions to amass large private fortunes. The resources were reportedly used in part to improperly influence the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe in order to minimize criticism of electoral conduct and alleged rights abuses. In October 2021, the Pandora Papers—an investigation by the International Consortium of Investigative Journalists (ICIJ) that exposed the improper financial connections of rich and powerful actors around the world—revealed that a network of offshore companies linked to Aliyev’s family had traded around £400 million ($522.1 million) in property in the United Kingdom since 2006, including the 2018 sale of a £67-million ($87.5 million) London property to a group linked to the British monarchy.

Government operations are opaque. Although public officials are nominally required to submit financial disclosure reports, procedures and compliance remain unclear, and the reports are not publicly accessible. There are legal guarantees for citizens’ access to information, but also broad exceptions to this right, and authorities at all levels systematically refuse to respond to information requests.

In 2017, Azerbaijan withdrew from the Extractive Industries Transparency Initiative (EITI), an international platform that promotes good governance and transparency in resource-rich countries. Azerbaijan, an important producer of oil and gas, had been suspended due to ongoing noncompliance with EITI human rights standards.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 7 / 60 (–1)

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 2 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 0 / 4

Constitutional guarantees for press freedom are routinely and systematically violated, as the government works to maintain a tight grip on the information landscape. Defamation remains a criminal offense. Journalists—and their relatives—face harassment, violence, and intimidation by authorities. Legal amendments passed in 2017 extended government control over online media, allowing blocking of websites without a court order if they are deemed to contain content that poses a danger to the state or society. Independent news sites are regularly blocked or struck with cyberattacks.

Journalists face detention or imprisonment on false charges, along with travel bans. The Committee to Protect Journalists (CPJ) counted two imprisoned journalists in the country in 2021. In late 2020, Polad Aslanov, editor in chief of news sites Xeberman and Press-az, received a 16-year prison sentence for selling state secrets to Iran. Aslanov, whose wife vowed an appeal to the Supreme Court after a lower court upheld his conviction in February 2021, claimed that he was targeted for reporting on corruption.

Journalists also risk surveillance. In July 2021, the Organized Crime and Corruption Reporting Project (OCCRP) reported that Azerbaijani journalists were among those targeted with the Pegasus spyware tool, which was likely supplied to the Azerbaijani government.

In January 2021, Aliyev issued a presidential decree that called for “media reforms” and created MEDIA. In December, the parliament passed a bill authored with MEDIA’s involvement that would, among other things, require journalists to register with the authorities and media owners to reside in Azerbaijan. Local and international media rights groups criticized the legislation, which awaited Aliyev’s assent at year’s end.

In August 2021, three journalists covering a women’s rights protest in front of a police building in Baku were forcibly detained and reportedly subjected to physical and psychological abuse by police.

The regime exercises control over religion through state-affiliated entities such as the Caucasus Muslim Board. Religious communities that attempt to operate independently face burdensome registration requirements, interference with the importation and distribution of printed religious materials, and arrest and harassment of religious leaders with international ties or a significant following. For example, Haji Taleh Bagirzade and members of his Muslim Unity Movement, a nonviolent conservative Shiite group, have been subjected to mass arrests, torture, and imprisonment as part of a crackdown that began in 2015.

A number of mosques have been closed in recent years, ostensibly for registration or safety violations. Jehovah's Witnesses face harassment as well as prosecution for evading military service.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 1 / 4

The authorities have long curtailed academic freedom. Some educators have reported being dismissed for links to opposition groups, and students have faced expulsion and other punishments for similar reasons. The Azerbaijani history curriculum is known to include negative and discriminatory references to Armenians.

Law enforcement bodies monitor private telephone and online communications—particularly of activists, political figures, and foreign nationals—without judicial oversight. The escalation of government persecution of critics and their families has undermined the assumption of privacy among ordinary residents and eroded the openness of private discussion. Even state officials have been punished for their and their family members' social media activity, and activists have been imprisoned—on unrelated fabricated charges—for critical Facebook posts. In recent years, activists have been targeted by spear-phishing campaigns designed to install malicious software on their computers or steal personal information. Activists report that harassment on social media, often highly sexualized for female activists, is commonplace.

Social media users and antiwar activists who signed a statement calling for a peaceful resolution to the 2020 conflict over control of Nagorno-Karabakh were harassed and threatened online, prompting at least one activist to remove their signature.

In July 2021, the OCCRP reported that people who had casual or familial connections to activists and journalists were targeted with Pegasus.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 1 / 12E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 0 / 4

The law imposes tight restrictions on freedom of assembly, which is contingent on the protection of “public order and morals.” Activists have complained that in practice, the obstacles to public gatherings include additional, extralegal measures. Unsanctioned assemblies can draw a harsh police response and fines for participants, and the government largely stopped issuing permits for rallies in Baku in 2019. Even when permits are issued, the government typically confines demonstrations to relatively isolated locations, where it can track attendees through facial-recognition technology and mobile-phone data.

Numerous small protests were held in 2021, including some by soldiers calling for access to welfare benefits. Supporters of AXP member Saleh Rustamli, meanwhile, were forcibly detained by authorities when they called for his release at a December rally in Baku.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 0 / 4

Repressive laws on NGOs have been used to pressure both local and foreign organizations, many of which have suspended operations when their bank accounts were frozen or their offices raided. Nearly all organizations or networks that work on human rights are forced by the state to operate in a legal gray zone. The government has refused to permit the European Union to provide grant support for local civil society groups. Civic activists are routinely subjected to harassment, intimidation, detention, and abuse by police.

Activists also risk surveillance; the OCCRP's July 2021 report noted that over 40 Azerbaijani activists were likely targeted with Pegasus, along with family members.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 1 / 4

Although the law permits the formation of trade unions and the right to strike, the majority of unions remain closely affiliated with the government, and many categories of workers are prohibited from striking. Most major industries are dominated by state-owned enterprises, in which the government controls wages and working conditions.

F. RULE OF LAW: 0 / 16F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 0 / 4

The judiciary is corrupt and subservient to the executive. Judges are appointed by the parliament on the proposal of the president. The courts' lack of political independence is especially evident in the many trumped-up or otherwise flawed cases brought against opposition figures, activists, and critical journalists.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 0 / 4

Constitutional guarantees of due process are not upheld. Arbitrary arrest and detention are common, and detainees are often held for long periods before trial. Political detainees have reported restricted access to legal counsel, fabrication and withholding of evidence, and physical abuse to extract confessions.

Although nominally independent, the Azerbaijani Bar Association (AVK) acts on the orders of the Ministry of Justice and is complicit in the harassment of human rights lawyers. Legal amendments that took effect in 2018 stipulated that only AVK members could represent clients in court. Since then, the association has disbarred, suspended, or threatened most of the country's active human rights lawyers for speaking to the media about violations of their clients' rights. In nearly all disciplinary cases, the courts have upheld AVK decisions without a thorough assessment or public justification.

International observers have consistently concluded that both torture and impunity for the perpetrators of such abuse are endemic in the Azerbaijani criminal justice system. Police regularly administer beatings during arrest or while breaking up protests. Prison conditions are substandard. Medical care is generally inadequate, and overcrowding is common.

Azerbaijanis were affected by armed conflict with Armenia during 2020. The two countries engaged in a full-scale conflict over control of Nagorno-Karabakh that September, with civilian and military casualties reported on both sides. The conflict ended in early November after a Russian-brokered cease-fire was agreed; under its terms, Azerbaijan would retain control of parts of Nagorno-Karabakh gained during the fighting, along with adjacent land held by Armenia. Baku reported that 2,783 soldiers died in the fighting, while at least 143 civilians on both sides were killed.

The conflict was marked by reported acts of mistreatment, desecration, and vandalism. In early 2020, Human Rights Watch (HRW) accused Azerbaijani forces of physically abusing Armenian prisoners of war (POWs). In its World Report 2022, HRW noted that 100 Armenian POWs and detained civilians were released by Azerbaijani authorities during 2021.

Members of ethnic minority groups have complained of discrimination in areas including education, employment, and housing. Women are subject to discrimination in employment, including both de facto bias and formal exclusion from certain types of work under the labor code.

While IDPs from the Nagorno-Karabakh conflict that ended in 1994 are entitled to special assistance, they face severe infringements on their economic and social rights and freedom of movement. Many are housed in dormitories or substandard housing and are unable to change their place of residence, which is often located out of range of sources of employment or adequate medical care.

Although same-sex sexual activity is legal, LGBT+ people experience societal discrimination and risk harassment by the police. In 2017, police fined or detained dozens of people for weeks in a coordinated crackdown that led many LGBT+ residents to flee the country. LGBT+ people also faced a series of attacks in May and June 2021; local and international NGOs called on the authorities to investigate and take measures to protect LGBT+ individuals.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 4 / 16 (-1)

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 1 / 4

The government restricts freedom of movement, particularly foreign travel, for opposition politicians, journalists, and civil society activists. While travel bans were lifted for some dissidents during 2019, many others remained in place, including for some of the political prisoners released that year; others fled the country to avoid further persecution. Some travel bans remained in effect in 2021.

IDPs from the previous Nagorno-Karabakh conflict enjoy freedom of movement in law, but not in practice. IDPs are legally registered at their place of initial resettlement, which are sometimes in rural areas and far from any source of employment. The process of changing registration is difficult, and IDPs who change their place of registration risk losing their status and accompanying state assistance. As a result, many families are separated, with usually male wage-earners relocating to urban centers for work while their families remain at their place of registration. In January 2021, President Aliyev established the Karabakh Revival Fund, which is meant to finance infrastructure development in Nagorno-Karabakh to allow IDPs to return there.

People with disabilities and psychiatric patients are routinely institutionalized; there is no clear procedure to review their confinement.

Property rights are affected by government-backed development projects that often entail forced evictions, unlawful expropriations, and demolitions with little or no notice.

Corruption and the economic dominance of state-owned companies and politically connected elites pose obstacles to ordinary private business activity.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 1 / 4 (-1)

The law generally grants women and men the same rights on personal status matters such as marriage, divorce, and child custody. Domestic violence is a notable problem, and related legal protections are inadequate. Conservative social norms contribute to the widespread view that domestic violence is a private matter, which discourages victims from reporting perpetrators to the police. However, the growth of social media and the movement of rural populations to Baku in recent years have spurred public discussion of the issue. Though authorities claim that the rate of domestic violence fell during their 2019–20 reporting period, activists believe official figures are undercounting the actual number of incidents.

Throughout 2021, LGBT+ people reported being both physically and verbally assaulted and experiencing substantial societal discrimination based on their appearance.

In January 2021, new legislation came into force, imposing mandatory mediation on those seeking to divorce. The law introduces a number of obstacles for those wishing to divorce, especially for people outside of large cities who may not have access to official mediation services, and often lengthens the timeframe of the proceedings. Critics say that the law will disproportionately disadvantage people who cannot secure legal representation or those who are otherwise vulnerable, such as survivors of domestic abuse attempting to divorce their abuser.

Score Change: The score declined from 2 to 1 due to high rates of domestic violence and impunity for perpetrators, the introduction of new mediation rules that could create a barrier to divorce, and reported attacks against LGBT+ people based on their appearance.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 1 / 4

Legal safeguards against exploitative working conditions are poorly enforced, and many employers reportedly ignore them without penalty. Children are vulnerable to sexual exploitation and forced labor.

The government has taken some steps to combat forced labor and sex trafficking, including by prosecuting traffickers and providing services to victims, but the problem persists, notably among Romany children and foreign household workers. The authorities have extended a preexisting moratorium on labor inspections through the end of 2021.

As a result of corruption and a lack of public accountability for the allocation of resources, the state's oil and gas revenues tend to benefit privileged elites rather than the general population, narrowing access to economic opportunity.

Bahamas

Population: 400,000

Capital: Nassau

Freedom Status: Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: The Bahamas is a stable democracy where political rights and civil liberties are generally respected. However, the islands have a relatively high homicide rate. Harsh immigration policies, which mainly affect Haitian-Bahamians and Haitian migrants, are often executed in the absence of due process. Government corruption is a serious problem that is thought to have had significant economic consequences.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- The Progressive Liberal Party (PLP) won a parliamentary majority in an early election held in September, defeating the ruling Free National Movement (FNM). PLP leader Philip Davis was appointed prime minister that month, succeeding FNM leader Hubert Minnis. Election monitors praised the election's conduct, though it also called on the Bahamas to digitize voter registration and issue campaign-finance regulations.
- In June, the Court of Appeal upheld a 2020 ruling affirming the granting of Bahamian citizenship to a Bahamian-born child regardless of the gender or marital status of their Bahamian parent. The Minnis government vowed to appeal the ruling.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 38 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 12 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The Bahamas is governed under a parliamentary system, and a mostly ceremonial governor-general is appointed by the British monarch as head of state. The prime minister is head of government and is appointed by the governor-general; the office is usually held by the leader of the largest party in Parliament or the head of a parliamentary coalition. In September 2021, Philip Davis became prime minister following the PLP's electoral victory.

Members of the lower chamber of the bicameral Parliament, the 39-member House of Assembly, are directly elected to five-year terms. The 16 members of the Senate are appointed for five-year terms by the governor-general based on recommendations made by the prime minister and the opposition leader.

Then premier Hubert Minnis triggered an early election in August 2021; polls were held in September. The PLP won 32 House of Assembly seats, defeating the ruling FNM. The Coalition of Independents and the Democratic National Alliance respectively won over 6 and 1 percent of the vote but won no seats. Turnout stood at 65 percent, a relatively low figure. Organization of American States (OAS) monitors praised the electoral process and COVID-19-related health protocols.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 4 / 4

The electoral process is regulated by the Parliamentary Elections Act (PEA) and generally well managed by the Parliamentary Registration Department. The parliamentary commissioner heads the department and is appointed by the governor-general acting on the recommendation of the prime minister after consultation with the opposition leader.

After the PEA was amended in 2020, electoral authorities implemented a continuous voter register, which was used in the September 2021 polls. In its postelectoral report, the OAS warned that individuals who were not included in the 2017 voter list or who did not register by the August 2021 election announcement may have been disenfranchised. The OAS reiterated prior calls to digitize voter registration and issue campaign-finance regulations.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 16 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 4 / 4

Political parties may organize freely and operate unhindered. However, as electoral financing is not regulated, there is no legal obligation to disclose funding sources and no limit on campaign spending.

Opposition parties operate without undue interference. Political power has alternated between the PLP and the FNM since the country achieved independence in 1973.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 4 / 4

Voters and candidates are generally able to exercise their political choices freely. However, a lack of campaign-finance regulations leaves open avenues for the outsized role of money in politics.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 4 / 4

Only citizens may vote, and protracted citizenship and naturalization proceedings make achieving citizenship difficult for children born in the Bahamas to foreign parents. This predominantly affects children of Haitian immigrants.

Women are underrepresented in Bahamian politics. In its September 2021 postelectoral report, the OAS noted that women do not often seek office, in part due to “gendered perceptions of politics” and social pressure. The OAS nevertheless noted an increase in women candidates. Seven women won House of Assembly seats. Four women were appointed to the Senate. Five women were appointed to the cabinet. Women additionally serve as speakers of both houses.

LGBT+ people are underrepresented in politics but continue to be more visible.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 10 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 4 / 4

Freely elected officials are generally able to determine national policies in a free and unhindered manner. Parliament approved a state of emergency at the onset of the coronavirus pandemic in 2020, which expired in November 2021.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 3 / 4

Anticorruption mechanisms are relatively weak. There is no agency specifically empowered to handle allegations of government corruption. Rates of reporting corruption are low, as whistleblowers fear retaliation. The PLP vowed to establish an independent anticorruption body and an ombudsman after taking power but did not do so in 2021.

In February 2021, Youth, Sports, and Culture Minister Lanisha Rolle resigned amid an audit of the ministry's expenditure and contracts. In September, Water and Sewerage Corporation chairman Adrian Gibson effectively stepped aside after facing misconduct allegations.

A federal lawsuit filed in the United States in 2020 alleging members of the former PLP government were paid to ignore a decades-long sex trafficking operation was ongoing.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 3 / 4

Government procurement processes lack transparency, and political parties and campaigns are not required to disclose their finances. Legislators and other high-ranking public officials must disclose their income and assets annually under the Public Disclosure Act but often fail to submit the required information on time, without penalty.

In a June 2021 report, the auditor general reported that the Minnis government did not disclose the ownership details of firms that received pandemic-related funding, which was sourced from an International Monetary Fund loan. A separate audit of the Bahamas Public Parks and Public Beaches Authority (BPPPBA), the results of which were revealed in December, showed that the BPPPBA had regularly overrun its budget and that contract files were missing, prompting it to terminate existing agreements.

The Fiscal Responsibility Act (FRA) of 2019 aims to improve transparency of public-sector spending. In September 2021, the Fiscal Responsibility Council, an independent oversight and enforcement body created by the FRA, published a critical evaluation of the Minnis government's 2020 fiscal report, saying it lacked detail.

Some improvements in the legal framework and in compliance were noted during the year, however. In May 2021, a freedom of information commissioner and deputy commissioner were appointed as required by the 2017 Freedom of Information Act. The Public Procurement Act, which is meant to ensure transparency in government contracts, was passed in March 2021 and took effect in September. Also in September, the Davis government vowed to review all government contracts issued during the pandemic-related state of emergency.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 53 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 15 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 3 / 4

Press freedom in the Bahamas is constitutionally guaranteed and generally respected in practice. Privately owned newspapers and radio broadcasters freely express a variety of views, although partisanship is common.

Libel is a criminal offense punishable by up to two years in prison. Though rarely enforced, Gorman Bannister, who ran social-media news and commentary pages, was charged with libel twice, once in 2019 and again in 2020, for allegedly insulting and defaming cabinet ministers. Bannister died in October 2021.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 4 / 4

Religious freedom is generally respected.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

Academic institutions are generally free from political pressure and other interference.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 4 / 4

People can freely express personal views in private and in public without fear of retribution or surveillance. However, ordinary Bahamians can face libel charges. In April 2021, a reverend was charged over a video criticizing Police Commissioner Paul Rolle and disseminated on social media. In May, a man was arraigned over allegedly libelous comments made about PLP leader Philip Davis in 2020.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 12 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

Freedom of assembly is constitutionally protected and is respected in practice. Protests sometimes faced police opposition and pandemic-related restrictions in 2020.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 4 / 4

Freedom of association is generally protected, and a variety of nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) operate in the country. A 2019 NGO registration law required NGOs to declare sources of contributions and donations and account for annual income and expenditures. In June 2021, the government said it was taking “aggressive steps” to ensure that NGOs complied with registration requirements.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 4 / 4

Labor, business, and professional organizations are generally free from government interference. Unions have the right to strike, and collective bargaining is prevalent. The country’s two major trade unions signed a memorandum of understanding with the PLP in August 2021, with the party vowing to address union grievances.

F. RULE OF LAW: 13 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 4 / 4

The judicial system is headed by the Court of Appeal and the Supreme Court, with the additional right of appeal to the London-based Privy Council under certain circumstances. The Bahamian judiciary is independent. There have been no major reports in recent years of attempts by powerful figures to use their influence to secure favorable rulings. In January 2021, the Bahamas Bar Association called for legislation to better codify judicial independence. The Inter-American Development Bank has suggested separating the Offices of the Public Prosecutor and the Attorney General to ensure independence.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 3 / 4

Due process in civil and criminal matters generally prevails. However, the government only appoints counsel to defendants in capital cases, leaving some people without legal representation.

Generally, noncitizens, asylum seekers, and migrants do not enjoy due process before detention or deportation. Reports of long-term detention of immigrants and arbitrary detention of asylum seekers persist. Bahamian authorities detained over 900 Haitians fleeing that country in September 2021; in October, UN agencies called on countries to refrain from deporting Haitians without assessing their needs, citing insecurity and the effects of an August earthquake.

Homicide and violent crime rates in the Bahamas remain among the highest in the Caribbean. A 61.1 percent murder-rate increase was recorded in the first nine months of 2021 over the same period in 2020. In December 2021, Police Commissioner Rolle reported 21 police-involved shooting incidents during the year, 13 of which resulted in fatalities. However, state security agents generally do not engage in the illegal use of force against civilians, and the population is not threatened by large-scale violence or insurgencies.

Prison conditions are poor. Violence against prisoners by guards continued to be reported in 2021.

The constitution does not prohibit discrimination based on gender or sexual orientation. LGBT+ people continue to report discrimination in employment and housing. LGBT+ advocates celebrated the country's second annual Pride week in October 2021.

Harsh immigration policies enacted in 2014 target Haitian-Bahamians and Haitian migrants, requiring them to carry a passport and residency permits. The government prioritizes Bahamian citizens for hiring, land grants, COVID-19 vaccinations, and shelter in hurricane relief centers, and has pursued removal of shantytowns that primarily house migrants.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 13 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 3 / 4

The freedom of movement is protected. Migrants' and Haitian-Bahamians' lack of Bahamian identity documents affect their ability to move freely; choose their places of residence, employment, and education; and obtain medical attention.

Roadblocks have been erected as part of immigration enforcement actions.

The country has a strong private sector, and the economy relies mostly on tourism and financial services. Individuals are free to establish businesses.

Efforts to dismantle shantytowns continued in 2021, with the government dismantling structures in an Abaco settlement in May. In June, a Supreme Court judge expanded an existing injunction to prohibit the dismantlement of any unregulated community in Abaco.

The government does not place explicit restrictions on social freedoms. However, the constitution distinguishes between Bahamian men and women in the transmission of citizenship to a spouse or child, resulting in distinctions in treatment of married Bahamian women's children and their foreign-born husbands.

In 2020, the Supreme Court issued a ruling affirming the granting of Bahamian citizenship to a Bahamian-born child regardless of the gender or marital status of their Bahamian parent, which the Court of Appeal upheld in June 2021. The Minnis government vowed to appeal to the Privy Council after the ruling was issued. In September, the Davis government's attorney general voiced his support for further appeal.

Violence against women, including domestic violence and marital rape, is a serious issue. Same-sex marriage is not legalized.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 3 / 4

The Bahamas is a source, destination, and transit country for men, women, and children for forced labor and sexual exploitation. According to the US State Department's Trafficking in Persons 2021, the government fully complies with minimum international standards to address the problem. Migrant workers, many of whom arrive in the Bahamas to work in the agricultural sector and in domestic services, are particularly vulnerable to exploitation.

Bahrain

Population: 1,500,000

Capital: Manama

Freedom Status: Not Free

Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: Bahrain's Sunni-led monarchy dominates state institutions, and elections for the lower house of the parliament are neither competitive nor inclusive. Since violently crushing a popular prodemocracy protest movement in 2011, the authorities have systematically eliminated a broad range of political rights and civil liberties, dismantled the political opposition, and cracked down on persistent dissent concentrated among the Shiite population.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- In January, Bahrain restored diplomatic ties with Qatar; Manama cut relations in 2017 after accusing the Qatari government of interfering in internal matters and backing terrorism in Bahrain.
- Small protests held in February marked the 10th anniversary of the 2011 prodemocracy protests. Police, who maintained a large public presence, arrested at least 29 people, including 11 children. In March, police were accused of physically beating and threatening some of the children they had detained.
- In September, the authorities allowed 30 prisoners—most of them political prisoners—to enter home detention. Hassan Mushaima, a high-profile opposition leader, rejected a conditional release offer, however.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 2 / 40A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 2 / 12*A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

The 2002 constitution gives the king power over the executive, legislative, and judicial authorities. The monarch appoints and dismisses the prime minister and cabinet members, who are responsible to him rather than the legislature. Khalifa bin Salman al-Khalifa, the uncle of the current king, Hamad bin Isa al-Khalifa, was the country's only prime minister between independence from Britain in 1971 and his death in November 2020. The crown prince and eldest son of the king, Salman bin Hamad al-Khalifa, was appointed prime minister that year.

The king appoints the 40-member Consultative Council, the upper house of the National Assembly. The lower house, or Council of Representatives, consists of 40 elected members serving four-year terms. Formal political parties are not permitted, but members of “political societies” have participated in elections.

Lower-house elections were held in November 2018, with a runoff round in December. The polls were uncompetitive due to bans on major opposition groups. A law adopted earlier that year prohibited the candidacy of anyone who belonged to dissolved political societies, had boycotted or been expelled from the parliament, or had received a prison sentence of at least six months. Most seats went to independents, though small Sunni Islamist groups won several seats, and a leftist group won two. As in previous years, turnout figures were disputed amid a lack of independent election monitoring.

Bahrain’s electoral framework is unfair, with electoral districts deliberately designed to underrepresent Shiites, who form a majority of the citizen population but have never been able to obtain majority representation in the parliament. The government has also allegedly drawn district borders to put certain political societies, including leftist and Sunni Islamist groups, at a disadvantage. The government directorate responsible for administering elections is headed by the justice minister, a member of the royal family, and is not an independent body.

Voters’ passports are stamped to indicate that they have voted, and there is a widespread belief that people who do not have these stamps are at a higher risk of being prevented from travelling. The government has previously punished people who call for election boycotts.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 0 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 0 / 4

Formal political parties are illegal. A 2005 law makes it illegal to form political associations based on class, profession, or religion, while a 2016 amendment prohibits serving religious clerics from engaging in political activity. The law permits “political societies,” with some of the functions of a political party, to operate after registering with the government, but the authorities have closed down almost all opposition political societies since 2016 and jailed many of their leaders. The most popular, the Shiite Islamist society Al-Wefaq, was forcibly disbanded that year for allegedly encouraging violence. In 2018, the monarch banned individual members of dissolved groups from competing in elections. In December 2021, Lebanon deported non-Lebanese Al-Wefaq members after Manama criticized the group’s activity there. The second-largest opposition group, the secularist National Democratic Action Society (Wa’ad), was banned in 2017.

Individual opposition leaders and activists routinely face harassment, and the regime has forced many into prison or exile. In 2019, the country’s top court upheld a life sentence against Al-Wefaq general secretary Ali Salman, who was jailed in 2018 for alleged espionage on behalf of Qatar. He had been in detention on various charges since 2014. In September 2021, Hassan Mushaima, secretary-general of the Haq Movement for Liberty and Democracy, rejected a conditional release offer; Mushaima was imprisoned in 2011.

The ruling family maintains a monopoly on political power, with members holding many cabinet seats directly. The system's structure excludes the possibility of a change in government through elections, and the parliament has been dominated by progovernment lawmakers since the dissolution of the main opposition parties and imprisonment of many of their leaders.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 0 / 4

The monarchy generally excludes the public from any meaningful or genuinely independent political participation. Since 2011 it has used the security forces to isolate the country's Shiite population and suppress political dissent. The royal court allegedly uses its patronage networks to influence candidates and elections.

Although Shiite Muslims make up a majority of the citizenry, they have tended to be underrepresented in the cabinet and the parliament. The regime, which is controlled by a Sunni ruling family, has tended to view Shiites with some suspicion and has sought to prevent Shiites from organizing to advance their political interests. Senior positions in politics and government are often allocated to members of the royal family and a number of affiliated Sunni tribes. Certain wealthy Shiite families also enjoy a privileged position.

Women formally enjoy full political rights but are marginalized in practice. Six women hold lower-house seats, while nine hold upper-house seats. One woman serves in the cabinet as minister of health; the first woman minister was appointed in 2004.

Noncitizens make up about half of the total population, and most have no political rights, but the minority of expatriates who own property in Bahrain can vote in municipal elections. Citizenship generally must be inherited from a Bahraini father, and foreign men married to Bahraini women do not have access to naturalization.

LGBT+ identity is generally not recognized openly, including in political contexts.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 2 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 0 / 4

There are no elected officials with executive authority. The National Assembly may propose legislation, but the government drafts and submits the bills for legislative consideration. As major opposition groups are absent from the National Assembly, the body has become silent on politically sensitive topics, though it does feature debate on economic reforms, austerity measures, subsidy reforms, and public services. The parliament formally welcomed Bahrain's 2020 agreement to normalize relations with Israel, though it was not consulted beforehand.

Bahrain is fiscally and economically dependent on Saudi Arabia and the United Arab Emirates, which gives their governments significant influence over its foreign policy.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 2 / 4

There are some laws in place to combat corruption, but enforcement is weak, and high-ranking officials or members of the royal family who are suspected of corruption are rarely punished. The 2013–18 national anticorruption strategy called for the creation of a national anticorruption authority, though legislators subsequently decided not to enact that proposal. The generally pliant parliament does not check malfeasance effectively, and the media are not sufficiently free to independently air allegations of corruption against powerful figures. Civil society anticorruption efforts are also restricted; activists who highlight such problems have been prohibited from traveling or otherwise harassed.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 0 / 4

Parliamentary proceedings are public, and the parliament is entitled to scrutinize the government budget, but in practice the executive issues orders and laws without providing insight or allowing meaningful public consultation. The government does not publish regular and timely income or expenditure data. No access-to-information law has been adopted, and officials are not obliged to disclose their assets or income.

ADDITIONAL DISCRETIONARY POLITICAL RIGHTS QUESTION

Is the government or occupying power deliberately changing the ethnic composition of a country or territory so as to destroy a culture or tip the political balance in favor of another group? -2 / 0

Over the past two decades, the government has made concerted efforts to erode the Shiite citizen majority and tip the country's demographic balance in favor of the Sunni minority, mostly by recruiting foreign-born Sunnis to serve in the security forces and become citizens. No data on the sectarian makeup of the population are made public.

Meanwhile, hundreds of Bahrainis have had their citizenship revoked in recent years, including a large number of Shiite leaders and activists. After a mass revocation in 2019 prompted an international outcry, the monarch and courts restored the citizenship of 698 people, though nearly 300 remained denationalized as 2019 ended. Citizenship was not restored to the most prominent opposition activists, and the government retains the authority to revoke citizenship without meaningful due process.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 10 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 2 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 0 / 4

The government owns all national broadcast media outlets, and the private owners of Bahrain's main newspapers have close ties to the state. The only independent newspaper, Al-Wasat, was banned in 2017. Self-censorship is encouraged by the vaguely worded Press Law, which allows the state to imprison journalists for criticizing the king or Islam or for threatening national security. Insulting the king is punishable by up to seven years' imprisonment. A 2016 edict requires newspapers to apply for a one-year renewable license to publish online. The government has blocked access to Qatari news outlets since 2017, when diplomatic relations with Qatar were severed. While ties were restored in January 2021, Qatari outlets such as Al Jazeera remained inaccessible as of November.

Journalists face legal and bureaucratic obstacles to their work in practice. The authorities have refused to renew the credentials of several Bahraini journalists working with foreign outlets. Six journalists remained imprisoned in 2021 according to the Committee to Protect Journalists (CPJ). International journalists face difficulty obtaining an entry visa.

Islam is the state religion, and the penal code criminalizes blasphemy-related offenses. However, non-Muslim minority groups are generally free to practice their faiths. Both Muslim and non-Muslim religious groups are required to register with government ministries. Muslim religious groups are required to register with the Ministry of Justice and Islamic Affairs through the Sunni or Shiite awqaf (endowments) that oversee mosques and prayer houses; their directors are appointed by royal decree and paid by the government.

Although Shiite communities are free to carry out religious observances like Ashura, Shiite clerics and community leaders face harassment, interrogation, prosecution, and imprisonment. Shiite religious sites were demolished or vandalized in 2011 in apparent reprisal for the role of Shiite opposition groups in that year's protests. The Islamic Ulema Council, a group of Shiite clerics, was banned in 2014. Shiite cleric Isa Qassim lost his citizenship in 2016, received a suspended sentence for money laundering in 2017, and left Bahrain in 2018. Other Shiite clergy have been detained or questioned for their actual or suspected involvement in protest activity. In August 2021, Al-Wefaq reported that Bahraini authorities investigated about 100 people and arrested 3 during Ashura.

Academic freedom is not formally restricted, but scholars who criticize the government have in the past been subject to dismissal, and universities are affected by a broader climate in which criticism is frequently equated with disloyalty. In 2011, a number of faculty members and administrators were fired for supporting the call for democracy, and hundreds of students were expelled. Those who remained were forced to sign loyalty pledges.

The penal code includes a variety of punishments for offenses such as insulting the king or state institutions and spreading false news. Many Bahrainis have been convicted and jailed for political speech, including on social media. Authorities have also warned against online expression that contradicts the foreign policy priorities of Bahrain and its regional allies. Following accounts deemed to promote sedition can constitute a cybercrime.

Security services are believed to employ networks of informers, and the government monitors the personal communications of activists, critics, and opposition members. In August 2021, Citizen Lab reported that the mobile phones of nine Bahraini political activists were hacked using the Pegasus spyware suite in 2020 and 2021.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 1 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 0 / 4

A permit is required to hold demonstrations, and a variety of onerous restrictions make it difficult to organize a legal gathering in practice. Participants can face long jail terms, particularly if the demonstrations involve clashes with security personnel. Police regularly use force to break up political protests, most of which occur in Shiite villages.

Police maintained a large public presence during the 10th anniversary of the 2011 protests in February 2021, which was marked by small rallies. The Bahrain Institute for Rights and Democracy (BIRD) reported that at least 29 people, including 11 children, were arrested ahead of the anniversary. In April, the UN Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights called for an investigation over reports that demonstrators protesting conditions in Jau prison were forcefully dispersed. In June, several hundred people in Diah protested the COVID-19-related death of a prisoner. In October, demonstrators opposed the opening of an Israeli embassy; authorities fired tear gas to disperse one of the rallies.

Nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) are prohibited from operating without a permit, and authorities have broad discretion to deny or revoke permits. The government also reserves the right to replace the boards of NGOs. Bahraini human rights defenders and their family members are subject to harassment, intimidation, and prosecution. Many were either in prison or in exile as of 2021.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 1 / 4

Bahrainis have the right to establish independent labor unions, but workers must give two weeks' notice before a strike, and strikes are banned in a variety of economic sectors. Trade unions cannot operate in the public sector, and collective-bargaining rights are limited even in the private sector. Harassment and firing of unionist workers occurs in practice. Domestic, agricultural, and temporary workers do not have the right to join or form unions.

F. RULE OF LAW: 1 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 0 / 4

The king appoints all judges and heads the Supreme Judicial Council, which administers the courts and proposes judicial nominees. The courts are subject to government pressure in practice. The country's judicial system is seen as corrupt and biased in favor of the royal family and its allies, particularly in politically sensitive cases.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 1 / 4

Due process is particularly problematic in politically sensitive cases. Law enforcement officers reportedly violate due process during arrests and detention, in part by obstructing detainees' access to attorneys. Detainees are sometimes held incommunicado. Judicial proceedings often put defendants at a disadvantage, with judges denying bail requests or restricting defense attorneys' attendance or arguments without explanation. Prominent defense lawyers who represent dissidents have themselves been prosecuted on various charges.

In 2017, Bahrain allowed prisoners to complete their sentences via alternative means through a new law. In September 2021, 30 prisoners, most of them political prisoners, were released under this law, in favor of home detention and monitoring. Hassan Mushaima declined conditional release under this law.

In 2017, the constitution was amended to permit military trials for civilians in security-related cases, further weakening due process rights.

Torture is criminalized, but detainees frequently report mistreatment by security forces and prison officials, who are rarely held accountable. The Interior Ministry ombudsman's office has failed to provide a meaningful check on such impunity. Political prisoners have alleged denial of medical care and religious discrimination against Shiite inmates. In April 2021, prisoner Abbas Malallah died in custody; Al-Wefaq blamed his death on negligence, while the government reported he died of a heart attack. In June, prisoner Husain Barakat died of COVID-19, though the Interior Ministry reported he had been vaccinated. In October, Ali Qamber, a political prisoner who was diagnosed with cancer but reportedly did not receive appropriate treatment while in custody, died.

Bahraini authorities were accused of physically attacking and threatening children during 2021. In March, Human Rights Watch (HRW) and the BIRD accused police of beating and threatening to electrocute children detained after detaining them during the previous month's protests.

A moratorium on executions ended in 2017, though no prisoners have been executed since 2019. UN special rapporteurs and experts have raised concerns that individuals sentenced to death were forced to confess under torture, among other flaws in their cases. Bangladeshi workers are heavily represented among this population; in July 2021, NGO Reprieve reported that 8 of the 13 foreigners who received death sentences between 2011 and 2020 were Bangladeshi.

Police have sometimes been targeted in small bombings and armed attacks in recent years, though no major incidents were reported in 2021.

Women enjoy legal equality on some issues, and gender-based discrimination in employment is prohibited, but discrimination is common in practice. Unlike men, Bahraini women who marry non-Bahrainis cannot pass their citizenship to their children, a long-standing issue highlighted by an online campaign in August 2021.

Shiites of both Arab and Persian ethnicity face de facto discrimination in matters including employment. They are largely excluded from the security forces, except when serving as unarmed community police officers. The government does not publish socioeconomic data that are broken down by religious sect.

Discrimination based on sexual orientation is common. The law does not provide protections against such bias, though same-sex sexual activity is not criminalized for those aged 21 and older. Public displays of same-sex affection could fall afoul of public decency laws.

Bahrain is not a signatory to the 1951 refugee convention and does not recognize refugee status.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 6 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 1 / 4

Authorities sometimes restrict movement inside the country to prevent protests by residents of largely Shiite villages outside Manama. The government also obstructs foreign travel by numerous opposition figures and activists.

Bahrain established a “flexible” permit for foreign workers in 2017, aiming to ease the workers’ ability to change jobs; the traditional sponsorship (kafala) system ties migrant workers to a specific employer. However, participation in the newer scheme has been limited by numerical caps and other restrictions.

In 2020, the government introduced the BeAware contract-tracing application as part of its COVID-19 mitigation efforts; human rights groups criticized its intrusive features, including real-time GPS location tracking. In February 2021, BeAware was updated to act as a vaccine passport.

Although registered businesses are largely free to operate, obtaining approval can be difficult in practice. For the wealthy elites who dominate the business sector, property rights are generally respected, and expropriation is rare. Shiite citizens encounter difficulties obtaining affordable housing and in some cases face de facto bans on purchasing land. Much of the country’s scarce land is occupied by royal properties and military facilities. Noncitizens can only own property in designated areas. Women may inherit property, but their rights are not equal to those of men.

Personal status issues such as marriage, divorce, and child custody are governed by a 2017 unified family law applying to both Sunni and Shiite Muslim families. The law's provisions are based on Sharia (Islamic law) principles that put women at a disadvantage on many topics.

Accused rapists can avoid punishment by marrying their victims, and spousal rape is not specifically outlawed. Adultery is illegal, and those who kill a spouse caught in the act of adultery are eligible for lenience in sentencing.

Migrant workers, who make up a large portion of the population, can be subjected to forced labor or have their salaries and passports withheld, although this is illegal. Migrant workers faced a disproportionate risk of contracting the novel coronavirus when the pandemic began in 2020. While the government made efforts to ensure less crowded temporary accommodations for some and encouraged voluntary repatriation for others, migrants who lost their jobs often faced eviction, denial of services, or deportation. Migrant workers also received fewer emergency benefits than citizens.

The US State Department noted that Manama made serious efforts to address human trafficking in its Trafficking in Persons Report 2021, highlighting the government's creation of a specialized prosecutor's office and court. The State Department noted that no traffickers were convicted during its reporting period, however.

Revenues from oil and gas exports are used to fund public employment and services that benefit all citizens, but access to public-sector jobs and promotion opportunities often depends on one's social and sectarian background and personal connections.

Bangladesh

Population: 171,700,000

Capital: Dhaka

Freedom Status: Partly Free

Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: The ruling Awami League (AL) has consolidated political power through sustained harassment of the opposition and those perceived to be allied with it, as well as of critical media and voices in civil society. Corruption is endemic, and anticorruption efforts have been weakened by politicized enforcement. Due process guarantees are poorly upheld and security forces carry out a range of human right abuses with near impunity. Violence and discrimination against religious minorities and refugees, particularly Rohingya who have fled Myanmar, are significant problems.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- In late March, four participants of protests in Chittagong against Indian Prime Minister Narendra Modi's visit to Bangladesh were killed after AL supporters attacked the demonstrators and police subsequently fired tear gas and rubber bullets into the crowds. Subsequent protests across the country against another attack by AL supporters on worshippers in Dhaka were again confronted and attacked by AL supporters. Fourteen more people were killed after police failed to protect peaceful protesters and used unnecessary and excessive force to disperse the crowds.

- In December, the US government placed sanctions on several leaders from Bangladesh's elite security force the Rapid Action Battalion (RAB), which is accused of nearly 600 extrajudicial killings since 2018 and hundreds of enforced disappearances. Local human rights organization Ain o Salish Kendra (ASK) documented at least 80 extrajudicial killings perpetrated by security forces during the year.
- The government escalated its repression of Rohingya refugees, allegedly relocating without consent nearly 21,000 refugees to Bhasan Char, a silt island off the Bangladesh coastline, as of July. The island lacks adequate facilities for the refugees and is prone to flooding. In September, prominent Rohingya civil society activist Mohibullah was murdered in a mainland camp, reportedly by Islamist militants.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 15 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 4 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 1 / 4

A largely ceremonial president, who serves for five years, is elected by the legislature. President Abdul Hamid was elected to his second term in 2018.

The leader of the party that wins the most seats in the unicameral National Parliament assumes the position of prime minister and wields effective power. Sheikh Hasina was sworn in for her third term as prime minister in early 2019 following the AL's overwhelming victory in the 2018 elections, which were marked by violence, intimidation of opposition candidates and supporters, allegations of fraud benefiting the ruling party, and the exclusion of nonpartisan election monitors.

The National Parliament is composed of 350 members, 300 of whom are directly elected. Political parties select a total of 50 women members based on the parties' share of elected seats.

The AL overwhelmingly won the December 2018 parliamentary election, taking 288 of the 300 directly elected seats with its alliance partners. Election day and the campaign that preceded it were marked by political violence in which at least 17 people were killed, as well as legal and extralegal harassment of government opponents. The main opposition party the Bangladesh Nationalist Party (BNP) claimed that thousands of its supporters and nearly a dozen of its candidates were arrested ahead of the elections, and that its candidates were subject to intimidation and violence.

In the election's wake, the BNP alleged that the AL had benefitted from widespread electoral fraud carried out by AL supporters with the complicity of law enforcement agents and the army. Several domestic and international observation missions were unable to observe the elections due to delayed or denied accreditation.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 2 / 4

Opposition parties and outside observers have long criticized the independence of the Election Commission (EC) and its ability to investigate complaints. Some foreign governments and international organizations have withdrawn financial assistance to the commission over such concerns. The EC's stewardship of the 2018 national election lent further credence to complaints that it favors the ruling party. In the run-up to the 2018 polls, the commission disproportionately disqualified opposition candidates for various violations. Moreover, the EC failed to order additional security measures following outbreaks of political violence that preceded the vote, or to meaningfully address many complaints filed by opposition figures about election-related violence and other electoral irregularities. After the election, the EC affirmed the results without investigating widespread allegations of fraud. In 2019, 2020, and 2021, subnational elections were criticized for irregularities.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 7 / 16

Bangladesh has a multiparty system in which power has historically alternated between political coalitions led by the AL and the BNP; third parties have traditionally had difficulty achieving traction. Both parties are nondemocratic in terms of internal structure and are led by families that have competed to lead Bangladesh since independence, along with a small coterie of advisers. A crackdown on the BNP ahead of the 2018 elections significantly disrupted its operations. However, the government eased restrictions on opposition protests and rallies after the polls. In 2021, the BNP routinely held public activities, but were often met with violence from AL supporters or the police.

In 2021, the Islamist political party Jamaat-e-Islami (JI), which was banned in 2013 for violating constitutional provisions outlawing religiously based parties, continued to face pressure on its activities. JI leaders have been prosecuted by the International Crimes Tribunal, a domestic government body that investigates war crimes committed during Bangladesh's independence war. In order to participate in elections, JI candidates have run as a part of the BNP.

The BNP has been weakened by regular harassment and arrests of key members that have significantly harmed its ability to challenge the AL in elections. The 2018 election campaign was marred by a crackdown on dissent that saw thousands of people and several political candidates arrested. There were also several acts of violence committed against opposition figures.

In the run-up to the 2018 parliamentary polls, former prime minister and BNP leader Khaleda Zia was convicted on corruption charges in two separate court cases, sentenced to over a decade in prison, and later banned from electoral competition. In March 2020, the government temporarily released Zia from jail to receive medical treatment at home, though she was not permitted to leave the country; her release has since continued to be extended for six-month intervals. Zia's forced absence from politics has severely hampered the competitiveness of the BNP. In 2021, the BNP decided to boycott subnational elections.

A JI spokesperson said more than 1,850 party members were arrested ahead of the 2018 elections, and some party members claimed they had been subject to torture while in custody.

The rival AL and BNP parties dominate politics and limit political choices for those who question internal party structures or hierarchy, or who would create alternative parties or political groupings.

Animosity between Hasina and Zia, as well as between lower-level cadres, has contributed to continued political violence. In 2020, human rights group Odhikar reported that 73 people had been killed and 2,883 people had been injured because of political violence. Violent political protests and election-related violence persisted in 2021.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 2 / 4

In the National Parliament, 50 seats are allotted to women, who are elected by political parties based on their overall share of elected seats. Women lead both main political parties. Nevertheless, societal discrimination against women, as well as against as well against LGBT+ people, limits their participation in politics in practice. Religious, ethnic, and other marginalized groups remain underrepresented in politics and state agencies. In 2019, several transgender women competed for women's reserved seats in parliament. None was selected.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 4 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 1 / 4

Policy is set by the ruling AL, and weaknesses in the country's institutions have reduced checks on its processes and decision-making. Low representation of opposition lawmakers in the National Parliament significantly reduces its ability to provide thorough scrutiny of or debate on government policies, budgets, and proposed legislation.

Problems with the 2018 election including violence, intimidation of opposition candidates and supporters, and allegations of fraud benefiting the ruling party undermined the legitimacy of the AL government that was seated in January 2019.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 1 / 4

Under the AL government, anticorruption efforts have been weakened by politicized enforcement and subversion of the judicial process. In particular, the Anti-Corruption Commission (ACC) has become ineffective and subject to overt political interference. The government continues to bring or pursue politicized corruption cases against BNP party leaders. In 2021, AL politicians continued to be accused of corruption, particularly involving funds intended for COVID-19 relief efforts, despite the party's increased actions and rhetoric against such wrongdoing. A February Al Jazeera investigative report alleged corruption in defense contracts, among other claims.

Media outlets and civil society face restrictions and are less able to expose government corruption.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 2 / 4

Endemic corruption and criminality, weak rule of law, limited bureaucratic transparency, and political polarization have long undermined government accountability. The 2009 Right to Information Act mandates public access to all information held by public bodies and overrides secrecy legislation. Although it has been unevenly implemented, journalists and civil society activists have had some success in using it to obtain information from local governing authorities.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 24 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 6 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 1 / 4

Journalists and media outlets face many forms of pressure, including frequent lawsuits, harassment, and serious or deadly physical attacks. Throughout 2021, journalists were arrested for critical reporting on the government, repression which has escalated under the AL government. A climate of impunity for attacks on media workers remains the norm, and there has been little progress made to ensure justice for a series of blogger murders since 2015. Dozens of bloggers remain in hiding or exile.

The 2018 Digital Security Act (DSA) allows the government to conduct searches or arrest individuals without a warrant, criminalizes various forms of speech, and was vehemently opposed by journalists. Forms of artistic expression contained in books, films, and other materials are occasionally banned or censored.

Islam is designated as the official religion, though the constitution designates secularism as among the “high ideals” the charter is grounded in. Although religious minorities have the right to worship freely, they occasionally face legal repercussions for proselytizing. Members of minority groups—including Hindus, Christians, Buddhists, and Shiite and Ahmadiyya Muslims—continue to face harassment and violence, including mob violence against their houses of worship. Increasingly in recent years, violence against religious minorities appears to be deliberately provoked on social media. In October 2021, groups of Muslims in at least 12 districts across Bangladesh attacked Hindu homes and temples, killing at least two Hindus, during the Hindu religious festival Durga Puja. The violence was primarily provoked by a Facebook post, later proven to be falsified, that depicted a Quran placed on a Hindu deity.

Those with secular or nonconformist views can face societal opprobrium and attacks from hardline Islamist groups.

In recent years, Bangladesh’s academic institutions have faced frequent threats from a variety of actors, resulting in reduced autonomy and rising self-censorship. Faculty hiring and promotion are often linked to support for the AL, and campus debate is often stifled by the AL’s student wing. Throughout 2020, several academics were fired or censured for criticizing the government’s response to the COVID-19 pandemic and other issues. In September 2019, members of the AL student wing attacked a nonviolent protest and beat a student to death after he posted criticism of the AL on Facebook. In 2021, the ruling party’s student wing continued to suppress dissent.

Islamist groups have growing influence on government policy and standards, compelling changes to educational content they deemed “atheistic” in widely used Bengali-language textbooks. Separately, Islamic extremists have attacked secular professors.

Open discussion of sensitive religious and political issues is restrained by fears of harassment and violence from the government and religious fundamentalists. Religious fundamentalists have retaliated in recent years against those who publicly discuss LGBT+ rights, atheism, or criticism of Islamist movements.

In the lead-up to national and local elections between 2018 and 2020, repression of dissent created a climate of fear. A 2019 poll from the International Republican Institute indicated that a considerable proportion of the public is afraid to publicly express their political opinions and widely reported self-censorship. The DSA has enabled the government to increase censorship of digital content and surveillance of telecommunications and social media. Between October 2018 and mid-2021, Amnesty International found that more than 1,300 cases have been filed and nearly 1,000 individuals had been arrested under the DSA for mostly politicized and minor offenses. The government has also procured phone surveillance and hacking equipment.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 5 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 2 / 4

The constitution provides for the rights of assembly and association, but this is upheld inconsistently. Protesters are frequently injured and occasionally killed during clashes in which police use excessive force.

In late March 2021, four participants of protests in Chittagong against Indian Prime Minister Narendra Modi's visit to Bangladesh were killed after AL supporters attacked the demonstrators and police subsequently fired tear gas and rubber bullets into the crowds. Members of the AL and members of the AL's student wing, the Bangladesh Chhatra League (BCL), attacked worshippers exiting a mosque in Dhaka who had planned another protest against Modi's visit. Police fired tear gas, rubber bullets, and live ammunition to disperse the protesters, many of whom were injured with gunshot wounds. On March 27 and 28, subsequent protests across the country against the AL and BCL attack in Dhaka were again confronted and attacked by AL supporters; police failed to protect those attempting to protest and used unnecessary and excessive force against them. In Chattogram and Brahmanbaria districts, at least 14 people were killed, and hundreds were injured.

Many nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) operate in Bangladesh and function without onerous restrictions, but the use of foreign funds must be cleared by the NGO Affairs Bureau, which can also approve or reject individual projects. The 2016 Foreign Donations (Voluntary Activities) Regulation Act made it more difficult for NGOs to obtain foreign funds and gave officials broad authority to deregister NGOs. Democracy, governance, and human rights NGOs are regularly denied permission for proposed projects and are subject to harassment and surveillance. Pressure and intimidation from Islamist groups also limit NGO activities on some issues such as LGBT+ rights and protection for minority religious groups.

In 2021, authorities continued to invoke digital security laws to arrest several rights activists for online speech, citing offenses including hurting religious sentiment and undermining law and order. In February, Bangladeshi writer Mushtaq Ahmed died in prison, having been arrested in May 2020 for criticizing the government's response to the COVID-19 pandemic. Ahmed, who became ill in January 2021, had been in pretrial detention since his arrest and was charged with "tarnishing the image of the nation," among other repressive offenses under the DSA.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 1 / 4

Legal reforms in 2015 eased restrictions on the formation of unions. However, union leaders who attempt to organize or unionize workers continue to face dismissal or physical intimidation. Organizations that advocate for labor rights have faced increased harassment. Worker grievances fuel unrest at factories, particularly in the garment industry, where protests against low wages and unsafe working conditions are common. Protesting workers often face violence, arrest, and dismissal.

F. RULE OF LAW: 4 / 16F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 1 / 4

Politicization of and pressure against the judiciary persists. In 2017, the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court retired; he left the country and said, in an autobiography published in 2018, that he had been forced to retire after the Bangladeshi military intelligence threatened him because of rulings he had made against the government. In 2019, Bangladesh's Anti-Corruption Commission charged the former chief justice with corruption in absentia. Allegations of political pressure on judges are common, as are allegations that unqualified AL loyalists were being appointed to court positions.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 1 / 4

Individuals' ability to access the justice system is compromised by endemic corruption within the courts and severe case backlogs. Pretrial detention is often lengthy, and many defendants lack counsel. Suspects are routinely subject to arbitrary arrest and detention, demands for bribes, and physical abuse by police. Criminal cases against ruling party activists are regularly withdrawn on the grounds of "political consideration," undermining the judicial process and entrenching a culture of impunity.

The 1974 Special Powers Act permits arbitrary detention without charge, and the criminal procedure code allows detention without a warrant. A 2009 counterterrorism law includes a broad definition of terrorism and generally does not meet international standards. Concerns have repeatedly been raised that the International Crimes Tribunal's procedures and verdicts do not meet international standards on issues such as victim and witness protection, the presumption of innocence, defendant access to counsel, and the right to bail. Since 2013, the tribunal has sentenced at least 45 people to death or long prison sentences.

The number of terrorist attacks by Islamist militant groups has remained low following the government's increased counterterrorism efforts since the 2016 Holey Artisan Bakery terrorist attack. However, the Islamic State (IS) militant group claimed credit for several nonlethal bomb attacks on police officers in Dhaka in 2019 and 2020. Though counterterrorist personnel arrested several militants in 2021, there is concern that the Taliban's victory in Afghanistan could inspire militant activity in Bangladesh.

A range of human rights abuses by law enforcement agencies—including enforced disappearances, custodial deaths, arbitrary arrests, and torture—have continued unabated. In 2018, the government initiated a "war on drugs"; since that time, thousands of people have been arrested and over 100 people have been killed. A statement from the International Federation for Human Rights released in August 2020 said at least 572 people had been subject to enforced disappearance between 2009 and July 2020.

Prison conditions are extremely poor; severe overcrowding is common, and juveniles are often incarcerated with adults. The human rights and legal aid organization Ain o Salish Kendra (ASK) documented the deaths of 81 people while in custody in 2021.

In 2021, ASK also documented at least 80 extrajudicial killings perpetrated by security forces. In December 2021, the US government placed sanctions on several leaders from Bangladesh's elite security force the Rapid Action Battalion (RAB), which is accused of nearly 600 extrajudicial killings since 2018 and hundreds of enforced disappearances.

Members of ethnic and religious minority groups face some legal discrimination, as well as harassment and violations of their rights in practice. Indigenous people in the Chittagong Hill Tracts (CHT), religious minorities, and other ethnic groups remain subject to physical attacks, property destruction, land grabs by Bengali settlers, and occasional abuses by security forces.

Over a million ethnic Rohingyas have fled Myanmar and entered Bangladesh since the 1990s. Since violence directed against Rohingyas escalated in Myanmar's Rakhine State in 2017, over 700,000 refugees have fled into Bangladesh, creating a humanitarian crisis. The vast majority do not have official refugee status and have limited access to health care, employment, and education. Authorities reached a repatriation agreement with Myanmar in October 2018, but the UN refugee agency said conditions in Myanmar were not fit for the refugees' return and that safeguards for them were "absent." Subsequent efforts to repatriate Rohingya have failed, and the Bangladeshi government has become increasingly hostile toward the refugees. In 2019, authorities cut off cell phone service in refugee camps (restored in August 2020 after international pressure) and erected barbed wire fencing around them.

In 2020, Bangladesh began transferring refugees to Bhasan Char, a silt island off the Bangladesh coastline, which had a refugee population of nearly 20,000 as of June 2021; the island lacks adequate facilities for the refugees and is prone to flooding. Reports alleged that authorities had forced refugees to consent to their relocation. In refugee camps on the mainland, gang violence and other lawlessness has escalated. In September 2021, the prominent Rohingya civil society activist Mohibullah was murdered in a mainland camp, reportedly by Islamist militants. In recent years, dozens of Rohingyas have drowned in the Bay of Bengal trying to leave Bangladesh.

A criminal ban on same-sex relations is rarely enforced, but societal discrimination remains the norm, and dozens of attacks on LGBT+ individuals are reported every year. A number of LGBT+ individuals remain in exile following the 2016 murder of Xulhaz Mannan, a prominent LGBT+ activist, by Islamist militants. Some legal recognition is available for transgender people, though in practice they face severe discrimination.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 9 / 16G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 3 / 4

The ability to move within the country is relatively unrestricted, as is foreign travel, though there are some rules on travel into and around the CHT districts by foreigners as well as into Rohingya refugee camps. During the COVID-19 pandemic in 2020, the government implemented some movement restrictions that were limited in scope and duration.

There are few legal restrictions regarding choice of education or employment.

Property rights are unevenly enforced, and the ability to engage freely in private economic activity is somewhat constrained. Corruption and bribery, inadequate infrastructure, and official bureaucratic and regulatory hurdles hinder business activities throughout the country. State involvement and interference in the economy is considerable. The 2011 Vested Properties Return Act allows Hindus to reclaim land that the government or other individuals seized, but it has been unevenly implemented. Tribal minorities have little control over land decisions affecting them, and Bengali-speaking settlers continue to illegally encroach on tribal lands in the CHT.

Under personal status laws affecting all religions, women have fewer marriage, divorce, and inheritance rights than men, and face discrimination in social services and employment. Rape, acid throwing, and other forms of gender-based violence occur regularly despite laws offering some level of protection. A law requiring rape victims to file police reports and obtain medical certificates within 24 hours of the crime in order to press charges prevents most cases from reaching the courts. In October 2020, the government introduced the death penalty for rape in response to large protests after a series of high-profile incidents of rape and sexual assault.

Giving or receiving dowry is a criminal offense, but coercive requests still occur. Bangladesh ranks among the top 10 countries with the highest rates of child marriage. Despite a stated government commitment in 2014 to abolish the practice by 2041, in 2017 parliament approved a law that would permit girls under the age of 18 to marry under certain circumstances, reversing a previous legal ban on the practice.

Socioeconomic inequality is widespread. Working conditions in the garment industry remain extremely unsafe in most factories despite the renewal of a legally binding accord between unions and clothing brands to improve safety practices. Comprehensive reforms of the industry are hampered by the fact that a growing number of factory owners are also legislators or influential businesspeople.

Bangladesh remains both a major supplier of and transit point for trafficking victims, with tens of thousands of people trafficked each year. Women and children are trafficked both overseas and within the country for the purposes of domestic servitude and sexual exploitation, while men are trafficked primarily for labor abroad. A comprehensive 2013 antitrafficking law provides protection to victims and increased penalties for traffickers, but enforcement remains inadequate.

Barbados

Population: 300,000

Capital: Bridgetown

Freedom Status: Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Barbados is a democracy that regularly holds competitive elections and upholds civil liberties. In November 2021, the government officially declared its independence from the United Kingdom, establishing a republican constitutional system. Challenges include official corruption and a lack of government transparency, discrimination against LGBT+ people, violent crime, and poverty.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- Barbados officially declared its independence from the United Kingdom and became a republic in November. In October, Dame Sandra Mason, who was appointed governor general in 2018, was nominated by the prime minister to become the president for a four-year term and almost unanimously voted into the office by the lower and upper houses of the parliament.
- In March, over 140 academics alleged that delays in reappointing Barbadian historian Hilary Beckles to a second term as vice-chancellor of the University of the West Indies—which has a major campus on Barbados—was equivalent to government retribution for his outspoken advocacy as chairman of the Reparations Commission of the Caribbean Community (CARICOM), which was created to map a plan to bring “reconciliation, truth, and justice for the victims of slavery and their descendants.” Beckles was subsequently reappointed in May.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 38 / 40A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 12 / 12*A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The prime minister, usually the leader of the largest party in Parliament, is head of government. The British monarch was until recently the head of state, represented by a governor general. However, Barbados officially declared its independence from the United Kingdom and became a republic in November 2021. In October, Dame Sandra Mason, who was appointed governor general in 2018, was nominated by the prime minister to become the president for a four-year term and was almost unanimously voted into the office by the lower and upper houses of the parliament.

Mia Mottley of the Barbados Labour Party (BLP) was appointed prime minister after her party decisively won the 2018 general elections, unseating Freundel Stuart of the Democratic Labour Party (DLP). The polls were competitive and credible. In December 2021, Mottley called for snap elections to be held in January 2022, a year ahead of schedule.

Members of the 30-seat House of Assembly, the lower house, are directly elected for five-year terms. The governor general appoints the 21 members of the upper house, the Senate: 12 on the advice of the prime minister, 2 on the advice of the leader of the opposition, and 7 at their own discretion. Senators serve five-year terms.

The results of parliamentary elections in 2018 were accepted by all stakeholders. The opposition BLP took all 30 seats in the House of Assembly. Bishop Joseph Atherley subsequently broke with the BLP to sit as an independent leader of the opposition.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 4 / 4

The independent Electoral and Boundaries Commission (EBC) oversees elections in Barbados in a professional manner. Its five commissioners are chosen based on expertise by the prime minister and the opposition for a maximum term of five years.

A broader constitutional reform process is slated to begin in January 2022.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 16 / 16B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 4 / 4

The political scene is dominated by the BLP and DLP, but other parties are able to form with ease. In December 2021, two minority parties formed a coalition, the Alliance Party for Progress (APP), to participate in the January 2022 election.

Power has historically rotated peacefully between the BLP and DLP. The BLP's landslide victory over the DLP in 2018 highlighted the political system's competitiveness.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 4 / 4

Voters and candidates are generally able to express their political choices without interference from actors that are not democratically accountable.

Barbados's population is fully enfranchised, with adult citizens, Commonwealth citizens, and foreigners with seven years' residency able to vote. Laws protect the political rights of women, but discrimination and societal marginalization can discourage women from running for office. Women make up only 20 percent of the House of Assembly.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 10 / 12C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 4 / 4

The prime minister and members of Parliament are largely unimpeded in their ability to craft and implement policy. In November 2021, Barbados declared its independence from the United Kingdom and became an independent republic. The governor general, Dame Sandra Mason, was voted into the newly created office of president for a four-year term by the lower and upper houses of the parliament in October. Critics have argued that Prime Minister Mottley enjoyed too much discretionary power over the process to transition the governance system into a republic, which was not put to a referendum. The recommendations of a committee examining the topic, the Republican Status Transition Advisory Committee, are nonbinding.

While much less severe than the rest of the region, serious incidences of corruption are known to take place. Barbados's government has failed to implement key anticorruption measures or prosecute senior officials. Potential whistleblowers fear costly defamation suits.

High-level malpractice was exposed in April 2021, when former minister of industry Donville Inniss was sentenced to two years in prison in the United States for taking bribes from a Barbadian insurance company through New York in 2015 and 2016.

Barbados is one of just seven countries in the Americas to have neither signed nor ratified the Inter-American Convention on Mutual Assistance in Criminal Matters. The government is also yet to ratify the UN Convention against Corruption (UNCAC), which it signed in 2003.

The Mottley administration has sought to create a new Anti-Corruption and Anti-Terrorism Agency (ACATA). However, legal experts have criticized plans for its director general to be appointed by the prime minister and say it needs to be accompanied by comprehensive anticorruption legislation in order to be effective; the existing Prevention of Corruption Act dates back to 1929.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 3 / 4

A Freedom of Information Act long promised by both major parties is yet to materialize. The Mottley administration has also yet to pass its Integrity in Public Life Bill—which would require senior officials to declare their personal wealth and would create a new Integrity Commission.

In October 2020, the European Council added Barbados to a list of noncooperative jurisdictions for tax purposes.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 57 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 16 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 4 / 4

The media are free from censorship and government control. Newspapers, including the two major dailies, are privately owned. Four private and two government-run radio stations operate in the country. The government-owned Caribbean Broadcasting Corporation (CBC) is the only local television station and is broadly balanced.

The constitution guarantees freedom of religion, which is widely respected for mainstream religious groups. In November 2020, the government decriminalized cultivation, personal use, and possession of small amounts of marijuana for religious reasons, a step that was welcomed by Rastafarian community leaders. In October 2020, the government approved an exemption for Muslims and Rastafarians to wear head coverings in official photographs.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

Academic freedom is respected, though members of the government occasionally disparage academics who criticize government policy. In March 2021, over 140 academics alleged that delays in reappointing Barbadian historian Hilary Beckles to a second term as Vice-Chancellor of the University of the West Indies—which has a major campus on Barbados—was equivalent to government retribution for his outspoken advocacy as chairman of the Reparations Commission of the Caribbean Community (CARICOM) Reparations Commission which was created to map a plan to bring “reconciliation, truth, and justice for the victims of slavery and their descendants.” Beckles was subsequently reappointed in May.

Freedom of speech is largely respected in Barbados, with commentators and members of the public free to express their views on most topics without encountering negative consequences.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 12 / 12E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

Barbados's legal framework guarantees freedom of assembly, which is upheld in practice. Several protests took place peacefully in 2021, including a large demonstration in August against reported government plans to make COVID-19 vaccination mandatory, which Prime Minister Mottley later denied.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 4 / 4

Many nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) operate without restriction or surveillance in Barbados, primarily focusing on cultural issues, homelessness, environmentalism, and women's rights.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 4 / 4

The right to form labor unions is respected, and unions are active and influential. However, critics have alleged that the BLP is seeking to co-opt union leaderships and sideline some organized labor bodies.

F. RULE OF LAW: 14 / 16F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 4 / 4

The judiciary generally operates with independence. The Supreme Court includes a high court and a court of appeals. The Caribbean Court of Justice is the highest appellate court for Barbados.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 4 / 4

Constitutional guarantees of due process are generally upheld. Despite the appointment of new judges under the Mottley administration, there is still a major backlog of court cases.

Barbados is free from war and insurgencies. However, complaints that the Royal Barbados Police Force physically abuses suspects to secure information have been reported in recent years.

The number of homicides, often related to microtrafficking (drug trafficking in small quantities), has risen steadily in recent years, although the figure decreased from 42 in 2020 to 32 in 2021.

The government has taken some steps to address prison overcrowding and abuse. In 2019, the government repealed the mandatory death penalty in cases of murder. Capital punishment remains on the statute book, though the last execution was carried out in 1984 and the last sentence was given in 2016. However, several prisoners on death row are still awaiting resentencing.

Women make up half of the country's workforce, although they earn less than men for comparable work. LGBT+ people face discrimination in housing, employment, and health care, and reported verbal harassment from the authorities when seeking assistance during the pandemic.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 15 / 16G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

Individuals in Barbados are generally free to move, live, and work across the territory as they see fit.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 4 / 4

The legal framework generally supports property rights and private-business activity. The government has worked to ensure a healthy environment for business and to attract domestic and foreign investment, particularly in the tourism industry.

Violence against women remains widespread, and laws addressing domestic violence—which spiked during COVID-19 lockdowns in 2020—are not well enforced. Same-sex relations remain punishable with jail sentences, though the law is not enforced.

Residents generally have access to economic opportunity, and the law provides some protections against exploitative labor practices. However, some estimates suggest that 50 percent of the population fell below the poverty line in 2020. The number of families seeking government assistance to pay for basic needs, including electricity and internet bills and books and supplies for school, rose sharply in 2021.

The government has taken steps to crack down on human trafficking, including police raids, screening of vulnerable people, training officials to detect possible trafficking victims, and awareness campaigns. However, reflecting in part a lack of resources, there have been no prosecutions for trafficking since the 2016 Trafficking in Persons Prevention Act (TIPPA) came into force.

Belarus

Population: 9,300,000

Capital: Minsk

Freedom Status: Not Free

Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: Belarus is an authoritarian state in which elections are openly rigged and civil liberties are severely restricted. In 2020, Alyaksandr Lukashenka, who maintains a firm grip over the military and security forces, cracked down on a massive prodemocracy protest movement, that was sparked by his reelection in a fraudulent presidential poll. Since then, security forces have violently assaulted and arbitrarily detained journalists and ordinary citizens who challenge the regime, whether by means of protesting, reporting on events, or posting opinions online. The judiciary and other institutions lack independence and provide no check on Lukashenka's power.

- Between July and October, the Belarusian authorities ordered the dissolution of more than 270 independent nonprofit organizations and public associations, including the Belarusian Association of Journalists, the Belarusian Helsinki Committee, and the Belarusian PEN Center. Throughout the year, security forces raided the offices and homes of human rights activists who remained in the country.
- In May, Belarusian authorities forced a Ryanair flight traveling from Athens to Vilnius to make an emergency landing in Minsk in order to arrest exiled blogger and opposition activist Raman Pratasevich. In response, the European Union (EU) banned Belarusian airlines from entering its airspace and from accessing its airports. As of November, Pratasevich was under house arrest in an unknown location in Belarus and had likely been subjected to torture.
- By November, approximately 4,000 migrants and refugees were camped in Belarus near the Polish border. The Lukashenka regime deliberately facilitated the passage of migrants—most of them from Iraq—through Belarus to the borders of the EU to divide the bloc and force them to end sanctions they imposed on the country. Both the Polish and Belarusian authorities used tear gas and water cannon against the migrants, who were left in freezing temperatures without adequate shelter, supplies, and assistance. At least 12 people died in the cold.
- The government forcefully cracked down on independent media during the year. Over 110 journalists were detained throughout the year, 32 of whom remained in prison at the end of the year. Authorities blocked access to over 100 news and media sites, including the largest and most popular internet portal in Belarus, Tut.by.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 2 / 40A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 0 / 12*A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

The president is elected for five-year terms, and there are no term limits. President Lukashenka was first elected in 1994, in the country's only democratic election. The 2020 campaign period was heavily controlled by authorities, who permitted only 15 of 55 applicants to register as candidates. The government arrested two major candidates, Siarhei Tsikhanouski and Viktor Babaryka, and forced another candidate, Valery Tsepkalo, to flee the country before voting day. Scores of activists were similarly arrested or fled the country. Sviatlana Tsikhanouskaya and Veronika Tsepkalo, who led the largest opposition rallies in the country since the fall of the Soviet Union, both became popular candidates after their husbands were arrested and forced to flee. They experienced severe pressure from authorities and eventually went into exile after the August election. Authorities failed to send an invitation to the Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE) on time, and the elections took place without an independent monitoring mission.

The government claimed that Lukashenka won the poll with 80 percent of the vote, though this was widely denounced as fraudulent. A parallel and independent vote count using the mobile phone application Golos, with data from just under 23 percent of polling stations, revealed that Tsikhanouskaya likely received 13 times more votes than were reported. Protests after the announcement of the results were met with disproportionate police force, including the use of live ammunition and mass, arbitrary detentions, among other abuses. Documentation by human rights organizations showed that by the end of the year, 33,000 people had been detained and fined, 169 people were being held as political prisoners, and the government had opened more than 900 criminal cases, all related to the election period. In 2021, the number of political prisoners continued to increase, reaching nearly 1,000 people by the end of the year.

In September 2020, amid ongoing massive protests and growing calls for a repeat election, Lukashenka inaugurated himself in a secret, unannounced ceremony.

Legislative elections in Belarus are tightly restricted. The 110 members of the Chamber of Representatives, the lower house of the National Assembly, are elected by popular vote to four-year terms from single-mandate constituencies. The upper chamber, the Council of the Republic, consists of 64 members serving four-year terms: regional councils elect 56 and the president appoints 8.

A parliamentary election was held in November 2019, nearly a year ahead of schedule. Candidates loyal to President Lukashenka won every seat in the lower house, while independent candidates won none. OSCE election monitors reported an overall lack of transparency, restrictions on observation of the vote count, and indications of ballot box stuffing.

The legal framework for elections fails to meet democratic standards, and authorities have dismissed OSCE recommendations to improve it. Electoral commission members of all levels are politically aligned with and dependent on the government, and independent observers have no access to ballot-counting processes. Out of the 1,989 members of local electoral commissions formed for the presidential election, authorities allowed only two representatives of independent political parties to register, dismissing thousands of other independent applications.

In December 2021, President Lukashenka published a draft of a new constitution that would further cement his grip on power. The new constitution would reintroduce a two-term limit for five-year terms to the office of president. These limits would take effect once a newly elected president assumed office and would not apply to Lukashenka's current term. He would thus be able to be reelected as president until 2035, despite feigning a capitulation to international pressure to enact democratic constitutional changes. Among other changes, the new constitution also introduces a new governing body, the All-Belarus People's Assembly, to operate in parallel with the parliament and extends parliamentary terms to five years. Discussions for the amendments lacked transparency and any opportunity for public debate. A referendum is scheduled for February 2022.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 1 / 16

Involvement in political activism can result in a loss of employment, expulsion from educational institutions, smear campaigns in the media, fines, and the confiscation of property. Political parties face formidable challenges when seeking official registration. Political initiatives are actively persecuted and can lead to criminal charges for the leaders. Authorities harass and threaten political opponents, public figures, and political dissidents through state media.

In August 2020, Maryia Kalesnikava, who campaigned with Tsikhanouskaya and Babaryka, announced the creation of a new political party called “Together.” In September, Kalesnikava was kidnapped and later incarcerated, effectively ending the initiative. That same month, Tsikhanouskaya and other activists, including the winner of the 2015 Nobel Prize in Literature, Sviatlana Aleksiyeovich, formed the Coordination Council, a civil society group that sought a peaceful resolution to the postelection violence and a rerun of the presidential poll. The government responded to the group’s creation by arresting and prosecuting several of its leaders, claiming that they were attempting to seize power illegally and that they were a national security threat. In September 2021, Kalesnikava and Maxim Znak, another member of the Coordination Council, were sentenced to 11 years and 10 years in prison, respectively, for conspiracy to seize power, among other dubious charges.

In 2021, prominent political opponents to Lukashenka’s regime continued to face politically motivated criminal charges and lengthy prison sentences. Viktor Babaryka was sentenced to 14 years in prison, and Siarhei Tsikhanouski for 18 years. Other activists prosecuted alongside Siarhei Tsikhanouski, such as Mikola Statkevich, Ihar Losik and others, also received lengthy prison terms.

There is effectively no opportunity for independent candidates to gain power through elections, and Belarus has never experienced a democratic transfer of power. During the 2020 presidential election, vast numbers of Belarusians responded enthusiastically to the participation of opposition candidates. This interest manifested itself at the early stages of campaign and, despite the regime’s attempts to eliminate challengers, developed into a broad civil resistance movement. However, Lukashenka’s regime has proven unyielding to the popular demand for political change.

Private citizens and political candidates are limited in their opportunities to express their views and make political choices. Meaningful participation in politics is generally not possible. The police and military used severe, sometimes fatal violence, and arrested and detained over 33,000 people to crack down on the peaceful prodemocracy protests that took place between August and November 2020, ensuring that Lukashenka would maintain his power.

No registered party represents the specific interests of ethnic, religious, or other minority groups. Between July and October 2021, the Belarusian authorities dissolved more than 270 nonprofit advocacy groups, charity organizations, and nongovernmental organizations (NGOs), some of which represented the interests of LGBT+ people and people living with disabilities.

Women formally enjoy equal political rights and make up 40 percent of the legislators elected in November 2019. However, women are underrepresented in leadership positions. Women’s advocacy groups have diverging positions on promoting the political rights of women, with some such groups taking the position that there is no need for gender equality initiatives in Belarus. There has been some visible activism by women’s groups seeking to raise awareness of gender-based violence, but the government has largely refrained from addressing their concerns.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 1 / 12C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 0 / 4

Though Lukashenka claimed victory in the 2020 presidential elections, the legitimacy of his office is disputed both domestically and internationally. The constitution vests power in the president, stating that presidential decrees have higher legal force than legislation. Lukashenka considers himself the head of all branches of government, including the parliament, which always supports his policies and rarely initiates legislation on its own.

The state controls at least 70 percent of the economy, and graft is encouraged by a lack of transparency and accountability in government. There are no independent bodies to investigate corruption cases, and graft trials are typically closed. Presidential clemency has been issued occasionally to free convicted corrupt officials, some of whom Lukashenka has returned to positions of authority.

Powerful oligarchs enjoy the protection of the government and adjustment of regulations and government policies in their favor, so long as they channel money in a quid pro quo back to Lukashenka by other means. Spurious bribery and tax evasion charges have been used against Lukashenka's political opponents; for example, in 2021, Viktor Babaryka was sentenced to 14 years' imprisonment on corruption charges after he announced his intentions to register as a presidential candidate.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 0 / 4

The government largely fails to adhere to legal requirements providing for access to information. In recent years, authorities have moved to make some basic information about government operations available online. However, the COVID-19 pandemic further revealed the government's inability to provide transparent information to the public. President Lukashenka frequently provided conflicting and misleading information and guidance about the dangers of the coronavirus, ways to reduce its spread, and the importance of mass vaccination. Evidence from the United Nations (UN) suggested that the government's reported COVID-19 case numbers and mortality rate were vastly inaccurate.

Similarly, the regime has deliberately kept silent about important matters, such as talks with Russia about economic and other issues.

From August through November 2021, Lukashenka intentionally withheld and obscured information about the increased numbers of economic migrants and asylum seekers that were being allowed into the country. Journalists and human rights groups were for months prevented access to the migrant camps in Belarus near the Polish border.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 6 / 60 (-3)D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 1 / 16 (-1)*D1. Are there free and independent media? 0 / 4

The government exercises unrestricted control over mainstream media. The 2008 media law secures a state monopoly over information about political, social, and economic affairs. Libel is both a civil and criminal offense, and the criminal code contains provisions protecting the "honor and dignity" of high-ranking officials.

The government owns the only internet service provider and controls the internet through legal and technical means. From August 9 to 12, 2020, during the height of the mass prodemocracy protests, the government shut down the internet in almost the entire country, limiting the ability of reporters to provide accurate information to the public. Internet disruptions were registered during protest rallies throughout 2020.

The official definition of mass media includes websites and blogs, placing them under the Information Ministry's supervision. Most independent journalists operate under the assumption that they are under surveillance by the Committee for State Security (KGB). Reporters are subject to fines, detention, intimidation, and criminal prosecution for their work. The regime has used antiextremism legislation and investigations into alleged financial crimes to curtail media activity. In May 2021, the government amended legislation on "mass media," "mass events," and "criminal liability," all of which tightened restrictions for independent media and significantly increased the already disproportionate criminal penalties for legitimate journalistic activities.

The government forcefully cracked down on independent media in 2021. Security forces raided offices and homes of independent journalists, arrested journalists and staff members of news outlets, and seized servers and equipment. Over 110 journalists were detained during the year, 32 of whom remained in prison at the end of December. Two journalists, Daria Chultsova and Katsiaryna Andreyeva who were detained after a live broadcast of a political protest in 2020, were sentenced to two years in prison in February 2021. Authorities blocked access to over 100 news and media sites, including the largest and most popular internet portal in Belarus, Tut.by. At least 10 print media outlets were forced to stop publishing.

Despite constitutional guarantees of religious equality, government decrees and registration requirements maintain restrict religious activity. Legal amendments in 2002 provided for government censorship of religious publications and barred foreigners from leading religious groups. The amendments also placed strict limitations on religious groups active in Belarus for less than 20 years. In 2003, the government signed a concordat with the Belarusian Orthodox Church, which is controlled by the Russian Orthodox Church, giving it a privileged position.

After the 2020 elections, Lukashenka attempted to weaken the Catholic Church's influence, which had denounced state violence against peaceful prodemocracy protesters. In December, the government denied Tadeusz Kondrusiewicz, a Belarusian citizen and Archbishop of Minsk–Mahileu, reentry to the country. Though he was allowed to return to Belarus later that month after negotiations with the Vatican and intense international pressure, he resigned in January 2021.

Academic freedom remains subject to intense state ideological pressures, and academic personnel face harassment and dismissal if they use a liberal curriculum or are suspected of disloyalty. Students and professors who join opposition protests face threat of dismissal and revocation of degrees.

The government pressures young people to join the state-sponsored pro-Lukashenka group Belarusian Republican Union of Youth (BRSU). The government has announced plans to tighten control over private schools and kindergartens, which noticed significant rise in demand after the 2020 election; many public school teachers were linked to the falsification of voting results.

Student activity at universities rose sharply in 2020, as many were involved in the August 2020 prodemocracy protests. Authorities responded with unprovoked brutality and repression, as plainclothes security forces attacked peaceful student protests within and outside of university campuses. Lukashenka replaced at least eight deans at different universities. Between August 2020 and May 2021, at least 153 students were arbitrarily expelled from universities, many of whom fled to neighboring countries. Throughout 2021, student activists were arrested and given several-year prison sentences for actions that allegedly “violated social order” or created “an extremist entity,” among other spurious charges.

The use of wiretapping and other surveillance by state security agencies limits the right to free private discussion. Private citizens often avoid discussing sensitive issues over the phone or via internet communication platforms, for fear that state security agents are monitoring conversations.

During and after the 2020 election period and prodemocracy protests, authorities threatened, harassed, and arrested protesters, presidential candidates, professionals in the cultural sphere, academics, theater troupes, athletes, medical professionals, public figures, private individuals, and others who spoke out against Lukashenka and the postelection violence.

Police routinely coerce, threaten, and torture detained individuals, forcing them to open their mobile devices in search of photos, videos, and correspondence that confirmed their participation in the prodemocracy protests. Authorities also monitored social media activity of people who were arrested in order to find evidence of their participation in the protests and potentially increase the criminal charges they would face. The private company Synesis, which was sanctioned by the EU, reportedly helped authorities identify and arrest demonstrators after the 2020 elections by providing video surveillance technology with facial recognition.

Voicing criticism of public officials and security forces on social media platforms, including sharing posts from other users or media sites that have been labeled “extremist,” can lead to criminal charges. In 2021, security forces violently detained and arrested hundreds of people who had posted allegedly critical or insulting comments about state officials on social media. Defamation charges were used to prosecute such speech, with ordinary internet users being sentenced to more than a year in jail. Local authorities routinely surveil and monitor individuals who display publicly or privately any symbols of the opposition, including coded phrases or colors.

In May 2021, Belarusian authorities forced a Ryanair flight traveling from Athens to Vilnius to make an emergency landing in Minsk in order to arrest exiled blogger and opposition activist Raman Pratasevich. Domestic rights groups and international organizations and governments condemned Lukashenka’s actions and responded with new sanctions. The EU banned Belarusian airlines from entering its airspace and from accessing its airports. As of November, Pratasevich was under house arrest in an unknown location and had likely been subjected to torture.

Score Change: The score declined from 1 to 0 because authorities took extraordinary measures to punish critical expression on social media, including the forced landing of an international flight to detain opposition activist Raman Pratasevich and arresting people for their critical comments posted online.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 0 / 12 (-1)E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 0 / 4

The government severely restricts freedom of assembly. Protests require permission from local authorities, who often arbitrarily deny it. The May 2021 amendment to the law on mass events imposes strict authorization requirements and impedes organizers' ability to raise funds for protests.

In the summer of 2020, unprecedented prodemocracy protests, demonstrations, and campaign rallies for Tsikhanouskaya occurred across the country—in the form of street chains, marches, and block parties with concerts and performances—assembling hundreds of thousands of people. Police and military forces only partially succeeded in blocking people from congregating before voting day on August 9. But in the weeks that followed, the government deployed military equipment and armed riot police, who attacked and arrested people brutally and indiscriminately, at times opening fire with live ammunition, killing several. More than 33,000 people were arrested and later tried, jailed, or fined. Numerous instances of cruel treatment, beatings, and torture of protesters were recorded, with total impunity for the security forces involved.

The Lukashenko regime amended the criminal code and increased the administrative fines and detention period (between 15 and 30 days) for participating in an unauthorized mass event. Administrative detention has been instrumentalized by the government against participants in the prodemocracy movement that began in 2020.

Freedom of association is severely restricted. Registration of groups remains selective, and regulations ban foreign assistance to entities and individuals deemed to promote foreign meddling in internal affairs. Prior to the 2020 prodemocracy movement, few human rights groups managed to operate due to resource shortages and pressure from the authorities, and staff and supporters risk prosecution and fines for their activism. Though the rise of the prodemocracy movement brought with it increased citizen activism, since August 2020 activists have been arrested by the thousands, and many more have fled the country.

Between July and October 2021, the Belarusian authorities ordered the dissolution of more than 270 independent NGOs and public associations, including prominent organizations like the Belarusian Association of Journalists, the Belarusian Helsinki Committee, and the Belarusian PEN Center. Throughout the year, security forces raided the offices and homes of human rights activists who remained in the country. For example, the director of and a lawyer from the Office for the Rights of Persons with Disabilities were detained due to a dubious fraud investigation. The organization ceased all activities and was in the process of dissolution.

Participation in unregistered or dissolved organizations was decriminalized in 2018. However, the criminal code was amended in 2021 to provide for exorbitant fines for participants in such organizations, further complicating the ability of human rights watchdogs to record civil liberties infringements.

Score Change: The score declined from 1 to 0 because authorities embarked on a wide-ranging crackdown against NGOs, marked by ongoing arrests and prosecutions of civil society activists and the closure of hundreds of independent organizations.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 0 / 4

Independent labor unions face harassment, and their leaders are frequently fired and prosecuted for engaging in peaceful protests. No independent unions have been registered since 1999, when Lukashenka issued a decree setting extremely restrictive registration requirements.

Independent unions were prominent in the prodemocracy movement in the summer of 2020, striking to protest the fraudulent presidential election and police violence toward peaceful demonstrators. The state increasingly targeted and pressured workers to prevent them from going on strike. Union leaders and rank-and-file members were arrested, fined, dismissed from their posts, sent to psychiatric institutions, and forced into exile.

In September 2021, security forces arrested at least 11 people, accusing them of being involved in an independent labor movement. The arrested workers face criminal charges of treason and conspiracy to seize power, with a maximum punishment of 15 years in prison.

F. RULE OF LAW: 0 / 16 (-1)F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 0 / 4

Courts are entirely subservient to President Lukashenka, who appoints Supreme Court justices with the approval of the rubber-stamp parliament.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 0 / 4

The right to a fair trial is not respected and often flatly dismissed in cases with political overtones. In a departure from international norms, the power to extend pretrial detention lies with a prosecutor rather than a judge. The absence of independent oversight allows police to routinely violate legal procedures. The government regularly attacks attorneys, who often are the only connection between imprisoned activists and their families and society.

During and after the presidential campaign of 2020 and throughout 2021, arbitrary arrests, police brutality and torture, and the denial of due process rights continued with impunity. Lawyers were often denied the right to meet with their defendants. Many lawyers defending political prisoners (arrested during the prodemocracy protests) were disbarred or arrested.

Law enforcement agencies have broad powers to employ physical force against suspects, who have little opportunity for recourse if they are abused. Human rights groups continue to document instances of beatings, torture, and intimidation during detention. During and after the presidential election period in 2020 and throughout 2021, detained peaceful prodemocracy protesters experienced cruel and dehumanizing treatment during their arrests, while being transported to detention centers and when incarcerated.

Authorities have sought to increase the dominance of the Russian language. Official Usage of Belarusian remains rare. The UN Educational, Scientific, and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) recognizes Belarusian as “vulnerable.” Since Lukashenka became president, the share of first graders who study in Belarusian fell from 40 to under 10 percent in 2019.

Women are prohibited from entering 181 different occupations, and societal norms in much of the country hold that women should be mothers or housewives. However,

Tsikhanouskaya's mass support in the prodemocracy movement has become a slight counter to long-standing gender roles.

LGBT+ people face widespread societal discrimination, and law enforcement authorities are reluctant to investigate and prosecute attacks against them.

Beginning in August 2021, Belarusian authorities began to allow an increased number of migrants and refugees to enter the country. The Lukashenka regime deliberately facilitated the passage of migrants—most of them from Iraq—through Belarus to the borders of the EU so as to divide the bloc and attempt to force an end to EU sanctions imposed on the country. Reports suggest that authorities have urged, and in some cases forced economic migrants to attempt to illegally enter the EU, providing them equipment to breach fences or preventing them from returning to Belarusian cities. By November, approximately 4,000 people were camped near the Polish border, and there were allegedly between 10,000 and 20,000 migrants throughout Belarus. Both the Polish and Belarusian authorities used tear gas and water cannon against the migrants, who were left in freezing temperatures without adequate shelter, supplies, and assistance. At least 12 people died in the cold. Lukashenka barred human rights groups and journalists from accessing the camps until November, when they were given limited access. By the end of the year, approximately 2,000 asylum seekers, refugees, and migrants were stranded in Belarus. Over 1,000 people chose to return home voluntarily. Repatriation efforts were still ongoing.

Score Change: The score declined from 1 to 0 because asylum seekers and migrants traveling through Belarus faced mistreatment by authorities, with some reportedly forced across the western border and prevented from returning.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 5 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 1 / 4

Opposition activists are occasionally detained at the border for lengthy searches. Passports are used as a primary identity document in Belarus, and authorities are known to harass people living in a different location than indicated by domestic stamps in their passport.

On numerous occasions, authorities forced the expulsion of politically active Belarusians in 2020 and 2021. Prominent prodemocracy figure Tsikhanouskaya, Archbishop of the Belarusian Catholic Church Kondrusiewicz, and other public figures were forced to leave the country. In December 2020, authorities prohibited Belarusians from leaving the country at land border crossings, except with Russia, ostensibly to prevent the spread of COVID-19; the policy was likely enforced to prevent political dissidents from fleeing. In May 2021, the EU banned Belarusian airlines from traveling over its airspace and accessing its airports. This has limited travel options for Belarusian citizens and significantly increased the cost of leaving the country. Further restrictions on air travel were imposed in response to the border crisis instigated by the Belarusian authorities.

Though limits on economic freedom have eased in recent years, state interference still affects the economy and profitable business owners are never secure from arbitrary government pressure and harassment. Many businesspeople that became involved in the postelection prodemocracy efforts, often to support victims of human rights abuses or to incentivize policemen to resign from law enforcement, were criminally prosecuted on groundless claims. Other businesses and their owners who supported candidates other than Lukashenka have been arrested under false pretense. Multiple businesses relocated their employees to neighboring countries fearing that they would be harassed or prosecuted by the state.

Domestic violence is a pervasive problem in Belarus, and police register about 150,000 incidents per year. In 2018, Lukashenka blocked a draft law on the prevention of domestic violence jointly developed by the law enforcement agencies and civil society representatives. He called attitudes against the corporal punishment of children “nonsense from the West” and insisted that “good” punishment of children could be useful to them. Threats of losing custody of children are often used to intimidate and harass political activists.

The constitution explicitly bans same-sex marriage. The Belarusian government led an effort in 2016 to block LGBT+ rights from being part of a UN international initiative focused on urban areas. In December 2021, authorities released a draft of a new constitution, subject to a national referendum set for February 2022, which includes a definition of marriage as a union solely between a man and a woman. This would create further obstacles for same-sex partners to have legal recognition.

Mandatory unpaid national workdays, postgraduate employment allocation, compulsory labor for inmates in state rehabilitation facilities, and restrictions on leaving employment in certain industries have led labor activists to conclude that all Belarusian citizens experience forced labor at some stage of their life. Many women become victims of the international sex trade.

In 2018, based on a presidential decree, the government effectively revived a plan to tax the unemployed by mandating full payment for housing and utility services starting in 2019. An attempt to impose the tax in 2017 was met with mass protests that were brutally suppressed.

Belgium

Population: 11,500,000

Capital: Brussels

Freedom Status: Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Belgium is a stable electoral democracy with a long record of peaceful transfers of power. Political rights and civil liberties are legally guaranteed and largely respected. Major concerns in recent years have included the threat of terrorism, corruption scandals, and rising right-wing nationalism and xenophobia.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- In May, a court ordered a Brussels-based public transport company to pay €51,000 ($60,700) in damages to a woman who was denied a job because of her choice to wear a hijab. However, anti-Muslim rhetoric, including among senior politicians, continued to rise throughout the year, leading to the July resignation of Ihsane

Haouach, a newly appointed government commissioner who faced months of harassment for choosing to wear a hijab.

- The government imposed travel restrictions in January in response to the spread of COVID-19. The measures were eased over the course of the year as vaccination rates rose.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 39 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 12 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The Belgian monarchy is largely ceremonial, although the king retains constitutional authority to mediate the process of government formation. He was particularly active in this role in 2020 as negotiations over a new government stalled. The prime minister, who is the leader of the majority party or coalition, is appointed by the monarch and approved by the legislature. In late September 2020, seven parties forged a parliamentary majority under the leadership of Alexander De Croo of the Open Flemish Liberals and Democrats party, who was sworn in as prime minister in October.

Belgium's multilayered subnational administrative units have their own governments with varying degrees of autonomy. In addition to the three main geographic divisions of French-speaking Wallonia in the south, Flemish-speaking Flanders in the north, and the bilingual Brussels capital region, there are overlapping governments for the French community, the Flemish community, and the much smaller German-speaking community. Beneath these are provincial and various local governments. In 2019, the German-speaking community launched a system of participatory democracy in which citizens are selected by lot to join a Citizens' Council, which provides input on policy matters.

Belgium's federal parliament consists of two houses: the Chamber of Representatives and the Senate. The 150 members of the lower house are elected directly by proportional representation. The Senate is composed of 50 members selected by community and regional parliaments, and an additional 10 members chosen by the first 50 based on the results of the Chamber of Representatives elections. Members serve five-year terms in both houses, and elections are generally free and fair.

In the May 2019 elections, establishment parties lost significant shares of support to parties on the far left and far right of the political spectrum. For example, the right-wing, nationalist New Flemish Alliance (N-VA) lost some power, taking 25 seats in the Chamber of Representatives (down 8 seats), but the far-right, separatist Flemish Interest (VB) party won 18 seats, a gain of 15. On the left, the francophone Socialist Party (PS) won 20 seats, down 3 from the previous election, while the Greens—composed of the francophone Ecolo and their Flemish-speaking counterpart Groen—won a combined 21 seats, a significant increase. The leftist Workers' Party of Belgium (PvdA in Flemish, PTB in French) also made major gains, rising from 2 seats to 12. A total of 12 parties won seats in the lower house, and it took until September 2020 to form a new government, a delay that is not historically unusual for Belgium.

Regional elections held concurrently in May 2019 showed a similar trend, with losses by establishment parties in all parts of the country.

Despite the complexity of the political system, the electoral laws and framework are generally fair and impartially implemented.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 16 / 16B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 4 / 4

The party system is robust but highly fragmented, with separate Flemish and franco-phone political parties representing various positions on the left-right spectrum.

Belgium's coalition-based politics allow individual parties to move easily in and out of government, and there is a long record of peaceful transfers of power between rival parties at the federal level. However, the 2019 regional and federal elections showed decreasing support for establishment parties and increasing support for far-right, far-left, and green parties across the country. The increasing power of the Flemish right-wing N-VA and the far-right VB makes majority coalitions that exclude these nationalist parties increasingly difficult to assemble. The N-VA and VB became the two largest parties in Flanders after the 2019 elections, and they criticized the formation in 2020 of a federal government that lacked their participation.

The political choices of voters and candidates are generally free from undue interference.

Members of racial, ethnic, religious, and other minority groups are free to participate in national and subnational politics, and women also enjoy full political rights. In the 2019 elections, women were elected to 65 seats out of 150 in the Chamber of Representatives; this 43 percent share represented a rise of 4 percentage points from the 2014 elections. The Senate must have a minimum of 20 women senators.

In general, the larger parties incorporate members of minority groups, including in senior positions. In 2019, Belgians elected Petra De Sutter, an openly transgender member of the Groen party, as a member of the European Parliament; in 2020, De Sutter became Belgium's deputy prime minister. In May 2021, Ihsane Haouach, who wears a hijab, was appointed as government commissioner at the Institute for the Equality of Women and Men. However, Haouach resigned her post in July after facing months of anti-Muslim harassment, including by francophone politician Georges-Louis Bouchez, who claimed that her choice to wear a headscarf represented a violation of "the neutrality of the state."

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 11 / 12C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 4 / 4

Elected officials generally adopt and implement laws and policies without improper interference from unelected entities, though the difficulty of forming majority coalitions has sometimes disrupted governance over the past decade.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 3 / 4

Public officials can face heavy fines and up to 10 years' imprisonment for corruption-related offenses, and enforcement of anticorruption legislation is generally adequate. However, recent corruption scandals have drawn attention to abuses involving politicians who hold multiple positions on the boards of public and private entities, with some officials holding more than a dozen paid positions. The Group of States against Corruption (GRECO), a Council of Europe (CoE) anticorruption body, has repeatedly warned about Belgium's slow implementation of recommended anticorruption reforms.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 4 / 4

The law provides mechanisms for the public to access government information, and these procedures generally function in practice. Legislators and other high-ranking elected officials are required by law to regularly disclose their assets as well as paid or unpaid mandates, executive functions, and occupations to the Court of Audit. Information about asset declarations is not publicly accessible, but declarations of interests are published in the official government gazette. In recent years, both GRECO and the European Commission have recommended that Belgium adopt stronger regulations governing interactions between lobbyists and high-level government officials, including members of parliament.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 57 / 60D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 15 / 16*D1. Are there free and independent media? 4 / 4

Freedom of the press is guaranteed by the constitution and generally respected by the government. Belgians have access to numerous public and private media outlets that present a range of views. Internet access is unrestricted. While online harassment cases are generally rare, the CoE issued several alerts about the online harassment of journalists during 2021. Some law enforcement actions affecting journalists have raised concerns in recent years. In May, police searched the home of journalist Dirk Selis after he published an investigative report on alleged political interference in COVID-19 vaccine allocation processes in Limburg. The Flemish Association of Journalists (VVJ) condemned the search as illegal and announced plans to address the incident with both political and judicial officials.

More than half of the country's population identifies as Roman Catholic. Freedom of religion is generally protected, but members of minority religious groups have complained of discrimination and harassment. A ban on the partial or total covering of the face in public locations, which is understood to target Muslims, has been in effect since 2011. The rise of nationalist and far-right parties in Flanders has contributed to the normalization of anti-Muslim rhetoric.

Several high-profile anti-Muslim incidents occurred during 2021. In May, a court ordered a Brussels-based public transport company to pay €51,000 ($60,700) in damages to a woman who was denied a job because she wears a hijab. The court found that preventing individuals from wearing religious symbols in the workplace constitutes discrimination and disproportionately affects women. In the wake of Ihsane Haouach's July resignation as government commissioner at the Institute for the Equality of Women and Men, media reports alleged that she had resigned due to ties with the Muslim Brotherhood; Haouach denied having any such links and said the reports were part of a smear campaign.

The government does not restrict academic freedom. Schools are free from political indoctrination, and there are no significant impediments to scholarly research or discussion.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 4 / 4

Private discussion is open and vibrant, and freedom of expression is guaranteed by the constitution, though there are laws banning incitement to hatred and other such offenses, which occasionally lead to prosecutions, fines, and jail terms.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 12 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

Freedom of assembly is protected by law and generally respected in practice.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 4 / 4

Freedom of association is guaranteed by the constitution, and nongovernmental organizations operate without undue restrictions.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 4 / 4

Workers at companies that employ more than 50 people have the right to organize and join unions and to bargain collectively. Employers found guilty of firing workers because of union activities are required to reinstate the workers or pay an indemnity.

F. RULE OF LAW: 15 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 4 / 4

The judiciary is independent by law and in practice, and court rulings are duly enforced by other state entities.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 4 / 4

The judicial process generally guarantees a fair trial, and the authorities typically observe safeguards against arbitrary arrest and detention. Extraordinary security measures adopted in the period surrounding terrorist attacks in 2015 and 2016 have eased significantly in the years since, though a 2017 legal change increased the maximum length of detention in police custody without a judicial order from 24 to 48 hours.

Although conditions in prisons and detention centers meet most international standards, the facilities continue to suffer from overcrowding and other problematic living conditions.

Antidiscrimination legislation prohibits bias and acts of hatred and incitement based on categories including gender, race, ethnicity, nationality, and sexual orientation.

Nevertheless, some groups, including immigrants, Belgians of African descent, and Romany residents, continue to face a degree of discrimination in practice.

In 2019, UN experts stated that racial discrimination is institutionally endemic in Belgium and called for recognition of the country's history of human rights abuses during its colonial rule over what is now the Democratic Republic of the Congo. Following debates prompted by the Black Lives Matter protests in 2020, King Philippe expressed regrets over Belgian colonial rule. Although politicians have gradually become aware of the need for critical discussion about the country's past, the rising influence of hard-right nationalist parties in Flanders has been accompanied by racism and xenophobia.

In 2020, the death of a young adult of Moroccan descent after a police chase in Brussels resulted in brief riots and prompted discussion of police discrimination against Belgians with racial or ethnic minority backgrounds who reside in areas of high poverty. The Interfederal Centre for Equal Opportunities (UNIA), Belgium's state antidiscrimination agency, has received hundreds of complaints of police mistreatment and abuse of migrants and members of ethnic and racial minority groups in recent years.

Despite robust legal protections for the rights of LGBT+ people, such individuals sometimes face instances of violence and discrimination in practice. In March 2021, a man was killed in a homophobic attack committed by three teenagers, who were quickly arrested.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 15 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

The law provides for freedom of domestic movement and foreign travel, and the government upholds these rights in practice. The authorities introduced travel restrictions in January 2021 in response to the spread of COVID-19, but the rules were eased over the course of the year as vaccination rates rose.

The legal framework supports property rights, and commercial activity is regulated without arbitrary interference.

There are few significant restrictions on personal social freedoms. Belgium legalized same-sex marriage in 2003, and in 2006 same-sex couples gained the right to adopt children.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 3 / 4

Immigration has increased in recent years, but non-European Union immigrants and their Belgian-born children remain poorly integrated into the labor market.

Despite government efforts to combat the problem, Belgium remains a destination country for human trafficking, particularly for sexual exploitation and domestic labor; victims generally originate in Eastern Europe, Asia, and Africa.

Belize

Population: 400,000

Capital: Belmopan

Freedom Status: Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Belize is a democracy that has experienced regular rotations of power through competitive elections. Civil liberties are mostly respected. Government corruption is a concern, as is the high rate of violent crime. Authorities have been slow to address persistent problems of police brutality and human trafficking within the country's borders.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- In April, the country's parliament passed new legislation mandating that Supreme Court and Court of Appeal judges deliver written judgments within six months of hearing a case or face dismissal.
- A state of emergency was declared for the south side of Belize City in August following a sharp increase in shootings in the area. The state of emergency remained in place until mid-September.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 34 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 12 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The prime minister, usually the leader of the largest party in the parliament, is head of government. Formally, the prime minister is appointed by the governor general, who represents the British monarch as head of state. The legitimacy of the prime minister is largely dependent on the conduct of legislative elections, which are typically credible and well administered. After 17 years in opposition, the People's United Party (PUP), under the leadership of Johnny Briceño, won a convincing victory in the November 2020 elections.

The 31 members of the House of Representatives are directly elected to five-year terms. The Senate has 12 seats. The ruling party, the opposition, and several civil associations select the senators, who are then appointed by the governor general.

In the 2020 legislative polls, the opposition PUP won a landslide victory, taking 26 of the 31 seats. Turnout was over 81 percent, the highest since 1998.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 4 / 4

Electoral laws are generally fair. The Organization of American States (OAS) has suggested that the role of the Elections and Boundaries Commission and the Elections and Boundaries Department be strengthened, and that authorities work to reduce partisanship associated with the confirmation of their appointees. In 2019, opposition parties and civil society groups brought a case to force a revision of Belize's highly malapportioned constituencies, but an opposition-party request for an injunction stopping the 2020 elections pending resolution of the redistricting issue was denied in October 2020. In December 2021, the Elections and Boundaries Commission announced that the redistricting process would begin in 2022.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 14 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 4 / 4

Political parties can organize freely. The effects of the country's "first-past-the-post" electoral system have entrenched the two largest parties. While a number of smaller parties have competed, only the PUP and United Democratic Party (UDP) have won seats in the parliament.

The political system allows for opposition parties to increase their support or gain power through elections. Since 1984 there have been fairly regular transfers of power between the two main parties.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 4 / 4

Recent elections, including those in 2020, have been viewed as generally free of undue interference from entities outside the democratic political sphere. However, the OAS has raised concerns about the potential impact of unregulated campaign financing on the transparency of the political process.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 2 / 4

Women are reasonably well represented in the political system, holding four seats in the current House of Representatives and five seats in the Senate. There were 13 women candidates out of a total of 88 in the 2020 elections. In municipal elections held in March 2021, 24 women were elected, and the capital city, Belmopan, elected its first woman mayor.

Indigenous people, particularly those of Mayan descent, who make up 11 percent of the population, are not well represented in politics. Mestizo Belizeans and Afro-Indigenous peoples are better integrated into the political system. LGBT+ people face discrimination, which affects their ability to engage fully in political and electoral processes. A collection of religious denominations nominate one member of the Senate, but non-Christian groups are not included in the process.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 8 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 4 / 4

The elected prime minister, cabinet, and national legislative representatives are duly seated following elections and are able to freely determine the policies of the government.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 2 / 4

Belize continues to struggle with corruption, and there is little political will to address the problem. Anticorruption laws are poorly enforced.

Several high-profile cases of corruption and fraud in 2020 were connected to the UDP, including that of John Saldivar, who resigned as leader-elect of the party due to allegations that he had received payments from a US businessman accused of fraud. In September 2021, a former UDP minister, Rene Jaime Montero, was charged with corruption for allegedly using ministry employees, heavy machinery, and fuel for his personal farms. Montero allegedly left Belize the day after his arrest warrant was issued in September; he had not returned by year's end.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 2 / 4

The government generally engages in policymaking with openness and transparency. However, a January 2020 Supreme Court, which found that the UDP government improperly spent $645 million, highlighted the UDP government's sidelining of the legislature on budgetary and finance matters. The court stated that the spending violated both the constitution and the Finance and Audit Reform Act.

There are also persistent problems with procurement processes and officials' financial disclosure statements. Members of Belize's business community allege favoritism influences the government's awarding of licenses and public contracts. In May 2021, the PUP government introduced the Protected Disclosures Bill, "to combat corruption" in both the public and private sectors. If passed, the bill would offer protection to whistleblowers.

In August, the governor of Belize's Central Bank, Gustavo Vasquez, was dismissed by the government only four months after his appointment to the role. Vasquez later implied that the termination came as a result of his attempts to "restore the integrity and operational autonomy" of the bank despite alleged opposition from the Ministry of Finance and certain interest groups within the economic sector.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 53 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 16 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 4 / 4

The constitution guarantees freedom of the press, though it includes exceptions for interests such as national security, public order, and morality. While reporting generally covers a wide range of viewpoints in practice, journalists sometimes face threats, physical harassment, or assault in the course of their work.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 4 / 4

Religious freedom is constitutionally protected and largely respected in practice. Religious groups must register with the authorities, and foreign missionaries are required to obtain a visa and permit, but the procedures are not onerous.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

Academic freedom is generally respected.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 4 / 4

There are no significant constraints on individual expression regarding politics or other such matters, whether in private discussion or on social media.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 11 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

Freedom of assembly is constitutionally protected, and the government generally respects this right.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 4 / 4

Nongovernmental organizations are generally free from government interference.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 3 / 4

Unions are free to form and operate, and employers have been penalized for violating union rights under the labor code. However, while labor unions are active and politically influential, their ability to protect workers' rights is limited in practice. There are some restrictions on the right to strike, including an official definition of "essential" workers that is broader than the International Labour Organization's standard. In December 2021, plans to implement a COVID-19-related vaccination mandate for public sector workers were postponed due to opposition from the Public Service Union (PSU).

F. RULE OF LAW: 13 / 16F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 4 / 4

The judiciary is generally independent, despite inadequate resources and periodic attempts by political and business interests to interfere with its composition. After coming to power in 2020, the newly elected PUP government pledged to provide greater resources to the judiciary. In April 2021, the parliament passed new legislation requiring Supreme Court and Court of Appeal judges to deliver written judgments within six months or face dismissal.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 3 / 4

Detainees and defendants are guaranteed a range of legal rights, which are mostly respected in practice. However, police have reportedly detained suspects without charge for longer than is permitted by the law and have used the threat of extended detention to intimidate suspects. Judicial delays and a large backlog of cases contribute to lengthy trials and other procedures, with many defendants spending years in pretrial detention.

Belize is free from major threats to physical security, such as war and insurgencies, but the long-running border dispute with Guatemala remains unresolved. Tensions have lessened in recent years, but there are occasional incidents.

Belize remains among the countries with the highest per capita murder rates in the world. There was a 24 percent decline in recorded homicides in 2020—likely due to lockdown restrictions aimed at curbing the spread of COVID-19. However, as of the end of 2021, recorded homicides had increased by 23 percent compared to the same period in 2020. Violence is localized around the south side of Belize City, where, in August 2021, a state of emergency was declared due to a spike in shootings. The state of emergency, which increased police authority to investigate and detain any person thought to be participating in criminal activity, remained in place through mid-September.

Cases of police brutality continue to be reported. The Police Amendment Act, promulgated in April 2018, was designed to improve disciplinary procedures, and increase penalties for police misconduct. Between January and August 2021, 14 police officers accused of misconduct were dismissed from the country's police force. However, some critics highlighted that only low-ranking officers were terminated, saying that higher-ranking police officials should face the same scrutiny.

The constitution and laws protect against many forms of discrimination, but there are no specific provisions addressing sexual orientation or gender identity.

Discrimination against LGBT+ people persists. In 2016, the Supreme Court struck down a provision of the criminal code that outlawed same-sex sexual activity. In December 2019, the Court of Appeal upheld the unconstitutionality of the criminal code article and confirmed that constitutional freedom of expression and antidiscrimination protections include sexual orientation. Following the ruling, the government proposed the Equal Opportunities Bill, which would have ensured explicit protections against discrimination for all Belizeans, but the bill was withdrawn in September 2020 after encountering strong opposition from religious groups.

Women face employment discrimination and are less likely than men to hold managerial positions. However, the government has actively pursued programs aimed at encouraging gender equality and protecting women's rights.

Migration into Belize has increased significantly in recent years, and government estimates suggest that up to 15 percent of the country's population is without official documentation. Migrants face legal and social challenges to integration into Belizean society, and some immigrants have faced detention in Belize Central Prison for entering the country illegally. In December 2021, the government announced that an amnesty program would be introduced to allow undocumented immigrants to gain permanent residency under certain conditions.

No separate legal system or laws specifically protect Indigenous people.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 13 / 16G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

The government generally respects freedom of internal movement and foreign travel.

Individuals have the right to own property and establish private businesses. However, legal regulations are at times poorly enforced. Leaders of the Indigenous Maya community say their ancestral land rights are not protected, particularly with regard to oil exploration and logging activities. In 2016 the Belizean government responded to a 2015 Caribbean Court of Justice (CCJ) ruling requiring recognition of Mayan land rights by setting up a commission to facilitate implementation of the court's decision, but progress has been slow. In June 2021, the government was ordered to pay US $6.3 million to the residents of a Maya village after using the village's communal lands for the construction of a road without first acquiring the community's approval as mandated by the CCJ. The following month, Belize tourism authorities removed all references to Maya temples from official websites, allegedly in an attempt to separate Maya imagery from the country's tourism promotion. The decision was reportedly made to more fully comply with the 2015 consent order.

Personal social freedoms are generally respected, though domestic violence remains a serious problem despite government measures to combat it. Rape is illegal, but reporting and conviction rates are low, and sentences are sometimes light.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 3 / 4

Some legal protections against exploitative working conditions are respected and enforced. However, Belizean and foreign women and girls are vulnerable to sex trafficking, and migrant workers are sometimes subjected to forced labor in agriculture, fisheries, and retail businesses. The US State Department's Trafficking in Persons Report for 2021 acknowledged the government's "significant efforts" to combat trafficking but noted that "the government did not demonstrate overall increasing efforts" and stated that "reports of official complicity in trafficking crimes were common."

Benin

Population: 12,600,000

Capital: Porto-Novo

Freedom Status: Partly Free

Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: Benin had been among the most stable democracies in sub-Saharan Africa, but President Patrice Talon began using the justice system to attack his political opponents after taking office in 2016, and new electoral rules and a crackdown on his political opponents enabled him to consolidate his power in 2021. Deadly police violence at political protests, arrests of activists, and other restrictions on civil liberties have become increasingly problematic in recent years.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- In April, Patrice Talon won reelection as president with 86 percent of the vote. The authorities had disqualified, arrested, or forced into exile the major opposition candidates, leaving only two opponents who posed no significant competition.
- After the April presidential election, human rights organizations reported that there had been a wave of ongoing arrests of activists and opposition figures by the authorities, though reports range from 36 to 150 people. Authorities also arrested Nigerian activists in both Benin and Nigeria.
- Reckya Madougou—a well-known prodemocracy campaigner, former justice minister, and 2021 presidential candidate—was arrested and detained in March on spurious terrorism charges for allegedly planning a series of assassination attempts. She was detained for nine months, reportedly in inhumane conditions. In December, Madougou was convicted, despite the prosecutor's lack of evidence or witnesses, and sentenced to 20 years in prison.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 17 / 40 (-4)

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 3 / 12 (-2)

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 1 / 4 (-2)

The president is elected by popular vote for up to two five-year terms and serves as both the chief of state and head of government. In April 2021, Patrice Talon won reelection as president with 86 percent of the vote. The authorities had disqualified, arrested, or forced into exile the major opposition candidates, leaving only two opponents who posed no significant competition. The electoral code adopted in Talon's first term gave elected members of progovernment parties veto power over which candidates qualified for the ballot. Some opposition parties boycotted the election. Peaceful protesters against the unfair and noncompetitive contest were injured, and two people died after security forces fired tear gas and live ammunition into the air. Voter turnout was 50 percent, a historic low for the country's multiparty presidential contests. Observers described election day as "calm" and "orderly."

Constitutional amendments created the largely ceremonial position of vice president in the 2021 election. Mariam Chabi Talata, who ran as Talon's running mate, became the first to hold the office.

Score Change: The score declined from 3 to 1 due to the presidential election, which lacked meaningful opposition.

Delegates to the 83-member, unicameral National Assembly serve four-year terms and are elected by proportional representation. The 2019 legislative elections were neither free nor fair, as new electoral rules effectively prevented all opposition parties from participating. Observers canceled poll-monitoring plans for fear of violence, turnout fell to about a quarter of eligible voters amid an opposition boycott, there was an internet shutdown on election day, and security forces violently suppressed protests before and after balloting, resulting in several deaths.

Only the two progovernment parties, Progressive Union and Republican Bloc, on the ballot won seats. In November 2021, the new National Assembly adopted constitutional amendments, including provisions imposing three-term limits on legislators, expanding the body to 109 seats, and extending terms to five years beginning in 2026 to align them with those of the president. The government ignored the African Court on Human and Peoples' Rights (AfCHPR) call for these amendments' repeal before the presidential election.

Municipal elections were held in 2020, ignoring an AfCHPR order to suspend them and ensure opposition participation. Sébastien Ajavon, a businessman living in exile after receiving a drug trafficking conviction in 2018, had sued after opposition parties were barred from participating. The Progressive Union and the Republican Bloc won most local council seats, while the Cowry Forces for an Emerging Benin (FCBE), the only opposition group to field candidates, won 14 percent of them. In March 2021, despite Benin's 2020 decision to withdraw from its protocol, the AfCHPR ruled in Ajavon's case that Benin had violated its human rights obligations.

Elections are conducted by the Autonomous National Electoral Commission (CENA). Following the passage of a restrictive electoral law in 2018, the Constitutional Court—headed by Talon's former personal lawyer—ruled that parties must obtain a "certificate of conformity" from the Interior Ministry. In 2019, CENA approved only two party lists, both loyal to the president, for the legislative election. Despite electoral and constitutional reforms approved that November, key rules barring opposition parties remained in force.

CENA barred most opposition groups from the 2020 local elections, again favoring progovernment parties.

Due to a 2019 amendment requiring presidential candidates to be endorsed by 10 percent of mayors and members of the National Assembly, the disqualifications of opposition parties in the 2019 and 2020 elections empowered members of Talon's party to disqualify all but two candidates for the 2021 presidential election.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 9 / 16B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 2 / 4

After multiparty elections were restored in 1991, Benin generally had a large number of active political parties. However, the 2018 electoral code established restrictive rules including an unusually high 10 percent national threshold and an onerous increase in obligatory financial deposits. Costs for presidential candidates were reduced in November 2019, but other requirements were introduced, including the need for endorsements and a vice presidential candidate.

All opposition parties were excluded from the 2019 parliamentary contest, though the FCBE gained legal recognition after the election and fielded candidates in the 2020 local elections.

In the 2021 presidential election, the FCBE was able to put forward its candidate Alasane Soumanou. A second opposition party, the Democrats, formed after a split within the FCBE, won recognition in December 2020, but its candidate for president Reckya Madougou was arrested before the election. A candidate for another party was shot shortly after filing his paperwork. The leader of a disqualified front of opposition parties, law professor Joël Aïvo, was arrested shortly after the polls.

Talon's defeat of Lionel Zinsou, former president Thomas Boni Yayi's chosen successor in the 2016 election, marked Benin's fourth presidential transfer of power between rival groups since 1991.

However, Talon's government has since introduced significant obstacles to opposition parties and presidential candidates, including the endorsement rule introduced in 2019, and leading opposition figures have faced harassment and prosecution. In 2019, Boni Yayi fled Benin after release from de facto house arrest, and Zinsou received a prison sentence in absentia and a five-year ban on running for office over alleged 2016 campaign violations. Ajavon and former minister Komi Koutché have also been sentenced in absentia to extensive sentences. Madougou and Aïvo were disqualified from the 2021 presidential ballot and were arrested just before and after the election. In December 2021, they were sentenced to 20 and 10 years in prison, respectively.

Under the 2019 constitutional amendments, no president can serve more than two terms in their life, even if they are nonconsecutive; some alleged this provision was aimed at Boni Yayi.

Politics have generally been free from military interference. The role of personal wealth in politics has increased in recent years, with higher campaign costs and clientelist structures boosting the careers of wealthier politicians. Talon developed his private businesses in part by financing the campaigns of Boni Yayi and other elites and then securing lucrative contracts. After becoming president, Talon allegedly attempted to bribe lawmakers while working to secure passage of constitutional amendments.

Women and minority groups are not legally excluded from political participation, but cultural factors limit women's engagement. Women won just 7 percent of the seats in the 2019 parliamentary elections. Constitutional amendments passed that November reserved 24 seats for women in the next legislative term. Benin's first vice president, Mariam Chabi Talata, is a woman.

Benin has historically been divided between northern and southern ethnic groups, and political parties often rely on ethnic bases of support. Southern-born Talon selected most of his political appointees from the southern Gbe-speaking region. The 2019 election of a southerner as National Assembly president broke with a tradition where legislative leaders and chief executives come from different regions. Vice President Talata is from the north.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 5 / 12 (-2)

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 1 / 4 (-1)

The president and the legislature generally determine government policy. However, the president and legislative representatives were not elected freely or fairly, and the lack of opposition members seriously undermines the legislature's role as an independent branch of government.

The government does not consistently implement policy throughout Benin. In many rural areas, the state struggles to deliver basic services, and citizens instead rely on local customary and religious leaders.

Score Change: The score declined from 2 to 1 because the exclusion of opposition candidates and other serious irregularities during the 2021 presidential election undermined the democratic legitimacy of the incumbent.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 2 / 4

Corruption remains widespread. Corrupt officials rarely face prosecution, contributing to a culture of impunity. In 2020, the National Anti-Corruption Authority (ANLC) was dissolved to be succeeded by the High Commission for the Prevention of Corruption (HCPC), which has the authority to refer corruption cases to court. The law establishing this office also removed aspects of public officials' asset declaration requirements.

The Court of Punishment of Economic Crimes and Terrorism (CRIET) was established in 2018 to prosecute corruption, drug trafficking, and terrorism cases, but critics claim it targets political opponents and journalists.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 2 / 4 (-1)

The 2015 Information and Communication Code provides for public access to government records. However, information deemed sensitive, including national security, trade, and judicial documents, remains restricted.

As required as a West African Economic and Monetary Union member, Benin converted the Chamber of Accounts into a more independent Court of Auditors to examine government finances. The first president of the Court was appointed in April 2021. However, a new law passed in 2020 repealed asset declaration provisions for presidential candidates and government officials, and a June 2021 joint report by the Clingendael Institute and the Armed Conflict Location and Event Data Project (ACLED) indicates that the government is deliberately concealing increasingly violent communal conflicts in the north from the public.

Score Change: The score declined from 3 to 2 due to a lack of progress on asset-declaration compliance, and because the government has not transparently managed its response to security threats.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 42/ 60 (-2)

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 14 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 2 / 4

Constitutional guarantees of freedom of expression are somewhat respected, and print outlets have expressed a wide variety of viewpoints. However, media outlets have encountered new scrutiny and restrictions under the Talon administration.

Defamation remains a crime punishable by fines, and media outlets critical of the government have increasingly risked suspension. The High Authority for Audiovisual Media and Communication (HAAC) in July 2021 lifted the ban of La Nouvelle Tribune, a newspaper that had been closed down in 2018. Major television broadcasters have also been shuttered by the HAAC and remain so, despite court orders reversing those actions. In 2020, the HAAC banned all “unauthorized” online news outlets, suspending three outlets temporarily; others ignored the order.

A 2017 digital media law allows for the prosecution and imprisonment of journalists for online content that is allegedly false or harasses individuals. In 2021, at least five journalists were arrested under this law.

Religious freedom is constitutionally guaranteed and generally respected in practice.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

Academic freedom is largely respected.

There are no major restrictions on personal expression, and individuals generally are not subject to surveillance or reprisals when discussing political or other sensitive matters.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 8 / 12 (-1)

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 2 / 4

Freedom of assembly has traditionally been respected; permit and registration requirements for demonstrations are not always enforced. Security forces violently dispersed opposition protests before the election in 2021 by firing tear gas and live ammunition into the air, resulting in at least two deaths. In 2020, protesters were killed by police in multiple incidents.

Authorities have prevented political opponents from organizing meetings and rallies using restrictions established in 2020 to control the spread of COVID-19. Gatherings of more than 50 people remain banned.

Nongovernmental organizations (NGOs), including human rights groups, generally operate freely, but individual activists have been arrested in increasing numbers. According to reports from Amnesty International, over 12 political figures and activists were arrested leading up to the 2021 presidential election. After the April poll, human rights organizations claimed there had been a wave of ongoing arrests of activists and opposition figures by the authorities, with reports ranging from 36 to 150 people detained.

Beninese NGOs can no longer bring cases to the AfCHPR, after Benin withdrew from a relevant protocol in 2020.

Score Change: The score declined from 4 to 3 because civil society activists were subjected to mass arrests during the election period.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 3 / 4

Workers, except certain civil servants and public employees, have the right to form and join unions, and to bargain collectively, with some restrictions. Public employees in the defense, health, justice, and security sectors are barred from striking; workers in other sectors may strike for a maximum of 10 days per year.

F. RULE OF LAW: 10 / 16 (-1)

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 2 / 4

Although the judiciary has demonstrated some independence, the courts are susceptible to corruption. Judges are not nominated or promoted transparently.

Judicial independence was undermined when President Talon's personal lawyer, Joseph Djogbénou, was named Constitutional Court president in 2018. The court's quick decision to reverse an earlier ruling on public sector strikes intensified concerns about its autonomy, as did a 2019 decision requiring parties to obtain conformity certificates to compete in that year's parliamentary elections.

Critics argue CRIET also lacks independence. Judges were appointed by decree in 2018, in lieu of a transparent confirmation process. A CRIET judge resigned and fled the country in April 2021, complaining that the court is used to prosecute Talon's political opponents.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 2 / 4 (-1)

Due process usually prevails in criminal and civil matters. However, judicial inefficiency, corruption, and a shortage of attorneys in the north inhibit the right to a fair trial. Lack of resources contributes to often lengthy pretrial detentions. Arbitrary arrests and detentions occasionally occur, sometimes with extreme sentencing, particularly in the CRIET.

During the 2021 presidential election period, reports suggest that large numbers of opposition leaders and activists were arrested by the authorities. Reckya Madougou—a well-known prodemocracy campaigner, former justice minister, and presidential candidate—was arrested and detained in March on spurious terrorism charges for allegedly planning a series of assassination attempts. She was detained for nine months, reportedly in inhumane conditions. In December, Madougou was convicted, despite the prosecutor's lack of evidence or witnesses, and sentenced to 20 years in prison. Amnesty International documented at least 12 politically motivated arrests from the start of the year through April.

Score Change: The score declined from 3 to 2 due to reports that large numbers of people, including opposition leaders, activists, and security personnel, were arbitrarily arrested during the election period.

The population is free from war and other major physical threats, though the threat of terrorism may be growing in the north. In December 2021, two soldiers were killed by presumed jihadists in the north, and there has been a rise in violent, sometimes lethal, incidents between herders and farmers in the north.

Prison conditions are harsh. Prisoners face overcrowding, lack of access to food and water, and occasional physical abuse. Police brutality remains a problem, including beatings and torture of suspects. Superiors often shield perpetrators from prosecution.

Relations among Benin's ethnic groups are generally amicable, despite recent political tensions. Minority ethnic groups have typically been represented in government agencies, the civil service, and the armed forces. The constitution prohibits discrimination based on race, gender, and disability, but not sexual orientation. The 1996 penal code imposes a higher age of consent for same-sex sexual activity (21) than for heterosexual activity (13). LGBT+ people face social stigma and discrimination in practice.

Women experience discrimination in employment and access to credit, health care, and education.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 10 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 3 / 4

Individuals can generally move freely throughout Benin. However, in some rural areas, cultural traditions force women to remain indoors for extended periods. Public transport was suspended in 2020 due to COVID-19-related restrictions, but resumed later in the year, while some movement restrictions persisted.

Reforms to the business registration process, anticorruption efforts, and other regulatory changes since 2010 improved the business environment. However, property registration is difficult, and contract enforcement is inconsistent. Despite laws guaranteeing equal rights to inheritance for women, many women are denied the right to inherit property in practice.

Domestic violence remains a serious problem, and women are often reluctant to report domestic abuse. A 2003 law that prohibits female genital mutilation (FGM) was somewhat effective in reducing its occurrence, though the challenge persists. Marriage for those under 18 years old is prohibited, though exceptions are allowed for 14- to 17-year-olds with parental consent. Child marriage and forced marriage remain common in rural areas.

Legal protections against forced labor and other exploitative working conditions are unevenly enforced. Poor conditions are prevalent in the large informal sector, which was impacted by the COVID-19 pandemic. Human trafficking is widespread, despite increased prosecutions for the crime. The practice of sending young girls to wealthy families to work as domestic servants has led to cases of exploitation and sexual slavery. Children are also exploited for agricultural labor and work in various trades.

Bhutan

Population: 800,000

Capital: Thimphu

Freedom Status: Partly Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Bhutan is ruled by a constitutional monarchy that has made significant strides toward democratic consolidation and the rule of law in recent years. It has held multiple credible elections and undergone transfers of power to opposition parties. Ongoing problems include discrimination against Nepali-speaking and non-Buddhist minorities, media self-censorship, and the use of libel and defamation cases to silence journalists.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- The Bhutanese response to the COVID-19 pandemic remained effective during the year. By July, 90 percent of eligible adults received vaccinations. A nationwide lockdown imposed in December 2020 remained in effect into January, though that lockdown remained in effect in the capital of Thimphu until February.
- In February, King Jigme Khesar Namgyel Wangchuck gave royal assent to a penal-code amendment that decriminalized same-sex activity. Parliament had voted in favor of the change in December 2020.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 29 / 40 (-1)

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 10 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 3 / 4

The monarch is head of state, appoints a number of high officials, and retains a waning degree of influence over ministerial positions. King Jigme Khesar Namgyel Wangchuck formally succeeded his father in 2008.

The monarch nominates the leader of the majority party in the elected National Assembly to serve as prime minister. Lotay Tshering of the United Party of Bhutan (DNT) was appointed prime minister in November 2018 after that party won a lower-house majority.

The constitution provides for a bicameral Parliament, with a 25-seat upper house, the National Council, and a 47-seat lower house, the National Assembly. Members of both houses serve five-year terms. The king appoints five members of the nonpartisan National Council, and the remaining 20 are popularly elected as independents. The National Assembly is entirely elected.

The April 2018 National Council election saw record turnout; some observers ascribed the higher turnout to reforms designed to encourage voting and make casting ballots easier for residents, such as a new postal voting system. The National Assembly election was held in two rounds in September and October 2018. The two parties that won the most support in the first round advanced to the second. The DNT, which launched in 2013, won 30 seats. The Bhutan Peace and Prosperity Party (DPT) won 17. The then ruling People's Democratic Party did not advance to the runoff.

Elections are administered by the Election Commission of Bhutan (ECB). The ECB is thought to act impartially, although some of its regulations regarding which parties can compete in elections are controversial.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 12 / 16B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 3 / 4

Citizens must receive government approval to form political parties. Obtaining approval is sometimes difficult and the government has been known to deny it in the past.

The opposition has a realistic chance to win elections, and there is now regular turnover in control of government. In 2018, the DNT won control of Parliament for the first time, and another opposition party, the DPT, finished second, despite having won no seats in 2013.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 3 / 4

India still has influence over the choices of Bhutanese voters and politicians. The Chinese government does not have an official diplomatic relationship with Thimphu but has courted Bhutanese leaders in recent years and has worked to gain control of Bhutanese territory. Chinese forces have constructed villages, military outposts, and infrastructure within Bhutan since 2015 and continued to do so in 2021.

The royal family retains influence, although it has significantly retreated in recent years, refraining from interference with policymaking. Neither the king nor politicians attempted to use the COVID-19 pandemic to consolidate political power.

Electoral rules stipulate that political parties must not be limited to members of any regional, ethnic, or religious group. Citizenship rules are strict, and many Nepali-speaking people have not attained citizenship, effectively disenfranchising them. International election monitors have noted that Nepali speakers have been turned away from voting.

Women are underrepresented in public office; traditional customs inhibit women's political participation, though electoral reforms introduced for the 2018 elections improved female turnout. Programs meant to improve women's political engagement have been supported by the government. Female representation in the National Assembly improved from 8.5 percent before the October and November 2018 elections to 14.9 percent immediately after. Women held 17.4 percent of the lower house as of December 2021.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 8 / 12 (-1)C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 2 / 4 (-1)

Bhutan has made a successful transition from a system in which the monarch dominated governance to one in which policies and legislation are mostly determined by elected officials.

Beijing has widened its effective influence over policymaking in part of Bhutan in recent years. Chinese forces have constructed villages, military outposts, and infrastructure in what is considered Bhutanese territory since 2015, effectively obstructing Thimphu's authority in affected areas.

The Indian government maintains significant influence on Bhutanese policymaking, in part by supplying considerable foreign aid. Thimphu's foreign policy is influenced by a bilateral treaty first signed in 1947.

Score Change: The score declined from 3 to 2 due to the growing presence of Chinese military and other personnel that have effectively occupied Bhutanese territory and obstructed the authority of the elected government.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 3 / 4

The government generally enforces anticorruption laws effectively. The 2006 Anti-Corruption Act established whistleblower protections. The Anti-Corruption Commission (ACC) is tasked with investigating and preventing graft and has successfully prosecuted several high-profile cases.

Nepotism in public procurement and government employment remain problematic.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 3 / 4

The government has strengthened transparency by making the salaries of officials public and making the central and local budgets more open to review. A right to information law passed by the National Assembly in 2014 was designed to put the onus on agencies to release information. However, the National Council still has not approved the bill.

ADDITIONAL DISCRETIONARY POLITICAL RIGHTS QUESTION

Is the government or occupying power deliberately changing the ethnic composition of a country or territory so as to destroy a culture or tip the political balance in favor of another group? -1 / 0

The government has for decades attempted to repress the rights of ethnic Nepalis, forcing many of them to leave Bhutan. The government expelled a large percentage of Nepali speakers in the early 1990s; in 1992, well over 100,000 refugees living in Nepal were denied reentry to Bhutan. A resettlement effort aimed at transferring the refugees to other countries began in 2007, resulting in the resettlement of the majority of refugees. However, 7,000 refugees remain in Nepal, some of whom continue to seek repatriation to Bhutan.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 32 / 60 (+1)

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 9 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 2 / 4

While there are multiple private media outlets, many depend on advertising from state bodies, and the media environment remains subject to a high degree of self-censorship. Powerful individuals can use defamation laws to retaliate against critics.

The Bhutan Information Communications and Media Act 2018 mandated the establishment of an independent Media Council, which became operational in 2019, to monitor the media for harmful content. Press freedom advocates fear the body will erode press freedom and prompt further self-censorship.

The constitution protects freedom of religion, but local authorities are known to harass non-Buddhists. While Bhutanese of all faiths can worship freely in private, some experience pressure to participate in Buddhist ceremonies and practices.

Christian churches have often been unable to obtain registration from the government, which places constraints on their activities.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 2 / 4

Few restrictions on academic freedom have been reported. However, Bhutanese university students are often hesitant to speak out on controversial political issues, including issues related to the monarchy, India, and China, and practice self-censorship.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 3 / 4

Freedom of expression is constitutionally guaranteed and generally respected. However, under the National Security Act, speech that creates or attempts to create “hatred and disaffection among the people” or “misunderstanding or hostility between the government and people,” among other offenses, can be punished with imprisonment. The broad language of the law makes it vulnerable to misuse.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 5 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 2 / 4

The constitution guarantees freedom of assembly, but this right is limited by government-imposed restrictions. Public gatherings require government permission, which is sometimes denied. Curfews and restrictions on the location of demonstrations also serve to curtail assembly rights.

Nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) that work on issues related to ethnic Nepalis are not allowed to operate, but other local and international NGOs work with increasing freedom on a wide range of issues. Under the 2007 Civil Society Organization Act, all new NGOs must register with the government. Registration is granted to NGOs that are determined by the government to be “not harmful to the peace and unity of the country.”

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 1 / 4

The constitution nominally guarantees the right of workers to form unions, but the right to strike is not legally protected. Workers may bargain collectively, and antiunion discrimination is prohibited.

F. RULE OF LAW: 9 / 16 (+1)

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 3 / 4

The independence of the judiciary is largely respected. Senior judges are appointed by the king on the recommendation of the National Judicial Commission. However, the rulings of judges often lack consistency, and many people view the judiciary as corrupt.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 2 / 4

Although the right to a fair trial is largely guaranteed and arbitrary arrest is not a widespread problem, plaintiffs and defendants in civil disputes often represent themselves. Many people who are unable to repay debts are held in detention, which is considered arbitrary under international law.

A number of political prisoners who were detained before Bhutan transitioned to its current democratic system remain imprisoned. In 2019, a campaign group that included members of the Bhutanese diaspora and resettled refugees petitioned for the prisoners' release, but they remained in jail throughout 2021.

Overall, however, the rule of law and due process has improved substantially in civil and criminal matters, and Bhutanese courts are relatively effective.

The civilian police force generally operates within the law, and incidents of excessive force are rare. In recent years, crime rates have generally been low. However, insurgents from the Indian state of Assam sometimes enter Bhutan and undermine security. Occasional instances of kidnapping and robbery occur along the border with India.

The constitution protects against discrimination based on sex, race, disability, language, religion, or societal status. However, Nepali-speaking people reportedly face employment discrimination and other forms of bias.

LGBT+ people experience societal discrimination and social stigma. There are no specific legal protections for transgender people. In December 2020, both houses of Parliament completed a final vote to repeal criminal-code provisions that criminalized same-sex relations. The king gave his assent in February 2021.

Discrimination in employment and education persists for Bhutanese women.

Score Change: The score improved from 1 to 2 because legislation that decriminalized same-sex sexual activity took effect during the year.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 9 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 2 / 4

Bhutanese citizens generally have the freedom to travel domestically and internationally. However, the government has established different categories of citizenship, which restricts foreign travel for some. These restrictions reportedly have the greatest effect on Nepali speakers. Bhutanese security forces sometimes arrest Nepali people seeking to enter the country.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 3 / 4

Individuals generally have rights to own property and establish businesses, but the process of registering property or a new business can be cumbersome and hinder business development. In recent years, the legal system has become more consistent, and establishing businesses has become easier. However, some ethnic Nepalis who lack a security clearance certificate face difficulties in starting a business.

Reports of domestic violence have increased in recent years, with an additional rise in 2021 attributed to a COVID-19 lockdown. Societal taboos lead many incidents of rape and domestic violence to go unreported. Child marriage still occurs with some frequency.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 2 / 4

Female household workers, who often come from rural areas or India, are vulnerable to forced labor and other abuse, as are foreign workers in the construction and hydropower sectors. Child labor persists, mostly in the agriculture and construction sectors.

The US State Department's Trafficking in Persons Report 2021 noted that the Bhutanese government finalized a trafficking prevention strategy and improved funding for shelters but did not meaningfully expand its overall antitrafficking efforts. No trafficking convictions were secured, nor were new cases initiated, during the State Department's reporting period.

Sex trafficking remains a problem; Bhutanese antitrafficking legislation does not criminalize all forms of this practice.

Bolivia

Population: 11,800,000

Capital: La Paz (administrative), Sucre (judicial)

Freedom Status: Partly Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Bolivia is a democracy where credible elections have been held regularly. While mass protests and violence erupted after the disputed 2019 elections, new general elections held in 2020 and subnational elections held in 2021 were credible and fair, and stakeholders accepted the results. Child labor and violence against women are persistent problems, independent and investigative journalists face harassment, and the judiciary is highly politicized and hampered by corruption.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- Subnational elections held in March and April were competitive and credible, and polling took place peacefully. Although the Movement for Socialism (MAS) remained the largest party in the country, it lost mayoral races in the largest cities and most of the country's gubernatorial elections.
 - In March, former interim president Jeanine Áñez was detained on numerous charges, including terrorism and sedition; several members of her cabinet were also indicted. At year's end, Áñez had not received a trial date and was still being held in preventive detention.
 - The Interdisciplinary Group of Independent Experts (GIEI)—commissioned through an agreement between the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights (IACHR) and the Bolivian government to investigate human rights violations between September and December 2019—released its final report in August. The report found that numerous human rights violations were committed during the 2019 political unrest, including by both the Áñez administration and state security forces.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 27 / 40A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 10 / 12*A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

Bolivia's president is both chief of state and head of government, and is directly elected to a five-year term. The presidential election in October 2020 took place after the results of the 2019 election was annulled. Early results of the October 2019 presidential election suggested that a runoff between incumbent Evo Morales of the Movement for Socialism (MAS) and the main opposition candidate, former president Carlos Mesa of the Comunidad Ciudadana (Citizen Community) party, was likely. Soon after, election officials released an updated vote count showing Morales with an outright victory, prompting mass demonstrations. An Organization of American States (OAS) electoral observation mission criticized the tally that showed Morales with an outright victory, saying it contradicted independent counts and that a runoff round should go forward—though the credibility of this criticism has since been disputed by some independent analysts.

In November 2019, as protests, counterprotests, and accompanying violence intensified in the weeks following the October poll, Morales, vice president Álvaro García Linera, and the heads of the Senate and the lower chamber resigned, after Morales lost the support of the military and police forces. Days later, Jeanine Áñez Chavez, a senior senator and the highest-ranking official in the line of succession who had not yet resigned, was endorsed by the Plurinational Constitutional Tribunal (TCP) to assume the presidency on an interim basis. Áñez indicated that she would only serve until a new election could be held, though in January 2020, she announced her candidacy for president in the next election. She eventually withdrew from the race in September 2020.

An agreement between the interim government and the parliament, mediated by the United Nations, the European Union (EU), and the Catholic Church, established a new election date and a new Supreme Electoral Tribunal (TSE), whose actions were widely considered independent and free from undue political influence. The election was supposed to be held in May 2020; however, it was postponed until October due to the COVID-19 pandemic. The results of the October 2020 poll showed a clear victory for MAS candidate Luis Arce, who won over 55 percent of the vote, precluding the need for a runoff. Former president Mesa won 28 percent of the vote. Voter turnout was recorded at 84 percent. Multiple independent observer missions deemed the poll credible and fair, and competing parties and civil society stakeholders accepted the results.

The Plurinational Legislative Assembly (ALP) consists of a 130-member Chamber of Deputies and a 36-member Senate. Legislative terms are five years.

Due to allegations of irregularities in the 2019 general elections, the results of the vote for legislative representatives were considered invalid, and in November 2019, the ALP unanimously passed a law calling for new legislative elections to be held in October 2020. In those elections, the MAS won 75 of the 130 seats in the Chamber of Deputies and 21 seats in the Senate. The Citizen Community party secured 39 seats in the lower house and 11 seats in the upper house, and the new We Believe (Creemos) alliance won 16 and 4 seats in the Chamber of Deputies and the Senate, respectively.

The final report of the OAS on the 2019 elections claimed that the elections' overall results were not verifiable, due to "willful manipulation" abetted by a biased TSE. However, in 2020 the methodology and credibility of the OAS report was disputed by a wide range of independent analysts. After Morales's resignation in November 2019, the parliament agreed on a transparent formula to reconstitute an independent TSE in December of that year.

In the 2020 elections, the TSE's actions were widely considered independent and free from undue political influence. Though the day of the vote was postponed twice due to the coronavirus pandemic, the body nevertheless administered a safe vote with high turnout.

For years, Bolivian politics were characterized by MAS efforts to abolish presidential term limits. In 2017, MAS lawmakers overturned the articles in the constitution setting presidential term limits by consulting the TCP, a body the lawmakers themselves had appointed, despite voters rejecting this measure by referendum in 2016. In June 2021, the IACHR found that—despite TCP claims that presidential term limitations infringe upon the political rights of former presidents seeking reelection and of their supporters—such term limitations do not violate rights protected by the American Convention on Human Rights.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 10 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 3 / 4

Citizens have the right to organize political parties. MAS has dominated politics since Morales's election to the presidency in 2005, drawing support from social movements, trade unions, and civil society actors. Morales's maneuvers to achieve a reelection bid were a core issue in the rancorous 2019 campaign period. The most prominent opposition party, Citizen Community, attracted individuals who opposed his persistent efforts to extend his term.

In January 2020, Luis Fernando Camacho—the regional leader from Santa Cruz who led the mass protests against Morales in 2019—founded the Creemos alliance. Creemos quickly became the leading party in Santa Cruz, Bolivia's richest region.

There are no formal institutional barriers that prevent opposition parties from participating in elections. Between 2005 and 2019, however, the overwhelming dominance of the MAS, aided by its use of public resources to back its campaigns, made it difficult for opposition parties to gain power through elections. MAS candidates achieved sweeping victories in the local elections held in March 2021, but lost the mayoral races in Bolivia's largest cities, and in most gubernatorial races.

In the 2019 presidential election, the OAS observer mission claimed that the results of the vote were manipulated by the TSE in order to prevent a runoff between Morales and Mesa, the second-place candidate. However, in 2020, independent researchers found that methodological errors significantly affected the OAS's results; when the errors were corrected, the researchers found no evidence of electoral fraud. Elections held in 2020 were generally considered to be free and fair.

People are generally free to make political decisions without undue influence from the military, foreign powers, or other influential groups. Although several violent confrontations occurred between supporters of competing parties in the run-up to the 2020 election, leaders of all parties called for their supporters to allow everyone to campaign freely and peacefully in each region. The interventions, protests, roadblocks, and violence that preceded and followed the 2019 elections were not as severe in 2020 and were mostly absent in 2021. However, tensions remained high throughout the year, leading to concern about potential confrontation between MAS supporters and supporters of the regionalist movement led by Camacho during political demonstrations in Santa Cruz.

Adult citizens enjoy universal and equal suffrage.

The constitution recognizes 36 Indigenous nationalities within a plurinational state, and formalizes political autonomy in Indigenous territories. Indigenous groups are well represented in government, and seven seats are reserved for Indigenous peoples in the Chamber of Deputies. However, the interests of Indigenous groups are often overlooked by politicians.

Formally, Bolivia has progressive legislation that guarantees equal political representation for women and seeks to protect them from political violence. While women are well represented in politics, holding 46 percent of seats in the Chamber of Deputies and nearly 56 percent of those in the Senate, sexism and patriarchal attitudes undermine their work, particularly at local levels.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 7 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 3 / 4

Elected officials are free to set and implement government policy without undue interference from nonstate actors. However, opposition members charge that the MAS majority in the legislature has opened the space for strong executive influence on legislative processes, closing the possibility of debating policy at the legislative level.

Historically, powerful social movements have been able to exert pressure on the ALP to prevent the adoption of policies seen as detrimental to their interests. In September and October 2021, numerous civic movements and economic interest groups mobilized to protest against a bill the ALP had passed in August to “fight the legitimization of illicit profits.” The bill was repealed in November, and MAS lawmakers claimed that the leaders of the civic committees had used violence and misinformation to interfere with the MAS majority government and achieve their own political goals.

Anticorruption laws are poorly enforced, and corruption affects a range of government entities and economic sectors, including law enforcement bodies and extractive industries. Public procurement processes are frequently compromised by bribery.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 2 / 4

Bolivia has no law guaranteeing access to public information. Elected officials by law must make asset declarations, but these are unavailable to the public.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 39 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 14 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 2 / 4

While the constitution guarantees freedom of expression, in practice, journalists encounter harassment in connection with critical or investigative reporting. Media outlets critical of the government faced harassment from administration officials during the Morales and Áñez presidencies. Similar harassment continued in 2021 under the Arce administration, which has characterized journalists as liars and independent media outlets as political actors.

Bolivia's National Press Association (ANP) documented numerous cases of violence against journalists in 2021. In October, several journalists were assaulted and briefly held captive by a group of armed men while reporting on a land dispute in Santa Cruz; the attack led several international press organizations to call on the Bolivian government to establish security mechanisms to protect members of the media.

In August, the ALP passed a draft law on illicit proceeds that contained an article that press freedom organizations feared would jeopardize existing confidentiality protections legally guaranteed for journalistic sources. The law was vetoed in November.

Freedom of religion is guaranteed by the constitution and generally upheld in practice. The 2009 constitution ended the Roman Catholic Church's official status, and created a secular state.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

Academic freedom is legally guaranteed and upheld in practice.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 4 / 4

Private discussion is robust and generally free from interference or surveillance.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 9 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 3 / 4

Bolivian law protects the right to peaceful assembly. However, many past protests have been marred by clashes between demonstrators and police, as well as physical confrontations between protesters and counterprotesters around divisive issues.

Widespread protests during the 2019 elections were characterized by high levels of violence among protesters, counterprotesters, and security forces. A report issued in August 2021 by the GIEI, commissioned through an agreement between the IACHR and the Bolivian government, found that during the protests that led to Morales's resignation, his administration facilitated the transport of its supporters and provided them with materials and weapons to use against the opposition, causing grave human rights violations.

Additional security forces were deployed by the interim government after Morales's resignation to disperse protesting Morales sympathizers, who at times also fought with opposition supporters. The use of force by authorities during the 2019 postelectoral unrest resulted in hundreds of injuries and the deaths of at least 30 people. The IACHR and the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights (OHCHR) reported that police had committed serious human rights violations.

In August and September 2021, Indigenous activists from the lowlands marched to Santa Cruz to protest against MAS policies of land distribution affecting Indigenous territory, and to present a list of related demands to the government; the protesters' demands were not met before they left Santa Cruz at the end of the year. Though several protests occurred in 2020 and 2021, including antigovernment demonstrations, they were not marred by the high levels of violence seen in previous years.

Many nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) operate but are subject to some legal restrictions. In 2016, the TCP dismissed a petition arguing that two statutes in the country's NGO laws gave the government license to dissolve NGOs. Government officials from all political affiliations have at times smeared rights groups as antigovernment conspirators.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 3 / 4

Labor and peasant unions are an active force wielding significant political influence.

The country's official labor code is inconsistent with Bolivian law; for example, it prohibits public sector unions, yet many public sector workers are able to legally unionize. A National Labor Court hears cases of antiunion discrimination, but tends to hand down verdicts slowly, and penalties for antiunion discrimination are not consistently applied.

F. RULE OF LAW: 6 / 16F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 1 / 4

Bolivia stands as the sole country that appoints justices via popular elections. However, judges on the Supreme Court, the TCP, and other entities are first nominated through a two-thirds vote in the legislature. For years, this allowed MAS to dominate the candidate selection process, producing a lenient judiciary. The popular election of judges has politicized and factionalized appointments, creating further opportunities for corruption. In addition to its politicization, the judiciary remains overburdened and beset by corruption.

The use of the judiciary to prosecute opposition leaders was a common practice during the Morales administration and continued under interim president Áñez's government, which pressured prosecutors to pursue criminal cases against hundreds of individuals associated with the Morales administration. An arrest warrant for Morales, issued in December 2019, was annulled following the MAS victory in the October 2020 elections. In October 2020, the outgoing legislature approved the indictment of 11 ministers from the interim government, and recommended that interim president Áñez be prosecuted for her role in worsening the election-related violence in 2019. Áñez was arrested on multiple charges in March 2021, including conspiracy, sedition, and terrorism; she remained in prison at year's end. The Arce administration has also accused several opposition leaders elected in the March 2021 local elections, including Camacho, of terrorism, conspiracy, and sedition.

The August 2021 GIEI report on the 2019 political crisis found that a lack of independence, transparency, and objectivity in the exercise of criminal prosecutions—often used against political opponents—constitutes a structural and endemic problem of the Bolivian judiciary.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 1 / 4

Many people have difficulty accessing the justice system because they lack resources to travel to courts and other relevant offices, and also because services, where provided, are often insufficient and inefficient. In criminal matters, people accused of committing crimes can go years before they have a formal trial; interim president Áñez, who was arrested in March 2021, remained in preventive detention and had not received a trial date at year's end. Police are poorly paid and receive inadequate training, and corruption within the police force remains a problem.

In February 2021, the ALP approved a presidential decree issuing an amnesty for those prosecuted by the Áñez government for crimes related to the 2019 political unrest. Human rights groups have criticized the amnesty, claiming that it “appears designed to favor” MAS supporters and will lead to impunity for serious crimes committed during the 2019 crisis.

Morales supporters and opponents fought violently in several cities following the 2019 elections and Morales’s resignation. Both sympathizers and detractors of Morales had access to explosives, including dynamite, homemade rocket launchers, and Molotov cocktails, and used them against each other and the security forces. Morales opponents were reportedly shot at by unidentified persons in the localities of Montero and Vila Vila. The houses of journalists and activists who had been critical of Morales were burnt, as were a number of public buses in La Paz. After the installation of the interim government, the houses of MAS supporters and former officials were also burnt. Though the country remains polarized, a political dialogue backed by the EU, the UN, and the Episcopal Conference, among others, allowed the violence to decrease before reaching the point of civil war or insurgency.

The 2010 antiracism law contains measures to combat discrimination and impose criminal penalties for discriminatory acts. However, racism and associated discrimination is common in the country, especially against Indigenous groups.

Bolivia has laws in place that prohibit discrimination against LGBT+ people. However, these laws are rarely enforced, and LGBT+ people experience widespread societal discrimination. Chi Hyun Chung, a Presbyterian minister who ran for president in 2019 and 2020, included an anti-LGBT+ rights agenda as part of his platform; he came in third in 2019 but lost most of his support in 2020.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 10 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 3 / 4

There are no formal limits on people’s ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education, but choices can be limited by socioeconomic difficulties. Roads are occasionally blockaded as part of protest actions, impeding free movement.

Women enjoy the same formal rights to property ownership as men, but discrimination is common, leading to disparities in property ownership and access to resources.

The rights of Indigenous people to prior consultation in cases of natural resource extraction and land development are not fully upheld by law or in practice.

The constitution reserves marriage as a bond between a man and a woman, and makes no provision for same-sex civil unions. However, in July 2020, the Second Constitutional Chamber of the La Paz Department Tribunal overturned a decision of the civil registry office denying a same-sex couple registration of their civil union, which was later officially approved.

Gender-based violence is a serious problem, and laws criminalizing violence against women are not well enforced. More than 100 femicides took place in Bolivia in 2021. In August, the GIEI reported that numerous cases of sexual and gender-based violence had occurred during the 2019 political crisis, and recommended that the government make the investigation of such crimes a priority. Many women lack access to birth control and reproductive health care.

Bolivia is a source country for the trafficking of men, women, and children for forced labor and prostitution, and the country faced international criticism over permissive legislation regarding child labor in 2018, when the country changed the minimum working age to 14 years old.

Bosnia and Herzegovina

Population: 3,500,000

Capital: Sarajevo

Freedom Status: Partly Free

Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: Bosnia and Herzegovina (BiH) is a highly decentralized parliamentary republic whose complex constitutional regime is embedded in the Dayton Peace Agreement, which ended the 1992–95 Bosnian War. Political affairs are characterized by severe partisan gridlock among nationalist leaders from the country's Bosniak, Serb, and Croat communities. Political participation by citizens from other communities is extremely limited. Corruption remains a serious problem in the government and elsewhere in society.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- In July, High Representative Valentin Inzko imposed a law prohibiting genocide denial related to the 1995 Srebrenica genocide in particular, but also denial of crimes against humanity and war crimes more broadly. The law was welcomed by some political actors and by genocide awareness activists, but it drew strong opposition from Serb nationalist leaders in the Republika Srpska (RS) entity.
- In October, Serb nationalist leader Milorad Dodik announced that the RS would withdraw from BiH's military, its top judiciary body, and its tax administration, prompting renewed fears of a secession crisis.
- US-led talks on the adoption of a new elections law collapsed in December, after less than four months. The initiative aimed to address court rulings against ethnic representation provisions in the 1995 constitution that exclude some segments of the population from certain offices, including the presidency.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 19 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 6 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 2 / 4

The 1995 Dayton Accords that ended the war in BiH reorganized the state as a combination of two autonomous entities—the Federation of BiH, whose residents are mainly Bosniak and Croat, and the Serb-dominated Republika Srpska (RS)—that operate under a weak central government. The position of head of state is held by a three-member presidency comprising one Bosniak, one Serb, and one Croat; they are each elected to a four-year term, which they serve concurrently.

The chair of the Council of Ministers, or prime minister, is nominated by the presidency and approved by the House of Representatives. The chair in turn nominates other ministers for approval by the House.

BiH's most recent general elections, in October 2018, were again dominated by the country's three entrenched nationalist blocs: the Bosniak nationalist Party of Democratic Action (SDA), the Croat nationalist Croatian Democratic Union (HDZ BiH), and the Serb nationalist Alliance of Independent Social Democrats (SNSD). Milorad Dodik of the SNSD, the longtime president of the RS entity, won the Serb seat in BiH's state presidency, and Šefik Džaferović of the SDA won the Bosniak seat. However, Željko Komšić of the center-left Democratic Front party decisively defeated the HDZ-BiH incumbent for the Croat seat of the presidency. International observers raised concerns about the integrity of the elections, including about a high number of ballots disqualified by the Central Electoral Commission (CIK).

The resulting government, formed in December 2019 after lengthy negotiations, was headed by Zoran Tegeltija of the SNSD. At the end of 2021, over three years after the elections, the Federation entity had yet to form its new government. The next general elections were scheduled for October 2022.

The Parliamentary Assembly, a state-level body, has two chambers. The 15-seat upper house, the House of Peoples, consists of five members from each of the three main ethnic groups, elected by the Federation and RS legislatures for four-year terms. The lower house, the House of Representatives, has 42 popularly elected members serving four-year terms, with 28 seats assigned to representatives from the Federation and 14 to representatives from the RS.

While the SDA, HDZ BiH, and SNSD dominated the 2018 general elections, they faced significant competition from other parties, particularly the Social Democratic Party (SDP). Election monitors noted significant irregularities and a decline in overall quality as compared with prior polls. Turnout was down slightly, at about 53 percent.

In the 2020 municipal elections, opposition parties won breakthrough victories in Sarajevo, Banja Luka, and Tomislavgrad, among several other municipalities. In Mostar's special election, the HDZ- and SDA-backed lists came in first and second, respectively. However, the opposition BH Bloc, composed of the SDP and Naša Stranka (Our Party), also secured 6 seats in the 35-seat city assembly. The HDZ BiH took the mayoralty after the SDA-led and SDP–Our Party lists were unable to commit to a joint candidate. Mostar's municipal elections ended a 12-year period in which local polls were not held due to an unresolved legal dispute over the allocation of city council seats between Croats and Bosniaks.

The CIK administers elections with the help of municipal election commissions. Both are subject to significant political party interference. The CIK is a largely ineffectual body, unable to act decisively without political support.

Conflicts over fair ethnic representation surround aspects of the constitution and electoral laws. For example, BiH citizens who do not identify as members of the country's Bosniak, Serb, or Croat "constitutive peoples" remain barred from the presidency and membership in the House of Peoples, despite 2009 and 2016 rulings by the European Court of Human Rights that the exclusion of members of other ethnic groups violated the European Convention on Human Rights.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 9 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 3 / 4

Political parties typically organize and operate freely, though the political arena in the Federation is generally limited to Bosniaks and Croats, while Serbs control politics in the RS. Coalitions at all levels of government shift frequently, but incumbent parties have maintained their positions with the help of vast patronage networks, making it difficult for smaller reform-oriented groupings to achieve meaningful gains.

While there are no explicit legal barriers preventing opposition parties from entering government, expansive veto powers granted to the constitutive peoples and their representatives have helped the dominant nationalist parties to manipulate the system and shut out reformist or multiethnic challengers. However, in the 2020 municipal elections, opposition parties made breakthroughs in Sarajevo, Banja Luka, Tomislavgrad, and several other locales, as well as in Mostar's special election.

In addition to domestic problems like the politicization of public resources and the influence of corrupt patronage networks, certain foreign powers wield outsized influence in the Bosnian political sphere. The governments of Serbia and Croatia exert leverage through their respective local allies, the SNSD and the HDZ BiH. The Russian and Turkish governments have also offered support to preferred parties and candidates.

The Office of the High Representative (OHR), which was created by the Dayton Accords, operates under the auspices of the United Nations and has the authority to remove elected officials if they are deemed to be obstructing the peace process. In July 2021, the OHR made its first major intervention in Bosnian politics in nearly a decade with the imposition of a law that criminalized the denial and glorification of genocide. The law was welcomed by genocide survivors and genocide-awareness activists in BiH and around the world, but it prompted a significant backlash from Serb nationalists in the country.

Political rights in BiH are in large part contingent on one's ethnic background and place of residence. Jews and Roma are constitutionally barred from the presidency and from membership in the House of Peoples, despite the European Court of Human Rights rulings against those provisions. Serbs who live in the Federation and Croats and Bosniaks who live in the RS are also excluded from the presidency. Some Croats argue that their rights to representation are violated by electoral laws allowing non-Croats a significant voice in the selection of the Croat member of the presidency and Croat members of the House of Peoples. Critics of the Croat nationalist HDZ BiH, however, counter that the party has manipulated the discourse surrounding this issue to obstruct civic and liberal reforms of the country's constitutional order.

Women are underrepresented in politics and government. As a result, debates pertaining to maternal health and domestic violence are rarely at the center of parliamentary discussion, although they are openly, if infrequently, discussed in the media. LGBT+ people are marginalized in formal political life, but LGBT+ rights groups are active in the civic sphere.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 4 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 2 / 4

Government formation and policy implementation are seriously impeded by the country's complex system of ethnic representation. Under the Dayton Accords, representatives from each of the three major ethnic groups, at both the state and entity levels, may exercise a veto on legislation deemed harmful to their interests. The state government is also undercut by movements within each of BiH's entities for greater autonomy.

Dodik, who serves as the Serb member of the state-level presidency and holds significant influence in the RS, continues to speak openly of his desire for the RS to secede from BiH. In October 2021, he announced the RS's withdrawal from various federal institutions, notably including the military, prompting fears of a secession crisis. The move came largely in response to the OHR's law against genocide denial and was the latest in a series of escalating efforts to chip away at the functionality of the BiH state.

Corruption remains widespread and systemic, and legislation designed to combat the problem is poorly enforced. When corruption probes are actually opened, they rarely result in convictions.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 1 / 4

Government operations remain largely inaccessible to the public. Procurement awards are often made in secret, and public institutions frequently fail to comply with freedom of information laws. Candidates for major offices are obliged to make financial disclosures, but the relevant laws are weak, and the resulting disclosures are widely considered unreliable. Debate and decisions on matters of public interest, including legislation and subjects pertaining to European Union (EU) accession, routinely occur during interparty negotiations that take place behind closed doors, outside of government institutions.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 34 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 10 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 2 / 4

Freedom of expression is legally guaranteed but limited in practice. Journalists face political pressure as well as harassment, threats, and occasional assaults in the course of their work. There is a large private media sector, including outlets that are affiliated with local political parties and those that belong to major international news networks. Public broadcasters in both entities, and at the canton level, often operate as partisan platforms; this is especially pronounced with the entity broadcaster in the RS, Radio-Television Republika Srpska (RTRS), whose coverage serves the interests of the SNSD.

Religious freedom is not subject to formal restrictions, but in practice religious communities face some discrimination in areas where they constitute a minority. Acts of vandalism against religious sites continue to be reported.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 2 / 4

The education system is racked by corruption and clientelism, and the curriculum is politicized at all levels of education. At some schools in the Federation, Bosniak and Croat students are still divided into separate classes along ethnic lines. Some Bosniak returnees in the RS have sent their children to temporary alternative schools to avoid curriculums they find discriminatory, and some Serb families have described discriminatory educational environments in the Federation.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 3 / 4

Freedom of expression for individuals is generally protected from overt government interference. However, peer pressure and the risk of an adverse public reaction remain significant curbs on the discussion of sensitive topics.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 7 / 12E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 3 / 4

Freedom of assembly is generally respected in BiH, and peaceful protests are common. However, demonstrators sometimes encounter administrative obstacles or police violence, and organizers can become targets of police or political harassment.

For the third year in a row, Sarajevo hosted an LGBT+ pride parade that proceeded without incident. A counterdemonstration by conservative and religious groups was also permitted to take place, but police kept it away from the main parade route.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 2 / 4

The nongovernmental organization (NGO) sector in BiH remains robust but is sometimes exposed to government pressure and interference, with conditions more difficult in the RS.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 2 / 4

Labor unions operate freely in the whole of BiH, although workers often have limited bargaining power in practice. The right to strike is legally protected, but labor laws in the Federation pose significant barriers to the exercise of this right. Legal protections against antiunion action by employers are weakly enforced. The leading political blocs in the country exercise significant control over unions in their respective strongholds.

F. RULE OF LAW: 7 / 16F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 1 / 4

The judiciary is formally independent but weak in practice. Dozens of Constitutional Court decisions have been disregarded by political leaders, as has some jurisprudence from the European Court of Human Rights. Individual judges are also subject to political pressure, interference, and intimidation regarding the cases before them. The High Judicial and Prosecutorial Council of Bosnia and Herzegovina (HJPC), which appoints judges, has been racked by scandal and is widely perceived as corrupt. The HJPC was among the state institutions from which the RS intended to withdraw, according to Dodik's October 2021 announcement.

The existence of four separate court systems—for BiH, the RS, the Federation, and the self-governing Brčko District—contributes to overall inefficiency.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 2 / 4

Guarantees of due process are inconsistently upheld, with judges often failing to manage trials effectively and contributing to extensive delays. Access to adequate legal counsel can be contingent on one's financial standing. Police corruption is a problem and sometimes stems from links to organized crime. Public prosecutors are widely reputed to be corrupt and under political control.

The process of prosecuting war crimes in domestic courts has been slow, with political interference and courts' lack of resources and capacity exacerbating a large backlog of cases. Despite efforts to reinvigorate the process, impunity for war crimes including killings and sexual violence has persisted.

In September 2021, the HJPC removed the country's chief prosecutor, Gordana Tadić, from her post for negligence. She was accused of working to shield individuals presumed to be under the protection the HDZ BiH from prosecution.

Although overall violent crime rates are low, organized crime is a significant problem, and high-profile incidents in recent years have fueled public frustration with the police and judicial system. Members of vulnerable groups are subject to harassment by police, including migrants transiting through the country. Many prisons are overcrowded or feature other substandard conditions, and detainees face physical abuse by prison authorities. Active land mines dating to the 1990s continue to pose a threat to civilians in rural parts of the country.

Laws guaranteeing equal treatment are unevenly upheld. Discrimination against members of the Romany minority is widespread. People who returned to their homes after being displaced during the war face discrimination in employment and housing in regions where their ethnic group constitutes a minority; Bosniak returnees in the RS entity face notable discrimination and harassment. Bosniaks and Croats in the RS more generally experience difficulties in accessing social services. Women are legally entitled to full equality with men but encounter discrimination in the workplace in practice. Members of the LGBT+ community face discrimination, harassment, and occasional physical attacks, and authorities often fail to adequately investigate and prosecute crimes against LGBT+ people.

Tens of thousands of migrants, refugees, and asylum seekers have arrived in the country each year since 2018. While the vast majority travel on to other locations, thousands remain stranded in BiH, most of whom live in squalid camps that lack basic services or protection against the elements. Authorities in the RS have refused to allow any migrant centers, and the burden of care has been thrust almost entirely on a handful of municipalities in the country's northwest. Many migrants are exposed to routine violence by local authorities, as well as by Croatian border guards who have repeatedly been accused of illegal pushbacks into BiH.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 10 / 16G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 3 / 4

The law protects freedom of movement, though there are minor barriers to the exercise of this right—for example, taxis will generally not take passengers across the border between the two entities. Bureaucratic hurdles make registering new domiciles a tedious and lengthy process. Land mines limit movement in some areas.

Although the legal framework broadly supports property rights and private business activity, widespread corruption and patronage remain major barriers to free enterprise. Individuals who returned to their homes after being displaced by the 1992–95 war have faced attacks on their property. The European Commission has called for further progress on compensating people for property that cannot be returned.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 3 / 4

Individual freedoms on personal status matters such as marriage and divorce are generally protected. Same-sex marriage is not recognized, though in 2020 the Federation government appointed a working group to consider ways to acknowledge such partnerships.

Domestic violence remains a serious concern despite some government efforts to combat it. Incidents of abuse are believed to be considerably underreported, and civic groups have found that law enforcement authorities are often reluctant to intervene or impose strong penalties.

Legal protections against exploitative working conditions are poorly enforced. Patronage and clientelism continue to adversely affect hiring practices and contribute to de facto restrictions on economic opportunity.

The US State Department's annual Trafficking in Persons Report has found that both Bosnian and foreign adults and children are subject to trafficking for the purposes of sexual exploitation and forced labor in BiH, with Romany children particularly vulnerable to forced begging and forced marriages that amount to domestic servitude. The 2021 report noted improved resources for antitrafficking efforts, including identifying and prosecuting traffickers. However, it criticized the slow pace of reforms in the RS and the Brčko District.

Botswana

Population: 2,300,000

Capital: Gaborone

Freedom Status: Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: While it is considered one of the most stable democracies in Africa, Botswana has been dominated by a single party since independence. Media freedom remains under threat. The indigenous San people, as well as migrants, refugees, and LGBT+ people, face discrimination.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- In August, the High Court acquitted former intelligence agent Welheminah “Butterfly” Maswabi of corruption charges after finding that she had been prosecuted based on fabricated evidence. The court also recommended that the government take action against implicated state officials.
- The controversial Emergency Powers Act (EPA), which was introduced in early 2020 to address the spread of COVID-19 and included provisions prohibiting strikes and the dissemination of false pandemic-related news, was lifted in September.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 28 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 10 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 3 / 4

The president is indirectly elected by the National Assembly for a five-year term and is eligible for reelection. The vice president is appointed by the president and confirmed by the National Assembly. The president holds significant power, including the authority to prolong or dismiss the National Assembly. In 2018, Vice President Mokgweetsi Masisi was named interim president when the term of predecessor Ian Khama expired. The Botswana Democratic Party (BDP) won a majority of parliamentary seats in the October 2019 elections. Masisi was sworn into office that November.

Parliament includes a unicameral, 65-seat National Assembly and an advisory House of Chiefs. Voters directly elect 57 National Assembly members to five-year terms, while 6 members are nominated by the president and approved by the National Assembly. The president and attorney general are ex officio members. The 34-member House of Chiefs is composed mostly of traditional leaders, representatives they elect, and representatives appointed by the president. It advises legislators on tribal issues, land matters, and the constitution.

The BDP won 38 National Assembly seats with 52.7 percent of the vote in the October 2019 elections, while the Umbrella for Democratic Change (UDC) won 15 seats and 35.9 percent, the Botswana Patriotic Front (BPF) won 3 seats and 4.4 percent, and the Alliance of Progressives (AP) won 1 seat and 5.1 percent.

Southern African Development Community (SADC) and African Union (AU) observers called the poll free and fair but criticized the lack of indelible ink and the use of translucent ballot boxes. The UDC claimed that voters were allowed to cast multiple ballots, and that voters and election officials were bribed. The UDC petitioned the High Court to throw the results out, but their case was dismissed in December 2019. The Court of Appeal agreed to hear the matter in January 2020, but dismissed it later that month, citing a lack of jurisdiction.

The Independent Electoral Commission (IEC) administers elections and is generally considered independent and capable. However, the IEC was affected by budgetary constraints and a staff shortage during the 2019 electoral period, impacting its voter-education and registration drives.

The Electoral Amendment Act of 2016 (EAA), which mandated electronic voting for the 2019 elections, caused controversy after its passage. The opposition Botswana Congress Party (BCP) claimed that electronic voting was susceptible to pro-BDP manipulation and threatened to boycott the 2019 polls. The government withdrew the electronic-voting mandate and other provisions of the EAA in 2018, and the BCP settled a lawsuit against the government in 2019.

In December 2021, President Masisi appointed a commission to review Botswana's constitution. The long-awaited constitutional review process could potentially address electoral reforms, which opposition groups say are necessary to ensure free and fair elections.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 10 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 3 / 4

The right of political parties to form and operate is legally guaranteed and is respected in practice. However, the opposition has alleged that the BDP abuses state resources, including the influential state media, to its own benefit. The lack of a public-financing system also leaves opposition parties at a disadvantage. The 2018 withdrawal of an EAA provision that had increased candidates' fees brought some relief to opposition parties.

The UDC and its leader, Duma Boko, reported harassment and interference from government agencies during the 2019 election campaign, including the harassment of Boko's family members and the impounding of a light aircraft used by the UDC for campaigning. The Directorate of Intelligence and Security Services (DISS) has also been accused of harassing opposition parliamentarians; in November 2021, the DISS reportedly arrested three members of the opposition BPF.

In July 2020, amid concerns that BDP parliamentarians intended to join other parties, the government gazetted a bill that would effectively prohibit local and national legislators from doing so. The law came into force in February 2021.

The BDP, drawing on the advantages of its long incumbency, has dominated the political landscape since 1966; no opposition party has ever won power.

In 2012, several opposition parties formed the UDC to contest elections. However, subsequent infighting within the UDC threatened its competitiveness during the 2019 contests. The opposition vote was further split when former president Khama quit the BDP in 2019 and helped form the BPF. In October 2020, the AP, BPF, and UDC signed an agreement to cooperate in future by-elections. However, persistent political infighting and the prevalence of personality-based leadership continues to impede the creation of a unified opposition.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 3 / 4

People's political choices are largely free from domination by unelected outside groups. While observers noted the potential for tribal chiefs to influence voters, an Afrobarometer survey published in January 2020 showed that most respondents did not see chiefs as influential.

Election monitors noted that Botswana political parties rely on foreign donations, which could allow for external interference in domestic politics.

There have been reports of vote buying during elections.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 2 / 4

Women have full political rights, but cultural factors limit their participation, and their interests are not necessarily addressed by elected leaders. Only 11 female candidates ran for seats in 2019, a decline from the 17 who participated in 2014. Seven women currently sit in the National Assembly.

Smaller ethnic and tribal groups tend to be left out of the political process, with observers noting that members are disadvantaged by the country's first-past-the-post electoral system. People with disabilities have participated at low levels in recent parliamentary elections. Parties generally do not represent the interests of LGBT+ people.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 8 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 3 / 4

Elected officials determine government policies. However, opposition parties have criticized the executive for its influence over Parliament, which is situated within the office of the president, and for rushing legislation without adequate deliberation or consultation.

In 2016, lawmakers approved an amendment increasing the number of National Assembly members appointed by the president from four to six. Opposition leaders argued that the change would strengthen executive power at the legislature's expense.

In 2018, Masisi transferred the DISS and the Financial Intelligence Agency from their respective ministries to the president's office, prompting concerns over the improper centralization of power.

President Masisi declared a COVID-19 state of emergency in March 2020, and the Emergency Powers Act (EPA), which gave the president wide-ranging powers, was gazetted that April. The state of emergency remained in force until September 2021.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 3 / 4

Botswana has a comprehensive legislative anticorruption framework. Whistleblower-protection legislation was passed in 2016. In 2019, legislators passed the Declaration of Assets and Liabilities Act (DALA), though opposition parties questioned its effectiveness in fighting corruption. DALA called for the creation of the Ethics and Integrity Directorate, which became operational in January 2020. However, anticorruption operations are constrained by a lack of funding; of the 182 cases before the Directorate of Public Prosecutions (DPP), 20 percent have been pending for 10 or more years.

The main anticorruption agency, the Directorate on Corruption and Economic Crime (DCEC) has been accused of ineffectiveness in pursuing high-level cases, and its independence has been questioned since it was transferred to the president's office in 2012. In June 2021, the president's office carried out an "unprecedented overhaul" of the DCEC, transferring a number of top investigators out of the agency without informing its director. The transfers, which came as the DCEC was pursuing high-profile cases involving top government officials, were later reversed.

In recent years, state anticorruption bodies have faced criticism for their perceived reluctance to pursue corruption cases against high-level individuals and for allegedly conducting politically motivated prosecutions. In August 2021, a high-profile corruption case involving former DISS agent Welheminah “Butterfly” Maswabi was dismissed by a High Court judge who condemned the case as “contrived” and “malicious,” and recommended that the officials who initiated the proceedings be prosecuted.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 2 / 4

Botswana lacks a freedom-of-information law, which limits government transparency. Budget processes are opaque and public contracts are often awarded through patronage networks. Section 44 of the Corruption and Economic Crime Act prohibits publishing information on DCEC investigations. Public officers and the heads of private organizations are subject to DALA.

The government embarked on a review of the public procurement law in April 2021 to address corruption and strengthen transparency and accountability. In November, President Masisi announced that a single law regulating public procurement would be adopted “soon.”

Opposition figures have criticized the government for a lack of transparency and making secretive deals, including the purchase of a luxury resort in May 2021. Local media outlets have also accused the government of suppressing public access to COVID-19-related information.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 44 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 12 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 2 / 4

Freedom of expression is constitutionally guaranteed. However, incidents of intimidation and harassment against journalists have been reported under the Masisi administration. However, incidents of intimidation, harassment, and physical assaults against journalists have been reported under the Masisi administration. In May 2021, the Committee to Protect Journalists (CPJ) reported that Botswana authorities routinely use digital forensics technology to extract information from devices seized from detained journalists.

The CPJ also condemned the repeated arrests of several media workers in January and March 2021 while they were investigating a missing persons case. While the individuals were detained, police confiscated and searched their computers and mobile phones. The charges from the group’s March arrest were dropped in April.

State-run media outlets dominate the broadcasting sector and have exhibited progovernment bias. A government ban on private-media advertising remains in place, harming the competitiveness and viability of many outlets. The 2008 Media Practitioners Act established a statutory media regulator and mandated the registration of all media workers and outlets—including websites and blogs—with violations punishable by a fine or imprisonment. Journalistic activity is also affected by provisions of the National Security Law, DALA, and the DISS Act.

Journalistic activity was also affected by COVID-19 measures. Under the EPA, Botswana were prohibited from using sources other than the government or the World Health Organization (WHO). In 2020 and 2021, several journalists, including the editor of the Botswana People’s Daily News, Oratile Dikologang, were arrested for allegedly publishing “fake news” about the COVID-19 pandemic. Dikologang faces up to five years in prison if convicted.

Religious freedom is generally respected, though all religious organizations must register with the government.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 3 / 4

Although academic freedom is generally respected, professors often practice self-censorship when addressing sensitive topics. Foreign academics have previously been deported for publishing work that criticized the government, contributing to cautiousness among many scholars.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 3 / 4

Freedom of expression is constitutionally protected but is restricted in practice, prompting self-censorship among Botswana. Insulting the president, a lawmaker, or a public official is punishable by a fine. The 2008 Public Service Act restricts the ability of public-sector workers to air political views. The DISS is able to monitor private online communications. In October 2021, the UN Human Rights Committee (OHCHR) expressed concern over an increase in the “scale and scope” of intrusive surveillance methods used against Botswana by the authorities in recent years.

Botswana were also affected by restrictions when discussing the COVID-19 pandemic. In March 2020, the communications regulator warned that so-called false-news dissemination was legally prohibited. The EPA included COVID-19-related false-news provisions. Offenders face a $10,000 fine, imprisonment of up to five years, or both.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 10 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

Freedom of assembly is constitutionally guaranteed and largely upheld in practice. However, the Public Order Act requires citizens to seek police permission to exercise this right. The constitutionality of this clause has been questioned in the past, and police have sometimes denied requests for unclear reasons.

In September 2021, prominent religious leader Thuso Tiego was arrested for participating in an antigovernment protest march without a permit. Protesters who gathered outside the police station to demand his release were violently dispersed by police; some were also arrested.

The government declared a COVID-19-related state of emergency in March 2020, which restricted the size of public assemblies until it was lifted in September 2021.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights– and governance-related work? 4 / 4

Nongovernmental organizations (NGOs), including human rights groups, generally operate without restrictions.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 2 / 4

The right to form a union is respected, but the Trade Dispute Act places restrictions on who can strike. As a result, the government declares many strikes illegal, putting employees’ jobs at risk. The law does not always protect workers from antiunion discrimination by employers.

In 2018, the government attempted to derecognize public-service unions for alleged noncompliance with provisions of the Public Service Act of 2008, but a trade court blocked the attempt. In September 2021, the Botswana Federation of Public, Private, and Parastatal Sector Unions (BOFEPUSU) threatened to take the government to court for failing to reinstate the dormant Public Service Bargaining Council (PSBC) despite the president's 2018 promise to do so. The PSBC was not restored by year's end.

The right to strike was restricted by the EPA.

F. RULE OF LAW: 11 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 3 / 4

The judiciary is generally independent and free from interference. Judges ruled against the government in several high-profile cases in 2021, including in August, when a High Court judge dismissed a corruption case against former DISS agent Welheminah "Butterfly" Maswabi, characterizing the prosecution as "malicious." The same month, another High Court judge condemned government officials for their "incompetence" in investigating alleged embezzlement from the state's National Petroleum Fund (NPF), while another court ordered the state to reimburse former president Ian Khama for costs incurred after he was denied the use of government-owned transport during a 2019 trip.

However, there have been calls to improve the transparency, impartiality, and public oversight of the selection and appointment processes for judges. While the Judicial Service Commission (JSC) advertises vacancies and interviews potential members of the High Court, the appointment process for Court of Appeal judges is relatively nontransparent. In July 2021, the Law Society of Botswana (LSB) accused the JSC of routinely promoting junior magistrates through a nontransparent process.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 3 / 4

The right to a fair trial is constitutionally protected and generally upheld in practice. However, the judiciary lacks human and financial resources, leading to case backlogs, lengthy pretrial detentions, and the postponement of cases. The LSB has advocated for the "naming and shaming" of judges who delay in delivering rulings.

Attorneys are provided to defendants in capital cases, but defendants in noncapital cases must pay for their own counsel. The DISS can arrest suspects without a warrant if agents believe they have committed or will commit a crime.

While courts were affected by COVID-19 mitigation measures, they remained largely operational during 2020 and 2021.

Although citizens are largely protected from the illegitimate use of force, corporal punishment is sometimes imposed. The law also allows for capital punishment; three people were executed in 2021.

The DISS has historically been accused of corrupt activity, unlawful arrests, and extrajudicial killings. Instances of police brutality have been reported, and perpetrators are rarely held accountable. Botswana has yet to investigate cases of police brutality reported during the enforcement of the COVID-19-related state of emergency.

Antipoaching operations have resulted in fatal incidents over the past two decades. In 2018, President Masisi ended an unwritten shoot-to-kill policy originally adopted in at least 2013 to deter wildlife poachers. The poaching ban was revoked altogether in 2019. However, in 2020, soldiers killed six suspected poachers. Botswana authorities began an inquest into the killings in November 2021. The inquest remained ongoing at year's end.

Customary law, commonly applied in rural areas, often discriminates against women. The indigenous San people tend to be economically marginalized and lack access to education and other public services. There have been reports of beatings, abuse, and arbitrary arrests of San by police and park rangers.

Same-sex relations were criminalized until 2019, when the High Court ruled that the ban was unconstitutional. The Court of Appeal upheld the ruling in November 2021.

Refugees in Botswana have been detained in encampments and have been denied the ability to work and integrate into local communities.

In July 2021, Parliament voted to expand the mandate and the powers of the Ombudsman to include the “protection and promotion of human rights.” The process of restructuring the Ombudsman’s office began in October and continued through year’s end.

In August, Botswana ratified the UN Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities (CRPD). Civil society groups praised the decision to ratify the convention, which came two months after the Albinism Society of Botswana reported the country to the Southern African Litigation Centre (SALC) for persistently failing to address the challenges faced by people living with albinism.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 11 / 16G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 3 / 4

Most citizens can move freely throughout the country and travel internationally, though refugees and asylum seekers face movement restrictions. San people have limited access to their traditional lands in the Central Kalahari Game Reserve. The government’s long-standing policy has been to relocate San out of the reserve, and those who still have relatives living there must apply for a permit to visit them. In October 2020, San signatories sent a petition to President Masisi calling on the government to recommit to a dialogue to resolve the land-access dispute.

International and domestic movement restrictions were imposed under a COVID-19-related state of emergency beginning in March 2020, with Botswana requiring permits to travel within the country in some cases. The state of emergency ended in September 2021, lifting most restrictions on movement.

Botswana has generally sound legal protections for property rights which are enforced in practice. The country’s regulatory framework is considered conducive to establishing and operating private businesses. Land rights for wives, widows, and orphans were improved in September 2020, when President Masisi signed amendments to the Land Policy of 2015 into law. In May 2021, the High Court found the compulsory acquisition of tribal land to be unlawful in a ruling that the SALC praised as “vital” to protecting tribal land rights.

Gender-based violence (GBV), including domestic violence and rape, is pervasive. Spousal rape is not considered a crime. Customary law restricts women’s rights within a marriage. When husbands and wives separate, custody is traditionally granted to the father. Child and forced marriages still occur under customary law. Perpetrators are rarely prosecuted. Women can experience harassment for not dressing conservatively. During 2021, Botswana reported being turned away from COVID-19 vaccination sites run by community councils for failing to adhere to traditional dress codes. Such policies disproportionately affected women.

In 2018, Parliament passed the Penal Code Amendment Bill, which introduced stronger penalties for rape and raised the age of consent from 16 to 18. The government proposed further amendments to the Penal Code in 2021, which would introduce longer sentences for rape and provide compensation for victims. Women's rights activists expressed concern over certain aspects of the reforms, which also proposed criminalizing false rape allegations.

In November 2020, 25 dedicated courts were established to adjudicate GBV cases.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 3 / 4

Workers enjoy protections against exploitative labor practices. However, employer abuses in the retail, tourism, and private-security sectors are an ongoing problem. Botswana lacks a strong regulatory framework for labor brokers that dispatch workers to clients on short-term contracts, in which exploitation is common.

Human trafficking remains an ongoing challenge. The Anti-Human Trafficking Act of 2014 was amended in 2018 to include stiffer financial penalties. However, the 2021 edition of the US State Department's Trafficking in Persons Report noted a "substantial decrease" in the government's antitrafficking efforts in 2021. Despite acknowledging the appearance of forced and child labor—particularly on San cattle farms—the government largely failed to address the problem during the year.

Brazil

Population: 212,800,000

Capital: Brasília

Freedom Status: Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Brazil is a democracy that holds competitive elections, and the political arena, though polarized, is characterized by vibrant public debate. However, independent journalists and civil society activists risk harassment and violent attack, and the government has struggled to address high rates of violent crime and disproportionate violence against and economic exclusion of minorities. Corruption is endemic at top levels, contributing to widespread disillusionment with traditional political parties. Societal discrimination and violence against LGBT+ people remain serious problems.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- Brazilians remained heavily affected by the effects of the ongoing COVID-19 pandemic, with the January closure of an aid program worsening economic conditions for millions; support was temporarily reinstated in April, however. Nearly 425,000 deaths and over 14.6 million cases were reported to the World Health Organization (WHO) during the year.
 - Rallies supporting and opposing President Jair Bolsonaro were held nationwide on September 7, the country's independence day. Most activity was peaceful, though pro-Bolsonaro participants broke through police barriers in Brasília; Bolsonaro himself called for the impeachment of a Supreme Court justice while addressing supporters.

- Lower-house legislators did not sustain Bolsonaro's proposal to replace the country's electronic voting system in an August vote. On the day of the vote, Bolsonaro presided over a military parade in Brasília, which was widely derided by other politicians.
- The Bolsonaro administration interfered with the work of scholars and educators during the year. In October, the Economy Ministry asked legislators to restrict disbursements earmarked for scientific endeavors, while staff members at the National Institute of Educational Studies and Research (INEP) accused the government of trying to influence the content of school examinations in November.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 31 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 10 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 3 / 4

Brazil is a federal republic governed under a presidential system. The president is elected by popular vote for a four-year term and is eligible for reelection to a second consecutive term.

In the 2018 race, candidates made their cases to voters disillusioned by persistent, high-level corruption scandals, and increasingly concerned by a difficult economic environment and a rise in violent crime. Jair Bolsonaro, then of the far-right Social Liberal Party (PSL), won the election, taking 55.1 percent of the vote in a runoff against Fernando Haddad of the leftist Workers' Party (PT). Bolsonaro's campaign was characterized by a disdain for democratic principles and aggressive pledges to wipe out corruption and violent crime. An Organization of American States (OAS) election observation mission generally praised the poll's administration and stakeholders quickly accepted its result. However, the highly polarized campaign was marred by the spread of disinformation, conspiracy theories, and aggressive rhetoric on social networks and online messaging services (notably WhatsApp). There were also frequent preelection threats and violence targeting candidates, political supporters, journalists, and members of the judiciary. While most of the reported incidents appeared to involve attacks by Bolsonaro supporters, his backers were also targeted, and Bolsonaro was stabbed at a rally that September, forcing him to cut back on public appearances a month before the election.

State and municipal elections, which are regulated by the same voter-registration and vote-counting rules as national elections, are generally perceived as free and fair. Municipal elections were held throughout the country in November 2020. Centrist and conservative parties not aligned with the president made gains and PT mayoral candidates suffered losses, while Bolsonaro-backed candidates performed poorly.

Legislative elections are generally free and fair. The bicameral National Congress is composed of an 81-member Senate and a 513-member Chamber of Deputies. Senators serve staggered eight-year terms, with one- to two-thirds coming up for election every four years. Members of the Chamber of Deputies serve four-year terms.

In the October 2018 elections, the PT lost seats but remained the largest party in the lower house, with 56 deputies. The PSL captured 52 seats, up from just a single seat previously. In the Senate, the center-right Brazilian Democratic Movement (MDB, previously PMDB) maintained its lead with a total of 12 seats, while the Brazilian Social Democratic Party (PSDB) won 9, followed by the Social Democratic Party (PSD), Democrats (DEM), and PT, with 4 seats each. The PSL entered the chamber after winning 4 seats.

The 2018 legislative elections were held concurrently with the first round of the presidential election; campaigning thus took place in the same highly polarized environment, marked by aggressive rhetoric and instances of political violence.

Brazilian election laws are generally well enforced. A Supreme Electoral Court (TSE) presides over cases related to violations of electoral law.

While Brazilian voters have cast ballots electronically since 1996, President Bolsonaro proposed its replacement with a paper-receipt system via a constitutional amendment. In August 2021, the TSE opened an investigation into Bolsonaro over his claims that elections due in 2022 could be affected by fraud due to electronic voting. The TSE also called on the Supreme Court to authorize an investigation, which a Supreme Court justice ordered days later. Later that month, the Chamber of Deputies did not sustain Bolsonaro's proposed amendment in a vote which did not attain a needed three-fifths majority. The TSE defended the integrity of the electronic voting system and announced measures to improve transparency after the legislative vote.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 14 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 4 / 4

Brazil has an unfettered multiparty system marked by vigorous competition among rival parties. The electoral framework encourages the proliferation of parties, a number of which are based in a single state. Some parties display little ideological consistency. Party switching is common by members of Congress, rendering electoral coalitions fragile. The sheer number of parties means that the executive branch must piece together diverse and often ideologically incoherent coalitions to pass legislation. In late 2019, Bolsonaro left the PSL, joining the Liberal Party (PL) in November 2021.

Ahead of the 2018 elections, 35 parties were registered, 30 of which won seats in the lower chamber—the largest number of parties seated there since the country's return to electoral politics in 1985. However, political parties operate with little transparency and under no governance rules, and often are targets of investigations into the misuse of public funds.

In October 2021, the PSL and the DEM announced their intention to merge; their proposed party, the Brazil Union, would have the single largest number of legislators in the current Chamber of Deputies. The merger requires the TSE's approval and was not finalized at year's end.

Opposition parties are able to compete freely and gain power through elections at both the federal and subnational levels. Ahead of the 2018 polls, the small, far-right PSL succeeded in attracting widespread support in a short amount of time. Elected officials in subnational positions are often influential political actors, and prominent opposition to Bolsonaro has come from these leaders.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 3 / 4

Recent investigations into corruption have exposed how powerful business interests undermine democratic accountability by facilitating or encouraging corruption among elected officials. Criminal groups have carried out attacks against political candidates.

In 2018, Rio de Janeiro councilwoman Marielle Franco, a Black lesbian politician and outspoken advocate for minorities, was murdered. Investigations into the crime revealed corruption schemes and the growing power of militia groups in Rio de Janeiro State, whose membership includes active and retired members of the local police force. Although two alleged perpetrators were detained in 2019, the mastermind of the crime remained unknown.

Militias and other criminal organizations—which may exercise significant control over campaigning and other political activity within their territories—were partly blamed for a rise in violence as the 2020 municipal elections approached; at least 25 candidates were killed prior to the balloting that November.

The constitution guarantees equal rights without prejudice, but some groups have greater political representation than others. Afro-Brazilians and women and their interests remain underrepresented in electoral politics and in government. Only 15 percent of all Chamber of Deputies seats were held by women as of December 2020, while 12.4 percent of Senate seats were held by women as of that month.

Several underrepresented groups saw improvements during the 2020 municipal elections: self-identified Afro-Brazilians garnered approximately 44 percent of city council seats; the number of Indigenous mayors and council members rose nearly 30 percent; LGBT+ candidates won a record number of seats; and the number of women elected rose modestly compared to 2016. Gains in diversity were abetted by a TSE ruling that parties must distribute public campaign funds equitably between white and nonwhite candidates.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 7 / 12C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 3 / 4

Widespread corruption undermines the government's ability to make and implement policy without undue influence from private or criminal interests.

During the 2010s, the functioning of government was severely hampered by a rolling political crisis that saw the removal of then president Dilma Rousseff following charges she had improperly manipulated the state budget. Her term was completed by then vice president Michel Temer, who faced bribery and obstruction-of-justice charges which the lower house subsequently blocked.

Given Bolsonaro's lack of a stable governing coalition, congressional leaders have gained political prominence since he came to power. The National Congress and state governors helped fill a vacuum in responding to the ongoing COVID-19 pandemic, with many governors insisting on stricter pandemic restrictions and vocally objecting to Bolsonaro's management.

The presence of thousands of active-duty and retired military officials in the Bolsonaro administration, along with the expansion of military missions to areas like environmental protection, has prompted unease about growing armed-forces influence in politics. In August 2021, as legislators considered Bolsonaro's proposal to end electronic voting, Bolsonaro presided over a military parade in Brasília, which was derided by other politicians.

Corruption and graft are endemic in Brazil, especially among elected officials. Beginning in 2014, an investigation known as Operation Car Wash focused on bribery, money laundering, and bid-rigging involving state oil company Petrobras and private construction companies. In addition to former Petrobras executives and heads of major construction firms, its findings have also implicated elected officials from across the political spectrum. Sérgio Moro, then serving as a judge, became the face of the crackdown, and subsequently joined the incoming Bolsonaro administration as justice minister.

However, a series of investigative reports known as Car Wash Leaks, published by the Intercept Brasil in 2019, exposed an improper relationship between then judge Moro and federal prosecutors, in which Moro shared advice on how to prosecute high-level corruption cases. One such case was that of former president Luiz Inácio “Lula” da Silva, who was convicted on corruption charges and imprisoned in 2018 before being freed in late 2019, after the Supreme Court ruled that defendants must be released while appeals are pending. A Supreme Court justice annulled the convictions in March 2021 on procedural grounds, a decision sustained by the full court in April. Moro himself had resigned as justice minister in 2020, after President Bolsonaro attempted to interfere with the federal police, one of the agencies tasked with investigating the president’s family and associates.

Criminal inquiries have targeted multiple members of Bolsonaro’s family. In November 2020, one of the president’s sons, Senator Flávio Bolsonaro, was charged with diverting public resources when he was a Rio de Janeiro state deputy. By March 2021, all four Bolsonaro sons were subject to corruption investigations. In July, news outlet UOL reported on President Bolsonaro’s apparent participation in a salary-embezzlement scheme while serving as a lower-house legislator; prosecutors would not be able to file any charges until he leaves office. By December 2021, the Supreme Court’s second chamber reportedly ruled that evidence against Flávio Bolsonaro was inadmissible.

Numerous corruption allegations were lodged amid Brazil’s widely criticized response to the COVID-19 pandemic. In April 2021, the Senate opened an inquiry into the Bolsonaro administration’s management of the pandemic. The inquiry submitted its report to the prosecutor general’s office in October, accusing the president of committing 9 crimes, including misuse of public funds, and calling for indictments against 78 individuals and 2 companies.

State and local governments have also faced investigations. Rio de Janeiro state governor Wilson Witzel, who was suspended over a federal graft probe related to pandemic-related procurements in September 2020, was removed from office in April 2021.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 2 / 4

Brazil enacted a Freedom of Information Act in 2012, but in practice, the government does not always release requested information, and when doing so, not always in machine-readable formats. Compliance with the legislation also varies among the country’s 26 states and the Brasília Federal District. In 2019, the Bolsonaro administration enacted a decree modifying the Freedom of Information Act, giving a larger group of officials the power to classify information as secret.

During the COVID-19 pandemic, President Bolsonaro routinely spread misinformation about the virus, advocating use of discredited medications, particularly hydroxychloroquine. In October 2021, Bolsonaro claimed that recipients of COVID-19 vaccines were susceptible to acquiring AIDS. Supreme Court justice Alexandre de Moraes ordered a probe into his comments in December.

COVID-19-related transparency portals maintained by subnational governments partially compensated for federal shortcomings by providing information on emergency contracts, donations, and social protection measures.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 42 / 60 (-1)

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF 13 / 16 (-1)

D1. Are there free and independent media? 3 / 4

The constitution guarantees freedom of expression and the country's media environment is vibrant. However, investigative journalists, particularly those who cover corruption and crime, face threats, harassment, obstruction, and sometimes deadly violence.

Journalists who criticize Bolsonaro face online and offline harassment, and outlets that carry such criticism face economic pressure from the government. Reporters Without Borders (RSF) counted 331 attacks against the press from President Bolsonaro, his family, and other government officials in the first half of 2021, a 5.4 percent increase over the second half of 2020.

The legal framework provides inadequate protection for freedom of expression. Defamation is subject to criminal penalties, and high-ranking officials have requested criminal investigations of journalists over criticisms of the government's COVID-19 response. In May 2021, Attorney General Augusto Aras alleged that Folha de São Paulo columnist and law professor Conrado Hübner Mendes engaged in slander, libel, and defamation for a January column criticizing Aras. The case remained ongoing as of July.

The constitution guarantees freedom of religion, and the government generally respects this right in practice. However, Afro-Brazilian religious groups face discrimination; 17 percent of cases registered through a national human rights hotline in the first half of 2019 came from members of those groups, who represent less than 2 percent of the Brazilian population. Violence against Afro-Brazilian religious groups is frequent, especially in Rio de Janeiro's favelas. The Commission to Combat Religious Intolerance, composed of judges and public prosecutors, registered over 200 Afro-Brazilian temples ("terreiros") closed in 2019 after assaults or threats from evangelical drug dealers, who claim territory like other Brazilian drug traffickers but also seek to repress faiths other than their own.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 3 / 4 (-1)

Education policy has become increasingly politicized under the Bolsonaro administration, with some professors and researchers seeking temporary refuge abroad following threats in Brazil.

The administration placed persistent pressure on academia and scientific organizations during the year. In February 2021, the comptroller general's office warned epidemiologist Pedro Hallal that his employment was at risk after he criticized the administration's COVID-19 response. The comptroller general later reached an agreement with Hallal, who promised not to discuss professional "appreciation or disapproval" for two years. In early 2021, the Education Ministry ordered the rectors of federal universities to stop staff activities deemed "partisan," though it rescinded its order in March. In April, the administrator of the Chico Mendes Institute for Biodiversity Conservation was allowed to review the works of its scientists before publication.

Government bodies have also sought to disrupt funding for scientific and educational projects. In October 2021, the Economy Ministry asked a congressional budget committee to restrict monetary disbursements earmarked for a public-science funding mechanism.

In November 2021, staff members of the National Institute of Educational Studies and Research (INEP), which is responsible for administering school tests, accused the government of pressuring it to remove controversial subjects from a high school examination. Some 37 INEP staff members asked for their own dismissal that month, citing a hostile work environment.

The administration has worked to influence education in other ways since taking power. In 2019, for example, the administration sought to remove references of gender-based violence (GBV) and minority-rights issues from school textbooks. In September 2021, news outlet Estadão reported that schoolchildren in Santa Filomena were forced to watch pro-Bolsonaro advertisements while using a publicly provided internet service.

Score Change: The score declined from 4 to 3 because the government has continued to monitor and persecute scholars for their work.

People are generally able to express personal views in public without fear of surveillance or retaliation. However, in the tense 2018 campaign atmosphere, some political speech was met with acts of violence. A prevalence of violent homophobic rhetoric in recent years has contributed to a sense of fear among many that open discussion of LGBT+ rights and issues could be met with harassment or attack.

Social-media intimidation and harassment by progovernment troll groups remains a serious problem in Brazil. Bolsonaro allies, including family members, have faced investigations over their involvement in disinformation campaigns.

Public servants are subject to social-media monitoring and risk losing their positions if they criticize the government.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 9 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 3 / 4

While freedom of assembly is generally respected, police or other security agents sometimes use excessive force against demonstrations.

Pro- and anti-Bolsonaro protests were held nationwide on September 7, 2021, the country's independence day. Pro-Bolsonaro protesters successfully broke through police barriers in Brasília, though they were prevented from entering the Supreme Court building and police used tear gas to push demonstrators back. The rallies, which reportedly included over 100,000 participants in Brasília and São Paulo, were otherwise largely peaceful.

Nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) operate freely in a variety of fields. However, activists working on land rights and environmental protection issues have faced harassment, threats, and violence in recent years, along with verbal hostility from Bolsonaro and other administration officials. In September 2021, Global Witness called Brazil the fourth most-dangerous country in the world for environmental activists, noting the deaths of 20 activists in 2020.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 3 / 4

Industrial labor unions are well organized, and although they are politically connected, Brazilian unions tend to be freer from political party control than their counterparts in other Latin American countries. However, controversial labor reforms enacted in 2017 diminished the strength and role of unions in collective bargaining with businesses.

F. RULE OF LAW: 8 / 16F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 3 / 4

The judiciary, though largely independent, is overburdened, inefficient, and often subject to intimidation and other external influences, especially in rural areas. Despite these shortcomings, the country's progressive constitution has resulted in an active judiciary that often rules in favor of citizens over the state.

The Supreme Court has maintained its role as an autonomous counterweight to the executive. Tensions remained high in 2021, with Bolsonaro frequently issuing threats against the court. In August, Bolsonaro called for the impeachment of Supreme Court justice Alexandre de Moraes, who had backed the TSE's call for an investigation into the president over his voting fraud comments earlier that month. Bolsonaro also vowed to ignore de Moraes's rulings when addressing supporters on September 7. Chief Justice Luiz Fux criticized Bolsonaro's statements in remarks delivered a day later, and Bolsonaro subsequently apologized to the court.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 2 / 4

The judiciary generally upholds the right to a fair trial. However, federal, state, and appellate courts are severely backlogged. The state struggles to provide legal counsel for defendants and prisoners who are unable to afford an attorney. Access to justice also varies greatly due to income inequality. Under a 2017 law, members of the armed forces and military police accused of certain serious crimes against civilians can be tried in military, rather than civilian, courts.

Brazil has a high homicide rate, though an 8 percent decline was recorded in the first half of 2021 over the same period in 2020. The police force remains mired in corruption, and serious police abuses, including extrajudicial killings, continued in 2021. Police officers are rarely prosecuted for abuses, and those charged are almost never convicted. In July 2021, the Brazilian Public Security Forum (FBSP) reported 6,416 deaths caused by police in 2020. Some 79 percent of the victims were Black.

Police violence is particularly acute in Rio de Janeiro State. The July 2021 FBSP report noted that seven cities there had some of the country's highest rates of police-caused deaths. In June 2020, the Supreme Court forbade most police operations in Rio de Janeiro's slums during the COVID-19 pandemic, leading to a sharp decline in police violence before the state government resumed raids that October. A May 2021 raid in the Jacarezinho section of the city of Rio de Janeiro ended with the deaths of 28 people, making the raid the deadliest in the city's history. While the authorities claimed that 24 of the dead attacked police officers, eyewitnesses claimed that officers engaged in executions.

Conditions in severely overcrowded prisons are life-threatening, characterized by disease, a lack of adequate food, and deadly gang-related violence. Violence is more likely to affect poor, Black prisoners. Prisoners and prison staff also risk contracting COVID-19. In May 2021, press outlet Globo reported that at least 437 inmates and prison officials died of the illness since the pandemic began.

Some populations are not able to fully exercise their human rights in practice. Many Indigenous communities—who comprise about 1 percent of the population—suffer from poverty and lack adequate sanitation and education services.

Just over half of the population identifies as Black or of mixed race. Afro-Brazilians suffer from high rates of poverty and illiteracy, and almost 80 percent of Brazilians living in extreme poverty are Black or mixed race. Victims of violence in Brazil are predominantly young, Black, and poor: According to a 2021 FBSP report, 77 percent of murder victims in 2019 were Black. The FBSP also counted 1,350 femicides in 2020, a 0.7 percent increase over 2019.

Although Brazilian society is largely tolerant, it reportedly has one of the world's highest levels of violence against LGBT+ people. According to Grupo Gay da Bahia, an LGBT+ advocacy organization, 224 LGBT+ people were killed in 2020 because of homophobic violence, while another 13 died by suicide. The organization noted that 70 percent of victims were transgender or cross-dressing people.

In 2019, despite intense pressure from some religious and political leaders, the Supreme Court ruled LGBT+ people are protected under a criminal law that prohibits discrimination on the basis of “race, color, ethnicity, religion, and national origin.”

Indigenous lands have been subject to increased pressure since Bolsonaro took office, encouraged by his rhetoric and support for easing environmental laws. Indigenous groups were severely affected by the COVID-19 pandemic, and legislators were forced to override a veto of several provisions of an aid package meant to support Indigenous peoples.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 12 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

Brazilians enjoy freedom to travel within and outside of the country, and to make decisions about their places of residence and employment, though access to high-quality education across all levels remains a challenge. Gang violence in favelas has sometimes impeded free movement and has prompted schools to shut down temporarily.

While property rights are generally enforced, laws granting Indigenous populations exclusive use of certain lands are not always upheld, sometimes leading to violent conflicts. According to the Pastoral Land Commission, 26 people were murdered over land disputes in the first eight months of 2021, with a plurality of victims belonging to Indigenous groups. According to Human Rights Watch (HRW), the federal government almost completely ceased collecting environmental fines starting in late 2019, even as illegal deforestation increased. In July 2021, Reuters reported on the existence of a backlog of over 17,000 uncollected fines.

Requirements for starting new businesses are often onerous, but authorities have taken some steps to ease the process. Legislation approved in 2019 loosened licensing and inspection requirements for small businesses, for example. Corruption and organized crime can pose obstacles to private business activity.

The government generally does not restrict social freedoms. Same-sex marriage became legal in 2013. GBV remains widespread, though legislation has been introduced to combat it. A 2006 law sought to address high rates of impunity for domestic violence. Law 14.188, which entered force in July 2021, amended the penal code to criminalize simple bodily harm due to gender and criminalize psychological violence against women.

Abortion is legal only in the case of rape, a threat to the mother's life, or a rare and usually fatal brain deformity in the fetus. In August 2020, the Health Ministry imposed new reporting requirements on clinicians in cases of rape survivors seeking abortions. These restrictions limit women's reproductive choices and impinge on family planning. As many as one million Brazilians seek abortions through clandestine means annually, including by traveling abroad.

Slavery-like working conditions pose a significant problem in rural and urban zones. A 2012 constitutional amendment allows the government to confiscate all property of landholders found to be using slave labor, a measure Bolsonaro has criticized. The economy has also suffered from mismanagement, including negligence and corruption in state-owned mining and oil enterprises, and successive administrations have failed to address distortions caused by economic concentration. Deeply entrenched patterns of discrimination, including precarious informal employment, contributed to Afro-Brazilians suffering high COVID-19-related mortality rates. State spending to address inequality has been obstructed by a 20-year budgetary spending cap enacted in 2016, which resulted in cuts to public services.

At the outset of the COVID-19 pandemic, poverty and inequality in Brazil had risen more since 2014 than in any other country in Latin America, and the pandemic led to record unemployment and workforce reductions. An emergency aid program provided to offset COVID-19-induced disruptions reduced poverty rates in 2020 but was withdrawn at the end of that year, forcing many recipients back into poverty. The government temporarily restored some pandemic aid in April 2021. Some 14.7 million Brazilians faced extreme poverty as of June.

Brunei

Population: 500,000

Capital: Bandar Seri Begawan

Freedom Status: Not Free

Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: Brunei is an absolute monarchy in which the sultan exercises executive power. There are no elected representatives at the national level. Freedoms of the press and assembly are significantly restricted. Online speech is monitored by authorities, but is lively nevertheless.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- COVID-19 transmission accelerated in August, prompting authorities to impose restrictions that were loosened in November. Some 15,000 cases were reported to the World Health Organization (WHO) by year's end, along with 54 deaths.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 7 / 40A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 0 / 12*A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

The hereditary sultan, Hassanal Bolkiah Mu'izzaddin Waddaulah, is the head of state and prime minister, and continues to wield broad powers under a state of emergency imposed in 1962, when Brunei was still governed as a British protectorate.

In recent years, Brunei has appeared to be paving the way for Hassanal's son, Prince Al-Muhtadee Billah, to take power. There are no indications that any transition would involve moving away from a traditional monarchy.

The unicameral Legislative Council has no political standing independent of the sultan, who appoints its members. Brunei has not held direct legislative elections since 1962.

Elections are held for village-level councils that play a consultative role, though candidates are vetted by the government.

There are no national-level electoral laws, and there have not been any national, direct legislative elections in over five decades.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 3 / 16B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 1 / 4

Genuine political activity by opposition groups remains extremely limited. The National Development Party (NDP) was permitted to register in 2005 after pledging to work as a partner with the government and swearing loyalty to the sultan; it is Brunei's only registered party.

There are no national-level elections in which opposition forces could gain power. Since the National Solidarity Party was deregistered without explanation in 2007, the NDP has been Brunei's sole legal political party. It has no formal political role and is unable to challenge the sultan's power in any meaningful way.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 1 / 4

With the dominance of the sultan and lack of elections, residents have few avenues for genuine and autonomous political participation. However, people have a very limited ability to challenge unpopular policies through the organization of social movements.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 1 / 4

Members of ethnic, religious, and other minority groups have few opportunities for political participation, even on a local level. Village council candidates must be Muslim, and ministers and deputy ministers must be Muslim and Malay unless the sultan grants an exception. Since many ethnic Chinese in Brunei remain permanent residents and not citizens, they are further excluded from the country's politics. Women play a minimal political role at the national and local level.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 4 / 12C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 0 / 4

No national-level policymakers are chosen through elections. The sultan wields broad powers and is counseled by appointed advisory bodies and the appointed legislature.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 3 / 4

In 2015, the government enacted amendments to the Prevention of Corruption Act, which strengthened the anticorruption framework by establishing new conflict of interest rules for public officials, among other provisions. The government claims to have a zero-tolerance policy on corruption, and its Anti-Corruption Bureau has successfully prosecuted a number of lower-level officials.

In early 2020, two former judges were convicted of charges including money laundering over accusations that they embezzled millions of dollars from government-controlled accounts. In July 2021, the Court of Appeal upheld their convictions and lengthened their prison sentences.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 1 / 4

Although the appointed Legislative Council has no independent power, it formally passes the state budget and engages in question-and-answer sessions with government officials. The council meets once each year for a session lasting approximately two weeks. However, government operations are largely opaque.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 21 / 60D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 6 / 16*D1. Are there free and independent media? 1 / 4

Officials may close newspapers without cause and fine and imprison journalists for up to three years for reporting deemed "false and malicious." Brunei's only television station is state-run. The country's main English-language daily newspaper, the Borneo Bulletin, is controlled by the sultan's family and its journalists often practice self-censorship. Another English-language newspaper, the Brunei Times, closed abruptly in 2016, allegedly after complaints from the Saudi embassy in Brunei over critical coverage of Saudi hajj policies. The Scoop, a news site that launched in 2017, contains mildly independent coverage.

The state religion is the Shafi'i school of Sunni Islam, but the constitution allows for the practice of other religions. Non-Shafi'i forms of Islam are actively discouraged, and marriage between Muslims and non-Muslims is not allowed. Muslims require permission from the Ministry of Religious Affairs to convert to other faiths. Christians are allowed to hold low-key Christmas celebrations inside churches or at homes, but not outdoors or at shopping malls.

In 2014, Brunei implemented new criminal regulations based on Sharia (Islamic law), which include limits on the use of certain words and expressions deemed to be sacred to Islam in reference to other religions. The code also includes a ban on proselytizing of a religion other than Islam to Muslims or atheists and requires Muslims to participate in religious observances. In April 2019, the government implemented a second phase that mandated death by stoning for insulting the prophet Muhammad, though a moratorium on this phase was issued that May.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 2 / 4

Academic freedom is respected to some extent, although institutions must seek approval from authorities to host visiting scholars, public lectures, and conferences. Scholars reportedly practice self-censorship.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 2 / 4

The government utilizes an informant system to monitor suspected dissidents, and online communications are monitored for subversive content. In 2019, a former civil servant became the first individual to be convicted under the Sedition Act after making statements criticizing the government's halal certification policy; the individual subsequently fled Brunei, fearing punishment under laws prohibiting same-sex activity as a gay man. Nevertheless, Brunei has an increasingly active and vibrant online community, though internet users reportedly self-censor regarding issues related to the monarchy.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 3 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 1 / 4

Long-standing state-of-emergency laws restrict freedom of assembly. No more than 10 people can assemble for any purpose without a permit, and these laws are frequently enforced.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 1 / 4

Most nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) are professional or business groups, although a few work on issues related to social welfare. All groups must register, registration can be refused for any reason, and registered groups can be suspended.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 1 / 4

The law guarantees the right to form and join a union, but the agreement that had permitted Brunei's only formerly active union, the Brunei Oilfield Workers Union, is expired. Strikes are illegal, and collective bargaining is not recognized.

F. RULE OF LAW: 5 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 1 / 4

Brunei has a dual judicial system of secular and Sharia courts; all senior judges are appointed by the sultan. The courts appear to act independently when handling civil matters, and have yet to be tested in political cases or under the new regulations recently phased in. They have not shown independence in any cases relating to the sultan's interests, however.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 2 / 4

Civil and criminal law is based on English common law and is enforced in secular courts, while Sharia is enforced in Sharia courts. People detained under the Internal Security Act lack due process rights including the presumption of innocence.

The country's controversial Sharia-based penal code was delayed for several years; Brunei introduced the first phase in 2014 but did not fully implement the code, which contains penalties including amputations and death by stoning, until 2019.

The government only provides an attorney to indigent defendants in death penalty cases. To address this gap in access to justice, the Law Society of Brunei launched a pilot program for the country's first legal aid fund in 2018.

Brunei retained the death penalty for crimes including drug trafficking before the new Sharia code was launched. However, no individual has been executed since 1957. Prison conditions generally meet international standards.

Sharia-based criminal statutes implemented in 2019 contain more severe penalties for violations including consensual same-sex relations, theft, and adultery; they vary from whippings to amputations and death by stoning. That May, the sultan issued a "de facto moratorium on capital punishment," but did not issue clarification on the other provisions.

Bruneian citizenship is inherited from citizen fathers. Citizen mothers must complete an application to pass citizenship on to children born to a noncitizen father. Thousands of stateless residents of Brunei, including longtime ethnic Chinese residents, are denied the full rights and benefits granted to citizens. The royal family receives unique and favored treatment in all aspects of laws, policies, and practices.

LGBT+ people living in Brunei are subject to severe penalties for same-sex relations under Sharia-based laws. Under regulations introduced in 2019, consensual same-sex acts can be punished by death, or by whipping if the offenders are female.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS 7 / 16G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 2 / 4

Freedom of movement is respected. All government employees, domestic and foreign, must apply for permission to travel abroad, but permission is easily obtained. Brunei did not rely on aggressive lockdowns seen elsewhere in the region in response to COVID-19.

Stateless children do not have free access to education and instead must apply to enroll in schools; if accepted they sometimes have to pay tuition not required of citizens.

Bruneian citizens are able to own property and can establish businesses with relative ease, but protections for private property are weak. State-linked firms dominate many sectors of the economy and the government heavily subsidizes a number of industries.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 1 / 4

Women are disadvantaged in Brunei under Islamic law in matters involving divorce and child custody. The Sharia penal code criminalizes “indecent behavior,” enjoins women to dress “modestly,” and makes abortion and extramarital sex capital offenses. There is no specific law against domestic violence, and although rape is a capital crime, spousal rape is not criminalized.

Transgender people are prohibited from dressing in line with their gender identity under the Sharia-based penal code.

There is no private-sector minimum wage in Brunei. Labor inspections are frequent but are often aimed at identifying undocumented migrant workers. Migrants who come to Brunei to serve as household workers are often coerced into involuntary servitude or debt bondage and can face varying forms of abuse. Workers who overstay visas are regularly imprisoned and, in some cases, caned.

According to the US State Department’s 2021 Trafficking in Persons Report, Bruneian authorities are making efforts to combat human trafficking; however, they did not identify trafficking cases, prosecute traffickers, or secure convictions during the reporting period. The government operates a shelter for women and boys who are trafficked, but adult males do not receive shelter or services.

Brunei ratified the Association of Southeast Asian Nations (ASEAN) Convention against Trafficking in Persons and acceded to the United Nations Trafficking in Persons protocol in 2020.

Bulgaria

Population: 6,900,000

Capital: Sofia

Freedom Status: Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Multiple parties compete in Bulgaria’s democratic system, and there have been several transfers of power between rival parties in recent decades. The country continues to struggle with political corruption and organized crime. Though the media sector remains pluralistic, outlets face increasing pressure to provide government-friendly coverage. Journalists at times encounter threats or violence in the course of their work. Ethnic minorities, particularly Roma, face discrimination. Despite funding shortages and other obstacles, civil society groups have been active and influential.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- Two parliamentary elections, held in April and July, failed to bring about the formation of a new government, sparking a months-long political crisis. The crisis was resolved when a third parliamentary election—held in November to coincide with the presidential election—resulted in the consolidation of a coalition government under Prime Minister Kiril Petkov.
 - Though presidential powers are generally limited, President Rumen Radev took on a prominent political role between the April and November parliamentary elections, when in the absence of an elected parliament, he was required to appoint an interim government; Radev appointed two successive provisional governments during the year. Radev won reelection in November with 65.8 percent of the vote.

- Widespread anticorruption protests were held daily until April, when then prime minister Boyko Borisov left parliament; though Borisov's departure resolved one of the protesters' key demands, frequent antigraft protests continued throughout the rest of the year. Following the November elections, the newly formed coalition government of four "protest parties" announced a shared platform centered on anticorruption and judicial reform.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 33 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 11 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The president, directly elected for up to two five-year terms, is the head of state; the prime minister, who serves as head of government, is chosen by the legislature. Though presidential powers are generally limited, in the event that parliament cannot form a government, the president has the power to dissolve the National Assembly, schedule new elections, and appoint an interim government.

In November 2021, incumbent president Rumen Radev was reelected to the presidency for a second term after winning 65.8 percent of the vote in the second round of the presidential elections. Radev, an independent candidate, was supported by the Bulgarian Socialist Party (BSP), the We Continue the Change party (PP), and the antielite There is Such a People party (ITN). The election was assessed by international observers to be generally competitive and free, though some irregularities, including problems with voting machines, were noted.

In December, the newly elected parliament confirmed Kiril Petkov, a member of the PP, as prime minister.

The unicameral National Assembly, with 240 members, is elected every four years in 31 multimember constituencies.

Parliamentary elections were held as scheduled in April 2021. Though incumbent prime minister Boyko Borisov's ruling party, the Citizens for European Development of Bulgaria (GERB), won the highest percentage of the vote, the party lost its majority, and was unable to form a coalition government. Following the April elections, Radev appointed a provisional government and called for new parliamentary elections to be held in July. A second interim government was put in place after the July parliamentary elections also failed to result in the formation of a government.

A third round of parliamentary elections, held in November, was won by the PP, a newly launched centrist party. The PP, which received 25.5 percent of the vote, was able to form a coalition government with the BSP, the ITN, and the Democratic Bulgaria alliance (DB). After forming, the coalition—which occupies 134 seats in the National Assembly—announced that it will govern based on a shared anticorruption platform.

All three parliamentary elections held in 2021 were deemed to be generally competitive and free by international election observation missions. However, alleged instances of voter intimidation and vote-buying by various groups, including by the Movement for Rights and Freedoms (DPS) party, were reported; such irregularities are persistent in economically and socially vulnerable communities. The Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE) election observation mission also reported the “massive” misuse of government resources by the incumbent GERB during the April elections.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 3 / 4

The Central Election Commission (CEC) administers Bulgaria’s elections and generally works professionally and impartially, though some flaws have been reported in past elections.

Controversial changes to the electoral code were introduced in September 2020, just months ahead of scheduled 2021 elections. The changes mandated a “mixed” mode of voting, using both paper ballots and voting machines; OSCE observers reported that the use of paper balloting led to a high percentage of invalid ballots in the April 2021 elections.

Substantial changes to the electoral framework were introduced between the April and July 2021 parliamentary elections, removing restrictions on voting abroad, reducing the CEC from 20 members to 15, and requiring the implementation of electronic voting as the only voting method. Though the short timeframe between the electoral code amendments and election day negatively impacted electoral administration, the electoral code reforms were generally accepted by both voters and political parties. In both the July and November elections, electronic voting reduced the incidence of invalid ballots; no evidence was found to support allegations of voting machine fraud made by GERB.

In November, contrary to provisions made in the May electoral reforms, the Supreme Administrative Court (SAC) ruled that the CEC would not be permitted to use mandatory manual vote counts to certify the election results.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 14 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 4 / 4

Bulgaria’s party system is quite volatile, featuring both established parties like the BSP and DPS, as well as cycles in which new parties emerge while others decline or disappear. Several new parties emerged and gained power in 2020 and 2021, including both the ITN and the PP, members of the coalition government formed after the November 2021 parliamentary elections. The DB alliance, a third member of the governing coalition, was formed in 2018.

There have been multiple peaceful transfers of power between rival parties through elections since the end of communist rule in 1990.

In 2021, the ruling GERB party lost its majority in the April 2021 parliamentary elections; a coalition of opposition parties came to power following the November parliamentary elections.

B3. Are the people’s political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 3 / 4

Bulgarians are generally free to make independent political choices. However, limited public funding and unlimited private funding for political parties leaves parties vulnerable to the undue influence of private donors.

Prominent businessmen dominate major political parties and exert influence over party platforms and policy decisions. The problem of business influence is exacerbated by a lack of transparency in campaign finance law.

While marginalized groups generally have full political rights, the law dictates that electoral campaigns must be conducted in the Bulgarian language, which hinders outreach to non-Bulgarian-speaking minority groups. The ethnic Turkish minority is represented by the DPS, but the Roma are more marginalized. Small Romany parties are active, and many Roma reportedly vote for the DPS, though none hold seats in the parliament. Courts have continued to deny registration to the political party OMO Ilinden, which seeks legal recognition of a Macedonian ethnic minority in Bulgaria; this issue was featured in a critical European Parliament resolution on the rule of law and fundamental rights in Bulgaria, adopted in October 2020.

Members of far-right nationalist parties have engaged in hate speech against Roma, ethnic Turks, Jews, Muslims, migrants, and refugees, among other groups, particularly during election periods.

Women are underrepresented in parliament, and the inclusion of women's issues in politics is generally lacking.

So-called oligarchs exert influence on the vote in smaller municipalities and within marginalized groups in particular, an issue referred to as the "controlled vote." Instances of controlled voting decreased following the May 2021 adoption of electoral reforms requiring electronic voting.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 8 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 3 / 4

Elected executive and legislative officials in general are able to set and implement policies without undue interference from external or unelected entities. However, "oligarch" politicians in the last several years have had increasing influence on policy making.

The informal influence on government of the nominally opposition party DPS and its honorary chair Ahmed Dogan, and the widespread perception that aspects of the state have been "captured" by dubious business figures, were among the triggers of the mass antigovernment protests in 2020.

The businessman and DPS lawmaker Delyan Peevski is also suspected of having had influence over policymaking, and of having played a role in securing the appointment of Ivan Geshev as the country's controversial prosecutor general. In July, as protests continued, Borisov replaced several of his cabinet ministers and GERB released a statement saying the dismissals were necessary to "eliminate insinuations that GERB and the three are directly controlled by the DPS and Peevski."

Bulgaria, which joined the European Union (EU) in 2007, has struggled to meet the bloc's anticorruption requirements amid resistance from much of the political class. Anti-corruption laws are not adequately enforced, including in high-profile cases, contributing to a culture of impunity. The country remains subject to long-term monitoring by the EU's Cooperation and Verification Mechanism (CVM), whose annual reports have called for new legislative efforts to combat corruption.

In 2020, mass antigovernment protests were launched in response to a series of corruption scandals involving both the prosecutorial office and a number of politicians. The resignations of Geshev and Borisov, both of whom are widely associated with corrupt practices within the government, were key demand of the protesters. Though Borisov left parliament following the April 2021 elections, Geshev remained in office at year's end.

The judiciary has been inefficient in tackling high-profile corruption cases; a 2021 report released by the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD) criticized the prosecutor's office for its persistent failure to investigate and prosecute cases of corruption.

The coalition government that formed following the November 2021 elections is made up of four "protest parties" that share an anticorruption platform centered on judicial reform.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 3 / 4

Although Bulgaria has laws meant to ensure that the government operates with transparency, they are only partially enforced. While the transparency in the work of Parliament, the cabinet, and municipal bodies has increased considerably in recent years, public access to information about budgets and spending of various government agencies is sometimes inadequate or presented in an inaccessible way.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 46 / 60 (+1)

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 13 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 2 / 4

The constitution protects freedom of expression, including for the press, but journalists face threats and pressure from private owners or public media management. Even though the media sector remains pluralistic, many outlets are dependent on financial contributions from the state (through advertising), effectively resulting in pressure to run government-friendly material. Media ownership remains opaque.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 3 / 4

Religious freedom is generally respected, but members of minority faiths in the mostly Orthodox Christian country have reported instances of harassment and discrimination, and some local authorities have prohibited proselytizing and other religious activities by such groups. A 2016 law that imposed fines for the wearing of face-covering garments in public locations was widely understood to be directed against Muslims.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

Academic freedom is generally upheld in practice.

In April 2021 a professor was fired for criticizing a preelection university visit by the prime minister Borisov as politically motivated on social media; he was reinstated following public outcry.

Due to a pervasive lack of access to both the internet and digital devices, Roma students have been disproportionately affected by COVID-19-related online learning requirements. In 2020, the government offered to provide free internet access to Roma communities and local NGOs donated a number of electronic devices to students in need. The education ministry provided 20,000 computers and tablets to students at state and municipal schools in August 2021.

Freedom of expression is guaranteed by the constitution. However, Bulgaria's criminal code allows for legal secret surveillance of citizens in a wide range of cases; in recent years, there has been increasing concern that authorities have misused such surveillance laws in order to monitor citizens who criticize the government.

In July 2021, then interim interior minister, Boyko Rashkov, testified that the prosecutor's office had conducted illegal mass wiretapping of antigovernment protesters in 2020. His testimony was corroborated in September by leaked police documents that showed that the government had secretly wiretapped around 1,000 people who had participated in the protests.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 11 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

The authorities generally respect constitutional guarantees of freedom of assembly.

Mass antigovernment demonstrations erupted in July 2020; though state authorities generally respected the right to peaceful protest during the protests, on at least two occasions police used excessive force against participants, prompting criticism in the country and from international organizations. In 2021, it was revealed that the government had ordered the unlawful secret surveillance of roughly 1,000 protesters in 2020.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 4 / 4

Nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) operate freely and have a degree of influence, though they experience funding shortages, often rely on foreign donors, and sometimes face hostility from politicians and interest groups.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 3 / 4

Workers have the right to join trade unions, which are generally able to operate, but some public employees cannot legally strike. Collective bargaining is legal—collective contracts are listed in a specialized public registry. Trade unions are partners to the government and business in discussing public budgets and other issues (retirement age, pensions reforms, and healthcare reforms, for example), yet their voice and influence is weak.

F. RULE OF LAW: 10 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 3 / 4

Bulgaria's judiciary has benefited from legal and institutional reforms associated with EU membership and is generally considered independent, but is still prone to politicization. Despite significant legislation formally guaranteeing judicial independence, the members and governing bodies of the judiciary often act in accordance with the ruling majority.

A Supreme Judicial Council (SJC), responsible for judicial and prosecutorial appointments and management, was installed under revised rules in 2017, with half the members (six judges, four prosecutors, and an investigator) elected by their peers and half by a two-thirds parliamentary majority. Bulgarian legal observers have reported that in practice, requiring a two-thirds majority vote in parliament to appoint SJC members has allowed political parties—including minority parties such as DPS—to exert undue influence over the selection and appointment of the country's top magistrates.

Tensions have increased in recent years between the prosecutor general's office and some of the courts, with high-ranking prosecutors verbally attacking the Supreme Court of Cassation (SCC), its court decisions, and its chair. The SJC, taking the side of the prosecutors, has launched disciplinary procedures against judges critical of it, which are widely seen as politically motivated.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 2 / 4

Constitutional rights to due process are not always upheld. Police have been accused of misconduct, including arbitrary arrests and failure to inform suspects of their rights. Public trust in the justice system is low due to its reputed vulnerability to political and outside pressure.

The long seven-year mandate granted to the prosecutor general and the lack of effective accountability mechanisms have long been noted as major problems with the prosecutorial office, weakening due process and rule of law in the country. In July 2020, the Constitutional Court ruled that any prosecutor may launch an investigation on the activities of the prosecutor general; however, the prosecutor general's strong position both with regard to career promotion, and within the SJC, does not de facto permit such investigations to take place. This leaves the most powerful figure within the judicial system without effective mechanisms of control over their actions.

A series of scandals involving the prosecutorial office, including alleged raids of private businesses, actions suppressing voices critical of the government, as well as a raid of the offices of the Bulgarian president, were among the triggers of the 2020 antigovernment protests.

Although the population faces few acute threats to physical security, police brutality, including abuse of suspects in custody, remains a problem. Overcrowding and violence plague many of Bulgaria's prisons. Organized crime is still a major issue, and scores of suspected contract killings since the 1990s are unsolved. A September 2021 report found that authorities had committed severe civil rights violations against citizens during the 2020 antigovernment protests, including the disproportionate use of force by police.

Ethnic minorities, particularly Roma, face discrimination in employment, health care, education, and housing, though the government and NGOs operate a number of programs meant to improve their social integration. Authorities periodically demolish illegally constructed or irregular housing—mostly in areas occupied by Roma—without providing alternative shelter.

COVID-19-related lockdown measures left many Roma unable to access basic services in 2020 and 2021; the Romany minority was also subject to disproportionately severe pandemic-related restrictions throughout 2020. Human rights watchdogs in the country and abroad raised serious concerns that COVID-19 had exacerbated racism against the Roma in Bulgaria.

Migrants and asylum seekers have reportedly faced various forms of mistreatment by Bulgarian authorities, including beatings and extortion.

Discrimination based on sexual orientation or gender identity is illegal, but societal bias against LGBT+ people persists. Throughout 2021, several LGBT+ events were disrupted, and in October, Rainbow Hub—a well-known LGBT+ organization in Sofia—and its employees were violently attacked by a mob allegedly led by a far-right political figure. Anti-LGBT+ violence is significantly underreported in Bulgaria, and largely goes unaddressed by authorities. However, following the October attack on Rainbow Hub, several politicians and the prosecutor's office announced that they plan to propose legislation that will allow homophobic attacks to be prosecuted as hate crimes.

A gender equality law passed in 2016 was designed to foster equal opportunity for women, but discrimination in employment persists: women are employed less often and paid less than men.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 12 / 16 (+1)

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4 (+1)

For the most part, Bulgarians have faced few major restrictions on their freedom of movement. However, the government restricts the ability of asylum seekers to move outside of the district where they are housed.

In 2020, the COVID-19-related state of emergency featured selective blockades of mostly Romany-populated neighborhoods in several towns. These discriminatory restrictions were discontinued in 2021, though the state of emergency was extended through the end of the year.

Corruption and bias can sometimes hamper efforts to change one's place of employment.

Score Change: The score improved from 3 to 4 because disproportionate and discriminatory COVID-19 movement restrictions issued against members of the Romany minority were rescinded during the year.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 3 / 4

The legal and regulatory framework is generally supportive of property rights and private business, though property rights are not always respected in practice, and corruption continues to hamper business and investment. The gray economy of undeclared business activity has been estimated at over 20 percent of the country's economy. Attempts at business raiding, including with the suspected assistance of state institutions and the prosecutorial office, are perceived to be on the rise and were among the triggers of the antigraft protests in 2020–21.

The law generally grants equal rights to men and women regarding personal status matters such as marriage and divorce. Domestic violence remains a problem. People who have experienced domestic violence and NGOs addressing gender-based violence claim that state authorities are often ineffective in providing protection and pursuing criminal charges when abuse is reported.

Same-sex marriage is illegal in Bulgaria, and same-sex couples are barred from adopting children.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 2 / 4

Labor laws provide basic protections against exploitative working conditions, but they do not extend in practice to gray-market employment. Roma and other ethnic minorities are particularly vulnerable to trafficking for sexual and labor exploitation. Although the government has continued to step up efforts to combat trafficking, shelter victims, and punish perpetrators, these measures have not matched the scale of the problem, and punishments remain light in practice.

Burkina Faso

Population: 21,500,000

Capital: Ouagadougou

Freedom Status: Partly Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Presidential and legislative elections held in 2015 and 2020 have laid a foundation for the continued development of democratic institutions in Burkina Faso. While civil society and organized labor remain strong forces for democracy, Burkinabè also face continued insecurity and violence from armed militant groups, militia groups, and government forces.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- The government restricted cellular connectivity for eight days in November as antigovernment protests were held in several cities, including Ouagadougou. Some protests were violent, with acts of vandalism and forceful security responses reported in Ouagadougou.
- Armed groups attacked security forces, militias, and civilians during the year, causing numerous casualties and internal displacement. As many as 160 people were killed in a June attack on the village of Solhan, while at least 53 were killed in a November assault on a military police outpost near Inata. In December, at least 41 militia members were killed in an ambush in Loroum Province.
- In April, a military court indicted former president Blaise Compaoré in absentia for his role in the 1987 assassination of then president Thomas Sankara, who he deposed in a coup. The trial remained unfinished at year's end.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 23 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 7 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 2 / 4

The president is head of state and is directly elected to no more than two five-year terms. Roch Marc Christian Kaboré of the People's Movement for Progress (MPP) was reelected in November 2020, winning 57.7 percent of the vote in the first round. Insecurity impeded electoral organization in some areas, particularly in the north and east. Islamist militants also threatened violence against voters. Opposition figures initially alleged fraud, but observers considered the election fair; no formal objections were received by the time the results were certified in December.

The prime minister is head of government and is appointed by the president with the approval of the National Assembly. The prime minister recommends a cabinet that is formally appointed by the president. Lassina Zerbo was named prime minister in December 2021 after President Kaboré dismissed his predecessor, Christophe Dabiré.

The 127 members of the National Assembly are directly elected to five-year terms via proportional representation. The November 2020 legislative elections, held concurrently with the presidential poll, were generally viewed as open and fair, despite ongoing insecurity. Voter turnout was reportedly low in some areas due to insecurity and a lack of polling stations. The MPP won 56 seats while the Congress for Democracy and Progress (CDP) won 20.

Municipal elections held in 2016 showed an erosion of support for CDP in favor of the MPP. Election-related violence prevented polling in some districts. In March 2021, the government delayed local elections to May 2022.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 3 / 4

The Independent National Electoral Commission is responsible for organizing elections, and the November 2020 polls were generally well administered. Local observers noted irregularities, such as a lack of ballot papers at some precincts, but reported that these issues did not affect the contests' integrity.

In 2020, the National Assembly adopted a revised electoral code that drew criticism from opposition politicians. Under the code, the president can refer cases of "force majeure or exceptional circumstances" that impede electoral organization to the Constitutional Council. The code allows the validation of results on the basis of polling stations that operate on election day, with the court's agreement. That December, the Constitutional Council annulled votes from 200 polling places due to irregularities.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 10 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 2 / 4

The constitution guarantees the right to form political parties, but their ability to participate in political activity is sometimes restricted by the government. The government authorized 146 political groups to participate in the November 2020 elections.

Major parties, such as the MPP, CDP, and Union for Progress and Change, have extensive patronage networks and disproportionate access to media coverage, making it difficult for other parties to build support. Presidential candidates must also provide a 25 million CFA franc ($45,300) deposit.

The end of former president Compaoré's 27-year regime in 2014 gave way to a freer environment in which opposition parties can consolidate popular support and gain power through elections. However, a history of rotation of power between parties has not been firmly established.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 2 / 4

The Burkinabè military maintains a significant presence in politics, and the history of military intervention poses a threat to democratic stability. In 2015, the presidential guard, which was loyal to Compaoré, attempted to stage a coup but failed after the army's chief of staff moved to support the transitional government.

In parts of the country, armed militant groups target local leaders for assassination and abduction, prompting some to relocate outside their area of political responsibility.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 3 / 4

The constitution enshrines full political rights and electoral opportunities for all segments of the population. However, a small educated elite, the military, and labor unions have historically dominated political life.

Women are underrepresented in political leadership positions. In 2020, the National Assembly adopted a 30 percent gender quota for party lists and introduced an alternating system meant to improve the position of female candidates on those lists. As of July 2021, however, women occupied only 16 parliamentary seats.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 6 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 2 / 4

Laws are promulgated and debated by the National Assembly. While democratic institutions continue to develop, they cannot withstand the influence of the military and other elite groups. Attacks by Islamic militants severely impede the government's ability to implement its policies in the north and east.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 2 / 4

Corruption is widespread, particularly among customs officials and municipal police. Anticorruption laws and bodies are generally ineffective, though local nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) provide some accountability by publicizing official corruption and its effects.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 2 / 4

The successful 2015 elections and installation of a civilian government signified a marked improvement in government accountability and transparency. However, government procurement processes are opaque, and procedures meant to increase transparency are often not followed. Government officials are required to make financial disclosures, but the information is rarely made public, and penalties for noncompliance do not appear to be enforced. In September 2021, the government launched a new online platform to facilitate the declaration of assets by public officials.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 30 / 60 (-1)

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 11 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 2 / 4

The media environment has improved in the post-Compaoré era. Since then, defamation has been decriminalized, reporters at the public broadcaster have experienced less political interference, and private outlets operate with relative freedom. However, a 2019 penal-code revision made disseminating information about terrorist attacks and security activity, along with the "demoralization" of defense and security forces, criminal offenses punishable by prison terms of up to 10 years.

In May 2021, the government tightened media access to camps housing internally displaced persons (IDPs), citing journalists' safety and the "dignity" of residents. In June, the Higher Council for Communication suspended a local outlet's broadcasts for five days after it allegedly broadcast incorrect information regarding an attack on Solhan.

Journalists also face heightened risks due to militant attacks. In April 2021, three foreign journalists producing a documentary on poaching were abducted and killed.

Burkina Faso is a secular state, and freedom of religion is generally respected. The population is predominately Muslim with a large Christian minority. Followers of both religions often engage in syncretic practices. However, religious activity is affected by ongoing insecurity. In May 2021, 15 individuals attending a baptism in the village of Adjarara were killed by a group of unidentified assailants.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 3 / 4

Academic freedom is unrestricted, though due to the former regime's repressive tactics against student-led protests, a legacy of tension between the government and academic organizations persists. In May 2021, students at secondary schools violently demonstrated to protest planned reforms to national exams; one student at an Ouagadougou school died during the protests. The government subsequently announced that school's indefinite closure, citing damage sustained during the protests, though the school's teachers called the closure a political decision.

Islamic militant groups in the north and east regularly threaten schools and teachers, resulting in the closure of numerous institutions.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 3 / 4

Private discussion is unrestricted in much of the country. However, attacks and intimidation by Islamic militants in the north and east, an increased security presence in response to their activities, and 2019 penal-code revisions have dissuaded people from discussing local news, politics, and other sensitive topics. In some areas, Burkinabè fear surveillance from the informers of Islamic militants, who may attack communities who speak out against them.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 7 / 12 (-1)

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 2 / 4 (-1)

Freedom of assembly is constitutionally guaranteed and is sometimes upheld in practice. In July 2021, for example, thousands of protesters freely marched in several cities to express their frustration with ongoing insecurity. In October, however, Burkinabè authorities deported a prominent activist who was planning to attend a protest against French military activity in the Sahel. Authorities in the town of Bobo Dioulasso refused to grant a permit for that demonstration, citing security concerns.

On November 19, protesters angered by ongoing militant violence blocked a road leading to Niger, impeding a French military convoy traveling there. Burkinabè security officers and French soldiers fired warning shots at protesters on November 20; at least four protesters were injured. The government restricted cellular services later that day, citing security concerns, and lifted connectivity restrictions on November 28.

The block coincided with protests that were held in several areas, including Ouagadougou; participants called for President Kaboré's resignation and criticized the government's handling of the security situation. Some protests, including a November 27 event in Ouagadougou, were violent. Protesters in the capital engaged in vandalism while authorities used tear gas. Several organizers were subsequently arrested in the following days, facing charges like endangering state security and destruction of public property.

In June 2021, government extended a state of emergency across 14 provinces in 6 regions. The state of emergency, which will remain in force through July 2022, allows the government to restrict the freedom of assembly.

Score Change: The score declined from 3 to 2 because the government extended a state of emergency, which allows authorities to restrict assemblies, in June and because authorities blocked internet access as protests were held in November.

While many NGOs operate openly and freely, human rights groups have reported abuses by security forces in the past. NGOs face harassment in carrying out their work and NGO leaders argue that some legal provisions, including vaguely worded terrorism laws, can be misused to silence human rights defenders. NGO members and activists also risk punishment under the 2019 penal-code revisions. In August 2021, civil society leader Pascal Zaida was arrested for endangering state security after he criticized the government's response to militant attacks at a press conference. Zaida was subsequently released without charge three days later.

NGO workers also face the risk of violence; in 2019, two Democratic Youth Organization (ODJ) activists were killed while traveling to meet a government official in Yagha Province. In May 2021, the ODJ denounced the government over its handling of the case, noting that autopsies had not been performed.

In September 2021, the government suspended the activities of the Norwegian Refugee Council after it criticized the government's slow IDP enrollment efforts. The organization was permitted to resume its activities in October.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 3 / 4

The constitution guarantees the right to strike. Unions frequently and freely engage in strikes and collective bargaining, and coordinate with civil society to organize demonstrations on social issues. However, the government has used legal means to suppress union activity, including the denial of permits for planned demonstrations.

F. RULE OF LAW: 5 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 2 / 4

The judiciary is formally independent but has historically been subject to executive influence and corruption.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 1 / 4

Constitutional due-process guarantees are undermined by corruption and the inefficacy of the judiciary and police force. The judicial system is also affected by ongoing insecurity, which has caused the closure of some courts and has limited access to judicial services.

The Burkinabè government organized and completed its first criminal trials for terrorism offenses in August 2021. However, the terrorism court is underresourced, resulting in long pretrial detentions and slow investigations.

The security environment is affected by Islamic militant groups, bandits, and militias. Traditional leaders, government officials, lawmakers, and civilians are regularly targeted for kidnapping or assassination by militants. Militants target government institutions, like health clinics and schools, restricting access to government services. Children are increasingly being recruited by militants and engage in armed activity. Ongoing violence has prompted significant internal displacement; in December 2021, the UN Children's Fund (UNICEF) reported that nearly 1.6 million Burkinabè were internally displaced.

Government forces and state-allied militias like the Volunteers for the Defense of the Homeland (VDP) commit extrajudicial violence. Militants, militias, and government forces are believed to orchestrate forced disappearances.

Security forces, militias, and civilians faced armed attacks during 2021, causing numerous casualties. In June, armed attackers, most of them children, targeted the village of Solhan, killing as many as 160 people and prompting a wave of internal displacement. In November, at least 53 were killed when armed assailants attacked a military police post near Inata. In December, at least 41 VDP personnel were killed in an ambush in Loroum Province.

Allegations of torture and abuse of suspects in custody by police are common, and prison conditions are poor. Security forces have been accused of forcibly detaining and abusing civilians.

While the constitution outlaws all forms of discrimination, prejudice occurs in practice. Members of the Fulani ethnic group have expressed dissatisfaction over government neglect, discrimination, and abuse, particularly at the hands of security forces and militias.

LGBT+ people, as well as those living with HIV, routinely experience discrimination, including difficulty accessing health services. While illegal, gender discrimination remains common in employment and education.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 7 / 16G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 1 / 4

Due to insecurity, the government has established heavily guarded checkpoints on roads and has instituted curfews and states of emergency in some provinces. Travelers are sometimes subjected to bribery or harassment by security forces at checkpoints. Rural villages in the commune of Madjoari were blockaded by militants during part of 2021. As of May, more than 2,200 schools were closed due to insecurity, affecting over 300,000 students.

In recent years, the government has implemented reforms to reduce the amount of capital necessary to start a business, facilitating the ability to obtain credit information, and improving the insolvency resolution process. However, the business environment is hampered by corruption.

Insurgents regularly interfered with commercial activities in 2021, including by stealing livestock, imposing taxes, and interrupting mining operations.

Women face discrimination in cases involving family rights and inheritance. Early marriage remains an issue, especially in the north. The practice of female genital mutilation (FGM) is less common than in the past, but still occurs. Domestic violence remains a problem despite government efforts to combat it. In 2021, female IDPs reported victimization by community leaders who controlled food-aid distribution in exchange for sex.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 2 / 4

Burkina Faso is a source, transit, and destination country for human trafficking. Child labor is prominent in the mining sector, with 20,000 children working in gold mines. Children are also recruited by militant groups. Women from neighboring countries are recruited by traffickers and transported to Burkina Faso, where they are forced into prostitution.

According to the US State Department's Trafficking in Persons Report 2021, the Burkinabè government did not prosecute suspected traffickers and provided insufficient support and shelter for trafficking survivors during its reporting period.

Burundi

Population: 12,200,000

Capital: Gitega

Freedom Status: Not Free

Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: Burundi has been in political and economic crisis since 2015. Democratic gains made after the 12-year civil war ended in 2005 have been undone by a shift toward authoritarian politics and violent repression against anyone perceived to oppose the ruling party, the National Council for the Defense of Democracy–Forces for the Defense of Democracy (CNDD-FDD).

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- In March, President Évariste Ndayishimiye pardoned over 5,200 prisoners via decree, citing overcrowding. However, the UN Commission of Inquiry (CoI) on Burundi reported that only 2,600 pardoned prisoners were released by July, and that some were later rearrested or kidnapped.
 - In June, the European Union (EU) announced its intention to lift sanctions against Burundi, though that process was not completed by year's end.
 - The government lifted bans on some media outlets during the year. Bans on RSF Bonesha FM and the Ikiraho media outlet were lifted in February and June respectively. However, bans on the British Broadcasting Corporation (BBC) and Voice of America (VOA) remained in effect at year's end.
 - Burundians faced several security incidents in September. The government blamed terrorists for grenade attacks in the cities of Bujumbura and Gitega, while a rebel group claimed responsibility for a mortar attack against Bujumbura's airport. At least five people died in the Bujumbura grenade attack, while another two died in Gitega.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 4 / 40A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 1 / 12*A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 1 / 4

Burundi adopted a new constitution in 2005 after a series of agreements ended the country's 12-year civil war. The constitution was amended in 2018 through a referendum. Among other provisions, the amended constitution lengthened presidential terms from five years to seven, consolidating the rule of then president Pierre Nkurunziza—who had served three terms—and the CNDD-FDD.

In January 2020, CNDD-FDD insiders selected Évariste Ndayishimiye, a former army general and interior minister, as the party's candidate to succeed Nkurunziza for that May's election. Ndayishimiye won 71.5 percent of the vote, while Agathon Rwaso of the National Congress for Liberty (CNL) received 25.2 percent. Gaston Sindimwo of the Union for National Progress (UPRONA) received 1.7 percent, while others received 1.6 percent.

The contest was marred by a wide-ranging campaign of repression, which the UN CoI said included the intelligence services, police, and the Imbonerakure, the ruling party's youth wing. However, violence and repression were less prevalent during the 2020 electoral period when compared to 2015. Relatively few COVID-19 mitigation measures were enforced during the 2020 campaign, with the CNDD-FDD encouraging large election rallies. Several days before election day, the government expelled World Health Organization (WHO) officials who voiced concern over the campaigning. International observers were also barred. The CNL claimed that the results were fraudulent, though the Constitutional Court upheld them in June. Nkurunziza died days after the election, with Ndayishimiye consequently succeeding him that month, ahead of schedule.

The president appoints a vice president, who must be approved separately by a two-thirds majority in both houses of Parliament. The 2018 constitutional amendments reintroduced the position of prime minister. In late June 2020, Prosper Bazombanza was named vice president, while former public security minister Alain-Guillaume Bunyoni was named prime minister.

Parliament's lower house, the National Assembly, includes 100 members who are directly elected via proportional representation along with 23 "co-opted" members to ensure that members of the Hutu ethnic group hold 60 percent of the house while Tutsis hold 40 percent. Members serve five-year terms. The upper house, the Senate, consists of 39 members, 36 of whom are chosen by locally elected officials for five-year terms. Three seats are reserved for the Twa ethnic group.

National Assembly elections took place concurrently with the May 2020 presidential elections, amid the COVID-19 pandemic and a campaign to repress opposition groups. The CNDD-FDD secured 86 seats, while the CNL secured 32 and UPRONA secured 2. The Twa received 3 seats via co-option.

Senators were indirectly elected in July 2020; the CNDD-FDD received 34 seats, while the CNL and UPRONA each received 1. Twa members held 3 seats.

The five-member Independent National Electoral Commission is under the effective control of the ruling CNDD-FDD. In 2015, two members who fled the country amid that year's unrest were replaced with pro-Nkurunziza appointees approved by a CNDD-FDD-controlled Parliament. Constitutional amendments extending presidential term limits, consolidating power in the executive, and allowing for a future revision of the Burundian ethnic power-sharing system were approved in a 2018 referendum that was marred by a violent intimidation campaign conducted by the CNDD-FDD.

CNL presidential candidate Rwasa challenged the conduct of the 2020 presidential election, alleging incidents of ballot-box stuffing, falsified election reports, and votes counted from deceased or exiled citizens. The Constitutional Court rejected that challenge that June.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 3 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 1 / 4

Political party formation is legally allowed, but the activities of opposition parties and political leaders are discouraged under the threat of retaliatory violence, repression, or arrest. Individuals are also intimidated into joining the CNDD-FDD.

The UN CoI's August 2021 report to the UN Human Rights Council noted that authorities continued to arbitrarily arrest and disappear opposition party members. The report also noted that CNL offices were targeted by opponents and that CNL members face difficulties in holding meetings. In July, Elie Ngomirakiza, a CNL leader in Mutimbuzi commune, was reportedly kidnapped by soldiers. Ngomirakiza's whereabouts remained unknown as of September.

The opposition has little realistic opportunity to increase its popular support through elections. Opposition parties, politicians, and their supporters face harassment, intimidation, and assassination. Many are forced to operate in exile.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 0 / 4

The Imbonerakure, National Intelligence Service (SNR), and police are allies of the CNDD-FDD and use violence and intimidation to influence people's political choices.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 2 / 4

The 2005 constitution requires power-sharing between Hutus and Tutsis in Parliament, and additionally stipulates that women and Twa representatives be seated in both houses. However, the constitutional revisions approved in 2018 require that these ethnic quotas be reviewed over the next five years, opening the door for their elimination.

In June 2020, President Ndayishimiye appointed Imelde Sabushimike as human rights minister; Sabushimike is the country's first Twa cabinet minister.

Women face social pressure that can deter active political participation, and few women hold political office at senior levels. A 2020 UN CoI report noted that women face state-sanctioned violence for perceived or actual opposition to the CNDD-FDD.

The CNDD-FDD apparatus has violently targeted returning refugees on suspicion of opposition sympathies, along with individuals suspected of ties to Burundian rebels operating in the Democratic Republic of Congo.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 0 / 12C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 0 / 4

The ruling CNDD-FDD, whose election to power fell far short of standards for free and fair elections, controls policy development and implementation.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 0 / 4

Corruption is rampant in Burundi. Corrupt officials generally enjoy impunity, even when wrongdoing is exposed by nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) and other actors. Anticorruption organizations are underresourced and ineffective.

Though President Ndayishimiye has vowed to address corruption, his actions in office have been contradictory. The Ndayishimiye administration dismissed over 120 government employees for embezzlement between February and May 2021, though none of them faced prosecution. In May, the president dismissed Commerce Minister Immaculée Ndabaneze after over suspicions of embezzlement. Ndayishimiye also reorganized Burundian anticorruption bodies since taking office, abolishing an anticorruption court and an anticorruption brigade and placing their functions within existing offices. In September 2021, the UN CoI criticized Ndayishimiye's declaration that civil servants can accept bribes to "contribute to the development of the country."

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 0 / 4

Government operations are opaque, and government officials are generally unaccountable to voters. There are few opportunities for civil society actors and others to participate in policymaking. Due to recurrent assassinations and assassination attempts, politicians are wary of organizing town hall-style meetings or making other public appearances before voters.

The government was not transparent during the COVID-19 pandemic, with authorities providing little scientific information.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 10 / 60D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 4 / 16*D1. Are there free and independent media? 0 / 4

Freedom of expression is constitutionally guaranteed but severely restricted in practice by draconian press laws and a dangerous operating environment for media workers, who risk threats, harassment, and arrest in response to their coverage. A 2013 media law limits the protection of journalistic sources, requires journalists to meet certain educational and professional standards, and bans content related to national defense, security, public safety, and the state currency. The government dominates the media through its ownership of the public television broadcaster, radio stations, and newspaper Le Renouveau. Key independent news outlets destroyed in the political violence of 2015 have yet to be reestablished.

The government has banned media outlets, though some bans were lifted in 2021. In February, the Burundian media regulator began talks to restore domestic access to the Iwacu outlet, though accessibility was not restored as of mid-2021. The regulator lifted the ban on RSF Bonesha FM in February and lifted bans on Ikirihoo and the BBC in June. However, Human Rights Watch (HRW) reported that access to BBC content was still restricted at year's end. The potential end to the ban on VOA was conditioned on the surrender of a VOA-affiliated journalist, which the outlet did not comply with.

Many journalists have fled the country since 2015, and some have been forcibly disappeared. In February 2021, the Supreme Court published a 2020 decision to issue life sentences against seven exiled journalists for their alleged involvement in the events of 2015.

Freedom of religion is generally observed. However, relations between the government and the Roman Catholic Church, of which most Burundians are members, have worsened in recent years. In 2017, the government set up a commission to monitor religious groups and guard against political subversion within them. In 2019, the UN CoI reported that the government was exerting more control over churches to curb political dissent.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 1 / 4

Both university students and staff who support the CNDD-FDD receive preferential treatment at academic institutions. Continued intimidation of opposition supporters has created an atmosphere of fear and limited free speech on university campuses. Reports indicate that teachers allied to the CNDD-FDD have intimidated students who are considered unsupportive, in some cases preventing them from attending school. Teachers are increasingly screened for political loyalty to the ruling party.

Some schools barred students of voting age who had not made monetary contributions to the 2020 elections from attending class, though the practice was prohibited in 2019.

The SNR and the Imbonerakure actively surveil private citizens. There is a reluctance to engage in speech which could be perceived as critical of the CNDD-FDD for fear of reprisal. The Imbonerakure used surveillance and harassment tactics in the run-up to the 2018 referendum, such as ensuring citizens paid election taxes and attacking those who had not, while assaulting individuals expressing opposition to the ruling party. Social media and messaging applications were notably blocked on election day in 2020.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 1 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 0 / 4

Opposition or antigovernment meetings and rallies are usually prevented or dispersed, and participants face harassment or arrest. Many people who participated in the 2015 protests against late president Nkurunziza fled Burundi amid a subsequent crackdown.

In August 2021, the UN CoI noted that the strictest restrictions on assembly were effectively loosened after the 2020 elections, as the CNL was perceived as a less acute threat to the CNDD-FDD.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 0 / 4

NGOs in Burundi face restrictive registration laws and persecution for activity seen as hostile to the government. A number of human rights and other groups perceived as antigovernment were banned during the 2018 referendum and the 2020 elections, and many of their members have fled the country. A May 2021 HRW report noted that NGO workers avoided open criticism of the government.

Human rights advocates can face arrest and imprisonment. In 2018, antitorture and antipoverty advocate Germain Rukuki was sentenced to 32 years' imprisonment on charges including rebellion. An appeals court reduced Rukuki's sentence to 1 year in June 2021, and Rukuki was released by July.

In April 2021, the government reversed its ban on Words and Actions for the Awakening of Consciences and the Evolution of Mentalities, an anticorruption NGO.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 1 / 4

The constitution provides protections for organized labor, and the labor code guarantees the right to strike. However, it is unlikely that union members would feel free to exercise legally guaranteed collective bargaining rights in the current political climate.

F. RULE OF LAW: 1 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 0 / 4

The judiciary is hindered by corruption and a lack of resources and training. The judiciary is generally subservient to the executive, which regularly interferes in the criminal justice system to protect CNDD-FDD and Imbonerakure members and persecute the political opposition.

In 2020, the Constitutional Court partially checked the CNDD-FDD's power by upholding a challenge to the disqualification of an opposition parliamentary candidate. However, it did not entertain a challenge over the conduct of the presidential election, despite evidence of widespread fraud and intimidation. The UN CoI criticized the judiciary's performance in its August 2021 report, citing corruption and the CNDD-FDD's continued interference. The UN CoI also reported that Germain Rukuki's appeal was affected by executive interference, noting that the reduction in his sentence was not promulgated until after the EU announced its intention to lift sanctions against Burundi.

The courts, police, and security forces do not operate independently or professionally, and constitutional guarantees of due process are generally not upheld. Arbitrary arrest and lengthy pretrial detention are common. The World Prison Brief (WPB) reported that 54.6 percent of all prisoners were pretrial detainees as of December 2021.

Defendants must provide their own legal representation, making trial rights dependent on the ability to afford a lawyer. Some detainees accused of participating in the 2015 protests or subsequent antigovernment violence did not have access to lawyers and were forced to make false confessions under threat of death.

The Burundian prison system is overcrowded, with the WPB reporting the prison population at 303 percent of capacity as of December 2021. Prisoners risked contracting COVID-19, with healthcare workers reporting that quarantine measures were insufficiently enforced within the prison system in 2020. In March 2021, President Ndayishimiye pardoned over 5,200 prisoners via decree, citing overcrowding. However, only 2,600 individuals were released by July according to the UN CoI, which noted that some were subsequently rearrested or kidnapped.

In 2017, the International Criminal Court (ICC) opened an investigation into alleged crimes against humanity committed by the government. Burundi left the ICC days later, becoming the first country in the world to do so.

The security situation in Burundi remains extremely poor. The August 2021 UN CoI report notes that widespread human rights violations persist; violations include forced disappearance, execution, torture, and arbitrary arrest and detention. The report identified the SNR as the principal perpetrator, though it also noted the involvement of the Imbonerakure and police. A 2018 BBC investigative report found that the government operated at least 22 secret facilities where dissidents were reportedly tortured and killed. The government called the report “fake” and threatened to sue the BBC.

According to the Office of the UN High Commissioner for Refugees, 265,000 Burundian refugees resided domestically or in nearby countries as of December 2021, including 140,000 returnees from Tanzania and another 125,000 still residing there.

Several security incidents were reported in 2021. In May, at least 12 people were killed when vehicles traveling in central Burundi were ambushed in an apparent robbery attempt. Another 18 died when a convoy in central Burundi was attacked by unidentified armed assailants in June. Grenade attacks were reported in Bujumbura and Gitega in September, which the government blamed on terrorists. Five people were killed in Bujumbura, while another two were killed in Gitega. Also in September, a rebel group launched a mortar attack against Bujumbura’s airport but did not significantly damage it.

Despite quotas for representation in the National Assembly, the Twa population remains marginalized relative to the Hutu and Tutsi ethnic groups. People living with albinism face systematic discrimination and violence. LGBT+ people also experience official and societal discrimination. The 2009 penal code criminalizes same-sex sexual activity, and punishments include up to two years in prison.

Discrimination against women is common in access to education, healthcare, and employment.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 4 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 1 / 4

Since 2015, concerns for personal safety have restricted free movement, particularly in neighborhoods regarded as opposition strongholds and where security forces frequently conduct search operations. In 2020, the UN CoI reported that the Imbonerakure maintained a checkpoint system to control population movement, despite official instructions for the organization to refrain from such activity. Some local authorities have imposed curfews on women and girls.

Land conflict has been an explosive issue in Burundi for decades, which was exacerbated by the return of displaced populations after the end of the civil war in 2005. Many returnees found new owners occupying their land, and the courts have often failed to fairly adjudicate land disputes. Some refugees who fled in 2015 reportedly returned to find their land occupied.

Due to customary law, women are typically unable to inherit property. The deteriorating security situation hampers private business activity in Burundi, as does rampant corruption.

Sexual and domestic violence are serious problems but are rarely reported to law enforcement agencies. Rights monitors continue to report sexual violence carried out by security forces and the Imbonerakure, who act with impunity. Women are often targeted for rape if they or their spouses refuse to join the CNDD-FDD. Men sometimes experience sexual abuse while in government custody.

According to the citizenship code, a Burundian woman married to a foreign national cannot pass on her citizenship to her husband or children.

The constitution explicitly bans same-sex marriage.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 1 / 4

Individuals not allied with the ruling party may lose their employment. Community service requirements have taken on political overtones, such as building offices for the CNDD-FDD, amounting to what a 2019 UN report called forced labor.

Women have limited opportunities for advancement in the workplace. Much of the population is impoverished. In 2017, “vagrancy” and begging by able-bodied persons became formal offenses under the penal code. The ongoing political and humanitarian crisis has contributed to an economic decline, less access to basic services, and deteriorating living conditions.

Human trafficking continues to be a serious issue in Burundi, with the International Organization on Migration counting over 1,000 trafficking victims between 2017 and July 2021. Burundian government employees are reportedly complicit in trafficking girls. In February 2021, the Burundian and Kenyan governments collaborated to secure the extradition of a Burundian official accused of involvement in trafficking.

Cabo Verde

Population: 600,000

Capital: Praia

Freedom Status: Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Cabo Verde is a stable democracy with competitive elections and periodic transfers of power between rival parties. Civil liberties are generally protected, but access to justice is impaired by an overburdened court system, and crime remains a concern. Other outstanding problems include persistent inequities for women and migrant workers.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- The ruling Movement for Democracy (MpD) won the April parliamentary elections. Prime Minister Ulisses Correia e Silva remained in office after the polls.
 - In October, José Maria Neves of the African Party for the Independence of Cabo Verde (PAICV) was elected president. He took office in November.
 - According to the World Health Organization (WHO), 40,700 people tested positive and 352 people died from COVID-19 during the year.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 38 / 40A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 12 / 12*A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The president is directly elected for up to two consecutive five-year terms. The prime minister, who holds most executive authority, is formally appointed by the president but is nominated by and accountable to the National Assembly.

Ulisses Correia e Silva became prime minister in 2016 and remained in that post after the MpD won the April 2021 parliamentary elections. In October, José Maria Neves of the PAICV was elected president with 51.7 percent of the vote, defeating MpD candidate Carlos Veiga. Neves, who succeeded term-limited incumbent Jorge Carlos Fonseca, took office in November. Observers assessed both elections as largely free and fair.

Members of the 72-seat National Assembly are directly elected in multimember constituencies to serve five-year terms. In the April 2021 elections, the ruling MpD won 38 seats, the PAICV won 30, and the Democratic and Independent Cabo Verdean Union took 4. People infected with COVID-19 were advised against casting a ballot.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 4 / 4

The legal framework provides for fair and competitive elections. The National Elections Commission (CNE), whose members are elected by a two-thirds majority in the National Assembly, is generally considered impartial. African Union observers lauded the CNE's performance in its report on the October 2021 presidential election.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 16 / 16B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 4 / 4

There are no significant impediments to the formation and competition of political parties. A number of different parties are active, though only the PAICV and the MpD have held power at the national level. Groups of independent citizens have an active role in political life, participating in elections.

The opposition has a realistic opportunity to gain power through elections. There have been three democratic transfers of power between the PAICV and the MpD since independence in 1975, the most recent in 2016.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 4 / 4

The political choices of voters and candidates are free from undue external influence. However, the functioning of public agencies is reportedly affected by partisanship.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 4 / 4

Women have full and equal political rights and are increasingly involved in politics. Nevertheless, social constraints have somewhat impaired their participation, with women currently holding 9 of the cabinet's 28 seats. The 40 percent gender quota for candidates required by the 2019 Gender Parity Law is often unmet, though women held 38.9 percent of the National Assembly's seats as of May 2021.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 10 / 12C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 4 / 4

The prime minister and cabinet determine the policies of the government, under the supervision of the National Assembly and the president. The government is able to implement laws and policies without undue interference from unelected entities.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 3 / 4

Cabo Verde has relatively low levels of corruption overall, but bribery and nepotism are problems at the municipal level. Allegations of clientelism and graft continue to surround costly infrastructure projects and other spending measures, public procurements, public companies, and management of public lands.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 3 / 4

The current government has taken numerous steps to improve transparency, including by publishing more information about state operations and finances online; it generally adheres to legal guarantees of public access to information. However, many officeholders fail to comply with rules requiring them to declare their personal assets and income. The government continued to communicate factual information about COVID-19.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 54 / 60D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 16 / 16*D1. Are there free and independent media? 4 / 4

Press freedom is guaranteed by law and generally respected in practice, though Article 105 of the electoral code prohibits media organizations from disseminating opinions on or criticism of parties and candidates after a certain date during a campaign period. The publicly owned Radio and Television of Cabo Verde (RTC) respected the right of all candidates to free airtime during the 2021 legislative election campaign period.

Publicly and privately owned media outlets are largely free of government control. However, precarious finances at many outlets can undermine journalists' job security and their ability to undertake investigative reporting projects. A lack of funding has contributed to the closure of several privately owned newspapers, decreasing the diversity of information in the print sector.

The constitution establishes the separation of church and state, though the Roman Catholic Church receives some privileges, such as the recognition of Catholic marriages under civil law. While all religious groups are required to register with the Justice Ministry to obtain tax and other benefits, the process is not restrictive, and there are no limitations on freedom of worship.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

Academic freedom is respected, and the educational system is not affected by political indoctrination.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 4 / 4

There are no significant constraints on individuals' freedom of expression. The government is not known to engage in online surveillance or improper monitoring of personal communications. Social media is widely used to express private and political opinions.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 11 / 12E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

Freedom of assembly is legally guaranteed and observed in practice.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 4 / 4

Numerous nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) operate freely in the country, focusing on a variety of social, economic, environmental, and cultural issues. International human rights institutions, local organizations, and journalists are able to monitor prison conditions and other human rights indicators without government interference.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 3 / 4

The constitution protects the right to unionize, and workers may form and join unions in practice. However, the government restricts the right to strike in broadly defined essential industries, and formal collective bargaining is reportedly uncommon in the private sector. Workers in the public and private sectors held strikes in 2021.

F. RULE OF LAW: 14 / 16F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 4 / 4

The judiciary is independent, though the courts are overburdened, understaffed, and underfunded. During the 2020–21 judicial year, the courts continued to improve their performance, though many cases remained unresolved. Under changes to the penal and criminal codes that took effect in July 2021, some criminal allegations can be adjudicated in abbreviated proceedings.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 3 / 4

Police and prosecutors generally observe legal safeguards against arbitrary arrest and detention. Defense attorneys are provided to indigent defendants. However, due to the limited capacity of the court system, there are often delays in detainees' first hearings before a judge, and many cases are dropped because defendants in detention are denied a timely trial.

Law enforcement officials are sometimes accused of excessive force, but perpetrators are often investigated and punished by oversight bodies. In June 2021, the president of the PAICV's youth wing criticized the physical mistreatment of soldiers after a video depicting such behavior was disseminated online.

Cabo Verde is generally free of major crime or unrest. Nevertheless, violent crime does occur, and street crime, smuggling, and drug trafficking are perceived as consistent problems. The National Police reported that crime fell by 57.2 percent between 2016 and 2020, though figures for 2021 showed a 33 percent year-over-year increase. In September 2021, Justice Minister Joana Rosa reported a recidivism rate of over 30 percent.

The government sought to increase the capacity of law enforcement during 2021. In February, the National Police opened a criminal investigation directorate. In August, Rosa announced the creation of a data collection agency under the Judicial Police. In September, Prime Minister Silva announced that the government would restructure its security apparatus to address crime.

In 2017, the government permitted Chinese technology firm Huawei to install surveillance cameras in Praia and three other cities as part of its Safe City project. While observers voiced privacy concerns, the government has maintained its support for the program. In 2021, the government installed 66 surveillance cameras in Boa Vista.

Prison conditions are poor and often overcrowded, but the government has been working to improve conditions, which includes changes in legislation, the implementation of a social reintegration program for prisoners, and the construction of more cells and bathrooms. In April 2021, 15 prisoners started a hunger strike in São Vicente over their treatment.

Gender discrimination is prohibited by law, but wage discrimination and unequal access to education persist for women. In November 2021, the government authorized a 2021–25 gender equality plan.

No comprehensive antidiscrimination legislation exists for the entire population. Immigrants often face discriminatory treatment in accessing papers and employment. In December 2021, the cabinet approved a draft bill on nationality that would effectively “extend the scope of nationality or origin.” That bill awaited parliamentary approval at year’s end.

Same-sex relations are not criminalized, and the law protects against employment discrimination based on sexual orientation. However, LGBT+ people are reportedly subject to such discrimination along with physical violence and verbal abuse.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 13 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

Individual freedom of movement is recognized by law, and there are no significant restrictions in practice. People may freely change their place of employment or education.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 3 / 4

Property rights are generally respected. The legal framework and government policies are supportive of private business activity, though obstacles such as corruption and legal and bureaucratic inefficiency remain a concern. Small and medium-size businesses are one of the main sources of income for families whose members are not directly employed in the public services.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 3 / 4

Personal social freedoms are generally protected, including in matters of marriage and family law. Authorities enforce laws against rape, domestic abuse, femicide, and sexual abuse of minors, but such violence remains a serious problem, and insufficient public resources are dedicated to supporting and protecting victims. During the 2020–21 judicial year, 34 percent of reported sex crimes were committed against children. Over 900 cases of gender-based violence (GBV) were reported in the first half of 2021. In July, the government established a support fund for GBV survivors. In August, it approved a 2021–23 action plan to address sexual violence against minors. In November, the government reopened facilities in Santiago Norte and Santo Antão to protect at-risk children.

Same-sex marriages are not recognized.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 3 / 4

The law prohibits forced labor and other exploitative practices, and the government actively enforces such safeguards in the formal sector. However, a high percent of the Cabo Verdean workforce continues to work informally.

Immigrant workers who lack employment contracts remain vulnerable to abuses, and children are reportedly exposed to sex trafficking and illegal work in agriculture or domestic service. In September 2021, the government issued an antitrafficking procedural handbook.

Cambodia

Population: 16,500,000

Capital: Phnom Penh

Freedom Status: Not Free

Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: Cambodia’s political system has been dominated by Prime Minister Hun Sen and the Cambodian People’s Party (CPP) for more than three decades. While the country conducted semicompetitive elections in the past, the 2018 elections were held in a severely repressive environment. Since then, Hun Sen’s government has maintained pressure on opposition party members, independent press outlets, and demonstrators with intimidation, politically motivated prosecutions, and violence.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- Khieu Samphan, the former head of state of the Khmer Rouge, appeared before the Extraordinary Chambers in the Courts of Cambodia (ECCC) in August to appeal his 2018 conviction for genocide. In December, the tribunal dropped charges against Meas Muth, a lower-level official in the Khmer Rouge, citing insufficient evidence and the “absence of a definitive and enforceable indictment.”
 - Prime Minister Hun Sen’s government continued to subject members of the opposition—including political figures and a broad range of human rights activists—to harassment, intimidation, and arrests throughout the year.
 - Restrictive legislation introduced in March allows the government to “ban or restrict any gathering or demonstration” in order to prevent the spread of COVID-19. International human rights groups have condemned the law, saying it places undue restrictions on Cambodians’ fundamental rights, including the freedom of movement and the right to peaceful assembly.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 5 / 40A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 1 / 12*A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

King Norodom Sihamoni is chief of state, but has little political power. The prime minister is head of government, and is appointed by the monarch from among the majority coalition or party in parliament following legislative elections. Hun Sen first became prime minister in 1985. He was nominated most recently after 2018 National Assembly polls, which offered voters no meaningful choice. Most international observation groups were not present due to the highly restrictive nature of the contest.

The bicameral parliament consists of the 62-seat Senate and the 125-seat National Assembly. Members of parliament and local councilors indirectly elect 58 senators, and the king and National Assembly each appoint 2. Senators serve six-year terms, while National Assembly members are directly elected to five-year terms.

In 2018, the CPP won every seat in both chambers in elections that were considered neither free nor fair by established international observers, and prompted condemnation from many democracies. In the lead-up to the vote, the Supreme Court banned the main opposition party, the Cambodia National Rescue Party (CNRP); many of its members were jailed, and numerous media outlets were closed. Several small, obscure new “opposition parties” ran candidates in the lower-house elections, though many of these were believed to have been manufactured by government allies to suggest multiparty competition.

In 2015, Cambodia passed two new election laws that permit security forces to take part in campaigns, punish parties that boycott parliament, and mandate a shorter campaign period of 21 days. The laws have been broadly enforced.

Voting is tied to a citizen’s permanent-resident status in a village, township, or urban district, and this status cannot be changed easily.

The CPP has complete control over the nine seats of the National Election Committee (NEC). In 2018, the NEC sought to aid the CPP’s campaign by threatening to prosecute any figures that urged an election boycott, and informing voters that criticism of the CPP was prohibited.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 2 / 16B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 0 / 4

Following the 2018 elections, Cambodia is a de facto one-party state. The main opposition CNRP was banned and its leaders have been charged with crimes, while other prominent party figures have fled the country. Although several small opposition parties contested the 2018 lower-house elections, none won seats. All the smaller parties were permitted to run by the CPP-controlled NEC, and both domestic and international observers questioned their authenticity. In late 2021, prominent opposition leader Sam Rainsy’s popular Candlelight Party—which had merged with Kem Sokha’s Human Rights Party to form the CNRP in 2012—resumed independent operations. The party quickly gained wide support among opposition groups and CNRP supporters.

Members of the political opposition, including CNRP members and supporters and a broad range of other political activists, were subject to harassment and arrests throughout 2021.

The political opposition has been quashed through an ongoing government campaign of harassment, arrests, and convictions of opposition figures, supporters, and perceived supporters, carried out alongside severe restrictions on press freedom, free assembly, and civil society. The high rate of spoiled ballots in the 2018 lower house election—8.6 percent of all votes, according to the NEC—suggested strong popular discontent with the lack of choice, especially given that Hun Sen had repeatedly warned Cambodians not to spoil ballots.

Since the CNRP was banned in 2017, divisions within the party's membership and among prominent opposition leaders have increased, which some fear has damaged the opposition's ability to effectively challenge the ruling CPP.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 1 / 4

The ruling party is not democratically accountable, and top leaders, especially Hun Sen, use the police and armed forces as instruments of repression. The military has stood firmly behind Hun Sen and his crackdown on the opposition. Hun Sen has built a personal body-guard unit in the armed forces that he reportedly uses to harass and abuse CPP opponents.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 1 / 4

Ethnic minorities, especially those of Vietnamese descent, are regularly excluded from the political process and scapegoated by both the CPP and the opposition. Women make up 15 percent of the National Assembly, but their interests, like those of most citizens, are poorly represented.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 2 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 0 / 4

Hun Sen has increasingly centralized power, and figures outside of his close circle have little impact on policymaking. Analysts also believe the prime minister is grooming his son, General Hun Manet, to succeed him. Hun Manet has been named to several key posts during his father's rule, including that of deputy commander-in-chief of the Royal Cambodian Armed Forces (RCAF). In December 2021, Hun Sen publicly stated that he wished to see Hun Manet succeed him as prime minister, though noted "it must be voted on." Later that month, the CPP's central committee unanimously voted to endorse Hun Manet as "future prime minister."

Anticorruption laws are poorly enforced, and corruption is pervasive in public procurement and tax administration, to the benefit of Prime Minister Hun Sen and his family. In 2018, Global Witness, an anticorruption nongovernmental organization (NGO), claimed that the prime minister's family benefited from ownership stakes in firms worth over $200 million; these companies were involved in projects varying from gold mining to the construction of Phnom Penh's international airport.

Members of the prime minister's family have also used their positions to keep millions of dollars in assets abroad, and have acquired Cypriot passports through its Citizenship by Investment program; participants must invest at least €2 million ($2.4 million) to qualify.

Senior CPP senators have been implicated in acts of corruption, allegedly benefiting from smuggling operations and illegal land concessions.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 1 / 4

Nepotism and patronage undermine the functioning of a transparent bureaucratic system. A draft access to information law was finalized in 2019, but the government added the bill to its long-term strategic plan, delaying its implementation to 2023. International information rights groups have criticized the bill, warning it does not meet international standards.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 19 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 7 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 1 / 4

The government uses lawsuits, criminal prosecutions, massive tax bills, and occasionally violent attacks to harass and intimidate the media. There are private print and broadcast outlets, but many are owned and operated by the CPP.

Since 2017, the government has engaged in an intense crackdown on independent media. The independent English-language newspaper Cambodia Daily closed that year after it was issued an onerous tax bill. It has since been relaunched as an online news aggregator. In 2018, the Phnom Penh Post, an independent newspaper, was sold to a Malaysian investor with links to Hun Sen, and many of its editors and reporters quit or were fired.

Chinese investments also influence Cambodian press output. Fresh News, a progovernment news site, has distributed content from Chinese state media since accepting outside investment in 2018.

While progovernment media organizations operate freely, foreign media groups operate with more severe restrictions and in some instances are forced out of the country altogether. In 2021, the state announced the creation of a new 15-member Monitoring Committee for Journalism Ethics, which is mostly composed of government officials. The committee is charged with monitoring and evaluating the "ethical conduct" of journalists and media outlets, and will report to the Information Ministry. Journalists and media rights NGOs have expressed concern that the committee will allow the government to more heavily restrict independent media coverage and further harass journalists.

The majority of Cambodians are Theravada Buddhists and can practice their faith freely, but societal discrimination against religious and ethnic minorities persists. The government has increasingly used Facebook to spread disinformation about or smear activist monks.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 2 / 4

Teachers and students practice self-censorship regarding discussions about Cambodian politics and history. Criticism of the prime minister and his family is often punished.

Open criticism of the prime minister and government by private citizens can result in reprisals, notably during the run-up to elections.

Free expression has been increasingly restricted in recent years. In 2020, the government enacted legislation that gave Hun Sen the power to declare a state of emergency that would grant authorities vast powers to conduct digital surveillance, ban assemblies, and ban or limit broadcasting, among other provisions that amounted to virtually unchecked powers. While a state of emergency was never declared, Hun Sen issued numerous threats as the global pandemic became apparent, and a number of people, including private citizens and those considered political opponents, were indeed arrested throughout year on the pretext of spreading false information about COVID-19 or purportedly contravening government narratives about public health. In 2021, dozens of people were arrested for criticizing the government's response to the COVID-19 pandemic.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 3 / 12E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 1 / 4

Authorities are openly hostile to free assembly. Gatherings by the CNRP, the now-banned major opposition party, are prohibited. Demonstrations are routinely dispersed by security forces, who frequently subject peaceful protesters to threats, excessive violence, and arbitrary detention. Several protests in 2021 featured violent clashes between police forces and protesters.

The introduction of a law on "Preventive Measures Against the Spread of COVID-19" and other contagious diseases in March allows the government to "ban or restrict any gathering or demonstration" in order to prevent the spread of COVID-19. Those who violate the law could be subject to lengthy prison sentences and fines of up to 20 million riels (5,000 dollars).

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 1 / 4

Activists and civil society groups dedicated to justice and human rights risk violence and typically face state harassment and arrest, as do activists involved in land disputes.

A 2020 report issued by the UN Human Rights Office in Cambodia found that human rights activists and NGOs are often subjected to undue "interference, intimidation, or harassment" by Cambodian authorities.

Several prominent activists were arrested in 2021, including several members of environmental advocacy group Mother Nature. Many of those arrested faced prolonged periods of detention or prosecution on vague charges; numerous international human rights organizations have called the charges "absurd," and called on the Cambodian government to permit peaceful activism.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 1 / 4

Cambodia has a small number of independent trade unions, and workers have the right to strike, but many face retribution for doing so. A 2016 law on unions imposed restrictions on union activity, including excessive requirements for union formation.

In July 2020, authorities arrested union leader Rong Chhun on incitement charges. Chhun was found guilty in August 2021, and sentenced to two years in prison; Chhun was released early in November, after an appeals court reduced his sentence to time already served.

F. RULE OF LAW: 3 / 16F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 0 / 4

The judiciary is marred by corruption and a lack of independence. Judges have facilitated the government's ability to pursue charges against a broad range of opposition politicians.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 1 / 4

Due process rights are poorly upheld in Cambodia. Abuse by law enforcement officers and judges remains extremely common. Sham trials are frequent, while elites generally enjoy impunity.

Cambodians live in an environment of repression and fear. The torture of suspects and prisoners is frequent. The security forces are regularly accused of using excessive force against detained suspects.

The work of the Extraordinary Chambers in the Courts of Cambodia (ECCC), established to try the leaders of the former Khmer Rouge regime, has brought convictions for crimes against humanity, homicide, torture, and religious persecution. In 2018, the tribunal found Nuon Chea and Khieu Samphan, two surviving leaders of the Khmer Rouge, guilty of genocide and crimes against humanity. They both received life sentences. The convictions marked the first time the Khmer Rouge crimes were legally defined as genocide. Nuon Chea died in August 2019. Khieu Samphan appealed the ECCC's verdict in August 2021, asking the court to overturn his conviction on charges of genocide; the ECCC had not ruled on the appeal by year's end. In December, the tribunal dropped charges against Meas Muth, a lower-level official in the Khmer Rouge, citing insufficient evidence and the "absence of a definitive and enforceable indictment."

Ethnic minorities, especially those of Vietnamese descent, often face legal and societal discrimination. The Cambodian government frequently refuses to grant refugee protections to Montagnards fleeing Vietnam, where they face persecution by the Vietnamese government. LGBT+ individuals have no legal protection against discrimination.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 6 / 16G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 2 / 4

The constitution guarantees the rights to freedom of travel and movement, and the government generally respects these rights in practice. However, the emergency law adopted in 2020 would allow the government to heavily restrict these rights if invoked. In response to COVID-19 outbreaks in 2021, authorities placed some people who tested positive for the virus in quarantine centers; human rights groups have called these measures overly restrictive.

Land and property rights are regularly abused for the sake of private development projects. Over the past several years, hundreds of thousands of people have been forcibly removed from their homes, with little or no compensation, to make room for commercial plantations, mine operations, factories, and high-end residential developments. Land disputes are common, and security forces typically respond to protests with force.

The government does not frequently repress personal social freedoms, but women suffer widespread social discrimination. Rape and violence against women are common.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 1 / 4

Equality of opportunity is severely limited in Cambodia, where a small elite controls most of the economy. Labor conditions can be harsh, sometimes sparking protests, and the government cracked down on labor protests in 2021. Exploitative working conditions and wage theft are common; in April, numerous garment workers reported that their legally guaranteed severance pay had been withheld.

Cambodia is a country of origin, destination, and transit point for sex and labor trafficking. In its 2021 Trafficking in Persons report, the US State Department noted that Cambodia does not meet the minimum standards for combating trafficking.

Cameroon

Population: 27,300,000

Capital: Yaoundé

Freedom Status: Not Free

Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: President Paul Biya has ruled Cameroon since 1982. His Cameroon People's Democratic Movement (CPDM) has maintained power by rigging elections, using state resources for political patronage, and limiting the activities of opposition parties. Press freedom and nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) are restricted, and due process protections are poorly upheld. A conflict between security forces and separatists in the Anglophone Northwest and Southwest regions is ongoing and has resulted in widespread civilian deaths and displacements.

- In December, members of the opposition Cameroon Renaissance Movement (CRM), who had been arrested in September 2020 during a peaceful protest, received prison sentences of up to seven years for “rebellion.”
 - A November report by the Supreme Court's Chamber of Accounts noted numerous “weaknesses and abuses” in the government's management of COVID-19 funding, and found that more than 21 billion CFA francs ($34.8 million) had been diverted from the government's COVID-19 fund. In May, the government also committed to investigating why “most of a $335 million loan” from the International Monetary Fund (IMF) could not be accounted for.
 - The conflict in the Anglophone regions wore on, with frequent reports of violence and deaths at the hands of both separatist and government forces throughout the year, including numerous deadly attacks on civil servants, students, teachers, and schools by separatists.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 6 / 40 (-1)

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 1 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

The president is the head of state, is directly elected to a seven-year term in a single voting round, and may serve an unlimited number of terms. President Paul Biya won a seventh term in the October 2018 presidential election, taking 71 percent of the vote in a process marked by low turnout and a lack of genuine democratic competition. Maurice Kamto of the CRM came in second with 14 percent of the vote. The election was marred by irregularities including unsigned results sheets, and intimidation and fear in the Anglophone regions kept many from casting their votes. A television report after the election depicted supposed Transparency International observers praising the electoral process, but Transparency International quickly issued a statement asserting that they had no election observers in Cameroon.

In the Northwest and Southwest regions, separatists called for an election boycott, and armed militants used threats and intimidation to keep voters away from the polls. Out of 2,300 polling stations in the Northwest Region, only 74 opened on election day. Approximately 15 percent of registered voters cast ballots in the Southwest Region, while turnout was only 5 percent in the Northwest Region.

Mayoral elections were held in Bangangté, a town in West Cameroon, in May 2021. The election process featured numerous irregularities, and resulted in the son of the Senate's top official being elected, despite the absence of the required number of municipal councilors as stipulated by Cameroon's electoral laws.

The upper chamber of Cameroon's bicameral Parliament is the 100-member Senate. Senators serve five-year terms; 70 are elected through indirect suffrage by regional councils, while the remaining 30 are appointed by the president. The 180 members of the National Assembly, the lower chamber, are directly elected in multimember constituencies to five-year terms.

Long-delayed National Assembly elections were finally held in Cameroon in February 2020, together with municipal elections. The CRM refused to put up candidates, though the Social Democratic Front (SDF) participated, as did the National Union for Democracy and Progress (UNDP), which is allied with the CPDM. The CPDM retained its majority, winning 139 of the 167 seats contested. The Constitutional Council invalidated the results in 11 constituencies of the Anglophone Northwest and Southwest regions, where boycotts and ongoing tensions resulted in low turnout; separatists claimed that 98 percent of eligible voters had boycotted the election. Reruns took place in March 2020, and the incumbent CPDM won all 13 of the seats at stake.

The first-ever regional elections took place in December 2020, despite calls for a boycott by opposition parties and threats by separatist groups in the Anglophone regions to arrest would-be voters. Biya's CPDM won the majority. In September 2021, the CPDM elected the executives of its local institutions; those appointed to senior positions will be able to take part in the next party conference, which some believe will determine President Biya's successor.

The independence and integrity of Cameroon's electoral framework has long been compromised by accusations of partisanship by election management bodies. The Constitutional Council—created in February 2018, just eight months before the presidential election—has the power to validate election results and adjudicate election disputes, and the majority of its 11 members have ties to the ruling party. The council rejected all 18 petitions to cancel the presidential election results filed by opposition parties in 2018, despite credible allegations of fraud and intimidation.

The Elections Cameroon (ELECAM) electoral body was created in 2006 to address concerns about the fair management of previous elections. However, President Biya chooses its members, and CPDM partisans have historically dominated the body. In March 2021, the leaders of seven opposition political parties met to draft an updated and fair electoral code. The group planned to present the proposed reforms to the public in November, but was prevented from doing so by police.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 3 / 16B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 1 / 4

The ability to organize in political groups, and their freedom to operate, is severely limited, and opposition leaders risk arrest and imprisonment. Opposition rallies are frequently prohibited by the government; in July 2021, the government banned a peaceful protest planned by the CRM, though numerous CPDM marches in support of President Biya were authorized.

In December 2021, the government briefly placed CRM president Kamto under house arrest in an apparent attempt to stop him from launching his book in Douala, a CRM stronghold. Later in December, 47 CRM members, who had been arrested in September 2020 during a peaceful protest, received prison sentences of up to seven years for “rebellion.”

Despite the existence of hundreds of registered political parties, Cameroon remains essentially a one-party state. The organizational advantages of the ruling party's long incumbency, its dominance over electoral bodies, and its superior access to media and public resources to achieve partisan gains, disadvantage opposition candidates. Opposition parties are highly fragmented, preventing any one of them from becoming a viable alternative to the ruling CPDM. Frequent harassment, intimidation, and arrests of opposition figures further reduce the ability of opposition parties to gain power through elections.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 1 / 4

State patronage and President Biya's control of high-level appointments help the CPDM retain power. Insecurity in the Anglophone regions caused by violence between armed militants and the military made voting nearly impossible in the 2018 presidential election, effectively denying voters a political choice. The ongoing crisis also affected the 2020 parliamentary, municipal, and regional elections with supporters of separatists in the Anglophone Northwest and Southwest regions calling for boycotts, resulting in low turnout.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 1 / 4

Groups advocating for greater self-determination in the Anglophone regions remain marginalized and excluded from political debate, as reflected by the 2017 banning of the Southern Cameroons National Council (SCNC), an Anglophone political group. LGBT+ people, some ethnic minorities, and women are generally excluded from positions of political influence, and their interests are poorly represented by elected officials. The government has expressed a commitment to increasing women's representation in Parliament.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 2 / 12 (-1)

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 1 / 4

President Biya has extensive executive authority, including wide-ranging appointment powers and strong control over state institutions. Many policies are generated by the government and adopted by presidential decree, with minimal involvement by the parliament. When it is involved, Parliament shows little independence and largely acts as a rubber stamp for the president's policy initiatives.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 0 / 4 (-1)

Corruption is systemic and bribery is commonplace in all sectors, despite anticorruption initiatives including the creation of the National Anticorruption Commission (CONAC). Several former high-level government officials are serving prison terms for corruption, though these efforts are often perceived as moves by President Biya to persecute political adversaries, who are oftentimes his former allies.

During 2020 and 2021, opposition leaders and civil society groups repeatedly alleged that government officials were embezzling funds intended to fight COVID-19. In May 2021, the summary of an investigative report by the Supreme Court's Chamber of Accounts was published on social media. The report, which was officially published in November, noted numerous "weaknesses and abuses" in the government's management of COVID-19 funding, and found that more than 21 billion CFA francs ($34.8 million) had been diverted from the government's COVID-19 fund. In May, the government also committed to investigating why "most of a $335 million loan" from the International Monetary Fund (IMF) could not be accounted for.

Score Change: The score declined from 1 to 0 because government officials brazenly embezzled funds allocated to combat the COVID-19 pandemic.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 1 / 4

Decisions, especially those made by presidential decree, are often adopted without public consultation. Cameroon lacks an access to information law, and it is difficult to gain access to government documents or statistics in practice. The websites of most ministries do not provide substantial information.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 9 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 4 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 0 / 4

Independent and critical journalists face pressure and the risk of detention or arrest in connection with their work. In September 2021, journalist Sébastien Ebala was sentenced to two years in prison for “contempt” of the president. Ebala has been detained since April 2020, when he was arrested after publicly stating that Biya should leave power while advocating for an antigovernment march.

The National Communications Council (CNC), a media regulatory body, has a history of harassing journalists and outlets. In June 2021, the prime minister installed the new head of the CNC, telling him to “promote sanity” and the “consolidation of national unity” and to fight fake news in the country’s media landscape. State-run Cameroon Radiotelevision (CRTV) has been criticized for favoring the CPDM in its coverage. The government continued to suppress media coverage of the Anglophone crisis in 2021.

Religious freedom is somewhat restricted in northern areas affected by the presence of the Boko Haram extremist group, which has carried out violent attacks against places of worship. In addition, random attacks against believers and facilities in connection with the conflict in the Northwest and Southwest regions are common.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 1 / 4

There are no legal restrictions on academic freedom, but state security informants operate on university campuses and academics can face negative repercussions for criticizing the government or discussing its political opponents. In September 2021, military security forces detained Fridolin Nke, a philosophy professor who had recently published a book criticizing the Biya government; Nke, who reported being tortured while in custody, was quickly released. Academic freedom continues to be severely impacted by the crisis in the Anglophone regions, with separatists enforcing a boycott of schools and carrying out acts of violence against teachers and students.

Public criticism of the government and membership in opposition political parties can have negative consequences for professional opportunities and advancement. In general, Cameroonians tend to avoid discussing sensitive political issues for fear of reprisals, notably the potential for a return to a federal system that would grant the Anglophone regions more autonomy, or the regions’ outright secession.

E. ASSOCIATION AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 2 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 0 / 4

Freedom of assembly is subject to significant restrictions. Authorities continued to ban and violently disperse events perceived as antigovernment in 2021, notably those staged by the opposition CRM.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 1 / 4

The influence of civil society has weakened over the years, with many nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) relying entirely on foreign assistance, and others coopted by the regime. Anglophone activists have faced harassment, violence, and arrest for their activities. LGBT+ organizations have also been targeted by law enforcement.

The government has restricted the work of international NGOs, denying their staff access to the country. In December 2020, Cameroonian authorities instructed international NGO Doctors Without Borders (MSF) to suspend their operations in the Northwest Region, claiming that the group was covertly aiding Anglophone separatists; MSF repeatedly denied such accusations, but was forced to withdraw from the region in August 2021.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 1 / 4

Trade unions and collective bargaining are legally permitted, although unions are still subject to numerous restrictions in the exercise of their rights. Strikes are theoretically permitted, but the government has used force to disrupt them in practice.

F. RULE OF LAW: 0 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 0 / 4

The judiciary is subordinate to the Ministry of Justice, with corruption and political influence, including by the executive, weakening courts. The president appoints judges and can dismiss them at will. Prosecutors have been pressured to stop pursuing corruption cases against some high-profile officials.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 0 / 4

Due process rights are poorly upheld. Lengthy pretrial detentions are commonplace. Civilians accused of terrorism are frequently not afforded the right to a fair trial. French legal norms are regularly imposed upon Cameroonians in Anglophone regions.

Acts of violence against lawyers have increased in recent years. In October and November 2021, human rights lawyer Felix Agbor Nkongho received numerous death threats in response to his work as a “prominent defender” of the rights of Cameroon’s Anglophone minority.

The government has also invoked charges of terrorism and insurrection against opposition leaders and separatist supporters, and they are often detained in the absence of due process and without realistic avenues for challenging their detention. In December 2021, 47 people arrested in the aftermath of the September 2020 CRM antigovernment rallies were sentenced to up to seven years in prison on charges of “rebellion.” State security forces have carried out extrajudicial killings and arbitrary detentions in connection with the Anglophone crisis, and in the Far North regions in response to Boko Haram activities.

Active conflicts involving both Boko Haram and Anglophone separatists continue to threaten the security of millions of people in Cameroon. The ongoing violence led to the deaths of numerous Cameroonian soldiers and civilians in the Anglophone and Far North regions throughout 2021.

Prison conditions are harsh, marked by “extreme overcrowding” and poor sanitation. Inmates often face a lack of access to food, water, and medical care. Police brutality remains a problem, including the abuse and torture of detainees.

Discrimination against Anglophone Cameroonians and individuals from certain ethnic groups, including the Bamiléké, is common. The government imposes the French language in Anglophone regions, and Anglophone Cameroonians are frequently denied senior jobs in the civil service.

Discrimination against the LGBT+ community is rife, and violence against LGBT+ people is common. The penal code forbids same-sex relations; those convicted face prison sentences as long as five years. A cybercrime law punishes those who solicit same-sex relations online with two-year prison sentences. People are frequently prosecuted with no evidence of sexual activity, but rather on suspicions that they are gay.

The ongoing Boko Haram and Anglophone conflicts have forced large numbers of people to flee their homes. As of December 2021, the UN Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs (UNOCHA) estimated that there were 573,900 internally displaced persons (IDPs) within the Northwest and Southwest regions; other UN reports estimated that as of August there were more than 340,000 IDPs in the Far North region. IDPs often struggle to access food, education, and other basic needs, and displaced women are more vulnerable to gender-based violence.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 3 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 0 / 4

Free movement is severely limited in parts of the Far North Region due to Boko Haram activity, and in the two Anglophone regions due to the ongoing crisis there.

The Anglophone crisis has exacted a heavy toll on children, many of whom have been deprived of their right to education. Thousands of schools have closed, and attacks and kidnappings of students and teachers at those operating are frequent. In June 2021, six civil servants from the Ministry of Economy, Planning and Regional Development (MINEPAT) were kidnapped by Anglophone separatists in the Southwest Region; one was killed, and the others had not been released at year's end.

Harassment of small business owners by state agents is common. Agribusinesses and logging operations are often carried out without consulting local inhabitants. In many regions, women are still dispossessed of their inheritance rights.

In August 2020, the minister of domains and land affairs, Henri Eyébé Ayissi, announced the suspension of a provisional lease between the government and cocoa producer Neo Industry SA in the Ntem Valley, in the South Province. The decision followed local opposition to Neo's plans to begin development of parts of an ancestral reserve. In May 2021, the prime minister signed a cancellation of Neo's lease, putting an end to five years of litigation.

The constitution guarantees equal rights to men and women, but traditional legal values and practices often take precedence, and do not always provide women with full rights. The Boko Haram conflict has also exacerbated the already prevalent practice of child marriage and the sexual abuse of minors in the Far North Region. Customary law can allow rapists to escape punishment if the victim consents to marriage. Despite laws guaranteeing equal rights to men and women to file for divorce, in practice courts often disadvantage women by making proceedings prohibitively expensive or lengthy. Cases of domestic violence and rape are widespread, and perpetrators are rarely prosecuted.

Sexual relations between people of the same sex are legally prohibited in Cameroon. In May 2021, two transgender women were sentenced to five years in prison and fined 200,000 CFA francs ($330) for “attempted homosexuality.” Both women were released pending appeal in July following pressure from international and domestic human rights organizations.

Despite a 2011 law against human trafficking, Cameroon remains a source, transit, and destination country for forced labor and sex trafficking of children, as well as a source country for women who are subject to forced labor and prostitution in Europe. Some internally displaced women have also resorted to prostitution in the cities of Yaoundé and Douala. Child labor remains common, and child workers are frequently exposed to hazardous working conditions, particularly when collecting scrap metal for sale. The sexual exploitation of children on social media has increased in recent years; in June 2021, the Minister of Women’s Empowerment held a press conference condemning such abuse, saying that those responsible will be held accountable under the law.

Canada

Population: 38,200,000

Capital: Ottawa

Freedom Status: Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Canada has a strong history of respect for political rights and civil liberties, though in recent years citizens have been concerned about laws relating to the administration of elections, freedom of expression, government transparency, and personal privacy. While Black, Indigenous, and other marginalized Canadians still face discrimination and economic, social, and political challenges, the federal government has acknowledged and made some moves to address these issues.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- In August, Prime Minister Justin Trudeau called for snap elections in September, during which there were almost no changes in the number of seats held by parties in Parliament. In the September polls, as well as in provincial elections in March and August, options for mail-in ballots and early voting were expanded and procedures were put in place at polling stations, such as physical distancing and sanitization protocols, to allow these elections to proceed in a free and fair manner.
- The government took several steps to address the equal treatment of Indigenous Canadians during the year, including passing a law in June to enforce the United Nations Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples. That same month, the government responded to the 2019 National Inquiry into Missing and Murdered Indigenous Women and Girls (MMIWG)—which concluded that the history of state discrimination and oppression of Indigenous people amounted to genocide—committing C$2.2 billion (US$1.8 billion) over five years to implement the Inquiry’s recommendations.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 40 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 12 / 12A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The British monarch is head of state, represented by a ceremonial governor general, currently Mary Simon, who is appointed on the advice of the prime minister. The prime minister is the head of government and is invited to the post by the governor general after elections; the office is usually held by the leader of the majority party or governing coalition in Parliament. Justin Trudeau remained prime minister after the Liberal Party maintained control of government in the September 2021 snap elections.

The Canadian parliament consists of an elected 338-member House of Commons and an appointed 105-member Senate. Lower-house elections are held every four years on fixed dates; early elections may be called by the governor general if the government loses a no-confidence vote, or on the advice of the prime minister. In August 2021, Prime Minister Trudeau called for snap elections to be held the following month. There were almost no changes in the number of seats held by parties in Parliament in the September poll: the center-left Liberal Party won 160 seats in the House of Commons and maintained its minority government; the Conservative Party took 119 seats; the Bloc Québécois secured 32 seats; the left-leaning New Democratic Party (NDP) won 25 seats; and the Green Party won 2.

In two provincial elections held in 2021—in Nova Scotia in August and in Newfoundland and Labrador in March—polling was conducted with public health measures in place to prevent the spread of COVID-19. The polls were deemed free and fair, in line with most Canadian elections. Voting day in Newfoundland and Labrador was delayed due to a surge of COVID-19 cases in the province's capital. However, the use of mail-in ballots allowed the election to proceed.

Electoral laws are generally fair and well enforced by the relevant bodies. Some critics expressed concern about the 2014 Fair Elections Act, arguing that its stringent voter identification requirements placed Indigenous Canadians at a disadvantage. In 2018, the Liberal government passed legislation that relaxed some of the criticized provisions; restricted spending by political parties and other actors during elections; gave voting rights to all Canadians living abroad; improved the privacy of voters' information within the databases of political parties; and increased the power of the commissioner of Canada Elections to investigate violations of election rules. It further bans foreign donations for partisan campaigns and requires major online platforms, such as Facebook and Google, to create a registry of digital political advertisements.

The Liberal government proposed a law in 2021 that would allow voting on the week-end prior to election day, increase options for mail-in ballots, and create special procedures to facilitate voting for seniors in long-term care and for persons with disabilities. However, the early elections held in September prevented the bill from proceeding before year-end.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 16 / 16B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 4 / 4

A small number of parties have historically dominated elections. However, Canadians are free to organize in different political parties, and the system is open to the rise and fall of competing groups. A total of 21 political parties were registered in the 2021 federal elections.

Opposition parties have a realistic chance of gaining power through elections. In 2015, the Conservatives lost power to a Liberal majority government, and in 2019, the Liberal Party's control of Parliament diminished to a minority government.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 4 / 4

People's political choices are generally free from domination by actors that are not democratically accountable.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 4 / 4

Members of religious minorities and Indigenous people are seated in the parliament, as are many women; Prime Minister Trudeau's cabinet has full gender parity. The rights and interests of LGBT+ people are protected. A 2017 law explicitly prohibits discrimination based on gender identity or gender expression, affording transgender individuals, among others, more protection against hate crimes.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 12 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 4 / 4

After some initial delays, federal and provincial governments in Canada were able to continue their legislative business during the COVID-19 pandemic by limiting the number of lawmakers allowed to meet in-person in Parliament and provincial assemblies and moving most legislative committees to online platforms. Emergency powers for the federal finance minister to spend money on pandemic-related measures without parliamentary approval were granted in 2020, and subsequently expired in 2021.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 4 / 4

Canada has a reputation for clean government and a record of vigorous prosecution of corruption cases.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 4 / 4

Canadians may request public information under the provisions of the Access to Information Act, but they may face delays or excessive costs. A law amending the act to improve this situation was passed in 2019, but critics have charged that it has not been very effective.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 58 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 16 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 4 / 4

Canada's media are generally free; journalists are mostly protected from violence and harassment in their work and express diverse viewpoints.

In November 2021, authorities arrested journalists Amber Bracken and Michael Toledano while they were covering land defenders' demonstrations in the First Nation

Wet'suwet'en territory in British Columbia. Police arrested the two journalists for having been embedded with the protesters. However, Canadian legal precedent maintains journalists' rights to embed with protest groups.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 3 / 4

The Canadian constitution and other legislation protect religious freedom. However, in 2019, the Quebec provincial government passed Bill 21, which bans certain government employees in positions of authority from wearing religious symbols such as a hijab, crucifix, turban, or kippah while at work. The list of such persons includes judges, police officers, government lawyers, and teachers. The bill has a grandfather clause for government employees already wearing symbols—they can keep wearing them until they change institutions or take a promotion.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

Academic freedom is generally respected.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 4 / 4

Private discussion in Canada is generally free and unrestrained.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 12 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

Freedom of assembly is constitutionally protected and generally upheld in practice. However, tensions over the right to assemble at the Fairy Creek logging site in British Columbia have led to several court cases and the arrest of over 1,000 antilogging protesters as of December 2021.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 4 / 4

Nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) operate freely and frequently inform policy discussions.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 4 / 4

Trade unions and business associations enjoy high levels of membership and are well organized.

F. RULE OF LAW: 15 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 4 / 4

Canada's judiciary is generally independent.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 4 / 4

Constitutionally protected due process rights are generally upheld in practice.

The use of solitary confinement for extended periods of time in Canada's prisons has been controversial. While there have been changes in recent years to solitary confinement laws, an advisory panel report released in May 2021 found that the length of solitary confinement and the frequency of its use had not substantially changed.

The government has made increasing efforts to enforce equal rights and opportunities for minority groups, although problems persist. Black and Indigenous Canadians remain subject to widespread discrimination, struggle with food insecurity, and have unequal access to education, health care, public services, and employment. While there has been some recent progress on these issues, it has been slow.

The federal government's 2015 Truth and Reconciliation Commission of Canada (TRC) and its 2019 National Inquiry into Missing and Murdered Indigenous Women and Girls (MMIWG)—which concluded that the history of state discrimination and oppression of Indigenous people amounted to genocide—made several recommendations to improve the lives of Canada's Indigenous peoples. However, an analysis published in June 2021 found that only 13 out of 94 TRC calls to action had been completed. Though the government's response to the MMIWG was delayed due to the COVID-19 pandemic, in June 2021 it committed C$2.2 billion (US$1.8 billion) over five years to implement the Inquiry's recommendations and related programs. Parliament also passed a law that month to enforce the United Nations Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples. How this new law will impact federal government policies relating to Indigenous people remains to be seen.

The federal government also introduced an antiracism strategy in 2019, which included substantial programs to combat anti-Black and anti-Indigenous racism that are now operational. In December 2021, the government officially outlawed "conversion therapy"—an array of violent practices that falsely claim to change LGBT+ people's sexual orientation—to take effect in early 2023.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 16 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

Freedom of movement is constitutionally protected and upheld in practice. Due to the COVID-19 pandemic, provincial and municipal governments at various times in 2020 and 2021 limited people's movements over borders and enforced public health orders to self-isolate if they were infected with COVID-19. The rules were enforced with monetary fines, though compliance was common, and fines were given quite rarely.

Property rights are not constitutionally guaranteed but are generally well protected by law and through the enforcement of contracts.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 4 / 4

Canada legalized same-sex marriage in 2005. In March 2021, the House of Commons passed amendments to Canada's assisted suicide laws to remove the eligibility requirement for a person's natural death to be "reasonably foreseeable," among other changes.

Domestic violence is a problem that disproportionately affects women, particularly Indigenous women, and is underreported. However, there have been initiatives in recent years to better train police in handling domestic violence cases.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 4 / 4

There have been some reports of forced labor in the agricultural, food processing, construction, and other sectors, as well as among domestic workers. However, the government, aided by NGOs that work to reveal forced labor and sex trafficking, do attempt to hold perpetrators accountable and to provide aid to victims.

Central African Republic

Population: 4,900,000

Capital: Bangui

Freedom Status: Not Free

Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: The Central African Republic (CAR) suffers from pervasive insecurity and an absence of state authority in much of the country. A series of peace deals between the government and various armed groups have not produced improvements in the security situation and have been repeatedly breached by both parties. Violent attacks against civilians, including sexual violence, are an acute risk in many areas. There is little support for independent journalists, and workers with nongovernmental organizations (NGOs), particularly aid workers, operate at great personal risk.

- A January ruling by the Constitutional Court found that the December 2020 presidential elections had been legal, rejecting the appeals of the opposition and confirming the reelection of President Faustin-Archange Touadéra. The election, in which Touadéra took 53.16 percent of the votes, was marked by significant flaws and low voter turnout.
 - The Constitutional Court also ruled in January that only 22 of the 140 members of Parliament had been elected outright in the December 2020 first-round polls, overturning the election results in a number of constituencies due to numerous irregularities, including voter intimidation and ballot box tampering. Additional rounds of voting were held in March, May, and July to fill the remaining seats, and were largely allowed to proceed peacefully.
 - Fighting between armed militant groups and the Central African Armed Forces (FACA)—supported by Russian and Rwandan military reinforcements and MINUSCA (United Nations Multidimensional Integrated Stabilization Mission in the Central African Republic)—continued throughout the year, despite Touadéra's declaration of a cease-fire in October.
 - The National Assembly voted to impose a six-month state of emergency in February in response to continuing violent attacks carried out by armed rebel groups throughout the country. During the state of emergency, administrative and judicial authorities severely restricted the rights of many of the country's opposition leaders, preventing them from leaving the country and threatening to revoke their parliamentary immunity.
 - In October, the Central African government officially acknowledged that rebel militants, FACA troops, and Russian forces in the country had committed numerous human rights violations against civilians in the CAR. Though government officials promised to enforce sanctions against the perpetrators, no meaningful action had been taken by year's end.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 3 / 40A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 2 / 12*A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

The president is chief of state and is directly elected to up to two five-year terms. President Faustin-Archange Touadéra was reelected to a second term in December 2020 with 53.1 percent of the vote. In January 2021, the Constitutional Court rejected the appeals presented by the opposition and confirmed the legality of the presidential election, despite numerous significant electoral flaws.

The 2020 presidential election was characterized by delays and irregularities in the voter registration, and was held following more than a week of intense fighting outside the capital. While the government and its international partners described the election as credible and legitimate, opposition parties denounced the polls, which took place alongside legislative elections, as marred by widespread ballot-box stuffing and vote buying. Many citizens were prevented from voting due to threats and attacks perpetrated by the new rebel coalition. There were no international independent observers outside of the capital, Bangui.

The prime minister is the head of government and is appointed by the president. In June 2021, President Touadéra appointed then finance minister Henri-Marie Dondra as prime minister after the resignation of former prime minister Firmin Ngebadà.

Members of Parliament are directly elected to five-year terms. The constitution adopted in 2015 stipulated the creation of a Senate, but it has not been established.

The first round of legislative elections took place in December 2020 alongside the presidential election, and was plagued by insecurity, voter intimidation, and allegations of fraud. In January 2021, the Constitutional Court certified that 22 out of 140 members of Parliament had been elected outright in the December 2020 polls. The court ruling also nullified the results of the December elections in a number of constituencies, citing numerous electoral irregularities, including ballot box tampering and acts of violence and intimidation against candidates and voters. Another round of voting was held in March to fill the 118 parliamentary seats still open; two more rounds of legislative elections were held in May and July to fill the remaining seats. According to UN reports, despite some flaws, the 2021 legislative elections were marked by high voter turnout and were largely allowed to proceed peacefully.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 1 / 4

The electoral laws of the Central African Republic permit multiparty competition, and adult citizens enjoy universal and equal suffrage. However, electoral authorities operate in an opaque manner.

A new law regulating the National Elections Authority (ANE) was approved in July 2020. Though the legislation introduced a number of mechanisms to enhance the independence of the ANE, the new board is still largely controlled by the ruling party.

Parliament also amended the electoral law in 2020 to extend the period for voter registration, three months before the December elections. The opposition coalition contested the bill, instead calling for a national consultation. The election ultimately was marred by irregularities surrounding voter registration due to poor implementation of the law.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 2 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 1 / 4

While political parties are legally able to form and operate, party members conducting political activities are at risk of intimidation and violence by the national police and pro-government militias in Bangui, and by armed groups and national security forces outside the capital.

In September 2021, President Touadéra established a committee to organize a “republican dialogue” between the government and the opposition. However, most opposition leaders withdrew from the committee in October after Touadéra refused to allow representatives of rebel groups to participate in the dialogue; the process was unable to begin before year’s end.

Several opposition parties exist in the parliament. In February 2020, the most prominent opposition leaders joined forces within the Coalition for Democratic Opposition (COD-2020) to overcome increasing government repression.

However, most of the candidates in the 2020–21 elections were not able to run electoral campaigns outside the capital due to widespread violence and direct threats and aggression by armed rebel groups. In late 2020, six presidential candidates from the opposition requested that the elections be postponed due to the withdrawal of another candidate from the presidential race because of insecurity; the Constitutional Court rejected the request in December 2020.

After the elections, administrative and judicial authorities severely restricted the rights of several prominent political opposition leaders, who were prevented from leaving the country and threatened with the loss of their parliamentary immunity. In August 2021, well-known opposition politician Abdou Karim Meckassoua was dismissed from the parliament after he was accused of treason and the Constitutional Court annulled his election win; Meckassoua criticized the ruling, claiming that it was politically motivated.

Citizens are vulnerable to pressure and intimidation from national police and nonstate armed groups. Due to enduring insecurity, voters outside the capital are largely unable to participate in political processes.

A Russian military presence in Central African Republic persists. President Touadéra has named a former Russian intelligence agent, Valery Zakharov, as his special advisor and assigned his security to the Wagner Group, a Russian security company with links to Russian President Vladimir Putin. More than 2,000 Wagner mercenaries were estimated to be present in the CAR as of the end of 2021, supporting the country’s military operations and directly engaging in fighting with armed rebel groups.

In December 2021, the European Union (EU) put Mr. Zakharov and the Wagner Group under financial sanctions, citing serious human rights abuses and destabilizing activities in the CAR. The EU also temporarily suspended the activities of the EU Training Mission in the CAR (EUTM RCA), asking the government to guarantee that trained troops would not fall under Wagner control.

Enduring discrimination and an accompanying lack of access to political processes prevents members of many ethnic, religious, and other minority groups from achieving political representation. Sectarian violence against Muslims continues to affect their ability to participate in politics. Women are underrepresented in politics, and fewer than 20 women sit in the 140-seat Parliament, though the electoral law passed in 2019 requires that 35 percent of candidates be women. Societal and legal discrimination against LGBT+ people prevent them from working to see their interests represented in the political sphere.

Due to the long-lasting tribalization of politics, the country's public institutions and army are dominated by its ethnic majority, the Gbaya, to which former President Bozizé belongs. President Touadéra has also promoted members of his groups, the Mbaka-Mandja, to key senior positions and to the presidential guard.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 0 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 0 / 4

While the elected representatives can determine the policies of the government, the poor governance and the weak authority of the state outside the capital severely limit the government's ability to implement policy decisions.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 0 / 4

Corruption and nepotism have long been pervasive in all branches of government, and addressing public-sector corruption is difficult given the lack of political will. Members of the president's party, the United Hearts Movement (MCU), appear to benefit from impunity. In March 2020, the vice president of the parliament, Jean-Symphorien Mapenzi, was reelected to his post despite admitting to having fixed a parliamentary vote on a finance bill. The year before, the second vice president of the parliament, Mathurin Dimbélé-Nakoé, escaped sanctions in a case of corruption involving mining licenses granted to Chinese companies.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 0 / 4

Government operations are largely nontransparent, and civil society groups and others have limited opportunity to comment upon or influence impending policy decisions. Citizens outside of the capital have limited access to their elected representatives in the national legislature. In July 2020, the UN Panel of Experts reported on an expansion of the presidential guard that was not provided for in the national defense plan nor in the security sector reform process.

ADDITIONAL DISCRETIONARY POLITICAL RIGHTS QUESTION

Is the government or occupying power deliberately changing the ethnic composition of a country or territory so as to destroy a culture or tip the political balance in favor of another group? -1 / -4

Targeted religious- and ethnic-based violence perpetrated by FACA and Russian mercenaries increased after the 2020–21 elections in northwestern and eastern regions of the country. Hundreds of thousands of civilians remain internally displaced or confined to ethnic and sectarian enclaves.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 4 / 60 (-2)D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 3 / 16 (-1)*D1. Are there free and independent media? 1 / 4

There is little support for independent media, and in Bangui, outlets are increasingly aligned with national politicians and foreign governments, especially Russia. Media (and social media) often carry material meant to incite hate, discrimination, or violence, mainly against minority groups, with a spike in such material during the 2020 preelection period. Although the High Commission of Communication (HCC) has played an active role in media regulation since 2017, the situation has not improved.

In February 2021, the government blocked access to two online news outlets, the Corbeau News and Le Tsunami, accusing them of spreading “hate speech” and “fake news.” The outlets’ publishers have alleged that the decision was made in order to prevent them from publishing information on the presence of Russian mercenaries in the country.

Journalists reportedly faced increasing threats from national security and progovernment militia forces throughout 2021, and the government began preventing international media workers from traveling outside the capital in September. Incidents of harassment and intimidation by government forces often go unreported for fear of reprisals.

Officially, the Central African Republic is a secular state, but ethnic and religious cleavages often overlap with the country’s political divisions. Muslims and Christian residents in Bangui remain partially segregated in separate enclaves, and fears of identity-based or sectarian violence by armed actors impedes free religious expression. Members of Muslim communities living in the northwestern and eastern regions of the country continued to be targeted by FACA and Russian mercenary forces throughout 2021.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 2 / 4

Although extremely dysfunctional, the educational system is generally free of extensive political indoctrination. However, clientelism and corruption are widespread in many schools and universities. Outside the capital, the school year is often disrupted, including by a lack of available teachers and the occupation of school buildings by armed rebel groups, national army forces, and Russian mercenaries.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 0 / 4 (-1)

Public discussion and political debates are increasingly surveilled by state authorities. Political instability and the growing risk of violent retaliation for expressing opinions on sensitive topics—including the widespread abuses perpetrated by progovernment militias, FACA forces, and Russian mercenaries—inhibit free expression.

Score Change: The score declined from 1 to 0 because fear of indiscriminate violence and retaliation by progovernment militias and Russian mercenaries have virtually shut down open discussion of political issues.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 1 / 12E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 0 / 4

Although freedom of assembly and the right to political protest is guaranteed under the constitution, these liberties are curtailed due to government repression of the opposition in

Bangui, and threats posed by armed groups, FACA forces, and Russian mercenaries outside the capital. Limitations imposed to prevent the spread of COVID-19 also hampered free association in 2020 and 2021, though there were no major reports of abuses in enforcement of lockdown measures.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights-and governance-related work? 0 / 4

The operations of NGOs are limited by poor security conditions, and aid workers are particularly vulnerable. According to the International NGO Safety Organization (INSO), there were 296 recorded security incidents in 2021 involving relief workers, resulting in 2 aid workers killed, 27 injured and 4 abducted.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 1 / 4

Trade unions and collective bargaining are permitted, although union organizers are sometimes subject to arbitrary detention or arrest. Small-scale agricultural organizations and cooperatives exist throughout the country, including organizations for women farmers.

F. RULE OF LAW: 0 / 16 (-1)

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 0 / 4 (-1)

Courts are generally inefficient and frequently hampered by corruption. The government has limited authority to enforce judicial decisions. Judicial salaries have often gone unpaid. Judicial personnel are often untrained and are reluctant to be deployed outside of the capital. The Special Criminal Court (SCC), created in 2015, is struggling to fulfill its mandate; however, the court announced its first trial in December 2021.

In February 2020, the parliament passed a bill establishing a Truth, Justice, Reconciliation and Reparations Commission (TJRRC), and its 11 commissioners took office in July 2021. The commission possesses a four-year mandate to investigate the violent events in the country over a period of 60 years (1959–2019). However, the commission was mostly conceived as a convenient vehicle to achieve political accommodation during peace negotiations, and it may never become fully empowered.

The independence of the Constitutional Court was significantly damaged by high levels of political interference from the ruling party throughout 2021. Previously one of the country's only independent judiciary bodies, the Constitutional Court repeatedly ruled in favor of the ruling MCU both during and after the presidential and legislative elections in 2020 and 2021. In August 2021, the court removed opposition politician Abdou Karim Meckassoua from the parliament based on allegations that Meckassoua had committed treason by supporting armed rebel groups; Meckassoua condemned the court's decision, calling it politically motivated and unlawful.

Score Change: The score declined from 1 to 0 due to the ruling party's interference with the previously independent Constitutional Court.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 0 / 4

Arbitrary detention and lengthy pretrial detention are commonplace, and the state justice system has limited presence beyond Bangui. Impunity for violence, economic crimes, and human rights violations remained widespread in 2021.

In December 2019, former President François Bozizé returned to Bangui from exile despite UN sanctions and an international arrest warrant for crimes against humanity and incitement to genocide. After entering the country in January 2020, former President Michel Djotodia, who overthrew Bozizé in the 2013 coup, announced his return to Bangui from exile in September 2020, and engaged in political maneuvers to support President Touadéra.

The commanders of two armed groups were arrested during 2021, including ex-Séléka leader Mahamat Said Abdel Kani, who was detained and handed over to the International Criminal Court (ICC) in January; and former FACA captain Eugène Ngaïkosset, who was brought to the SCC in September. The trials of two other former militia leaders, Alfred Yekatom and Patrice-Edouard Ngaïssona, who were arrested in 2018 on charges of crimes against humanity, began in the ICC in February.

In November, the SCC arrested the Minister of Livestock, Hassan Bouba, accusing him of war crimes and crimes against humanity; Bouba's detention ended later that week when, in defiance of the SCC, members of the presidential guard unlawfully escorted him out of the prison in which he was being held.

In Bangui, the officials of the Central African Office for the Repression of Banditry (OCRB) and the progovernment militias are often accused of abuse of power and excessive use of force. Outside the capital, armed nonstate actors continue to operate with impunity, despite the 2019 peace deal. These groups are responsible for numerous violent attacks against civilians, as well as attacks against international peacekeeping forces and humanitarian workers.

Allegations of serious human rights violations committed by FACA and Russian mercenary forces have increased since the reelection of President Touadéra in December 2020. In October 2021, the Central African government officially acknowledged that rebel militants, FACA troops, and Russian forces in the country had committed numerous human rights violations against civilians in the CAR. Though government officials promised to enforce sanctions against the perpetrators, no meaningful action had been taken by year's end.

Violent competition between national security forces and insurgent groups for control of territory and natural resources kept about 669,791 Central Africans internally displaced in 2021, and there were 743,865 refugees living outside the country at year's end. The UN Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs (OCHA) reported that insecurity and attacks during the 2020–21 elections had led at least 233,200 people to flee their homes. Conflict between farmers and nomadic pastoralists further destabilized the country in 2021.

In July, the UN Security Council (UNSC) voted to further relax the arms embargo established in 2013.

Same-sex sexual acts are illegal, and punishable by fines and imprisonment. While enforcement of these laws is uncommon, societal discrimination against LGBT+ people remains acute. Discrimination continues against the Muslim minority, nomadic pastoralist groups, and the Ba'aka minority. The Gbaya majority, to which former President Bozizé belongs, is also targeted.

The independent High Authority for Good Governance is tasked with protecting the rights of members of minority groups and people with disabilities, though its reach is limited.

Due to the tribalization of politics, the Mbaka-Mandja groups may continue to enjoy unfair advantages.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 0 / 16G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 0 / 4

Free movement by citizens is inhibited by the lack of security and targeted violence. Transportation routes are threatened by banditry and theft in many areas. Limitations of movement imposed to prevent the spread of COVID-19 have economically affected Central Africans.

Businesses and homes are regularly looted or extorted by armed militants, with little prospect for compensation or legal recourse for victims. The agricultural economy—the livelihood of the majority of the population—remains restricted by ongoing violence and insecurity.

The family code does not discriminate against women when it comes to inheritance rights. However, in practice, the possibility for women to inherit faces many challenges, including eviction from the family home after the death or disappearance of men during conflict.

Women and girls are by far the primary victims of sexual violence, but men and boys are also affected. Sexual violence is used as a deliberate tool of warfare, and attackers enjoy broad impunity. Such acts that are not related to ethnic conflict are most often perpetrated within communities by family or neighbors. Constitutional guarantees for women's rights are rarely enforced, especially in rural areas.

Allegations of sexual abuse committed by UN peacekeeping forces in the country have been documented, including in September 2021, when UN peacekeepers from Gabon were accused of sexually abusing five Central African girls; the same month, UN officials removed the entire Gabonese peacekeeping contingent from the CAR and ordered an investigation into the allegations.

Economic opportunity is heavily restricted by the widespread corruption and the presence of armed groups throughout the country. Many armed groups exploit gold and diamond mines, and forced labor and child recruitment for soldiering are common practices. The government has made significant efforts to eliminate trafficking, though it has not yet fully met minimum standards, according to the US State Department's 2021 Trafficking in Persons report.

Chad

Population: 17,400,000

Capital: N'Djamena

Freedom Status: Not Free

Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: Chad has been ruled by a military government since April 2021, when a group of senior officers seized power in a coup d'état following the death of longtime president Idriss

Déby Itno. The military regime, led by the former president's son, announced that it would oversee an 18-month transition period, which can be renewed once, followed by elections. Elections in Chad have historically been characterized by a high degree of repression, and legislative elections in Chad have been routinely delayed. Opposition activists risk arrest and severe mistreatment while in detention. The state faces multiple insurgencies led by rebel militants in the north and Boko Haram in the Lake Chad Basin.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- In April, incumbent president Idriss Déby Itno was reelected to a sixth term in office in an election marred by a government crackdown on political dissent. Later that month, Déby was killed by rebel forces while visiting Chadian soldiers fighting in the north of the country.
- Following Déby's death, a transitional military council (TMC) comprised of senior military officers and headed by his son took control of the country in an April coup d'état. The TMC announced that it would oversee an 18-month transition period, which can be renewed once, followed by "free and fair" elections.
- In September, the ruling TMC appointed a 93-member National Transitional Council (NTC) to serve as an interim legislature for the transitional government. In October, the former president of the National Assembly, Haroun Kabadi, was appointed president of the NTC.
- In December, the NTC approved two laws granting amnesty to approximately 300 members of armed rebel groups for crimes ranging from terrorism to the recruitment of child soldiers. Civil society organizations criticized the amnesty for only applying to a small sub-set of rebels.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 1 / 40 (-2)

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 0 / 12 (-1)

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4 (-1)

The president is normally directly elected to a five-year term. President Idriss Déby Itno took power in 1990 during a rebellion, and overwhelmingly won reelection in 1996, 2001, 2006, 2011, and 2016. Déby was reelected to a sixth term in April 2021 with 79.3 percent of the vote. The election, which was not credible or free, took place amid a government crackdown on political dissent and was boycotted by the country's main opposition figures.

Less than two weeks after the election, President Déby was killed by rebel forces while visiting Chadian soldiers fighting in the north of the country. Following Déby's death, a transitional military council (TMC) comprised of senior military officers and headed by his son—General Mahamat Idriss Déby Itno—took control of the country in a coup d'état. The TMC announced that it would oversee an 18-month transition period, which can be renewed once, followed by "free and fair" elections. In July, the TMC announced a planned timeline for the transition, calling for an "inclusive national dialogue" to be held in November and December 2021, followed by elections between June and September 2022. In December, the transitional government announced that the national dialogue had been postponed, and would not be held until February 2022.

In April, the TMC named Albert Pahimi Padacké as prime minister of the transitional government. Padacké previously served as prime minister under former president Déby; opposition politicians criticized the choice, saying the military lacked the authority to appoint a prime minister.

Score Change: The score declined from 1 to 0 because the military seized power in a coup after the incumbent president was killed in April.

Prior to the April 2021 military coup, the unicameral National Assembly consisted of 188 members elected to four-year terms. The ruling political party, former president Déby's Patriotic Salvation Movement (MPS), and allied parties controlled 117 seats. Elections have not been organized since 2011, with legislative elections due in 2015 having been repeatedly postponed. At the time of the coup, legislators were performing their functions despite the expiration of their electoral mandates.

Following the April 2021 coup d'état, the TMC dissolved the National Assembly and assumed its functions. Later that month, the TMC authorized the National Assembly to resume functioning; the final meeting of the National Assembly took place at the end of June. In September, the TMC appointed a 93-member National Transitional Council (NTC) to perform the functions of the National Assembly under the transitional government. While some opposition members were named to the NTC, members of a prominent opposition coalition that denounced the coup were excluded. In October, the former president of the National Assembly, Haroun Kabadi, was appointed president of the NTC.

Before the April 2021 coup, elections were managed by the Independent National Electoral Commission (CENI); the CENI's leadership was appointed by the country's entrenched political class through the National Framework for Political Dialogue (CNDP), and civil society was excluded from the process. In 2019, the CNDP adopted a revised electoral code, reducing the number of lower-house members from 188 to 161 in the next legislature, over the objection of opposition members.

The 2021 installation of the military government—which suspended the constitution upon taking power in April—violated constitutional provisions requiring that power be passed to the president of the National Assembly in the event that the head of state dies in office.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 1 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 1 / 4

There are more than 130 registered political parties in Chad, though most have historically been aligned with the government.

Opposition parties are subject to government harassment and arrest. In February 2021, the Chadian military killed multiple people when they stormed the home of a prominent opposition politician after he allegedly failed to respond to a judicial summons. In May, the leader of the opposition Reform Party (PR) was arrested and tortured by the police after participating in an anti-TMC protest march.

The mandate of the National Assembly, which was dissolved and temporarily reinstated following the April coup d'état, expired in 2015. Parliamentary elections, originally planned for 2015, were repeatedly postponed, leaving the opposition unable to increase its support or gain power through elections. The political opposition is legally recognized, but opposition leaders who publicly criticize the government risk harassment and arrest. Opposition leaders have disappeared after entering state custody. Some opposition parties called for a boycott of the 2021 presidential elections following a deadly raid on an opposition leader's home by state security forces in February.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 0 / 4

Before the April 2021 coup d'état, extensive kinship networks tied to former president Déby had resulted in a concentration of political and economic power. The former government was not accountable to voters in practice, and voters had few effective means of influencing politics. After Déby's death in April, the military took control of the government, violating the constitution and furthering a historic pattern of outsized military influence in Chadian politics.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 0 / 4

The military government has continued a longstanding pattern of appointing members of the Beri ethnic group to prominent positions within the government, causing resentment among the country's other ethnic groups. Christians in the south are largely excluded from political power; though some Christians have held government positions, their voice was limited.

Women have historically held few senior positions in government, and face discrimination in employment and inheritance practices. LGBT+ people are severely marginalized, impacting their ability to engage in political processes and advocate for their interests.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 0 / 12 (-1)

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 0 / 4 (-1)

Prior to his death in April 2021, former president Déby enjoyed unlimited discretionary power over the composition of government and had concentrated power within the executive branch. Presidential elections, including the election held in April, were not credible and were characterized by significant political repression. Members of the National Assembly, last elected in 2011, acted on expired mandates from 2015 until 2021. The April 2021 coup d'état replaced the country's executive and legislative institutions with an unelected military government, which remained in power at year's end.

Score Change: The score declined from 1 to 0 because the April military coup left the country under the control of unelected leaders.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 0 / 4

Corruption, bribery, and nepotism are endemic in Chad. Journalists, labor leaders, and religious figures have faced harsh reprisals for speaking out about corruption, including arrest, prosecution, and expulsion from the country. Corruption charges against high-level officials that do go forward are widely viewed as selective prosecutions meant to discredit those who pose a threat to the government or its allies.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 0 / 4

Chad has no law establishing the right to access official information. Since seizing power in April 2021, the TMC has largely ruled by decree, offering no meaningful opportunity for civil society to comment on government operations or obtain basic information about government functions.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 14 / 60D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 6 / 12*D1. Are there free and independent media? 1 / 4

The TMC's transitional charter provides for freedom of the press, but press freedom is restricted in practice. Newspaper editors are legally required to have completed at least three years of higher education; outlets employing editors who do not meet this condition face suspension, constraining the media environment. Although criticism of the government is generally permitted within certain boundaries, reporters and editors commonly self-censor to avoid reprisals. Journalists can face arrest, detention, and imprisonment on charges including defamation.

In March 2021, the government banned interactive political broadcasts in all media during the runoff to April's presidential election.

The state imposes a number of religious restrictions, primarily against certain Muslim sects. Several sects deemed to promote violence are banned, despite limited evidence of such activity. Imams are subject to governance by the semipublic High Council for Islamic Affairs, which is led by a group of imams belonging to the Tijanyya Sufi order. Wearing burqas is banned by ministerial decree, and the government detains individuals who wear them in public.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 2 / 4

The government does not restrict academic freedom, but funds meant for the education system, as well as government-funded stipends, are regularly in arrears.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 2 / 4

Space for open and free private discussion exists but tends to be self-censored due to fears of reprisal from the state. The government throttled internet connectivity speeds across the country multiple times during 2021 in an attempt to limit media coverage of antigovernment demonstrations and the arrest of an opposition politician. In October, police arrested a political activist for making pro-opposition social media posts.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 4 / 12E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 1 / 4

The right of free assembly is not upheld by the military government, and the TMC routinely bans gatherings. In April 2021, protests against the military coup were met with state violence, resulting in the deaths of at least five people. Nonetheless, some protests denouncing a lack of political transparency and inclusivity were authorized by transition authorities during the year, and were allowed to proceed peacefully.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 1 / 4

Nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) must receive government approval to operate legally, but few such applications are approved. Some NGOs, many of which focus on issues such as human trafficking and humanitarian relief, operate in the country.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 2 / 4

Though the TMC's transitional charter protects the rights to strike and unionize, other laws limit public sector workers' right to strike. Despite such restrictions, some public unions, including teachers' unions, organized strikes in 2021.

Following the April coup d'état, some unions released statements denouncing the military takeover.

F. RULE OF LAW: 1 / 16F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 0 / 4

The rule of law and the judicial system remain weak because the political leadership heavily influences the courts. Instances of political interference in trials were reported in 2021.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 1 / 4

Security forces routinely ignore legal guidelines regarding search, seizure, and detention. Detained persons are often denied access to lawyers, especially those detained in connection with their involvement in antigovernment protests or activities. Many people suspected of committing crimes are held for lengthy periods without charge. Instances of arbitrary detention and forced disappearances by security forces were reported throughout 2021.

In December, the NTC approved two laws granting amnesty to approximately 300 members of armed rebel groups for crimes ranging from terrorism to the recruitment of child soldiers. Civil society organizations criticized the amnesty for only applying to a small sub-set of rebels.

Political leaders do not maintain control of the security forces, who stand accused of killing and torturing with impunity. In addition, tensions amongst ethnic groups have been known to escalate into violent conflict. In August 2021, 22 civilians were killed when members of two communities clashed over land being used by both groups.

Beginning in April, rebels belonging a group known as the Front for Change and Concord in Chad (FACT) crossed into Chad from Libyan territory, attacking Chadian military positions and attempting to depose the government. The fighting resulted in the April death of Chadian President Déby. In May, the Chadian military claimed victory over the rebel group. Chadian human rights groups reported that members of certain ethnic groups were targeted for arbitrary arrest and forcibly disappeared by security forces due to perceived complicity with FACT rebels.

The Boko Haram militant group, including a faction known as the Islamic State's West Africa Province (IS-WA), operates near Lake Chad, and was active throughout 2021. In August, IS-WA militants attacked a Chadian military position in the Lake Chad region, killing 26 soldiers.

Prison conditions often do not conform to international standards. In July, prisoner of war and former opposition politician Ngarial Modeste died under unclear circumstances while in the custody of Chad's military intelligence service.

Due to cultural stigmatization, LGBT+ citizens are forced to conceal their sexual orientation and gender identity. The current penal code criminalizes same-sex sexual activity. Women face pervasive discrimination, and girls have limited access to education.

Ethnic disparities in the justice system have been reported, with officials refraining from enforcing court orders against people who share the same ethnic identity. Arbitrary arrests and detentions based on ethnic identity have also been reported.

While discrimination against people living with disabilities is legally prohibited, NGOs claim that these provisions go unenforced.

The government struggles to provide services to internally displaced persons (IDPs). In September 2021, the UN Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs counted 402,000 IDPs, along with over 481,000 refugees from other countries residing in Chad.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 3 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 1 / 4

Although legal guarantees for the freedom of movement exist, in practice militant activity and government restrictions have limited movement. Following the April 2021 coup, the TMC closed national borders and imposed a curfew; these measures were lifted in April and May, respectively. In some areas of Chad, militants have erected roadblocks, limiting citizens' freedom of movement.

Public resource constraints restrict citizens' ability to pursue employment or educational opportunities outside of their local areas. The delivery of administrative documents is often slowed by bureaucratic constraints, limiting access to official documentation.

Laws establishing land and property rights are nominally in force, but are functionally irrelevant to the majority of the country's population owing to the state's minimal presence in rural areas; customary law governs land ownership and use rights in practice. Laws protecting the right of women to inherit land are not enforced.

Establishing and operating a business in Chad is extremely difficult, due in part to corruption.

Violence against women is common. Female genital mutilation is illegal but widely practiced.

The penal code bans child marriage, setting the legal age of marriage at 18, but the courts rarely hold those who practice it accountable.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 1 / 4

Chad has adopted minimum wage and occupational safety laws, but they are not well enforced. Many workers are unaware of or lack access to formal channels through which they may seek redress for mistreatment; corruption also impedes workers from obtaining such redress. Unpaid wages are a problem in many sectors.

Chad is a source, transit, and destination country for child trafficking. NGOs in Chad have reported that a large percentage of human trafficking in Chad is related to the operation of illegal gold mines in the country's south.

Chile

Population: 19,600,000

Capital: Santiago

Freedom Status: Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Chile is a stable democracy that has experienced a significant expansion of political rights and civil liberties since the return of civilian rule in 1990. Ongoing concerns include corruption and unrest linked to land disputes with Indigenous Mapuche people.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- In December, left-wing legislator Gabriel Boric became the youngest president elected in Chilean history after winning 55.8 percent of the votes in the runoff election. Elections were also held for the Constitutional Convention, the Chamber of Deputies, over half of the Senate, governors, and regional councilors.
- Though progressives won the presidency and dominated the Constitutional Convention and subnational politics, Congress remained fragmented, meaning Boric will govern under a divided government.
- In October, the Pandora Papers investigation revealed that President Sebastián Piñera had allegedly engaged in irregular use of his political office for personal financial gain. Although the Chamber of Deputies approved impeachment charges, the Senate acquitted Piñera.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 38 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 12 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

Presidential elections in Chile are free and fair. The president is directly elected to a four-year term, and consecutive terms are not permitted. In December 2021, Chileans elected Gabriel Boric, to the presidency. Boric, a leftist member of Congress, won the second round of the election with 55.8 percent of the vote, becoming the youngest elected president in Chilean history at age 35.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The upper house, the Senate, has 50 seats, and the lower house, the Chamber of Deputies, has 155 seats; all members are directly elected. Senators serve eight-year terms, with half up for election every four years, and members of the Chamber of Deputies are elected to four-year terms.

In November 2021, Chileans elected 27 of 50 senators and all 155 members of the Chamber of Deputies. No coalition won a majority of seats, and both chambers remain politically diverse.

Chile's electoral framework is robust and generally well implemented.

In May of 2021, Chileans elected all 155 members of the Constitutional Convention using a gender parity criterion, with 17 seats reserved for Chile's 10 official Indigenous groups. The convention will propose a new constitution in 2022, which must be approved by a referendum. The constitutional reform process was triggered by an October 2020 national plebiscite, organized in response to the large-scale protests of the previous year. The election of the convention was held concurrently with subnational elections, including for governors, who were elected for the first time following a 2018 legal reform.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 15 / 16

Chile has a multiparty political system in which parties operate freely. The newly elected Congress, which will hold its first session in March 2022, includes representatives from 16 political parties, as well as several independent candidates. Multiple new parties were registered or began organizing in 2020, motivated by interest in participating in the Constitutional Convention elected in May 2021. By the end of 2021, 27 parties were legally constituted.

Power alternation between parties occurs regularly, both in Congress and for the presidency.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 4 / 4

People are generally free to exercise their political choices without undue influence from actors that are not democratically accountable.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 3 / 4

The Constitutional Convention elected in May 2021 features gender parity among its 155 members, comprised of 78 men and 77 women, and 17 seats were reserved for members of Indigenous communities. Women are represented in government, and the electoral system includes a quota for women in the legislature. However, women report difficulty gaining influence in intraparty debates.

The interests of the Mapuche minority, which represents about 9 percent of the population, are present in political life, with Mapuche activists regularly making their voices heard in street demonstrations. However, this activism has yet to translate into significant legislative power. In 2017, one Mapuche candidate was elected to the Senate, and one to the Chamber of Deputies.

Members of the LGBT+ community are organized in civil society organizations but few are elected to political positions.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 11 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 4 / 4

While lobbying and interest groups exist and work to shape policy, there is little significant intervention by actors who are not democratically accountable in policymaking processes.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 3 / 4

Anticorruption laws are generally enforced, though high-level corruption scandals crop up with some regularity. In October 2021, an anticorruption investigation into President Sebastián Piñera was triggered by allegations found in leaked documents known as the Pandora Papers, which sparked an international investigation that exposed offshore financial records of powerful figures across the globe. Information included in the documents led to speculation that Piñera had improperly used his office to benefit from the sale of a mining company; the sale was contingent on the government choosing not to impose environmental restrictions on the mining area. In November, the Chamber of Deputies voted to impeach Piñera; the Senate acquitted him one week later.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 4 / 4

The government operates with relative transparency. In 2009 the Transparency and Access to Public Information Law came into force; it increases public access to information and created a Council on Transparency. Agencies have generally been responsive to information requests.

In September 2019 the government replaced the decades-old Copper Law, in what was viewed as a major step toward improving transparency in the wake of a series of corruption scandals involving the armed forces. The previous legislation stipulated that 10 percent of the state-run copper giant Codelco's export sales be channeled to the armed forces without oversight.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 55 / 60 (+1)D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 16 / 16*D1. Are there free and independent media? 4 / 4

Guarantees of free speech are generally respected, though some laws barring defamation of state institutions remain on the books. Media ownership is highly concentrated.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 4 / 4

The constitution provides for religious freedom, and the government generally upholds this right in practice.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

Generally, academic freedom is unrestricted in Chile. In 2019, protesters occupied, vandalized, and looted some universities, forcing several educational establishments to finish the semester early or move classes online. Some academics were publicly harassed, especially on social media. However, in 2020 academic freedom was restored to its previous level.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 4 / 4

Chileans enjoy open and free private discussion.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 11 / 12 (+1)E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4 (+1)

The right to assemble peacefully has traditionally been widely respected. However, peaceful protest activity that arose in 2019, when people took to the streets to demonstrate against the government and against societal inequality, was severely disrupted by a variety of factors including people who took advantage of the protest movement's cover to engage in looting, arson, and vandalism; and by widespread police violence and a restrictive state of emergency that was imposed in response to the unrest. Though sporadic protests still occur, both civilian violence and police repression have decreased significantly since 2019.

In September 2021, the government lifted a COVID-19-related state of emergency that had been in effect since March of 2020.

Score Change: The score improved from 3 to 4 because past violent crackdowns on protests were not repeated.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 4 / 4

Nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) form and operate without interference.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 4 / 4

There are strong laws protecting worker and union rights, but some limited antiunion practices by private sector employers continue to be reported.

F. RULE OF LAW: 13 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 4 / 4

The constitution provides for an independent judiciary, and the courts are generally free from political interference.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 4 / 4

The right to legal counsel is constitutionally guaranteed and due process generally prevails in civil and criminal matters. However, indigent defendants do not always receive effective legal representation.

In 2021, the Supreme Court and other courts of appeal ordered authorities to stop numerous deportations of Venezuelans on the basis of international law; these rulings exposed significant violations of due process.

Human rights groups and the United Nations have also criticized the government's use of antiterrorism laws, which do not guarantee due process, to prosecute acts of violence by Mapuche activists.

While the government has developed mechanisms to investigate and punish police abuses, excessive force and human rights abuses committed by the carabineros (the national police) still occur, and such abuses intensified during the social upheaval that started in 2019. The protest movement was also marked by a general state of unrest in many places, as some took advantage of the uprising to commit acts of arson, looting, and other vandalism. Protests, vandalism, and police use of excessive force occurred sporadically throughout 2021, but did not reach the intensity of the unrest seen in 2019.

The government's National Institute for Human Rights (INDH), Human Rights Watch (HRW), and Amnesty International all accused the carabineros and the military of perpetrating human rights violations during the protests, including excessive use of force against protesters, as well as torture and sexual abuse of people held in detention.

In 2020, the scale of abuses committed by the security forces fell because of the decline in protests amid the COVID-19 pandemic and associated restrictions, but criticism of security force tactics continued, and there is no evidence that practices exposed during the 2019 protests have been addressed.

In October 2021, President Piñera declared a state of emergency in the Araucanía and Biobío regions in response to violent clashes between security forces and Mapuche activists. The state of emergency has been extended several times, and remained in place at the end of 2021.

While Indigenous people still experience societal discrimination and police brutality, their poverty levels have declined somewhat, aided by government scholarships, land transfers, and social spending.

LGBT+ people continue to face societal bias, despite a 2012 antidiscrimination law that covers sexual orientation and gender identity. In November 2018, the president signed a gender-identity law allowing for gender identity to be changed on the civil registry.

In practice, elites benefit from systematic favorable legal treatment, and widespread grievances about social inequality were a major driver of the 2019 protests.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 15 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

The constitution protects the freedom of movement, and the government respects this right in practice. Freedom of movement was constrained in 2019 due to the roadblocks, damage to train stations, and vandalism associated with the social unrest that began in October. In 2020, the transit impact of civil unrest ceased, and in 2021 the only constraints on freedom of movement stemmed from governmental measures to control the spread of the coronavirus.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 4 / 4

Individuals generally have the right to own property and establish and operate private businesses, and do so without interference from the government or other actors. However, Mapuche activists continue to demand greater territorial rights to land, ancestral waters, and natural resources.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 4 / 4

The government generally does not restrict personal social freedoms. Violence against children and women remains a problem. A law against femicide went into force in 2010. The government reported 44 femicides and 163 attempted femicides in 2021.

In 2017, a law introduced by then president Michelle Bachelet that decriminalized abortion in the events of rape, an inviable fetus, or danger to the life of the woman, took effect.

In December 2021, the Chilean Congress approved same-sex marriage by an overwhelming majority. Previously, a 2015 law recognized civil unions for same-sex and different-sex couples.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 3 / 4

While compulsory labor is illegal, forced labor, particularly among foreign citizens, continues to occur in the agriculture, mining, and domestic service sectors.

Although there have been improvements in fighting child labor, minors still suffer commercial sexual exploitation and work unprotected in the agricultural sector. Moreover, there is limited public information about forced child labor.

Overview: China's authoritarian regime has become increasingly repressive in recent years. The ruling Chinese Communist Party (CCP) continues to tighten control over all aspects of life and governance, including the state bureaucracy, the media, online speech, religious practice, universities, businesses, and civil society associations, and it has undermined an earlier series of modest rule-of-law reforms. The CCP leader and state president, Xi Jinping, has consolidated personal power to a degree not seen in China for decades. Human rights activists and lawyers continue to speak out, though at great personal cost.

- The authorities remained largely successful in containing the COVID-19 virus, but they continued to exploit the pandemic to justify intensified surveillance and control of citizen behavior, and to punish those who provided independent sources of information and criticism about the government's handling of the contagion.
 - Numerous new rules and regulations governing media and the internet came into effect during the year, including measures that tightened restrictions on news dissemination and resulted in the banning of mobile applications used by marginalized groups. Meanwhile, the network of volunteer pro-CCP internet commentators was reported to have grown to 20 million people, in addition to two million others who are paid for their service.
 - New evidence showed that China's top leaders, including Xi Jinping, were directly involved in the design and implementation of the most draconian policies affecting Uyghurs and other ethnic minority groups, including programs aimed at changing demographics in the relevant areas. Rare first-hand accounts from inside detention camps in the Xinjiang Uyghur Autonomous Region revealed systemic sexual abuse and torture of ethnic minority detainees, in addition to credible reports of deaths in custody. The authorities took further steps to forcibly assimilate all ethnic minorities into the dominant Han Chinese national identity, in part by imposing Mandarin as the language of instruction at all educational levels.

- The authorities continued a years-long crackdown on independent civil society, carrying out arrests and criminal prosecutions of journalists, activists, human rights lawyers, and Chinese and foreign activists who challenged state authority. The persecution of religious practitioners of all backgrounds who refused to submit to oppressive state controls also continued unabated, and the limited space for independent academic discussion and research was subjected to new constraints.
- More aggressive regulatory action against some of the country's largest private firms allowed the authorities to counter monopolistic practices and other perceived economic dysfunctions while also advancing Xi Jinping's goal of bringing the economy more firmly under party and state control.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: -2 / 40A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 0 / 12*A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

There are no direct or competitive elections for national executive leaders. The National People's Congress (NPC) formally elects the state president for five-year terms and confirms the premier after he is nominated by the president, but both positions are determined in advance by the top CCP leadership and announced at the relevant party congress. The CCP's seven-member Politburo Standing Committee (PSC), headed by Xi Jinping in his role as the party's general secretary, sets government and party policy in practice. Xi also holds the position of state president and serves as chairman of the state and party military commissions.

Xi was awarded a second five-year term as CCP general secretary at the 19th Party Congress in October 2017, and at the NPC session in March 2018 he was confirmed for a second five-year term as state president. Also at that session, the NPC approved amendments to China's constitution that abolished the two-term limit for the state presidency and vice presidency. In 2021, the top leadership continued to lay the groundwork for Xi to remain in office for a third term or indefinitely.

The 3,000 NPC members are formally elected for five-year terms by subnational congresses, but in practice all candidates are vetted by the CCP. Only the NPC's standing committee meets regularly, with the full congress convening for just two weeks a year to approve proposed legislation; party organs and the State Council, or cabinet, effectively control lawmaking decisions. The current NPC was seated in March 2018.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 0 / 4

Political positions are directly elected only at the lowest levels. Independent candidates who obtain the signatures of 10 supporters are by law allowed to run for seats in the county-level people's congresses, and elections for village committees are also supposed to give residents the chance to choose their representatives. In practice, however, independent candidates for these posts are often kept off the ballot or out of office through intimidation, harassment, fraud, and in some cases detention.

Elections are not administered by an independent body. The indirect elections that populate people's congresses at various levels are conducted by those congresses' standing committees, while village-level elections are conducted by a village electoral committee that answers to the local party committee. New vetting criteria and other rules that were put in place for village elections held during 2021 helped to ensure that the villages' elected bodies would be identical in membership to the local party committees, and that the local party secretary would be the elected village chief; the terms of village chiefs were also extended from three years to five.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 0 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 0 / 4

The CCP effectively monopolizes all political activity and does not permit meaningful political competition. Eight small noncommunist parties are represented in the Chinese People's Political Consultative Conference (CPPCC), an official advisory body, but their activities are tightly circumscribed, and they must accept the CCP's leadership as a condition for their existence.

Citizens who have sought to establish genuinely independent political parties or advocated for democracy are nearly all in prison, under house arrest, or in exile. In 2021, the authorities continued to hold prodemocracy activists and lawyers in various forms of detention. It was reported in August that New Citizens' Movement founder and legal activist Xu Zhiyong, in detention since February 2020, had been formally indicted for "subversion," though he had yet to be tried at year's end.

China's one-party system provides no institutional mechanism for organized political opposition, and the CCP has ruled without interruption since winning a civil war against the Nationalist Party (Kuomintang) in 1949. While factions within the CCP have always existed, they do not compete openly or democratically, and they remain unaccountable to the public. Xi Jinping has steadily increased his personal power and authority within the party since 2012, and the authorities have become even less tolerant of any expression of dissent.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 0 / 4

The authoritarian CCP is not accountable to voters and denies the public any meaningful influence or participation in political affairs. The party uses a broad array of coercive tools and methods to suppress independent political engagement.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 0 / 4

The political system is dominated in practice by ethnic Han Chinese men. Societal groups such as women, ethnic and religious minorities, and LGBT+ people have no opportunity to gain meaningful political representation and—as with the rest of the population—are barred from advancing their interests outside the structures controlled by the CCP. Nominal representatives of ethnic minority groups such as Tibetans, Uyghurs, and Mongolians participate in party and state bodies like the NPC, but their role is largely symbolic. Women are severely underrepresented in top CCP and government positions, and the situation has grown slightly worse in recent years. Just one woman was named to the 25-member Politburo at the 19th Party Congress in 2017, down from the previous two. No woman has ever sat on the PSC.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 1 / 12C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 0 / 4

None of China's national leaders are freely elected, and the legislature plays a largely rubber-stamp role in policymaking and the development of new laws. The continuing concentration of power in Xi Jinping's hands, an expanding cult of personality centered on Xi, and his regular calls for greater ideological conformity and party supremacy have further reduced the limited space for policy debate, even within the CCP.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 1 / 4

Since becoming CCP leader in 2012, Xi has pursued an extensive anticorruption campaign. Well over a million officials have been investigated and punished, according to official figures, including senior state, party, and military officials. However, the campaign is widely believed to have been pursued selectively against Xi's potential rivals. Anticorruption functions are currently managed by the National Supervisory Commission (NSC), which was established through a 2018 merger of existing state and party entities and is tasked with enforcing political and ideological discipline in addition to compliance with the law.

While anticorruption efforts have generated a chilling effect among officials and reduced ostentatious displays of wealth, corruption remains rooted in the one-party system, which does not tolerate the institutions necessary for effectively addressing graft, including a free press, independent civil society groups, and impartial courts.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 0 / 4

The Chinese government and the CCP are notoriously opaque. Regulations on "open government" do not effectively compel local party and state organs to share critical data or respond to citizen requests. Under Xi Jinping's leadership, the government has developed increasingly sophisticated methods for controlling the diffusion of information and shaping public discourse. In 2021 the authorities continued to suppress information about their management of COVID-19, to spread disinformation about the pandemic, and to punish those who sought to report truthfully about the situation.

ADDITIONAL DISCRETIONARY POLITICAL RIGHTS QUESTIONIs the government or occupying power deliberately changing the ethnic composition of a country or territory so as to destroy a culture or tip the political balance in favor of another group? -3 / 0

Despite growing international condemnation, the government continued in 2021 to aggressively pursue policies that are altering the demographics of ethnic minority regions, especially Xinjiang, Tibet, and Inner Mongolia. New analysis provided strong evidence that China's top leaders, including Xi Jinping, were directly involved in the design and implementation of the most draconian of these policies.

The ongoing detention of more than one million Uyghurs and other Muslims in internment camps or forced-labor facilities in Xinjiang continued to limit birth rates among those communities. Rare first-hand accounts from inside the camps that were made public by international media during 2021 pointed to systemic sexual abuse and torture of detainees. Uyghur and other Muslim women in Xinjiang, particularly those with two or more children, are subject to a program of forced sterilization, and "surplus rural laborers" in both Xinjiang and Tibet have been relocated en masse by the authorities. Despite the government's claim that the relocations are voluntary and beneficial to participants, the evidence suggests conditions that are tantamount to forced labor, with members of ethnic minorities housed separately in prison-like environments, subjected to political indoctrination, and economically exploited. The government also promotes policies intended to attract Han Chinese migrants to ethnic minority regions. Programs aimed at encouraging marriages between Han Chinese and members of ethnic minorities through financial and other incentives are meant to further dilute minority identities.

The authorities have increasingly sought to undermine minority cultures and identities across the country, not just in Uyghur, Tibetan, and Mongolian areas. In August 2021, the Ministry of Education issued notification of a new policy requiring all preschools in China to make Mandarin Chinese the language of instruction, deepening its push to impose Mandarin as the dominant language at all educational levels. Increasing numbers of ethnic minority children in Xinjiang and Tibet have been separated from their parents and forced to attend state-run boarding schools, where Mandarin is the sole language of instruction and where students are subject to intense political indoctrination. Those who protest are subject to detention and other forms of punishment.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 11 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 1 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 0 / 4

China is home to one of the world's most restrictive media environments and its most sophisticated system of censorship, particularly online. The CCP maintains control over news reporting via direct ownership, accreditation of journalists, harsh penalties for comments that are critical of party leaders or the CCP, and daily directives to media outlets and websites that guide coverage of breaking news stories. State management of the telecommunications infrastructure enables the blocking of websites, removal of smartphone applications from the domestic market, and mass deletion of social media posts and user accounts that touch on banned political, social, economic, and religious topics. Thousands of websites have been blocked, many for years, including major news and social media hubs like the New York Times, the British Broadcasting Corporation (BBC), YouTube, Twitter, and Facebook.

Numerous new rules and regulations governing the media and internet usage came into effect during 2021, including measures that restricted news dissemination and contributed to the banning of mobile apps focused on minority languages, Bible content, and foreign-language learning, among other topics. Censors also removed large numbers of social media groups, accounts, or posts that dealt with LGBT+ issues, financial advice, critical views of CCP history, and celebrities.

According to the Committee to Protect Journalists, 50 journalists were behind bars in China in connection with their work as of December 2021, though the actual number of people held for uncovering or sharing newsworthy information is far greater. The authorities subjected the renewal of both Chinese and foreign journalists' press cards to heightened scrutiny and political criteria. BBC China correspondent John Sudworth was forced to leave China in March following his reporting on Xinjiang, having faced harassment and a harsh smear campaign against him in state media.

Early in the year, the Central Propaganda Department banned the posting of news-related information by anyone without a license, effectively raising the risks of engaging in any current-affairs commentary. Numerous citizen journalists and bloggers were detained, disappeared, or criminally charged during 2021 for their reporting and online posts. The government set up a tip line for people to report critical comments about the party and state. Meanwhile, the country's network of pro-CCP volunteer internet commentators was reported to have grown to 20 million people, in addition to two million others who are paid for their service.

Zhang Zhan, a citizen journalist and former human rights lawyer who was sentenced to four years in prison in December 2020 for “picking quarrels and stirring up trouble” through her reporting from Wuhan on the COVID-19 pandemic, was said to be close to death in late 2021 after months of hunger striking to protest her imprisonment. The whereabouts of others detained for their reporting early in the pandemic remained unknown.

The CCP regime operates a multifaceted apparatus to control all aspects of religious activity, including by vetting religious leaders for political reliability, placing limits on the number of priests, requiring ideological conformity within religious doctrine, and installing security cameras inside religious establishments. Certain religions and religious groups, including Tibetan Buddhists, Uyghur Muslims, Falun Gong practitioners, and Christian “house churches,” are persecuted particularly harshly. In Xinjiang, children under 18 cannot enter mosques or receive religious instruction. Peaceful religious practices are routinely punished under charges of “religious extremism,” resulting in detention, prison sentences, and indoctrination for many Uyghur, Kazakh, and Hui Muslims. However, all religious groups must go through a rigorous process of certification to be officially recognized by the authorities, with those that refuse to do so being labeled illegal and persecuted, including independent Buddhist groups. Even recognized groups and their places of worship are being forced to visibly conform to the CCP’s interpretation of “Chinese culture” as part of the regime’s broader effort under Xi Jinping to assimilate minority groups. Hundreds of Buddhist, Taoist, and folk-religion temples across China have also been completely or partially demolished by authorities in recent years.

The government has expanded the use of mobile “transformation” units, which subject members of illegal religious groups to severe psychological and physical torture intended to force them to “transform” by renouncing their religious beliefs. Thousands of members of such illegal groups are also sentenced to long prison terms and illegal forms of detention, in which torture and ill-treatment are routine. Dozens of Falun Gong practitioners were reported to have died in custody, or shortly after their release, during 2021.

Academic freedom is heavily restricted, and the space for academic discussion and research that departs from CCP guidelines has been reduced further in recent years. Efforts to police classroom discussions have increased at all levels of education, including via installation of surveillance cameras in some classrooms, large-scale recruitment of student informants, and the creation of special departments to supervise the political thinking of teaching staff. The CCP controls the appointment of top university officials, and a revised set of rules issued in April 2021 gave greater formal authority over university administration to CCP committees and party branches. Many scholars practice self-censorship to protect their careers and personal safety.

Political indoctrination, including the study of “Xi Jinping Thought,” is a required component of the curriculum at all levels of education. Increased government funding to support research promoting party ideology has spurred the establishment of dozens of centers dedicated to “Xi Jinping Thought.” A number of universities have formally removed references to “freedom of thought” from their charters in recent years, replacing them with pledges of loyalty to the CCP. Professors and students face reprisals—ranging from censored writings, travel restrictions, and demotions to arrest and imprisonment—for expressing views that are deemed critical of the CCP’s governance and Xi’s leadership. Geng Xiaonan, a publisher, was sentenced in February 2021 to three years in prison for publicly expressing support for Xu Zhangrun, a Tsinghua University law professor who had been detained and dismissed in 2020 in connection with publications that criticized Xi’s authoritarian policies.

The government issued sweeping new restrictions on the country’s $100 billion private school and tutoring industry in July, sharply limiting the operations, educational content, and foreign contacts of such services.

Citizens continue to be charged and sentenced to sometimes long prison terms for critical or satirical social media posts on a variety of subjects. Among numerous other recent cases, Niu Tengyu was sentenced to 14 years in prison in December 2020 after a photo of Xi Jinping’s daughter was posted on the online portal he administered. It was reported in June 2021 that blogger Qiu Ziming had been sentenced to eight months in prison for “defaming martyrs” by questioning official information about military deaths near the border with India. In addition to criminal punishment, internet users face account deletions, job dismissals, arbitrary detention, and police interrogation in response to politically sensitive or simply humorous comments made on social media platforms.

The government’s ability to monitor citizens’ lives and communications has increased dramatically in recent years, inhibiting online and offline conversations. Social media applications like WeChat closely monitor user discussions to ensure conformity with government content restrictions. Surveillance cameras, now frequently augmented with facial-recognition software, cover many urban areas and public transportation, and these networks are expanding into rural regions. Devices used by police to quickly extract and scan data from smartphones, initially deployed in Xinjiang, have spread nationwide.

Police have access to the personal details of broad categories of individuals. China’s Cybersecurity Law obliges companies to store Chinese users’ data within the country and submit to often intrusive security reviews. Telecommunications companies are required to obtain facial scans of new internet or mobile phone users as part of the real-name registration process.

Electronic surveillance is supplemented with offline monitoring by neighborhood party committees, “public security volunteers” who are visible during large events, and an especially heavy police presence in places like Xinjiang. The ability of Uyghurs and members of other Muslim minority groups in Xinjiang to express themselves freely, even in private, has been further undermined in recent years by a policy of having Chinese officials live in their homes to monitor and indoctrinate them.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 2 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 1 / 4

The constitution protects the right of citizens to demonstrate, but in practice protesters seldom obtain approval and risk punishment for assembling without permission. Spontaneous demonstrations have provided some outlet for local grievances, though they are increasingly met with police violence and criminal prosecution rather than limited concessions by officials. Solitary protests—in which an individual holds a placard in public, for example—can be criminally punished. Activist Zhang Wuzhou was sentenced to two years and nine months in prison in March 2021 for holding up a sign to denounce the harsh national security law imposed on Hong Kong and to commemorate the 1989 Tiananmen Square massacre. Armed police have been accused of opening fire during past protests, particularly in Xinjiang.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 0 / 4

The crackdown on civil society in recent years has largely deprived both Chinese and foreign nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) of meaningful autonomy, especially for those whose work relates to human rights and governance. The space for organizations to operate without formal registration, long a common practice, has also been reduced. Nearly all prominent NGOs that focused on policy advocacy, including in previously less politically sensitive areas, have been shuttered under government pressure in recent years. Hundreds of thousands of NGOs are formally registered, but many effectively operate as government-sponsored entities and focus primarily on service delivery.

The law requires foreign NGOs to find a Chinese sponsor and register with the Ministry of Public Security, and police have the authority to search NGOs' premises without a warrant, seize property, detain personnel, and initiate criminal procedures. A list of sponsoring Chinese entities documented by the ChinaFile NGO Project indicated a heavy presence of state and CCP-affiliated organizations. The number of foreign NGOs that choose to deregister rather than attempt to comply with the law has increased each year since it took effect in 2017.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 1 / 4

The only legal labor union organization is the government-controlled All-China Federation of Trade Unions (ACFTU), which has long been criticized for failing to properly defend workers' rights, but has reportedly become even less of an ally to workers in recent years. Worker efforts to organize independent trade unions are swiftly shut down by authorities, and the activists involved face harsh penalties. Chen Guojiang, who led an effort to organize delivery workers, was detained in February 2021 and faced criminal charges, though his whereabouts and status were not publicly known at year's end. Despite the risks, workers continue to engage in largely spontaneous strikes, with nearly 1,100 recorded during 2021.

F. RULE OF LAW: 2 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 1 / 4

The CCP dominates the judicial system, with courts at all levels supervised by party political-legal committees that have influence over the appointment of judges, court operations, and verdicts and sentences. CCP oversight is especially evident in politically sensitive cases, and most judges are CCP members. Judges are expected to conform to CCP ideology and uphold the party's "absolute leadership" of the courts.

Incremental reforms aimed at improving judicial performance and increasing the courts' transparency, professionalism, and autonomy from local authorities were introduced in 2014, but they have been undercut by the principle of party supremacy over the judiciary. Many judges complain about local officials interfering in cases to protect powerful litigants, support important industries, or avoid their own potential liability. The reported disappearance of millions of court rulings from an online database in 2021 cast further doubt on the judiciary's commitment to transparency.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 1 / 4

Reforms to the criminal justice system in recent decades were ostensibly meant to guarantee better access to lawyers, allow witnesses to be cross-examined, and establish other safeguards to prevent wrongful convictions. However, violations of due process are widespread in practice. Criminal trials are frequently held in secret, and the conviction rate is estimated at 98 percent or more. While adjudication of routine civil and administrative disputes is considered more fair, cases that touch on politically sensitive issues or the interests of powerful groups are subject to decisive “guidance” from political-legal committees.

Prosecutions rely heavily on confessions, many of which are obtained through torture, despite laws prohibiting such practices. Forced confessions are often televised. A multiyear crackdown on human rights lawyers has left defendants without effective or independent legal counsel, while the lawyers affected are either in jail, under house arrest, or unable to continue their work.

Extrajudicial forms of detention remain widespread, with detainees commonly held incommunicado. The use of “residential surveillance in a designated location,” which allows the police to hold individuals in secret detention for up to six months, has increased in recent years, with more than 6,000 people estimated to be held under this system by 2019.

Conditions in places of detention are harsh, with reports of inadequate food, regular beatings, and deprivation of medical care. In addition to their use to extract confessions, torture and other forms of coercion are widely employed to force political and religious dissidents to recant their beliefs. Security agents routinely flout legal protections, and impunity is the norm for police brutality and suspicious deaths in custody. Citizens and lawyers who seek redress for such abuse often meet with reprisals or imprisonment. In April 2021, anti-corruption activist Guo Hongwei died in a prison hospital under suspicious circumstances while serving a 13-year prison sentence.

The government has gradually reduced the number of crimes that carry the death penalty, though the total was still more than 40 as of 2021. It is estimated that thousands of people are executed each year; the actual figure is considered a state secret. Despite the government’s claim that it has ended the transplantation of organs from executed prisoners, the scale and speed of the transplantation industry far exceed what is feasible via the country’s nascent voluntary donation system. In June 2021, a group of UN human rights experts expressed alarm over ongoing reports of organs being procured from “minorities, including Falun Gong practitioners, Uyghurs, Tibetans, Muslims, and Christians, in detention in China.”

Chinese laws formally prohibit discrimination based on nationality, ethnicity, race, gender, religion, or health condition, but these protections are often violated in practice. Several laws bar gender discrimination in the workplace, and some indicators of gender equality have reportedly improved over the past decade. Nevertheless, bias remains endemic, including in job recruitment and college admissions. Women’s rights activists and individuals involved in the #MeToo movement against sexual harassment and assault have themselves faced harassment, detention, and in some cases criminal prosecution. After tennis star Peng Shuai accused former PSC member Zhang Gaoli of sexual assault on social media in November 2021, she disappeared from public view, only to reappear in tightly controlled settings and effectively disavow her original allegations; the topic remained heavily censored amid widespread concern about Peng’s well-being at year’s end.

Members of ethnic and religious minority groups, LGBT+ people, people with disabilities, and people with illnesses such as HIV/AIDS and hepatitis B also face discrimination in employment and access to education. Members of religious and ethnic minorities are disproportionately targeted and abused by security forces and in the criminal justice system. In addition to being held in extrajudicial detention in larger numbers, members of these communities tend to be sentenced to longer prison terms than Han Chinese convicts.

Despite China's international obligation to protect the rights of asylum seekers and refugees, law enforcement agencies continue to repatriate North Korean defectors, who face imprisonment or execution upon return.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 6 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 1 / 4

Despite the government's stated commitment to reforming the hukou (household registration) system, it continues to prevent roughly 290 million internal migrants from enjoying full legal rights as residents in the cities where they work. Recent partial reforms still leave a large majority of migrants without equal rights or full access to the same social services enjoyed by urban residents, such as education for their children in local schools.

Police checkpoints throughout Xinjiang limit residents' ability to travel or even leave their hometowns. As in the previous year, pandemic-related controls in 2021 included abusive enforcement methods, and some lockdowns reportedly failed to accommodate residents' needs for food and other basic provisions. Local governments continued to employ the Social Credit System, designed to rate citizens' trustworthiness using a wide range of data, as well as mandatory "health code" mobile apps intended to combat COVID-19, to deny people access to air and train travel, medical facilities, and other public services and spaces based on arbitrary or opaque criteria. While China's constitution gives individuals the right to petition the government concerning a grievance or injustice, in practice petitioners are routinely intercepted in their efforts to travel to government centers, forcibly returned to their hometowns, or extralegally detained in "black jails," psychiatric institutions, and other sites.

Millions of people are affected by government restrictions on their access to foreign travel and passports, with Uyghurs and Tibetans experiencing the greatest difficulty. Many overseas Chinese nationals who engage in politically sensitive activities abroad are at risk of being prevented from returning to China, while those who seek refuge abroad may face forced repatriation and arrest.

The authorities dominate the economy through state-owned enterprises in key sectors such as banking and energy, through state ownership of land, and through political and regulatory control. Chinese citizens are legally permitted to establish and operate private businesses. However, all enterprises are vulnerable to political interference, arbitrary regulatory obstacles, debilitating censorship, negative media campaigns, demands for bribes, and other forms of corruption. A 2021 government crackdown on private businesses, particularly large technology and social media firms, was ostensibly aimed at curbing monopolistic practices, uncontrolled growth, and other economic ills, but it effectively brought the private sector more firmly under CCP control.

Property rights protection remains weak. Urban land is owned by the state, with only the buildings themselves in private hands. Rural land is collectively owned by villages. Farmers enjoy long-term lease rights to the land they work, but they have been restricted in their ability to transfer, sell, or develop it. Low compensation and weak legal protections have facilitated land seizures by local officials, who often evict residents and transfer the land rights to developers. Corruption is endemic in such projects, and local governments rely on land development as a crucial source of revenue.

The government further adjusted family-planning regulations in 2021, allowing all married couples to have up to three children rather than two, though officials retained their authority to regulate reproduction and reportedly began applying pressure for more births to stave off population decline. While ethnic minority couples were already permitted to have up to three children prior to 2021, in practice ethnic Tibetans as well as Uyghurs and other Muslims in Xinjiang are subject to abusive policies aimed at limiting their reproduction.

Domestic violence continues to affect one-quarter of Chinese women, according to official figures, despite laws criminalizing the behavior. Activists have complained that the law does not criminalize spousal rape, and that it remains extremely difficult for victims to win court cases.

Chinese law defines marriage as the union between a man and a woman, denying marriage rights to same-sex couples. Muslims in Xinjiang face restrictions and penalties related to aspects of their appearance with religious connotations, such as headscarves on women or beards on men.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 2 / 4

While workers in China are afforded important protections under existing laws, violations of labor and employment regulations are widespread. Exploitative employment practices such as wage theft, excessive overtime, student labor, and unsafe working conditions are pervasive in many industries. Forced labor and human trafficking are common, affecting internal migrants as well as Chinese nationals who are trafficked abroad. Forced labor is the norm in prisons and other detention facilities.

Colombia

Population: 50,900,000

Capital: Bogotá

Freedom Status: Partly Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Colombia is among the longest-standing democracies in Latin America, but one with a history of widespread violence and serious human rights abuses. Public institutions have demonstrated the capacity to check executive power, and the country's main left-wing guerrilla group signed a peace accord in 2016. Nonetheless, Colombia faces enormous challenges in consolidating peace and guaranteeing political rights and civil liberties outside of major urban areas.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- With over 5 million cases and approximately 130,000 deaths reported by the government by the end of 2021, Colombia remained severely afflicted by the COVID-19 pandemic, with cases and deaths peaking in mid-2021.

- The peace accord signed in 2016 between the government and the left-wing Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia (FARC) rebel group remained intact during the year, but implementation delays resulting from insufficient resources and political will, along with the continued rearming of some former rebels, prompted concern about the pact's durability.
- A wave of protests powered by numerous grievances against the government swept the country between April and June, resulting in dozens of dead protesters, widespread property damage, and numerous accusations of human rights abuses, including by the authorities.
- A multiyear wave of lethal attacks against human rights defenders and other social activists continued throughout 2021. Scores of activists were murdered, many from marginalized Indigenous and Afro-Colombian communities. The perpetrators of such crimes generally enjoyed impunity.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 29 / 40A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 10 / 12*A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The president is directly elected to a four-year term. As part of a series of 2015 constitutional amendments, presidential reelection was eliminated.

No candidate garnered an outright majority in the first round of the 2018 election; following a polarized runoff campaign, President Iván Duque of the right-wing Democratic Center (CD) party defeated left-wing former Bogotá mayor Gustavo Petro with 54 percent of the vote. The balloting was considered competitive and credible, though election observers logged sporadic reports of vote buying and other violations in both the first and second rounds.

Congress is composed of the Senate and the Chamber of Representatives, with all seats up for election every four years. The nation at large selects 100 Senate members using a proportional representation system; two additional members are chosen by Indigenous communities, one seat is awarded to the runner-up in the presidential election, and another five seats were reserved in 2018 and 2022 for the FARC under the peace accord. For the 2022 elections, the Chamber of Representatives will consist of 188 members: 161 are elected by proportional representation in multimember districts, two chosen by Afro-Colombian communities, one each by Indigenous and expatriate voters, one seat reserved for the runner-up vice presidential candidate, five seats reserved for the FARC, and 16 seats reserved for representatives of victims of the country's internal conflict; the latter were instituted following an August 2021 law implementing a peace accord provision.

The March 2018 legislative elections were relatively peaceful, though observers noted accusations of fraud, vote buying, and connections between candidates and organized crime figures. Senate seats were dispersed, with six parties winning 10 or more seats, led by Duque's CD with 19. In the Chamber of Representatives, five parties won 21 or more seats, led by the Liberal Party with 35; the CD garnered 32 seats. In its first balloting as a legal party, the FARC took no seats aside from the five guaranteed to it in each chamber.

The legal framework generally allows for competitive balloting in practice, though the nine-member National Electoral Council (CNE)—which oversees the conduct of the country’s elections, including the financing of political campaigns and the counting of votes—has faced criticism for ineffective enforcement of electoral laws, blamed in part on the partisan selection system for its members. In advance of the 2022 elections, Congress voted in October 2021 to suspend a law that constrains public contracting during electoral periods, raising concerns about the diversion of state resources for electoral purposes.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 11 / 16B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 3 / 4

Colombia’s historically rigid two-party system has undergone a protracted process of realignment and diversification in recent years. The 2018 elections brought into the legislature a mix of parties from the left, right, and center. This balance, coupled with intraparty splits, left Duque with an unstable governing coalition in each legislative chamber, though the government has maintained a fragile working majority during most its term. The FARC—whose leaders changed the party’s name to Commons (Comunes) in January 2021—reorganized as a political party in 2017, but has made negligible electoral advances.

Democratic transfers of power between rival parties are routine at both the national level and in many regions, though significant areas remain under the long-term control of machine-style political clans with ties to organized crime. Petro’s performance in the 2018 presidential election marked the strongest showing for the political left in a modern presidential campaign, and a number of candidates from outside traditional parties were able to win regional-level races in 2019. Numerous prominent politicians occupy the political space between the extremes of Petro and the CD, and in 2021 jockeying mounted among the numerous candidates in the 2022 elections, most of whom joined coalitions representing the right, left, or center.

B3. Are the people’s political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 2 / 4

Despite the peace accord with the FARC, activity by the smaller National Liberation Army (ELN) leftist guerrilla group, the successors of previously disbanded right-wing paramilitary groups, so-called “dissident” FARC members, and criminal gangs has continued to impair the ability of citizens in some areas to participate freely in the political process.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities 3 / 4

Lighter-skinned Colombians occupy a disproportionate share of government posts. While progress remains slow, the government has undertaken a series of steps to incorporate Indigenous and Afro-Colombian voices into national political debates in recent years. The 2016 peace accord included provisions for improving consultation mechanisms for marginalized groups, but issues affecting Afro-Colombians and Indigenous groups are rarely priorities in national policymaking.

Women enjoy equal political rights, and at least 30 percent of the candidates on party lists must be women. About 20 percent of the seats in each congressional chamber are currently held by women, and Vice President Marta Lucía Ramírez is a woman. Colombia's Congress has historically disregarded women's issues, but in 2021 legislators passed several laws intended to improve social and economic conditions for women, including on issues of family violence and employment opportunities.

In October 2019, Green Alliance and former senator candidate Claudia López won the mayorship of Bogotá, becoming the city's first woman and first openly gay mayor.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 8 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 3 / 4

Elected officials generally determine government policy without interference. However, the Colombian state has long struggled to establish a secure presence in all parts of its territory, meaning threats from guerrilla groups and criminal gangs can disrupt policymaking and implementation in certain regions and localities. The peace accords ended FARC control of significant territory, but since 2017 nonstate armed actors have filled the void in many regions, with FARC dissidents and paramilitary successors expanding the territory in which state authority is absent or mainly limited to coca-eradication efforts.

Corruption occurs at multiple levels of public administration. Graft scandals have emerged in recent years within an array of federal agencies, but investigations do result in convictions, including against senior officials.

A multicountry bribery scandal centered on the Brazilian construction firm Odebrecht led to charges in 2017 and 2018 against two senators and multiple former legislators and bureaucrats, while also drawing attention to the role of corruption in campaign finance. Whistleblowers lack sufficient legal protection, and a proposed legislative remedy failed to pass Congress in 2021. Following revelations of large-scale graft scheme involving contracts for rural internet access, close Duque adviser and Minister of Communications and Information Technology Karen Abudinen resigned in September 2021, and several members of Congress were placed under investigation.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 3 / 4

Government information is generally available to the public, though information related to military and security affairs, as well as criminal justice processes, can be difficult to access. In 2021 transparency watchdogs continued to note shortcomings in government data regarding disbursement and oversight of COVID-19-related emergency spending, which had spawned numerous graft allegations in 2020.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 35 / 60 (-1)

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 12 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 2 / 4

The constitution guarantees freedom of expression, and opposition views are commonly aired in the media. However, journalists face intimidation, kidnapping, and violence both in the course of reporting and in retaliation for their work. The government has prosecuted several notorious cases of murdered journalists in recent years, but convictions are rare. Local press watchdog Foundation for Press Freedom registered hundreds of threats and attacks—more than half of which were attributed to police and soldiers—linked to the protest wave that began in April. Free expression groups including the Committee to Protect Journalists (CPJ) also harshly criticized the government for a March attempt to undermine an Inter-American Court of Human Rights case involving state responsibility for the 2000 kidnapping, sexual assault, and torture of journalist Jineth Bedoya; in October the Court issued a ruling that confirmed state responsibility.

Self-censorship is common, and slander and defamation remain criminal offenses. The government does not restrict access to the internet, nor does it censor websites. Twitter and other social media platforms have become important arenas for political discourse, but large areas of Colombia remain without local news coverage. In May 2021, media watchdog groups criticized an online “cyberpatrol” campaign organized by the Ministry of Defense that labeled scores of social media posts regarding police behavior during the national strike “fake news” and “digital terrorism.”

The constitution provides for freedom of religion, and the government generally respects this right in practice.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 3 / 4

Academic freedom is generally respected. University debates are often vigorous, though armed groups maintain a presence on some campuses to generate political support and intimidate opponents.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 3 / 4

Individual expression is generally protected in major urban centers, but it remains inhibited in more remote areas where the state, insurgents, and criminals vie for control.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 5 / 12 (-1)

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 1 / 4 (-1)

Although provided for in the constitution, freedom of assembly is restricted in practice by violence. In recent years a series of large-scale protests have erupted, including a wave that swept the country between April and June 2021 and became known as the national strike. Sparked by a tax reform viewed as regressive, the protests grew to encompass a range of grievances, including economic despair and police brutality. Most protests were peaceful, but in several cities protesters destroyed property and erected blockades that disrupted supplies of essential goods and services. The police responded with what domestic and international rights observers characterized as serious human rights abuses, particularly in Cali, the epicenter of the protests. The local office of the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights tallied at least 44 protesters killed, with at least 28 of those deaths attributed to the police, while Human Rights Watch (HRW) registered hundreds of other rights violations, including assaults, sexual violence, and scores of arbitrary detentions. Two police officers also died, and hundreds were injured. The government acknowledged abuses and prosecutors opened numerous investigations into police abuses, but officials also repeatedly used terms like “terrorism” to portray protesters, blamed the unrest on armed infiltrators, and downplayed the scale of rights violations. In December 2021, Congress approved the Citizen Security Law, which human rights advocates claimed could exacerbate unjust treatment of protesters.

Score Change: The score declined from 2 to 1 because security forces responded to protests between April and June with severe violence that resulted in significant human rights abuses, including killings, sexual assaults, and numerous arbitrary detentions.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 2 / 4

The legal framework generally supports nongovernmental organizations, and civil society is diverse and active, but the threat of violent reprisal poses a major obstacle to freedom of association. While the government provides protection to thousands of threatened human rights workers, trust in the service varies widely. Hundreds of activists have been murdered in recent years, mostly by insurgents or the criminal organizations that succeeded demobilized right-wing paramilitary groups; impunity is widespread, with indictments and convictions occurring in only a small minority of cases.

Although the Duque administration has reiterated its respect for civil society groups and repeatedly committed to developing more effective protection policies, violations against activists have continued at a high level. Local human rights group Indepaz registered 171 killings of social leaders and human rights defenders during the year. Among the most frequent victims are land rights, victims' rights, and ethnic and Indigenous rights advocates targeted by illegal armed groups and other powerful interests seeking to control local illicit economies or halt the implementation of rural development plans, especially coca substitution programs.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 2 / 4

Workers may form and join trade unions, bargain collectively, and strike, and antiunion discrimination is prohibited. Over the past three decades, Colombia's illegal armed groups have killed thousands of union activists and leaders. Killings have declined substantially from their peak in the early 2000s, though 22 trade unionists were murdered between April 2020 and March 2021, according to the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC). A special prosecutorial unit has substantially increased prosecutions for such assassinations since 2007, but few investigations have targeted those who ordered the killings.

F. RULE OF LAW: 9 / 16F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 3 / 4

The justice system remains compromised by corruption and extortion. The Constitutional Court and the Supreme Court have consistently exhibited independence from the executive, though corruption allegations involving members of both courts have damaged their credibility in recent years. In March 2021, a former Supreme Court chief justice was convicted of corruption and sentenced to 19 years in prison.

The Constitutional Court has repeatedly been asked to mediate polarizing political disputes, especially with respect to the Special Jurisdiction for Peace (JEP), a parallel judicial tribunal that lies at the heart of the 2016 peace accord's transitional justice system. Critics of the peace accord, led by former president Álvaro Uribe, have repeatedly called for shutting down the JEP, though in August 2021 Uribe shifted, proposing a general amnesty for crimes by both state and nonstate actors. In August 2020, the Supreme Court ordered Uribe confined to house arrest amid a witness tampering and bribery investigation. He subsequently resigned from the Senate, leading to the transfer of the case to the attorney general's office, and was granted conditional release; proceedings continued throughout 2021.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 2 / 4

Colombia's prosecutorial service is relatively professional, but watchdog groups suggest that key oversight institutions, including the Attorney General's Office, have become less independent during the Duque administration. Due process protections remain weak, and trial processes move very slowly, though a judicial reform passed in June 2021 included provisions intended to accelerate legal processes. The two key transitional justice bodies, the JEP and the Truth Commission, began operations in 2018; by late 2021 they had amassed enormous volumes of evidence and received testimony from thousands of people. In 2021, the JEP issued its first indictments: eight former FARC members were charged with kidnapping in January, and 10 soldiers, including several senior officers, were indicted for extrajudicial executions in July. However, uncertainty remains about the extent to which the bodies will be able to render a comprehensive historical and judicial accounting of Colombia's conflict.

Many soldiers operate with limited civilian oversight, though the government has in recent years increased human rights training and investigated violations by security forces personnel. Collaboration between security forces and illegal armed groups has declined, but rights groups report official toleration of paramilitary successor groups in some regions. The police lack necessary resources, some units are prone to abuse, and police are largely absent from many rural areas where the most dangerous groups are active. The rights abuses committed by police during the national strike in 2021 prompted calls for deep institutional changes, including removal of the police from the Ministry of Defense. In December 2021 Congress passed a reform package strengthening police disciplinary structures, but rights groups described the changes as insufficient.

Civil-military relations have been a source of significant tension in recent years. A portion of the armed forces opposed the peace process, and the ability of accused human rights violators within the military to receive benefits under the transitional justice system is one of the most controversial elements of the process. In February 2021 the JEP released a report stating that the systematic killing of civilians to fraudulently inflate guerrilla death tolls had resulted in as many as 6,400 murders by the military between 2002 and 2008, nearly tripling previous official figures. Such killings plummeted after the scandal was exposed, but scandals involving both corruption and rights violations have continued to buffet the military, including the bombing of a FARC dissident camp in March 2021 that killed several minors.

Some parts of the country, particularly resource-rich zones and drug-trafficking corridors, remain highly insecure. Remnant guerrilla forces—including both the ELN and dissident factions of the FARC—and paramilitary successor groups regularly abuse the civilian population, especially in coca-growing areas. A general conflict fragmentation and intensification has affected some areas, illustrated by a significant rise in the number of people affected by mass displacement—over 64,000 victims in the first 10 months of 2021, according to the United Nations. Massacres, defined as incidents in which three or more people are murdered, have also risen, with local NGO Indepaz registering 96 massacres during the year. Though the acreage under cultivation has stabilized, coca production has reached historic highs in recent years. In October 2021, authorities arrested Colombia's most notorious drug trafficker, Dario Antonio Úsuga (alias "Otoniel"), but many analysts suggested it would do little to upset the thriving cocaine production chain. Impunity for crime in general is rampant, and prison conditions remain harsh.

A steady trickle of former FARC combatants, including several high-ranking members, have returned to clandestine life, alleging government failure to abide by the accord's terms. Indepaz estimated the total number of "dissidents" at around 5,200 as of October 2021; several of the most prominent dissidents were killed during internecine fighting in Venezuela during the year. Although observers characterize reintegration of ex-combatants as partially successful, as of October 2021 the UN Verification Mission reported that 296 demobilized

FARC members had been killed since the peace agreement. Prospects for an accord between the government and ELN rebels remained poor throughout the year amid ongoing violence on both sides of the Colombia-Venezuela border.

Violence overall has significantly subsided since the internal conflict peaked in the early 2000s, but analysts have noted a gradual trend upward since 2017. The national homicide rate rose nearly 20 percent in the first nine months of 2021, with a particularly sharp spike in Cali, the center of the national strike.

The legal framework provides protections against various forms of discrimination based on gender, race and ethnicity, sexual orientation and gender identity, and other categories, and the government takes some measures to enforce these protections. Nevertheless, several vulnerable groups suffer serious disadvantages in practice.

Afro-Colombians, who account for as much as 25 percent of the population, make up the largest segment of the more than 7 million people who have been displaced by violence, and Afro-Colombians' income fell significantly amid the economic disruption linked to COVID-19. Areas with concentrated Afro-Colombian populations continue to suffer vastly disproportionate levels of abuse by guerrillas, security forces, and criminal groups, and in 2021 UN officials reported that impunity is nearly absolute for killers of Afro-Colombian and Indigenous ex-combatants and social leaders.

Most of Colombia's Indigenous inhabitants, who make up more than 3 percent of the population, live on approximately 34 million hectares granted to them by the government, often in resource-rich, strategic regions that are highly contested by armed groups. Indigenous people have been targeted by all sides in the country's various conflicts. In 2021, Indigenous communities in the departments of Chocó, Cauca, Valle de Cauca, and Nariño suffered widespread violence and displacement perpetrated by former FARC members, paramilitary successors, and criminal groups, and Indigenous groups encountered racism and violent attacks while participating in the national strike in Cali in May.

Women face employment discrimination and sexual harassment in the workplace, as well as gender-based violence. In June, the Constitutional Court ruled that businesses must take steps to prevent and punish workplace gender violence.

LGBT+ people suffer societal discrimination and abuse, and there are also high levels of impunity for crimes committed against them. According to the governmental ombudsman's office, 21 LGBT+ people were murdered in the first 5 months of 2021.

As many as 1.7 million Venezuelan migrants have entered Colombia in recent years, and the government has offered work permits, access to services, and other accommodations to those who register. The influx created increasing strain in 2020 as public opinion toward migrants hardened amid the economic disruption inflicted by the COVID-19 pandemic. International relief agencies praised a February 2021 government announcement that Venezuelan migrants would be granted long-term temporary protection status, though stigmatization and lack of access to services, including COVID-19 vaccines, remained problems during the year.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 9 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 2 / 4

Freedom of movement improved substantially in tandem with the peace process, but it remains restricted by ongoing violence in certain regions, particularly for vulnerable minority groups. Travel in some remote areas is further limited by illegal checkpoints operated by criminal and guerrilla groups. These problems were exacerbated in 2020 by a strict official lockdown and the even harsher unofficial lockdown imposed by illegal armed groups. Though restrictions eased in 2021, the United Nations reported tens of thousands of Colombians were subjected to movement restrictions by armed groups. In addition, blockades associated with the national strike inflicted serious disruption to mobility in some areas, particularly around Cali.

Violence and instability in some areas threaten property rights and the ability to establish businesses. Guerrillas, paramilitary successor groups, and common criminals regularly extort payments from business owners. Corruption as well as undue pressure exerted on prosecutors and members of the judiciary can disrupt legitimate business activity.

Progress remains slow on the implementation of the landmark 2011 Victims and Land Law, which recognized the legitimacy of claims by victims of conflict-related abuses, including those committed by government forces. While affected citizens continue receiving compensation and modest progress has been made on land titling, the legal process for land restitution is heavily backlogged, and the resettlement of those who were displaced during the conflict continues to move slowly, with the Duque administration demonstrating limited will to accelerate the process.

Personal social freedoms, such as those related to marriage and divorce, are largely respected. In 2016, after several years of contradictory judicial and administrative decisions regarding same-sex unions, the Constitutional Court voted to legalize them. In October 2018 the Constitutional Court reaffirmed a 2006 ruling that allowed abortion in cases of rape or incest, severe fetal malformation, or a threat to the life of the mother, but women continue to face criminal charges for abortion. A prominent case involving the constitutionality of criminal penalties for abortion remained under review at the court at the end of 2021.

Child labor, the recruitment of children by illegal armed groups, and related sexual abuse are serious problems in Colombia; recruitment declined following the peace accord, but has increased since 2020 amid pandemic-related disruption and violence. A 2011 free trade agreement with the United States and a subsequent Labor Action Plan called for enhanced investigation of abusive labor practices and rights violations, but progress remains deficient in several areas. In coca-growing zones, armed groups exert coercive pressure on farmers to engage in coca cultivation and shun crop-substitution programs.

Comoros

Population: 900,000

Capital: Moroni

Freedom Status: Partly Free

Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: Comoros's volatile political history includes coups and attempted coups, though some recent presidential and legislative elections were reasonably well administered. A controversial 2018 referendum introduced major systemic changes, and opponents of the referendum were severely persecuted. Since winning the referendum and securing reelection in 2019, President Azali Assoumani has consolidated power by cracking down on the opposition and limiting press freedom. Systemic corruption and poverty remain problems.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- President Azali Assoumani was sworn in for a second term in May, after winning reelection in 2019. The 2019 election, which was boycotted by the opposition, was not free or fair, and international election monitors reported that the contest was marred by “significant irregularities.”
- Journalists continued to face harassment, intimidation, and arbitrary arrests throughout the year. In September, the new finance minister, Kamalidine Souef, publicly threatened journalists, declaring that if they ever criticized him, he would have them torn “into pieces.”

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 16 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 5 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 1 / 4

Under the 2001 constitution, the president was directly elected for a single five-year term, with eligibility rotating among the main islands of Grande Comore (Ngazidja), Anjouan, and Mohéli. However, a new constitution, approved in a controversial 2018 referendum that was boycotted by the opposition, allows the president to run for two consecutive five-year terms, and abolished the system of rotating power among the islands. The referendum allowed President Azali Assoumani of the Convention for the Renewal of the Comoros (CRC) party to contest and win the March 2019 presidential election, which was also boycotted by the opposition. Azali was sworn in for a second presidential term in May 2021.

The Supreme Court barred seven contestants from participating ahead of election day, including former president Ahmed Abdallah Mohamed Sambi. On election day, the 12 opposition candidates reported that some polling stations opened several hours early, with full ballot boxes. Acts of violence and intimidation were also reported in some regions.

The Independent National Electoral Commission (CENI) initially reported that Azali won the election in the first round with 60.8 percent of the vote, while Ahamada Mahamoudou of the Juwa Party won 14.6 percent; in early April, the Supreme Court validated results stating that Azali earned 59 percent of the vote. The 12 opposition candidates immediately rejected the results. Observers from the African Union (AU), the Common Market for Eastern and Southern Africa, and the East Africa Standby Force, an AU-backed regional defense organization, said the contest was marred by irregularities.

The unicameral Assembly of the Union consists of 24 directly elected members who serve five-year terms. Another 9 members were previously selected by the three islands' assemblies, but those seats were eliminated via a 2019 ordinance.

The 2020 legislative elections, held in two rounds in January and February, were boycotted by the major opposition parties. Progovernment candidates won every seat; the CRC won 20, the allied Orange Party won 2, and progovernment independent candidates won the remaining 2. AU monitors who observed the January round called the contest generally peaceful, but noted a lack of public interest due to the opposition boycott. Opposition groups claimed that first-round turnout stood at 10 percent, rejecting the CENI figure of 61.5 percent. Members of the Comorian diaspora were unable to participate, with the government denying the opposition's calls to ensure their inclusion.

The CENI, while historically able to run credible elections, has faced more recent accusations of bias and corruption.

The 2018 constitutional referendum, which the CENI said passed with 93 percent of the vote, was marred by an opposition boycott. Opposition groups denounced it as an unconstitutional power grab by Azali, and said Azali's dismissal of the Constitutional Court ahead of the vote rendered it illegal. There were also allegations of voter intimidation and fraud. Later, upon facing growing dissent in the parliament, Azali dismissed the CENI's top opposition representative.

The new constitution allows the president to run for two consecutive terms, abolished the system of rotating power among the islands, abolished the three vice-presidential posts (one representing each island), and declared Sunni Islam the national religion. It also transferred the competencies of the Constitutional Court, which was considered impartial in deciding electoral matters, to a new Supreme Court chamber.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 7 / 16B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 2 / 4

Political parties are mainly formed around specific leaders and draw on island or ethnic bases of support. In the past, parties have generally operated freely, though the government occasionally disrupted opposition parties' activities by denying them meeting and assembly space.

The authorities systematically cracked down on opposition figures who publicly criticized the 2018 constitutional referendum. Though Azali issued pardons to 17 opposition figures in 2019, the government has maintained pressure on the opposition in the aftermath of the 2019 presidential election. Presidential candidates Achmet Said Mohamed and Soilihi Mohamed were briefly detained in March 2019, though both were later released. Soilihi, who led a National Transitional Council (CNT) that unsuccessfully attempted to force Azali from office through civil disobedience and industrial action, agreed to refrain from further involvement after his release that April.

In the past, numerous opposition parties had a realistic chance of gaining power through elections, though they were impeded by occasional government interference. Allegations of misuse of state resources by incumbents were not uncommon. However, the arrests, convictions, and harsh sentences against opposition leaders who spoke out against the 2018 constitutional referendum hampered the ability of opposition parties to compete in elections. The 2020 legislative elections, which were marred by an opposition boycott, ended with progovernment candidates winning every seat.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 2 / 4

While individuals are generally free to exercise their political choices, the influence of Comoros's powerful army—which cracked down on dissent during the 2018 constitutional referendum—as well as of religious authorities can place pressure on voters and candidates.

The army was used to intimidate and detain opposition figures during and after the 2019 presidential campaign. Gendarmes arrested Soilihi after he announced his CNT involvement that March. Gendarmes also interrogated the spouse of presidential candidate Achmet, who served as a CNT spokesperson, that April.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 2 / 4

There are no laws preventing various segments of the population from enjoying full political rights and electoral opportunities. However, traditional attitudes discourage women from participating in politics. Only four women won legislative seats in the 2020 polls. Legal and societal discrimination against LGBT+ people makes political advocacy for LGBT+ rights difficult.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 4 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 2 / 4

According to the constitution, the president decides on the policies of the state, which are executed by the government. However, irregular legislative activity hampered representative policymaking in previous years.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 1 / 4

There are reports of corruption at all levels, including within the judiciary, civil service, and security forces. The Azali administration dissolved the National Commission for Preventing and Fighting Corruption in 2016.

In 2018, former president Sambu was arrested for corruption, embezzlement, and forgery in connection with a passport-sales scheme. A parliamentary report revealed that the scheme cost Comoros as much as $971 million. Sambu remained under house arrest at the end of 2021.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 1 / 4

Government operations are characterized by opacity. Various reform initiatives have been unsuccessful. Financial asset disclosures by public officials are not released to the public. Comoros provides no opportunities for public engagement in the budget process.

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 8 / 16D1. Are there free and independent media? 1 / 4

The constitution and laws provide for freedom of speech and of the press. However, the use of censorship laws to prosecute legitimate journalistic work, and other pressure, has prompted widespread self-censorship. Press freedom was restricted in 2018 with the closings of private radio stations, as criticism of Azali and the constitutional referendum gained traction.

Journalistic activity remained restricted throughout 2021, and journalists continued to face harassment and intimidation, including from government officials. In September, the newly appointed finance minister, Kamalidine Souef, warned journalists not to criticize him, saying those who did would be ripped “into pieces.”

Arrests of journalists and bloggers are common. Since 2019, FCBK FM reporter Oubeidillah Mchangama has been arrested several times in relation to his work. In January 2021, Oubeidillah was arrested again, along with journalist Ali Abdou Mkouboi, for allegedly participating in antigovernment protests; both journalists were detained for several days.

Some 98 percent of the population is Sunni Muslim. Sunni Islam was made the state religion in 2018, resulting in wariness of the government among adherents of minority religions. Previously, the state religion had been “Islam”; some observers suggested the change reflected Azali’s efforts to bring Comoros closer to Saudi Arabia and to counter the influence of former president Sambi, who is seen as close to Iran.

Anti-Shia sentiments have been publicly expressed by some government figures, while many Christians keep their faith private to avoid harassment. Proselytizing and public religious ceremonies are prohibited for all religions except Sunni Islam.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 3 / 4

Comoros has two types of schools: madrassas, where the Quran is integral, and state-run schools with French instruction. Academic freedom is generally respected, though the education system is sometimes affected by unrest from student protests and teacher strikes. Self-censorship on political topics is reportedly common within the education system.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 2 / 4

Private discussion is generally free. However, the legacies of the country’s volatile political history, which involves coups and attempted coups, the opposition crackdown during the 2018 constitutional referendum, authorities’ monitoring of social media during the 2019 presidential campaign, and a one-day shutdown of telecommunications services that March, can discourage people from openly discussing politics in some situations.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 6 / 12E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 1 / 4

Freedoms of assembly and association are constitutionally protected, but these freedoms have been inconsistently upheld, and have deteriorated significantly since 2018. Opposition rallies held before and soon after the March 2019 presidential election were violently dispersed. Public gatherings were banned under COVID-19-related measures in 2020; such measures remained in effect during much of 2021, and had not been lifted at year’s end.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 2 / 4

Nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) sometimes face bureaucratic interference, including requirements to secure permits from high-level officials to visit prisons. Some NGO representatives have spoken out against the atmosphere of repression in recent years, but did so at some risk in light of the broad crackdown on dissent.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 3 / 4

Workers have the right to form unions, bargain collectively, and strike. In cases of national interest, the government may require essential personnel to return to work. No law prohibits antiunion discrimination or protects workers from retribution for striking. There are some laws that impose mandatory arbitration processes for labor disputes.

F. RULE OF LAW: 6 / 16F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 1 / 4

The judicial system is based on both Sharia (Islamic law) and the French legal code. Though the law establishes mechanisms for the selection of judges and attorneys, the executive often disregards these and simply appoints people to their positions. Court decisions are not always upheld.

The 2018 referendum abolished the Constitutional Court and established a new constitutional chamber of the Supreme Court. This chamber ruled in favor of the government during the March 2019 election period by barring several candidates from running and by validating the results, despite widespread concerns over voting irregularities.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 1 / 4

All defendants have the right to a fair public trial, but they often face lengthy delays. Due-process rights are affected by corruption.

Political figures, including candidates, have been denied due process; 2019 presidential candidates Achmet and Soilihi were arrested for CNT-related activities that March, for example. Former president Sambi's pretrial detention period ended in April 2019 with no progress on pending corruption charges, and he remained under house arrest at the end of 2021.

In May 2020, Inssa "Bobocha" Mohamed was arrested for allegedly attacking President Azali in an unsuccessful bombing the previous month. Bobocha remained in pretrial detention until escaping from prison that November; he was returned to custody in January 2021. In March, the UN called on the government to "immediately reveal the fate and whereabouts" of Bobocha, who was allegedly being held as a "secret prisoner." He had not been tried by year's end.

The law prohibits the illegitimate use of physical force, but security agents have engaged in excessive force, and are generally not held accountable for such behavior. There are questions about the will or capacity of the army to identify and punish abuses within its ranks.

President Azali has been the reported target of violent attacks. In March 2019, Azali was reportedly targeted in a bombing while traveling to a campaign rally, though no one was injured. Azali was also the reported target of an unsuccessful April 2020 bombing attempt. The authorities reported that a terrorist organization was suspected of orchestrating the incident.

The law provides for equality of persons. However, same-sex sexual activity is illegal, with punishments of a fine and up to five years' imprisonment. Few women hold positions of responsibility in business outside of elite families. Laws requiring that services be provided for people with disabilities are not well enforced.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 6 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 2 / 4

Internal and external freedom of movement is constitutionally and legally protected. While these rights are generally respected in practice, poverty frequently prevents travel between the islands as well as access to higher education.

The authorities introduced pandemic-related movement restrictions in March 2020, suspending travel to the French territories of Mayotte and Réunion. An overnight curfew was imposed in February 2021 and remained in effect at year's end.

In accordance with civil and some customary laws, women have equal rights in inheritance matters. Local cultures on Grande Comore and Mohéli are matrilineal, with women legally possessing all inheritable property. However, this is complicated by the concurrent application of Sharia, interpretations of which can limit gender equality. In addition, a poor land-registration system and women's difficulties in securing loans hampers their right to own land.

Endemic corruption and a lack of transparency hampers normal business activity.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 1 / 4

Early and forced marriages have been reported in Comoros. The law prohibits domestic violence, but courts rarely fine or order the imprisonment of convicted perpetrators, and women and children rarely file official complaints. Sexual violence and workplace harassment are believed to be widespread, but are rarely reported to authorities.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 1 / 4

The Comorian economy, which is primarily agricultural, relies heavily on remittances from Comorian citizens in France. Many young people struggle to find sustainable opportunities for employment. Poverty has driven many people to attempt the dangerous trip to Mayotte.

Government efforts to identify and prosecute human trafficking are minimal, and trafficking cases, if addressed, are often done so through informal mediation processes. These mechanisms have sometimes facilitated the return of trafficking victims to traffickers. However, in August 2021, Comoros ratified the International Labour Organization's (ILO) Forced Labour Protocol, which is designed to "eliminate forced labor," and requires the government to take legal action against traffickers.

Congo, Republic of (Brazzaville)

Population: 5,700,000

Capital: Brazzaville

Freedom Status: Not Free

Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: President Denis Sassou Nguesso has maintained nearly uninterrupted power for over 40 years by severely repressing the opposition. Corruption and decades of political instability have contributed to poor economic performance and high levels of poverty. Abuses by security forces are frequently reported and rarely investigated. While a variety of media operate, independent coverage is limited by widespread self-censorship and the influence of owners. Human rights— and governance-related nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) scrutinize state abuses, but also self-censor to avoid reprisals. Religious figures are also known to self-censor.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021:

- In March, President Sassou Nguesso won a fourth presidential term since returning to power in 1997. Sassou Nguesso received 88.4 percent of the vote in a contest marred by a boycott from an opposition group, voter intimidation, and an internet shutdown.
- In February, the Organized Crime and Corruption Reporting Project (OCCRP) revealed that the government had imported several caches of weapons from Azerbaijan between 2015 and 2020, with financial and logistical support from Turkey and Saudi Arabia. Some of the weapons were reportedly used during the government's 2016–17 military campaign in the Pool Region.
- In June, the government forced the Congolese Observatory for Human Rights (OCDH), the country's most active human rights NGO, to dismiss executive director Trésor Nzila Kendet. His dismissal followed a series of OCDH reports that were critical of the government's human rights record.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 2 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 0 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

The president is directly elected to five-year terms. The 2002 constitution restricted the president to two terms and set an age limit of 70. However, a 2015 constitutional referendum proposed by President Denis Sassou Nguesso removed those restrictions, allowing him to run again. The referendum passed amid widespread protests and claims of fraud.

Sassou Nguesso has held power since 1979, with the exception of a five-year period in the 1990s. In March 2021, he secured a fourth presidential term since returning to power in 1997, winning 88.4 percent of the vote. The election was marked by a boycott from the opposition Pan-African Union for Social Democracy, intimidation, and an internet shutdown. Guy Brice Parfait Kolélas, who died of COVID-19 soon after the election, won 8 percent.

Congo's parliament consists of a 72-seat Senate and a 151-seat National Assembly. Councilors from every department elect senators to six-year terms. National Assembly members are directly elected to five-year terms.

The July 2017 legislative elections were boycotted by several opposition parties amid credible allegations that the vote would be rigged. Sassou Nguesso's Congolese Labor Party (PCT) claimed 96 lower-house seats and its allies won 12 in a process tainted by widespread fraud and low voter turnout. Elections were indefinitely postponed in nine districts in the Pool Region, where the military had been engaged in a campaign against a rebel group accused of launching attacks on Brazzaville.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 0 / 4

The 2015 constitutional referendum to increase presidential term limits consolidated the PCT's dominance of the political system by allowing Sassou Nguesso to run for a third term. Elections are administered by the Independent National Electoral Commission, which was established in 2016 and is widely regarded as an instrument of presidential authority.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 2 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 1 / 4

Political groupings exist, but the government represses those not aligned with the PCT, including by persecuting their leaders. In 2016, opposition leader Paulin Makaya of the United for Congo party was sentenced to two years' imprisonment for inciting disorder over his participation in protests against the constitutional referendum. Makaya was released in 2018 but was blocked from boarding international flights on at least two subsequent occasions. Four members of Embody Hope were arrested in 2019 for endangering state security but were released pending trial in 2020.

Sassou Nguesso's two most prominent opponents in the 2016 presidential election received prison terms after that contest. In 2018, retired general Jean-Marie Michel Mokoko was sentenced to 20 years' imprisonment for threatening state security. In 2019, André Okombi Salissa, who had led the opposition Initiative for Democracy in Congo coalition, was sentenced to 20 years of forced labor for the same charge.

The government banned private campaign contributions in 2016, leaving opposition parties and candidates dependent on limited public financing.

Political parties are sometimes denied registration without cause. During the 2017 legislative campaign, the Yuki party was denied official party status, forcing its candidates to run independently.

There is little opportunity for the opposition to gain power through elections, and opposition leaders frequently experience harassment, intimidation, and arrest. During the 2016 presidential race, opposition candidates Mokoko and Okombi Salissa were repeatedly harassed during the election campaign and were subsequently imprisoned. During the 2021 electoral period, Kolélas complained of movement restrictions, while authorities cancelled some campaign events.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 0 / 4

The Sassou Nguesso government routinely uses military and police forces to intimidate citizens. Employers engage in widespread discrimination in hiring and regarding other decisions, based on political beliefs.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 1 / 4

Although there are no legal restrictions on political participation by religion, gender, sexual identity, or ethnic group, members of Sassou Nguesso's northern Mbochi ethnic group occupy key government posts. Insofar as the government includes representatives from other regional and ethnic groups, their ability to shape policy is very limited. The government also routinely suppresses political parties that draw support from Congo's southern regions, which have long opposed Sassou Nguesso.

Women are underrepresented in government, holding just 17 National Assembly seats and 13 Senate seats. Societal constraints limit women's political participation in practice.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 0 / 12C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 0 / 4

Government policy is set by President Sassou Nguesso, who won reelection in a deeply flawed process in March 2021. There is little oversight from the parliament, which is dominated by the ruling PCT and protects the executive from accountability.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 0 / 4

Corruption is endemic, and domestic prosecutions for corruption are often politically motivated. The president's family and advisers effectively control the state-run National Petroleum Company of Congo (SNPC) without meaningful oversight, and offshore companies are allegedly used to embezzle SNPC funds.

Sassou Nguesso's family has long been dogged by credible allegations of corruption by foreign governments, NGOs, and journalists, prompting demands for accountability from civil society. Denis Christel Sassou Nguesso, the president's son, reportedly faced a money-laundering indictment in France in 2019. In 2020, US prosecutors accused Denis Christel of using SNPC funds to acquire an apartment in Miami.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 0 / 4

Government operations are opaque. Although the constitution guarantees access to information, there is no implementing legislation, nor is there a specific law mandating public access to official information. Public procurement procedures are nontransparent. Authorities generally do not publish draft legislation or regulations.

In 2020, Global Witness reported that the SNPC held as much as $3.3 billion in undisclosed liabilities, some of which resulted from activities unrelated to oil production, while dividends owed to the government had gone missing.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 14 / 60D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 6 / 16 (-1)*D1. Are there free and independent media? 1 / 4

While the constitution provides for freedom of speech and press, the government routinely pressures, threatens, and incarcerates journalists. While there are numerous media outlets, many are owned by government allies who influence their coverage. Widespread self-censorship among journalists discourages independent reporting in practice.

In February 2021, authorities arrested the editor of the satirical Sel-Piment newspaper, Raymond Malonga; a relative of President Sassou Nguesso had accused the publication of defamation. In December, Sel-Piment director Augias Ray Malonga was arrested in Brazzaville.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 3 / 4

Although religious freedom is generally respected, pastors are reticent to make statements that could be construed as hostile to the government. In 2015, the government banned the wearing of the niqab, the full face veil, in public, citing security and terrorism concerns.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 1 / 4

Academic freedom is tenuous. Most university professors avoid discussions of or research on politically sensitive topics. In 2018, the government announced that it would ban a book, published in Paris, about widespread human rights abuses perpetrated by the military in the Pool Region between 2016 and 2017.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 1 / 4 (-1)

The government surveils electronic communications of private individuals and maintains an extensive surveillance apparatus, which includes secret police and local informants. Surveillance is reportedly prevalent in public spaces in Brazzaville and Pointe-Noire. Citizens who speak out against the government are often arrested.

Score Change: The score declined from 2 to 1 because rising surveillance has increased the threat of retaliation for public discussion of sensitive topics.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 2 / 12 (-2)

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 0 / 4 (-1)

The government restricts freedom of assembly. Groups must receive official authorization from local and federal authorities to hold public assemblies, and permission is routinely denied. Government forces sometimes employ violence against protesters or disperse assemblies. In early 2021, the government restricted the size of gatherings nationwide and maintained a nighttime curfew in Brazzaville and Pointe-Noire, using COVID-19 as its justification. Assembly restrictions remained in place as of December 2021.

The government placed a range of restrictions on political gatherings prior to the March 2021 elections. In some cases, officials used COVID-19 measures to justify their actions.

Score Change: The score declined from 1 to 0 because the government maintained a nighttime curfew in some parts of the country, restricted the size of public assemblies, and restricted political gatherings during the electoral period.

Although the constitution guarantees freedom of association, NGOs must register with the Interior Ministry. Those critical of the government often encounter a more burdensome registration process. Arbitrary arrests of civil society figures have continued in recent years, contributing to a reduction in activity. Groups still operating commonly curtail reporting on human rights abuses, or word criticism of authorities carefully, in order to avoid reprisals or harassment.

In March 2021, police arrested Alexandre Ibacka Dzabana, a prominent human rights activist, near his home. In June, the government forced the OCDH to dismiss Trésor Nzila Kendet, its executive director. Nzila's dismissal followed a series of reports that were critical of the government's human rights record.

Score Change: The score declined from 1 to 0 because authorities have increasingly persecuted activists and retaliated against critical NGOs.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 2 / 4

Although union rights are nominally protected, laws protecting union members are not always enforced. The government has intervened in labor disputes by harassing and arresting laborers and pressuring union leaders, particularly against the country's largest labor union, the Congolese Trade Union Confederation.

F. RULE OF LAW: 1 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 0 / 4

Congo's judiciary is dominated by Sassou Nguesso's allies, crippled by lack of resources, and vulnerable to corruption and political influence. In 2015, the Constitutional Court's confirmation of the constitutional referendum results was viewed as a rubber-stamp approval of Sassou Nguesso's efforts to remain in power. In April 2021, the Constitutional Court rejected legitimate objections to the conduct of the March elections.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 1 / 4

Defendants, including the government's political opponents, are routinely denied due process. Arbitrary arrests and detentions are common, despite being prohibited by the constitution. Other fair-trial rights guaranteed by law, including the right to legal assistance for those who cannot afford it, are not always honored in practice.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 0 / 4

Citizens in some neighborhoods are at risk of intimidation and violent crime by groups of young men known as bébés noirs. There have also been reports of arbitrary arrests and physical abuses by police attempting to curb the activities of such groups. Reports of human rights violations by security forces are generally not investigated by the government. Security forces physically attacked people while enforcing COVID-19 measures in 2020.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 0 / 4

Employment discrimination against women persists. The government prevents refugees and other foreign workers from holding certain jobs, and refugees sometimes face harassment and arrest by authorities.

While no law specifically prohibits same-sex sexual relations between adults, LGBT+ people experience occasional police harassment.

Minority ethnic groups experience severe discrimination in employment, housing, and education. Some communities often live in substandard housing on the outskirts of villages, and occasionally are targeted in acts of violence committed by members of the majority Bantu population.

The government exhibits widespread discrimination against residents of Congo's southern regions. They are routinely denied high-paying public-sector jobs, as well as admission to the public university. By contrast, residents of Congo's northern regions are disproportionately appointed to key government positions and the civil service.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 6 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 2 / 4

Although private citizens generally enjoy freedom of movement, activists and opposition leaders can face restrictions and confiscation of their passports.

An estimated 81,000 people left their homes in Pool Region during the 2016–17 conflict there.

The government imposed curfews, border closures, and internal travel restrictions in response to the COVID-19 pandemic in 2020. While curfews expired in much of Congo that year, nighttime curfews in Brazzaville and Pointe-Noire remained in effect as of December 2021. Land and river crossings were also closed as of December.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 2 / 4

Legal protections for business and property rights can be undermined by bureaucracy, poor judicial safeguards, and corruption. The government directly or indirectly controls property in key industries such as oil, minerals, and aviation.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 1 / 4

Violence against women, including domestic violence and rape, is widespread but rarely reported. There are no specific laws forbidding domestic violence other than general assault statutes.

Men are legally considered the head of the household, and divorce settlements are thus skewed against women. Adultery is illegal for both men and women, but women convicted of the crime face a potential prison sentence, while the penalty for men is a fine.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 1 / 4

Congo is a source and destination country for human trafficking, and allegations of complicity have been lodged against government officials. However, the US State Department reported in its Trafficking in Persons Report 2021 that authorities continued to strengthen their antitrafficking efforts by providing more assistance to victims and prosecuting more alleged traffickers. In its 2021 report, the State Department noted that Congolese authorities won their first conviction since 2017.

According to local NGOs, members of minority groups have been conscripted into forced farm labor by members of the Bantu ethnic majority. Child labor laws are reportedly not effectively enforced.

Congo, Democratic Republic of (Kinshasa)

Population: 92,500,000

Capital: Kinshasa

Freedom Status: Not Free

Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: The political system in the Democratic Republic of Congo (DRC) has been paralyzed in recent years by the manipulation of the electoral process by political elites. Citizens are unable to freely exercise basic civil liberties, and corruption is endemic. Physical security is tenuous due to violence and human rights abuses committed by government forces, as well as armed rebel groups and militias in many areas of the country.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- In July, President Félix Tshisekedi reformed the membership of the Independent National Electoral Commission (CENI), allocating seats for civil society groups, the ruling coalition, and the opposition. Civil society groups denounced this move as an attempt to secure control of the body (ruling party members can outnumber civil society representatives) and, consequently, influence elections.
- In May, Tshisekedi declared a “state of siege” in North Kivu and Ituri provinces, which replaced civilian authorities with military personnel, to combat armed groups and return the violence-affected areas to central government control. The state of siege was extended through the year and saw an increase in the levels of violence and displaced persons caused by the conflict with militia groups, which reached record highs.
- Throughout the year, journalists and activists uncovered the extent of corruption within former president Joseph Kabila’s administration. In February, reports revealed Israeli businessman Dan Gertler’s embezzlement of $3.7 billion in state funds through Kabila-approved contracts over several years. Reports released in November detailed how Kabila, his family, and his associates siphoned hundreds of millions of dollars of state funds from Congo’s Central Bank between 2013 and 2018.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 4 / 40 (-1)

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 1 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

According to the constitution, the president is chief of state and is elected for a maximum of two five-year terms. The prime minister is head of government and is formally appointed by the president.

Félix Tshisekedi was declared president in 2019, following 2018 end-of-year elections. Former president Joseph Kabila overstayed his constitutional mandate by two years; the Constitutional Court allowed him to stay in office until his successor had been elected, but polls were repeatedly delayed.

The Independent National Electoral Commission (CENI) declared Tshisekedi president with 38.6 percent of the vote, defeating Martin Fayulu of the Lamuka (Wake Up) coalition, who reportedly secured 34.8 percent. Tshisekedi, a leader of the Course for Change (CACH) coalition, was believed to have come to power via a backroom deal, under which he allied with the Kabila-led Common Front for Congo (FCC). The FCC had previously backed Emmanuel Ramazani Shadary, who reportedly received 23.9 percent of the vote as the People's Party for Reconstruction and Democracy (PPRD) candidate. Several opposition candidates were barred from competing in the poll.

The vote was heavily criticized due to voter suppression and electoral fraud. Observers from the Catholic Church and the civil society coalition Synergy of Citizen Election Observation Missions reported massive fraud and irregularities. An independent tally by the Roman Catholic Church's National Episcopal Conference of Congo (CENCO), reviewed by independent auditors, suggested that Fayulu won 60 percent of the vote; they found widespread ballot-validation procedure violations and vote-counting discrepancies. Election observers were denied access to polling stations in some cases, and foreign observers were not allowed to participate. Moreover, 1.2 million voters were barred from voting in three opposition areas—Beni territory and Butembo in North Kivu Province and Yumbi in Mai-Ndombe Province. Official results reported a margin of victory that was a little over half the number of voters disenfranchised in opposition areas.

Sama Lukonde was appointed prime minister in February 2021, replacing Kabila-ally Sylvestre Ilunga Ilukamba.

The DRC has a bicameral national legislature with a 500-seat National Assembly directly elected for five-year terms, and a 108-seat Senate elected by provincial assemblies. Senators hold a five-year mandate. The DRC's 715 provincial legislators elect national senators and provincial governors. Eight Senate seats are reserved for customary chiefs.

National Assembly elections were held concurrently with the presidential vote in 2018 and were also criticized as deeply flawed. The FCC won 341 seats, Lamuka took 112, and the CACH took 47. Because elections were postponed until 2019 in opposition areas of Beni, Butembo, and Yumbi, voters in those regions were prevented from influencing the National Assembly race.

Senators are elected indirectly through provincial assemblies, and in 2018 the provincial elections were compromised by vote buying. As former president, Kabila holds a lifetime Senate appointment.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 0 / 4

The country's electoral framework does not ensure transparent elections in practice. Opposition parties and civil society frequently criticize the CENI and the Constitutional Court for lacking independence and supporting the president. Fayulu unsuccessfully appealed the election results in 2019. The following month, the United States announced diplomatic sanctions on the then-president and vice president of CENI, the National Assembly president, and the chief judge of the Constitutional Court for electoral fraud.

In July 2021, Tshisekedi reformed the CENI, allocating seats for civil society groups, the ruling coalition, and the opposition. Civil society groups claimed the move was made in bad faith and maintained Tshisekedi's control of the body (because of the balance of seats between the ruling party and civil society groups) and, consequently, control over future elections. Lamuka called for the CENI to be placed under the full control of civil society. In October, the parliament confirmed Denis Kadima, an election expert from Tshisekedi's province and Kabila ally, as CENI head.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 2 / 16B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 1 / 4

People have the right to organize political parties. Hundreds of parties exist, with many configured along ethnic or regional lines. However, most lack national reach, and their ability to function is limited in practice. Opposition leaders and supporters are often intimidated and face restrictions on movements and rights to campaign or organize public events.

Opposition and government coalitions have shifted frequently in recent years. Tshisekedi's CACH formed a power-sharing government with Kabila's FCC in 2019. Kabila initially maintained influence over the judiciary and key ministerial posts. Facing major disagreements over government appointments and oversight, Tshisekedi dissolved this power-sharing agreement in December 2020, and installed a new government that passed with near unanimous support in April 2021, removing Kabila appointees from key ministerial posts and creating the "Sacred Union" coalition.

Under the Tshisekedi administration, some opposition members have been released from prison, and some politicians living in exile were permitted to return. However, political party officials still faced reprisals for criticizing the government. Security forces dispersed multiple opposition protests led by Fayulu against CENI appointees throughout 2021.

Although opposition groups enjoy significant public support, repeated postponement of and government interference in elections prevent the opposition from gaining power through electoral competition.

The government prevented an opposition coalition from rising to power despite evidence that it won the vote in 2018. In the run-up to those elections, the CENI rejected the candidacy of six opposition politicians, including former Katanga governor Moïse Katumbi. Government authorities regularly blocked or delayed the campaign activities of opposition candidates. Authorities helped facilitate the movement and campaign activities of Kabila's favored candidate. Armed groups also obstructed candidate movements.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 0 / 4

The military, security services, and armed groups interfere with citizens' political choices. Systematic repression in major cities across the country intensified in the lead-up to the 2018 elections, including excessive force against opposition demonstrators. In some areas, soldiers and armed groups at polling stations reportedly coerced voters to cast ballots for the FCC. Armed groups hindered citizens' ability to participate in the political process.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 1 / 4

Lack of access to public services and state institutions in rural areas hinders political participation. Women are politically underrepresented; in the government installed in 2021, they held 14 out of 57 cabinet seats. Internally displaced people throughout the country face practical obstacles to participating in elections.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 1 / 12 (-1)C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 0 / 4

Massive electoral fraud and irregularities prevent democratically elected officials from determining government policies.

Beginning in May 2021, Tshisekedi declared a “state of siege” in North Kivu and Ituri provinces to combat armed groups and return violence-affected areas to central government control. Civilian authorities and provincial governments were replaced with military officers, effectively removing elected authorities or constitutionally recognized territorial administrations from determining government policies.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 1 / 4

Corruption in the government, security forces, and mineral extraction industries is extensive and has corroded public services and development efforts. Appointments to high-level positions in government are often determined by nepotism. Accountability mechanisms are weak, and impunity is commonplace.

President Tshisekedi publicly committed the government to fighting corruption when he came to power. In 2020, Tshisekedi’s chief of staff, Vital Kamerhe, was convicted and received a 20-year forced-labor sentence for embezzling over $50 million in public funds. Kamerhe is the highest-ranking politician to face such a prosecution in the country’s history.

However, political will to combat corruption seemingly dropped off in 2021, and civil society groups exposed major cases of corruption within former president Kabila’s administration. In February, reports revealed Israeli businessman Dan Gertler’s embezzlement of $3.7 billion in state funds through Kabila-approved contracts over several years. Reports released in November revealed that Kabila, his family, and his associates had siphoned hundreds of millions of dollars of state funds from Congo’s Central Bank between 2013 and 2018. The government in September 2020 imposed death sentences on the two whistleblowers of Gertler’s money laundering scheme.

In June 2021, prodemocracy activists from the Struggle for Change (Lucha) group alleged that the First Lady’s staff misappropriated relief aid intended for people displaced by the Nyiragongo volcano eruption near Goma. The First Lady’s office subsequently filed a defamation complaint against them.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 0 / 4 (-1)

Despite previous incremental improvements in revenue reporting, there is barely any transparency in the state’s financial affairs. The law does not provide for public access to government information, and citizens often lack the practical ability to obtain records on public expenditures and state operations.

In 2021, some efforts were made to bring the Central Bank of Congo into conformance with International Monetary Fund (IMF) protocols as a condition for loans. However, required financial disclosures from top officials have not been made public; tax agencies suffer from poor reporting; and shadow networks determine political and financial decisions in practice. Embezzled military funds contribute to networks inside the national army and contracts for the extractive industries are conducted in secret. In September 2021, evidence emerged of $6 billion in previously hidden loans from China as part of a joint Congolese-Chinese mining venture.

Citizens in violence-affected areas routinely petition the government for openness about insecurity, including state involvement in violence, but report little clarity. The state of siege first announced in May 2021 replaced governors, territorial administrations, and city administrations in Ituri and North Kivu provinces with military authorities who are not accessible to constituents. Security forces continually maintain impunity despite committing human rights abuses, according to the United Nations (UN).

Score Change: The score declined from 1 to 0 because government openness about violence-affected areas, accountability for security forces, and transparency around government contracts are nonexistent.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 15 / 60D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 7 / 16*D1. Are there free and independent media? 1 / 4

Although media freedom is constitutionally guaranteed, journalists often face criminal defamation suits, threats, detentions, arbitrary arrests, and physical attacks in the course of their work. Radio is the dominant news medium, and newspapers and state-sponsored news channels are found in large cities. While journalists frequently criticize authorities, political harassment of reporters is common, and authorities have sometimes attempted to shutter media outlets. Some foreign reporters were barred from the country during the last national elections. Artists also face government reprisal.

The Journalist in Danger (JED) watchdog, Human Rights Watch (HRW), and other civil society organizations have recorded expanding repression of journalists under Tshisekedi's tenure. In 2021, three journalists were assassinated; at least 106 others faced detentions, threats, assault, and censorship—a more than two-fold increase over reported abuses in 2020.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 3 / 4

The constitution guarantees freedom of religion, and authorities generally respect this right in practice. Although religious groups must register with the government to be recognized, unregistered groups typically operate unhindered. Some religious facilities, personnel, and services have been affected by violence in conflict areas. Despite overall tolerance, the authorities responded aggressively to protest activities by the Catholic Church and some Protestant groups following the announcement of election results in 2019. Some North Kivu mosques have faced heightened threats from Islamist rebels who target members of the Muslim community who criticize Islamist militancy, as well as government suspicions that Muslims in the region aid rebel groups. The government has also used violence to suppress the Bundu dia Kongo (BDK), a religious movement that calls for autonomy in Kongo Central Province.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 2 / 4

There are no formal restrictions on academic freedom. Primary and secondary school curriculums are regulated but not strongly politicized. However, political events and protests at universities and schools are subject to violent repression. Armed groups have also attacked schools, preventing children from accessing education. In practice, payment for grades, including sexual exploitation of students, is common.

Although open political dissent is routinely suppressed, Congolese publicly express their views on some subjects. Many Congolese openly discuss systemic corruption and insecurity on social media platforms.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 3 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 1 / 4

The constitution guarantees freedom of assembly, and demonstrations are held regularly in urban areas. However, those who participate risk arrests, beatings, and lethal violence.

Despite COVID-19 restrictions, protesters held major assemblies and rallies that security forces dispersed with unnecessary force and arbitrary detentions throughout 2021. Activists, students, and civilians—who led marches and peaceful sit-ins to protest changes to the electoral framework and perceived government inaction to stop civilian massacres in Beni territory—were arrested, beaten, or forcibly dispersed, including with tear gas. In August and September, miners protested dangerous working conditions, particularly those under Chinese companies whose exploitative practices also contaminate rivers with serious environmental and public health consequences.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 1 / 4

Thousands of NGOs are active in the DRC, but many face obstacles to their work. Domestic human rights advocates in particular are subject to harassment, arbitrary arrest, and detention.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 1 / 4

A number of national labor unions and professional associations, covering parts of the public and private sectors, operate legally in the DRC, but the overwhelming majority of workers are informally employed. Some civil servants and members of state security forces are not permitted to unionize and bargain collectively. Violations of the procedures for a legal strike can result in prison terms. Although employers cannot legally retaliate against workers for union activities, such protections are poorly enforced.

F. RULE OF LAW: 1 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 1 / 4

The judiciary is often seen as corrupt and subject to political manipulation. It often shows bias against the opposition and civil society, while government allies typically enjoy impunity for abuses. Judges are not paid adequately or receive salaries late, increasing their susceptibility to bribes.

Under Tshisekedi's administration, the judicial branch initially showed greater independence in trying officials and replacing several judges suspected of wrongdoing or corruption. In July 2021, the Constitutional Court announced the arrest of former prime minister Matata Ponyo—a political rival of Tshisekedi—for allegedly embezzling funds related to property confiscation during the 1970s "Zairianization" campaign. He was released a day later after agreeing to cooperate. However, the Constitutional Court ruled in November they could not try the case as they only had jurisdiction over sitting, not former, prime ministers.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 0 / 4

Courts are concentrated in urban areas; rural areas rely on customary courts. Informal justice mechanisms are common throughout the country. Civilians are often tried in military courts, which have weak safeguards for defendants' rights, poor witness protection mechanisms, and are subject to interference from high-ranking military personnel. The state of siege from May 2021 on in North Kivu and Ituri provinces enacted martial law but only authorized military courts to try criminal, not civilian cases, resulting in growing detentions and stalled judicial cases. Arbitrary arrests and detentions are common, as is prolonged pretrial detention; much of the prison population consists of pretrial detainees. Prisoners frequently pay bribes to avoid torture or meet basic needs; rape among detainees is common.

DRC courts have officially granted reparations to the targets of sexual violence and other serious crimes, but these are rarely paid in practice.

Civilian authorities do not effectively control security forces. The military is notoriously undisciplined. Incidents of soldiers exchanging intelligence and weapons with rebel or militia groups continued during 2021. Soldiers and police regularly commit serious human rights abuses, including rape and other physical attacks, and high-ranking military officials enjoy impunity for crimes. Despite the government's promise to "eradicate" militia groups during the 2021 state of siege, the levels of violence and the number of displaced persons caused by the conflict with those groups increased, reaching record highs.

Government forces have participated in summary killings and forced disappearances, and the judicial system has not held officials accountable. Senior intelligence officials accused of serious human rights abuses have not been tried for their acts. Many high-ranking military officers have been sanctioned by various international entities for human rights abuses.

Armed groups have contributed to years of conflict and communal violence that have had a catastrophic impact on civilians, with over five million conflict-related deaths since 1998. Civilian massacres in South Kivu's Hauts Plateaux and Beni and Lubero territories in North Kivu continued in 2021. Urban crime rates also rose after the deployment of military forces in North Kivu.

Ethnic discrimination is common and is both a contributing factor and an outcome of armed conflicts across the country. While the constitution prohibits discrimination against people with disabilities, they often encounter obstacles to finding employment, attending school, or accessing government services. Discrimination based on HIV status is also prohibited, but people with HIV similarly face difficulties accessing health care and education. LGBT+ people can be prosecuted for same-sex sexual activity under public decency laws.

Although the constitution prohibits discrimination against women, in practice they face discrimination in nearly every aspect of their lives. The family code assigns women a subordinate role in the household. Young women increasingly seek professional work outside the home, particularly in urban centers, but face disparities in wages and promotions. When families are short on money to pay school fees, boys are often favored over girls to receive education.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 4 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 1 / 4

Freedom of movement is protected by law but seriously curtailed in practice, in large part due to armed conflicts and other security problems. An estimated 5.3 million people were internally displaced at the end of 2021 according to the Internal Displacement Monitoring Centre. Various armed groups and government forces impose illegal tolls on travelers passing through territory under their control.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 1 / 4

Individuals have the right to own property and establish private businesses. In conflict zones, armed groups and government soldiers regularly seize private property and destroy homes and businesses. Property ownership and business activity are also hampered by pervasive corruption and a complicated system of taxation and regulation that encourages bribery.

Although the constitution prohibits discrimination against women, some laws and customary practices put women at a disadvantage with respect to inheritance and land ownership.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 1 / 4

Sexual and gender-based violence is common. Rebels and government soldiers have regularly been implicated in cases of rape and sexual abuse. Rebel commanders have abducted girls into forced marriages. Convictions for these offenses remain rare. Abortion is prohibited except to save the life of a pregnant woman, and illegal abortions can draw lengthy prison sentences.

The family code obliges wives to obey their husbands, who are designated as the heads of their households. Married women are under the legal guardianship of their husbands. Although the legal minimum age for marriage is 18, many women are married earlier.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 1 / 4

Formal protections against economic exploitation are poorly enforced, and most Congolese are informally employed. Although the law prohibits forced or compulsory labor, such practices are common and include forced child labor in mining, street vending, domestic service, and agriculture. Some government forces and armed groups force civilians to work for them, and the recruitment and use of child soldiers remains widespread. Working conditions can be life threatening. Accidents are common in the mining sector, and safety precautions are rarely enforced.

Costa Rica

Population: 5,200,000

Capital: San José

Freedom Status: Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Costa Rica has a long history of democratic stability, with a multiparty political system and regular rotations of power through credible elections. Freedoms of expression and association are robust. The rule of law is generally strong, though presidents have often been implicated in corruption scandals. Among other ongoing concerns, Indigenous people face discrimination, and land disputes involving Indigenous communities persist.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- In June, more than two dozen officials were detained when police raided the presidential office in connection with an investigation into alleged corruption in public procurement processes; a second high-profile corruption investigation, also involving public works contracts, led to the arrests of several more politicians in November. Both investigations were ongoing at year's end.
- Numerous protests against a controversial public employment bill, intended to curtail excessive government spending on salaries paid to public sector employees, were held during the year. Other protests, including demonstrations against proposed pension reforms and a loan agreement between the government and the International Monetary Fund (IMF), also took place.
- The number of Nicaraguan asylum seekers in Costa Rica rose sharply during the year, beginning after the Nicaraguan government launched a crackdown against its opponents in May. According to Costa Rican authorities, 53,000 Nicaraguans sought asylum in the country by year's end—more than in the previous three years combined.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 38 / 40A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 12 / 12*A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The president is directly elected for a four-year term and can seek a nonconsecutive second term. Presidential candidates must win 40 percent of the vote to avoid a runoff. In April 2018, Carlos Alvarado Quesada of the governing Citizen Action Party (PAC) was elected president in the second round. Alvarado faced Fabricio Alvarado Muñoz of the evangelical National Restoration Party (PRN) in the runoff and won decisively, with over 60 percent of the vote.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

Elections for the 57-seat unicameral Legislative Assembly occur every four years. Deputies, elected by proportional representation, may not run for two consecutive terms, but may run again after skipping a term. In the February 2018 legislative elections, no party won a majority: the PAC took 10 seats, the PRN won 14, and the National Liberation Party (PLN), historically one of the most powerful parties in Costa Rican politics, won 17 seats.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 4 / 4

A special chamber of the Supreme Court appoints the independent national election commission, the Supreme Electoral Tribunal (TSE), which is responsible for administering elections. The TSE carries out its functions impartially, and the electoral framework is fair.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 15 / 16B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 4 / 4

People have the right to organize in different political parties without undue obstacles. The historical dominance of the PLN and the Social Christian Unity Party (PUSC) has waned in recent years as newly formed parties have gained traction, leading to the collapse of the traditional two-party system. The PRN, which was founded in 2005, emerged as a major force in 2018, as evidenced by Alvarado Muñoz's second-place finish in the presidential election and the party's relatively strong showing in the legislative elections.

As of September 2021, a total of 28 parties had registered to participate in the 2022 general elections.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 4 / 4

Power regularly alternates in Costa Rica, and opposition parties compete fiercely in presidential and legislative elections.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 4 / 4

Citizens' political choices are free from domination by unelected elites and other undemocratic powers.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 3 / 4

Members of religious, racial, ethnic, and other minority groups enjoy full political rights. Some groups remain underrepresented in government. Indigenous rights have not historically been prioritized, and there is no representation of Indigenous Costa Ricans, who comprise 2.4 percent of the population, in the legislature. Afro-Costa Ricans, who make up almost 8 percent of the population, are also underrepresented in government.

Women and women's interests are represented in government, with 47 percent of seats in the Legislative Assembly held by women. In May 2021, Silvia Hernández of the PLN was elected president of the legislature—the fourth woman ever to hold the post.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 11 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 4 / 4

Costa Rica's freely elected government and lawmakers set and implement state policy without interference. However, legislative gridlock remains a systemic issue.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 3 / 4

Costa Rica's anticorruption laws are generally well enforced. However, despite the existence of functioning anticorruption mechanisms, nearly every president since 1990 has been accused of corruption after leaving office. In 2017, former president Luis Guillermo Solís was implicated in the Cementazo scandal, involving influence peddling related to Chinese cement exports to Costa Rica. Although he was cleared of wrongdoing by the Public Ethics Office of the Attorney General in 2018, the attorney general's office ordered the reopening of investigations into Solís's role in the scandal in 2020. In August 2021, interim attorney general Warner Molina Ruiz reduced the number of prosecutors investigating the Cementazo case.

Numerous politicians and government officials were implicated in high-profile corruption investigations during 2021. In June, police raided the presidential office and detained more than two dozen officials in connection with the so-called Cochinilla case, a corruption scandal that reportedly involved state agencies accepting bribes from private construction companies in return for government contracts. The investigation into the scandal, which allegedly caused a deficit of over $125 million in the country's road works budget between 2018 and 2020, was ongoing at year's end. Another high-level corruption investigation, known as the Diamante case, involving an alleged bribery scheme related to public works contracts, led to the November arrests of several politicians, including the mayor of San José.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 4 / 4

Citizens generally have access to government information. There are some deficiencies in the reporting of budgets to the public, including a lack of transparency in communicating the objectives of the annual budget. Senior government officials are required to make financial disclosures, but that information is not available to the public. The government has also faced criticism from information rights activists for failing to make data on the beneficiaries of the country's COVID-19-related financial relief programs publicly available.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 53 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 16 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 4 / 4

Freedom of the press is largely respected in Costa Rica. Defamation laws are on the books, but imprisonment was removed as a punishment for defamation in 2010.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 4 / 4

Roman Catholicism is the official religion, but the constitution guarantees the freedom of religion, which is generally respected in practice.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

Academic freedom is constitutionally protected and generally upheld. In November 2021, controversy arose when the National Association of Educators alleged that the Ministry of Public Education had gathered sensitive information on students' personal and socio-economic backgrounds via survey questions included on the 2021 national FARO exams.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 4 / 4

Private discussion is free, and the government is not known to surveil the electronic communications of Costa Ricans. However, widespread concern over possible government surveillance arose following the February 2020 publication of an executive decree creating a Presidential Data Analysis Unit (UPAD) with the power to access "confidential information held by public institutions when required." The decree was quickly repealed, but investigations into whether UPAD illegitimately accessed sensitive information remained ongoing through 2021.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 11 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

Freedom of assembly is constitutionally protected. This right is largely upheld in practice. A diverse range of groups hold regular rallies and protests without government interference.

A number of protests against a controversial public employment bill, intended to curtail excessive government spending on salaries paid to public sector employees, occurred in 2021, alongside demonstrations against a related loan agreement between the government and the International Monetary Fund (IMF). However, these protests were of a much smaller scale than the 2020 demonstrations against a proposed tax increase and IMF loan agreement, some of which turned violent.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 4 / 4

Nongovernmental organizations (NGOs), including those engaged in human rights work, are active and do not encounter undue obstacles.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 3 / 4

Although labor unions are free to organize and mount frequent protests and strikes with minimal governmental interference, the law requires a minimum of 12 employees to form a union, which may impact union rights at small enterprises. Rates of union membership in the private sector are low, due in part to discrimination by employers against members. Employers have been known to occasionally fire workers who attempt to form unions.

In 2020, President Alvarado enacted a law restricting strikes by public sector employees, which includes limits on permitted justifications for strikes and salary suspensions for workers who participate in strikes deemed illegal. Unions organized several demonstrations in 2021, and were prominently involved in protests against both the proposed public employment law and proposed pension reforms that would, among other things, increase the retirement age for Costa Ricans.

F. RULE OF LAW: 13 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 4 / 4

The judicial branch is generally independent and impartial. Supreme Court judges are elected by a supermajority of the legislature. Prosecutors and judges are able to investigate public officials. In June 2021, then attorney general Emilia Navas Aparicio stepped down, reportedly to avoid “perceived conflicts of interest” regarding her ties to the Cochinilla corruption case, in which her husband represents a number of the defendants.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 3 / 4

Due process rights are enshrined in the constitution and are generally protected. However, there are often substantial delays in judicial processes, sometimes resulting in lengthy pretrial detention.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 3 / 4

Violent crime in Costa Rica has increased in recent years. In 2021, Costa Rica registered 588 homicides, a rate of approximately 11.5 murders per 100,000 people. Criminal groups transport drugs along the Pacific coast, and the government has reported that many homicides there are related to organized crime and drug trafficking. There are reports of occasional police abuses of detainees and civilians; confirmed cases are generally investigated and prosecuted.

Overcrowding, poor sanitation, insufficient access to health care, and violence remain serious problems in Costa Rica’s prisons. Recurrent abuse by prison police has not been thoroughly investigated due to victims’ reluctance to file formal complaints.

The constitution outlines equal rights for all people, but rights are upheld unevenly. Indigenous people, who compose 2.4 percent of the population, continue to face discrimination, particularly regarding land rights and access to basic services. In recent years, conflict over land disputes has led to Indigenous groups being targeted by lawsuits and violence. Bribri leader Sergio Rojas was murdered in 2019, and in 2020 Brörán leader Yehry Rivera was killed and Bribri leader Mainor Ortiz Delgado was shot and wounded in connection with land disputes. All three had previously been granted protectionary measures by the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights (IACHR). Though the attorney general's office dismissed the Rojas case in 2020, in January 2021, the Criminal Court of Buenos Aires ruled that the investigation into Rojas's assassination case must continue.

Costa Ricans of African descent have faced discrimination in health care, education, and employment. In August 2021, a law recognizing the historical discrimination against those of African descent came into force. The law stipulates that for a period of ten years, all public institutions must allocate at least 7 percent of vacant positions annually to people of African descent. The law also mandates the inclusion of the legacy of Afro-Costa Ricans in the country's history in public education curriculums.

Women experience discrimination due to entrenched stereotypes, which can limit their equal access to employment, health services, and the justice system. In August 2021, President Alvarado enacted a law expanding the definition of femicide and introducing penalties of up to 35 years in prison for the crime. Executive orders prohibit discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation and gender identity, and the government has expressed commitment to the protection of LGBT+ people. However, law enforcement officials have discriminated against LGBT+ people, and there have been reports of attacks by police on transgender sex workers.

In 2016, a new law provided disabled people greater personal autonomy. Prior to the law's passage, family members often had legal guardianship over disabled people. In January 2021, the legislature approved a new law intended to protect the rights of people with autism.

In 2019, the government modified legislation on HIV/AIDS to facilitate condom distribution and expand screenings, counseling, and privacy protections for HIV/AIDS patients. A pilot program providing preventative HIV treatment to people deemed at high risk for contracting the virus was launched in July 2021.

The number of asylum seekers from Nicaragua, which initially increased following a political crisis that erupted there in 2018, rose significantly after the Nicaraguan government began a crackdown against its opponents in May 2021. Between 2018 and 2020, over 80,000 Nicaraguans fled to Costa Rica, and approximately 50,000 applied for asylum; according to Costa Rican authorities, 53,000 Nicaraguans sought asylum in Costa Rica in 2021 alone. Although the law entitles asylum seekers to access public services, discrimination sometimes prevents it in practice. Legal restrictions limit employment opportunities for asylum seekers. Anti-Nicaraguan discrimination rose in 2020 during the COVID-19 pandemic.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 13 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

Freedom of movement is constitutionally guaranteed. Costa Ricans enjoy relative freedom in their choice of residence and employment. COVID-19-related restrictions on transit at night and on weekends reduced freedom of movement in 2020 and 2021.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 3 / 4

Property rights are generally protected. Individuals are free to establish businesses, and the business and investment climate is relatively open, although complicated bureaucracy can deter entrepreneurs seeking to establish a business.

Land disputes between Indigenous and non-Indigenous peoples have been a source of conflict for years, and Indigenous groups sometimes face harassing lawsuits and violence. A 1977 Indigenous Law formalized Indigenous groups' exclusive rights to some territories, but the government has failed to implement the law or provide compensation to non-Indigenous settlers who continue to occupy the land.

Despite the existence of domestic violence protections, violence against women and children remains a problem. In 2019 the president signed a bill increasing the statute of limitations in child sexual abuse cases from 10 to 25 years, and in August 2021 he signed a bill expanding the definition of femicide and increasing the penalties for those convicted of the crime.

In 2020, Costa Rica became the first Central American country to permit same-sex marriage.

Abortion is illegal in Costa Rica except when a woman's health is in danger due to a pregnancy. In 2019, President Alvarado signed a technical decree intended to facilitate limited access to abortion by outlining the circumstances under which an abortion may be performed legally, though conditions remain restrictive.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 3 / 4

Despite legal protections, domestic workers are subject to exploitation and forced labor. Employers often ignore minimum wage and social security laws, and the resulting fines for violations are insignificant. Child labor is a problem in the informal economy.

Sex trafficking and child sex tourism are serious problems. The US State Department's 2021 Trafficking in Persons Report highlighted the government's adoption of new investigative techniques in trafficking cases; however, the report also noted a decrease in funding for antitrafficking efforts and the closure of a dedicated shelter for trafficking victims.

Côte d'Ivoire

Population: 27,100,000

Capital: Yamoussoukro (official), Abidjan (de facto)

Freedom Status: Partly Free

Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: Côte d'Ivoire continues to recover from an armed conflict that ended in 2011. Several root causes of the country's violent conflict remain, including ethnic and regional tensions, land disputes, corruption, and impunity. While civil liberties had been better protected in recent years, an outbreak of election-related violence in 2020 brought significant setbacks. Improved electoral conditions in 2021 allowed opposition groups and civil society to operate more freely than during the previous year.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- In March, the members of the National Assembly were directly elected in credible and generally peaceful polls. President Ouattara's party, Rally of the Houphouëtists for Democracy and Peace (RHDP), won an absolute majority in the parliament, taking 137 of 255 seats.
- After the death of Prime Minister Hamed Bakayoko in March, Patrick Achi, Ouattara's former chief of staff, became prime minister. He was appointed to the role by the president according to normal constitutional procedure.
- In June, former President Laurent Gbagbo returned to Côte d'Ivoire after 10 years; he was able to return after being acquitted of charges of crimes against humanity by the International Criminal Court (ICC) in March. Gbagbo officially returned to Ivorian politics in October, when he introduced a new political party, the African People's Party-Côte d'Ivoire (PPA-CI); his return prompted civil society leaders to call for further political reconciliation in order to prevent potential future violence.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 19 / 40 (+3)A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 6 / 12 (+1)*A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 2 / 4

The October 2020 presidential election was neither free nor fair. Former prime minister and presidential candidate of the RHDP Amadou Gon Coulibaly died unexpectedly in July 2020. President Alassane Ouattara, who had spent two five-year presidential terms in office, reversed his previous decision not to run and was nominated in August by the RHDP, which claimed Ouattara was eligible for two more terms because the 2016 Constitution's two-term limit was adopted after Ouattara's second election; some critics charged that Ouattara had moved forward with the new constitution to enable his third term. His nomination was met by major protests from opposition parties.

The Constitutional Council rejected 40 of the 44 candidates for the presidential election and validated the candidacy of only four individuals: Alassane Ouattara, Henri Konan Bédié, Pascal Affi N'Guessan, and Bertin Konan Kouadio. Rejected candidates were unable to appeal the Council's decisions, and the government ignored a ruling from African Court of Human and People's Rights (ACHPR) to allow prominent opposition leader Guillaume Soro and former president Laurent Gbagbo to run. Several leading opposition parties, including those of Soro and Gbagbo, refused to participate in the polls and called for a boycott of and protests against the election. The government banned all public demonstrations throughout the election period, and those that occurred were met with violence. The campaign period itself was marred by instances of violence between progovernment and antigovernment supporters, resulting in dozens of deaths.

The opposition boycotted the October election outright, while many would-be voters were prevented from casting ballots due to security concerns. Ouattara won the poll with 94 percent of the vote, according to the government, which put turnout at 54 percent. These numbers were contested by independent observers from the Electoral Institute for Sustainable Democracy in Africa (EISA), which reported that only 54 percent of polling stations opened and only 41 percent of voter cards were distributed before the vote. The group also said the electoral roll had issues with the comprehensiveness of its data, and included a large number of deceased individuals, and that the election commission lacked transparency and heavily favored the ruling party in administering the election.

The prime minister is the head of government, is appointed by the president, and is responsible for designating a cabinet, which is also approved by the president. In March 2021, Patrick Achi was appointed prime minister following the death of former prime minister Hamed Bakayoko.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 2 / 4

The bicameral parliament consists of a 255-seat lower house, the National Assembly, and a 99-seat Senate, which was envisaged by the 2016 constitution and seated in March 2018. National Assembly members are directly elected to five-year terms. Of the Senate's 99 seats, 66 are indirectly elected by the National Assembly and members of various local councils, and 33 members are appointed by the president; all members serve five-year terms.

In March 2021, the members of the National Assembly were elected in transparent, credible, and peaceful elections. The parliamentary elections were contested by candidates from several opposition parties and coalitions, including most of those that had boycotted the October 2020 presidential elections. However, the Generations and People in Solidarity (GPS) party, led by former prime minister Guillaume Soro, did not take part in either the presidential or the parliamentary elections.

President Ouattara's RHDP won an absolute majority in the parliament, taking 137 of 255 seats. A coalition between two leading opposition parties, the Democratic Party of Côte d'Ivoire-African Democratic Rally (PDCI-RDA) and the pro-Gbagbo Together for Democracy and Solidarity (EDS), won 81 seats.

Despite the peaceful nature of the parliamentary elections and the return of several leading opposition parties, voter turnout remained low: only 37.8 percent of eligible voters participated in the 2021 elections.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 2 / 4 (+1)

In 2016, the ACHPR ruled that the Independent Electoral Commission (CEI) was biased in favor of the government and ordered amendments to the electoral law. President Ouattara conceded to the CEI's reorganization, increasing the number of civil society members in the CEI from four to six by parliamentary amendment in 2019. Civil society criticized the reforms, warning that the government would still exert influence due to its continued ability to nominate members, and changes that could make the body more independent were only partially implemented. Recent allegations of irregularities in CEI appointment and other procedures and related changes in staff, as well as opposition boycotts of staffing processes for district-level posts, have left the CEI mostly run by members of the ruling party.

In April 2020, the government amended the electoral code by emergency executive ordinance—enabled because of the COVID-19 pandemic's state of emergency measures—without consultation with the election's participants. The updated electoral roll was opaque and regionally unbalanced, and the CEI refused to report detailed data and submit to an independent audit. In July 2020, the ACHPR ruled that Côte d'Ivoire must take steps to further reform the CEI, including reforming the process for nominating members to the CEI in order to reduce potential government influence over the nominations. Following the ruling, opposition groups called for all CEI local electoral commissions to be dissolved in preparation for new elections.

Despite remaining weaknesses in the electoral framework and dissatisfaction with recent electoral reforms among opposition parties and civil society groups, the reforms that have been implemented since 2016 have improved electoral competition. In 2021, opposition groups were able to participate in the CEI's central commission after reforms allowed seats in the commission to be assigned to parties with significant parliamentary representation. Opposition candidates were also able to participate in the March 2021 parliamentary elections without facing arbitrary rejection by electoral administration bodies.

Score Change: The score improved from 1 to 2 because opposition members participated in the country's electoral commission.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 9 / 16 (+2)

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 3 / 4 (+1)

The Ivorian constitution permits multiparty competition, and recent presidential and legislative elections have been contested by a large number of parties and independent candidates. The ruling RHDP, dominated by Ouattara's Rally of the Republicans (RDR), holds a virtual lock on political power, but has faced increased competition in recent years. In 2018, the Democratic Party of Côte d'Ivoire (PDCI) of former president Henri Konan Bédié split with the coalition after disagreement over the RHDP's 2020 presidential nominee; a faction of PDCI candidates ran against the RHDP in the 2018 municipal elections. In February 2019, former rebel commander and former premier Guillaume Soro resigned as National Assembly speaker. He later formed the Generations and People in Solidarity (GPS) party, and declared his presidential candidacy in October 2020.

In contrast to the 2020 presidential elections—which had been boycotted by several leading opposition parties—party competition improved in 2021. Multiple opposition parties, including many of those that had boycotted the 2020 presidential elections, contested the March 2021 parliamentary elections, increasing the competitiveness of the election and winning a combined 117 of 255 seats in the National Assembly.

In June 2021, former president Laurent Gbagbo returned to Côte d'Ivoire after ten years, following his acquittal by the ICC on charges of crimes against humanity. In October, Gbagbo officially launched a new left-wing pan-African party, the PPA-CI. Gbagbo's former party, the Ivorian Popular Front (FPI), which he founded in exile in 1982, remains a leading opposition party, and is now led by former prime minister Pascal Affi N'Guessan.

Score Change: The score improved from 2 to 3 because parties that boycotted the 2020 presidential contest participated in the March parliamentary elections and because of the formation of a new party later in the year, increasing political pluralism.

Opposition parties have little chance of gaining power without reforming the electoral framework, which favors the ruling party. The ruling RHDP has an absolute majority in the National Assembly, limiting the opposition's ability to pursue such reforms.

In August 2020, the Constitutional Council rejected the candidacy of 40 of the 44 parties and individuals who submitted a nomination for the presidential election, including Soro and former president Gbagbo. International observer missions noted there was no appeals process for the rejected candidates to have their candidacy recognized, and that the election was not genuinely competitive. The government ignored the ACHPR's ruling to accept Soro's and Gbagbo's candidacies.

The opposition largely boycotted the October 2020 presidential elections. After election day, security forces arrested and detained opposition figures, and some were prevented from contacting a lawyer or their families. Opposition leaders including N'Guessan and dozens of opposition party members were detained at the house of Henri Konan Bédié, allegedly for “conspiracy” and “sedition.” N’Guessan was detained and held incommunicado for over 60 hours. Between August and October 2020, police arrested over 40 political dissidents, mainly for their participation in protests.

After Ouattara began his third presidential term, opposition leaders and former presidents Gbagbo and Bédié called for the release of over 100 detainees, who Gbagbo labeled political prisoners. In August 2021, the government announced the release of nearly 80 people who had been arrested during the 2020 presidential elections.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 2 / 4 (+1)

Individuals faced intimidation, threats, and physical violence when participating in the 2020 presidential election. Opposition parties boycotted the polls and staged multiple marches, sit-ins, and demonstrations leading up to election day in October 2020, despite the government’s ban on all protests from August through October. Security forces used violence to disperse protesters, killing several demonstrators during the campaigning period. Members of leading civil society institutions, like academics, suggested that participating in public debate about the elections would be seen as protest by their superiors.

Supporters of the opposition faced threats from the police and the military, who further failed to keep citizens safe during and after election day. More than 50 people were killed by militia members who attacked citizens with impunity. Opposition and government supporters clashed on the streets with machetes, clubs, and hunting rifles in Abidjan and at least eight other towns.

Such violence was not repeated during the March 2021 legislative elections; observers from the Electoral Institute for Sustainable Democracy in Africa (EISA) found the elections to have taken place in an inclusive, peaceful, and generally transparent atmosphere. Despite the improved atmosphere, however, voter turnout remained low, at 37.88 percent.

Score Change: The score improved from 1 to 2 because there were fewer instances of violence during the March elections than in past polls.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 2 / 4

Citizenship has been a source of tension since the 1990s, when Ivorian nationalists adopted former president Bédié’s concept of “Ivoirité” to exclude perceived foreigners, including Ouattara, from the political process. A law relaxing some conditions for citizenship went into effect in 2014 but its application remains uneven. Hundreds of thousands of individuals, mostly northerners, lack documentation.

Women are poorly represented in the parliament, holding 14.2 percent of seats in the National Assembly and 19.2 percent in the Senate in 2021.

A north-south, Muslim-Christian schism has been a salient feature of Ivorian life for decades, and was exacerbated by the 2002–11 crisis. However, the schism has since receded, and the current government coalition includes Muslims and Christians. Political parties are not ethnically homogenous—Côte d’Ivoire comprises people from more than 60 ethnicities—though each tends to be dominated by specific ethnic groups.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 4 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 2 / 4

Though defense and security forces are nominally under civilian control, problems of parallel command and control systems within the armed forces, known as the Republican

Forces of Côte d'Ivoire (FRCI), remain significant. In 2016, the government instituted a law meant to reduce the size of the officer corps and refine the military's command structure, but these changes have largely gone unimplemented. Nonstate armed actors and former rebels enjoy significant influence, especially in the north and west.

Additionally, after several years of relative calm, military mutinies in 2017 exposed the fragility of the civilian government's control over the state armed forces. Civilian control was tested again in September 2019, when special forces members scuffled with Abidjan police in an effort to free an arrested colleague; this incident ended without violence, however.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 1 / 4

Corruption and bribery remain endemic, and particularly affect the judiciary, police, and government contracting operations. Petty bribery also hampers citizens' access to services ranging from obtaining a birth certificate to clearing goods through customs. A public anticorruption body, the High Authority for Good Governance (HABG), was established in 2013, but is considered ineffective. Perpetrators at all levels seldom face prosecution.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 1 / 4

The government generally awards contracts in a nontransparent manner. Access to up-to-date information from government ministries is difficult for ordinary citizens to acquire, although some ministries do publish information online. In 2013, the National Assembly passed an access to information law, but enforcement has been inconsistent. The HABG requires public officials to submit asset declarations, but this is not well enforced.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 30 / 60 (+2)

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 10 / 16 (+1)

D1. Are there free and independent media? 2 / 4

Conditions for the press have improved since the end of the 2010–11 conflict, and incidents of serious violence against journalists are rare. However, journalists face intimidation and occasional violence by security forces in connection with their work. Most national media sources, especially newspapers, exhibit partisanship in their news coverage, consistently favoring either the government or the opposition. Many journalists were arrested, detained, and beaten by police while covering protests and violence during and after the 2020 election period.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 3 / 4

Legal guarantees of religious freedom are typically upheld, and individuals are free to practice their faith in public and private. Relations between Muslims and Christians were exacerbated by the 2002–11 crisis, but tensions have largely receded. In May 2019, police closed Danané's great mosque, after the supporters of two imams vying for its leadership clashed.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 2 / 4

Public universities were closed and used as military bases during the 2010–11 conflict, and now suffer from a lack of adequate resources and facilities. Classes were disrupted when teachers and university lecturers launched a nationwide strike over salaries, bonuses, and housing aid in late January 2019; the strike was suspended that March when unions held talks with the government.

Academics faced threats and intimidation if they addressed or critiqued the ruling party and other politically sensitive topics during the 2020 election cycle. Legal scholars were unable to organize a public debate on the constitutionality of President Ouattara's third term, as many feared their participation would be considered a form of illegal protest. Individuals at institutions with leadership that support the ruling party engaged in self-censorship.

While people are free to engage in political discussion and debate, politics and the ruling party became dangerous topics during the 2020 election cycle. During and after the elections, militias and unknown actors attacked opposition supporters demonstrating and meeting during the opposition's boycott of the election. Security forces largely overlooked the violence against opposition supporters, which discouraged individuals from openly expressing their political views.

In 2021, Ivorians' ability to speak openly greatly improved, and political debates were allowed to resume in the newspapers and on social media. However, self-censorship remains common, and some political discussions, especially those regarding the legitimacy of Ouattara's third presidential term, still carry a risk of harassment for participants.

Score Change: The score improved from 2 to 3 because Ivorians encountered less harassment or retaliation for engaging in private discussion than in the previous year.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 7 / 12 (+1)

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 2 / 4 (+1)

Freedom of assembly was restricted by June 2019 criminal code revisions, which include one- to three-year prison sentences for organizing "undeclared or prohibited" assemblies and a vague definition of "public order" that can be broadly interpreted by authorities.

President Ouattara banned public demonstrations and protests throughout the 2020 election period. Police violently dispersed protests and other acts of civil disobedience that stemmed from the opposition's election boycott; more than 50 people were killed because of violence at public demonstrations.

In 2021, fewer political demonstrations and protest marches took place than in the previous year; those that did occur were largely peaceful, and were not subjected to police violence or interference.

Score Change: The score improved from 1 to 2 because protesters faced fewer physical threats than in the previous year.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 2 / 4

Domestic and international nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) are generally free to operate. However, poor security conditions—especially in north and west—are a constraint for some organizations.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 3 / 4

The right to organize and join labor unions is constitutionally guaranteed. Workers have the right to bargain collectively. Côte d'Ivoire typically has various professional strikes every year, though sometimes strikes have become violent. Teachers and university lecturers held a nationwide strike over salaries, bonuses, and housing aid from January through March 2019.

F. RULE OF LAW: 6 / 16F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 1 / 4

The judiciary is not independent, and judges are highly susceptible to external interference and bribes. Processes governing the assignment of cases to judges are opaque. The courts generally adjudicate cases in accordance with the ruling party's political interests, and the judiciary was fully mobilized to support President Ouattara's third term.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 1 / 4

The constitution guarantees equal access to justice and due process for all citizens, but these guarantees are poorly upheld in practice. The state struggles to provide attorneys to defendants who cannot afford legal counsel. Security officials are susceptible to bribery and are rarely held accountable for misconduct. Prolonged pretrial detention is a serious problem for both adults and minors, with some detainees spending years in prison without trial. In late 2018, the lower house adopted a new Code of Criminal Procedure that included a circuit of criminal courts to address the backlog.

Physical violence against civilians in the form of extortion, banditry, and sexual violence, sometimes perpetrated by members of the state armed forces, remain common. Disputes over land use and ownership between migrants, and those who claim customary land rights, sometimes turn violent. The country's prisons are severely overcrowded, and incarcerated adults and minors are not always separated.

Concerns about impunity, victor's justice, and reconciliation have persisted after the close of the 2010–11 conflict. To date, only a handful of individuals have been put on trial for crimes committed during that period, and most prosecutions have focused on figures associated with Gbagbo. In 2018, Ouattara pardoned 800 people accused or convicted of committing violent acts during the 2010–11 conflict, including former first lady Simone Gbagbo, ostensibly to foster reconciliation. In January 2019, the ICC acquitted former president Gbagbo of crimes against humanity during the 2010–11 conflict, and Gbagbo was conditionally released. The acquittal was upheld in March 2021, and Gbagbo returned to Côte d'Ivoire in June.

In November 2020, the United Nations reported that over 3,000 people fled Côte d'Ivoire because of postelection violence. Many of those who fled returned to Côte d'Ivoire in 2021.

Throughout 2020 and 2021, numerous terrorist attacks occurred in the north of country, along the borders with Burkina Faso and Mali. In February 2021, the head of French intelligence warned that terrorist groups were planning to expand their operations in Côte d'Ivoire and in December, the government increased its budget for antiterrorism programs in the north.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 2 / 4

Same-sex relations are not criminalized in Côte d'Ivoire, but LGBT+ people can face prosecution under criminal code language amended in 2019 that references "unnatural acts" and "moral sensitivity." No law prohibits discrimination based on sexual orientation. LGBT+ people face societal prejudice as well as harassment by state security forces.

Intercommunal tensions over land rights frequently involve migrants from neighboring countries, who sometimes experience violent intimidation.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 7 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 2 / 4

Freedom of movement has improved since 2011. However, irregular checkpoints and acts of extortion continue in some areas, particularly in the west and north, and near gold and diamond-producing regions. The government's efforts to combat these practices have been undermined by inconsistent financial support and a failure to investigate and prosecute perpetrators. Women are generally afforded equal freedom of movement, though risks of insecurity and sexual violence hinder this in practice.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 2 / 4

Citizens have the right to own and establish private businesses, and the country has attracted significant investment since 2011. However, property and land rights remain weak, especially in the west, where conflict over land tenure remains a significant source of tension. Under a new marriage law passed in July 2019, women are legally entitled to use inherited property as collateral for loans. Migrants may be discriminated over land issues even though they have legal documents of their property title.

Women suffer significant legal and economic discrimination, and sexual and gender-based violence are widespread. According to a 2019 survey carried out by Citizens for the Promotion and Defense of the Rights of Children, Women and Minorities (CPDEFM), an Ivorian NGO, more than 70 percent of women in Abidjan, Côte d'Ivoire's largest city, have been victims of domestic violence. The spread of COVID-19 has also been linked to an increase in violence against women; during a COVID-19-related lockdown between March and May 2020, cases of domestic violence rose by 52 percent.

Legal protections from gender-based violence are weak and are often ignored. Impunity for perpetrators also remains a problem, and when it is prosecuted, rape is routinely reclassified as indecent assault. Costly medical certificates are often essential for convictions, yet are beyond the means of victims who are impoverished.

Child marriage is historically widespread, though the July 2019 marriage law set the minimum age for marriage at 18 for both sexes. Customary and religious marriages, more common outside urban areas, were not affected by the law. The July 2019 law also banned same-sex marriage.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 2 / 4

Despite efforts by the government and international industries in recent years to counter the phenomenon, child labor is a frequent problem, particularly in the cocoa industry. Human trafficking is prohibited by the new constitution, but government programs for victims of trafficking—often children—are inadequate.

Croatia

Population: 4,000,000

Capital: Zagreb

Freedom Status: Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Croatia is a parliamentary republic that regularly holds free elections. Civil and political rights are generally respected, though corruption in the public sector is a serious issue. The Roma and ethnic Serbs face discrimination, as do LGBT+ people. In recent years, concerns about the presence of far-right groups and figures espousing discriminatory values in public life have increased.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- Local elections were held in May, and saw the conservative Croatian Democratic Union (HDZ) win most mayoral and municipal races throughout the country. However, in Zagreb, Tomislav Tomašević of the left-wing We Can party won the mayoral race with more than 65 percent of the vote; We Can candidates also won 23 of the 47 seats on Zagreb's city council.
- Police violence against migrants, refugees, and asylum-seekers continued throughout the year, with nearly 12,000 illegal pushbacks documented along the country's border with Bosnia and Herzegovina, leading to criticism from human rights advocates and European Union (EU) representatives.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 36 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 12 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The president, who is head of state, is elected by popular vote for a maximum of two five-year terms. The prime minister is head of government and is appointed by the president with parliamentary approval.

Former Social Democratic Party (SDP) prime minister Zoran Milanović defeated incumbent Kolinda Grabar-Kitarović in the second round of the country's presidential elections in January 2020, capturing 52.7 percent of the vote. Voter turnout was 55 percent.

Chairman of the HDZ Andrej Plenković remained prime minister following the 2020 legislative elections.

Local elections were held in May 2021. The governing HDZ won mayoral races in 15 of Croatia's 20 prefectures, but did not win in the country's three largest cities. In Zagreb, Tomislav Tomašević of the left-wing We Can party won 65.25 percent of the vote, defeating far-right candidate Miroslav Škoro in the second round of the elections.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

Members of the 151-member unicameral parliament, called the Hrvatski Sabor, are elected to four-year terms.

Prime Minister Plenković called for the 2020 parliamentary election to occur in July, a few months ahead of schedule. Critics claimed he moved the date forward to capitalize on the public's perception of the governing HDZ's success in addressing the COVID-19 pandemic. The HDZ went on to capture 66 seats, which enabled the party to form a coalition government with two smaller parties. The main opposition party, the SDP, won 41 seats, the far-right Homeland Movement party secured 16, and the new left-wing We Can party took 8. Though the elections were deemed free and fair, ethnic Serb candidates experienced harassment during the campaign.

The HDZ won most races throughout the country in the May 2021 local elections. However, both the HDZ and SDP lost a number of council seats in Croatia's largest cities; in Zagreb, We Can won 23 of the 47 seats on the city council.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 4 / 4

While some concerns about the use of public funds for political campaigns persist, in general, the State Election Commission (SEC) implements robust electoral laws effectively.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 14 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 4 / 4

Citizens may freely organize and participate in the activities of a wide variety of political parties. A slate of new right- and left-wing populist parties and candidates emerged in the 2019 European Parliament elections. Two new coalitions made breakthroughs in the July 2020 parliamentary election: the far-right Homeland Movement and the new left-wing coalition We Can. In May 2021, We Can won both the Zagreb mayoral and city council elections with a decisive mandate.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 4 / 4

The SDP-led opposition coalition holds a significant bloc of seats in the legislature and is generally able to operate free from restrictions or intimidation. In general, however, the HDZ has dominated politics and draws support from the Roman Catholic Church, veterans, and a growing number of conservative nongovernmental organizations (NGOs). The main SDP-led opposition bloc has won the most seats in only two parliamentary elections since 1991, although the country was headed by non-HDZ executives from 2000-2015, including an SDP president from 2010 to 2015 and again since 2020.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 3 / 4

While voters and candidates are generally able to freely express their political choices, many public servants obtained their positions through patronage networks, and thus risk becoming beholden to a party or special interest group as a result. Patronage networks are particularly influential in Zagreb, which was under the stewardship of HDZ-affiliated mayor Milan Bandić—considered one of the country's most powerful politicians—almost continuously from 2000 until he passed away suddenly in February 2021. Bandić's nearly 20-year tenure was marked by corruption allegations and credible allegations of improper hiring practices and public procurement deals.

The Catholic Church remains influential in Croatia and has begun associating with conservative and far-right civil society groups, which have become a bigger factor in local politics in recent years. Veterans groups are also influential, especially in regard to the still contentious memory politics of the Independence War (1991–1995) and the position of ethnic Serbs in Croatian society.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 3 / 4

Eight parliamentary seats are set aside for ethnic minorities, including three for ethnic Serbs. However, the political interests of marginalized groups, notably Roma and Serbs, are underrepresented. Another three seats are reserved for Croatian citizens in the diaspora, including ethnic Croats in neighboring Bosnia and Herzegovina.

Women are represented across political parties, and women have held Croatia's presidency between 2015 and 2019 and the prime minister's office between 2009 and 2011. However, the number of women in parliament decreased in 2016 after the Constitutional Court struck down a law requiring 40 percent of a party's candidates be women. In the 2020 parliamentary election, 35 women from various political parties won seats in parliament.

The treatment of ethnic Serbs in public office in Croatia has deteriorated in recent years. In September 2018, sitting lawmaker and Independent Democratic Serb Party (SDS) leader Milorad Pupovac was pelted with food items by a protester in Zagreb. Pupovac claimed the incident reflected growing hostility toward the Serb population from ascendant right-wing movements in the country, many of which enjoy the tacit support of the HDZ. Pupovac remained the target of verbal attacks throughout 2019 and 2020, and his party's election posters were repeatedly defaced during both the European Parliament and Croatian elections.

Societal discrimination discourages LGBT+ people from participating in politics, and elements of the political establishment have espoused discriminatory attitudes in their activism.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 10 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 4 / 4

Democratically elected representatives are duly installed into office and are generally able to make public policy without undue external influence or pressure.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 3 / 4

A criminal code in effect since 2013 enforces stiffer penalties for various forms of corruption. While some progress has been made, official corruption—including nepotism, bribery, fraud, and patronage—remains a serious problem. The European Commission singled out corruption as a major issue facing the country and local NGOs have observed that the problem has actually worsened since the country joined the bloc in 2013.

In November 2020, former prime minister Ivo Sanader was sentenced to eight years in prison for taking money from public companies to create slush funds for the HDZ. The HDZ was fined and compelled to return millions of illegally obtained funds.

In July 2021, Kazimir Bačić, the director of the state broadcaster Croatian Radiotelevision (HRT), was arrested on suspicion of bribery and influence trading; he was released from custody in October. Bačić was a leading figure in the broader HDZ patronage network and a long-time associate of Milan Bandić.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 3 / 4

In 2013, Croatia adopted the Law on the Right of Access to Information. The legislation created a proportionality and public-interest test designed to balance reasons for disclosing information and reasons for restricting it. It also established an independent information commissioner to monitor compliance. However, government bodies do not always release requested information in a timely manner.

Media reports in 2018 suggested that former economy minister Martina Dalić and a group of well-connected businesspeople and lawyers crafted a 2017 law allowing the government to take over management of the troubled agricultural company Agrokor. The entire drafting process took place in private meetings outside of official proceedings. Facing conflict-of-interest allegations, Dalić resigned in May 2018.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 49 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 13 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 3 / 4

Media in Croatia is highly polarized but generally free from overt political interference or manipulation. However, journalists continue to face threats, harassment, and occasional attacks—sometimes at the hands of police—which has created an atmosphere of self-censorship. The European Federation of Journalists (EFJ) and local journalist associations have warned of growing political pressure and attacks on the Croatian press under the HDZ government. A 2020 European Commission report warned about deteriorating media freedoms in Croatia.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 3 / 4

The Croatian constitution guarantees freedom of religion, and this is generally upheld in practice. However, the small Serb Orthodox community remains vulnerable to harassment, and members have reported vandalism of their churches. Jewish communities and other groups have expressed increasing concern about Holocaust denial and displays by right-wing nationalists of symbols and slogans associated with the fascist Ustaša regime that governed Croatia during the Second World War. Revisionist accounts of the Ustaša period continued to be promoted by far-right groups and newspapers in 2021.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 3 / 4

While there are generally no overt restrictions on speech in classrooms, critics continue to allege inappropriate political interference at all levels of education. While aspects of a long-planned modernization of school curriculums were approved by the parliament in 2018, the HDZ has long sought to delay the updates and has moved to install its own members into the group tasked with developing its policies—including extremely conservative members opposed to sex education.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 4 / 4

People are generally free to engage in discussions of a sensitive nature without fearing surveillance or retribution, although there have been some reports of police arresting individuals voicing criticism of the government.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 12 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

Freedom of assembly is protected and respected in Croatia.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 4 / 4

NGOs in Croatia are robust, active, and free from restrictions. However, many groups have complained of growing political pressure from parts of the government and the HDZ against journalists and civil society activists.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 4 / 4

The constitution allows workers to form and join trade unions, and this right is generally respected in practice.

F. RULE OF LAW: 11 / 16F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 3 / 4

While judicial independence is generally respected, there have been recent concerns about the influence of extreme right-wing groups on the judiciary. For example, in 2017, a court reversed a 1945 conviction of an academic who was complicit in atrocities committed by the fascist Ustaša regime. Critics allege the courts have been ruling in line with the views of right-wing NGOs and the HDZ, while the courts maintain that they are redressing partisan rulings of the Yugoslav communist era.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 3 / 4

Due process rights are generally upheld, but the system tends to work more efficiently for individuals with abundant resources or high social standing.

In November 2018, Ivica Todorović, the former owner of Agrokor under investigation for fraud in relation to the company's collapse, was extradited from the United Kingdom. He was arrested upon arrival in Croatia but released days later after posting the €1 million bail. Todorović was acquitted in one trial in October 2020 but still faced other charges.

The International Commission on Missing Persons (ICMP) has criticized Croatia for its slow progress in identifying human remains of victims of the 1991–95 conflicts and in making reparations to survivors and their families.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 3 / 4

Violence by state and nonstate actors is uncommon. Prison conditions do not meet international standards due to overcrowding and inadequate medical care.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 2 / 4

Ethnic and religious minorities and LGBT+ people in Croatia face discrimination. Analysts have expressed concerns that the increasing visibility of far-right, nationalist groups has spread discriminatory rhetoric. Occasionally, the government's actions suggest their endorsement of far-right groups, and observers have expressed concern that the government has tacitly approved of discriminatory behavior. A group of NGOs in December 2018 criticized the government for lacking a comprehensive human rights policy, and warned of the continuing deterioration of protection of human rights in the country, especially for marginalized groups and women.

The constitution prohibits gender discrimination, but women earn less than men for comparable work and hold fewer leadership positions.

According to a June 2021 Council of Europe (CoE) report on the protection of national minorities, ethnic Serbs continue to face high levels of discrimination. In July, a cadet was dismissed from the state police academy, allegedly for filming herself performing a traditional Serbian folk dance while in uniform; the Police Officers' Union has suggested that the Serbian origin of the dance led to her dismissal.

Police violence against migrants, refugees, and asylum-seekers continued in 2021, according to the Danish Refugee Council (DRC). Most such incidents, including nearly 12,000 illegal pushbacks of refugees and migrants, took place along the border with Bosnia and Herzegovina. The DRC has produced photographs and testimony of grave abuses allegedly committed by border police toward migrants and refugees, including sexual violence and torture. In December, the CoE's Committee for the Prevention of Torture (CPT) found that Croatian authorities had repeatedly failed to investigate reports of these "systematic" and "serious" abuses allegedly committed by border police.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 13 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

Freedom of movement is protected by the constitution and upheld in practice. People may freely change their place of residence, employment, or education.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 3 / 4

Property rights are generally well protected. However, corruption can inhibit normal business operations.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 3 / 4

In 2014, following a 2013 referendum that banned same-sex marriage, the parliament passed a law allowing same-sex civil unions. The law affords same-sex couples equal rights in inheritance, social benefits, and taxation, and in April 2021, an administrative court in Zagreb ruled that same-sex couples have the right to adopt children.

Domestic violence remains a concern. Convictions for rape and domestic violence can bring lengthy prison terms, although Amnesty International noted that the vast majority of cases receive light sentences of one year or less. Police sometimes fail to adhere to recommended procedures for handling reports of domestic violence.

In April 2018, lawmakers ratified the Istanbul Convention, a treaty on preventing and combating gender-based and domestic violence. The treaty was unpopular among conservative and far-right groups who believed its tenets could lead to the legal introduction of same-sex marriage, a third gender category, or school curriculum changes. In response, the government adopted a statement saying the treaty's adoption would not change the legal definition of marriage. Amnesty International criticized the Croatian government for failing to harmonize its legislative and policy framework with the treaty's terms.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 3 / 4

Worker protection laws are robust, and the Office of the Labor Inspectorate actively investigates work sites. However, labor violations remain a problem within the hospitality sector. Workers in the informal sector have less access to legal protections.

Human trafficking remains a problem, sentences for those convicted of it can be light, and witness statements are not always given the appropriate consideration in court cases.

Cuba

Population: 11,200,000

Capital: Havana

Freedom Status: Not Free

Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: Cuba's one-party communist state outlaws political pluralism, bans independent media, suppresses dissent, and severely restricts basic civil liberties. The government continues to dominate the economy despite recent reforms that permit some private-sector activity. The regime's undemocratic character has not changed despite a generational transition in political leadership between 2018 and 2021 that included the introduction of a new constitution.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- Cuba saw the largest protests in over 20 years on July 11, as protesters nationwide rallied over goods shortages, economic difficulties, and the government's COVID-19 response. Security forces responded violently, using live ammunition, tear gas, and charging maneuvers against participants. Detainees faced torture and degrading treatment while in custody and suffered due process violations during subsequent trials.
- The government continued to target the dissident San Isidro Movement (MSI) and 27N artist collectives during the year. MSI member Luis Manuel Otero Alcántra was forced to a hospital in early May to end a hunger strike and was detained on July 11, while MSI cofounder Maykel Castillo Pérez was detained in mid-May. Otero and Castillo remained in custody at year's end.
- In August, the government gazetted Decree Laws 35 and 42, both of which target the dissemination of information deemed false or detrimental to "public order." The government also gazetted Resolution 105, which targets "false news," that month.
- Havana retired the convertible peso (CUC) in January, ending the country's dual currency system. The Cuban peso (CUP), the surviving domestic currency, lost value against the US dollar on the black market as the year progressed.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 1 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 0 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

Under the 2019 constitution, the president and vice president of the republic are chosen to serve up to two five-year terms by the National Assembly. The prime minister and the Council of Ministers are designated by the National Assembly upon the president's recommendation. In practice, these processes ratify candidates who have been preselected by the Communist Party of Cuba (PCC).

Miguel Díaz-Canel Bermúdez was elected president of the republic under the new constitutional system in a nearly unanimous National Assembly vote in October 2019. That December, he named Manuel Marrero Cruz prime minister. National Assembly president Juan Esteban Lazo Hernández became president of the Council of State, Cuba's top executive office under the old constitution, in October 2019, succeeding Díaz-Canel.

Raúl Castro Ruz, who preceded Díaz-Canel as president of the Council of State, continued to wield considerable power as PCC first secretary. However, Castro retired from that post during the April 2021 party congress and was succeeded by Díaz-Canel. Castro maintains significant influence despite his retirement.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

The unicameral National Assembly is directly elected to serve five-year terms, but a PCC-controlled commission designates all candidates, presenting voters with a single candidate for each seat. Those who receive more than 50 percent of the valid votes cast are deemed elected. The National Assembly in turn selects members of the Council of State, a body that exercises legislative power between the assembly's two brief annual sessions. In the 2018 National Assembly elections, all 605 of the approved candidates were deemed elected.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 0 / 4

The only Cuban elections that offer a choice of more than one candidate per office are those for municipal assemblies, but no campaigning is allowed. This did not change under the electoral law unanimously approved in 2019 following ratification of the new constitution, which retained the system of PCC-controlled electoral and candidacy commissions. However, the new law eliminated provincial assemblies, calling instead for municipal assemblies to approve provincial governors proposed by the president, and cut the number of National Assembly delegates to 474 as of the 2023 elections.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 0 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 0 / 4

The constitution identifies the PCC as the “superior driving force of society and the state.” All other political parties are illegal.

Political dissent is a punishable offense, and dissidents are systematically harassed, detained, physically assaulted, and imprisoned for minor infractions. Supposedly spontaneous mob attacks, known as “acts of repudiation,” are often used to silence political dissidents. Madrid-based nongovernmental organization (NGO) Prisoners Defenders reported that 251 political prisoners were held by Cuban authorities as of September 2021.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 0 / 4

The PCC has monopolized government and politics in Cuba since the mid-1960s, allowing no electoral competition and any alternative force from succeeding it through a democratic transfer of power. Dissident groups were blocked from fielding independent candidates in the 2017 municipal elections, while security forces suppressed opposition activity during both the February 2019 constitutional referendum and the October 2019 election of Díaz-Canel.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 0 / 4

The authoritarian one-party system in Cuba excludes the public from any genuine, autonomous political participation. Intelligence agencies play an important role in suppressing dissent and wield deep influence over virtually every aspect of the state. Members of dissident groups and even independent actors in the arts, journalism, and other fields are systematically surveilled and periodically interrogated in order to silence them or turn them into informants.

State employees who express political dissent or disagreement with the authorities often face harassment or summary dismissal. Professionals dismissed from their jobs in the state sector have difficulty continuing their careers.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 0 / 4

The PCC leadership has exhibited greater gender and racial diversity in recent years. However, since political rights are denied to all Cuban citizens, women, Afro-Cubans, and members of other demographic groups are unable to choose their representatives or organize independently to assert their political interests.

Women hold more than half of the 605 National Assembly seats. However, women held only 3 seats in the 12-seat Political Bureau of the PCC Central Committee during the April 2021 party congress. Cubans of African and mixed-race descent are well represented in the legislature. Lazo, an Afro-Cuban PCC stalwart, simultaneously holds the powerful positions of National Assembly president and head of the Council of State.

The political interests of LGBT+ people are not well represented. Some public advocacy is permitted, but only with the permission of the PCC.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 1 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 0 / 4

None of Cuba's nominally elected officials are chosen through free and fair contests, and major policy decisions are reserved for the PCC leadership in practice. The National Assembly, which the constitution describes as the "supreme organ of state power," has little independent influence, meets for brief sessions twice a year, and votes unanimously on nearly all matters before it.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 1 / 4

Corruption remains a serious problem in Cuba, with widespread illegality permeating everyday life. The state enjoys a monopoly on most large business transactions, and there are no independent mechanisms to hold officials accountable for wrongdoing.

The government has at times pursued anticorruption campaigns, and long prison sentences have been imposed on high-level Cuban officials and foreign businessmen found guilty of corruption-related charges. However, internal reforms that would make the system more transparent and less prone to abuse have been rejected, and the authorities do not tolerate civil society groups, independent journalists, or independent courts that might serve as external checks on government malfeasance.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 0 / 4

Cuba lacks effective laws that provide for freedom of information and access to official records. Decree Law 6 of 2020 allows individuals to request data from the national statistics office; in practice, however, officials can decline such requests.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 11 / 60 (-1)

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 4 / 16D1. Are there free and independent media? 0 / 4

Cuba has one of the most restrictive media environments in the world. The formal media sector is owned and controlled by the state, and the constitution prohibits privately owned media. The country's independent press operates outside the law, its publications are considered "enemy propaganda," and its journalists are routinely harassed, detained, interrogated, threatened, defamed in the official press, and prohibited from traveling abroad. Government agents regularly accuse them of being mercenaries and even terrorists, and many face charges of "usurpation of legal capacity," "diffusion of false news," or other vaguely defined offenses. Journalists at state-owned outlets engage in similar discourse when discussing dissidents; in April 2021, television presenter Humberto López called for members of the MSI and 27N artist collectives to be charged with "treason against the homeland," a capital offense.

The government closely monitors and persecutes perceived dissidents within the artistic community, mainstream artists, and media figures who air independent or critical views. In May 2021, authorities forcefully entered the home of MSI member Luis Manuel Otero Alcántra—who began a hunger strike over the seizure and destruction of artwork in April—and sent him to a hospital. Otero was discharged at the end of May but was arrested on July 11, as protests were held nationwide. Otero held another hunger strike between late September and mid-October.

In mid-May 2021, MSI cofounder Maykel Castillo Pérez was detained by the authorities and was charged with crimes including "resistance" and "contempt." Castillo, who coproduced and performed the antigovernment song "Patria y Vida" ("Homeland and Life") along with Otero, began a hunger strike in late October while held at Pinar del Río prison. Both Otero and Castillo remained in detention at year's end.

Journalists and artists were exiled or were otherwise prohibited from returning to Cuba during 2021. In March, opposition journalist Karla Pérez González, who was traveling to the country from Costa Rica, was denied entry. Costa Rica granted Pérez refugee status in August. In June, artist and 27N member Hamlet Lavastida was arrested and accused of instigating a crime for communicating with other members of the collective. Lavastida and his partner, poet Katherine Bisquet, were both exiled from Cuba in September.

While Cubans do enjoy religious freedom, official obstacles make it difficult for churches to operate without interference. Certain church groups have struggled to obtain registration, and association with an unregistered group is a criminal offense. The Roman Catholic Church has enjoyed an expansion of its pastoral rights, including periodic access to state media and public spaces and the ability to build new churches and distribute its own publications. Protestant and evangelical groups tend to face greater restrictions, though they too have experienced improved conditions in recent years.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 0 / 4

Academic freedom is restricted in Cuba. Private schools and universities have been banned since the early 1960s, teaching materials often contain ideological content, and educators commonly require PCC affiliation for career advancement. University students have been expelled for dissident behavior. Despite the elimination of exit visas in 2013, university faculty must still obtain permission to travel to academic conferences abroad, and officials often prevent dissident intellectuals from attending such events. Officials also deny entry to prominent intellectuals who have been critical of the regime. Recent years have featured numerous cases of academics being dismissed from positions in reprisal for their political opinions or activities.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 1 / 4

Cubans often engage in private discussions regarding everyday issues like the economy, food prices, foreign travel, and internet access, but tend to avoid discussing more sensitive political issues. Neighborhood-level “Committees for the Defense of the Revolution” assist security agencies by monitoring, reporting, and suppressing dissent.

The authorities also monitor expressions of dissent on social media and through surveillance of electronic communications, punishing users with criminal charges or other forms of reprisal. Decree Law 370 of 2019 bans Cuban citizens from hosting their writings on foreign servers—including social media platforms like Facebook—and prohibits the circulation of “information contrary to the social interest, morals, good customs, and integrity of people.” Under Decree Law 389 of 2019, authorities can engage in electronic surveillance without prior judicial approval and use the information gained in criminal cases.

Several laws and resolutions that restrict private discussion were gazetted in August 2021. That month, the government gazetted Decree Law 35, which allows the state-run Telecommunications Company of Cuba SA to terminate networks used to disseminate information considered false or detrimental to “public order.” The government also gazetted Decree Law 42, which requires internet service providers to suspend or terminate the services of users who disseminate such content. Resolution 105, meanwhile, targets “the dissemination of false news.”

Anonymity and encryption technologies are legally prohibited, but many Cubans with mobile internet access use encrypted services such as WhatsApp and Telegram to communicate privately among trusted friends.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 0 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 0 / 4

Restrictions on freedom of assembly remain a key form of political control. Security forces and government-backed assailants routinely break up peaceful gatherings or protests by political dissidents and civic activists. The government also targets assemblies and gatherings using COVID-19 measures.

Authorities and officials disrupted and forcefully dispersed several protests during the year. 27N supporters held a protest in front of the Culture Ministry’s headquarters in January, which ended after Culture Minister Alpidio Alonso Grau slapped a journalist.

On July 11, Cubans participated in the largest rallies in over 20 years, holding nationwide protests over shortages of basic goods, economic difficulties, and the government’s COVID-19 response. President Díaz-Canel called on government supporters to oppose the protests, saying “the order to combat has been given” in televised remarks. Authorities acted violently in order to disperse the protests; security officers used live ammunition, tear gas, and pepper spray, and were also seen charging protesters. One person was killed and as many as 1,300 people were arrested, with over 700 remaining in detention as of late December.

Authorities also restricted the activities of Archipiélago, a group that sought to organize antigovernment rallies in November 2021 and called for the release of those detained in July.

In October, the group's request to hold protests in November was denied. Later in October, prosecutors warned its leaders not to proceed with their plans. On November 15, security forces were deployed to prevent the planned protests from occurring, while organizers and prominent government opponents were detained. Playwright and Archipiélago leader Yúnior García Aguilera fled Cuba for Spain several days later.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 0 / 4

Citing the 1985 Law on Associations, the government refuses to register any new organization that is not state supervised. Nearly all politically motivated short-term detentions in recent years have targeted members of independent associations, think tanks, human rights groups, political parties, and trade unions.

A number of NGOs suffered repression during 2021, with members facing arrest, detention, and exile. In addition to the MSI, the authorities also targeted 27N, Archipiélago, the Ladies in White, and the Patriotic Union of Cuba (UNPACU). UNPACU leader José Daniel Ferrer García was arrested when trying to join the July 11 protests. In August, the government revoked a home-detention order originating from a previous conviction, sending Ferrer to prison to serve a 4-year-14-day term. In November 2021, Ladies in White leader Berta Soler Fernández and UNPACU member Guillermo Fariñas were among those arrested and detained as authorities sought to disrupt that month's planned Archipiélago rallies.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 0 / 4

Cuban workers do not have the right to strike or bargain collectively, and independent labor unions are illegal.

F. RULE OF LAW: 1 / 16 (-1)

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 0 / 4

According to the constitution, the National Assembly controls judicial appointments and suspensions, and the Council of State exercises these powers when the assembly is not in session. The Council of State is also empowered to issue "instructions of a general character" to the courts, whose rulings typically conform to the interests of the PCC. Judges must enforce laws on vaguely defined offenses like "public disorder," "contempt," "disrespect for authority," and "precriminal dangerousness," which are used to prosecute the regime's political opponents.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 0 / 4

The regime's systematic violation of due process is regularly illustrated by trumped-up criminal cases against dissidents and independent journalists.

Those arrested on July 11, 2021 faced due process violations, with the judiciary holding summary trials against defendants. Courts issued convictions and sentences against 40 people by early August, with none of those individuals benefiting from legal representation. Another round of trials reportedly took place in December, with the US State Department noting that over 150 defendants received prison sentences during those proceedings; some defendants convicted in December received terms lasting as long as 30 years.

Cubans facing trial do not benefit from speedy proceedings. Luis Robles Elizástigui was arrested after holding a one-person protest in December 2020 but did not face proceedings over charges of "disobedience" and disseminating "enemy propaganda" until December 2021, with prosecutors requesting a six-year sentence.

Although violent crime rates are believed to be relatively low, physical security for the population is undermined by government-backed violence. Opposition activists, human rights defenders, and other perceived enemies of the regime are routinely subjected to public assaults, excessive use of force by police during raids and arrests, and abuse in custody. The government has repeatedly refused to allow international monitoring of its prisons. Prison conditions are poor, featuring overcrowding, forced labor, inadequate sanitation and medical care, and physical abuse.

Cubans faced violence at the hands of the authorities during and after the July 11, 2021 protests. Security forces used live ammunition against protesters and subsequently engaged in violent and degrading treatment—including torture, sleep deprivation, and threats of reprisal—against those taken into custody. A teenage girl arrested on July 11 recounted that security officers ordered her to remove her clothing and intimated that she would be raped. Opposition journalist Orelvys Cabrera Sotolongo, who was arrested while covering the protests, was also forced to remove his clothing while under interrogation. University student Leonardo Romero Negrin, who was also detained on July 11, recounted that officers physically assaulted him after he was detained. The Military Prosecutor's Office declined to criminally pursue a subsequent complaint from Romero's father by September.

Score Change: The score declined from 1 to 0 due to credible reports of violent repression of peaceful demonstrators during the July 11 protests and the degrading treatment and torture of some of those detained in subsequent months.

Article 42 of the 2019 constitution extended protection from discrimination to a wider array of vulnerable groups, explicitly adding categories such as ethnic origin, gender identity, sexual orientation, age, and disability to the existing safeguards regarding race, sex, national origin, and religion. PCC control of the government and justice system limits their ability to enforce such guarantees impartially or effectively, and independent calls for equal treatment can draw state reprisals.

Women enjoy legal equality and are well represented in most professions, though their labor force participation rate lags well behind that of men, suggesting persistent economic disparities and cultural double standards. According to the International Labour Organization (ILO), male labor force participation stood at 66.3 percent in 2019, while female labor force participation stood at 41 percent.

While racial discrimination has long been outlawed, Cubans of African descent have reported widespread discrimination and profiling by police. Many lack access to the dollar economy and receive fewer remittances from abroad than white Cubans.

Discrimination based on sexual orientation is illegal in areas such as employment and housing. Mariela Castro Espín, Raúl Castro's daughter and director of the National Center for Sex Education (CENESEX)—which seeks to control and direct LGBT+ advocacy—has advocated on behalf of LGBT+ people. However, the advocacy efforts of independent LGBT+ groups and activists are either ignored or suppressed.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 6 / 16G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 1 / 4

Freedom of movement and the right to change one's residence and place of employment are restricted. Cubans still face extremely high passport fees, and Cuban doctors, diplomats, and athletes who "defect" abroad are prohibited from visiting for eight years. Some dissidents and journalists are barred from foreign travel, despite a 2013 migration law that rescinded the exit-visa requirement. The number of these individuals, known as regulados, rose sharply during 2020, with estimates exceeding 200 that year.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 1 / 4

The 2019 constitution recognized private property as one form of ownership, though opportunities to obtain property and operate private enterprises remain restricted. In July 2020, in an effort to respond to the economic effects of its COVID-19 measures, the government announced plans for a series of economic reforms, including the legalization of small and medium-sized enterprises. In June 2021, the government announced that it would allow the formation of small and medium-sized enterprises but would limit their activities to sectors that are not deemed strategic. Restrictions on self-employed workers remained under the government's updated private-enterprise policy, however.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 3 / 4

Individuals enjoy broad freedom in their interpersonal, romantic, and sexual relationships. While divorce is common, men and women have equal rights to marital goods and child custody. The 2019 constitution does not contain language that defines marriage as a union between a man and a woman. The draft family code published in September 2021 would allow same-sex couples to marry but will require legislative approval and approval via a referendum before it enters force.

Abortion is legal in Cuba.

The country lacks specific legislation to address domestic violence, and police are reportedly unresponsive to complaints of such abuse. In January 2021, Granma, a PCC mouthpiece, reported that the draft family code would more explicitly address domestic violence.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 1 / 4

Average official salaries remain extremely low. Cubans employed by foreign firms are often much better remunerated than their fellow citizens, even though most are contracted through a state employment agency that siphons off the bulk of their wages and uses political criteria in screening applicants.

The national currency's historical weakness encouraged an exodus of trained personnel into the private and tourism sectors, where the CUC—pegged to the US dollar—was used. The CUC was retired from use in January 2021 and was fully phased out by June, leaving the CUP as the country's only domestically backed legal tender. Cubans using the CUP faced inflation as the year progressed, as the currency fell in value against the US dollar on the black market.

Cyprus

Population: 1,200,000

Capital: Nicosia

Freedom Status: Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Note: The numerical scores and status listed here do not reflect conditions in Northern Cyprus, which is examined in a separate report. Freedom in the World reports assess the level of political rights and civil liberties in a given geographical area, regardless of whether they are affected by the state, nonstate actors, or foreign powers. Disputed territories are sometimes assessed separately if they meet certain criteria, including boundaries that are sufficiently stable to allow year-on-year comparisons. For more information, see the report methodology and FAQ.

Overview: The Republic of Cyprus is a democracy that has de jure sovereignty over the entire island. In practice, however, the government controls only the southern, largely Greek-speaking part of the island, as the northern area is ruled by the self-declared Turkish Republic of Northern Cyprus (TRNC), recognized only by Turkey. Political rights and civil liberties are generally respected in the Republic of Cyprus. Ongoing concerns include corruption, societal discrimination against minority groups, and weaknesses in the asylum system.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- Legislative elections were held in May, but the results left the composition of the parliament largely unchanged, with the governing center-right Democratic Rally (DISY) garnering the most votes and the left-wing Progressive Party of Working People (AKEL) placing second. However, the far-right National Popular Front (ELAM) doubled its representation from two seats to four, and the liberal centrist Democratic Alignment (DIPA) won representation for the first time.
- In June, Annita Demetriou of DISY became the first woman to win election as speaker of the Cypriot parliament.
- Protesters who were opposed to the government's COVID-19 vaccine requirements and other public health measures attacked the television station Sigma TV in July, breaking windows and setting fire to cars outside the building. The government condemned the attack, and several suspects were arrested.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 38 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 12 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The president is elected by popular vote for five-year terms. The current president, Nicos Anastasiades of DISY, won a second term with 56 percent of the vote in a 2018 run-off against Stavros Malas, who was backed by AKEL. The two had outpolled seven other candidates in the first round. International observers found that the overall election process adhered to democratic principles.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The unicameral House of Representatives has 80 seats filled through proportional representation in six multimember electoral districts, with members serving five-year terms. The Turkish Cypriot community has 24 reserved seats, which have been left unfilled since Turkish Cypriot representatives withdrew from the chamber in 1964.

In the May 2021 legislative elections, which were held in accordance with international standards, DISY led the voting with 17 seats, down one from 2016, followed by AKEL with 15, also a one-seat decline. The centrist Democratic Party (DIKO) received nine seats, the far-right ELAM received four, the Movement for Social Democracy–Citizens' Alliance (EDEK-SYPOL) also took four seats, and the Green Party (KOSP) secured three seats. DIPA won parliamentary representation for the first time, receiving four seats.

The elections took place while Cyprus was in a nationwide partial lockdown following an increase in COVID-19 cases. Restrictions were imposed on movement and assembly, limiting in-person campaign activities, but the rules were widely seen as legitimate public health measures.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 4 / 4

Electoral laws are generally fair. In March and April 2021, lawmakers adopted legislation designed to accommodate voters who were unable to appear at ordinary polling places due to the COVID-19 pandemic. In their report on the 2021 legislative elections, election monitors from the Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE) noted confidence in the professionalism and impartiality of the civil servants responsible for election administration. They also recommended several improvements, including legal provisions for the presence of foreign and citizen observers, caps on parties' campaign spending, and earlier reporting requirements for such spending.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 15 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 4 / 4

A wide array of parties compete in the political system. Cyprus's two main parties, DISY on the right and AKEL on the left, usually split the largest share of the vote, but neither has dominated politics, and other parties are often able to play significant roles. Both DISY and AKEL lost seats in the 2021 parliamentary elections, and despite an increase in the vote threshold for representation ahead of the 2016 voting, from 1.8 percent to 3.6 percent, a new party, DIPA, was able to enter the parliament in 2021.

Cyprus has experienced regular democratic transfers of power between rival parties in recent decades, and multiple opposition parties are able to gain representation in the legislature.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 4 / 4

People are generally able to express their political choices without undue interference from outside actors.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 3 / 4

Three recognized Christian minority groups—the Armenians, the Latins, and the Maronites—each have one nonvoting representative in the parliament. Members of these communities vote in special elections for their representatives, as well as in the general elections. The 24 seats reserved for the Turkish Cypriot population remain unfilled. However, in the 2019 European Parliament (EP) elections, Niyazi Kızılyürek of AKEL became the first Turkish Cypriot to be elected to the EP or to win office in the Republic of Cyprus since 1964.

Women in Cyprus have equal political rights, but they are traditionally underrepresented in political parties. No parliamentary party is led by a woman, and parties have failed to meet internal quotas mandating that 30 to 35 percent of their candidates be women. Only eight women were elected to the parliament in 2021, a decline from the 2016 results. Sexism and patriarchal attitudes discourage women from playing a more active role in politics. Despite these realities, in June 2021 Annita Demetriou of DISY became the first woman to be elected as speaker of the Cypriot parliament.

The interests of the LGBT+ community, which still faces significant discrimination from some sectors of society, are not always well represented in the political system.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 11 / 12C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 4 / 4

The freely elected government is able to make and implement policy without improper interference from unelected entities.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 3 / 4

Cyprus has strong anticorruption laws that are, for the most part, adequately enforced. However, there have been a number of high-profile corruption scandals in recent years, and critics of the government's record have raised concerns about early releases and pardons of individuals convicted on corruption charges.

An August 2020 investigative report from Al-Jazeera on Cyprus's citizenship-by-investment program revealed that at least 30 of the roughly 1,400 wealthy applicants who received European Union (EU) citizenship by investing €2 million ($2.4 million) in Cyprus had criminal convictions or pending charges; another 40 were identified as "politically exposed persons," meaning they held senior positions in governments or state-owned enterprises. This led some analysts to conclude that members of the Cypriot government may have knowingly facilitated the problematic applications in violation of the law. The government terminated the citizenship-by-investment program in November 2020 and stopped receiving new applications, but it continued to process pending applications during 2021. In February 2021, partly in response to the controversy, Interior Minister Nicos Nouris introduced draft legislation that would impose stricter criteria for the naturalization of foreign citizens in general, including a threshold for duration of legal residency, a clean criminal record, and basic knowledge of the country's language and culture.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 4 / 4

In general, the government operates with openness and transparency. The country enacted a long-awaited freedom of information law in 2017, though civil society activists had argued that the bill's exemptions were too broad.

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 15 / 16D1. Are there free and independent media? 4 / 4

Freedom of speech is constitutionally guaranteed, and media freedom is generally respected. A vibrant independent press frequently holds the authorities to account. Numerous private outlets compete with public media, and there are no restrictions on access to online news sources.

In July 2021, a group of violent protesters attacked and vandalized the offices of the television station Sigma TV, breaking windows and setting fire to cars near the building. They were part of a larger demonstration of roughly 5,000 people who were expressing opposition to the government's measures to curb COVID-19 transmission and increase vaccination rates. Government officials denounced the violence, and a number of suspected perpetrators were arrested.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 4 / 4

Freedom of religion is guaranteed by the constitution and generally protected in practice. Nearly 90 percent of those living in government-controlled Cyprus are Orthodox Christians, and the Orthodox Church enjoys certain privileges, including religious instruction and some religious services in public schools. Non-Orthodox students may opt out of such activities. The government also constitutionally recognizes and subsidizes non-Orthodox Christian and Muslim religious institutions, and it facilitates crossings at the UN buffer zone between north and south for the purpose of worship at religious sites. Muslim groups have occasionally faced obstacles in the operation of their religious sites or discrimination by the general public. Unrecognized religious groups can receive tax exemptions by registering as nonprofit organizations.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 3 / 4

Academic freedom is respected in Cyprus. However, state schools use textbooks containing negative language about Turkish Cypriots and Turkey, and there is some political pressure regarding schools' treatment of sensitive historical and unification-related issues. In September 2021, the Education Ministry ordered the withdrawal of an English-language textbook that made positive references to Mustafa Kemal Atatürk, the founder of the Republic of Turkey.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 4 / 4

People are generally free to engage in political and other sensitive discussions without fear of retribution or surveillance.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 11 / 12 (-1)E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

Freedom of assembly is constitutionally guaranteed and generally respected in practice.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 3 / 4 (-1)

NGOs are generally free to operate without government interference. However, in June 2020, the Supreme Court ordered Action for Equality, Support, Antiracism (KISA) to pay a €10,000 ($12,000) fine for defamation over a document that criticized two government appointees. In August of that year, the parliament amended the law on associations, empowering the Ministry of Interior to swiftly deregister NGOs that it deems inactive or noncompliant with the law's filing requirements. The ministry then deregistered KISA, which was known for its advocacy on behalf of migrants and asylum seekers, in December 2020, on the grounds that it failed to file with the Registrar of Associations within the required deadline to show that its constitution was compatible with the law. The necessary information was submitted after the deadline, but in February 2021 the ministry ordered banks to freeze the organization's assets, and in June the Administrative Court rejected KISA's appeal of the deregistration. An appeal to the Supreme Court was pending at year's end.

Score Change: The score declined from 4 to 3 due to a pattern of government pressure on an antiracism NGO that threatened the group's ability to continue operating.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 4 / 4

Workers have the right to strike, form independent trade unions, and engage in collective bargaining. The law provides remedies for antiunion discrimination, though enforcement is uneven.

F. RULE OF LAW: 15 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 4 / 4

The judiciary is independent in practice. Supreme Court judges are appointed by the president on the recommendation of the court's existing members, and lower court judges are appointed by Supreme Court judges in their capacity as the Supreme Council of Judicature.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 4 / 4

The justice system generally upholds due process standards. Law enforcement agencies largely observe safeguards against arbitrary arrest and detention, and criminal defendants have access to counsel and fair trial procedures.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 4 / 4

Residents of Cyprus are free from major threats to physical security, though human rights monitors have noted cases of police brutality. Overcrowding and other problematic conditions have been reported at prisons and migrant detention centers.

In an attempt to block Cyprus's efforts to explore for offshore oil and gas, the Turkish government has threatened to use force against drilling vessels. Ankara argues that the maritime areas in question are under the jurisdiction of either Turkey or the TRNC, leading to a number of tense confrontations at sea in recent years.

Despite government efforts to combat prejudice and inequality, members of non-Greek Cypriot minority groups, including migrants and asylum seekers, face discrimination and occasional violence.

A total of 13,260 first-time asylum applications were filed in Cyprus during 2021, up sharply from the roughly 7,000 submitted in 2020. Most asylum seekers arrive by land through the TRNC, prompting allegations from the Cypriot government that Ankara is encouraging irregular migration. Cypriot authorities have denied reports that they engage in unlawful maritime pushbacks to prevent arrivals by sea. The Cypriot Asylum Service estimated that there were nearly 17,000 asylum applications pending at the end of 2021, though this was a slight reduction from the previous year. A specialized administrative court began operating in 2019 to handle appeals. While many newcomers are quickly released from overburdened reception centers, they often lack access to other housing. In 2021, the government simplified procedures for the hiring of asylum seekers, though they were permitted to work only in certain sectors and categories of employment.

Overcrowding and other poor conditions at the Pournara reception center have been exacerbated in recent years by COVID-19 and the rise in new arrivals, prompting periodic protests by the residents. The center, built in 2014 as an emergency reception facility for up to 400 people, was later expanded to accommodate 1,000. By December 2021 it reportedly hosted more than 2,500 people.

Gender discrimination in the workplace remains a problem, including with respect to hiring practices, salaries, and sexual harassment; laws against it have not been adequately enforced.

Antidiscrimination laws generally prohibit bias based on sexual orientation, and there are legal protections for transgender people on some issues as well. For example, laws barring incitement to hatred apply to both sexual orientation and gender identity. However, the LGBT+ community continues to face societal discrimination in practice.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 14 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 3 / 4

There are few impediments to freedom of movement within the government-controlled area of the Republic of Cyprus. The UN buffer zone dividing the island remains in place, but the number of border crossings between north and south has increased over the last decade. In June 2021, Cypriot authorities reopened checkpoints that had been closed for months in response to the COVID-19 pandemic.

In August, the Cypriot government decided to rescind the passports of senior TRNC officials, arguing that the Turkish Cypriot leaders had subverted the country's integrity when they announced plans to reopen parts of the resort town of Varosha, a key point of contention in talks on peace and unification.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 4 / 4

Property rights are generally respected in Cyprus. A 1991 law stipulates that property left by Turkish Cypriots after 1974, when a Turkish invasion divided the island, is administered by the state. Under the law in the north, Greek Cypriots can appeal to the Immovable Property Commission (IMP), which in 2010 was recognized by the European Court of Human Rights as a responsible authority for the resolution of property disputes. However, its work has been seriously impaired in recent years by a lack of funding from the TRNC and Ankara.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 4 / 4

Personal social freedoms are largely unrestricted. Same-sex civil unions are allowed under a 2015 law, which did not include adoption rights for same-sex couples. Since 2017, the government has been considering legislation that would establish a procedure to correct one's legal gender. President Anastasiades announced in June 2021 that he would establish a committee to review the draft bill. Domestic violence remains a problem despite official efforts to prevent and punish it. Government-funded shelters are open to survivors of domestic abuse.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 3 / 4

The legal framework generally protects workers against exploitative conditions of employment, and the government has made genuine progress in combating human trafficking. However, persistent problems include insufficient resources for labor inspectors and illegally low pay for undocumented migrant workers. Migrant workers and asylum seekers remain vulnerable to sexual exploitation and forced labor.

Czech Republic

Population: 10,700,000

Capital: Prague

Freedom Status: Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: The Czech Republic is a parliamentary democracy in which political rights and civil liberties are generally respected. However, in recent years, the country has experienced several corruption scandals and political disputes that have hampered normal legislative activity. Illiberal rhetoric and the influence of powerful business entities in the political arena are increasingly visible.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- Legislative elections held in October were generally deemed free and fair, and resulted in the formation of a coalition government comprising two electoral alliances—the Together coalition (SPOLU) and the Pirates-Mayors coalition. The new government is headed by SPOLU leader Petr Fiala, who was sworn in as prime minister in November.
- President Miloš Zeman was hospitalized with a serious illness the day after the October elections, preventing him from appointing the new government for over a month. The public was given little information about the president's condition, leading to speculation that Zeman had become unable to execute his duties; the president later recovered and denied the allegations.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 36 / 40A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 12 / 12*A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The president is the head of state but holds limited powers and is directly elected to up to two five-year terms. The January 2018 presidential election was considered credible. President Miloš Zeman of the Party of Civic Rights was reelected, defeating his opponent, Jiří Drahoš, in the second round of voting.

The prime minister is the head of government and holds most executive power. In November 2021, Petr Fiala of the Civic Democratic Party (ODS) was sworn in as prime minister following free and fair legislative elections the previous month. Fiala leads a coalition government comprising two pro-European Union (EU) electoral alliances—SPOLU and the Pirates-Mayors coalition—that agreed to govern together in order to oust the former prime minister, controversial billionaire Andrej Babiš of the Action of Dissatisfied Citizens (ANO) party.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The 200 members of the Chamber of Deputies, the lower house of Parliament, are elected to four-year terms by proportional representation. The Senate, the upper chamber, which holds limited legislative power, has 81 members elected for six-year terms, with one-third up for election every two years.

The October 2021 legislative elections were held in accordance with international standards and saw a voter turnout of 65.4 percent. The ANO won a plurality of 72 seats in the Chamber of Deputies, while SPOLU—comprising the ODS, the Christian Democratic Union-Czechoslovak People's Party (KDU-ČSL), and Tradition, Responsibility, Prosperity 09 (TOP 09)—came in second with 71 seats. A coalition of the liberal Czech Pirate Party and centrist Mayors and Independents (STAN) took 37 seats, and the populist, anti-immigration Freedom and Direct Democracy (SPD) party won 20 seats.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 4 / 4

The electoral framework is robust and generally well implemented by the State Election Commission. However, the body does not always operate with transparency. In 2021, the Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE) expressed disappointment that most of its previous recommendations have gone unaddressed.

In February 2021, a Constitutional Court ruling amended the electoral law to remove provisions that unduly advantaged larger parties; changes included reducing the vote threshold for coalitions entering Parliament. Parliament passed the amendments in April, and President Zeman signed the changes into law in May. The reforms were broadly accepted by stakeholders, and the October elections, which were administered according to the reformed electoral law, were deemed well organized by international election observers.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 15 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 4 / 4

Political parties are free to form and operate.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 4 / 4

Power rotates between parties regularly. The opposition holds a large majority in the Senate. Two new opposition alliances were formed in the runup to the October 2021 legislative elections: the liberal Pirates-Mayors coalition, comprising the Pirate Party and STAN; and the center-right SPOLU, composed of the ODS, the KDU-ČSL, and TOP-09. Together, the blocs won a majority of seats in the 2021 elections, moving the ANO to the opposition. Neither the Czech Social Democratic Party (ČSSD) nor the Communist Party of Bohemia and Moravia (KSČM) occupy any seats in the Chamber of Deputies following the 2021 elections, marking the first time either party has lost parliamentary representation since 1990.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 4 / 4

The influence of politically connected media outlets has been a growing concern since a significant controversy arose in 2017 involving the daily newspaper MF Dnes, which is among the assets then prime minister Babiš placed in a trust to comply with 2016 conflict-of-interest legislation. Critics have accused him of using MF Dnes and another newspaper his trust owns, Lidové noviny, to advance his political and business interests. In 2019, Petr Kellner, then the country's wealthiest man, acquired the company that operates one of the most influential Czech television channels, TV Nova. Reports suggest Kellner helped mobilize a network of experts and journalists to improve China's image in the country, which he refuted.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 3 / 4

By law, all citizens have full political rights and electoral opportunities. However, Roma lack meaningful political representation. After the 2021 legislative elections, women hold 50 of the 200 seats in the Chamber of Deputies—the most in the Chamber's history—and 12 of the 81 seats in the Senate. However, women remain underrepresented in politics and public bodies generally.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 9 / 12C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 4 / 4

Elected officials are duly installed and generally able to craft and implement policy. Political polarization and controversies surrounding former prime minister Babiš contributed to long-running disputes in the Parliament, and conflicts between Babiš and President Zeman also deepened the nation's political instability.

In 2020, president of the Senate Miloš Vystrčil visited Taiwan despite the disapproval of both the coalition government and the president. The visit was met with pressure and threats from the Chinese government. In response, President Zeman announced that he would not include Vystrčil in foreign policy briefings. In June 2021, the Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, Defense and Security sought to impeach Zeman, declaring him "unfit for office," due in part to this incident; the impeachment bid was unsuccessful.

Concerns about Zeman's fitness for office escalated in October. The day after the legislative elections, the president—who is tasked with appointing the new government—became ill and was hospitalized, leaving him unable to participate in postelection negotiations for several weeks. The public was given little information about the president's condition, and officials issued misleading statements about his health, leading to concern that Zeman had become unable to execute his duties. Though the president later denied such allegations, the formation of a new government was delayed due to Zeman's illness, and observers continued to question whether the president had been unduly influenced by his inner circle during his hospitalization.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 2 / 4

Corruption remains a problem in Czech politics, but institutions have generally been responsive to corruption allegations and scandals. In 2017, Czech police and the European Anti-Fraud Office began an investigation into then prime minister Babiš following allegations of improprieties, known as the Stork's Nest resort fraud scandal, regarding the disbursement of EU subsidy funds to one of his firms, Agrofert, over which Babiš still had de facto ownership. Investigations into the Stork's Nest affair continued during 2021, and in August, the European Commission threatened to suspend payments of EU subsidies to the Czech Republic over suspected conflicts of interest in Babiš's business dealings.

Another scandal involving Babiš emerged a week before the October 2021 elections, when the Pandora Papers, an investigation by the International Consortium of Investigative Journalists (ICIJ) that exposed corruption in the international financial system, revealed that Babiš had used offshore companies to secretly purchase a $22 million French chateau in 2009. Tax experts have speculated that the complicated financial arrangements underlying the transaction were designed to hide ownership of the property or the source of the funds used to make the purchase.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 3 / 4

The government often fails to proactively publish information about procurement processes, public officials' salaries, and public spending. Members of the public must request a time-sensitive password to view asset declarations online. In 2018, new legislation came into force requiring that the "ultimate beneficial owners" of companies and trust funds be disclosed in a register. Although the register is not available to the public, law enforcement agencies, the courts, and several other entities can access it.

During 2020 and 2021, government officials repeatedly issued inaccurate or misleading information about the country's response to the coronavirus pandemic, including incorrectly announcing the number of COVID-19 testing sites opened by the government in March 2020. Government reports later issued corrections for such errors.

In October 2020, the Interior Ministry proposed a legislative amendment that would allow officials to withhold information pertaining to crisis situations that they believe, if made public, would endanger the management of that crisis. Critics argued that this restriction of oversight would give authorities an excuse to not share sensitive information with the public. The bill remained awaiting approval in the parliament at the end of 2021.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 55 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 14 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 3 / 4

The media operate relatively freely, and the government does not place undue restrictions on content. However, prominent politicians have contributed to a hostile environment for journalists in recent years, including both Zeman and Babiš, who have made inflammatory remarks about the press. Media outlets critical of the government are sometimes denied accreditation, and journalists from these outlets are frequently prevented from attending government press conferences. In September 2021, several journalists were excluded from a joint press conference held by Babiš and Hungarian prime minister Viktor Orbán, drawing criticism from a number of international and domestic media rights organizations.

The independence of the country's public broadcaster, Czech Television (ČT), came under threat in March 2021, when then prime minister Babiš attempted to appoint four ANO-affiliated members to the ČT's board; the opposition blocked the appointments in the parliament.

Legislation protects private ownership of media outlets, but concerns remain about the extent to which the media is controlled by wealthy business figures and its potential impact on journalists' ability to investigate commercial interests. Although former prime minister Babiš placed his significant media holdings in a trust while in office, the trust was controlled in part by his close associates. Critics have accused both of his newspapers of biased coverage, claiming that they are being used as tools to advance Babiš's political interests. In 2020, another Czech billionaire, the late Petr Kellner, bought Central European Media Enterprises (CME), which owns more than 30 television channels broadcasting to five countries. Although Kellner denied any political motives, his acquisition of CME raised questions about his influence on public discourse. Kellner's family took over the management of CME after his sudden death in March 2021.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 3 / 4

The government generally upholds freedom of religion. Tax benefits and financial support are provided to registered religious groups. The state has initiated a process to return land confiscated from churches by the former communist regime, which will take place over the next 30 years.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

Academic freedom is respected. Ceremonial presidential approval is required for academic positions.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 4 / 4

People are generally able to express controversial or political opinions without fear of surveillance or retribution.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 12 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

Freedom of assembly is upheld in practice, and demonstrations take place frequently and without incident. Protests took place peacefully and without undue interference from the authorities during 2021.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 4 / 4

Tens of thousands of registered nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) operate in the country, generally without interference from the government or security forces. However, the environment for civil society has grown increasingly antagonistic as the government and its allies have harshly criticized some outspoken NGOs.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 4 / 4

Trade unions and professional associations function freely, though they are weak in practice. Workers have the right to strike, though this right is limited for essential public employees, such as hospital workers and air traffic controllers.

F. RULE OF LAW: 14 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 3 / 4

The judiciary is largely independent, though its complexity and multilayered composition have led to slow delivery of judgments. The 2019 appointment of Marie Benešová as Justice Minister has raised concerns over the independence of the judiciary. Benešová has openly supported Babiš since her appointment, publicly downplaying his involvement in the so-called Stork's Nest subsidy fraud scandal and, in October 2021, claiming that information about Babiš contained in the Pandora Papers investigation was part of a campaign against both the then prime minister and the ANO. Additionally, after resigning in May 2021, former attorney general Pavel Zeman claimed that he had stepped down due to political pressure from Benešová; she denied the allegations.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 4 / 4

The rule of law generally prevails in civil and criminal matters. Despite corruption and political pressure within law enforcement agencies, the office of the public prosecutor has become more independent in recent years. However, the recent investigation of former prime minister Babiš and his nomination for Justice Minister, Marie Benešová, showed that political interests may interfere with due process.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 4 / 4

The Czech Republic is free from war and insurgencies. However, prisons are overcrowded and at times unsanitary. In June 2021, police intervened in a fight involving Stanislav Tomáš, a Romany man, pinning him to the ground while kneeling on his back; Tomáš later died in an ambulance. A wave of protests followed Tomáš's death, prompting calls for an investigation into police brutality against Roma people. Police defended their actions and denied any responsibility for Tomáš's death, and a court-ordered autopsy found that Tomáš had died from a methamphetamine overdose. In December, the Deputy Public Defender of Rights announced that she had started an investigation into the incident.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 3 / 4

The 2009 Antidiscrimination Act provides for equal treatment regardless of sex, race, age, disability, belief, or sexual orientation. However, high-level public officials have made insensitive comments that some critics have called discriminatory. Roma face discrimination in the job market and significantly poor housing conditions than non-Roma, as well as occasional threats and violence from right-wing groups. Many Roma children attend ethnically segregated schools. The COVID-19 pandemic deepened inequality particularly for low-income families with more than one child and Roma students, as classes were moved online and required stable internet connection and often multiple computers per household.

Women are underrepresented at the highest levels of business. According to data from the European Commission, the gender pay gap in the Czech Republic is one of the largest in the EU.

Anti-Muslim attitudes have increased in recent years amid the country's legal battle with the EU about accepting refugee quotas. The populist and anti-immigration SPD continued to spread Islamophobic rhetoric characterizing Islam as "incompatible with freedom and democracy." These positions are episodically approved by some of the highest representatives of state.

Asylum seekers are routinely detained, and conditions in detention centers are generally poor. Only about 11 percent of applicants were granted asylum in 2021.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 15 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

Individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education. During 2020–21, the government periodically imposed COVID-19-related movement restrictions, though the measures were in line with public health guidance.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 4 / 4

The rights to own property and operate private businesses are established in the law and upheld in practice.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 4 / 4

Authorities generally do not restrict social freedoms, though same-sex marriages are not legally recognized. While gender discrimination is legally prohibited, sexual harassment in the workplace appears to be fairly common.

Parliament has yet to ratify the Council of Europe's Istanbul Convention on preventing and combating violence against women. Reports show that only a small number of perpetrators of gender-based violence face criminal charges.

At the beginning of the coronavirus pandemic in 2020, organizations supporting victims of gender-based violence reported an increase in calls received. Due to COVID-19-related movement restrictions, victims were often forced to stay in the same household as their abusers.

In September 2019, the government cut funding for NGOs providing support for survivors of gender-based and domestic violence by 70 percent. This has severely limited counseling services and legal support for those who have experienced gender-based violence.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 3 / 4

Human trafficking remains a problem as organized criminal groups use the country as a source, transit, and destination point; women and children are particularly vulnerable to being trafficked for the purpose of sexual exploitation. The government has made serious efforts to fund protective services and other resources for survivors and to prosecute perpetrators.

Denmark

Population: 5,800,000

Capital: Copenhagen

Freedom Status: Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Denmark is a robust democracy with regular free and fair elections. Citizens enjoy full political rights, the government protects free expression and association, and the judiciary functions independently. However, Denmark has struggled to uphold fundamental freedoms for immigrants and other newcomers.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- Parliament rejected a petition requesting amendments to Denmark's controversial "antighetto" initiatives in May. The initiatives, which seek to shift the demographics of areas identified as having high unemployment and crime rates, have been criticized as discriminatory by numerous human rights bodies, including the Office of the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights (OHCHR).

- In September, former immigration minister Inger Støjberg was found guilty of violating the Ministerial Responsibility Act in 2016, when she illegally ordered the separation of several couples seeking asylum in Denmark, and sentenced to two months in prison. She was voted out of Parliament by a majority of legislators in December.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 40 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 12 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The constitution retains a monarch, currently Queen Margrethe II, with mostly ceremonial duties. The monarch chooses the prime minister, usually the leader of the largest party or government coalition. Mette Frederiksen of the Social Democratic Party (SDP) was appointed by Queen Margrethe in June 2019, after that party emerged as Parliament's largest in the election held that month.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The 179 members of Denmark's unicameral Parliament (Folketinget) are elected to four-year terms through a system of modified proportional representation.

Since the June 2019 elections, Frederiksen has headed an SDP-led government with the support of the Red-Green Alliance, the Socialist People's Party (SF), and the Social Liberal Party (SLP). The election was considered free and fair, and the results were accepted by stakeholders and the public.

Local elections held in November 2021 were competitive and well-administered.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 4 / 4

Robust electoral laws are upheld impartially by the various bodies tasked with implementation.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 16 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 4 / 4

Numerous political parties compete freely.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 4 / 4

The Danish political system is open to the rise of opposition parties through elections.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 4 / 4

Voters and political figures are generally free from undue influences by actors who are not democratically accountable.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 4 / 4

The electoral laws guarantee universal suffrage for citizens, as well as representation in regional and municipal elections for permanent residents. Refugees and other immigrants may vote in municipal and regional but not general elections, after having obtained permanent residence at least three years before an election date. Women, LGBT+ people, persons living with disabilities, and members of ethnic and religious minority groups are represented in prominent positions.

The territories of Greenland and the Faroe Islands each have two representatives in Parliament. They also have their own elected institutions, which have power over almost all areas of governance, except foreign and financial policy.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 12 / 12C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 4 / 4

Denmark's freely elected government is able to craft and implement policy. Danish governments most often control a minority of seats in Parliament, ruling with the aid of one or more supporting parties. Since 1909, no single party has held a majority of seats, helping to create a tradition of compromise.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 4 / 4

Anticorruption laws and bodies are generally effective, and corruption is not considered an urgent problem in Denmark. The government upholds a zero-tolerance policy for corruption and is subject to independent audits; those found in violation of anticorruption regulations face criminal prosecution.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 4 / 4

Government operations are generally transparent. The Public Access to Information Act recognizes the right to request government information, though with some exceptions, such as information concerning national security and foreign policy.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 57 / 60D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 16 / 16*D1. Are there free and independent media? 4 / 4

Domestic media reflect a wide variety of political opinions and are frequently critical of the government.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 4 / 4

Freedom of worship is legally protected. However, the Evangelical Lutheran Church is subsidized by the government as the official state religion. The faith is taught in public schools, though students may withdraw from religious classes with parental consent.

In 2018, a general ban on the public wearing of face coverings, widely referred to as a "burqa ban" applicable to Muslim women, took effect. By July 2020, 60 people had been charged with violating the ban, out of which only some cases addressed specifically the wearing of burqas. Fines for defying the ban range from $150 to $300.

In 2018, Parliament adopted a law requiring mandatory participation in a ceremony for confirmation of newly granted Danish citizenship, with guidelines including a requirement for shaking hands. The provision was viewed as a means of requiring Muslims who refuse to touch someone of a different gender on religious grounds to adopt practices seen as “Danish.” In February 2020, one man rejected the handshake—not for religious reasons, but out of principle—and as a consequence was not granted citizenship. When COVID-19 struck Denmark in March 2020, all citizenship ceremonies were put on hold, but they were later resumed; as a temporary measure, the mandatory handshake introduced in 2018 was suspended and replaced with the signing of a statement. The government plans to reinstate the policy when public health guidance permits.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

Academic freedom is generally respected.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 4 / 4

Private discussion is vibrant and unrestricted.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 12 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

The constitution provides for freedom of assembly, which is upheld in practice. Restrictions were placed on assembly throughout 2020 and 2021 to limit the spread of COVID-19. Most restrictions were lifted in September 2021, but reintroduced in December in response to a spike in the number of coronavirus cases in Denmark.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 4 / 4

Nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) operate freely in Denmark, and frequently inform policy debates.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 4 / 4

Workers are free to organize and bargain collectively.

F. RULE OF LAW: 14 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 4 / 4

The judiciary is independent. Judges are formally appointed by the monarch but are recommended by the Justice Minister in consultation with the independent Judicial Appointments Council.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 3 / 4

Citizens enjoy full due-process rights. However, restrictions imposed especially on rejected asylum seekers remain in force. Individuals who were denied asylum in Denmark, but whom the government is for various reasons unable to deport, may be subject to administrative measures parallel to those imposed on people with criminal convictions. Many such individuals live in isolated centers with poor facilities where they are subject to travel restrictions and have no legal option to challenge their placement.

In 2019, the Youth Crime Board was established to deal with individuals between the ages of 10 and 17 who violate the law or are at risk of criminal behavior. Youths may be placed in secure institutions where conditions closely resemble those in the detention system. Professionals have criticized the mechanism for reinforcing criminal identity among youth, in addition to effectively lowering the age of criminal responsibility below the age of 15, as outlined by law. In a 2021 evaluation of the mechanism, the Justice Ministry assessed the program as generally effective, though recommended the Board work toward shortening case processing times.

In October 2019, Parliament adopted legislation that would allow the minister of immigration and integration to strip citizenship from individuals who fight abroad for extremist groups, namely the Islamic State (IS); the minister only has the power to do so for those holding dual citizenship. Further, children born to Danish parents in conflict zones are no longer granted Danish citizenship at birth, and the Danish foreign service may deny fighters in foreign conflicts consular assistance. As of the end of 2021, 11 individuals considered to be “foreign fighters” had been stripped of their Danish citizenship. Five of these “foreign fighters” have appealed the government’s decision; court proceedings in one such case began in November.

People in Denmark are generally free from violent crime and physical abuse by state authorities.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 3 / 4

Discrimination, including based on gender identity or sexual orientation, is prohibited by law.

Danish immigration laws have long been some of the harshest in Europe, and immigration laws and asylum policies were tightened in response to large numbers of refugees and asylum seekers entering Europe beginning in 2015. While Denmark recorded 21,000 asylum applications that year, the figure stood at just 2,095 in 2021. Denmark loosened some restrictions for refugees and asylum seekers in 2019.

In recent years, controversy has arisen over the disproportionate number of people with non-Danish ethnic ancestry in the justice system: though members of ethnic minority groups comprise less than 10 percent of the population, the percentage of incarcerated young men from “non-Western” backgrounds is up to four times that of their ethnic Danish counterparts, according to government statistics. This disparity has been partly attributed to a higher rate of policing in areas with a significant “non-Western” population. However, others have used these figures to promote the government’s “antighetto” initiatives, which seek to shift the demographics of areas identified as having high unemployment and crime rates, and a high percentage of foreign-born residents.

In 2018, the High Court convicted Mohamed Abdi—who had lived in Denmark for over 20 years after being brought there as a child—of illegally possessing a firearm, and ordered that he be permanently expelled from the country. In September 2021, the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR) found that the ruling ordering Abdi’s expulsion had violated the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR).

The Greenlandic Inuit community faces social marginalization in Denmark, though the government has implemented programs to address this issue.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 15 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

Freedom of movement is protected by law and generally respected by the government. However, in 2018, the previous government of Lars Løkke Rasmussen proposed an “antighetto” initiative, applicable to neighborhoods identified as having high unemployment and crime rates, and a high percentage of foreign-born residents. It aims to shift the areas’ demographics, institute day care requirements for foreign children that would integrate them into Danish society through language and culture lessons, and enact stricter punishments for crimes committed there. Legislation to demolish certain housing structures to meet demographic quotas passed that November, and the daycare provision was approved that December. Since the introduction of these initiatives, several public housing areas have found themselves on the “hard ghetto” list, a consequence of which will be that public housing in the area will have to be demolished or transformed into cooperative or privately owned housing. This would have a strongly detrimental effect on the freedom of residence of affected individuals, with a further discriminatory effect. By December 2020, more than 52,000 citizens had signed a motion to bring the “ghetto law” before Parliament, with a view to halting further implementation including demolitions and other significant measures; Parliament rejected the petition in May 2021. The government has also rejected calls from the OHCHR to eliminate or amend parts of the “antighetto” initiative, which the OHCHR has called discriminatory. As of the end of 2021, no actual demolitions have taken place.

Since 2015, Denmark has enacted measures that restrict the movement of people who seek to join, or have joined, extremist groups abroad—notably the IS. Some of the measures have been criticized for having a low evidentiary threshold or for lacking appropriate oversight mechanisms.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 4 / 4

Private business activity is free from undue influence by government officials or non-state actors.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 3 / 4

Refugees and other newcomers face lengthy waiting times for family reunification, including in cases involving small children, and restrictions on family reunification were tightened in the wake of the 2015 refugee crisis. The SDP, under pressure from partners in the Red Bloc, committed to loosening some restrictions in return for their support in forming the government in June 2019, and specifically committed to reviewing strict requirements for children seeking permanent residence in Denmark.

Restrictive amendments to the Epidemic Act were passed by Parliament in March 2020, during the early months of the COVID-19 pandemic. A measure authorizing forced vaccinations and other limitations of individual freedoms was reversed by the government later in the year, and in December 2020, a much-revised form of the bill ensuring transparency and democratic control was presented, with the support of most lawmakers and the health-care sector. The revised Epidemic Act came into force in March 2021, creating legal procedures for combatting “socially critical diseases.” The legislation is intended to ensure a transparent government response for future public health crises. All COVID-19-related restrictions were lifted in September after the government announced that the virus no longer posed a major health threat; however, some restrictions were reintroduced in December following a spike in case numbers.

In 1989, Denmark became the first country in the world to adopt same-sex civil unions, and in 2012, Parliament overwhelmingly passed same-sex marriage legislation enabling couples to wed in the Lutheran state church of their choosing. Priests are not obligated to officiate but, when requested to do so, must find a colleague who will.

In December 2020, lawmakers passed a measure that criminalized sex without explicit consent. Previously, proof of violence or serious threat had been required to bring rape charges.

In September 2021, former immigration minister Inger Støjberg was convicted of unlawfully separating several couples seeking asylum in Denmark in 2016—including couples with children and those with one partner below the age of 18—and was sentenced to two months in prison. A majority of legislators voted to remove Støjberg from Parliament in December.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 4 / 4

Public- and private-sector workers are generally free from exploitation by employers. However, migrants engaged in forced labor can be found in some sectors, including the agricultural and service industries. Women and children, also primarily migrants, can be found engaged in forced sex work. The government and NGOs work, frequently in conjunction, to identify and prevent human trafficking and to provide aid to survivors.

Djibouti

Population: 1,000,000

Capital: Djibouti

Freedom Status: Not Free

Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: Djibouti is a republic ruled by a powerful president, Ismail Omar Guelleh, who has been in office since 1999 and is not subject to term limits. While Djibouti technically has a multiparty political system, the ruling Union for a Presidential Majority (UMP) uses authoritarian means to maintain its dominant position. The opposition's ability to operate is severely constrained, and journalists and activists who air criticism of Guelleh or the UMP are regularly harassed or arrested.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- President Guelleh was elected to a fifth term in April with over 97 percent of the vote, according to the Interior Ministry. The main opposition parties boycotted the poll, claiming that the election administration would be neither free nor fair. The African Union (AU) observation mission reported the poll was run competently with no noted misconduct.
 - In August, intercommunal fighting broke out between people from the ethnic Afar minority group and people from the majority Issa group in Djibouti City. At least a dozen people were killed—mainly Afar individuals—several others were injured, and houses were set on fire. The Djiboutian Human Rights League (LDDH) alleged that security forces waged a “coordinated attack” against Afar civilians, claiming both plainclothes police and uniformed officers took part in the violence.
 - In November, Fouad Youssouf Ali, a former air force pilot who was arrested in 2020, was referred to a criminal court and convicted of attempting to incite a coup and of attempted theft of military property. The court sentenced him to 10 years' imprisonment with an additional fine of 300,000 Djiboutian francs ($1,700). Ali's 2020 arrest and alleged torture had sparked nationwide protests.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 5 / 40A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 2 / 12*A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

The president, who holds most executive power, serves five-year terms without term limits. President Guelleh was elected to a fifth term in April 2021, with 97 percent of the vote, according to the Interior Ministry. Of the nearly 215,000 citizens registered to vote, more than 80 percent cast ballots, according to the African Union (AU) observation mission. The AU monitors also reported that the polls were conducted competently, though the main opposition parties boycotted the contest, alleging that, should they participate, the election administration would be neither free nor fair. Guelleh faced only one challenger, political newcomer Zakaria Ismail Farah, who claimed that his party was barred from vote monitoring.

The 65 members of the unicameral National Assembly are directly elected for five-year terms. Constitutional changes in 2010 called for the creation of an upper house, which had yet to be established as of 2021.

Most of the opposition boycotted legislative elections held in 2018, citing the government's failure to honor a 2014 political agreement that provided for electoral reform. The 2018 polls were marked by irregularities, and the ruling UMP increased its majority to 57 of 65 seats. The opposition Union for Democracy and Justice–Djiboutian Democratic Party (UDJ-PDD) won seven seats, and the Center of Unified Democrats (CDU) took one.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 1 / 4

A core element of the 2014 political agreement—meant to end the opposition's boycott of the legislature following deeply flawed elections in 2013—was a pledge to reform the Independent National Electoral Commission (CENI), which the opposition has accused of bias. These reforms had not been carried out as of 2021. Other electoral provisions favor the dominant party, for example by awarding at least 80 percent of the seats in each multimember parliamentary district to the party that wins a majority in that district.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 3 / 16B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 1 / 4

While Djibouti technically has a multiparty political system, parties must register with the government to operate legally. The authorities have denied recognition to a number of opposition parties; members of such parties have been periodically harassed, arrested, and prosecuted, and their offices have been raided by police. The law requires the leaders of political parties to have clean criminal records, and the government has pursued spurious charges against opposition figures to disqualify them or their parties.

President Guelleh has been in power since 1999, when he succeeded his uncle, the only other president since independence in 1977. The 2013 elections marked the first time that the opposition had won any seats in the National Assembly. Opposition parties have traditionally been disadvantaged by Djibouti's electoral system, media controls, abuse of state resources to favor incumbents, and arrests and harassment of opposition leaders and supporters.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 1 / 4

The ruling party dominates the state apparatus and uses security forces and other administrative resources to marginalize, disrupt, and suppress independent political activity.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 1 / 4

The constitution prohibits political parties based on gender or on ethnic, religious, or regional identity. Minority groups, including the Afar, Yemeni Arabs, and non-Issa Somalis, are represented at all levels of the government, but the president's majority Issa group holds paramount positions in the ruling party, the civil service, and the security forces.

Women are underrepresented in leadership positions. A legal quota ensures that women hold at least 25 percent of the seats in the National Assembly, and the actual number is only slightly above that level. In practice, the authoritarian political system restricts the ability of women and members of ethnic and religious minorities to organize independently and advance their respective interests.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 0 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 0 / 4

The president, who is not freely elected, effectively controls policymaking and governance, and the UMP-dominated parliament does not serve as a meaningful check on executive power.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 0 / 4

Corruption is a serious problem that is enabled and sustained by the dominant position of President Guelleh and his ruling party in every aspect of public administration. All significant business deals reportedly go through the president himself.

State bodies tasked with combating corruption lack the resources and independence to function effectively. Prosecutions of senior officials are rare.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 0 / 4

The government operates in an opaque manner and resists attempts to shed light on its policymaking, budgetary, and procurement decisions. There is no law establishing the right to access public information. The government has made no effort to explain to citizens how it spends revenue collected from foreign powers that lease land for military bases in Djibouti.

There is also little transparency on President Guelleh's investment deals with the Chinese government and other foreign entities, which have provided Djibouti with loans, built critical infrastructure, and operated special economic zones. The agreements have resulted in a massive amount of public debt and spread discontent among local communities that were not consulted on the location or terms of foreign development projects.

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 6 / 16D1. Are there free and independent media? 0 / 4

Despite constitutional protections, freedom of expression is not upheld in practice, and journalists engage in self-censorship. Defamation and distribution of false information are criminal offenses. The National Communication Commission distributes licenses to media outlets; the National Security Service reportedly has a role in approving such licenses. The government owns the dominant newspaper, television station, and radio broadcaster, as well as printing presses.

According to Reporters Without Borders, domestic media content generally reflects government views. Journalists affiliated with outlets based abroad or small opposition publications are subject to harassment and arbitrary arrest. The websites of the overseas opposition radio station La Voix de Djibouti, run by exiles in Europe, and the Association for Respect for Human Rights in Djibouti (ARDHD) are sometimes blocked by the state-owned internet service provider.

In July 2020, police arrested journalist Charmarke Saïd Darar, a reporter working for La Voix de Djibouti, while covering protests over the detention and alleged torture of an air force pilot. Darar was held without access to a lawyer until his release nearly a month later, during which time police interrogated him, physically assaulted him, and deprived him of food and water.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 2 / 4

Islam is the state religion, and 94 percent of the population is Sunni Muslim. The Islamic Affairs Ministry oversees religious matters; under a 2013 law and 2014 decree, the ministry has direct authority over mosques and imams, who are civil service employees, and vets their Friday sermons. Registered non-Muslim religious groups operate freely, and unregistered groups are able to worship in private, though public proselytizing is illegal.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 2 / 4

Academic freedom is not always respected. Teachers have at times been detained for alleged affiliation with opposition groups. The state oversees the curriculums of the secular public school system and private Islamic schools.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 2 / 4

Open discussion of sensitive political issues is impeded by restrictive laws on defamation and other such offenses. The government reportedly monitors social media and conducts surveillance on perceived opponents. Individuals are subject to arrest for posting critical content about the government online.

In March 2020, air force lieutenant Fouad Youssouf Ali fled to Ethiopia and called for an armed uprising in a video on social media in which he accused a military official of corruption and clan-based discrimination. After Ethiopian authorities deported him back to Djibouti in April, the government arrested him on charges of treason, defamation of the armed forces, and incitement to hatred and rebellion. In June, he released a video from prison, alleging he had been tortured while detained. In November 2021, Ali was referred to a criminal court, where he was convicted of attempting to incite a coup and attempted theft of military property. The court sentenced him to 10 years' imprisonment with an additional fine of 300,000 Djiboutian francs ($1,700)—he had already been fined 2 million francs ($11,254), payable to the state.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 3 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 0 / 4

Freedom of assembly is protected under the constitution but not respected in practice. Permits are required for public gatherings. Police regularly use violence to disperse unauthorized protests and arrest participants. In June 2020, antigovernment protests were held for several days after the arrest and alleged torture of air force lieutenant Ali. Over 200 people were allegedly arrested.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 1 / 4

Local human rights groups that work on politically sensitive matters cannot operate freely, face difficulties in registering with the authorities, and are subject to government harassment. Organizations that focus on social and economic development, including women's rights groups, are generally tolerated by the government. Individual activists are regularly arrested for their work.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 2 / 4

While workers may legally join unions and strike, the union registration process is onerous and subject to government discretion, which the Labor Ministry has used to favor progovernment unions and deny registration to independent labor groups. The government has been known to intimidate labor leaders and obstruct union activities. Teachers' union activists have reported being dismissed, transferred, demoted, or denied access to wages.

F. RULE OF LAW: 4 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 0 / 4

The courts are not independent of the government and suffer from corruption. Supreme Court judges are appointed by the president, with the advice of a judicial council dominated by presidential and UMP nominees. The president and parliamentary majority also control appointments to the Constitutional Council.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 2 / 4

Security forces frequently make arrests without the required court approval, and lengthy pretrial detention is a problem, with detainees often waiting years to go to trial. Allegations of politically motivated prosecutions are common, and opposition groups consistently accuse the government of sanctioning arbitrary arrests and detentions. The government has used counterterrorism laws to target political opponents.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 1 / 4

Security forces regularly engage in physical abuse and torture during arrest and detention. Prison conditions are reportedly poor, with pretrial and convicted prisoners often held together due to overcrowding.

In August 2021, intercommunal fighting broke out between people from the ethnic Afar minority group and people from the majority Issa group in Djibouti City. At least a dozen people were killed—mainly Afar individuals—several others were injured, and houses were set on fire. The Djiboutian Human Rights League (LDDH) alleged that security forces waged a “coordinated attack” against Afar civilians, claiming both plainclothes police and uniformed officers took part in the violence.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 1 / 4

Though the law provides for equal treatment of all Djiboutian citizens, Somali Issas control the ruling party and dominate government positions, while members of minority ethnic groups and clans suffer from discrimination that contributes to their social and economic marginalization.

Women have fewer employment opportunities and are paid less than men for the same work. While the law requires at least 20 percent of upper-level public service positions be held by women, this rule has not been enforced.

Same-sex sexual activity is not specifically banned, but such conduct has been penalized under broader morality laws, and there are no laws in place to prevent discrimination against LGBT+ people. Matters of sexual orientation and gender identity are generally not discussed publicly.

As of the end of 2021, Djibouti hosted roughly 34,700 refugees and asylum seekers. Slow processing of asylum claims leaves many asylum seekers at risk of deportation. A 2017 law allows registered refugees to work without a permit and provides access to health care and education.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 6 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 2 / 4

The government has been accused of suspending the travel privileges of political opponents. Civilian movement is restricted in militarized border areas due to past activity by the Front for the Restoration of Unity and Democracy (FRUD-Armé), a rebel group, and tensions with Eritrea.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 2 / 4

Private property protections are weak, and court proceedings on business and property matters are affected by corruption and political influence.

Customary practices and personal status rules based on Sharia (Islamic law) place women at a disadvantage regarding inheritance and property ownership.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 1 / 4

Female genital mutilation (FGM) is illegal, but most women and girls have undergone the procedure. Domestic violence is rarely reported and prosecuted, and spousal rape is not specifically criminalized. The Sharia-based family code requires women to obtain a guardian’s consent to marry, among other discriminatory provisions surrounding marriage and divorce.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 1 / 4

Many residents have difficulty finding employment in the formal sector, as the president and his allies tightly control all large-scale economic activity, especially around the military bases leased by foreign powers. Legal safeguards against exploitative working conditions are poorly enforced; migrant workers and refugees are especially vulnerable to abuse.

A 2016 law on human trafficking includes strong penalties for perpetrators, but authorities have struggled to secure convictions and to effectively identify and assist victims.

Dominica

Population: 70,000

Capital: Roseau

Freedom Status: Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Dominica is a parliamentary democracy and has been governed by the Dominica Labor Party (DLP) since 2000. While the country is committed to democratic governance and civil liberties are generally upheld, several concerns persist; these include effective management of elections, judicial efficiency, and government corruption—notably relating to the country’s Citizenship by Investment (CBI) program.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- In March, the Caribbean Court of Justice (CCJ) ruled that respondents from the ruling DLP must respond to a summons over allegations that they improperly worked to influence voters during the 2014 electoral period. In May, 12 party members pleaded not guilty to the charges.
- In May, an appeals court dismissed a case brought by the opposition United Workers Party (UWP), which argued that the 2019 electoral results in 10 constituencies should be overturned due to fraud and bribery. In December, the CCJ agreed to consider the case and is expected to hear the UWP’s petition in 2022.
- The country’s first COVID-19 death was recorded in August. Some 6,718 cases and 47 deaths were reported to the World Health Organization (WHO) during the year.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 37 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 11 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The president, who is the ceremonial head of state, is nominated by the prime minister and opposition leader and elected by the House of Assembly for a five-year term. The prime minister is head of government and is appointed by the president.

The leader of the ruling DLP, Roosevelt Skerrit, retained his position as prime minister after his party won most of the parliamentary seats in the 2019 general elections. Despite the poll’s overall credibility, the campaign was marred by unrest linked to opposition concerns over the lack of electoral reform and a corruption scandal involving Skerrit. To ensure the elections passed without incident, the government requested that personnel from the Regional Security System of the Caribbean (RSSC)—an organization composed of several Eastern Caribbean states—be deployed to Dominica four days before the election.

In October 2018, the government reelected former security minister Charles Savarin as president. The UWP walked out of the confirmation session in protest of what they considered an irregular nominating process.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

Dominica's unicameral House of Assembly consists of 30 members who serve five-year terms; 21 members are directly elected, 5 senators are appointed by the prime minister, and 4 are appointed by the opposition leader. There are two ex officio members: the House speaker and the clerk of the House.

The DLP won 18 seats in the 2019 general elections, while the UWP captured 3. Turnout was historically low, with only 54 percent of eligible voters participating. The polls were monitored by the Caribbean Community (CARICOM), the Organization of American States (OAS), and the Commonwealth. They generally concluded that voters were able to cast their ballots without intimidation or fear and that the results reflected the popular will. However, the poll was marked by unrest and the deployment of RSSC personnel.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 3 / 4

The Electoral Commission manages and organizes the election process, and the electoral laws are generally fair. However, concerns persist. In the aftermath of the 2014 elections, the results of which were challenged by the UWP, the government was expected to support some reforms. These included updating voter rolls and issuing voter identification cards—which among other things would address concerns about voting by members of the Dominican diaspora. However, the government did not adopt any new measures.

After the 2019 polls, the OAS recommended a series of changes, such as issuing photo identification cards to voters, introducing an electronic voting system, undertaking a voter-list review, and introducing party and campaign-finance legislation. The Skeritt government later appointed jurist Dennis Byron to serve as a sole commissioner to produce electoral-reform recommendations; his report was incomplete as of the end of 2021.

In late December 2019, the opposition challenged the results in 10 constituencies, alleging they were affected by fraud and bribery. In May 2021, an appeals court dismissed the case, though the CCJ agreed to consider the case in December; the CCJ expects to hear their petition in February 2022.

A separate case relating to the 2014 election remains open. In March 2021, the CCJ ruled that respondents from the DLP must respond to a summons over allegations that they improperly “treated” voters. In May, 12 respondents pleaded not guilty. The allegations focus on two DLP-organized concerts held during the 2014 electoral period, which the complainants say were meant to improperly influence the polls’ outcome.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 16 / 16B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 4 / 4

Political parties are free to organize and operate. The effects of the country's first-past-the-post electoral system has entrenched two-party politics, and while there are several small political parties in Dominica, since 2005 only the DLP and UWP have won parliamentary seats.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 4 / 4

Opposition parties are unencumbered by formal restrictions and are generally free to operate. There has not been a change of party in government since 2000, but this has more to do with the weakness of the opposition than any unfairness in the electoral system.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 4 / 4

Voters and candidates are generally able to express their political choices without undue influence from actors that are not democratically accountable.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 4 / 4

All adult citizens may vote. Women are underrepresented in politics generally. Out of 42 candidates in the 2019 elections, only 13 were women, and 8 won seats—although this was an improvement from the 2014 elections.

The Indigenous Carib-Kalinago population participates in the political process, with members generally supporting one of the two major political parties. LGBT+ people face discrimination and are marginalized, impacting their ability to engage fully in political processes.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 10 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 4 / 4

The freely elected prime minister, cabinet, and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government.

In July 2021, government legislators limited the opposition's response to the budget to 30 minutes, prompting opposition legislators to leave the chamber. One opposition member was physically removed and saw his salary suspended until November.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 3 / 4

While the government generally implements anticorruption laws effectively, domestic and international observers have raised concerns over corruption within Dominica's Citizenship by Investment (CBI) program, which allows foreigners to gain citizenship through an economic investment in the country. In March 2021, the US State Department said in its International Narcotics Control Strategy Report that "Dominica accepts a large number of applicants and sometimes issues passports despite adverse information on applicants uncovered during the vetting process."

In 2017, Prime Minister Skerit announced an interim policy to tighten the issuance of diplomatic passports, following a controversy in which an Iranian businessman ensnared in a corruption scandal in Iran was found to be holding a Dominican diplomatic passport. In 2019, Al Jazeera published a story claiming that Dominican officials from both major parties, including Skerit, were willing to receive money in return for political appointments.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 3 / 4

The government of Dominica generally operates with openness and transparency, though there are concerns that the long-incumbent DLP has been less forthcoming in recent years with information on some programs, including CBI. Government officials are required to submit financial accounts, but these accounts are frequently incomplete. Access to information is not protected by law, but the government makes efforts to provide information on many topics, and posts information related to the budget online.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 56 / 60D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 15 / 16*D1. Are there free and independent media? 3 / 4

Freedom of expression is constitutionally guaranteed, and the press is generally free in practice. However, defamation remains a criminal offense punishable by imprisonment or fines. Defamation lawsuits and threats of lawsuits are commonly used by the Skerit government against members of the media, resulting in some self-censorship.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 4 / 4

Freedom of religion is protected under the constitution and other laws and is generally respected in practice.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

Academic freedom is generally respected.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 4 / 4

Individuals are generally free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 11 / 12E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 3 / 4

Freedom of assembly is guaranteed under the constitution, and the government has generally respected these rights. However, protests sometimes become violent, or give way to looting or acts of vandalism.

Some unrest took place at opposition protests in 2017, and Prime Minister Skerit characterized them as threats to state security. Later, several UWP members, including leader Lennox Linton, were charged with incitement and obstruction. The trials were still ongoing as of July 2021. Some UWP protests during the lead-up to the 2019 elections featured burning debris and confrontations between protesters and riot police, though there were no major injuries.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 4 / 4

Nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) and advocacy groups generally operate without interference.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 4 / 4

Workers have the right to organize, strike, and bargain collectively, and laws prohibit antiunion discrimination by employers. However, the country's definition of "essential" workers is broad, extending to those in the agricultural sector, and there are burdensome restrictions on the ability of these workers to strike.

F. RULE OF LAW: 15 / 16F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 4 / 4

An independent judiciary is provided for in the constitution, and judicial independence is generally respected. Courts are subordinate to the interisland Eastern Caribbean Supreme Court and the CCJ.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 4 / 4

The constitution provides for due process rights, and these are generally observed in practice. While the judicial system generally operates efficiently, staffing shortages remain a problem and can result in prolonged pretrial detention.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 4 / 4

People in Dominica generally enjoy freedom from illegitimate force.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 3 / 4

Women's rights are not fully protected. Laws on sexual harassment are weak. Cases of rape are underreported, with significant stigma attached to the crime and little support available for victims.

Same-sex sexual relations are illegal, though the relevant provisions of the Sexual Offences Act are not enforced, a position that has been made clear by Prime Minister Skerrett. In 2019, a gay man filed a claim against the colonial-era law.

Members of the small Indigenous population, the Carib-Kalinago, face discrimination and a variety of accompanying challenges, including high poverty levels and difficulties in obtaining loans from banks. Rastafarians have reported discrimination and profiling by police.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 15 / 16G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

Individuals in Dominica generally enjoy freedom of movement, though those outside the established Carib-Kalinago community must apply for special access to the Carib Reserve area, which is granted by the Carib Council. There are no restrictions on people's ability to change their place of employment or education.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 4 / 4

The government of Dominica supports both domestic and foreign investment. Property rights are generally safeguarded. However, women have more limited rights because traditionally property is deeded to the head of household, who is usually a man.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 3 / 4

Women and children have some limitations on their personal freedoms, including freedom from violence. There is little protection against domestic abuse, and both violence against women and child abuse remain widespread problems.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 4 / 4

Revisions to labor laws have strengthened worker protections in recent years, though violations of overtime laws in the tourism sector have occurred. The labor commissioner operates within the Justice Department and is underresourced. The government has made efforts to address poverty and unemployment, including in the wake of Hurricane Maria, which devastated the island in 2017. In September 2021, the government implemented minimum-wage increases.

In its 2020 Findings on the Worst Forms of Child Labor report, the most recent available, the US Labor Department found no evidence of child labor in Dominica but warned that the government made “no advancement” in preventing it. Carib-Kalinago children face barriers to education, which make them more vulnerable.

Dominican Republic

Population: 10,600,000

Capital: Santo Domingo

Freedom Status: Partly Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: The Dominican Republic holds regular elections that are relatively free, though recent years have been characterized by controversies around implementing a new electoral framework. Pervasive corruption undermines state institutions. Discrimination against Dominicans of Haitian descent and Haitian migrants, as well as against LGBT+ people, remain serious problems.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- The National Human Rights Commission and nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) reported that, as of October, police and security forces had committed at least 41 extrajudicial killings during the year. After police shot and killed a young couple in their car in April, President Abinader announced the creation of a special commission for police reform.
- Throughout the year, the Anti-Corruption Office (PEPCA) continued to investigate administrative corruption in former president Danilo Medina’s administration, opening several new investigations into the prior administration’s operations. By September, PEPCA had linked at least four current legislators to drug trafficking and money laundering networks and had suspended or removed nine officials from office.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 27 / 40 (+1)

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 9 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 3 / 4

The president is both head of state and chief of government and is elected to a four-year term. A 2015 constitutional amendment allowed presidents to run for a second term. In 2020, Luis Abinader of the Modern Revolutionary Party (PRM) was elected president over the Dominican Liberation Party (PLD) candidate Gonzalo Castillo, ending the PLD’s 16-year tenure. Voter turnout was low at 49.6 percent, compared to 68 percent in 2016.

Observers from the Organization of American States (OAS) monitored the elections and deemed the polls credible, lauding the Central Electoral Board’s (JCE’s) measures to curb the spread of the coronavirus at polling stations and the consensus among political forces in postponing the election. However, inconsistent enforcement of social distancing and curfew measures benefited the PLD, and both parties used pandemic-related food, services, and medical supplies to incentivize voters. OAS observers reiterated issues with electronic voting and repeated calls for compliance with parity requirements for women candidates and better supervision of parties' and candidates' finances under existing regulations.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 3 / 4

The Dominican Republic's bicameral National Congress consists of the 32-member Senate and the 190-member Chamber of Deputies, with members of both chambers directly elected to four-year terms. The PRM gained majorities in both chambers in the 2020 legislative elections, which were held alongside the presidential election.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 3 / 4

Despite its shortcomings, the JCE operates with some transparency and cooperates with election monitors, opposition parties, and other relevant groups. The 2019 Electoral Regime Law and the 2018 Law of Political Parties, Groups, and Movements established the country's new electoral framework. A Special Prosecutor for Investigation and Persecution of Electoral Crimes and Offences was instituted by the Electoral Regime Law, but election observers expressed concerns about its political independence. The 2020 elections exposed gaps in the implementation of campaign finance laws—demonstrated by unregulated distribution of gifts and humanitarian aid, candidates' failure to submit required budgets and expenditure reports, and a lack of transparency in public fund allocations to candidates.

New members of the Superior Electoral Court (TSE) were appointed in July 2021; so far, only four cases from the 2020 election cycle have come before it. However, a December 2021 Constitutional Court decision invalidated the law that assign the TSE's jurisdiction to hear electoral crimes trials, recognizing instead ordinary criminal courts. Separately, the Superior Administrative Court invalidated a JCE resolution on party financing in June.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 11 / 16 (+1)

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 4 / 4 (+1)

Political parties are generally free to form and operate. However, newer and smaller parties struggle to access public financing and secure equal media coverage. In April 2021, the Constitutional Court allowed parties to maintain legal status if they achieve congressional or municipal representation, expanding the rule that previously required dissolution if they failed to gain at least 1 percent of the vote. A minimum amount of time that competing candidates must be associated with their party was declared unconstitutional in 2019.

Score Change: The score improved from 3 to 4 because the Constitutional Court eased legal restrictions that posed significant obstacles to smaller parties.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 3 / 4

Opposition parties and candidates generally do not face selective restrictions during election periods but are disadvantaged by elements of the electoral framework. In July 2020, the main opposition party, the PRM, ended the PLD's 16-year tenure and won a majority in the National Congress.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 3 / 4

People are generally free to exercise their political choices. A history of violent police responses to social and political demonstrations may deter political participation by some, and economic oligarchies and organized crime groups have some influence over the political sphere. Electoral laws require some accountability for campaign finances, but political parties and presidential candidates do not always comply. The Specialized Directorate for Financial Control was established in December 2020 to monitor public and private financing for political parties and electoral candidates.

Gender parity laws requiring between 40 and 60 percent of candidates for the National Congress be women were not respected during the 2020 elections. The percentage of women in Congress decreased; women hold 48 seats in the Chamber of Deputies and 4 in the Senate.

A 2013 Constitutional Tribunal decision stripped hundreds of thousands of Dominican-born descendants of Haitian migrants of their citizenship, and thus their right to vote. Discriminatory attitudes and occasional acts of targeted violence against Black Dominicans (perceived to be Haitians) and LGBT+ people discourage their political participation, though more than 64 percent of LGBT+ people voted in the 2020 elections.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 7 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 3 / 4

Government and legislative representatives are generally able to determine national policies in a free and unhindered manner. Despite a one-week shutdown of the Chamber of Deputies in June 2021, due to the COVID-19 pandemic, both legislatures operated freely during the year.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 2 / 4

Corruption remains a serious, systemic problem at all levels of the government, judiciary, and security forces, as well as in the private sector. Reports indicate that politicians routinely accept bribes. A 2016 US Justice Department report on the Brazilian construction company Odebrecht revealed that $92 million had been paid to public officials in the Dominican Republic to obtain contracts for major infrastructure projects in the country during three consecutive governments. Numerous officials from prior administrations were linked to the scandal, but only seven were formally charged. In October 2021, a Dominican court convicted a former Odebrecht representative and the former minister of public works for bribery and money laundering; four others who were on trial for similar offences were acquitted.

In 2021, PEPCA continued to investigate administrative corruption in former president Danilo Medina's administration, which had resulted in the 2020 arrest of Medina's brother, and opened several new investigations into the prior administration's operations. By September 2021, PEPCA had linked at least four current legislators to drug trafficking and money laundering networks and had suspended or removed nine officials from office.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 2 / 4

The government does not always operate with transparency. Although state agencies generally respond to information requests, they often provide inaccurate or incomplete responses. Public officials are required to publicly disclose assets, but NGOs have cast doubt upon the accuracy of these disclosures. Public contracting and purchasing processes are opaque; a September 2021 report exposed millions of dollars in missing taxes from purchases of luxury and other vehicles imported under the names of Dominican legislators, who have exemptions.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 41 / 60D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 14 / 16*D1. Are there free and independent media? 2 / 4

The law guarantees freedom of speech and of the press. Several national daily newspapers, many local publications, more than 300 privately owned radio stations, and several private television networks operate in the country alongside the state-owned Radio Televisión Dominicana (RTVD). However, ownership of private outlets is highly concentrated and public funding of media lacks transparency.

Journalists risk intimidation and violence when investigating drug trafficking and corruption and may also face legal or regulatory pressure as a result of their investigations. During the pandemic, state authorities threatened, attacked, arrested, and detained journalists, although the press members were exempt from curfew restrictions. Charges for defamation and insult brought against journalist Marino Zapete for corruption allegations in 2019 were dropped in 2020, and his accuser was fined. Zapete and other journalists increasingly turned to YouTube in 2021 to escape the limitations of the traditional media.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 4 / 4

Religious freedom is generally upheld. However, the Catholic Church receives special privileges from the state, including funding for construction, and exemptions from customs duties. In September 2021, the education minister announced that bibles would be given to public school students.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

Constitutional guarantees regarding academic freedom are generally observed.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 4 / 4

People are generally free to express personal views in public and private without fear of retribution or surveillance. In January 2021, the director of police threatened legal consequences for individuals who post content online, including through videos that he called “smear campaigns,” portraying or alleging police abuse.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 10 / 12E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 3 / 4

Freedom of assembly is guaranteed by the constitution, and demonstrations are common, but sometimes subject to violent dispersal by police. In March 2021, activists began camping outside the National Palace to support expanded abortion legislation, while religious groups mobilized against it. Police dispersed the camp in April while enforcing COVID-19 protocols.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 4 / 4

Freedom of association is constitutionally guaranteed, and the government respects the right to form civic groups.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 3 / 4

Workers other than military and police personnel may form and join unions, though over 50 percent of workers at a workplace must be union members to engage in collective bargaining. Workers must exhaust mediation measures and meet other criteria for a strike to be considered legal. In practice, union membership is discouraged, and workers risk dismissal for joining.

F. RULE OF LAW: 8 / 16F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 3 / 4

Judicial independence is hampered by corruption and the judiciary is susceptible to political pressure. Reports of selective prosecution and the improper dismissal of cases continue.

Justices of the Supreme Court and Constitutional Court are appointed to seven- and nine-year terms, respectively, by the National Council of the Judiciary, comprised of the president, the leaders of both chambers of Congress, the Supreme Court president, and a congressional representative from an opposition party. President Abinader in September 2021 proposed constitutional reforms to improve the council's political independence.

In August 2021, the Constitutional Court declared virtual hearings—started during the pandemic—unconstitutional, a ruling praised as reinforcing the rule of law.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 2 / 4

Corruption and politicization of the justice system have significant impact on due process, and strongly limit access to justice for people without resources or political connections. Corruption within law enforcement agencies remains a serious challenge.

Data from September 2020, the most recent statistic available, show that 58 percent of people being held in prisons were in pretrial detention.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 2 / 4

Prisons are severely overcrowded, and rates of murder and other violent crime are high. Initial reports from Citizen Security Observatory indicated a 22 percent increase in homicides in 2021 compared to 2020. The National Human Rights Commission and NGOs reported that, as of October 2021, police and security forces had committed at least 41 extrajudicial killings during the year. President Abinader announced in April the creation of a special commission for police reform after police killed a young couple in their car that month.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 1 / 4

Dominicans with European features or lighter skin color enjoy systemic advantages. Dominican-Haitians and Haitian migrants face persistent discrimination, which was exacerbated by growing unrest in Haiti in 2021. They faced obstacles in securing legal documents such as identification cards, birth certificates, and marriage licenses, and have difficulty registering their children as Dominican citizens. Without identification, they are ineligible for any social assistance, including COVID-19 vaccines; the government has implemented vaccination requirements for public spaces and businesses, effectively excluding many Dominican-Haitians from accessing public services. Women experience a significant amount of workplace discrimination, and the gender pay gap was 20 percent, as of 2020.

Before he left office in 2020, former president Medina granted citizenship to 750 individuals who had their citizenship stripped by a 2013 court ruling that denationalized individuals whose parents were undocumented foreigners; this particularly affected those of Haitian descent. President Abinader granted nationality to another 50 individuals in April 2021. However, the decrees were not implemented by state institutions, and many were unable to regain their citizenship. In March 2021, the Supreme Court of Justice affirmed the JCE's practice of issuing new birth certificates for those affected by the 2013 ruling, which further impedes their ability from ever claiming Dominican citizenship.

LGBT+ people experience occasional violence, as well as discrimination in employment, education, and health services. They are barred from working in certain public sectors, such as the police and armed forces. Changes to the penal code proposed in 2021 fail to prohibit discrimination based on sexual orientation and gender identity.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 9 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 2 / 4

While citizens are generally free to move around the country, arrests for violating COVID-19-related restrictions continued in 2021. In October, the government began requiring proof of vaccination against COVID-19 to access some public spaces. The government in February also announced "emergency" plans to construct a 236-mile fence on the Haitian border that would inhibit the movement of thousands of Haitian workers. People who are six or more months pregnant would also be prohibited from crossing into the country.

Asylum seekers and refugees must pay a fee to gain travel documents. People of Haitian descent without identification cards cannot attend university or obtain formal jobs.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 3 / 4

Private business activity remains susceptible to undue influence by organized crime and corrupt officials.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 2 / 4

Violence and discrimination against women remain pervasive. In January 2021, President Abinader prohibited marriage for individuals under 18 years of age and issued a decree that created the Cabinet for Women, Young Women, and Girls within his office. Poor medical care has left the country with one of the highest maternal mortality rates in the region. A 2015 Constitutional Tribunal decision effectively reinstated a complete ban on abortion, and in June 2021, the Chamber of Deputies voted against decriminalizing it in cases of rape or incest, risk to the life of the pregnant individual, and when the fetus cannot survive outside of the uterus.

Many workers in the country are employed informally, leaving them without legal protections. Haitians who lack documentation and clear legal status are particularly susceptible to forced labor but are often overlooked by antitrafficking initiatives.

The Dominican Republic remains a source, transit, and destination country for the trafficking of men, women, and children for sexual exploitation and forced labor. The US State Department's 2021 Trafficking in Persons report highlighted that the government has failed to revise its trafficking laws and does not report on the number of victims who received care.

Ecuador

Population: 17,500,000

Capital: Quito

Freedom Status: Partly Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Status Change: Ecuador's status improved from Partly Free to Free because the year's presidential and legislative elections did not suffer from the types of abuses seen in previous contests, such as the misuse of public resources, and resulted in an orderly transfer of power between rival parties.

Overview: Elections take place regularly, and some key state institutions have recently displayed greater independence. Freedoms for media and civil society expanded under former president Lenín Moreno, the chosen successor of leftist Rafael Correa. The 2021 elections marked the first time that neither Correa nor his preferred candidate won the presidency in 14 years. Ongoing challenges include official corruption, due process violations, and violence in prisons and during protests.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- In April, Guillermo Lasso, who had unsuccessfully run for president twice before, defeated Andrés Arauz of the Correa-led Union for Hope (UNES) amid high turnout. Lasso won with 52 percent of the vote in the second-round contest, while Arauz received 48 percent.
- Though no party won a majority in the February legislative elections, UNES secured 49 seats, followed by Pachakutik, a party that represents Indigenous communities, with 27. President Lasso's party, Creating Opportunities (CREO), obtained 12. International and domestic observers generally praised the legislative elections as credible and fair.
- In September, 119 inmates were killed in a high-security prison in Guayaquil after a dispute between two rival criminal gangs became violent, making for the deadliest such incident in Ecuadorian history. Various media outlets reported that the aggressors were heavily armed.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 31 / 40 (+4)

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 11 / 12 (+3)

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4 (+1)

The 2008 constitution provides for a directly elected president. The president has the authority to dissolve the legislature, which triggers new elections for both the assembly and the presidency. In 2018, voters approved a referendum that restored term limits, which had been eliminated in a 2015 constitutional amendment under former president Correa; the president can now serve up to two terms, which effectively bars Correa from reclaiming the presidency.

In April 2021, Guillermo Lasso, who had unsuccessfully run for president twice before, defeated UNES candidate Andrés Arauz. Lasso won 52 percent of the vote while Arauz received 48 percent.

Lasso narrowly outpolled Yaku Pérez of Pachakutik in the first round, which was held in February. Pérez denounced those results as fraudulent, but was unable to produce any evidence to support his claims. The Organization of American States (OAS) and other observers called the election free and fair, and the National Electoral Council (CNE) overcame internal disputes and a tense political environment to provide results on election day.

Score Change: The score improved from 3 to 4 because deficiencies seen in the last election, including abuse of public resources in favor of the ruling party, were not repeated.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4 (+1)

Ecuador has a 137-seat unicameral National Assembly, with 116 members directly elected, 15 elected by proportional representation, and 6 elected through multiseat constituencies for Ecuadorians living abroad; as dictated by the 2018 referendum, members serve a maximum of two four-year terms.

International and domestic observers generally praised the February 2021 legislative elections as credible and fair. While no party won a majority, UNES, the new party formed by Rafael Correa and his allies, secured 49 seats, followed by Pachakutik with 27. The Social Christian Party (PSC) and the Democratic Left (ID) both won 18. CREO obtained only 12.

Score Change: The score improved from 3 to 4 because deficiencies seen in the last election, including abuse of public resources in favor of the ruling party, were not repeated.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 3 / 4 (+1)

During the Correa era, the CNE had generally been considered government-controlled. The body faced some criticism for its administration of the 2017 elections, including for slow vote counting and irregularities in the voter rolls. In response to the criticism, the transitional National Council of Citizen Participation and Social Control (CPCCS), which is responsible for appointing CNE members, dismissed all sitting CNE members in July 2018, and that November, five newly appointed members began a six-year term.

The new members displayed greater independence and transparency than their predecessors and oversaw successful 2019 local elections. However, in January 2020, CNE president Diana Atamaint narrowly avoided an impeachment trial amid accusations of influence peddling. The CNE also faced scrutiny as preparations began for the 2021 presidential and general elections.

The Latin American Political Reforms Observatory, a research center at The New School University in New York, praised the CNE for how the 2021 elections were organized, for successfully implementing recommendations from international election observers and the OAS, particularly around public health, and publishing the results quickly and accurately.

Score Change: The score improved from 2 to 3 due to better organized elections and the implementation of new registration procedures that increased access for opposition candidates.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 13 / 16 (+1)

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 3 / 4

According to the 2008 constitution, political organizations must collect voters' signatures equivalent to 1.5 percent of the electoral roll to register and participate in general elections. If a party or group fails to win 4 percent of the vote for two consecutive elections, its registration can be revoked, disadvantaging smaller parties. Recent elections have seen a significant rise in electoral competition: the 2021 elections featured 16 presidential candidates and 17 legislative party lists.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 4 / 4 (+1)

For decades, Ecuador's political parties have been largely personality based, clientelist, and fragile. Proud and Sovereign Fatherland (PAIS), the largest bloc in the previous legislature, split after former president Moreno came to power, with one faction loyal to Moreno and the other loyal to Correa; ahead of the 2019 polls the latter group left the ruling party and joined the Citizens' Revolution party.

Smaller establishment parties such as the PSC and newer parties have successfully gained representation in recent years. Lasso's victory in the 2021 presidential election marked the first time in 14 years that neither Correa nor a candidate affiliated with one of Correa's parties became president.

Score Change: The score improved from 3 to 4 because there are no significant impediments to the opposition's ability to win power in elections.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 3 / 4

The people's political choices are generally free from domination by powerful groups that are not democratically accountable. However, wealthy business interests can undermine democratic accountability by facilitating or encouraging corruption among elected officials.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 3 / 4

Ecuador's constitution promotes nondiscrimination and provides for the adoption of affirmative action measures to promote equality and representation of marginalized groups. In practice, however, Indigenous groups often lack a voice in key decisions pertaining to their land and resources. Nonetheless, Indigenous groups are an important force in national politics. Pachakutik candidate Pérez narrowly finished in third place in the first round of the 2021 presidential election; Pachakutik became the second largest legislative bloc in the concurrent legislative polls. A member of Pachakutik, Guadalupe Llori, also became the first Indigenous woman to preside over the National Assembly.

An LGBT+ rights activist, Pamela Troya, registered as the only openly gay candidate for the 2021 legislative elections. In 2020, she filed a complaint after being mocked by a prosecutorial staffer while reporting that she had received death threats.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 7 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 3 / 4

Elected officials are generally free to set and implement government policy without undue interference from nonstate actors. However, the executive has exhibited a strong influence on other branches of the government, and political actors are susceptible to manipulation by powerful business interests.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 2 / 4

Ecuador has long been racked by corruption, and the weak judiciary and lack of investigative capacity in government oversight agencies contribute to an environment of impunity. Although the Moreno administration initially emphasized anticorruption efforts and several prominent politicians have faced investigation and prosecution in recent years, corruption scandals rocked the country during the COVID-19 pandemic, illustrating the depth of the challenge of effectively combating graft. In September 2021, the Lasso administration estimated the cost of corruption between 2007 and 2019 at approximately $68 billion.

In July 2021, Pachakutik legislator Rosa Cerda was recorded telling other party members, “If you’re going to steal, do it well.” National Assembly president Llori, also from Pachakutik, has been accused of misusing public funds and spending lavishly during official trips. In October 2021, National Assembly vice president Bella Jimenez, an ID member, was expelled from the legislature for offering to get people public-sector jobs in exchange for money.

During the 2021 presidential election campaign, UNES candidate Arauz questioned whether Lasso’s stake in the country’s second-largest bank posed a conflict of interest. In October, Lasso was accused of tax evasion by several members of the opposition after Lasso was listed in the Pandora Papers, an investigation by the International Consortium of Investigative Journalists (ICIJ) that exposed corruption in the international financial system and connections between powerful actors around the world, as having stored much of his fortune in offshore accounts.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 2 / 4

The law guarantees citizens’ right to access public information, and although compliance has improved over the years, some government bodies remain reluctant to disclose it. In 2018, the government took steps to enhance access to information, including the establishment of a transparency-monitoring mechanism to ensure that public agencies provide relevant information online. At the height of the COVID-19 pandemic’s first wave in April 2020—and following heavy criticism from the media and civil society—then president Moreno admitted that the government’s stated numbers of cases and deaths represented a significant undercount.

Public procurement processes are frequently opaque and malpractice involving government contracts is common.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 40 / 60D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 13 / 16*D1. Are there free and independent media? 3 / 4

Media freedom improved after former president Moreno took office in 2017. His administration permitted more diverse coverage in the country’s state-run media, which had previously shown clear bias toward Correa and the PAIS alliance. In 2018, the National Assembly reformed the restrictive Organic Communications Law, including by eliminating the notorious Superintendency of Information and Communication (SUPERCOM), which monitored media content, investigated journalists, and issued fines and other sanctions.

Investigative journalists played an active role in discrediting official COVID-19 statistics, exposing corruption in the public health sector, and revealing new details about the mechanics of corruption in the Correa administration.

Challenges to press freedom remain. In October 2021, President Lasso sent a letter to the editorial board of El Universo, one of the country’s most prestigious newspapers, complaining that its coverage of the Pandora Papers was unfair. The letter was widely condemned by local media outlets and freedom of expression activists as an attempt to influence the paper's editorial independence.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 4 / 4

Freedom of religion is constitutionally guaranteed and generally respected in practice.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 3 / 4

In 2018, the National Assembly approved reforms to the Organic Law on Higher Education, which restored public funding for research at universities that operate in Ecuador under international agreements. In August 2021, the Lasso administration proposed amendments to the same law that would strengthen the autonomy of universities and independence of students in Ecuador.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 3 / 4

Discussion of controversial topics among private citizens is generally free. However, crackdowns on social media have led some online outlets to disable sections for public commentary for fear of reprisals, limiting the freedom of private discussion online.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 9 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 3 / 4

Protests occur regularly throughout the country without incident, and restrictions on assembly rights initially eased under President Moreno. However, national security legislation provides a broad definition of sabotage and terrorism, extending to acts against persons and property by unarmed individuals, which can be used to limit assembly rights. In May 2020, the Ministry of Defense issued a regulation authorizing soldiers' use of lethal force in situations that potentially included protests. Following a challenge by rights groups, the Constitutional Court suspended the regulation that June, pending a full decision.

In 2019, coalition of unions, Indigenous political groups, and other civil society groups began a series of demonstrations and strike actions against an end to fuel subsidies, with some demonstrations turning violent. In response, the government declared a nationwide state of emergency, and police used excessive force against and arrested protesters en masse. Moreno eventually rescinded the cuts, and activists in turn called off the demonstrations.

In October 2021, Indigenous communities initiated mass protests again, as President Lasso similarly proposed an increase in fuel prices. Protesters blocked major roads and were prevented from entering the presidential palace by riot police. Lasso subsequently announced a pause on the fuel cost increases and engaged in talks with Indigenous community leaders in early November.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 3 / 4

In 2017, the Moreno administration rescinded controversial Correa-era decrees that heavily restricted nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) and their ability to operate. However, though observers saw Moreno's regime was an improvement, many criticized the retention of excessive government regulatory power. For example, current NGO regulations allow authorities to close an organization deemed to perform activities different from those for which it was created, or to be participating in politics.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 3 / 4

Private-sector labor unions have the right to strike, though the labor code limits public-sector strikes. Only a small portion of the general workforce is unionized, partly because many people work in the informal sector. In 2018, the National Union of Educators (UNE), which had been dissolved by the government in 2016 under restrictive NGO regulations, was able to resume operations.

F. RULE OF LAW: 8 / 16F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 2 / 4

Ecuador's highest-ranking judicial bodies are the 21-member National Court of Justice and the 9-member Constitutional Court. Both courts faced attacks on their autonomy during the Correa era, but judicial independence increased during the Moreno administration. The passage of the 2018 referendum restructured the CPCCS, a powerful body responsible for appointing the attorney general, and the Judiciary Council, which appoints judges. All CPCCS members, who were considered allies of the Correa government, and Judiciary Council members were replaced.

More controversially, the transitional CPCCS had significant influence over the composition of the Constitutional Court, despite its lack of jurisdiction. The transitional CPCCS voted to remove all nine judges on the court, citing corruption and a lack of independence within the body, and then created a committee to select the court's new members who were selected and approved in early 2019. Later that year, the new court ratified the legality of the transitional CPCCS's actions.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 2 / 4

Judicial processes remain slow, and procedures designed to expedite cases have been implemented at the detriment of defendants' due process rights. Many people are held in pretrial detention for longer than is permitted by law. While the number of public defenders has increased in recent years, the state is still unable to provide adequate legal counsel for all defendants who are unable to supply their own.

During his tenure, former president Correa and his allies frequently intervened in court cases, telling judges how they should rule, and sometimes removing judges who refused to comply. Under President Moreno, such blatant interference in court proceedings diminished, allowing defendants more fair public hearings of their cases.

Allegations of police abuse of suspects and detainees are common. In October 2020, municipal police officers in Durán were filmed attacking a mentally disabled woman who was caught selling toothpaste outside a public building. The officers involved were detained.

Accountability efforts related to the 2019 protest violence remained limited in 2021. Hundreds of investigations were open in 2020, but only a handful of trials had begun; nearly all were focused on protesters accused of inciting or committing violence, some of whom were Indigenous leaders or members of the political opposition. Multiple groups that conducted investigations, including the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights (IACHR), Human Rights Watch (HRW), and the governmental Ombudsman's Office, found that state agents committed human rights violations during the protests, but investigations had not yielded charges.

Prisons are overcrowded and violent. There are approximately 40,000 inmates, nearly 15,000 of whom have not been sentenced. The system also lacks adequate personnel, employing only 1,600 prison guards.

Three major security incidents occurred in Ecuadorian prisons during 2021. In September, 119 inmates were killed in a high-security prison in Guayaquil after a dispute between two rival criminal gangs became violent. Various media outlets reported that the aggressors were heavily armed with machetes, knives, rifles, semiautomatic weapons, and grenades. The events in Guayaquil were the latest in a series of incidents that highlight the state's inability to protect prisoners from gangs and drug cartels and was the most fatal such incident in the country's history. After the Guayaquil incident, President Lasso declared a state of emergency for the penitentiary system and extended it through late December.

Indigenous people continue to suffer widespread societal discrimination, and oil-drilling and mining projects on Indigenous lands are frequently carried out without consulting local Indigenous communities, as required by the constitution. In July 2020, the Constitutional Court reinforced consultation requirements for proposed changes to the status of Indigenous ancestral territories.

Ecuador is one of the largest recipients of refugees in Latin America. According to the Office of the UN High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR), Ecuador hosted over 508,000 Venezuelans as of the end of 2021. Many Venezuelan immigrants have reported facing discrimination and xenophobia, amid unfounded accusations that their arrival has caused a spike in crime and violence in the country. In addition, approximately 250,000 refugees from Colombia have entered Ecuador since the late 1990s, and thousands are still there.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 10 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 3 / 4

Freedom of movement outside and inside the country is largely unrestricted. Workers in the palm oil industry, however, have faced restrictions on their movement imposed by employers, including curfews. Individuals may generally determine their place of employment and education.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 2 / 4

The government does not impose significant restrictions on the right to own property and establish private businesses. However, widespread corruption by both public officials and private-sector actors can obstruct normal business activity and weakens the protection of property rights.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 3 / 4

In June 2019, the Constitutional Court narrowly ruled that the marriage ban on same-sex couples was unconstitutional, based on a previous opinion by the Inter-American Court of Human Rights that recommended the recognition of same-sex marriage. The Constitutional Court ruling divided public opinion, but same-sex couples successfully applied for marriage licenses in the following months. Civil unions had previously been recognized in Ecuador.

In a May 2020 report, the UN special rapporteur on violence against women highlighted significant ongoing challenges in protecting women from violence and abuse. A study from the National Institute of Statistics and Censuses (INEC) found that 65 percent of Ecuadorian women had suffered abuse in some form during their lives. Abortion remains a crime in Ecuador, and in September 2020, President Moreno vetoed an ambitious health code reform that would have decriminalized abortions resulting from obstetric emergencies.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 2 / 4

Men, women, and children are sometimes subjected to forced labor and sex work in Ecuador; Indigenous and Afro-Ecuadorian individuals, as well as migrants and refugees, remain most vulnerable. According to data published in a 2020 World Bank report, 6.6 percent of Venezuelans in Ecuador reported being subjected to forced labor within the previous month, and the economic disruption caused by the COVID-19 pandemic further increased migrants' economic precarity and vulnerability.

The government has taken some action to address the problem of economic exploitation, including by increasing trafficking-related law enforcement operations. However, services for victims are inadequate, and some public officials believed to be complicit in trafficking operations have escaped punishment.

Egypt

Population: 102,300,000

Capital: Cairo

Freedom Status: Not Free

Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: President Abdel Fattah al-Sisi, who first took power in a 2013 coup, has governed Egypt in an increasingly authoritarian manner. Meaningful political opposition is virtually nonexistent, as expressions of dissent can draw criminal prosecution and imprisonment. Civil liberties, including press freedom and freedom of assembly, are tightly restricted. Security forces engage in human rights abuses and extrajudicial killing with impunity. Discrimination against women, LGBT+ people, and other groups remain serious problems, as does a high rate of domestic violence.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- In December, an emergency court sentenced activists and human rights defenders Alaa Abdel Fattah and Mohamed al-Baquer to five and four years in prison, respectively, after being convicted of spreading false news and undermining state security. Egyptian authorities had held both activists in prison since 2019.
 - In October, President Sisi suspended the state of emergency that was imposed in 2017. The suspension should end the use of emergency courts, which do not satisfy the minimum standards of fair trials. However, the decision does not preclude hearing cases that were already referred to those courts, nor does it invalidate repressive legislation that was integrated into criminal law.
 - According to the Egyptian Initiative for Personal Rights, in the first two months of 2021 alone, seven prisoners were executed by Egyptian authorities, 67 new defendants were sentenced to death, and 48 new defendants received provisional death penalty sentences. In April, at least seven convicted prisoners were executed.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 6 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 2 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

The president is elected by popular vote for up to two terms. President Abdel Fattah al-Sisi, who first took power in a 2013 coup while serving as Egypt's defense minister and armed forces commander, has been elected only through unfair, noncompetitive contests. In the 2018 elections, Sisi received 97 percent of the votes after pressuring all opposition candidates to withdraw, leaving only Mousa Mostafa Mousa, head of the Al-Ghad Party who had campaigned for Sisi, in the race. Voting in 2018 was marred by low turnout, the use of state resources and media to support Sisi's candidacy, voter intimidation, and vote buying.

Constitutional amendments adopted in 2019 added two years to Sisi's current term, extending it through 2024, at which point he will be allowed to seek an additional six-year term. Beyond this, future presidents will be limited to two six-year terms.

The 2019 amendments to the 2014 constitution reestablished the Egyptian parliament as a bicameral body in which members serve five-year terms. The upper house, the Senate, consists of 300 seats and has no significant legislative competencies. Two-thirds of Senate members are elected (half through closed party lists and half through individual seats) and one-third are appointed by the president. The House of Representatives consists of 568 members, half elected through closed party lists and half through individual seats. The president has the right to appoint 28 additional members to the House.

The 2020 elections to both bodies of the parliament were neither free nor fair and were marred by the widespread detention and intimidation of individuals who criticized the process, low turnout, claims of fraud, vote buying, and severe interference by security apparatuses. No credible groups were allowed to monitor the elections.

Without any competitor lists, the Unified National List, headed by the regime-allied Mostaqbal Watan (Nation's Future) Party, won all 100 party-list seats and 88 individual seats in the Senate; Mostaqbal Watan also won all 284 party-list seats and 31 individual seats in the House of Representatives. Another preregime party, the Republican People's Party, won 6 individual Senate seats and 50 individual House seats. Independents and small parties took the remaining seats in the Senate and House. In October 2020, President Sisi appointed 100 mostly preregime members to the Senate.

Egypt has not held elections for local councils since 2008. The last elected local councils were dissolved in 2011; since then, government-appointed officials, mostly consisting of former police and military officers, have dominated local governance and politics.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 1 / 4

While electoral laws provide some basis for credible elections, electoral authorities largely fail in practice to ensure an open and competitive campaign environment. The board of the National Electoral Commission (NEC) consists of senior judges drawn from some of Egypt's highest courts, who serve six-year terms. The NEC's establishing legislation phases out direct judicial supervision of elections by 2024, which critics argue will further damage the integrity of elections and reduce public trust in the results. In November 2021, Hossam Bahgat, director of the Egyptian Initiative for Personal Rights was fined 10,000 pounds for insulting NEC.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 2 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 0 / 4

Political parties are legally allowed to form and operate, but in practice there are no political parties that offer meaningful opposition to the incumbent leadership.

Activists, parties, and political movements that criticize the regime face arrests, harsh prison terms, death sentences, extrajudicial violence, and other forms of pressure. Known as the Al-Amal (Hope) Coalition case, at least 15 individuals were detained in 2019 before launching a secular coalition to run in the 2020 parliamentary elections. In November 2021, an emergency court sentenced without appeal coalition leaders Ziad el-Elaimy Hossam Monis, Hisham Fouad, and three others to multi-year prison terms for posting critical content on social media. Some members of this group were reportedly subjected to torture while in detention. Thousands of other opposition figures remain in prison, where they live in unsanitary conditions.

Parties formed based on religion are forbidden. While some Islamist parties still operate in a precarious legal position, the Muslim Brotherhood was outlawed in 2013 as a terrorist organization, and its political party was banned. Since then, authorities have systematically persecuted its members.

By extending presidential term lengths and limits in 2019, controlling the electoral process, intimidating presidential and parliamentary candidates, and arresting and prosecuting those seeking to contest elections, the Sisi regime makes it nearly impossible for the opposition to gain power through elections.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 1 / 4

Since the 2013 coup, the military and intelligence agencies dominate the political system, with most power and patronage flowing from Sisi and his domestic allies in the armed forces and security agencies. Regional support from the United Arab Emirates and Saudi Arabia help in stabilizing the regime domestically and globally. Most of Egypt's provincial governors are former military or police commanders. Vaguely worded 2019 constitutional amendments further strengthened the legal underpinnings of the military's political influence, calling on it to "protect the constitution and democracy" for the sake of citizens' rights that are not respected by Egyptian authorities.

In July 2021, President Sisi approved amendments to some provisions of Law No. 10 of 1972 that would allow the dismissal of public servants if they were found to undermine state security or be on a terrorism list. The amendments enable authorities to further target opposition supporters working in the civil service.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 1 / 4

The constitution and Egyptian laws grant political rights to all citizens regardless of religion, gender, race, ethnicity, or any other such distinction. However, Christians, Shiite Muslims, people of color, and LGBT+ people face discrimination and are denied access to rights, which in turn affects their ability to participate in political life. Sisi and the security apparatus's increasing control of elections and other aspects of society only permit these groups to represent their interests within the narrow scope of officially sanctioned politics, or risk harsh penalties for transgressing stated and unstated red lines. The diminishing power of the legislature further undercuts avenues for meaningful representation.

Though President Sisi has approved laws tightening punishments on female genital mutilation (FGM) and sexual harassment, women generally struggle to see their interests represented in politics. Women held 27.7 percent of seats in the House of Representatives as of mid-2021, in large part due to legal gender quotas.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 2 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 0 / 4

President Sisi and the security apparatus dominate the policymaking process. The parliament has neither a significant role in forming and debating laws, nor the ability to provide a meaningful check on executive power. Many laws originate in Sisi's cabinet.

The 2019 constitutional amendments further consolidated Sisi's authority and increased the military's already considerable independence from civilian oversight and its constitutional role in civilian governance. The amendments allow the Supreme Council of the Armed Forces to permanently control the appointment of the defense minister, who is also the commander in chief.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 1 / 4

Corruption is pervasive at all levels of government. Official mechanisms for investigating and punishing corrupt activity remain weak and ineffective. The Administrative Control Authority (ACA), the body responsible for most anticorruption initiatives, is under the control of Sisi. It lacks credibility, transparency, and impartiality and is not allowed to monitor the economic activities of the military. Thus, the ACA is believed to be an instrument for Sisi to control bureaucracy, manage key patronage networks, and serve the regime's propaganda.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 1 / 4

The Sisi administration has provided very little transparency regarding government spending and operations and denies civil society groups and independent journalists opportunities to comment on or influence state policies. The military is notoriously opaque with its budget and its extensive business interests.

The government's handling of the COVID-19 pandemic was characterized by opacity and lack of transparency on the numbers of cases and deaths. Regime-allied outlets that dominate the media sector spread misinformation about the illness. Many doctors were arrested for publicly criticizing the lack of personal protective equipment (PPE) and coronavirus tests.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 12 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 3 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 0 / 4

The Egyptian media sector is dominated by progovernment outlets; most critical or opposition-oriented outlets were shut down in the wake of the 2013 coup. Private media are owned by businesspeople and individuals tied to the military and intelligence services. Independent reporting is suppressed through restrictive laws and intimidation, while foreign journalists face obstruction by the state. The Committee to Protect Journalists (CPJ) noted that Egypt detained the third-most journalists in the world in 2021, with 25 in detention at the end of the year.

Intelligence apparatuses seek to shape citizen attitudes by promoting conspiracy theories, disinformation, and hatred toward opposition and critics through media outlets they own or control. Moreover, authorities block news websites and target independent journalists, limiting citizens' access to credible information.

In July 2021, Abdel Nasser Salama, former editor in chief of state-run newspaper Al-Ahram, was detained on terrorism and false news charges after writing an article calling for President Sisi to resign.

Two laws ratified in 2018 pose additional threats to press freedom. The Media Regulation Law prescribes prison sentences for journalists who “incite violence” and permits censorship without judicial approval, among other provisions. The 2018 Anti-Cyber and Information Technology Crimes Law allows authorities to block any website considered to be a threat to national security, a broad stipulation that is vulnerable to abuse. Websites of independent news and information entities are regularly blocked. In June 2021, the president approved amendments to the penal code tightening punishments for journalists who cover criminal trial sessions without prior approval. In November, President Sisi further toughened penalties for disclosing state classified information, increasing potential fines and allowing for prison terms between six months and 5 years.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 1 / 4

While Article 2 of the 2014 constitution declares Islam to be the official religion, Article 64 states that “freedom of belief is absolute.” Most Egyptians are Sunni Muslims. Coptic Christians form a substantial minority, and there are smaller numbers of Shiite Muslims, non-Coptic Christian denominations, and other groups. Religious minorities and atheists have faced persecution and violence, with Copts in particular suffering numerous cases of forced displacement, physical assaults, bomb and arson attacks, and blocking of church construction in recent years. Informal reconciliation sessions following instances of sectarian conflict have denied Copts justice for acts of violence against them. In November 2021, Ahmed Abdo Maher, a lawyer and Islamic thinker, was sentenced to five years in prison on charges of defaming Islam and “stirring up sectarian strife.”

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 1 / 4

The state controls education and curriculums in public schools and to a lesser degree in some of the country's private institutions. Faculty members and departments have some autonomy in shaping specific courses, though many scholars self-censor to avoid any punitive measures. University professors can be dismissed for on-campus political activity, and several prominent academics are in prison for expressing political views. The government imposes strict requirements for academics to obtain approval from security officials for travel abroad, and many have been subject to prosecution by emergency courts.

Since 2013, university students have been arrested, faced disciplinary sanctions such as expulsion, military trials, and extrajudicial killings for their political activism. In June 2021, an emergency court in Egypt sentenced researcher and graduate student Ahmed Samir Santawy to four years in prison for publishing false news.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 1 / 4

Individuals who express personal views contrary to preferred state narratives are subject to reprisals. Arrests of activists over social media posts and other activities are common and send a clear message that voicing dissent is intolerable, which contributes to self-censorship among ordinary Egyptians. In recent years, authorities have targeted content creators on social media platforms, most notably TikTok, for various spurious charges. Progovernment media figures and state officials regularly call for national unity and suggest that only enemies of the state would criticize authorities.

In December 2021, an emergency court in Cairo sentenced activist and blogger Mohamed Ibrahim, also known as Mohamed Oxygen, to four years in prison. He was convicted of spreading false news and undermining state security.

Security agencies use surveillance equipment and techniques to monitor social media platforms and mobile phone applications. The Anti-Cyber and Information Technology Crimes Law requires telecommunications companies to store users' data for 180 days, further enabling widespread government surveillance. The law also broadly criminalizes online expression that "threatens national security." The 2018 Media Regulation Law subjects any social media user with more than 5,000 followers to government monitoring and regulation.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 1 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 0 / 4

According to the constitution, freedom of assembly should not be restricted. However, the Interior Ministry can legally ban, postpone, or relocate protests with a court's approval. Unauthorized gatherings of 10 or more people can be subject to forced dispersal. Protest organizers must inform police of their plans at least three days in advance. Thousands of protesters have been arrested since 2013 (when these strict laws were introduced), and some jailed protesters have received death sentences. Because of this government crackdown on assembly rights, protests are extremely rare.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 0 / 4

In recent years, nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) have faced mass closures as well as harassment in the form of office raids, arrests of members, lengthy legal cases, and restrictions on travel. A restrictive 2019 law constrains the activities of NGOs deemed to threaten national security, public morals, and public order and imposes onerous reporting requirements and intrusive monitoring systems. Punishments for violations of the law are severe. In 2021, authorities arrested and imprisoned activists and dissidents on spurious charges, including undermining state security.

In December 2021, an emergency court sentenced activists and human rights defenders Alaa Abdel Fattah and Mohamed al-Baqer to five and four years in prison, respectively, after being convicted of spreading false news and undermining state security. Authorities had held both activists in prison since 2019.

Political dissidents abroad are targeted by espionage operations, and their families in Egypt have increasingly faced persecution by state authorities. In February, authorities raided the homes of six members of the extended family of Mohamed Soltan, a US-based human rights advocate, after Soltan sued a former Egyptian prime minister in June 2020 over his arrest and torture.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 1 / 4

The government only recognizes unions affiliated with the state-controlled Egyptian Trade Union Federation. While Article 15 of the constitution provides for the right to organize peaceful strikes, they are not tolerated in practice, and the law on protests prohibits gatherings that impede labor and production. Striking workers have in the past been arrested and prosecuted. Workers at military-owned businesses are subject to trials by military courts. Authorities failed to protect striking workers in July and August 2021, allowing the large manufacturing company LORD International to unfairly dismiss and punish workers on strike.

F. RULE OF LAW: 2 / 16F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 1 / 4

The executive branch exerts influence over the courts, which typically protect the interests of the government, military, and security apparatus and have often disregarded due process and other basic safeguards in cases against the government's political opponents and all forms of independent expression. The 2019 constitutional amendments further strengthened the president's supervisory powers over the judiciary and undermined its independence. The changes allow the president to appoint the heads of judicial bodies and authorities, choosing from among several candidates nominated by their governing councils. The president also serves as the veto-wielding head of the Supreme Council for Judicial Bodies and Authorities, which controls appointments and disciplinary matters for the judiciary. The chief justice of the Supreme Constitutional Court is chosen by the president from among its most senior members.

A number of detained government critics and opposition figures have been prosecuted in the emergency courts created when President Sisi declared a state of emergency in 2017, which remained in effect until October 2021. Decisions in these courts are subject to approval by Sisi, who can reverse or commute sentences without right to appeal.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 0 / 4

Since 2013, Egyptian authorities have increasingly used months- or even years-long pretrial detentions as retribution for opposition members, journalists, and activists. These severe violations of due process rights and legal standards has normalized the use of the Egyptian justice system for political purposes.

Although the constitution limits military trials of civilians, a 2014 presidential decree placed all "public and vital facilities" under military jurisdiction, resulting in the referral of thousands of civilian defendants to military courts. That expansion of jurisdiction was made permanent in November 2021. Charges brought in military courts are often vague or fabricated, defendants are denied due process, and basic evidentiary standards are routinely disregarded.

In October 2021, President Sisi suspended the state of emergency that was imposed in 2017. The suspension should end the use of emergency courts, which do not satisfy the minimum standards of fair trials. However, the decision does not preclude hearing cases that were already referred to those courts, nor does it invalidate repressive legislation that was integrated into criminal law.

Police brutality and impunity for abuses by security forces were catalysts for the 2011 uprising against former president Hosni Mubarak, but no reforms have since been enacted and security forces continue to wield illegitimate force with impunity. Antiterrorism laws provide a vague definition of terrorism and grant law enforcement personnel sweeping powers and immunity in enforcement. Prison conditions are very poor, and prisons were grossly unequipped during the COVID-19 pandemic to treat the illness or prevent its spread. Inmates are subject to physical abuse, overcrowding, unsanitary conditions, and denial of medical care.

Use of the death penalty has increased dramatically since Sisi took power, despite serious concerns about due process violations and politicized prosecutions. According to the Egyptian Initiative for Personal Rights, in the first two months of 2021 alone, seven prisoners were executed by Egyptian authorities, 67 new defendants were sentenced to death, and 48 new defendants received provisional death penalty sentences. In April, at least 7 convicted prisoners were executed. In June, the Court of Cassation upheld death sentences for 12 prisoners based on their involvement in protests related to the ouster of former president Mohamed Morsi from power in July 2013.

Conflict continues between security forces and adherents of the Islamic State (IS) militant group based in the North Sinai region. Both terrorist attacks and military operations have resulted in civilian casualties. For years, Egyptian security forces have carried out extrajudicial executions, claiming that the victims had been killed in shootouts. In August 2021, a video released by the spokesperson of the Egyptian armed forces praising the success of military operations in North Sinai and the killing of 89 militants, appeared to show the killing of two unarmed people who clearly posed no threat to the security forces present.

Though the constitution stipulates equality for women, their court testimony is not equal to that of men in cases involving personal status matters and they are disproportionately marginalized. In practice, women face extensive discrimination in employment, among other disadvantages. Other segments of the population that are subject to various forms of harassment and discrimination include Coptic Christians and other religious minorities, people of color from southern Egypt, migrants and refugees from sub-Saharan Africa, people with disabilities, and LGBT+ people.

While same-sex sexual conduct is not explicitly banned, people suspected of such activity can be charged with prostitution or “debauchery.” The police have carried out dozens of such arrests in recent years. An October 2020 Human Rights Watch (HRW) review of the cases of 13 LGBT+ individuals prosecuted between 2017 and 2020, found that many of the 13 were tortured or sexually assaulted by police officers.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 6 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 1 / 4

The constitution guarantees freedom of movement, but internal travel and access are restricted tightly in North Sinai and to a lesser extent in other governorates along Egypt’s borders. Sinai residents are subject to curfews, checkpoints, and other obstacles to travel.

Individuals seeking to change their place of employment or education can encounter bureaucratic barriers and scrutiny from security officials. In addition, a growing list of rights activists, journalists, political party members, bloggers, and academics have been subjected to arbitrary bans on international travel in recent years. Foreign researchers or activists have been expelled or denied entry to the country.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 2 / 4

Under Sisi, the military is woven into many aspects of Egypt's economy. It runs businesses, produces goods, and manages megaprojects and infrastructure that benefit from tax and customs exemptions, free labor (conscripted soldiers), lack of public budget oversight, and allocation of lands through presidential decrees. Opportunities for private businesses are limited. In December 2020 and February 2021, the authorities arrested Safwan Thabet, the founder and majority shareholder of Egypt's largest dairy products and juice producer Juhayna, and his 40-year-old son, Seif, detained them in inhumane conditions; and charged them with funding terrorism after they refused to release control of Juhayna's assets.

Property rights in Sinai and other border areas are affected by the activities of security forces. Women are at a legal disadvantage in property and inheritance matters, typically receiving half the inheritance due to a man. Societal biases also discourage women's ownership of land.

In November 2021, President Sisi approved legal amendments that gave the Egyptian military the authority to secure vital facilities (including gas stations, gas lines, oil fields, railways, road networks, bridges, and other public facilities and properties). According to the amendments, crimes against public and vital facilities and properties are subject to the jurisdiction of the military judiciary.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 2 / 4

Domestic violence, sexual harassment, and female genital mutilation (FGM) are still among the most acute problems in Egyptian society, though in April 2021, the government toughened penalties for FGM. However, the effectiveness of such laws is hindered by societal resistance, poor enforcement, abuses by the police themselves, and lack of adequate protection for witnesses, all of which deter victims from contacting authorities. Spousal rape is not a crime.

Personal status rules based on religious affiliation put women at a disadvantage in marriage, divorce, and custody matters. Muslim women cannot marry non-Muslim men, for example, and the Coptic Church rarely permits divorce.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 1 / 4

Women and children, migrants from sub-Saharan Africa and Asia, and Syrian refugees are vulnerable to forced labor and sex trafficking in Egypt. Authorities routinely punish individuals for offenses that stemmed directly from their circumstances as trafficking victims. Military conscripts are exploited as cheap labor to work on military- or state-affiliated development projects.

El Salvador

Population: 6,500,000

Capital: San Salvador

Freedom Status: Partly Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Elections in El Salvador are largely credible and free. However, widespread corruption undermines democracy and the rule of law, and lack of physical security remains a grave problem. Authorities have pursued a harsh, militarized response to the country's powerful criminal gangs, resulting in extrajudicial killings and other abuses. There is an active civil society sector and a lively press, though journalists risk harassment and violence in connection with coverage of organized crime or corruption.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- The party of President Nayib Bukele, New Ideas (NI), won a supermajority in the February legislative elections. Upon assuming office in May, new legislators replaced the attorney general and all five members of the Constitutional Chamber of the Supreme Court, undermining democratic institutions intended to check executive power.
- In September, the Constitutional Court—newly staffed by Bukele allies—ruled that the president may serve two consecutive terms, contravening Article 152 of the constitution. The decision enabled Bukele to run for reelection.
- Amid mounting allegations of corruption, a number of mechanisms meant to ensure government transparency and combat official misconduct were undermined through a series of executive decrees and partisan appointments. In May, legislators approved a bill granting public officials and contractors immunity from any civil or criminal liability stemming from pandemic-related state expenditures.
- After the unconstitutional appointment of a government-aligned attorney general in May, opposition party offices in July were raided and party property was confiscated, and the Legislative Assembly set up commissions to investigate past bonus payments to politicians and public funding of nongovernmental organizations (NGOs). The actions were ostensibly meant to combat corruption, but opposition parties, rights groups, and other critics denounced them as political persecution.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 26 / 40 (-4)

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 10 / 12 (-4)

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

El Salvador's president is directly elected for a five-year term. In February 2019, Nayib Bukele won the presidential election in the first round with 53 percent of the vote, and was inaugurated that June. Voter turnout was 52 percent. Organization of American States (OAS) observers called the election free and generally fair and praised the peaceful transfer of power, noting the losing candidates' willingness to concede on election night.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 3 / 4

The 84-member, unicameral Legislative Assembly is elected for three years. The Nationalist Republican Alliance (ARENA) and Farabundo Martí National Liberation Front (FMLN) dominated Salvadoran politics since the first postwar election in 1994. However, in the February 2021 legislative elections, ARENA was reduced to 14 seats and the FMLN to 4, while the newly constituted party of President Bukele, New Ideas (NI), won a supermajority with 56 seats. The remaining 10 seats went to smaller parties. Turnout was about 49 percent.

European Union (EU) and Latin American election observers attested that the results reflected the popular will, but found that the campaign environment was flawed in favor of NI, with violations of electoral law including the use of significant state resources to favor the party. Notably, an investigation into the use of pandemic-related food aid by the campaign for the NI candidate for mayor of San Salvador was closed by the government-named attorney general. Such aid was also distributed through the NI party elsewhere.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 3 / 4 (-1)

El Salvador's electoral framework is designed by the Legislative Assembly and administered by the Supreme Electoral Tribunal (TSE). The three parties that won the greatest proportion of votes in the last presidential election appoint three of the five TSE magistrates. The remaining two are nominated by the Supreme Court of Justice and must gain a two-thirds approval vote in the legislature. All are appointed to five-year terms.

In September 2021, the Constitutional Court—newly staffed by Bukele allies the NI-dominated legislature had appointed after dismissing sitting members in May—ruled that the president may serve two consecutive terms, contravening Article 152 of the constitution; the decision overturned a recent ruling that had reaffirmed the ban. The Constitutional Chamber directed the TSE to allow the change, which the TSE did, saying that the ruling could not be appealed.

Score Change: The score declined from 4 to 3 because the government-controlled Constitutional Chamber of the Supreme Court overturned a constitutional ban on presidential reelection, enabling President Bukele to run in future contests.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 12 / 16 (-1)

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 3 / 4 (-1)

The leftist FMLN and the right-wing ARENA dominated politics since the end of the war in 1992 until recently. In 2018, the first independent candidate was elected to the legislature, and in 2021, two new parties associated with Bukele won seats—NI with 56 seats, Our Time with 1.

Salvadorans have traditionally been free to organize in different political parties or groupings. However, in 2021, politically motivated corruption charges resulted in raids on party offices. After the unconstitutional appointment of a government-aligned attorney general in May 2021, ARENA party offices in July were raided and party property was confiscated. In addition, other figures from ARENA and FMLN were arrested or had arrest warrants issued against them, including two former mayors, a number of former ministers, and former president Salvador Sánchez Cerén. Meanwhile, the Legislative Assembly set up commissions to investigate past bonus payments to politicians and public funding of nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) during the year. While these actions were all ostensibly linked to fighting alleged corruption, opposition parties, rights groups, and other critics denounced them as political persecution and attempts to silence the opposition. There were numerous reports of those arrested being denied due process protections, including being refused access to their lawyers, and police failing to inform detainees of the charges against them.

Score Change: The score declined from 4 to 3 because opposition figures faced politically motivated corruption charges, resulting in raids and the confiscation of party assets.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 4 / 4

Opposition parties are able to increase support and gain power through elections. Historically, presidential elections were closely contested between the leftist FMLN and the right-wing ARENA, while smaller parties performed better in the legislature. President Bukele's 2019 election marked a break in the two main parties' executive dominance; while they commanded a combined 88 percent of the vote in the first round of the 2014 presidential election, they received 46 percent in 2019.

In the February 2021 legislative and municipal elections, two recently founded parties, NI and Our Time, both gained national and local representation.

Gangs threaten political candidates and elected officials, but individual politicians and their parties also regularly engage in transactions with gangs for their own purposes. For example, municipal officers may find this necessary to guarantee the safety of their staff while working in communities. Cash payments and political promises have been made to gangs in elections going back at least twenty years.

Top-level politicians from all major parties have at different times been accused of links to organized crime. Journalists have regularly uncovered evidence of covert engagement between the Bukele government and gang leaders, chiefly to rein in gang-related crimes—especially homicides—in exchange for various concessions such as privileges for imprisoned gang members. A criminal investigation into the government's negotiations with gangs was underway, but the former prosecutor in charge said in December 2021 that the probe was shut down after the government-controlled legislature replaced the attorney general.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 3 / 4

All citizens have full political rights and electoral opportunities under the law, regardless of gender, ethnicity, religion, or sexual orientation, but women and minority groups are underrepresented in the legislature and in high-level government positions. A 2013 statute requires that 30 percent of legislative and municipal candidates be women, but the proportion of women in the Legislative Assembly dipped under 30 percent following the 2021 elections, and only 11 percent of mayors are women. Furthermore, women's, LGBT+, and Indigenous peoples' interests are poorly represented in practice.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 4 / 12 (-2)C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 2 / 4

The Bukele administration repeatedly interfered with the legislature's ability to determine policy until it gained a supermajority in the new legislative session that commenced in May 2021. Since then, the government and ruling party legislators routinely deny opposition legislators access to key information, including draft legislation, inhibiting substantial deliberation of proposed laws. In practice, legislation is drawn up by the government and swiftly rubber stamped by its legislators. Policy decisions are centralized in the executive, and specifically in President Bukele and a close circle of his trusted collaborators.

Gangs leverage their ability to coordinate surges in homicides so as to push for specific concessions from those in power, especially as regards prison conditions and police harassment and abuse.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 1 / 4 (-1)

Corruption including embezzlement, money laundering, and other forms of self-enrichment remains a problem in government, and anticorruption bodies and prosecutions are increasingly susceptible to politicization.

In November 2020, prosecutors launched a criminal investigation into the suspected misuse of COVID-19-related funds, including the awarding of public contracts to businesses linked to politicians from the ruling party. Against this backdrop, in May 2021, the government-controlled legislature passed a law granting public officials and contractors immunity from any civil or criminal liability stemming from pandemic-related state expenditures. Since then, more cases of suspected graft involving COVID-related funds have emerged.

In July 2021, the US Department of State released a list of actors engaged in “significant corruption” or actions that “undermine democratic processes or institutions” in Central America. Out of 14 Salvadorans listed, 6 were senior officials in the Bukele government, including Bukele’s cabinet chief and close associate, Carolina Recinos. President Bukele dismissed the allegations. Three weeks later, authorities issued arrest warrants for former President Sánchez Cerén and several former ministers, and arrested four former ministers and a former legislator, all from the FMLN, charging them with topping off their salaries with generous bonuses—a long-standing and widespread practice among top Salvadoran officials.

The government in June 2021 ended its cooperation agreement with the International Commission against Impunity in El Salvador (CICIES), an OAS-supported anticorruption agency that assisted Salvadoran prosecutors. The OAS denounced the decision in a statement, which also said that the government had a record of attempting to “induce the CICIES to investigate actions of opposition politicians exclusively.”

Score Change: The score declined from 2 to 1 due to the politicization of anticorruption efforts under President Bukele.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 1 / 4 (-1)

The 2011 Access to Public Information Law instituted strong mechanisms for transparency and oversight of public institutions. While there have been issues with compliance all along, government bodies have been more resistant and less transparent since the beginning of the Bukele administration. Bukele has issued executive decrees that impinge on the independence of the oversight and enforcement body, the Access to Public Information Agency (IAIP), and has named partisan commissioners. In April 2021, Bukele suspended one commissioner, who claimed she had been harassed by the other commissioners and appealed the suspension, which was pending at the end of the year.

Government officials in 2021 continued to withhold information on COVID-19-related expenditures, even amid widespread allegations and indications of related corruption.

As of September 2021—more than two years into Bukele’s term—no government ministers had submitted their asset disclosures, as required by law to detect potential corruption. Moreover, in July the government proposed 11 changes to the Access to Public Information Law that would restrict access to information about officials’ finances.

After the governing party won a supermajority in the legislative session that started in May 2021, legislation has been routinely passed with minimal information provided to the public and even opposition lawmakers. Government plans are generally withheld from public access.

Score Change: The score declined from 2 to 1 due to the Bukele government’s efforts to dismantle public oversight mechanisms.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 33 / 60D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 11 / 16*D1. Are there free and independent media? 2 / 4

While the constitution provides for freedom of the press, and the media scene is robust, reporters face significant challenges. Harassment and acts of violence in response to coverage of corruption and organized crime have often led journalists to engage in self-censorship. Access to the internet is not restricted, and online outlets like El Faro, GatoEncerrado, and Revista Factum are critical sources of independent reporting. However, most Salvadorans rely on social media and privately owned television and radio networks for news, and ownership in the broadcast sector is highly concentrated. Fake news and disinformation campaigns are widespread and fomented by key government officials, including through surrogate online media outlets.

At an April 2021 meeting of the Inter American Press Association (IAPA), a number of journalists denounced the deterioration of freedom of the press and harassment of journalists in El Salvador. In November, Apple warned at least 24 Salvadoran reporters, in addition to activists and political opposition leaders, that they were being targeted by “state-sponsored attackers” trying to remotely compromise their mobile phones.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 3 / 4

Religious freedom is widely respected by state and nonstate actors. However, people in some communities have been unable to access their churches due to territorial disputes between gangs. In addition, some religious leaders working with former gang members face harassment by gangs and police and the threat of murder.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 3 / 4

Academic freedom is respected, and the educational system is generally free from extensive political indoctrination.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 3 / 4

While private discussion and personal expression are generally free, the prevalence of gang activity leads many Salvadorans to curtail speech about criminal activity and other sensitive topics outside of their homes.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 8 / 12E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 3 / 4

Freedom of assembly is generally upheld, and public protests and gatherings are permitted.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 3 / 4

NGOs have operated freely and played an important role in society and policymaking in the postwar era. However, they have largely been excluded from engagement with policymakers under the Bukele government and are frequently lambasted by the president and other officials over critical stances toward government policy.

The Legislative Assembly set up a special commission in May 2021 to investigate NGOs and other associations and the state funding they had received during the last five years. Government officials allege that the money had been used by opposition politicians for the illicit enrichment of the organizations and their trustees. Critics noted that the commission was made up solely of progovernment legislators and their supporters.

In November 2021, the government put forward a Foreign Agents Law, requiring individuals and organizations to register as foreign agents if their activities “respond to the interests of, or are directly or indirectly funded by, a foreigner.” The law would also require them to submit to government inspections and pay a 40 percent tax on foreign payments. Ruling-party legislators and government officials explicitly linked the law to funding given to investigative journalism that is critical of the government and recent protest marches. In the face of massive pressure, not least by the diplomatic corps and foreign donors, the government later in the month announced that it would delay voting on the law. During the same month, police and prosecutors raided the offices of seven NGOs on charges of embezzlement.

Groups that work on human rights and governance-related topics sometimes face threats and extortion attempts from criminal groups.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 2 / 4

Labor unions have long faced obstacles in a legal environment that favors business interests, including by mandating only light penalties for employers who interfere with strikes. The law prohibits strikes in sectors deemed essential, and the designation is vaguely defined.

F. RULE OF LAW: 6 / 16 (-1)

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 1 / 4 (-1)

Judicial independence has long been under pressure, and the judicial system is hampered by corruption. Elected officials do not always observe Supreme Court rulings. Powerful individuals can evade justice by exerting pressure on the judiciary.

The Bukele administration repeatedly defied court orders related to its COVID-19 response during 2020. Constitutional Court orders against Bukele’s pandemic response—in particular, its decision that a strict stay-at-home order was illegal—appeared to have a major role in prompting the legislature’s dramatic removal of the chamber’s judges in 2021: in early May, the 2021–24 Legislative Assembly came together for the first time and immediately removed all members of the Constitutional Chamber, as well as the attorney general. Minutes later, the Constitutional Chamber ruled that the legislature’s actions regarding the magistrates was unconstitutional and a violation of judicial independence. That night, the legislature named new members of the Constitutional Chamber and a new attorney general. In the next days, the ousted judges submitted their resignations, amid reports that the home of Óscar Pineda, who until then served as the president of the Supreme Court (CSJ) and head of the Constitutional Chamber, was being monitored by police.

Three months later, in August, President Bukele announced that it was time to “purge” the judiciary, and the legislature days later passed measures to dismiss judges and prosecutors who were over 60 years old or who had more than 30 years of service, which were estimated to affect one in three judges and numerous prosecutors. The reforms, which Bukele signed in September, also changed the mechanism for appointing and reassigning judges to a seemingly arbitrary process, garnering condemnation by the UN Special Rapporteur on the Independence of Judges and Lawyers.

The Bukele administration continued to resist calls to cooperate in the ongoing El Mozote trial, in which 17 high-ranking military officers stand accused of massacring nearly 1,000 people in the northeastern town of El Mozote in 1981. In September 2021, the judge in charge of the case, who was 61 years old, resigned in protest of the new measure under which he would be dismissed.

Score Change: The score declined from 2 to 1 because President Bukele and his government forced the resignation of all five members of the Constitutional Chamber of the Supreme Court, along with scores of judges throughout the country.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 1 / 4 (-1)

In May 2021, the government-controlled Legislative Assembly removed from office the attorney general, Raúl Melara, and replaced him with the government-affiliated Rodolfo Delgado, in breach of the procedures laid out in the constitution.

Due process rights are constitutionally guaranteed but systematically violated. Human rights advocates report that police routinely carry out arbitrary arrests and detentions and fabricate and plant evidence. Defendants—especially those in pretrial detention—are provided inadequate access to effective legal counsel.

Progress on addressing crimes committed during the civil war has largely stalled.

Score Change: The score declined from 2 to 1 because the Bukele administration replaced the prosecutor general through unconstitutional procedures.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 2 / 4 (+1)

Crime and violence, much of which is linked to gangs, remain grave problems. Yet, 2020 and 2021 saw the lowest homicide rates in years. In 2020, according to statistics from the Salvadoran National Police, there were 20 homicides per 100,000 people; in 2021, the number dropped to 18 per 100,000. In comparison, in 2016, police recorded 5,278 homicides—a rate of approximately 80 per 100,000.

Civilians in El Salvador are vulnerable to forced disappearances. According to police figures, in 2020 there were 1,534 reports of missing persons, and 989 between January and June 2021. Relatives of the disappeared often fear reprisals for discussing their cases publicly.

Police and military forces have been implicated in hundreds of extrajudicial killings as part of the government's militarized response to gangs, with almost complete impunity. A report by the Observatory of Human Rights at the José Simeón Cañas University of Central America found that between 2015 and 2020, killings by police peaked in 2016 at 603 but have declined since, with 88 recorded cases in 2020.

Prisons remain overcrowded, and conditions for incarcerated people can be lethal due to disease, lack of adequate medical care, and the risk of violence. The “extraordinary measures” in prisons implemented by the Sánchez Cerén government in 2016 to increase security in prisons and upheld ever since have suspended family visits, limited access to lawyers, and undermined due process guarantees.

Score Change: The score improved from 1 to 2 because the number of victims of homicides and use of lethal force by law enforcement officers has dropped significantly in recent years.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 2 / 4

Men and women are granted equal rights under the law, but women are often subject to discrimination. Indigenous people disproportionately face poverty, unemployment, and labor discrimination. Certain other populations, particularly internally displaced persons and LGBT+ people, also have inadequate access to the justice system. Discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation is prevalent, and LGBT+ people are often the targets of hate crimes and violence, including by state security agents.

The government restricted the rights of asylum seekers by signing an agreement with the United States in September 2019, whereby El Salvador would accept asylum seekers trying to reach the United States and stop them from traveling north. Human rights groups objected, warning that the country was unsafe, but the two governments reportedly finalized the agreement in December 2020.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 8 / 16 (+1)

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 2 / 4 (+1)

Freedom of travel within El Salvador is complicated by gang activity. People living in the turf of one gang may suffer threats or violence when entering the turf of another gang, making it dangerous to travel, work, and attend school, especially for young men. Internal displacement due to gang-related crime and violence is commonplace.

Severe and lengthy restrictions on movement under the aegis of the COVID-19 pandemic were in place from March to August 2020.

Score Change: The score improved from 1 to 2 because disproportionate pandemic-related restrictions on movement were not reimposed.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 2 / 4

The rights to property and to start and run a business enjoy legal and regulatory protections. Businesses and citizens are regularly subject to extortion, chiefly by gangs.

Indigenous people face difficulties in securing land rights and accessing credit. Most Indigenous Salvadorans live on communal land or in rented accommodations.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 2 / 4

Men and women have equal legal rights on matters such as marriage and divorce, and there are few formal restrictions on such decisions. However, same-sex marriage and adoption remain illegal in El Salvador. The rights of transgender people were slightly expanded in January 2019, when a judge in the southern city of Zacatecoluca ruled in favor of a transgender woman who sought to update her name and gender on government-issued identification documents.

Abortion is punishable by imprisonment, including in cases where the pregnant person's life is at risk. Some women have been jailed despite credible claims that their pregnancies ended due to miscarriage.

The prevalence of adolescent pregnancy is a serious problem, accounting for approximately a third of all pregnancies, and many are the result of sexual assault. Female students with children often leave school, sometimes under pressure from their principals. Gender-based violence, including domestic violence, sexual violence, and femicide, is also common. An April 2019 report by the Organization of Salvadoran Women for Peace (OR-MUSA) indicated that the majority of sexual-assault survivors were girls between the ages of 12 and 17. El Salvador has one of Latin America's highest femicide rates.

There have been several reported incidents in recent years of femicide-suicide, in which women and girls die by suicide as a result of abuse. El Salvador remains one of the only countries in the world where this is considered a crime, and the first conviction was handed down in March 2019.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 2 / 4

El Salvador remains a source, transit, and destination country for the trafficking of women, children, and LGBT+ people. There are instances of forced labor in the construction and informal sectors. According to the 2021 edition of the US State Department's Trafficking in Persons Report, there has been a significant increase in prosecutions of traffickers, and 2019 legislation granted temporary residency rights to trafficking survivors. However, shelter and public services for survivors remain insufficient.

Children are vulnerable to economic exploitation, and child labor is a serious problem. Children perform dangerous jobs in agriculture and are recruited by gangs and other criminal elements to carry out illegal activities.

Equatorial Guinea

Population: 1,400,000

Capital: Malabo

Freedom Status: Not Free

Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: Equatorial Guinea holds regular elections, but the voting is neither free nor fair. The current president, who took power in a military coup that deposed his uncle, has led a highly repressive authoritarian regime since 1979. Oil wealth and political power are concentrated in the hands of the president's family. The government frequently detains the few opposition politicians in the country, cracks down on civil society groups, and censors journalists. The judiciary is under presidential control, and security forces engage in torture and other violence with impunity.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- In November, authorities raided several cities, arresting hundreds of foreign nationals particularly from other African countries with or without documentation or a residence permit. Some were expelled from the country without a court procedure.
- In March, an explosion in the city of Bata killed more than 100 people. The trial to prosecute the suspects, held in July, was handled by a military court without respect for due process rights, which failed to compensate the victims and their families.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 0 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 0 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

President Teodoro Obiang Nguema Mbasogo, Africa's longest-serving head of state, has held power since 1979. He was awarded a new seven-year term in the 2016 presidential election, ostensibly winning 93.5 percent of the vote in an unfair contest. The main opposition party at the time, Convergence for Social Democracy (CPDS), boycotted the election, and other factions faced police violence, detentions, and torture. One opposition figure who had been barred from running for president, Gabriel Nsé Obiang Obono, was put under house arrest during the election, and police used live ammunition against supporters gathered at his home.

The bicameral parliament consists of a 70-seat Senate and a 100-seat Chamber of Deputies, with members of both chambers serving five-year terms. Fifteen senators are appointed by the president, 55 are directly elected, and there can be several additional ex officio members. The Chamber of Deputies is directly elected.

In the 2017 legislative elections, the ruling Democratic Party of Equatorial Guinea (PDGE) and its allied parties won 99 seats in the lower house, all 55 of the elected seats in the Senate, and control of all municipal councils. The opposition Citizens for Innovation (CI), led by Nsé Obiang, took a single seat in the Chamber of Deputies and a seat on the capital city's council. CI was later banned, and the seat in parliament remained unfilled in 2021. The preelection media environment was tightly controlled, and a wave of arrests of CI supporters began when police dispersed an opposition rally ahead of the vote. Among other irregularities on election day, a ban on private vehicles prevented many voters from reaching distant polling stations, and polls closed one hour earlier than scheduled.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 0 / 4

Equatorial Guinea does not have an independent electoral body; the head of the National Election Commission during the 2017 elections was also the country's interior minister and a member of the ruling PDGE. Elections are not fairly managed in practice.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 0 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 0 / 4

The PDGE is the dominant party, operating in conjunction with a number of subordinate parties in its coalition. The opposition CI was officially banned as a political party in 2018, and its members face imprisonment and regular threats of imprisonment by the state.

Opposition leaders and members are subject to arrest, detention, and trial. Two members of the Coalition for the Restoration of Democracy (CORED), who were seized in Togo, and dissident members of the ruling PDGE were among a group of 130 defendants tried in 2019 for their alleged involvement in a 2017 coup attempt. Opposition leaders included in the prosecution and living in exile were tried in absentia. The court ultimately convicted 112 people and imposed harsh prison terms.

Equatorial Guinea has never experienced a peaceful transfer of power through elections. President Obiang appointed his son, Teodoro "Teodorín" Nguema Obiang Mangué, as vice president in 2016, paving the way for a dynastic succession.

Jesús Mitogo Oyono, CI's only lower house member, was not allowed to return to his seat after he was imprisoned on charges of sedition in 2018, even though he was pardoned and released later that year. He sought asylum in the United States in May 2020.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 0 / 4

The regime routinely uses the security forces to attack and intimidate opposition supporters, and political loyalty to the ruling party is treated as a condition for obtaining and keeping public-sector employment.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 0 / 4

The ethnic Fang majority dominates political life, leaving minority ethnic groups with little influence; power is concentrated in the hands of the president's family and allies from their region of origin. Women formally enjoy equal political rights, but hold few government positions, 23 percent of the seats in the Chamber of Deputies, and 17 percent of the seats in the Senate. They have little opportunity to independently advocate for their interests or organize politically. While no law explicitly prevents LGBT+ individuals from exercising their political rights, societal discrimination discourages them from participating openly and advocating for their welfare.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 0 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 0 / 4

The executive branch—headed by the president, who is not freely elected—sets and implements government policy, leaving the legislature no meaningful role in the policy-making process.

In August 2020, the president accepted the resignation of the prime minister and cabinet after criticizing them for mismanaging the economy and other shortcomings. However, most of the ministers were reappointed days later, including Prime Minister Francisco Pascual Obama Asue, who had held his post since 2016.

There are no independent anticorruption mechanisms, and the government is marred by nepotism and graft. Hiring and promotions within the government, army, and civil service favor those with ties to the president and his family. Though the government has taken some steps to address corruption—ratifying the UN Convention against Corruption in 2018 and the African Union's (AU) Convention on Preventing and Combating Corruption in 2019—the efforts have largely been superficial. Analysts believe the Senate's approval of a new anticorruption law in May 2021 is unlikely to have any effect.

One of the president's sons, Gabriel Mbega Obiang Lima, is the Minister of Mines and Hydrocarbons, granting him sweeping control over the country's natural resources and chief source of revenue. In January 2021, an unknown individual with knowledge of Obiang Lima's wrongdoing filed a corruption complaint in a Portuguese court against him. Vice President Teodorin has been the focus of money-laundering investigations in multiple countries. In July 2021, a French court upheld his conviction on money-laundering charges and embezzlement, and approved the seizure of his assets in France, including a luxurious building in Paris, which the government of Equatorial Guinea claimed was used for diplomatic purposes.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 0 / 4

The government's budget process and procurement system are opaque, as are the finances of state-owned companies. A significant percentage of revenue from the country's oil reserves are funneled to Obiang's allies through noncompetitive, nontransparent construction contracts, often for projects of questionable value. International financial organizations and human rights groups have criticized the government for pouring resources into wasteful infrastructure initiatives while neglecting health and social spending.

In 2020, authorities repeatedly attempted to suppress information about the COVID-19 pandemic and the government's response. In May, the government forced the World Health Organization (WHO) to withdraw its representative from the country, accusing her of inflating the case count. The move disrupted the reporting of case numbers for several weeks.

In September 2021, the International Monetary Fund requested a full audit of government contracts as part of an emergency loan to support the country's recovery from the coronavirus pandemic and the explosion in Bata.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 5 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 2 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 0 / 4

Press freedom is severely limited, despite constitutional protections. Most journalists consistently exercise self-censorship, and those who do criticize the regime are subject to dismissal and other reprisals. The country's only private television and radio broadcaster, RTV-Asonga, is controlled by Teodorin. The handful of private newspapers and magazines in operation face intense financial and political pressure and are unable to publish regularly. The government has sought to block access to the websites of opposition parties and exile groups since 2013, and online versions of some Spanish newspapers are regularly blocked. The government has obstructed access to the internet in times of political tension.

In April 2020, seven journalists from an Asonga TV talk show were suspended after they aired images of soldiers beating a man who had allegedly violated COVID-19-related restrictions.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 1 / 4

The constitution protects religious freedom, though in practice it is sometimes affected by the country's broader political repression and endemic corruption. The Roman Catholic Church is the dominant faith and is exempt from registration and permit requirements that apply to other groups. Government officials have reportedly been required to attend Catholic masses on ceremonial occasions, such as the president's birthday.

In April 2020, the government issued a decree to disband two religious groups on the grounds that they did not comply with COVID-19-related bans on church services and other gatherings. The dissolution decree took effect without due process and included deportation orders for foreign pastors associated with the groups.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 1 / 4

Academic freedom is politically constrained, and self-censorship among faculty is common. Some university professors and teachers have reportedly been hired or dismissed due to their political affiliations.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 0 / 4

Freedoms of personal expression and private discussion are restricted. The government uses informants and electronic surveillance to monitor members of the opposition, nongovernmental organizations (NGOs), and journalists, including the few members of the foreign press in the country. Critics of the government are subject to arbitrary arrest, physical abuse, and trumped-up charges.

In April 2020, a nurse was arrested after expressing concerns to a friend on WhatsApp about the lack of oxygen in a Malabo hospital; the message was shared widely beyond its original recipient. The nurse was released later in the month.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 0 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 0 / 4

Freedom of assembly is severely restricted. Opposition gatherings are typically blocked or dispersed by security forces, and citizens are sometimes pressured to attend progovernment events.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 0 / 4

All associations must register with the government through an onerous process, and independent NGOs face state persecution. In 2019, the Center for Studies and Initiatives for the Development of Equatorial Guinea (CEID-GE) was dissolved by government decree just a few months after its leader was placed under house arrest to prevent him from receiving a human rights award at a ceremony hosted by the French and German embassies.

Two activists who had been arrested in separate cases in 2019, Joaquín Eló Ayeto and Luis Nzó, were released in February and March 2020, reportedly without explanation. In May 2020, however, a group of soldiers stormed Eló Ayeto's house.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 0 / 4

The constitution provides for the right to organize unions, but there are many legal and practical barriers to union formation, collective bargaining, and strikes. The government has refused to register several trade unions; a farmers' organization is the only legal union.

F. RULE OF LAW: 0 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 0 / 4

The judiciary is not independent, and judges in sensitive cases often consult with the office of the president before issuing important rulings. Under the constitution, the president is the nation's first magistrate. He also oversees the body that appoints judges. The court system's impartiality is further undermined by corruption. Judges are regularly accused of taking bribes.

In January 2020, Antonio Ondo Abaga Maye, a judge in Malabo, was arrested without a warrant on orders from the government, apparently because he had released two individuals in an investigation under his purview. He was allegedly tortured while in detention.

In February 2020, security forces surrounded the home of former Supreme Court president Juan Carlos Ondó Angué, who had been dismissed in 2018 after supporting a colleague who resisted a government-backed corruption scheme and later died in detention. The arrival of Spanish, French, and US diplomats reportedly prevented Ondó Angué's arrest; he was accused of involvement in the alleged 2017 coup attempt. He is currently living in exile.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 0 / 4

Security forces routinely detain people without charge. In 2019, as the trial against alleged participants in the 2017 coup attempt was underway, President Obiang unilaterally appointed new magistrates and prosecutors by decree. The court convicted 112 of the defendants despite these failings, with some receiving 97-year prison sentences, and the verdicts were upheld on appeal in November 2020.

Military courts, which are empowered to try civilians for certain crimes, have even fewer due process protections than civilian courts and lack an avenue for appeal. In March 2020, a military court convicted 10 people suspected of links to the opposition Movement for the Liberation of Equatorial Guinea 3rd Republic (MLGE3R) after a closed-door trial held in a prison facility. They were found guilty of treason, espionage, and verbal abuse and insult of the head of state, receiving sentences of up to 90 years in prison.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 0 / 4

Beatings and torture by security forces are reportedly common. Defendants who were tried in 2019 for alleged involvement in the 2017 coup attempt claimed that they were tortured to extract confessions. Two of the defendants died in custody. Prisons are overcrowded and feature harsh conditions, including physical abuse, poor sanitation, and denial of medical care.

In March 2021, an explosion killed more than 100 people in the city of Bata. The trial to prosecute the suspects, held in July, was handled by a military court without respect for due process rights, which failed to compensate the victims and their families.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 0 / 4

Women face discrimination in employment and other matters, particularly in rural areas. Ethnic minority groups such as the Bubi, Ndowe, and Annobonese suffer persistent societal discrimination in the form of harassment from law enforcement officials or difficulties accessing public services.

Immigrants, including irregular migrants, are subject to raids, physical abuse, and extortion by police. Same-sex sexual activity is not illegal, but LGBT+ people face social stigma and mistreatment including street harassment and discrimination in the workplace.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 3 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 1 / 4

Freedom of movement is protected by law but restricted in practice through measures such as police checkpoints, which often require the payment of bribes. Authorities have denied opposition members and other dissidents' return from abroad or restricted their movements within the country.

Amid the travel restrictions imposed in response to the COVID-19 pandemic in 2020, individuals with dual nationality who were trying to return to their countries of residency abroad were pressured to give up their Equatoguinean nationality at the airport.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 1 / 4

Pervasive corruption and onerous bureaucratic procedures serve as major impediments to private business activity. Property rights are inconsistently respected by the government. Members of the Bubi minority have reported cases of land grabs by elites and the government in recent years.

Most women face disadvantages regarding inheritance and property rights under both the civil code and customary practices, though women enjoy greater customary rights among the Bubi.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 1 / 4

The civil code and customary law put women at a disadvantage with respect to personal status matters like marriage and child custody, with some exceptions among the Bubi. Laws against rape and domestic violence are not enforced effectively. The government does little to collect data, raise awareness, or support civil society efforts to combat such problems, which include sexual violence against minors and LGBT+ people. Child marriage is common, with the UN Children's Fund estimating that 30 percent of Equatoguinean women between the ages of 20 and 24 were married before age 18. The Education Ministry requires female students to take pregnancy tests and bars pregnant girls from attending school.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 0 / 4

The country's oil wealth is concentrated among the ruling elite, leaving much of the population without access to basic services. Equatorial Guinea continues to score poorly on social and economic development indicators, and economic conditions have worsened amid low oil prices in recent years.

Foreign workers in the oil and construction industries and a variety of other sectors are subject to passport confiscation and forced labor. In November 2021, authorities sent security forces to raid several cities, arresting hundreds of foreign nationals particularly from other African countries with or without documentation or a residence permit. Some were expelled from the country without a court procedure, as provided by law. Corrupt officials are often complicit in human trafficking, according to the US State Department.

Eritrea

Population: 3,600,000

Capital: Asmara

Freedom Status: Not Free

Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: Eritrea is a militarized authoritarian state that has not held a national election since independence from Ethiopia in 1993. The People's Front for Democracy and Justice (PFDJ), headed by President Isaias Afwerki, is the sole political party. Arbitrary detention is commonplace, and citizens are required to perform national service, often for their entire working lives. The government shut down all independent media in 2001.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- Eritrean forces continued to support the Ethiopian government's military campaign against the Tigrayan People's Liberation Front (TPLF), though they reportedly left three towns in the Tigray region in June. Eritrean forces were accused of committing human rights abuses during their deployment in Ethiopia, including the forcible repatriation of Eritrean refugees, killings, and rape.

- In January and February, 70 Evangelical and Orthodox Christians and 4 Jehovah's Witnesses were released from custody.
- Asmara otherwise maintained its limits on religious activity during the year. In March, 35 people were arrested while attending two prayer meetings. In May, the government interfered in the recognized Eritrean Orthodox Church (EOC) by installing a new patriarch.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 1 / 40A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 0 / 12*A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

Following Eritrea's formal independence from Ethiopia in 1993, an unelected Transitional National Assembly chose Isaias Afwerki to serve as president until elections could be held under a new constitution. He has remained in office since then, without ever obtaining a mandate from voters.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

A constitution ratified in 1997 but never instituted calls for an elected 150-seat National Assembly, which would choose the president from among its members by a majority vote. National elections have been postponed indefinitely, and the transitional assembly has not met since 2002. National elections have never been conducted. Periodic local and regional assembly elections are carefully orchestrated by the PFDJ and offer no meaningful choice to voters.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 0 / 4

The 1997 constitution calls for an electoral commission whose head is appointed by the president and confirmed by the National Assembly, but it has never been established. Electoral laws have not been finalized.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 0 / 16B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 0 / 4

The PFDJ is the only legally recognized political party in Eritrea. Alternative groups must operate from abroad among the diaspora. Groups were hosted in Ethiopia in the past, but its government ordered many of them to cease operations after the two countries sought rapprochement in 2018.

The Eritrean government holds prominent dissidents and family members in detention; a group of 11 has reportedly been held incommunicado since 2001. In September 2021, Amnesty International noted that nine may have died in detention. In addition, Ciham Ali Abdu, the daughter of former information minister Ali Abdu Ahmed, was detained in 2012 when she tried to flee to Sudan. Former finance minister Berhane Abrehe, meanwhile, was detained in 2018. Ciham and Berhane remain in custody.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 0 / 4

President Isaias and the PFDJ have been in power without interruption since independence. Since multiparty elections have never been allowed, opposition groups have had no opportunity to compete or enter government.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 0 / 4

Eritrean society is dominated by the military, with most citizens required to perform open-ended military or other national service. The authorities' intolerance of dissent and the absence of elections or opposition parties leaves individuals with no political options other than loyalty to the PFDJ, imprisonment, or illegal emigration.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 0 / 4

Women and various ethnic groups are nominally represented within the PFDJ but have no practical ability to organize independently or advocate for their interests through the political system.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 1 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 0 / 4

Power is concentrated in the hands of the unelected president, who reportedly determines policy with the help of an informal circle of advisers, leaving the cabinet and security officials to merely carry out his decisions. In 2016, the United Nations Human Rights Council (UNHRC) noted that military personnel were overrepresented among the president's closest associates.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 1 / 4

Petty bribery and influence peddling are thought to be endemic, and larger-scale corruption is a problem among some party officials and military leaders. The government's control over foreign exchange effectively gives it sole authority over imports. Those in the regime's favor profit from the smuggling and sale of scarce goods such as food, building materials, and alcohol. Senior military officials have allegedly profited from smuggling Eritreans out of the country. There are no independent agencies or mechanisms in place to prevent or punish corruption. Special anticorruption courts overseen by the military nominally exist but are mostly inactive.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 0 / 4

The government operates without public scrutiny. Basic data about the state budget and its appropriations are not publicly disclosed, and officials are not required to disclose their assets.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 2 / 60 (+1)

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 1 / 16 (+1)

D1. Are there free and independent media? 0 / 4

The government shut down all independent media outlets in 2001. Several outlets provide coverage to Eritreans from outside the country, including the British Broadcasting Corporation (BBC), Paris-based Radio Erena, and satellite station Asena TV. According to the Committee to Protect Journalists (CPJ), 16 journalists remain imprisoned for their work in Eritrea.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 1 / 4 (+1)

The government places strict limits on the exercise of religion. Eritrea officially recognizes only four faiths: Sunni Islam, Orthodox Christianity, Roman Catholicism, and Evangelical Lutheranism. Religious practice is prohibited among members of the military.

Asmara interferes in the practice of recognized faiths. The EOC's patriarch, Abune Antonios, was deposed in 2006 and expelled from the EOC for "heresy" in 2019. Abune has remained under house arrest. In May 2021, Asmara announced the election of Abune Qerlos as patriarch.

Followers of other denominations are subject to arrest, imprisonment, and the loss of property. Jehovah's Witnesses face severe persecution, including detention and denial of citizenship.

The government released several groups of religious prisoners in 2020 and continued to do so in 2021. Authorities released 70 Evangelical and Orthodox Christians and 4 Jehovah's Witnesses in the first two months of the year according to the UN's special rapporteur on human rights in Eritrea. However, authorities arrested 35 religious followers at two prayer meetings in March.

Score Change: The score improved from 0 to 1 because the government continued to release religious prisoners of conscience, including Evangelical and Orthodox Christians and Jehovah's Witnesses.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 0 / 4

Academic freedom is greatly constrained. Students in their last year of secondary school must perform military service at the Sawa military training center. In 2019, Human Rights Watch (HRW) reported that widespread physical and sexual abuse took place at Sawa. Former students say they were given insufficient food and were forced to perform manual labor.

From 2017 to 2019, the government took steps to nationalize an Islamic school in Asmara along with seven other schools operated by religious organizations, though no subsequent actions have been reported.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 0 / 4

Freedoms of expression and private discussion are severely inhibited by fear of government informants and the likelihood of arrest and arbitrary detention for any airing of dissent. The authorities regularly block access to social media platforms and shutter internet cafés.

Members of the Eritrean diaspora are, by comparison, better able to express dissent online. Activists have used internet platforms and protests to oppose the government and raise awareness of government abuses. However, members of the diaspora are also subject to government surveillance and harassment.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 0 / 12E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 0 / 4

Freedom of assembly is not recognized by the authorities. Public gatherings of more than seven people require a permit. Those who protest face the threat of deadly force at the hands of state security officers or arbitrary detention.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 0 / 4

The law requires all nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) to undergo an onerous and arbitrary annual registration process and limits their activities to providing humanitarian relief. In reality, there are no independent NGOs based in Eritrea. The government continues to deny permission for external human rights organizations to enter the country.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 0 / 4

While the Eritrean government has ratified the International Labour Organization's eight fundamental conventions, no independent trade unions function in Eritrea. The only union umbrella group, the National Confederation of Eritrean Workers, is affiliated with the PFDJ. According to reports to the UNHRC, the government has prevented new unions from being formed.

F. RULE OF LAW: 0 / 16F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 0 / 4

The judiciary has no independence from the executive branch. The Supreme Court called for in the constitution has never been established, nor has a Judicial Commission tasked with appointing judges. The president controls the appointment and dismissal of all judges; even nominally elected judges in local community courts are controlled by the Justice Ministry, according to UN investigators. Many judges are military officers.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 0 / 4

Basic principles of due process are systematically violated. Arbitrary arrests and detentions are common; targets include those who evade military service, try to flee the country, or are suspected of practicing an unauthorized religion. Eritreans who offend high-ranking government or party officials are also reportedly subject to arbitrary arrest.

Prisoners, including children, former members of the government, and their family members, are routinely held incommunicado for indefinite periods without charge or trial, with the authorities refusing even to inform family members whether they are still alive. There is no operational system of public defense lawyers. Thousands of political prisoners and prisoners of conscience remain imprisoned.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 0 / 4

UN investigators have described the routine and systematic use of physical and psychological torture in both civilian and military detention centers. Deaths in custody or in military service due to torture and other harsh conditions have been reported, though authorities do not investigate such incidents. Security forces employ lethal violence arbitrarily and with impunity. Individuals attempting to escape military service or flee the country have been fired on by soldiers.

Eritrean forces continued to operate in Ethiopia in support of Addis Ababa's military campaign against the TPLF during the year. In March 2021, Human Rights Concern-Eritrea reported that boys were being pressed into military service and sent to the Tigray region of Ethiopia. Asmara reportedly committed to withdrawing from Tigray in March, with Eritrean forces leaving three Tigrayan towns in June.

Eritrean forces engaged in violence against civilians during their deployment. In August 2021, Amnesty International reported that Eritrean forces and an Eritrean militia group engaged in rape in Tigray. In September, HRW reported that Eritrean forces killed and forcibly repatriated Eritrean refugees while deployed in Tigray.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 0 / 4

There are allegations that two of Eritrea's nine recognized ethnic groups, the Kunama and Afar, face severe discrimination, including exclusion from the government's poverty alleviation programs.

Laws mandate equal educational opportunity for women and equal pay for equal work. However, traditional societal discrimination against women persists in the countryside, and the deeply flawed legal system does not effectively uphold their formal rights.

Same-sex relations are criminalized, and LGBT+ people enjoy no legal protections from societal discrimination.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 1 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 0 / 4

Freedom of movement is heavily restricted. Eritreans young enough for national service are rarely given permission to go abroad, and those who try to travel outside the country without obtaining an exit visa face imprisonment. Individuals also require permits to travel within the country. Eritrean refugees and asylum seekers who are repatriated from other countries are subject to detention under harsh conditions.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 0 / 4

The national conscription system denies much of the working-age population the opportunity to establish and run their own businesses. Both the authorities and private actors with the regime's support can confiscate property and evict occupants without due process.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 1 / 4

Men and women have equal rights under laws governing marriage, nationality, and other personal status matters. However, girls in rural areas remain vulnerable to early or forced marriage. Rape of women and sexualized forms of violence against men are common in detention and in military service. Sexual assault of female conscripts is endemic and has not been thoroughly investigated by the authorities.

The government has banned the practice of female genital mutilation (FGM). In 2020, the government formed a steering committee and adopted a national action plan to halt FGM and other forms of gender-based violence. FGM remains widespread in rural areas, though awareness campaigns have contributed to a decline in the practice.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 0 / 4

Eritrea's conscription system ties most able-bodied men and women—including those under 18 who are completing secondary school—to obligatory military service, which can also entail compulsory, unpaid labor for enterprises controlled by the political elite. National service is supposed to last 18 months but is open-ended in practice. UN human rights experts have described this system as enslavement.

Estonia

Population: 1,300,000

Capital: Tallinn

Freedom Status: Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Estonia's democratic institutions are generally strong, and both political rights and civil liberties are widely respected. However, more than 5 percent of the population remains stateless and cannot participate in national elections. Corruption is a persistent challenge, as is discrimination against ethnic Russians, Roma, LGBT+ people, and others. Far-right and Euroskeptic forces have become increasingly vocal in Estonian politics in recent years.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- In response to the Center Party's alleged involvement in a high-profile corruption scandal, then prime minister Jüri Ratas resigned in January, leading to the collapse of his governing coalition. A new governing coalition, comprising the Center Party and the Reform Party, was formed later that month under the leadership of Reform Party leader Kaja Kallas, who became Estonia's first woman prime minister.
- In August, the parliament elected Alar Karis to the presidency. Karis was elected in the second round of voting, and took office after winning the support of all parliamentary parties except the far-right Conservative People's Party of Estonia (EKRE).
- A corruption scandal, known as the Porto Franco case, was publicly revealed in January. The case saw Center Party officials accused of agreeing to provide real estate developer Hillar Teder with access to high-profile development sites in Tallinn in return for a donation of €1 million (roughly $1.01 million) to the party; official investigations into the scandal were ongoing at year's end.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 38 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 12 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The prime minister, who serves as head of government, is nominated by the president and approved by the parliament. Following the 2019 parliamentary elections, then prime minister Jüri Ratas of the Center Party was reappointed for a second term as the head of a coalition government comprising the centrist-populist Center Party, the far-right EKRE, and the conservative Isamaa party.

The governing coalition collapsed in January 2021, when Ratas resigned after several leading officials in his Center Party were implicated in a high-level corruption investigation; Ratas denied any wrongdoing. A new governing coalition, comprising the Center Party and the Reform Party, was formed later that month under the leadership of Reform Party leader Kaja Kallas, who became Estonia's first woman prime minister.

The president is elected by the parliament to a five-year term, filling a largely ceremonial role as head of state. In August 2021, Alar Karis was elected as a nonpartisan consensus candidate in a second round of voting, winning the support of all parliamentary parties except the EKRE.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The constitution establishes a 101-seat, unicameral parliament, called the Riigikogu, whose members are elected for four-year terms using proportional representation in multi-member constituencies.

The March 2019 parliamentary elections met democratic standards. Like in previous elections in 2015, the voter turnout was about 64 percent. Five parties cleared the 5 percent vote threshold for representation, with the main opposition center-right Reform Party capturing a plurality with 34 seats. Electoral support for EKRE more than doubled, which translated into 19 seats. The incumbent Center Party won 26 seats, down one. The number of seats won by Isamaa and the left-wing Social Democratic Party (SDE) dropped to 12 and 10, respectively.

Local elections were held in October 2021 and saw a voter turnout of 54.7 percent, with 47 percent of all votes cast online.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 4 / 4

The legal framework for conducting elections is clear and fairly administered. Online voting is common and has gained in popularity. The 2019 parliamentary and 2021 local elections featured record turnout online demonstrating strong public confidence in the system.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 15 / 16B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 4 / 4

Estonia's political parties organize and operate freely, and the political landscape remains open and competitive.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 4 / 4

The country has undergone multiple democratic transfers of power between rival parties following elections over the past three decades, and opposition parties have a strong presence in the parliament.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 4 / 4

People's political choices are generally not subject to undue interference. However, there have been increasing concerns about the influence of online disinformation in recent years, particularly during election campaigns and about the COVID-19 pandemic.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 3 / 4

More than 5 percent of the country's population—mostly ethnic Russians—remain stateless and cannot participate in national elections. Resident noncitizens are permitted to vote in local and European Parliament elections but may not run as candidates or join political parties. The authorities have adopted policies to assist those seeking naturalization.

Political representation of women is gradually increasing. Former president Kersti Kaljulaid became the first woman in the country's history to hold her office when she was elected in 2016. Moreover, a record total of 29 women were elected to the 101-seat Riigikogu in 2019. After taking office in 2021, Prime Minister Kallas—the first woman to hold her post—appointed an almost equally gender-balanced cabinet.

The inclusion of the far-right EKRE in the governing coalition between 2019–21 raised political equality concerns among domestic and international observers due to the party's history of racist, sexist, anti-LGBT+, and White nationalist sentiments. The party returned to the opposition after former prime minister Ratas resigned in January 2021, but remained popular, taking 13.2 percent of all votes cast in the October local elections. Pushed back into the opposition, EKRE became the most popular party at the end of the year.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT 11 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 4 / 4

Both the government and the parliament are freely elected and function without interference from external or nonstate actors.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 3 / 4

The legal framework and independent law enforcement institutions provide important checks on corruption, and cases against high-profile defendants have been brought to court in recent years, though the results have been mixed. A trial that began in 2017 focused on Edgar Savisaar—former leader of the Center Party and Tallinn city mayor—and a number of codefendants who were accused of bribery, money laundering, and embezzlement. Savisaar was excused from the trial due to poor health in 2018, and defendants including the Center Party itself were punished with fines. A November 2020 Supreme Court ruling rejected appeals lodged by several government officials and businessmen who had been convicted for their roles in the case.

Another corruption scandal involving the Center Party emerged in January 2021, when it was revealed that party officials had allegedly agreed to provide real estate developer Hillar Teder with access to high-profile development sites in Tallinn, including the Porto Franco property, in return for a donation of €1 million (roughly $1.01 million) from Teder's son, Rauno Teder, to the party. The Center Party's involvement in the so-called Porto Franco scandal led to the resignation of then prime minister Jüri Ratas and the collapse of his Center Party–led governing coalition later that month. Official investigations into the scandal—including into Hillar Teder, who spent nearly two months in prison in connection with the case in early 2021—were ongoing at year's end.

In another high-profile case, Center Party politician and former Minister of Education and Research Mailis Reps was charged with fraud and embezzlement of ministry funds in November 2021. Reps stepped down as education minister in November 2020 and was stripped of parliamentary immunity in October 2021. The case was ongoing at year's end.

There are no comprehensive rules for the protection of whistleblowers, and lobbying is not sufficiently regulated.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 4 / 4

Estonia is known for its high degree of government transparency and well-developed e-governance services.

Public access to government information and the asset declarations of officials is provided for both in law and in practice. Estonia stands out as one of the EU's top performers in ensuring a transparent and effective public procurement system.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 56 / 60D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 16 / 16*D1. Are there free and independent media? 4 / 4

The government generally respects freedom of the press. However, judges have increasingly used the criminal procedure code to restrict media coverage in various cases of public interest, particularly those concerning corruption. Public and private television and radio stations broadcast freely, and there are a number of independent newspapers.

In recent years, EKRE leaders have verbally attacked journalists, raising concerns about self-censorship, and observers have noted a trend toward ownership concentration, especially at the regional level. Economic dislocation associated with the COVID-19 pandemic led to sharp declines in advertising revenue in 2020, which could exacerbate the media's vulnerability to editorial pressure.

The prevalence of antigovernment disinformation campaigns disseminated by pro-Kremlin Russian-language media outlets has reportedly increased in recent years, sparking concern among observers. However, Estonia's public Russian-language television station, ETV+, which offers an alternative to Russian-language stations that are based outside of Estonia, steadily increased its ratings during 2021.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 4 / 4

Religious freedom is respected in law and in practice. In 2020 and 2021, public gatherings, including religious services, were periodically restricted to contain the spread of the COVID-19.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

Academic freedom is generally respected. However, by law, public Russian-language high schools must teach 60 percent of their curriculum in the Estonian language.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 4 / 4

There are no significant constraints on the freedoms of personal expression and private discussion.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 12 / 12E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

The constitution guarantees freedom of assembly, and the government upholds this right in practice. Gatherings were temporarily restricted during 2020 and 2021 in response to the COVID-19 pandemic. Several large demonstrations were held during 2021, including numerous protests against COVID-19-related lockdown measures and vaccination mandates.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 4 / 4

The government upholds freedom of association and does not restrict or control the activities of nongovernmental organizations (NGOs).

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 4 / 4

The law recognizes workers' rights to organize, strike, and bargain collectively, although public servants at the municipal and state levels may not strike. While these rights are largely upheld in practice, union membership is low, and employers in some sectors have resisted bargaining efforts.

F. RULE OF LAW: 14 / 16F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 4 / 4

The judiciary is independent and generally free from government or other interference.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 4 / 4

Legal processes in civil and criminal matters are generally free and fair. Laws prohibiting arbitrary arrest and detention and ensuring the right to a fair trial are largely observed. A July 2021 European Commission report noted that the judicial system continued to operate “without notable disruption” during the COVID-19 pandemic, attributed largely to the system’s “advanced level of digitalization.”

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 3 / 4

While Estonians generally enjoy physical security, the country’s steadily declining intentional homicide rate remains one of the highest in the EU. There have been reports of law enforcement officials using excessive force when arresting suspects. Some inmates reportedly have inadequate access to health care. Estonia has a relatively high incarceration rate, with about 184 people per 100,000 residents in prisons as of 2020.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 3 / 4

The constitution and laws provide broad safeguards against discrimination based on race, gender, language, sexual orientation, and other such categories. However, Russian-speaking residents continue to face societal discrimination, and some statutes lack robust protections against such bias. Gender discrimination is also a problem, particularly in employment, and the gender pay gap is among the highest in the EU, though it has decreased in recent years. Roma face employment discrimination and disparities in educational outcomes.

The rhetoric and ideological beliefs of many active EKRE members have increased the prevalence of hostile and extremist views toward the Jewish community, LGBT+ people, and Muslims, as well as other marginalized groups. In 2020, the European Commission began infringement proceedings against Estonia for failing to match EU regulations for prosecuting hate crimes and criminalizing hate speech in domestic laws; legislation resolving the discrepancies had not been passed as of the end of 2021.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 14 / 16G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

Citizens and residents enjoy free movement inside Estonia, and there are no significant restrictions on international travel. Movement restrictions imposed during 2020–21 in response to the COVID-19 pandemic were generally regarded as proportionate to the health threat. Most COVID-19-related movement restrictions were lifted by June 2021.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 4 / 4

The legal and regulatory framework is generally supportive of property rights and entrepreneurship, and residents can freely engage in private business activity in practice.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 3 / 4

While individual freedom on personal status issues such as marriage and divorce is generally upheld, same-sex marriage is not recognized. At the end of 2021, the parliament had yet to adopt necessary amendments for the implementation of a 2014 law permitting same-sex civil unions. In September 2021, the Supreme Court ruled that—like for opposite-sex partners—constitutional protections against state interference in family life apply to same-sex couples that live together. Gender-based violence (GBV), including domestic violence, remains a serious problem.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 3 / 4

There are legal safeguards against exploitative working conditions, and they are generally enforced in practice. The government makes serious and sustained efforts to prosecute those responsible for human trafficking and provide services to victims, though it has encountered difficulties in adequately punishing convicted traffickers and identifying victims, according to the US State Department.

Estonia's unemployment rate, which had reached 8.7 percent by the end of March 2021 due to the effects of the COVID-19 pandemic, fell to 5.2 percent by year's end. Nearly a quarter of the population remains at risk of poverty or social exclusion.

Eswatini

Population: 1,100,000

Capital: Mbabane (administrative), Lobamba (legislative, royal)

Freedom Status: Not Free

Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: Eswatini (known internationally as Swaziland until 2018) is a monarchy currently ruled by King Mswati III. The king exercises ultimate authority over all branches of the national government and effectively controls local governance through his influence over traditional chiefs. Political dissent and civic and labor activism are subject to harsh punishment under sedition and other laws. Additional human rights problems include impunity for security forces and discrimination against women and LGBT+ people.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- Unprecedented prodemocracy and antigovernment demonstrations began in May and continued across the country throughout the year, despite an October ban on protests. Security forces responded violently to the demonstrations, employing disproportionate force to suppress the protests, which resulted in the deaths of more than 80 people; hundreds were injured, and more than 1,000 people were arrested.
 - In July the Southern African Development Community (SADC), of which Eswatini is a member, initiated a fact-finding mission in response to the “political and security disturbances” in the country. SADC envoys returned in October as the protests continued, and the South African president met with the king to discuss resolutions to the crisis in November; opposition parties supported the involvement of the SADC, but the government denied them meaningful consultation with SADC representatives.

- The king appointed Cleopas Dlamini as prime minister in July, filling the vacancy left by former prime minister Ambrose Mandvulo Dlamini, who died from COVID-19 in 2020.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 1 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 0 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

The king is the chief executive authority and is empowered to appoint and dismiss the prime minister and members of the cabinet. Mswati III took the throne in 1986, four years after the death of his father, King Sobhuza II.

The prime minister is ostensibly the head of government but has little practical power. Cleopas Siphos Dlamini was appointed prime minister in July 2021, succeeding acting prime minister Themba Masuku, who temporarily held the position after former prime minister Ambrose Mandvulo Dlamini died of COVID-19 in December 2020.

Traditional chiefs govern their respective localities and typically report directly to the king. While some chiefs inherit their positions according to custom, others are appointed through royal interventions, as allowed by the constitution.

The 73-member House of Assembly, the lower chamber of the bicameral Parliament, includes 59 members elected by popular vote within the tinkhundla system, which allows local chiefs to vet candidates and influence outcomes in practice; the king appoints 10 members. If female representation does not exceed 30 percent of the lower house, an additional four women may be elected by the body; parliamentarians did so in November 2018.

The king appoints 20 members of the 30-seat Senate, the upper chamber, with the remainder selected by the House of Assembly. All members of Parliament serve five-year terms. After the parliamentary elections in September 2018, the king appointed six members of the royal family to the House of Assembly and eight to the Senate. The elections, which were tightly controlled and featured a slate of candidates almost entirely loyal to the king, did not offer voters a genuine choice.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 0 / 4

The Elections and Boundaries Commission (EBC) is not considered impartial. It is financially and administratively dependent on the executive, and its members are appointed by the king on the advice of the Judicial Service Commission, whose members are also royal appointees. Details of the results of September 2018 parliamentary elections were only made public in March 2019.

Traditional chiefs also play an important role in elections, as candidates effectively need their approval to run for office.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 1 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 0 / 4

Election to public office is based on “individual merit,” according to the constitution. There is no legal avenue for parties to register and participate in elections, though some political associations exist without legal recognition. Over the years, political parties seeking legal recognition have suffered court defeats, including a Supreme Court ruling in 2018 rejecting a challenge by the Swazi Democratic Party (SWADEPA) to the ban on political parties competing in elections.

A number of prodemocracy organizations and trade unions have continued to lobby for political reforms and have publicly challenged Mswati's grip on power, even given the serious risks involved. The government has used increasingly repressive tactics to stifle rising prodemocracy activism in recent years; those calling for political reform often face arbitrary arrest, harassment, and assault at the hands of security forces, who regularly use excessive force. In December 2019, the police raided the homes of prominent opposition leaders, arresting and briefly detaining several individuals. Although the police denied targeting prodemocracy activists, the arrests indicated the authorities' intolerance of political reform efforts. In July 2021, two prodemocracy members of Parliament, Mduduzi Bacede Mabuza and Mthandeni Dube, were arrested on terrorism charges amid a government crackdown on political dissent following the widespread antigovernment protests that began in May. The parliamentarians remained in detention at year's end.

The king has tight control over the political system in law and in practice, leaving no room for the emergence of an organized opposition with the potential to enter government. The vast majority of candidates who contested the 2018 general elections were supporters of the king. Parliamentarians often self-censor in fear of retaliation.

The king called for Sibaya—a meeting of the nation traditionally held once a year—to be held in July 2021, claiming the meeting would serve as a platform for a national dialogue. Nearly all of Eswatini's political opposition rejected the Sibaya, calling the process one-sided. At the meeting, only Mswati, who openly ridiculed calls for democratic reforms, was given the opportunity to speak. Opposition groups were also excluded from discussions between the government and the SADC delegation sent to Eswatini in July to assess the political situation in the country.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 0 / 4

Traditional chiefs, as the king's representatives, wield enormous influence over their subjects. In addition to vetting prospective candidates for office, they have been accused of ordering residents to vote or not vote for certain candidates.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 1 / 4

There are virtually no members of minority groups in the government, as most officials have some connection to the royal family or its broader clan. Women are politically marginalized, with the lower house of Parliament falling well short of a 30 percent gender quota after the 2018 elections. Even after the invocation of the Election of Women Members to the House of Assembly Act, which allowed for the selection of another four female legislators, women only represent 9.6 percent of the House of Assembly. Women hold 40 percent of seats in the Senate, which is not directly elected.

Customary restrictions on widows in mourning—a period that can last from one to three years—effectively bar women from participating in public affairs during that time. LGBT+ people and people with disabilities are also politically marginalized.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 0 / 12C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 0 / 4

The king and his government determine policy and legislation; members of Parliament hold no real power and effectively act as a rubber stamp in approving the king's legislative priorities. Parliament cannot initiate legislation and has little oversight or influence on budgetary matters. The king is also constitutionally empowered to veto any legislation. The absolute authority of the king was demonstrated by his decision to rename the country in 2018 without any constitutional process or parliamentary approval.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 0 / 4

Corruption is a major problem, and implicated officials generally enjoy impunity. The Anti-Corruption Commission (ACC) is perceived to be ineffective, with civil society groups accusing it of pursuing politically motivated cases and serving the interests of the prime minister. The ACC, which reports to the Justice Ministry, lacks adequate financial and human resources and must consult with the minister on hiring. In 2018, a cabinet committee was established to develop a zero-tolerance policy on corruption in government, but its ability to create an effective anticorruption framework remains unclear. The Tibiyo Taka Ngwane (Wealth of the Nation) investment fund, managed by Mswati, has reportedly been used for the king's personal gain, with PUDEMO accusing him of using it to bolster his personal income as far back as 2011.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 0 / 4

Eswatini lacks access-to-information laws, and there is no culture of proactive disclosure of government information. Public requests for information are largely ignored in practice, and the budgeting process lacks transparency. The authorities tightly restrict access to data on spending by the royal family and the security forces. Transparency was further reduced by Parliament's passage of the Public Service Act in 2018, which broadly prevents officials from providing public information to the media unless given express permission by the secretary of the cabinet.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 16 / 60 (-2)D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 5 / 16*D1. Are there free and independent media? 1 / 4

A variety of laws, including the Sedition and Subversive Activities Act (SSAA) and defamation laws, can be used to restrict media coverage by criminalizing publications that are alleged to be seditious, as well as the use of words that are alleged to be seditious, for example, those that "may excite disaffection" against the king. Journalists often face harassment, assault, and intimidation, and self-censorship is reportedly common. The state broadcaster is tightly controlled by the government, and the Swazi Observer, a major newspaper, is effectively owned by the king.

Several journalists faced questioning, detention, or other forms of scrutiny for their reporting or their own political activity during 2020 and 2021. Numerous journalists fled the country in 2020 after being detained and physically assaulted by police for their work. In July 2021, two South African journalists covering the antigovernment protests were arrested and reportedly tortured by Eswatini security forces.

In response to the use of social media to promote the widespread protests that took place throughout the year, the government twice blocked internet access in the country in 2021. In late June, the Eswatini Communications Commission (ESCCOM) ordered communications providers to impose a countrywide internet shutdown; internet service was not restored until more than a week later. A second internet blackout was briefly imposed in October.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 2 / 4

The constitution guarantees religious freedom and bars discrimination based on religion. Rules requiring registration of religious organizations are not strictly enforced. However, members of the Muslim minority allege discrimination by officials and Christian residents, and police reportedly monitor mosques. Non-Christian groups are also denied airtime on state broadcasters. Construction of religious buildings must be approved by the government or local chiefs. Christian education is compulsory in public schools, and in 2017, the government banned the teaching of other religions in the public-school curriculum.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 1 / 4

Academic freedom is limited by restrictive laws such as the Suppression of Terrorism Act (STA) and the SSAA. Student activists face potential violence, arrest, and suspension.

Constitutional rights to free expression are severely restricted in practice. Security agencies reportedly monitor personal communications, social media, and public gatherings, and criticism of the king or other elements of the regime can be punished under laws such as the SSAA, the STA, and the Public Order Act. Any criticism of Swazi culture and traditions or defacement of national symbols—including the king's image—can draw fines and up to two years in prison.

The government's crackdown on dissent in response to the widespread prodemocracy protests in 2021 led to a further deterioration of free expression within the country. In June, the king issued a decree banning citizens from delivering petitions to the government, though officials denied that the ban was intended to prevent citizens from "raising grievances." Prodemocracy activists faced harassment and arbitrary detentions throughout the year; in July, two prominent prodemocracy parliamentarians, Mduduzi Bacede Mabuza and Mthandeni Dube, were arrested under the STA.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 2 / 12 (–1)

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 0 / 4 (–1)

Freedom of assembly is restricted. Surveillance of protests is common, and the information collected is reportedly used to deny protesters access to government jobs and services. Demonstrations, notably by public workers demanding higher wages, are often violently dispersed by police, and protesters risk arrest and detention. Nevertheless, labor and prodemocracy protests have taken place in spite of these risks. Demonstrations that are not perceived as a direct challenge to the king have been allowed to go forward.

Widespread prodemocracy protests began in May 2021 and continued throughout the year. The protests escalated in June, after Mswati banned citizens from petitioning the government. Security forces attempted to suppress the demonstrations, subjecting numerous peaceful protesters to arbitrary arrests and using indiscriminate force to disperse gatherings, resulting in the deaths of more than 80 people; hundreds more were hospitalized for their injuries. Eswatini authorities further attempted to repress dissent by imposing a nationwide curfew in June, in addition to temporary internet blackouts in June, July, and October; a curfew remained in place at year's end. Demonstrations continued throughout the year, despite an official ban on protests issued in October.

Score Change: The score declined from 1 to 0 because the authorities responded to demonstrations with lethal force, arrests, curfews, and internet disruptions,²⁶ and because the government eventually banned protests.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 1 / 4

The operation of nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) has been inhibited by broadly written sedition and terrorism laws as well as police monitoring and interference. Organizations that advocate for democracy remain banned.

Despite such restrictions, it appears there is limited tolerance of some forms of human rights-based legal activism. For example, Women and Law Southern Africa–Swaziland was allowed to bring a case on gender equality in divorce settlements, with the court deciding in its favor in 2019. In October 2020, the Southern Africa Litigation Centre was allowed to submit an opinion on a pending cybercrime bill to Parliament.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 1 / 4

Eswatini has active, vocal labor unions, but workers' rights are poorly upheld in practice. Although workers in most sectors, with the exception of essential services defined by the labor minister, can join unions, strikes and other labor activism routinely trigger crackdowns and arrests by the police. A number of prodemocracy activists and former trade unions are exiled in South Africa, where they have been accommodated by South Africa's Congress of South African Trade Unions (COSATU)—whose members periodically picket against the Eswatini government on South Africa's border with the country.

F. RULE OF LAW: 4 / 16 (-1)

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 2 / 4

Although the judiciary displays a degree of independence in some cases, the king holds ultimate authority over the appointment and removal of judges, acting on advice from the Judicial Service Commission made up of royal appointees.

In a rare instance of judicial review that sought to change gender power relations, the High Court of Eswatini in August 2019 ruled in favor of gender equality in civil marriages regarding property rights in the event of divorce.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 1 / 4

Safeguards against arbitrary arrest and detention, such as time limits on detention without charge, are not always respected in practice. Detainees are generally granted access to lawyers, though only those facing life imprisonment or capital punishment can obtain counsel at public expense. Lengthy pretrial detention is common.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 0 / 4 (-1)

Despite the 2018 passage of the Police Service Act, which prescribes disciplinary measures for police officers who use illegitimate force, physical abuse of suspects and inmates by law enforcement officials is an ongoing problem, and investigations into such abuse lack independence and transparency.

The May 2021 death of Thabani Nkomonye, a student allegedly killed by police using excessive force, sparked a series of protests against police brutality that evolved into widespread antigovernment demonstrations. Security forces responded to the protests with disproportionate force, assaulting protesters and violently dispersing gatherings by shooting live ammunition. At least 200 people were hospitalized and more than 80 were reportedly killed by security forces during the prodemocracy protests. Reports of increased state repression and violence in response to the demonstrations prompted the SADC to send a fact-finding mission to Eswatini, a member country, in July, with the support of Eswatini opposition leaders; SADC representatives returned to the country several times throughout the year as the protests continued. As part of the SADC's involvement, the South African president met with Mswati in November to discuss resolutions to the "political and security situation" in the country.

Some prisons also suffer from overcrowding and other harsh conditions. According to Amnesty International, over 1,000 people were arbitrarily arrested during the 2021 protests, many of whom were reportedly tortured while detained.

Score Change: The score declined from 1 to 0 because the authorities employed excessive force in response to antigovernment protests, including live ammunition and torture.

Women's rights remain restricted in law and in practice. Both civil and customary law treat women as dependents of their fathers or husbands, and societal discrimination further impairs their access to education and employment. Residents who are not ethnic Swazis also face de facto discrimination. People with disabilities experience social stigma as well as discrimination in education and employment. In 2018, King Mswati signed the Persons with Disabilities Act, intended to address many of the inequities experienced by disabled residents.

Discrimination against LGBT+ people is not prohibited by law and is widespread in practice. A criminal ban on same-sex sexual activity is not regularly enforced. In October 2020, the High Court considered a challenge from an NGO advocating for LGBT+ rights, Eswatini Sexual and Gender Minorities, to be added to the government's registrar of companies. The court had not ruled on the case before the end of 2021.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 5 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 2 / 4

The constitution guarantees freedom of movement. However, minority ethnic groups and political activists have faced delays in obtaining passports and other citizenship documents. Traditional chiefs regulate movement and residence within their communities and generally deny access to groups advocating for human rights or democracy. Individuals who violate customary rules can face eviction from their localities. Widows in mourning are barred from approaching chiefs or the king and excluded from certain public places and activities. However, no broad-based policies or practices prevent or punish internal movement generally.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 1 / 4

The constitution provides legal protections for property rights, but women generally face limitations under customary rules that subordinate them to male relatives. Widows in particular face displacement by the deceased husband's family. Chiefs have broad authority to allocate and withdraw rights to communal land. However, some progress was made in 2019, when the High Court ruled in favor of gender equality in civil marriages, granting women property rights in the event of divorce.

Individuals sometimes face expropriation due to land claims by state-owned companies and powerful private interests. Constitutional guarantees of fair compensation are not upheld in practice.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 1 / 4

Women's social freedoms are restricted by both civil and customary law, which puts them at a disadvantage regarding marriage, divorce, and child custody. Customary law allowed girls as young as 13 to marry. Sexual and domestic violence remains extremely common; in March 2020, the UN resident coordinator for Eswatini reported that 48 percent of Swazi women and girls experience sexual violence in their lifetimes. Punishment for perpetrators is often lenient.

The Eswatini government made progress on women's rights in 2019 by amending the 1964 Marriage Act to prohibit marriages of persons under the age of 18 and passing the Sexual Offences and Domestic Violence Act, which criminalizes nonconsensual sex between spouses.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 1 / 4

Residents have some access to formal employment and economic opportunity, but the majority of the population lives in poverty. Forced labor remains a problem, with some chiefs compelling Swazis, including children, to work in their communities or the king's fields. Among other forms of child labor, girls are particularly vulnerable to domestic servitude and commercial sexual exploitation. The royal family has extensive privileges compared to ordinary citizens.

Ethiopia

Population: 117,800,000

Capital: Addis Ababa

Freedom Status: Not Free

Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: The appointment of Prime Minister Abiy Ahmed, who came to power after Prime Minister Hailemariam Desalegn resigned in the face of mass protests, set off a transitional period in Ethiopia. Abiy pledged to reform Ethiopia's authoritarian state, and has held elections and implemented some liberalization policies. However, Ethiopia remains beset by political factionalism and intercommunal violence, abuses by security forces and violations of due process are still common, and many restrictive laws remain in force. Since late 2020, fighting between the Federal Government and the Tigray Defense Force (TDF) has led to the displacement of hundreds of thousands and credible allegations of atrocity crimes, and violence has spilled over into neighboring regions.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- Early in the year, human rights organizations and media outlets began to report allegations of atrocity crimes in Tigray Region. These included alleged massacres of Tigrayans by Eritrean Defense Forces aligned with the federal government, and sexual violence against civilians. Outside of Tigray, hundreds of civilians were killed in Benishangul Gumuz, Oromia, and Amhara regions, largely on the basis of their ethnicity.

- In June, Ethiopia held much-anticipated elections for 436 of the 547 constituencies of the House of People's Representatives and regional councils. Due to security and logistical challenges, voting was postponed in several parts of the country and indefinitely suspended in Tigray. While there were some improvements under the leadership of an increasingly independent National Electoral Board of Ethiopia (NEBE), a lack of participation by key political groups and intimidation of registered opposition parties and media undermined the credibility of the process and outcomes.
- In June, following the elections and as Tigrayan forces moved quickly to retake control of Mekelle and most parts of the region, the federal government announced a unilateral cease-fire. While accepting the cease-fire in principle, the TDF set out conditions for ending fighting, including the removal of Amhara and Eritrean forces from occupied parts of Tigray, the restoration of the Tigrayan People's Liberation Front (TPLF) regional government, and unfettered humanitarian access. When conditions were not met, the TDF launched attacks in neighboring Amhara and Afar Regions—leading to the mobilization of regular forces and militias in those regions and further expanding the conflict.
- In October the TDF pushed further into Amhara, capturing towns as far south as North Shewa. In response, the federal government announced a nationwide, six-month state of Emergency (SOE), under which thousands of individuals, mostly Tigrayans, were detained under suspicion of supporting armed groups. The federal government retook Afar and Amhara Regions in December but refrained from pursuing the TDF, which retreated to Tigray.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 12 / 40 (+3)

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 2 / 12 (+2)

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 1 / 4 (+1)

The president is the head of state and is indirectly elected to a six-year term by both chambers of Parliament. The prime minister is head of government, and is selected by the largest party in Parliament after elections, or in the case of a resignation.

General elections originally set for August 2020 were held in June 2021 but did not take place in Tigray, Harari, and Somali Regions, and parts of Oromia, Amhara, Afar, and Benishangul-Gumuz, and Southern Nations, Nationalities, and Peoples' Regions due to insecurity and logistical challenges including challenges with voter registration. An estimated 37 million people registered to vote, and some 90 percent of registered voters cast a ballot. Final results from the NEBE confirmed a majority for the Prosperity Party, which won over 410 of 436 constituencies contested. While a new election date was set for 73 of the constituencies where elections had been delayed, polls were indefinitely postponed in Tigray.

With a majority in Parliament, Prime Minister Abiy's Prosperity Party formed a new cabinet that included three opposition party members. In October 2021, Abiy was sworn in for a new five-year mandate. Despite the landslide victory for Abiy and the Prosperity Party, the results were contested by political actors who were excluded or who did not participate in the process due to perceived unfairness.

Score Change: The score improved from 0 to 1 because despite postponements, electoral flaws, and insecurity, the year's election offered voters a greater degree of choice than in previous years.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 1 / 4 (+1)

The bicameral Parliament includes the 153-seat House of Federation, whose members are elected by state assemblies to five-year terms, and the House of People's Representatives, with 547 members directly elected to five-year terms.

The 2021 parliamentary and regional elections were seen as an opportunity for the country to break from its past of undemocratic elections. Changes in electoral laws and reform of the National Electoral Board of Ethiopia, which came under the leadership of former opposition party leader, Birtukan Mideksa, improved the body's operations and encouraged far more opposition parties to participate than ever before. A total of 47 political parties participated in the elections, fielding more than 8,200 candidates.

Despite these improvements, the elections were fraught with the previously described insecurity, registration problems, and other challenges that limited widespread acceptance of the outcomes as free and fair. In addition, numerous political parties raised concerns about the closure of their offices by security agents, harassment, imprisonment, and the killing of at least one candidate, which his supporters described as a probable assassination. In this context, key opposition groups boycotted the election, resulting in many uncontested seats. While more competitive than previous elections—the 2021 still fell short of conferring broad-based legitimacy to the elected government among significant political factions in the country.

Score change: The score improved from 0 to 1 because despite postponements, electoral flaws, and insecurity, the year's election offered voters a greater degree of choice than in previous years.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 2 / 4

Several reforms to the electoral system and its oversight have taken shape under Prime Minister Abiy. In August 2019, Parliament unanimously passed the Ethiopian Election, Political Parties Registration, and Election Ethics law. The new legal framework reduced restrictions that had limited the participation of opposition groups, and failed to recognize voting rights of marginalized sections of the population such as international displaced persons (IDPs) and prisoners.

Challenges that arose during the 2021 polls tested the impartiality and credibility of NEBE and the broader electoral framework, including regarding the participation of imprisoned political candidates. One party, the Balderas for True Democracy, sought legal recourse to ensure imprisoned candidates were registered and succeeded when the Federal High Court directed NEBE to allow the jailed candidates to participate. NEBE initially resisted the court order, saying ballots had already been printed, but ultimately reprinted ballots to include the Balderas candidates. The case demonstrated a small but significant improvement in judicial oversight and compliance with the electoral laws.

The lack of a complete census remains a major impediment to the demarcation of constituencies that ensure fair representation based on accurate population estimates. With the exception of the newly established Sidama regional state, the distribution of electoral constituencies in 2021 has not changed from the original distribution established in 1995.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 4 / 16B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 1 / 4

The transition beginning in 2018 initially brought progressive political reforms, but crackdowns in 2020—first after the assassination of Oromo musician Hachalu Hundessa and its aftermath in June, and then after the beginning of the conflict in Tigray in November—harmed political pluralism. Since then, in May 2021, the House of Peoples' Representatives designated the TPLF and the (OLF-Shene), an armed breakaway group of the Oromo Liberation Front (OLF), as terrorist organizations, accusing them of carrying out acts of politically motivated violence against government and civilian targets. As a consequence, hundreds of Tigrayans accused of being affiliated with the TPLF have faced arrest and other pressure. Oromo political leaders have also faced pressure, including OLF chairman Dawud Ibsa who was placed under house arrest in May. Prominent political figures arrested after the assignation of Hachalu Hundessa—including Eskinder Nega, Jawar Mohamed, and Bekele Gerba—remain in prison, over a year after their arrest due to procedural delays in their trials.

Changes that Abiy's government began to implement in 2018 improved conditions for opposition groupings, though the Prosperity Party still maintains numerous formal and informal advantages over opposition parties due to its effective incumbency. The party won a landslide victory in 2021 polls, taking almost 95 percent of the 436 constituency seats contested in June. However, numerous opposition candidates entered the new parliament compared to past elections, and some hold cabinet seats. However, key opposition groups including the Oromo Federalist Congress (OFC), the Ogaden National Liberation Front (ONLF), and the OLF boycotted elections (the latter after being disqualified by NEBE), citing electoral mismanagement and harassment by the ruling party.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 1 / 4

The 2018 reforms allowed many constituencies to exercise their political rights more freely. However, the designation in 2021 of armed political groups such as the TPLF as terrorist organizations has been detrimental for the political support base of the party, which had dominated national and regional politics in Tigray for the past three decades.

The Tigray conflict also led Prime Minister Abiy to seek external military and political support from President Isaias Afwerki of Eritrea, to combat the TPLF. The presence within Tigray of the Eritrean Defense Forces—who have been accused of widespread atrocities and sexual violence—has exacerbated the conflict and remains an impediment to its resolution.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 1 / 4

Since 1991, political parties in Ethiopia have primarily been based on ethnicity. However, upon coming to office, Abiy Ahmed has advocated a message of national unity and expressed disagreement with the enduring legacies of ethnic politics. In the past year, political alliances between major political factions within the country have realigned, with Tigrayan and Oromo parties, on the one hand, urging for more decentralized power to ethnically defined regions, and mostly Amhara and other political parties, on the other hand, generally in favor of non-ethnically defined federalism and a greater unifying role played by the central government. Public opinion polling from 2020 indicate that Ethiopians are evenly split between preference for ethnic and non-ethnic federation. These divergent perspectives have fomented the ongoing conflict in Tigray and neighboring regions, and have hardened as a result of it.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 4 / 12 (+1)

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 1 / 4 (+1)

Political reforms that began in 2018 helped to create an atmosphere where opposition parties can win elected office. However, the shortcomings of the 2021 elections, including a climate of insecurity and growing repression of some opposition groups, suggest that gains have become forestalled and, in the absence of stability, may eventually be reversed.

Some areas plagued by insecurity remain out of the control of government—such as Tigray—while others have been under prolonged states of emergency, with heightened military presence and control—including parts of Oromia, Amhara, and Benishangul Gumuz.

Score Change: The score improved from 0 to 1 because the government was selected via a more representative electoral process than in previous years.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 2 / 4

Corruption and unequal resource distribution are significant problems that have contributed to the recent unrest that has plagued Ethiopia. The government has taken some steps to address the issue, which remains a priority for Prime Minister Abiy's administration.

Numerous high-profile military and government officials were arrested and charged with corruption since 2018, and a handful have been convicted.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 1 / 4

The Prosperity Party made some initial attempts to be more transparent than its predecessors, but its actions have reflected an inability or unwillingness to operate with openness and transparency.

Authorities have notably been opaque and at times dishonest about the presence and role of Eritrean forces in Tigray. While state media and the government's official communications throughout 2021 emphasized the limited nature of what it has termed a "law enforcement operation," media and other reports of alleged atrocities, sexual violence, and expanding conflict have contradicted the government's narrative.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 11 / 60 (-2)

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 4 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 1 / 4

After years of severe restrictions on press freedom, Abiy's government took initial steps to increase freedoms for independent media, and notably released a number of prominent journalists from prison in 2018. However, independent journalists remain constrained by security imperatives that limit their ability to work and travel.

In 2021, international and Ethiopian journalists and media networks came under government pressure over coverage of internal conflicts and political dynamics, resulting in some cases in expulsions from the country and revocation of licenses. Several Ethiopian journalists were also imprisoned without charges. By the end of 2021, Ethiopia topped the list of countries with the most journalists in jail, ranked second highest in sub-Saharan Africa, only after Eritrea. Additionally, effective October 29, 2021, the Ethiopia Media Authority banned local Ethiopian broadcasters from transmitting programs from foreign media outlets.

In the early months of the conflict in Tigray, the lack of telephone and internet connectivity and the inability for journalists to travel and cover developments in the region, meant that very little was known about the scale of the conflict and the resultant humanitarian situation. In this context, misinformation and disinformation about the conflict and the humanitarian situation have been rampant on social media.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 1 / 4

The Ethiopian constitution guarantees religious freedom, and different faith groups have coexisted in the country for centuries. Prime Minister Abiy has promoted reconciliation between Ethiopia's main faith groups, including through the 2018 release of Muslim activists who had been arrested in 2015 for protesting the government's treatment of Muslims.

However, religion has increasingly become a divisive factor in Ethiopian politics, and local conflicts have featured violence along religious lines. Mass violence in July 2020 following the assassination of Hachalu Hundessa took on a religious dimension in parts of Bale and Arsi, in the Oromia Region, with the targeting of followers of the Ethiopian Orthodox Tewahedo Church (EOTC). In 2021 the head of the EOTC, Abune Mathias, said he had been prevented from speaking out against the ongoing violence in Tigray, though he did not explain by whom.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 1 / 4

Academic freedom remains restricted in Ethiopia, though academics have become more vocal on political and economic matters in lectures, at conferences, in media columns, and online since the lifting of the state of emergency in 2018. However, self-censorship remains common in the context of ongoing conflicts and political tensions.

With few exceptions, institutions of higher education are funded and administered by the federal government, which also sets admission standards and student quotas. The Ministry of Education still monitors and regulates official curriculums.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 1 / 4

The gains made in 2018, including the release of political prisoners and lifting of bans against prominent government critics in the media and other sectors, had fostered a more open atmosphere for free expression among ordinary people. However, in the last two years, arbitrary arrests, extrajudicial activities, widespread surveillance, and nontransparent court proceedings have once again led individuals to be more reluctant to express political views openly. In particular, the government has arrested hundreds of Tigrayan activists, professionals, and public figures and closed Tigrayan-owned businesses with alleged connections to the TPLF, contributing to a sense of fear among Tigrayans.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 3 / 12 (-1)

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 1 / 4

Free assembly is restricted by insecurity in several regions, and resultant declarations of states of emergency or martial law. In November, a six-month, nationwide state of emergency was enacted, further curtailing freedom of assembly and other civil liberties throughout the country.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 1 / 4 (-1)

The passage of a new civil society law in February 2019 dispensed with many restrictions that had been placed on nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) by the draconian 2009 Charities and Societies Proclamation. However, the federal Civil Society Organizations Agency retains broad powers. Moreover, while NGOs are more able to legally operate in the human rights and governance spheres, practically many of these organizations are unable to access large parts of Ethiopia either due to security challenges or a lack of official approval, as was the case in Tigray. While the discourse around NGOs is more open, many of the practical realities for these groups have not improved.

Relations between federal government and international human rights and humanitarian NGOs further soured in 2021. In August, the government suspended for three months the Norwegian Refugee Council (NRC) and Doctors Without Borders (MSF), which had criticized the destruction of refugee camps and health facilities in Tigray, respectively. In September, they designated seven senior UN humanitarian workers as persona non grata, requesting them to leave the country within 72 hours. The government has regularly accused aid organizations of spreading propaganda and providing material support to armed groups, while failing to provide evidence for such serious accusations.

Score Change: The score declined from 2 to 1 due to the government's crackdown on humanitarian organizations and personnel operating in Tigray.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 1 / 4

The Ethiopian Constitution recognizes the right of workers to join trade unions, and more than 500,000 workers are organized under the umbrella of the Confederation of Ethiopian Trade Unions (CETU). However, independent unions have faced harassment in the past, and there has not been a legal strike in Ethiopia since 1993.

On the employer side, a large number of chambers of commerce and business associations exist for different industries and locations. The largest and oldest among them, the Addis Ababa Chamber of Commerce, is a regular critic of government economic policy. The federally organized Ethiopian Chamber of Commerce, of which the Addis chamber is a member, has been more aligned with official policy.

F. RULE OF LAW: 1 / 16 (-1)F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 1 / 4

The judiciary is officially independent, but in practice it is subject to political interference, and judgments rarely deviate from government policy. Ethiopia's security forces have maintained significant influence over the judicial process, especially in cases against opposition leaders and other political adversaries. An exception to this was the notable decision of the Federal High Court to uphold the rights of jailed opposition party candidates to participate in the June 2021 elections.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 0 / 4

Due process rights are generally not respected. While more than 10,000 people who had been arbitrarily detained were released after the change of political leadership in 2018, several waves of summary arrests have taken place since.

In May 2021, the House of People's Representatives designated the TPLF a terrorist organization, enabling those affiliated with the group to be charged under the Prevention and Suppression of Terrorism Crimes Proclamation of 2020. The proclamation, which replaced a controversial antiterrorism law, made marginal improvements in safeguarding human rights but left open possibilities for government to use the law to detain opposition groups. The nationwide, six-month state of emergency enacted in November 2021 was announced as the TDF moved closer to Addis Ababa, and at least 1,000 individuals—most of Tigrayan descent—were detained on suspicion of supporting the armed opposition.

The right to a fair trial is often not respected, particularly for government critics. In civil matters, due process is hampered by the limited capacity of the Ethiopian courts system, especially in the peripheral regions where access to government services is weak. As a result, routine matters regularly take years to be resolved.

Several conflicts have intensified in 2021—most notably in Tigray—but there has also been growing instability in Amhara, Afar, Oromia, and other regions. Over 2 million people have been internally displaced, and over 60,000 have fled to neighboring Sudan. Security forces, both regional and federal, have been accused of war crimes, including the massacring of civilians and rape. Conflict dynamics include competition for local resources, ethnic mobilization, and national political rivalries. External diplomatic pressure has had limited impact, while internally, political polarization is increasing, in part due to the government's inflammatory rhetoric.

A joint investigation into human rights abuses in Tigray conducted by the UN Human Rights Office and the Ethiopian Human Rights Commission (EHRC) confirmed several violations that took place between November 2020 and June 2021, concluding that some “may amount to crimes against humanity and war crimes.” While most reported civilian attacks in Tigray were perpetrated by EDF and ENDF members, one of the earliest and most deadly, in the town of Mai-Kadra, is believed to have been perpetrated by Tigrayan forces against Amhara civilians. The scope of the joint UN-EHRC investigation did not cover areas outside of Tigray in Amhara and Afar during the months during which the TDF took the offensive southward. Several recent reports of TDF fighters indiscriminately killing civilians and perpetrating sexual abuse have emerged from the Amhara and Afar regions. In early 2021, the United Nations warned of alarming accounts of rape and sexual violence occurring in Tigray during the conflict. While the government convicted 3 soldiers of rape and brought charges against another 53, witness accounts from the region suggest the abuse is more widespread than what the government has acknowledged.

Separately, after restoring telecommunications within Tigray for some time in 2021, internet and telephone services were rendered largely inoperable following the government's withdrawal from Mekelle and surrounding areas in June.

An ongoing government campaign to suppress armed opposition forces in western Oromia has led to repeated clashes and widespread displacement. The OLA's attacks on Amhara civilians has led to the death of hundreds. Ethnic rivalries along the border of Amhara and Benishangul Gumuz as well as Afar and Somali regional states also resulted in bloodshed. The situation in the border region between Amhara and Tigray remains tense due to a boundary dispute.

The ongoing conflict in Tigray and political tensions throughout the country have inflamed ethnic divisions, contributing to discriminatory policies and actions against certain groups. The prime minister and prominent leaders aligned with him have referred to the TPLF with inflammatory language that may be interpreted as ethnic hate speech. Because of their perceived or actual support for regional Tigrayan forces, the broader Tigrayan population has become increasingly marginalized. Tigrayans have been purged from civil and military roles, forced to close businesses, and thousands have been detained arbitrarily. Amharas also decry growing targeted attacks, discrimination, and the failure of state actors to protect them, particularly in Oromia, Benishangul Gumuz, and in areas of Amhara where the TDF launched an offensive in mid-2021.

The number of IDPs in Ethiopia surpassed 2 million in 2021, and humanitarian groups have struggled to meet the growing need. Security and bureaucratic constraints continue to hinder the flow of aid.

Same-sex sexual activity is prohibited by law and punishable by up to 15 years' imprisonment. Women face discrimination in education. A gender gap persists in many aspects of economic life including women's wages relative to their male counterparts in similar positions; according to the World Bank's Gender Innovation Lab, women have far lower wage incomes (44 percent lower) and business sales (79 percent lower) than do men.

Score change: The score declined from 1 to 0 due to growing ethnic-based discrimination, particularly against Tigrayans, amid the ongoing war.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 3 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 0 / 4

While the constitution establishes freedom of movement, local conflicts impede people's ability to travel freely. Travel to Tigray has been severely impeded due to conflict. Following the government's announcement of a cease-fire and withdrawal from the region, in June 2021, humanitarian aid deliveries into the region have slowed to a fraction of what is needed in what UN officials have referred to as a "de facto blockade." Fighting between forces loyal to the federal government and the TDF along the Tigray-Afar border and the Amhara-Tigray border, in addition to numerous government checkpoints, has also limited access and movement to the region. The intentional destruction of infrastructure such as roads and bridges by armed actors has also undermined civilian and humanitarian movement.

Violent conflict and security clampdowns in parts of Amhara, Afar, Oromia, and Benishangul Gumuz have also significantly reduced internal travel, with most Ethiopians feeling safer in their home region than in other states.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 1 / 4

Private business opportunities are limited by heavy government regulation of key industries and the dominance of state-owned enterprises in many sectors. State monopolies have persisted in the telecommunication, shipping, and aviation industries, while the financial sector is closed to foreign competition and effectively controlled by state-owned banks. After announcing plans to liberalize the economy as part of the political transition, in 2021 the Abiy government completed the partial sale of the state-owned EthioTelecom, awarding a license to a consortium led by Vodafone and ending more than a century of state monopoly in Ethiopia telecommunications.

All land must be leased from the state. The government has evicted Indigenous groups from various areas to make way for infrastructure projects, such as the Gibe III dam in the Lower Omo Valley. Urban development projects in Addis Ababa and other cities have also repeatedly led to the forced resettlement of local tenants.

A gender gap persists in many aspects of economic life including land ownership and access to finance.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 1 / 4

Legislation protects women's rights, but these rights are routinely violated in practice. Enforcement of laws against rape and domestic abuse is inconsistent, and cases routinely stall in the courts.

Forced child marriage is illegal but common in Ethiopia, and prosecutions for the crime are rare. Female genital mutilation (FGM) is also illegal, but the law is inconsistently enforced.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 1 / 4

Despite near-universal primary school enrollment, access to quality education and other social services varies widely across regions and is particularly poor in the "emerging" low-land states. A new labor law adopted in 2019 expanded workers' rights, such by extending paid maternity leave, and raised the working age to 15 years. However, reports from Ethiopia's industrial parks suggest that working conditions can be precarious, and child labor is prevalent in many agricultural households.

In April 2020, the Ethiopian government adopted a new antitrafficking law which stipulates strict punishments for crimes such as sexual exploitation and the smuggling of persons.

Fiji

Population: 900,000

Capital: Suva

Freedom Status: Partly Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: The repressive climate that followed a 2006 coup has eased since democratic elections were held in 2014 and 2018. However, the ruling party frequently interferes with opposition activities, the judiciary is subject to political influence, and military and police brutality is a significant problem.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- In September, the FijiFirst majority in Parliament passed an amendment to the Electoral Act requiring citizens to use the name "specified on the applicant's birth certificate" when registering to vote. The opposition criticized the law, saying that it will disproportionately affect women voters whose birth names differ from their marital names.
 - Nine leading opposition figures were detained and questioned by police in July after voicing opposition to Bill 17, a controversial draft law that would alter how native land leases are administered by the iTaukei Land Trust Board; the bill was passed into law in August.
 - In February, the government forcibly deported Pal Ahluwalia, a Canadian citizen and then vice chancellor of the Fiji-based University of the South Pacific (USP).

Ahluwalia had faced pushback the previous year for launching an investigation into financial management irregularities under his predecessor, who was known to be close to the Fiji government.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 23 / 40 (-1)

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 7 / 12 (-1)

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 3 / 4

The prime minister is the head of government. The party that wins the most seats in parliamentary elections selects the prime minister, who is then appointed by the president. In the 2018 parliamentary elections, Prime Minister Frank Bainimarama's FijiFirst Party won 50 percent of the total vote and 27 seats in the 51-member parliament. The Multinational Observer Group reported that the polling "was transparent and credible overall and the outcome broadly represented the will of Fijian voters."

The president is elected by Parliament for a three-year term and holds a largely ceremonial role. In October 2021, Ratu Wiliame Katonivere was elected president, replacing former president George Konrote.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 2 / 4

Parliament is Fiji's unicameral legislative body, with 51 members elected to serve four-year terms. International observers of the 2018 parliamentary elections found polling largely credible, although civil society participation was limited.

Municipal elections have not been held since 2005. Municipal councils were dissolved in 2009 and have since been run by government-appointed administrators.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 2 / 4 (-1)

The legal framework for Fijian elections is considered fair. However, the structure of the electoral administration has raised concerns about potential political interference. FijiFirst's secretary general, Aiyaz Sayed-Khaiyum, serves as minister of elections, as well as attorney general. Opposition parties claim that this creates a bias in the Electoral Commission, which administers elections, and affects the independence of the body.

A July 2021 decision by the Supervisor of Elections, Mohammed Saneem, removed opposition parliamentarian Niko Nawaikula from the voter registry on the grounds that he had not registered under his birth name. Nawaikula was forced to vacate his seat, but was reinstated in August by Fiji's chief justice, who criticized Saneem for overextending his authority. Sayed-Khaiyum expressed frustration that the government's lawyers had not successfully defended Saneem's decision; the solicitor general was suspended shortly thereafter, and was fired in November.

Following Nawaikula's reinstatement, the FijiFirst majority in Parliament passed an amendment to the Electoral Act in September requiring citizens to use the name "specified on the applicant's birth certificate" on the voter registry. The opposition has expressed concern that the rule will disproportionately affect women voters whose birth names differ from their marital names.

Score Change: The score declined from 3 to 2 because new amendments to the electoral law introduced onerous voter registration requirements.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 9 / 16B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 3 / 4

The right to form political parties is constitutionally guaranteed, but the government has eligibility requirements that discourage the formation of smaller parties: prospective parties must submit 5,000 signatures to become registered. The 5 percent nationwide threshold for representation in Parliament further disincentivizes the formation of smaller parties. In September 2021, Sitiveni Rabuka, the former leader of the Social Democratic Liberal Party (SODELPA), successfully registered a new party, The People's Alliance.

In July, nine leading opposition figures were detained and questioned by police after voicing opposition to Bill 17, a controversial draft law that would alter how native land leases are administered by the iTaukei Land Trust Board; the bill was passed into law in August.

In April, the Supervisor of Elections briefly suspended three minor parties, all without seats in Parliament, for allegedly failing to submit their audited accounts on time. Two of the parties were reinstated later that month, but the third had not been reinstated by year's end.

The dominance of FijiFirst in Parliament has left little space for opposition forces to assert themselves politically. In 2018, the major opposition party, SODELPA, won 21 seats, up from 15 in 2014. The Multinational Observer Group noted that during the 2018 parliamentary campaign, government ministers and high-level officials engaged in high-profile activities, such as opening buildings, signing commercial contracts, and disbursing government grants and funds, which could have provided an electoral advantage to FijiFirst. Prime Minister Bainimarama has, in the past, stated that he would not allow the opposition parties to assume office in the event that FijiFirst was defeated.

Opposition figures have been targeted by corruption charges they claim are politically motivated. Before the 2018 election, the Fiji Independent Commission Against Corruption (FICAC) charged then SODELPA leader Rabuka with making a false declaration of assets. He was acquitted, but FICAC appealed the decision; the case was ultimately dismissed two days before the elections. Had he been convicted, Rabuka would have been barred from the contest.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 2 / 4

The military has a history of interference in Fijian politics. Several prominent political leaders, including Prime Minister Bainimarama, are former military commanders, which contributes to the perception that the military has undue political influence.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 3 / 4

The law does not restrict the participation of minorities and women in politics. However, both Indigenous and Indo-Fijian women are underrepresented by political parties. Only 10 out of the 51 members of Parliament are women.

Small minority groups, including Banabans, members of the Chinese ethnic minority, and the descendants of people from the Solomon Islands, lack significant political representation.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 7 / 12C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 3 / 4

The executive branch under Prime Minister Bainimarama determines the policies of government. With FijiFirst holding a strong parliamentary majority, the government has frequently pushed through legislation with minimal scrutiny from the opposition.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 2 / 4

Corruption remains a serious problem, and existing safeguards are limited in their effectiveness. FICAC has had limited success combatting institutional corruption. FICAC has also allegedly pursued politically motivated corruption cases.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 2 / 4

Since the restoration of elective democracy in 2014, government transparency and openness has improved. Parliamentary sessions are broadcast live, and the Hansard (an official report of parliamentary proceedings) is updated regularly. Although candidates for elections are required to declare their assets, there is no law requiring public asset disclosures by members of Parliament. Fiji lacks an access to information law, and requests for information from the media and the public are sometimes denied. In recent years, FijiFirst has used its parliamentary majority to rewrite parliamentary standing orders in a manner that limits debate on legislation and scrutiny of official statements.

The head of Fiji's Bureau of Statistics, Kemueli Naiqama, was dismissed in September 2021 for publishing data on ethnicity in the 2019-2020 Household Income and Expenditure Survey. The Attorney General questioned the reliability of the data, which showed that the majority of people experiencing poverty in the country are Indigenous Fijians. Local human rights organizations have expressed concern that Naiqama was fired "for telling the truth."

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 35 / 60 (-1)D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 11 / 16 (-1)*D1. Are there free and independent media? 2 / 4

Fiji has an active media sector, with several private television stations, radio stations, and newspapers. The political opposition and other critics of the FijiFirst government have accused the state of using its power to silence critics. The vaguely worded Media Industry Development Decree bans reporting that is critical of the government or harmful to "national interest public order." Restrictive press laws are sometimes enforced by the government, and the risk of fines and jail time encourages self-censorship.

In April 2020, Jone Kalouniwai, a senior military officer—who in 2021 became the country's top military commander—defended the government's right to censor the press during the COVID-19 pandemic. In August 2021, a former government advisor reported that the Attorney General regularly tells the openly progovernment newspaper The Fiji Sun which stories to cover. Nevertheless, there has been a notable increase in articles critical of government in the national media in recent years.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 4 / 4

Freedom of religion is generally respected, though in the past there have been many cases of vandalism of Hindu temples. In July 2021, there were reports of arson attacks on mosques and Muslim-owned shops on the island of Taveuni and in Labasa.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 2 / 4 (-1)

Academic freedom is not directly constrained, but government control over funding has been used to exert influence over tertiary institutions. The government withdrew its funding for the Fiji-based University of the South Pacific (USP) in 2020 after the Fijian Attorney General claimed the university's leadership had engaged in misconduct; Vice Chancellor Pal Ahluwalia had launched an investigation into irregularities under his predecessor, who was known to be close to the Fiji government. The government deported Ahluwalia, a Canadian citizen, in February 2021.

Score Change: The score declined from 3 to 2 because the government forcibly deported an academic official who had made accusations of financial mismanagement against the university where he worked.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 3 / 4

The government places some constraints on free speech, such as a law banning the burning of the national flag. Political activist Ben Padarath was arrested and charged with sedition in March 2021 for publishing a social media post critical of a FICAC investigation. In July, the acting police commissioner warned the public to be cautious when expressing opposition to Bill 17 on social media.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 7 / 12E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 2 / 4

The constitution gives the government wide latitude to prohibit protests, including on the basis of public safety and morality. Fiji has refused entry into the country for the United Nations Special Rapporteur on the rights to freedom of assembly since 2014.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 3 / 4

Fiji has an extensive nongovernmental organization (NGO) network, which largely operates without government interference. However, strict sedition laws, which criminalize criticism of the government, place constraints on the range of initiatives that NGOs can undertake.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 2 / 4

Restrictions on trade union protests remain. The Fiji Trades Union Congress (FTUC) has been denied permits for marches numerous times in recent years, including in April 2021, when a further such permit was rejected, allegedly due to concern about the spread of COVID-19.

Union members' political activities are also restricted: they are prohibited from becoming members of Parliament and face obstacles to joining political parties. General secretary of the National Workers Union and the FTUC, Felix Anthony, appeared in court in April and November over his activities during a 2019 protest by water authority workers. Amnesty International reported a rise in harassment of trade unionists in the leadup to these protests and other important union meetings.

F. RULE OF LAW: 7 / 16F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 2 / 4

While the constitution guarantees an independent judiciary, there have been credible allegations of political interference among judges. The prime minister has substantial appointment powers, with the authority to both appoint and dismiss judges on the Supreme Court and other high courts. These powers leave the judiciary vulnerable to interference and abuse by the executive. Fiji has refused entry into the country for the United Nations Special Rapporteur on the independence of judges since 2014.

The Criminal Procedure (Amendment) Act, passed by Parliament in February 2021, removed assessors—lay judicial advisors—from trials, leaving verdicts in criminal cases solely to judges. Though the Attorney General claimed the assessor system had contributed to discrimination based on ethnicity in court decisions, opposition leaders criticized the amendments, saying that removing assessors eliminates public participation and reduces transparency in the criminal justice system.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 1 / 4

Due process rights are often not respected in practice. Corruption is a major problem in the police force. Due to resource shortages, lengthy pretrial detentions are common. The law allows suspects to be arrested without a warrant for violating the Crimes Decree. Politically motivated criminal charges are not uncommon.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 2 / 4

Torture and beatings by police remain a serious issue. Police officers and military officials who commit abuses are rarely brought to justice, and those who are convicted of crimes are frequently pardoned or have their convictions overturned on appeal. Prisons are often overcrowded, lack sanitation, and provide inadequate health services. Fiji refuses entry into the country for the United Nations Special Rapporteur on torture. In March 2021, the government unexpectedly withdrew a controversial bill that would have given sweeping additional powers to the police.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 2 / 4

LGBT+ people face discrimination in employment and access to healthcare. Prime Minister Bainimarama has been criticized for making prejudiced remarks against LGBT+ people.

Women experience discrimination in employment as well, and a gender pay gap persists.

Relations between Indigenous Fijians and Indo-Fijians remain strained. Indigenous Fijians previously enjoyed legal advantages in education and political representation. However, the interim government installed after the 2006 coup removed many of these privileges in a bid to foster a sense of national unity.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 10 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 3 / 4

Citizens enjoy the freedom to travel, live, work, and seek education inside and outside the country. However, the law gives the government broad powers to restrict both internal and foreign travel. Substantial restrictions on movement were imposed in 2021 in response to the COVID-19 pandemic.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 3 / 4

Property rights are generally respected. However, it is difficult to obtain land titles. The government amended the Land Sales Act in 2014 to require foreign nationals who fail to build a dwelling on their land within two years of acquisition to pay a fine equivalent to 10 percent of the land value every six months. Under the law, urban residential freehold land cannot be sold to foreigners.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 2 / 4

Domestic violence remains a problem in Fiji, and perpetrators who are convicted of the crime often receive light sentences. The Fiji Women's Crisis Center warns that there was a spike in domestic violence cases during the government's lockdown in 2020, implemented to prevent the spread of COVID-19.

Although there is a growing movement in support of marriage equality in Fiji, Prime Minister Bainimarama has openly stated he does not support it.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 2 / 4

Human trafficking, including sex trafficking of children, remained a problem in 2021. The US State Department's 2021 Trafficking in Persons Report reported that Fiji had increased its efforts to fight human trafficking in 2020, including pursuing investigations of 10 suspected trafficking cases and formally endorsing a national antitrafficking strategy for 2021–26. However, trafficking convictions remain rare, with only one recorded in the country since 2014. Safety standards at workplaces are not always adequately enforced. Long work hours are common in some jobs, including transportation and shipping.

Finland

Population: 5,500,000

Capital: Helsinki

Freedom Status: Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Finland's parliamentary system features free and fair elections and robust multi-party competition. Corruption is not a significant problem, and freedoms of speech, religion, and association are respected. The judiciary is independent under the constitution and in practice. Women and ethnic minority groups enjoy equal rights, though harassment, hate speech, and discrimination aimed at minority groups does occur.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- In March, the government declared a state of emergency in response to rising COVID-19 case numbers. Though the state of emergency was lifted in April, some COVID-19-related restrictions, including on movement, remained in place through year's end.
 - Finnish prosecutors brought Gibril Massaquoi, a Sierra Leonean living in Finland, to trial in February for his alleged role in war crimes committed in Liberia between 1999 and 2003. The trial remained ongoing at year's end.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 40 / 40A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 12 / 12*A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The president, whose role is mainly ceremonial, is directly elected for up to two six-year terms. In 2018, former finance minister and incumbent president Sauli Niinistö, originally of the center-right National Coalition Party (KOK), won a second presidential term with 62.6 percent of the vote, defeating several challengers. The election was considered broadly free and fair.

The prime minister, the head of government, is selected by Finland's freely elected parliament. Following parliamentary elections in April 2019, Antti Rinne of the Social Democratic Party became prime minister in June. However, he resigned due to criticism within the governing coalition over his handling of a postal workers' strike in November 2019, and Sanna Marin was chosen by the party to replace him in December 2019.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

Representatives in the 200-seat, unicameral parliament, the Eduskunta, are elected to serve four-year terms. In March 2019, the coalition government headed by Prime Minister Sipilä of the Center Party resigned after failing to secure parliamentary support for a reform of the health care system, one of its key priorities. The move triggered the elections held in April 2019. Prior to the 2019 elections, the Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE) expressed "a high level of confidence in all the aspects of the electoral process" and concluded that it was not necessary to send an election observation mission.

The Social Democratic Party won the largest share of the vote, taking 40 seats. The right-wing Finns Party placed second with 39 seats. The new government formed in June 2019 comprised the Social Democratic Party, the Center Party with 31 seats, the Green League with 20 seats, the Left Alliance with 16 seats, and the Swedish People's Party of Finland with 9 seats. The remainder of seats went to KOK, which took 38, the Christian Democrats with 5, the new Movement Now with 1, and the Åland Coalition, also with 1.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 4 / 4

Finland's electoral laws are robust and generally well implemented by the relevant authorities.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 16 / 16B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 4 / 4

There are no significant constraints on political parties' ability to organize and operate, and they compete freely in practice.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 4 / 4

Finland regularly experiences peaceful transfers of power between rival political parties through elections, with governments typically consisting of multiparty coalitions. The 2019 elections produced the country's first Social Democratic prime minister since 2003.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 4 / 4

People's political choices are generally free from undue interference by forces that are not democratically accountable.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 4 / 4

Citizens from the Finnish majority and all ethnic minorities enjoy full political rights. The Åland Islands—an autonomous region located off the southwestern coast whose inhabitants speak Swedish—have their own 30-seat parliament, as well as one seat in the national legislature. The Sámi of northern Finland, an Indigenous people who number about 10,000, have a legislature with limited powers, but they do not have guaranteed representation in the parliament. Members of the Sámi community continue to call for greater inclusion in political decision-making processes.

Women and women's interests are reasonably well represented in politics, as are LGBT+ people and their respective interests. Prime Minister Marin is the third woman to serve as Finland's head of government. Her installation also marked the first time that all parties in a Finnish governing coalition were headed by women.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 12 / 12C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 4 / 4

Finland's freely elected government and lawmakers are generally able to develop and implement policy without undue interference from unelected entities.

In March 2020, the government invoked the Emergency Powers Act due to the COVID-19 pandemic; the state of emergency lasted through June of that year. A second COVID-19-related state of emergency was imposed in March 2021. Though the state of emergency was lifted in April, some COVID-19-related restrictions remained in place through year's end.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 4 / 4

Corruption is not a significant problem in Finland and is generally punished under relevant laws when discovered. However, in 2018 the Council of Europe's Group of States against Corruption (GRECO) urged Finland to bolster corruption prevention and detection policies within government and law enforcement agencies, including by increasing whistleblower protections. It further warned of possible conflicts of interest between the public and private sectors in the Sipilä government's planned health care and social service reforms. As of December 2020, GRECO reports that Finland has fully implemented only 1 of 14 recommendations issued by the anticorruption body.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 4 / 4

Laws permitting access to public information are generally well enforced, though there are some limits on the disclosure of information related to national security, foreign affairs, trade secrets, and criminal investigations. All citizens, including government officials, are required by law to make public asset declarations, though there are no penalties for noncompliance. While companies perceive corruption risks and favoritism within public procurement as low, informal networks and personal associations, notably at the local level, are still believed to hold influence over procurement decisions.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 60 / 60D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 16 / 16*D1. Are there free and independent media? 4 / 4

Freedom of expression is protected by Article 12 of the constitution and the 2003 Act on the Exercise of Freedom of Expression in Mass Media. Media outlets in Finland are typically independent and free from political pressure or censorship, and the media environment is strong.

However, journalists sometimes face harassment for their work, notably those who cover topics related to immigrants and immigration. Journalists also face the risk of defamation charges. In April 2019, investigative reporter Johanna Vehkoo was convicted of defaming a far-right politician and ordered to pay more than $7,000 in fines and compensation. Vehkoo was granted leave to appeal the decision in April 2021.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 4 / 4

Religious freedom is guaranteed in the constitution and generally respected in practice. However, far-right hate speech and incidents of vandalism directed at the Jewish and Muslim communities are ongoing concerns. In July 2021, the Interior Ministry published a report identifying both perceived threats to the premises of religious communities and potential solutions for improving security in and around these locations. The report found that while, overall, more than 70 percent of those surveyed felt their religious premises were generally safe, only 69 percent of Muslim respondents and 32.5 percent of Jewish respondents felt safe in and around their religious premises.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

Academic freedom is generally respected.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 4 / 4

There are few impediments to personal expression, and the authorities are not known to engage in improper surveillance of personal communications. However, in March 2019, the parliament gave final approval to two bills that strengthen the authority of the intelligence service and defense forces to access private communications involving national security threats.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 12 / 12E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

Freedom of assembly is protected by law and upheld in practice. As a response to the COVID-19 pandemic, the government restricted public events—including protests—to no more than 50 people in March 2020. This restriction was removed in October of that year.

In October 2020, police used pepper spray against protesters obstructing traffic, who were associated with the environmental activist group Extinction Rebellion and calling on the government to take more significant measures to combat the climate crisis. An official inquiry into accusations of assault levied against the police for their actions was opened in December 2020 and remained ongoing at the end of 2021.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 4 / 4

Nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) operate without restriction.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 4 / 4

Workers have the right to organize and bargain collectively, though public-sector workers who provide services deemed essential may not strike. Approximately 75 percent of workers belong to trade unions, which actively advocate for members' interests.

F. RULE OF LAW: 16 / 16F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 4 / 4

The constitution provides for an independent judiciary, and the courts operate without political interference in practice.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 4 / 4

Due process is generally respected in Finland. Authorities largely uphold safeguards against arbitrary arrest and detention and provide the conditions for fair trials.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 4 / 4

There are few significant threats to physical security, and violent crime is uncommon, although it has increased in recent years.

In February 2021, Finnish prosecutors brought Gibril Massaquoi, a Sierra Leonean living in Finland, to trial for his alleged role in atrocities committed in Liberia between 1999 and 2003. Massaquoi faces charges of murder, aggravated war crimes, and aggravated crimes against humanity; his trial was ongoing at year's end.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 4 / 4

The constitution guarantees the Sámi people cultural autonomy and the right to pursue their culturally significant livelihoods, which include fishing and reindeer herding. However, representatives of the community have said that they cannot fully exercise their rights in practice and face restrictions on land use. While Roma comprise a very small percentage of Finland's population, they are significantly disadvantaged and marginalized.

Women enjoy equal legal rights. Despite an equal pay law, women earn only about 84 percent as much as men on average, and women's pensions are worth roughly 20 percent less than men's. In 2020, the government initiated a new policy that grants new parents seven months of parental leave, regardless of gender.

A June 2019 report by the European Commission against Racism and Intolerance (ECRI) noted an increase in racist and intolerant hate speech in Finland, especially toward Muslims and refugees. Hate speech on the internet was also a concern, with targets including immigrants, people of African descent, LGBT+ people, the Jewish community, and Roma. A 2020 report by Finland's Non-Discrimination Ombudsman further highlighted racism against people of African descent. In September 2021, the Finnish Ministry of Justice and the Equality Commissioner launched a campaign encouraging people to take action against racism.

The Nordic Resistance Movement, a neo-Nazi organization that the National Police Board has called "violent and openly racist," was banned in March 2019, following a Supreme Court ruling that the organization abused freedom of assembly and speech. This is the first time an organization has been given a cease-and-desist order in Finland since the 1970s.

In 2016, the Finnish government amended its asylum law to limit the aid available to asylum seekers. The amendments prompted concern from the UN refugee agency, which suggested that authorities had abandoned good practices and sought to align their policies with the minimum required by international treaties governing the treatment of refugees. International human rights NGOs have also criticized the policies, saying they restrict the rights of asylum seekers.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 16 / 16G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

Individuals in Finland are free to travel abroad and domestically. The country has one of the most expansive “freedom to roam” policies in the world, allowing people to use any public or private land for recreational purposes so long as the privacy of a private residence is not violated, and no environmental damage is incurred. There are no undue restrictions on people’s ability to change their place of residence, education, or employment.

After the emergence of the COVID-19 pandemic in 2020, entry restrictions for non-citizens were implemented temporarily. Beginning in November 2020, passengers entering Finland were required to have a certificate of a negative COVID-19 test taken less than 72 hours before arrival. Such restrictions were lifted in July 2021 for people who had been vaccinated against COVID-19 and were entering Finland from the EU and Schengen countries.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 4 / 4

Intellectual and physical property rights are upheld. There are no major obstacles to establishing a business, and the country boasts a well-regulated, transparent, and open economy.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 4 / 4

People’s choices on personal status matters are for the most part unrestricted. Same-sex marriage has been allowed since 2017. However, legislation requires that transgender people be sterilized and have a mental health diagnosis in order to obtain legal recognition of their gender. In 2017, the UN Human Rights Council (UNHRC) called for Finland to eliminate these impediments to legal gender recognition. The ECRI echoed this call in 2019. The government appointed a working group intended to draft reforms to this law in June 2021.

The UNHRC has also recommended that Finland amend its criminal code to no longer define rape according to the degree of violence used by the perpetrator. The new coalition government in 2019 placed this matter on its agenda, and in July 2020 the Ministry of Justice issued a recommendation to include consent in the definition of rape. Domestic violence is an ongoing concern.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 4 / 4

The authorities generally uphold protections against exploitative working conditions. Asylum seekers and migrants are most vulnerable to sex and labor trafficking. The government actively prosecutes trafficking offenses, and survivors have access to protection and assistance. However, alleged perpetrators often receive lighter charges and penalties due to lack of specialized training for investigators.

France

Population: 65,300,000

Capital: Paris

Freedom Status: Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: The French political system features vibrant democratic processes and generally strong protections for civil liberties and political rights. However, successive governments have responded to deadly terrorist attacks in recent years by curtailing constitutional protections and empowering law enforcement to infringe upon personal freedoms. Anti-Muslim and anti-immigrant sentiment continue to be rife throughout the country.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- The Global Security Bill, which passed in April and formalized the 2020 National Enforcement Law, caused concerns over the securitization of protests and media coverage. The Constitutional Council in May ruled against one of its the bill's more controversial articles, which outlawed the spread of identifiable images of police that sought to identify or harm them or their families. Though this was removed, other concerning provisions of the law were kept in place.
- The National Assembly in July enacted the Reinforcing Republican Principles Bill, also known as the Anti-Separatism Law, which eased authorities' ability to disband associations that allegedly disrespect so-called "values of the Republic." The government has used the law to target organizations that combat Islamophobia, including the Coordination against Racism and Islamophobia (CRI) organization, which the government dissolved in October claiming its activities provoked violence.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 38 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 12 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The French president is chief of state, and is elected to five-year terms by direct, universal suffrage in a two-round system. The prime minister is head of government and is appointed by the president. Emmanuel Macron, a centrist newcomer to politics, won the second round of the 2017 presidential election against Marine Le Pen from the far-right National Front (FN).

The Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE) expressed confidence in the integrity of French elections.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

Members of the lower house of Parliament, the 577-seat National Assembly, are elected to five-year terms in a two-round system. The upper house, the 348-seat Senate, is an indirectly elected body whose members serve six-year terms. In the 2017 legislative elections, Macron's La République en Marche! (LREM) and its centrist ally won 350 seats in the National Assembly.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 4 / 4

France's electoral laws and framework are fair and implemented impartially. In March 2021, Parliament passed legislation to improve election rules before the 2022 presidential poll, facilitating the postal vote for imprisoned people, proxy voting, and voting for French citizens living abroad.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 15 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 4 / 4

Parties are generally able to organize and operate freely. Elections in recent years have been competitive and less dominant parties have gained more visibility.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 4 / 4

The recent elections have demonstrated that parties outside the political mainstream can gain power through elections.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 4 / 4

People's political choices are generally free from domination. However, some media outlets have drawn outsized attention to controversial political personalities, potentially skewing public perception for economic gain.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 3 / 4

No laws restrict the political participation of women, LGBT+ people, and other marginalized groups. However, far-right parties and their nationalist ideologies have become more mainstream and have emboldened racist commentary in public discourse, further excluding marginalized groups from the political sphere. The LREM's rhetoric surrounding the Reinforcing Republican Principles Bill, enacted in August 2021, targeted the French Muslim population, claiming the need to protect the country's values and traditions. Critics have called the law discriminatory and politically polarizing.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 11 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 4 / 4

The elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government. However, the ruling LREM has increasingly used Article 49.3 of the constitution—the ordonnance process—to forego parliamentary debate and change government policy.

The "health state of emergency" declared in the context of the COVID-19 pandemic has increasingly shifted powers to the executive. The parliament has voted six times between March 2020 and March 2021 to establish and extend the state of emergency, granting Macron expanded powers.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 3 / 4

Despite a 2017 law seeking to reduce conflicts of interest, corruption allegations have been lodged against several high-level government officials in recent years. In most cases, these officials have resigned or been dismissed from office. A few other officials, such as Interior Minister Gérald Darmanin and Justice Minister Éric Dupond-Moretti, were the focuses of ongoing investigations or complaints at the end of the year.

In September 2021, former president Nicolas Sarkozy was found guilty of illegal campaign financing during the 2012 presidential election and sentenced to one year in prison. He had been convicted in March 2021 in another case of corruption and influence peddling.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 4 / 4

The government generally operates with openness and transparency, although it has increasingly used the ordonnance process and an accelerated procedure—which limits Parliament’s discussion of draft legislation—to enact policies without parliamentary debate or public scrutiny. These powers were used to push through the controversial Reinforcing Republican Principles Bill and the much-criticized Global Security Bill in 2021.

The government’s response to the COVID-19 pandemic was inconsistent and lacked transparency. A December 2020 report from parliament’s investigative committee on the management of the pandemic criticized the health sector’s lack of preparedness and its chaotic and erratic decision-making processes. Former minister of health Agnès Buzyn was indicted in September 2021 for publicly minimizing the danger of the coronavirus pandemic before she stepped down in February 2020 to run in the Paris mayoral election.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 51 / 60 (–1)D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 14 / 16*D1. Are there free and independent media? 4 / 4

The media generally operate freely and represent a wide range of political opinions. In 2020 there were some incidents of violence against journalists.

The 2020 National Law Enforcement Doctrine stipulates that no exceptions in legal terms are to be made for journalists covering protests that police disperse. The doctrine was formalized in the April 2021 Global Security Bill, causing concerns over the securitization of protests and media coverage. The Constitutional Council in May ruled against one of the law’s more controversial articles, which outlawed the spread of identifiable images of police with the intent to identify or harm them or their families. Though this was removed, other stipulations in the law remain concerning for press freedom.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 3 / 4

The constitution protects freedom of religion. Antidefamation laws penalize religiously motivated abuse, and Holocaust denial is illegal. The government maintains the policy of laïcité (secularism), whereby religion and state affairs are strictly separated, though it also has official relationships with organizations representing the country’s three major religions—Christianity, Islam, and Judaism.

The controversial Reinforcing Republican Principles Bill, also known as the Anti-Separatism Law, was passed by the National Assembly in July 2021. Claiming to combat “religious separatism,” the law allows the government to dissolve religious organizations, increases the surveillance of mosques and Muslim associations, and requires the latter to sign a contract of “respect for Republican values” when applying for state subsidies. Critics have warned that it particularly stigmatizes Muslims and could increase Islamophobic sentiment.

Interior Minister Gérald Darmanin was accused of expressing antisemitic sentiments in his book, Islamic Separatism. Far-right media personalities, such as Éric Zemmour, have flagrantly displayed racist and antisemitic beliefs in the public sphere.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

There are no formal restrictions on academic freedom in France.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 3 / 4

Though citizens express their views publicly, the government's surveillance and tracking of individuals based on their political views has raised concerns in recent years. Three government decrees were approved in January 2021 by the Council of State that expanded the government's powers to compile information for three public security files, allowing authorities, in the name of national security, to keep records on alleged political militants and activists, their families (including underage children), their health, or their activities on social media. Civil society groups, human rights activists, and labor organizations heavily criticized the decrees.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 10 / 12 (-1)

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 3 / 4

Freedom of assembly is normally respected. However, the government's restrictions on public gatherings in response to the COVID-19 pandemic were declared unconstitutional by the Council of State in June 2020. Political protests in 2020 were marked by police use of unnecessary force.

In 2021, a new series of lockdowns and curfews were introduced to counter new COVID-19 variants. Demonstrators gathered despite these restrictions to protest the passe sanitaire (health pass). Established in July to replace lockdown measures, the pass limited access to public gatherings to vaccinated people or those who had tested negative for the virus.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 3 / 4 (-1)

Nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) generally operate freely. However, the National Law Enforcement Doctrine and the Global Security Bill have complicated and obstructed NGO reports around protests and police actions.

The Reinforcing Republican Principles Bill eased authorities' ability to disband associations that allegedly disrespect so-called "values of the Republic." The law has been used to target organizations that seek to combat Islamophobia. The Collective against Islamophobia in France (CCIF) was dissolved by decree in December 2020 for its failure to moderate its social media comments; the Council of State approved the dissolution in September 2021. In October, the government dissolved the Coordination against Racism and Islamophobia (CRI) organization, claiming its activities ostensibly provoke violence.

Score Change: The score declined from 4 to 3 because the government passed legislation that has been used to target organizations that combat Islamophobia, dubiously claiming they provoke violence.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 4 / 4

Trade unions are generally free to operate without any undue restrictions.

F. RULE OF LAW: 13 / 16F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 4 / 4

France has an independent judiciary, and the rule of law generally prevails in court proceedings.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 3 / 4

Due process generally prevails in civil and criminal matters. However, antiterrorism legislation passed in 2017, which replaced a state of emergency instituted after the 2015 terror attacks in Paris, enshrined controversial administrative control measures into law.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 3 / 4

The number of complaints of police violence sent to the police's internal disciplinary body (IPGN) has sharply increased since 2018, as have suspicions that the IGPN is too lenient on police forces.

Romany people living in France face systemic discrimination. They were particularly affected by the government lockdowns enforced to prevent the spread of COVID-19, with many struggling to access basic services like water and electricity.

Anti-Muslim sentiment, attacks against mosquegoers, reports of vandalism of mosques, and verbal assaults have increased in recent years. A variety of antisemitic conspiracy theories surged after the emergence of the coronavirus pandemic. The far-right has become increasingly successful in using racist language to shape French public discourse. In January 2021, six international and French organizations sent a formal notice to the government calling for an end to the use of ethnic profiling and other forms of discrimination by the police. In July, they filed a class action lawsuit against the French state.

The efficacy of government efforts to address gender inequality is unclear. Research published in October 2020 by the European Trade Union Confederation revealed that the French gender pay gap has only narrowed by 0.1 percent since 2010. Sexual harassment of women is a prominent issue.

Migrants and refugees in France continue to face societal discrimination and abuse from authorities. During the COVID-19 pandemic, they received reduced aid, were heavily policed, and experienced dangerous sanitary conditions. In 2021, NGOs providing humanitarian assistance in Calais reported police mistreatment and abuse of both migrants and aid workers. In Paris, groups of Afghan refugees were reportedly harassed, sometimes with force, by French police who raided makeshift camps. Human Rights Watch (HRW) reported in May on the expulsion of unaccompanied children to Italy, in violation of both French and international law.

In November 2021, the government announced they would offer migrants accommodation when dismantling camps, would end unannounced evictions, and would allow migrants more time to gather their possessions. Throughout the year, tensions between French and British authorities rose over disputes about migrants in northern France who attempted to reach the United Kingdom by boat. That month, close to 30 migrants drowned in the British Channel after their boat capsized.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 14 / 16G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

While there are normally no restrictions on freedom of travel or choice of residence or employment in France, the government enforced lockdowns that significantly restricted movement to prevent the spread of the COVID-19 pandemic in 2020 and 2021. Authorities were criticized for discriminatory enforcement of the rules, as marginalized groups were far more policed than the rest of the population. As of August 2021, more than one million French workers, including health sector workers, were required to have a health pass or proof of vaccination to continue working.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 4 / 4

Private businesses are free to operate.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 3 / 4

Individuals generally enjoy personal social freedoms—including choice of marriage partner and size of family. A measure approving access to fertility treatments for women, including single women and lesbian couples, was passed by Parliament in June 2021; however, transgender individuals were excluded, and surrogacy remains illegal.

During the two COVID-19 lockdowns in 2020, reports of domestic violence rose sharply, despite government measures to prevent this. Authorities implemented mechanisms to report violence and set up safe zones, for which legislation was adopted in June 2020. However, the appointment of Interior Minister Gérald Darmanin, who is being criminally investigated for rape, in July 2020 caused shock and anger among many.

Muslim women remain the target of several laws enacted in recent years preventing them from wearing clothing that involves religious practice, forcing some women to dress against their will.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 3 / 4

Employment discrimination against women, French Muslims, immigrants of North African descent, and other marginalized groups hinders equality of opportunity. While France's government acts against human trafficking, the problem persists in the commercial sex trade; some victims are also forced into domestic labor.

Gabon

Population: 2,200,000

Capital: Libreville

Freedom Status: Not Free

Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: Although Gabon holds multiparty elections, President Ali Bongo Ondimba maintains political dominance through a combination of patronage and repression, having succeeded his father upon his death in 2009 after more than 40 years in power. However, President Bongo's fitness to exercise power has been the subject of considerable doubt since he suffered a stroke in October 2018. The executive branch effectively controls the judiciary. Other significant problems include discrimination against immigrants, marginalization of minority groups, and legal and de facto inequality for women.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- In February, President Bongo's Gabonese Democratic Party (PDG) won 45 of the Senate's 52 elected seats. The president then appointed the remaining 15 senators, a new power invested in him by constitutional amendments rushed through the National Assembly in December 2020.
- In June, Mathurin Ovono Ebe, a prominent faculty member and president of the Omar Bongo University chapter of the National Union of Teachers and Researchers (SNEC), was kidnapped, tortured, and threatened by armed assailants, who some analysts suspect had ties to the government. Ebe had participated in a protest in front of the university hours before he was abducted.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 3 / 40A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 0 / 12*A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

The president, who wields executive authority, is elected by popular vote for seven-year terms. Presidential term limits were abolished in 2003. The president nominates and can dismiss the prime minister at will.

The August 2016 presidential election pitted incumbent Ali Bongo Ondimba of the PDG against Jean Ping of the opposition Union of Forces for Change (UFC). The electoral commission declared Bongo the winner with 49.8 percent of the vote. In Haut-Ogooué Province, a Bongo family stronghold, the commission claimed a turnout rate of 99.9 percent, with 95 percent for Bongo, even though turnout in the rest of the country was just 54 percent. Both Ping and observers from the European Union (EU) called for a recount.

Meanwhile, violent protests erupted, and security forces stormed Ping's headquarters. Although the government claimed the death toll from the unrest was under 10 people, journalists and opposition leaders estimated that more than 50 people had died; hundreds of people were arrested.

The Constitutional Court, headed by a longtime Bongo family ally, rebuffed an observation mission from the African Union (AU) during the recount. Following the recount, the president was credited with 50.66 percent of the vote. Ping rejected the results.

President Bongo suffered a stroke in 2018 and was not seen publicly for nearly a year. Since then, his capacity to serve as president has been questioned.

Gabon's Parliament consists of the National Assembly, whose members are elected by popular vote for five-year terms, and the Senate, which was reformed by December 2020 constitutional amendments as part of the ruling party's efforts to consolidate control should Bongo be further incapacitated. Under the new constitution, the Senate consists of 67 seats, 52 of which are directly elected and 15 of which are appointed by the president. Bongo appointed 15 senators in February 2021, days after the PDG claimed 45 of the body's 52 elected seats.

National Assembly elections were originally due in 2016 but were repeatedly postponed. The incumbent assembly was finally dissolved in 2018, leaving the Senate as the only legislative body for most of the year. The PDG claimed 98 seats in the National Assembly elections that October, which were boycotted by opposition parties due to the government's failure to create an independent electoral commission. PDG allies won roughly 10 more seats, and no single party other than the PDG took more than 11. The elections were marked by credible allegations of fraud and repression.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 0 / 4

Gabon's electoral laws and framework do not ensure credible elections. The electoral commission, the Interior Ministry, and the Constitutional Court all play important roles in managing elections, and all are loyal to the president.

In January 2018, Parliament gave its final approval to constitutional amendments that were developed without meaningful input from opposition parties or civil society. The amendments introduced a runoff system for presidential elections if no candidate wins a majority in the first round and required ministers to pledge allegiance to the president. Lawmakers rejected the imposition of presidential term limits. In December 2020, Parliament rushed through a slate of constitutional amendments that reduced the size of the Senate and provided for the president's appointment of 15 of the body's 67 members. Critics largely saw the amendments as a means of consolidating the PDG's power.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 2 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 1 / 4

The PDG dominates the nominally multiparty system. Opposition parties remain fragmented, and the government has disrupted their activities by denying them permits for public gatherings, arresting participants in their largely peaceful protests, and incarcerating their leaders.

In September 2021, the government proposed a new law that would require presidential candidates to have lived in Gabon for at least six months in each of the two years preceding an election. Analysts believe the law targets members of the extended Bongo family who might contest the 2023 election against the president or his anointed successor.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 0 / 4

The PDG has monopolized the executive branch since the 1960s, and there is no realistic opportunity for the opposition to gain power through elections. In 2017, Ping called for a civil disobedience campaign, arguing that he had exhausted all institutional remedies for the fraudulent 2016 election. He and some other opposition leaders boycotted the 2018 National Assembly elections.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 0 / 4

The Bongo family and associates have acquired enormous wealth after decades in power, which has led to judicial investigations in France, including of BNP Paribas, which is accused of laundering money on the Bongo family's behalf. The October 2021 release of the Pandora Papers, an investigation by the International Consortium of Investigative Journalists (ICIJ) that revealed the corrupt global financial system and connections of rich and powerful actors around the world, revealed that the Bongo family used substantial resources to sustain patronage networks and fund vote-buying during elections. The leadership relies on security forces to intimidate the opposition.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 1 / 4

Ethnic minorities have little ability to gain political representation, given the PDG's dominance. Key government and military posts are held by loyalists from major ethnic groups. Though Parliament decriminalized homosexuality in 2020, LGBT+ people are not openly represented politically.

In July 2020, Rose Christiane Ossouka Raponda of the PDG became the first woman to be prime minister of Gabon.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 1 / 12C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 0 / 4

Government policy is set by the president and senior aides, and the parliament is dominated by the PDG. President Bongo suffered a stroke in October 2018, and his fitness for office remains uncertain. In November 2018, the Constitutional Court unilaterally altered the constitution to allow the vice president to assume some of the president's functions if he is "temporarily unavailable." In December 2020, the PDG-dominated parliament passed further constitutional amendments stipulating that the president of the Senate, the president of the National Assembly, and the defense minister would share interim executive powers should the president become incapacitated.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 1 / 4

Corruption and impunity remain major problems, and the Bongo family's corrupt networks were exposed by the Pandora Papers, released in October 2021. Authorities have reportedly used anticorruption efforts to target regime opponents. A special criminal court for cases involving the theft of public funds was established in 2018, but prosecutions remain selective. In January 2020, civil society organizations filed a lawsuit in Libreville accusing Nouredin Bongo, the president's son, of corruption and money laundering. The public prosecutor dismissed the complaint. In September of that year, President Bongo announced that Nouredin would direct his 2023 reelection campaign, despite widespread skepticism about the president's health.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 0 / 4

The government operates with minimal transparency. The presidency's budget is not subject to the same oversight as those for other institutions. High-level civil servants are required to disclose their assets, but the declarations are not made public. The government has refused to disclose any information about President Bongo's health.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 18 / 60 (-1)D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 7 / 16 (-1)*D1. Are there free and independent media? 1 / 4

Press freedom is guaranteed by law but is restricted in practice, and reporters self-censor to avoid legal repercussions. The 2017 communications code contains provisions that restricted media freedom, including an obligation for media to promote "the country's image and national cohesion."

In April 2020, the High Authority of Communication (HAC) suspended the news site Gabon Media Time for three months after its representatives ignored a summons to attend an HAC meeting on a libel complaint; the HAC had suspended the site for a month in 2019 after it criticized state hospitals.

Although religious freedom is enshrined in the constitution and generally respected, some heterodox religious groups reportedly have difficulty obtaining registration from the government.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 1 / 4 (-1)

Omar Bongo University, Gabon's main center for tertiary education, is state-run, and academic freedom is tenuous. Professors self-censor to avoid conflicts with the authorities.

In June 2021, Mathurin Ovono Ebe, a prominent faculty member and president of the Omar Bongo University chapter of the National Union of Teachers and Researchers (SNEC), was kidnapped, tortured, and threatened by armed assailants, who some analysts believe are linked to the government. Ebe had participated in a protest in front of the university hours before he was abducted.

Score Change: The score declined from 2 to 1 due to the kidnapping and torture of a high-profile university figure by unknown assailants in apparent retaliation for his union activity.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 2 / 4

Ordinary individuals' freedom to express criticism of the government is limited by restrictive laws and deterred by state surveillance. Individuals who criticize the government are routinely detained or attacked by security forces.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 3 / 12E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 1 / 4

Freedom of assembly is limited. The government repeatedly denied permits for meetings, used tear gas, and arrested demonstrators to disperse unauthorized gatherings. A 2017 law further limited the freedom to assemble by making organizers responsible for offenses committed during gatherings.

In February 2021, two people died during protests against the government's COVID-19 restrictions after police fired tear gas and stun grenades into crowds in Libreville and Port Gentil. Some witnesses claimed that police used live ammunition and shot the two individuals who were killed.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 1 / 4

Relatively few nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) operate in Gabon. Freedom of association is guaranteed by the constitution, but the process for formally registering NGOs is onerous and implemented inconsistently, leaving groups vulnerable to accusations that they are not in compliance with the law.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 1 / 4

Workers are legally permitted to join unions, engage in collective bargaining, and strike, but the government has disrupted sit-ins and other labor activism in recent years, and has arrested participants. Some analysts suspect that the June 2021 kidnapping and assault of Omar Bongo University faculty member and SNEC leader Mathurin Ovono Ebe was carried out by government-linked agents.

F. RULE OF LAW: 3 / 16F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 0 / 4

The courts are subordinate to the president. The judiciary is accountable to the Ministry of Justice, through which the president has the power to appoint and dismiss judges. Gabon's highest judicial body, the Constitutional Court, is composed of three members appointed by the president, two by the National Assembly, one by the Senate, and three by the Superior Council of the Judiciary, which itself is headed by the president and justice minister. The 2018 constitution also created a new special court, the Court of Justice of the Republic, which alone has the authority to place a check on top executive and judicial officials. It consists of seven members appointed by the Superior Council of the Judiciary and six members of Parliament. The Constitutional Court is headed by a longtime Bongo ally.

In 2019, a Libreville appellate court agreed to hear a lawsuit that would have required President Bongo to undergo a medical exam to determine his fitness for office. The government suspended the judge who made the ruling and blocked the proceedings. In February 2020, the government refused to hear a lawsuit charging Nouredin Bongo with corruption. In July of that year, a Libreville court convicted Bertrand Zibi Abeghe, a former ally turned opposition leader arrested during the 2016 election, to six years in prison.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 1 / 4

Legal safeguards against arbitrary arrest and detention are not upheld by police, and detainees are often denied access to lawyers. Lengthy pretrial detention is common. Arbitrary arrests linked to opposition activism have increased since the 2016 election crisis. Several detained opposition figures have been denied due process, and prisoners have occasionally died in custody.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 1 / 4

Prisons are severely overcrowded, with limited access to proper medical care. Torture is outlawed by the constitution, but detainees and inmates face physical abuse. In January 2021, former head of the state-run Gabon Oil Company Patrichi Christian Tanasa, imprisoned as the result of a corruption investigation, alleged he had been tortured and sexually assaulted while in custody.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 1 / 4

The country's large population of African immigrants is subject to harassment and extortion, including by police. Members of some minority groups experience workplace discrimination and live in extreme poverty.

Women have equal legal rights on some issues but face significant de facto discrimination in employment and other economic matters. Sexual harassment in the workplace, which is not prohibited by law, is common.

In June 2020, the government passed a law decriminalizing homosexuality. Same-sex marriage remains illegal and LGBT+ individuals are still subject to widespread social stigma, discrimination, and the threat of physical violence.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 5 / 16G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 2 / 4

There are no laws restricting internal travel, but police often monitor travelers at checkpoints and demand bribes. Married women seeking to obtain a passport or travel abroad must have permission from their husbands. The government has imposed travel bans on opposition leaders in recent years.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 1 / 4

Bureaucratic and judicial delays can pose difficulties for businesses. Enforcement of contracts and property rights is weak, and the process for property registration is lengthy. Bongo and his associates play a dominant role in the economy, impairing fair competition and favoring those with connections to the leadership.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 1 / 4

Personalized forms of violence are believed to be widespread, and perpetrators generally enjoy impunity. Rape and domestic abuse are rarely reported to authorities or prosecuted. Spousal rape is not specifically prohibited. Abortion is a punishable crime under most circumstances. The minimum age for marriage is 15 for women and 18 for men. The civil code states that a wife must obey her husband as the head of household.

In March 2021, the parliament amended the civil code to enhance legal equality for married women, including by recognizing gender-based violence as legitimate grounds for divorce.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 1 / 4

Wage standards and laws against forced labor are poorly enforced, particularly in the informal sector and with respect to foreign workers. Both adults and children are exploited in a number of different occupations, and foreign women are trafficked to Gabon for prostitution or domestic servitude.

Georgia

Population: 3,700,000

Capital: Tbilisi

Freedom Status: Partly Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Note: The numerical scores and status listed above do not reflect conditions in Abkhazia and South Ossetia, which are examined in separate reports. Freedom in the World reports assess the level of political rights and civil liberties in a given geographical area, regardless of whether they are affected by the state, nonstate actors, or foreign powers. Disputed territories are sometimes assessed separately if they meet certain criteria, including boundaries that are sufficiently stable to allow year-on-year comparisons. For more information, see the report methodology and FAQ.

Overview: Georgia holds regular and competitive elections. Its democratic trajectory showed signs of improvement during the period surrounding a change in government in 2012–13, but recent years have featured backsliding. Oligarchic influence affects the country's political affairs, policy decisions, and media environment, and the rule of law is undermined by politicization. Civil liberties are inconsistently protected.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- In April, European Council (EC) president Charles Michel brokered an agreement between the ruling Georgian Dream (GD) party and opposition groups, effectively ending an parliamentary boycott that began in late 2020. However, GD withdrew from the agreement in July.
- Anti-LGBT+ rioters broke into the offices of nongovernmental organization (NGO) Tbilisi Pride in July, destroying property and injuring 53 media workers preparing to cover a subsequently cancelled pride parade. One of the injured individuals died later that month.
- In August, the State Security Service (SSS) was revealed to have surveilled several hundred individuals, including journalists, activists, politicians, and members of the clergy, reportedly tracking the personal activities and communications of their targets. The SSS and the government denied wrongdoing.
- In October, former president Mikheil Saakashvili, who was convicted in absentia of abuse of power while living abroad, was arrested upon his return to Georgia. Saakashvili engaged in a hunger strike, which he agreed to end in November.
- Georgians voted in local elections in October, with the ruling GD winning 19 of 20 mayoral races. Observers called the elections peaceful but noted the misuse of official resources, intimidation, and allegations of vote buying among other problems.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 22 / 40 (-1)

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 7 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 2 / 4

Georgia has a dual executive, with the prime minister serving as head of government and the president as head of state. Under constitutional changes approved in 2017, the president elected in 2018 is to serve a six-year term, after which a 300-member electoral college comprising national lawmakers and regional and local officials will choose presidents.

In 2018, Salome Zourabichvili, a former foreign minister supported by GD, won about 60 percent of the vote in the second round of the presidential election, defeating Grigol Vashadze, a former foreign minister running for the opposition United National Movement (UNM). While the electoral environment was largely peaceful, significant problems in the preelection period and voter intimidation on election day marred the quality of the runoff. Abuse of administrative resources and limited instances of vote buying and ballot-box stuffing were reported. Outside many voting stations, the presence of GD activists created an intimidating atmosphere. Just days before the runoff, a charitable foundation controlled by former prime minister Bidzina Ivanishvili, then the GD chairman, promised to write off the debts of about one in six eligible voters.

The president formally appoints the prime minister, whom Parliament nominates. Giorgi Gakharia, the prime minister since late 2019, resigned in February 2021, objecting to the court-ordered arrest of UNM leader Nika Melia. Gakharia was succeeded by defense minister and former prime minister Irakli Gharibashvili.

The unicameral Parliament is composed of 150 members, with 120 selected through nationwide proportional representation and 30 directly elected in single-member districts. This system was introduced in 2020; previously, nearly half of lawmakers were elected in single-member districts. All members serve four-year terms.

In the October 2020 parliamentary elections and November runoffs, GD won 90 seats, including all 30 single-member district seats. The UNM-led coalition won 36, all via proportional representation, and seven smaller groups won the remaining seats. Election observers, including the Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE) Office for Democratic Institutions and Human Rights (ODIHR), considered the vote competitive but noted numerous shortcomings, including the use of administrative resources, vote buying, interference with observers, disorganized precinct-level electoral commissions, preelection and election-day violence, violations of voting secrecy, and widespread intimidation.

In November 2020, opposition parties announced a boycott of that month's runoff and refused to enter the new Parliament. Voter turnout for the runoff stood at 26 percent, the lowest recorded since independence. Opposition members who were elected declined to take their seats until an agreement between the government and opposition was brokered with the support of EC president Michel in April 2021. GD withdrew from the agreement in July, however.

Local elections took place in two rounds in October 2021, with GD winning 19 of 20 mayoral races. International and local observers called the elections generally peaceful, but noted the misuse of administrative funds, the preelectoral dismissal of government employees for supporting opposition candidates, intimidation of candidates and voters, and extensive allegations of vote buying. Two opposition parliamentarians requested that their mandates be terminated after the local elections.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 3 / 4

The country's electoral laws are generally fair, and the bodies that implement them have typically done so impartially. However, GD's dominance in precinct-level commissions, complicated complaints procedures, and short timelines for filing complaints impair election quality.

The current electoral system for Parliament was introduced in June 2020 and first implemented in the that year's elections. The new system expanded the use of proportional representation and reduced the vote threshold for entering Parliament via proportional representation from 5 percent to 1 percent.

Several electoral-code amendments were passed in June 2021, though the UNM and Lelo for Georgia parliamentarians both declined to vote for them, saying they did not fully comply with the Michel-brokered agreement. Elements related to selection of Central Election Commission (CEC) members were rolled back by the GD-controlled Parliament in December. Further reforms to the electoral system were still being debated year's end.

In August 2021, Parliament selected Giorgi Kalandarishvili to head the CEC and selected two commissioners in a session boycotted by opposition members. A two-thirds vote failed to materialize in three previous attempts to select a chair.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 8/16 (-1)

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 2 / 4

While Georgia hosts a dynamic multiparty system, opposition parties increasingly face undue barriers to political competition. A pattern of single-party dominance since the 2000s has inhibited the development and stability of competing groups. In 2019, Mamuka Khazaradze, the founder of one of Georgia's largest banks, and his business partner were charged with money laundering two weeks after Khazaradze stated his intention to form a political party. That party, Lelo for Georgia, won four seats in the 2020 parliamentary elections, though Khazaradze himself remained under investigation as of year's end.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 2 / 4 (-1)

Georgia last underwent a peaceful transfer of power between rival groups in 2012–13, when GD defeated the UNM in parliamentary and presidential elections. A faction of the UNM split off in 2017, leaving smaller parties that are less capable of mounting a credible challenge.

Opposition parties and members experienced significant intimidation and harassment in 2021. UNM leader Melia was arrested in February on charges related to antigovernment protests held in 2019, though he was released from pretrial detention in May. Also in May, former prime minister Gakharia launched the For Georgia party. For Georgia members faced police harassment, surveillance, arrests on politically motivated charges, and dismissal from government jobs. Security services reportedly intimidated candidates of the Girchi party and others into withdrawing from the October 2021 local elections.

Under the Michel-brokered agreement, GD agreed to hold elections in 2022 if it received less than 43 percent of the vote in the 2021 local elections. GD subsequently withdrew from the agreement in late July, removing a negotiated pathway for the opposition to gain power through elections.

Score Change: The score declined from 3 to 2 because an opposition party leader was arrested over protest activity, while members of other parties were subjected to intimidation, threats, and loss of employment.

Ivanishvili, the wealthy businessman who founded GD in 2011, resigned as party chairman and premier in 2013, but remained the party's primary financial backer and continued to control it informally. His successors as prime minister and party chairman were close confidants and former employees. Bidzina Ivanishvili was reelected as GD chairman at a party congress in 2018 and remained in that post until January 2021, when he resigned and left party politics.

Recent elections have featured allegations of various forms of vote buying and intimidation, including pressure on public employees and recipients of social benefits to support the ruling party.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 2 / 4

No laws prevent women or ethnic and religious minorities from participating in politics. Electoral reforms introduced in 2020 included a gender quota for the proportional-representation component of parliamentary elections; at least one in every four candidates on a party's list must be a woman. Nevertheless, women's and minority interests remain underrepresented at all levels of government. Although a woman became president in 2018, women won only 31 seats in the 2020 parliamentary elections.

Ethnic minority groups make up an estimated 13 percent of the population, with ethnic Armenians and Azerbaijanis forming the largest communities. However, few parliamentarians are members of ethnic minority groups.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 7 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 2 / 4

The ability of elected officials to determine and implement government policy has been impaired by the informal role of Ivanishvili, who has exerted significant influence over decision-making after leaving office. His de facto authority was demonstrated in 2018, when then prime minister Giorgi Kvirikashvili resigned due to disagreements with Ivanishvili.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 2 / 4

While petty corruption has become less common, corruption persists. It has allegedly taken the form of nepotism or cronyism in government hiring and procurement. The lack of independence among law enforcement bodies and the judiciary impedes the effective application of anticorruption laws. Successful cases against high-ranking officials and those close to them remain rare.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 3 / 4

Government operations are generally subject to scrutiny by auditing bodies, the media, NGOs, and the public. However, the Institute for the Development of Freedom of Information, a Georgian advocacy group, reports that access to public information has been uneven since 2010. While public officials declare assets, the Georgia chapter of Transparency International warned in 2020 that the monitoring of such declarations is inconsistent and does not focus on conflicts of interest or potential corruption.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 36 / 60 (-1)

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 9 / 16 (-1)

D1. Are there free and independent media? 2 / 4

The media environment is pluralistic but partisan. Although free expression is broadly allowed, the government has become increasingly aggressive towards journalists.

In July 2021, anti-LGBT+ rioters broke into the offices of Tbilisi Pride, which was organizing the city's LGBT+ pride parade, and injured 53 media workers covering the event. Cameraman Aleksandre Lashkarava, who was one of the injured, died later that month. Officials engaged in antimedia rhetoric after the attack, with Tbilisi mayor Kakha Kaladze calling Georgian news programs "psychological violence" in late July. Journalists critical of the government's conduct were denied access to press events.

The government engages in the surveillance of journalists. In August 2021, television station Mtavari Arkhi (Main Channel) reported that the SSS had surveilled and recorded the conversations of journalists along with politicians, members of the clergy, and civil society activists.

Journalists at publicly funded or owned outlets face dismissal for criticizing the GD government. In August 2021, the Georgian Public Broadcaster dismissed news anchor Irakli Absandze after he criticized the government's response to the Tbilisi Pride riot.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 2 / 4

The constitution guarantees freedom of religion but grants unique privileges to the Georgian Orthodox Church. Georgia's religious minorities—among them Jehovah's Witnesses, Pentecostals, and Muslims—have reported discrimination and hostility, including from Georgian Orthodox priests and adherents, and are insufficiently protected by the state.

Members of the clergy were among those surveilled by the SSS according to August 2021 press reports, with the SSS reportedly tracking their communications with journalists and diplomats along with their personal activities.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 3 / 4

Academic freedom is generally respected. However, in 2018, Georgian authorities froze the assets of the International Black Sea University and prevented it from accepting students for the new academic year, citing tax arrears that the institution allegedly owed. The asset freeze was eventually lifted after the debt was paid, though the university maintained the tax claim was unlawful. The university is associated with the Turkish Islamic preacher Fethullah Gülen, which the Turkish government has declared a terrorist organization. In 2017, Georgian authorities closed two schools associated with the movement, citing regulatory violations. The seemingly disproportionate and arbitrary nature of the enforcement actions raised suspicions that they were carried out under Turkish pressure.

Georgians generally enjoy freedom of expression, including in their online communications. However, watchdog groups have expressed concerns that state agencies can conduct surveillance and data collection without adequate oversight. A 2017 law created a new electronic surveillance agency under the SSS that can fine service providers for failure to cooperate with its work.

In August 2021, the SSS was revealed to have engaged in widespread surveillance of public figures, including journalists, activists, clergy members, and politicians. Multiple individuals confirmed the authenticity of their conversations after they were leaked in September. Ombudsman Nino Lomjaria publicly stated that several hundred people were surveilled by the SSS. The government and the SSS both denied wrongdoing, though prosecutors launched an investigation in mid-September.

In March 2021, several people accused authorities of harassing them after criticizing musician Bera Ivanishvili, the former GD chairman's son, on social media. Their accusations came after TV Pirveli aired an undated conversation in which Ivanishvili, his father, and the head of the Special State Protection Service discussed the targeting of internet users, including minors.

In recent years, multiple public figures—including opposition and ruling party politicians—have been subjected to intimidation through the threatened or actual release of surreptitiously recorded sex videos, contributing to an atmosphere that deters free expression on politics.

Score Change: The score declined from 3 to 2 because Georgian security services were reported to have engaged in widespread surveillance of individuals, including journalists, clergy members, and diplomats, and to have used such surveillance to intimidate perceived opponents.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 7 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 2 / 4

Freedom of assembly is often respected, though police sometimes respond to demonstrations with excessive force.

LGBT+ groups' right to assembly are rarely protected, however, and LGBT+ events are rarely held. In July 2021, anti-LGBT+ rioters met little resistance from police when they broke into the offices of Tbilisi Pride, destroying property and attacking journalists who prepared to cover the day's events. The parade was consequently cancelled. The government previously declined to guarantee protection for a planned LGBT+ rally in Tbilisi in 2019, while right-wing protesters gathered outside the offices of an LGBT+ pride organization and reportedly vandalized its exterior in 2020.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 3 / 4

Civil society sector is fairly robust. Some groups are included in policy discussions, though others report facing political pressure, largely in the form of public criticism by government officials. Civil society advocates were also revealed to be targets of SSS surveillance in August 2021.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 2 / 4

Workers are legally allowed to organize, bargain collectively, and strike, though there are some restrictions on the right to strike, including a ban on strikes by certain categories of workers. Legal protections against antiunion discrimination by employers are weak and poorly enforced in practice.

F. RULE OF LAW: 8 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 2 / 4

Despite ongoing judicial reforms, executive and legislative interference in the courts remains a substantial problem, as does a lack of transparency and professionalism surrounding judicial proceedings.

Under the constitutional framework that took effect after the 2018 presidential election, the High Council of Justice rather than the president nominates Supreme Court judges; Parliament then approves the judges. A judicial self-governing body elects most council members. In 2018, the council presented a list of Supreme Court nominees, but a coalition of NGOs criticized the process's apparent opacity and the nominees' quality. The head of Parliament's legal affairs committee resigned over what she called an "unacceptable" process soon after. In late 2019, Parliament confirmed 14 justices, though opposition members did not participate in the vote. Observers, including from the Council of Europe, criticized the appointments, saying the candidates were neither qualified nor impartial. Parliament passed further judicial reforms in 2020, preempting an opinion from the Venice Commission of the Council of Europe.

The GD government agreed to institute judicial reforms under the Michel-brokered agreement, though the government withdrew from the agreement in July 2021. Parliament appointed six Supreme Court justices in mid-July, ignoring the agreement. Another four were appointed in December, despite calls from the European Union to continue a judicial-reform program. In September, the Georgia chapter of Transparency International criticized the GD government's decision to reverse changes to the selection process for the prosecutor general, saying it did so to retain unilateral control.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 2 / 4

The law guarantees due process, but the related safeguards are not always respected. The ombudsman's office has reported problems including a failure to fully implement Constitutional Court rulings on due process matters, administrative delays in court proceedings, the violation of the accused's right to a presumption of innocence, failure to observe rules surrounding detention and interrogation, and the denial of access to a lawyer upon arrest. A number of government opponents have faced prosecutions in recent years that were widely seen as selective or politically motivated.

Former president Mikheil Saakashvili, who had been convicted of abuse of power in absentia in 2018, was arrested by Georgian authorities upon his return to the country in October 2021. Saakashvili was prohibited from attending several hearings related to new charges in November, prompting criticism from the ombudsman and the US State Department.

Human rights watchdogs and the ombudsman have expressed concern about the physical abuse of detainees during arrest and in police custody and have noted the lack of an independent system for supervising police conduct and addressing claims of mistreatment. Violence and harsh conditions in prisons remain problems.

A 2018 law established the State Inspector's Service (SIS), which was tasked with investigating police abuses, but it was not independent from the prosecutor's office. In December 2021, the government passed legislation to replace the SIS with two entities, which the state inspector described as "punishment of the Service for its independence." The SIS will be dissolved in 2022 under the legislation.

Former president Saakashvili faced apparent mistreatment after his October 2021 arrest. In November, footage of Saakashvili being physically dragged into a prison hospital against his will was aired by the State Penitentiary Service (SPS). While the SPS claimed that Saakashvili had mistreated personnel, Saakashvili claimed that he was physically attacked.

A 2014 antidiscrimination law provides protection against discrimination on the basis of various factors, including race, gender, age, sexual orientation, and gender identity, but it is enforced unevenly. Women and people with disabilities suffer employment discrimination, among other problems.

LGBT+ people face societal discrimination and are increasingly the targets of serious violence. Transgender people in particular receive little protection, and prosecutors rarely designate crimes against transgender people or other minorities as hate crimes, despite evidence supporting such designations.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 12 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

There are ongoing restrictions on travel to and from the separatist territories of Abkhazia and South Ossetia, and individuals who approach their de facto borders can face detention, generally for short periods. Georgians also faced COVID-19-related movement restrictions, including a curfew, during part of 2021. Georgians are otherwise free to travel and change their place of residence, employment, and education without undue interference.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 3 / 4

The legal framework and government policies are generally supportive of private business activity. However, protection for property rights remains weak, and deficiencies in judicial independence and government transparency hamper economic freedom.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 3 / 4

Personal social freedoms are generally respected. However, constitutional changes approved in 2017 define marriage as “a union between a man and a woman for the purpose of creating a family.” There is no law allowing civil unions for same-sex couples.

Domestic violence remains a problem in Georgia, and the response from police is often inadequate, though changing societal attitudes have contributed to more frequent reporting and some improvements in enforcement in recent years. Spousal rape is not specifically criminalized.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 2 / 4

Unsafe conditions and inadequate legal protections for workers continue to contribute to a high rate of workplace deaths and injuries. In 2020, Parliament passed a labor reform law that introduced new rules for overtime, shift breaks, and other working conditions, while strengthening the labor inspector’s office.

Georgia is a source, destination, and transit country for human trafficking linked to sexual exploitation and forced labor. Displaced people from Abkhazia and South Ossetia are among the populations most vulnerable to trafficking. However, according to the US State Department’s Trafficking in Persons Report 2021, the government has continued its enforcement efforts and improved its performance on victim assistance.

Germany

Population: 83,100,000

Capital: Berlin

Freedom Status: Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Germany is a representative democracy with a vibrant political culture and civil society. Political rights and civil liberties are largely assured in law and practice. The political system is influenced by the country’s totalitarian past, with constitutional safeguards designed to prevent authoritarian rule. Although Germany has generally been stable since the mid-20th century, political tensions have grown in recent years following an influx of asylum seekers into the country, and the growing popularity of right-wing populist movements.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- Free and fair federal elections held in September resulted in the formation of a new coalition government of the Social Democratic Party (SPD), the Green Party, and the liberal Free Democratic Party (FDP). Following the elections, the SPD’s Olaf Scholz won the chancellorship, replacing former chancellor Angela Merkel; Merkel, of the Christian Democratic Union (CDU), had served four consecutive terms as chancellor and chose not to contest the September elections.
 - In May 2020, the Federal Constitutional Court (BVerfG) ruled that provisions of the Federal Intelligence Service (BND) Act were unconstitutional, in part because they impinged on the privacy of journalistic sources. A revised bill was passed in March, though Reporters Without Borders (RSF) criticized the new bill, saying that it still offered insufficient protections for journalists.

- Beginning in March, a number of CDU and Christian Social Union (CSU) officials resigned their positions after being implicated in various high-profile corruption cases. Investigations into corruption allegations against government officials, including suspected cases of bribery in arranging the sale of COVID-19-related face masks to the state, continued throughout the year.
- Large demonstrations protesting Germany's COVID-19 restrictions were held throughout the year. Many of these protests turned violent: Querdenken (Lateral Thinking) anti-lockdown protesters physically assaulted several journalists and violently clashed with police numerous times.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 39 / 40A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 12 / 12*A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

Germany's head of state is a largely ceremonial president, chosen by the Federal Convention, a body formed jointly by the Bundestag (Federal Parliament) and state representatives. The president can serve up to two five-year terms. Former foreign minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier of the SPD was elected president in February 2017.

The federal chancellor—the head of government—is elected by the Bundestag and serves for the duration of a legislative session, unless the Bundestag votes to elect a replacement in a “constructive vote of no confidence.” Incumbent chancellor Angela Merkel, who had served four consecutive terms in the role, did not contest the September 2021 Bundestag elections. In December, the Bundestag elected former finance minister Olaf Scholz to the chancellorship. Scholz, of the center-left SPD, leads a coalition government composed of three parties: the SPD, the Green Party, and the liberal FDP.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The parliament includes a lower house (Bundestag), and an upper house, the 69-seat Federal Council (Bundesrat), which represents the country's 16 federal states. The Bundestag is elected at least every four years through a mixture of proportional representation and single-member districts, which can lead the number of seats to surpass the minimum of 598. The number of lower-house representatives increased from 709 to 736 following the September 2021 Bundestag elections. The September elections were competitive, and deemed free and fair by local and international election monitors.

The SPD won 206 seats, gaining a narrow majority over the center-right CDU and its Bavarian sister party, the CSU. The CDU-CSU won 196 seats—a nearly 9 percent decline from the 2017 elections, and the party's worst result since 1949. The Greens won a record 118 seats, and the FDP won 92; following the elections, both parties entered a coalition government with the SPD. The right-wing populist AfD took 83 seats, and the far-left party the Left, widely viewed as a successor to the East German communists, took 39. One representative from the Danish minority party South Schleswig Voters' Committee (SSW), also entered the Bundestag.

In Germany's federal system, state governments have authority over matters such as education, policing, taxation, and spending. State governments appoint Bundesrat members, and in this manner can influence national policies.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 4 / 4

Germany's electoral laws and framework are fair and impartial. German voters cast two ballots—one for a candidate in their constituency and another for a party, with the latter vote determining the seat share a party receives in the Bundestag. If a party wins more seats in the first vote than are permitted by results of the second, it gets to keep these “overhang seats”—yet to avoid distorting the results of the second vote, all other parties receive “balance seats.” With 736 lower-house members, Germany has the world's second-largest national parliament, after China.

In order to curtail the increasing size of the Bundestag, its members voted to adopt a two-step electoral reform plan in October 2020. The first step took effect ahead of the 2021 elections, and includes a requirement that one party must gain more than three overhang seats in order for balance seats to be allocated to the other parties. The second step will reduce the number of constituencies, lowering the number of candidates able to win overhang seats in future elections.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 15 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 4 / 4

While CDU-CSU and SPD have historically dominated German politics, other parties have increased their support in recent years. Parties do not face undue restrictions on registration or operation. Under electoral laws that, for historical reasons, are intended to restrict the far-left and far-right, a party must receive either 5 percent of the vote or win at least three constituency seats directly to gain representation in the parliament. The constitution makes it possible to ban political parties, although a party must be judged to pose a threat to democracy for a ban to be legal, and no party has been successfully banned since 1956.

Support for the AfD has risen in recent years, as the party has moved further to the radical right. The AfD held seats in the Bundestag and all state parliaments in 2021. While its popularity has shaken the German political system, most parties oppose the AfD and eschew coalitions that include it.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 4 / 4

Opposition parties in Germany have a realistic opportunity to increase their support and gain power through elections.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 4 / 4

The German government is democratically accountable to the voters, who are free to throw their support behind their preferred candidates and parties without undue influence.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 3 / 4

The constitution gives all citizens age 18 or older the right to vote, to stand for election, and to hold public office. However, some groups are politically underrepresented. Women hold only 34.92 percent of Bundestag seats. Some 11.3 percent of Bundestag members are from immigrant backgrounds, having at least one parent born without German citizenship. In February 2021, Green Party member Tareq Alaows became the first refugee to run for the Bundestag; he withdrew his candidacy nearly two months later, citing concerns for the safety of his family after receiving numerous death threats.

Naturalization rates are low, leading to large numbers of long-term residents who cannot vote in federal elections. About 8.7 million foreign-born permanent residents were unable to vote in the 2021 federal elections, due in part to restrictive citizenship and voting laws.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 12 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 4 / 4

Democratically elected representatives decide and implement policy without undue interference.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 4 / 4

While Germany generally maintains strong and effective corruption safeguards, the Council of Europe's Group of States against Corruption (GRECO) regularly criticizes Germany for its opaque party-financing regime and for a lack of lobbying regulations. In an effort to increase transparency, the SPD and CDU-CSU coalition government introduced a lobby registry in March 2021, which will require individuals representing interest groups to register before contacting officials in the federal government.

The June 2020 collapse of payment processing firm Wirecard brought scrutiny on the German financial regulatory system. Wirecard filed for bankruptcy after its accounting firm refused to sign off on financial statements over evidence of fraud. Its chief executive was arrested over fraud and embezzlement charges, and remained in pretrial custody throughout 2021.

A number of CDU-CSU officials resigned their positions in early 2021 after being implicated in bribery and corruption cases. Several who stepped down were under investigation for allegedly receiving kickbacks for arranging the sale of face masks to the state after the start of the COVID-19 pandemic. Others resigned following allegations that they had accepted bribes to make political decisions that benefited the government of Azerbaijan.

Germany is obligated to enhance legal protections for whistleblowers under an EU directive issued in 2019. In December 2020, justice minister Christine Lambrecht presented a draft whistleblower protection law; the bill, which exceeded the EU requirements in its scope, faced significant resistance from members of the CDU-CSU, who claimed it posed "a threat to businesses." The bill failed to pass in the Bundestag in April 2021.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 4 / 4

The government is held accountable for its performance through open parliamentary debates. In 2018, the government introduced question time, in which the chancellor answers questions from the parliament three times per year. However, transparency is limited by an overburdened bureaucracy and inconsistent state-level standards.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 55 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF 14 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 4 / 4

Freedom of expression is enshrined in the constitution, and the media are largely free and independent. Hate speech, such as racist agitation or antisemitism, is punishable by law. It is illegal to advocate for Nazism, deny the Holocaust, or glorify the ideology of Hitler.

Journalists sometimes face harassment and abuse, especially via social media, as well as physical attacks when reporting on right-wing demonstrations. Such attacks were common in 2021, especially against journalists reporting on Querdenken demonstrations against COVID-19 restrictions.

The privacy of communications between journalists and their sources has been affected by surveillance provisions in the BND Act, ruled unconstitutional in 2020. A revised bill was passed by the Bundestag and Bundesrat in March 2021. However, Reporters Without Borders (RSF) says the bill still offers insufficient protections for journalists, and announced they would again appeal to the BVerfG.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 3 / 4

Freedom of belief is legally protected. However, eight states have passed laws prohibiting schoolteachers from wearing headscarves, while Berlin and the state of Hesse have adopted legislation banning headscarves for civil servants.

Antisemitism in Germany has been on the rise in recent years. The Federal Criminal Police Office (BKA) recorded nearly 2,000 criminal offenses against Jewish individuals and organizations during 2021, warning that the number of unreported cases was many times higher. In September, a 16-year-old was arrested for allegedly planning to attack a synagogue in Hagen; he remained in custody at year's end. Querdenken protesters regularly invoked antisemitic conspiracy theories throughout 2020 and 2021.

Islamophobia also remains a concern: German police recorded 662 politically motivated attacks against Muslim individuals and institutions during 2021.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

Academic freedom is generally respected, though legal prohibitions on extremist speech are enforceable in educational settings.

In late 2020, university employees—disadvantaged by a newly adopted 12-year time limit on fixed-term contracts—launched a grassroots initiative seeking a solution to precarious working conditions in academia. In 2021, the topic was taken up for discussion in the Bundestag, and the Greens, the SPD, and the Left all advocated for increased funding to extend permanent positions in academia.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 3 / 4

Private discussion and internet access are generally unrestricted, but recent developments have prompted concern about government surveillance. In June 2021, the government passed new legislation allowing the federal police and intelligence services to use spyware to surveil encrypted online messaging services like WhatsApp when conducting criminal investigations. Critics have called the legislation unconstitutional, and several German media rights organizations have filed lawsuits asking the courts to prevent the intelligence services from secretly surveilling the private communications of individuals who are not suspected of criminal activity.

Watchdogs continue to express concern about a controversial 2015 data-retention law that requires telecommunication companies to store users' telephone and internet data for 10 weeks. Critics view the law as a threat to general privacy and to whistleblowers, who could be punished under a section detailing illegal data handling. The law was later suspended and found to be incompatible with EU law by several German courts; the advocate general of the European Court of Justice (ECJ) issued a legal opinion confirming those findings in November 2021.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 12 / 12E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

The right to peaceful assembly is enshrined in the constitution and is generally respected in practice, except in the case of outlawed groups, such as those advocating Nazism or opposing democratic order. Assembly rights were restricted under COVID-19 measures, but an April 2020 BVerfG ruling upheld rights for protesters adhering to social-distancing requirements.

Several large demonstrations against COVID-19 measures were held in 2020 and 2021, some of which turned violent. Far-right Querdenken protesters assaulted several journalists and repeatedly clashed with police throughout 2021.

In May 2021, Amnesty International and other human rights groups released a joint report finding that assembly rights had been unfairly curtailed during the pandemic by restrictions on demonstrations.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 4 / 4

Germany has a vibrant sphere of NGOs, which operate freely. In December 2020, the parliament passed a revised tax law that explicitly allowed more NGOs operating in areas including climate change and LGBT+ issues to claim tax-exempt status.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 4 / 4

Trade unions, farmers' groups, and business confederations are generally free to organize, and play an important role in shaping Germany's economic model.

F. RULE OF LAW: 14 / 16F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 4 / 4

The judiciary is independent, and generally enforces the rights provided by Germany's laws and constitution.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 4 / 4

The rule of law prevails in Germany. Civil and criminal matters are treated according to legal provisions and with due process. However, under "preventive detention" practices, those convicted of certain violent crimes can be detained after serving their full sentence if they are deemed to pose a danger to the public.

In 2019, the ECJ ruled that German prosecutors were not allowed to issue European arrest warrants because of their dependence on state-level justice ministers. In January 2021, the Federal Ministry of Justice and Consumer Protection (BMJV) proposed a draft law that would strengthen the independence of Germany's public prosecutors.

In recent years, several state governments adopted laws that increased the surveillance powers of law enforcement. These laws have been criticized for enabling police to take pre-emptive action if they believe there is an "impending danger," a vaguely defined term could allow for abuses according to critics.

The professionalism of law-enforcement officers has come into question following the 2018 discovery of a neo-Nazi network within the Frankfurt police. Since then, police in several cities and states have been accused of espousing extremist and discriminatory sentiments. An investigation into the issue was launched by the federal Ministry of the Interior in October 2020, and is expected to last three years.

Politically motivated crimes against public officials and politicians have increased in recent years. The political establishment was notably shaken by the 2019 murder of Hesse politician Walter Lübcke at the hands of a far-right extremist. According to a June 2021 report, the BKA registered 3,365 politically motivated violent crimes in 2020, an increase from 2,832 in 2019.

Attacks on refugees and refugee housing continued to decline from a peak of 3,500 in 2016. In 2019, nearly 1,750 such attacks were reported. In the first half of 2021, 461 assaults were recorded, a significant decrease from the 879 attacks reported during the same period in 2020.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 3 / 4

The constitution guarantees equality and prohibits discrimination on the basis of origin, gender, religion or belief, disability, age, or sexual orientation. However, a number of obstacles stand in the way of equal treatment of all segments of the population. Race-based discrimination is commonplace, including continued discrimination against Roma and Sinti people. Women, meanwhile, face a gender-based pay gap, while men are likelier to hold full-time employment. Women earned on average 18 percent less per hour than men in 2020. The differences were significantly higher in West Germany than in East Germany.

In 2018, restrictive new asylum and migration policies were passed, which include building camps along Germany's international borders to hold and deport asylum seekers who had previously applied for asylum in another EU countries. The implementation of these policies thus far has been slow. Due to the dramatic deterioration of the security situation in Afghanistan, Germany indefinitely suspended deportations to the country in August 2021.

New legal guidelines governing blood donation were enacted in September, lifting some of the regulations that had previously prevented gay and bisexual men from donating blood. However, LGBT+ activists say that the new eligibility requirements still contain discriminatory restrictions.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 15 / 16G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

Freedom of movement is legally protected and generally respected, although the refugee crisis and security concerns related to activity by the Islamic State (IS) militant group have led to some restrictions on travel. In 2015, the government introduced legislation allowing the confiscation of identity documents from German citizens suspected of terrorism to prevent them from traveling abroad, particularly to Iraq and Syria.

COVID-19-related restrictions on movement, including the imposition of lockdowns and curfews, were periodically introduced in several states throughout 2020 and 2021 in response to coronavirus outbreaks and rising case numbers.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 4 / 4

The rights to own property and engage in commercial activity are respected.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 4 / 4

The government generally does not restrict social freedoms. Women's rights are protected under antidiscrimination laws. However, a considerable gender wage gap persists, with women earning approximately 18 percent less per hour in gross wages than men according to 2020 statistics. A law requiring large German companies to reserve at least 30 percent of nonexecutive-board seats for women took effect in 2016, but this law affects a limited number of companies. A similar law went into effect in August 2021, requiring the executive boards of stock market-listed companies to include at least one woman; additionally, if the federal government holds majority ownership of a company, 30 percent of that company's board seats must be reserved for women.

Adoption and tax legislation passed in 2014 gave equal rights to same-sex couples in these areas. The government legalized same-sex marriage in 2017.

In December 2021, the justice minister announced he would introduce legislation to fully revoke a Nazi-era law banning doctors from providing information on abortion services.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 3 / 4

According to both BKA reports and the US State Department's 2021 Trafficking in Persons Report, migrants from Eastern Europe, Africa, and Asia are persistently targeted for sex trafficking and forced labor, and ethnic Roma are notably vulnerable to sex trafficking and to other forms of sex work. Germany has seen an increase in prosecutions and convictions of suspected traffickers in recent years.

Ghana

Population: 32,400,000

Capital: Accra

Freedom Status: Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Since 1992, Ghana has held competitive multiparty elections and undergone peaceful transfers of power between the two main political parties. Although the country has a relatively strong record of upholding civil liberties, discrimination against women and LGBT+ people persists. There are some weaknesses in judicial independence and the rule of law, corruption presents challenges to government performance, and political violence is a growing concern.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- Ghanaians sought to organize protests over economic and social concerns under the #FixTheCountry banner, but authorities attempted to stop a rally via a May injunction, which was overturned in June. Protesters were also subjected to violence; a #FixTheCountry supporter was killed by unidentified individuals in June while two people were killed by authorities during a protest held the day after the activist's death.

- In February, security officers raided the country's first LGBT+ community center, which faced significant opposition from political and religious figures as well as violent threats. Police closed the center later that month.
- In August, Parliament began considering a bill that would criminalize displays of affection, cross-dressing, and LGBT+ advocacy, the latter of which would be punished with prison sentences of up to 10 years. The bill was under consideration by a parliamentary committee as of December.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 35 / 40A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 12 / 12*A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The president, who serves as head of state and head of government, is directly elected for up to two four-year terms. President Nana Akufo-Addo of the New Patriotic Party (NPP) won a second term in the December 2020 presidential election with 51.3 percent of the vote, while his predecessor, John Mahama of the National Democratic Congress (NDC), took 47.3 percent. African Union (AU) and European Union (EU) observers called the contest well-organized and generally peaceful, though EU monitors criticized a lack of campaign finance regulation and a misuse of state resources. Mahama rejected the results, alleging fraud, and issued a legal challenge. In March 2021, the Supreme Court dismissed Mahama's petition, stating that it lacked merit.

The immediate postelection period was marred by violence, with the national police reporting at least five deaths in the days following the vote. NDC supporters protested in parts of Ghana after the vote, notably marching on the Electoral Commission (EC) headquarters in Accra.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

Members of the unicameral, 275-seat Parliament are elected directly in single-member constituencies to serve four-year terms.

The NPP, which held a majority in the previous parliament, and the NDC each won 137 seats in elections held concurrently with the 2020 presidential contest. One seat was won by an independent who agreed to support the NPP, giving that party a bare de facto majority. Monitors lauded the elections' overall conduct. Despite the NPP's majority, an NDC member was selected as speaker in January 2021.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 4 / 4

Domestic and international observers consider the EC a capable manager of the electoral process. However, its composition has been the subject of political disagreement in the past; the 2018 appointment of Jean Mensa as its chairwoman was criticized by the NDC, which called her appointment partisan. Civil society largely lauded Mensa's selection, however.

In 2019, the EC announced plans to compile a new voter register ahead of the 2020 elections. The EC registered voters through an updated biometric system during two registration drives in 2020; while its efforts were largely successful, a number of minors and foreign-born residents were reportedly able to register, and NPP and NDC supporters clashed at some registration sites. AU electoral observers ultimately lauded the registration process and the EC's overall performance that December. In May 2021, the EC agreed to enact reforms after holding a conference with the Inter Party Advisory Committee, including the introduction of continuous voter registration.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 13 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 3 / 4

The constitution guarantees the right to form political parties, and this right is generally respected. However, civil society groups have expressed concern about the rising involvement of partisan vigilante groups in inter- and intraparty disputes.

Candidates, especially from smaller parties, were impeded in their ability to compete by an increase in registration fees. In 2020, Mensa announced that presidential candidates' filing fees would double compared to the 2016 amount.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 4 / 4

There have been multiple peaceful transfers of power between the NPP and NDC and parties in opposition have meaningful opportunities to increase their public support and win office. Mahama's defeat in the 2016 presidential race marked the first time since the 1992 reintroduction of multiparty politics that an incumbent stood for reelection and lost.

While Ghanaian political contests are generally peaceful, politicians are sometimes victims of violence. One member of Parliament was shot and killed in October 2020, while another was attacked and hospitalized that December.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 3 / 4

Ghanaians are generally free from undue interference with their political choices by powerful groups that are not democratically accountable. However, voters and candidates are threatened by vigilantism and politically motivated violence despite the 2019 promulgation of the Vigilantism and Related Offences Act, which bans all political and other vigilante groups.

NPP and NDC supporters clashed at several voter registration sites in 2020—despite an agreement between the two parties to refrain from such activity—resulting in one death.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 3 / 4

Ghanaian laws provide for equal participation in political life by the country's various cultural, religious, and ethnic groups. Women formally enjoy political equality but hold comparatively few leadership positions in practice. In 2020, the NDC selected Jane Naana Opoku-Agyemang as its vice-presidential candidate, the first time a woman was placed on a major party's presidential ticket. Women won 40 parliamentary seats in that December's elections, a slight increase over the 2016 results and the largest share since the reintroduction of multiparty politics.

The National House of Chiefs, Ghana's highest body of customary authority, has been under pressure to include women as members.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 10 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 4 / 4

Elected officials are generally free to set and implement government policy without improper influence from unelected entities. However, the president gained the ability to more easily enact states of emergency under the Imposition of Restrictions Act (IRA). The IRA, which was passed by Parliament and signed by Akufo-Addo in 2020 as the COVID-19 pandemic became a global crisis, limited Parliament's ability to easily revoke presidentially declared states of emergency. The IRA was criticized by the NDC and legal scholars, who warned that the legislation was disproportionate and gave the executive wide-ranging powers. In May 2021, Akufo-Addo stated that the law would remain in force until more Ghanaians received COVID-19 vaccines.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 3 / 4

Political corruption remains a problem despite active media coverage, fairly robust laws and institutions, and government antigraft initiatives. Legislation adopted in 2017 established the Office of the Special Prosecutor (OSP) to investigate political corruption.

Former attorney general Martin Amidu was appointed special prosecutor in 2018 but resigned in 2020, citing a lack of resources as one of his reasons. Amidu also claimed that Akufo-Addo sought to interfere in a report on the planned transfer of mineral royalties to publicly owned Agyapa Royalties. The OSP warned that the plan, which envisioned Accra selling shares in the firm, could lead to "bid rigging" or "illicit financial flows." Amidu's deputy, Jane Cynthia Naa Torshie Lampitey, became acting special prosecutor immediately after his resignation. In August 2021, Kissi Agyebeng, a lawyer and academic, was appointed to the role. The government withdrew the Agyapa Royalties proposal after the OSP made its assessment, but vowed to submit a renewed proposal in October.

The administrations of former presidents John Atta Mills and Mahama were implicated in a bribery scheme in 2020, when European aircraft maker Airbus admitted to bribing individuals in Ghana and several other countries between 2011 and 2015. President Akufo-Addo referred the matter to the OSP that February. Later in 2020, the OSP named Mahama's brother a person of interest and reported that Mahama himself was directly implicated. However, Amidu elected not to open an investigation against Mahama before resigning.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 3 / 4

The government operates with relative transparency, though there are weaknesses in the legal framework. The Right to Information Act, which grants citizens the right to seek, access, and receive information from public as well as some private institutions, came into effect in 2020.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 45 / 60 (-2)

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 14 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 3 / 4

Freedom of the press is constitutionally guaranteed and generally respected in practice. Ghana has a diverse and vibrant media landscape that includes state- and privately-owned television and radio stations as well as a number of independent newspapers and magazines. Online news media operate without government restrictions. Government agencies occasionally limit press freedom by harassing and arresting journalists, especially those reporting on politically sensitive issues.

Military and police personnel detained or attacked journalists on several occasions in 2021. In January, soldiers detained three staff members of Joy News, deleting some of their footage and damaging their vehicle before releasing them. In April, Accra police arrested Whatsup News editor in chief David Tamakloe, accusing him of the "publication of false news” and “extortion” after receiving a complaint from an interviewee before releasing him on bond. In May, Accra police detained and physically attacked Citi FM journalist Caleb Kudah after accusing him of photographing official vehicles. Police then impersonated Kudah to facilitate the arrest of another Citi FM colleague. Both were later released without charge.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 3 / 4

Religious freedom is constitutionally and legally protected, and the government largely upholds these protections in practice. However, public schools feature mandatory religious education courses drawing on Christianity and Islam, and Muslim students have allegedly been required to participate in Christian prayer sessions and church services in some publicly funded Christian schools.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

Academic freedom is legally guaranteed and generally upheld in practice.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 4 / 4

Private discussion is both free and vibrant. The government does not restrict individual expression on social media.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 10 / 12 (-1)

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 3 / 4 (-1)

The right to peaceful assembly is constitutionally guaranteed and generally respected. Permits are not required for meetings or demonstrations. Assemblies can be restricted under COVID-19 regulations, however.

Ghanaians sought to organize protests over economic and social concerns under the #FixTheCountry banner during 2021 but were impeded by the authorities. In May, the Accra High Court granted an injunction against a proposed #FixTheCountry rally, though the Supreme Court overturned that decision in June. Later in June, 11 organizers protesting in front of the Accra High Court were arrested.

#FixTheCountry supporters faced violence as 2021 continued. In late June, unidentified assailants killed #FixTheCountry supporter Ibrahim Muhammed in the town of Ejura. Protesters in Ejura rallied the day after Muhammed’s death; police and military personnel used live ammunition in subsequent clashes, killing two people and injuring at least four more.

Score Change: The score declined from 4 to 3 because the authorities responded to mid-year protests by attempting to prevent legitimate demonstrations, arresting protesters, and firing live ammunition during protests.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 4 / 4

Nongovernmental organizations are generally able to operate freely and play an important role in ensuring government accountability and transparency.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 3 / 4

Under the constitution and 2003 labor laws, workers have the right to form and join trade unions. However, the government forbids or restricts organized labor action in a number of sectors, including fuel distribution and utilities, public transportation, and ports and harbor services.

F. RULE OF LAW: 10 / 16 (-1)

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 2 / 4

Judicial independence is constitutionally and legally enshrined. While the judiciary has demonstrated greater levels of impartiality in recent years, corruption and bribery continue to pose challenges.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 3 / 4

Constitutional protections for due process and defendants' rights are mostly upheld. However, police have been known to accept bribes, make arbitrary arrests, and hold people without charge for longer than the legally permitted limit of 48 hours. The government is not obliged to provide the accused with legal counsel, and many people unable to afford lawyers are forced to represent themselves in court.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 3 / 4

Prisons are overcrowded and conditions can be life threatening, though the prison service has attempted to reduce congestion and improve the treatment of inmates in recent years.

Communal and ethnic violence is known to occur in parts of Ghana. Communal violence that began in 2018 between members of the Konkomba and Chokosi ethnic groups in North East Region escalated in 2019. In 2020, the Internal Displacement Monitoring Centre reported that 2,300 people had been internally displaced by that conflict.

Islamic militants and other armed groups active in the Sahel have reportedly taken refuge in the northern reaches of Ghana in recent years.

Despite equal rights under the law, women face societal discrimination, especially in rural areas, where their opportunities for education and employment are limited. However, women's enrollment in universities is increasing. People with disabilities face societal discrimination.

LGBT+ people face significant discrimination. Same-sex sexual activity remains criminalized, encouraging impunity for violence and harassment against LGBT+ people. LGBT+ Rights Ghana, which opened the country's first LGBT+ community center in January 2021, faced significant opposition from political and religious figures as well as violent threats. The center was raided by security officers in February and was closed by police later that month. In May, police arrested 21 people participating in a legal training workshop operated by Rightify Ghana, alleging that they sought to promote homosexuality. The participants, who were charged with unlawful assembly, were bailed in June.

A bill that would limit LGBT+ rights was also considered by Parliament in 2021. In early August, Parliament held its first reading of the Promotion of Proper Human Sexual Rights and Ghanaian Family Values Bill. The bill would criminalize displays of affection and cross-dressing, while those engaging in LGBT+ advocacy would face prison sentences as long as 10 years. The bill was being considered by a parliamentary committee as of December.

Score Change: The score declined from 3 to 2 because the persecution of LGBT+ people has increased—including through a wave of public harassment against the country's first LGBT+ community center, which was forced to shut down—and the authorities have contributed to the problem rather than protecting vulnerable citizens.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 11 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 3 / 4

Freedom of movement is guaranteed by the constitution and is generally respected by the government. However, poorly developed road networks and banditry can make travel outside the capital and tourist areas difficult. Police have been known to set up illegal checkpoints to demand bribes from travelers. Bribery is also rife in the education sector. Authorities instituted movement restrictions during the COVID-19 pandemic.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 3 / 4

Although the legal framework generally supports property ownership and private business activity, weaknesses in the rule of law, corruption, and an underregulated property rights system remain impediments. Bribery is a common practice when starting a business and registering property.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 3 / 4

While personal social freedoms are upheld in many respects and among large segments of the population, domestic violence and rape are serious problems, and harmful traditional practices including female genital mutilation (FGM) and early or forced marriage persist in certain regions.

The government has worked to combat gender-based violence (GBV), including by expanding the police's domestic violence and victim support units and creating special GBV courts, though such services are reportedly underresourced.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 2 / 4

Most workers are employed in the informal sector, limiting the effectiveness of legal and regulatory safeguards for working conditions. The exploitation of children in the agricultural and mining sectors remains a problem. Similar abuses in the fishing industry have also been reported, especially in the region surrounding Lake Volta.

In its Trafficking in Persons Report 2021, the US State Department reported that the government was working to improve its human-trafficking response, but won no convictions against alleged sex traffickers and made little progress in the alleged involvement of government officials. The State Department also noted that law enforcement efforts remained underresourced.

Greece

Population: 10,700,000

Capital: Athens

Freedom Status: Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Greece's parliamentary democracy features vigorous competition between political parties and a strong if imperfect record of upholding civil liberties. Ongoing concerns include corruption, discrimination against immigrants and minority groups, and poor conditions for irregular migrants and asylum seekers.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- Christos Pappas, one of the main leaders of the far-right party Golden Dawn, was arrested in July after being on the run for nine months. Pappas and many other members of Golden Dawn, which failed to win representation in the 2019 elections, were convicted of running a criminal organization in October 2020.
- A law passed in February 2021 introduced police stations on university campuses, in what the government claimed was an effort to fight crime. However, students, faculty, and staff protested the law that month and prevented its enforcement for what they saw as a threat and violation of academic freedom and expression.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 37 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 12 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The largely ceremonial president is elected by a parliamentary supermajority for a five-year term. The prime minister is chosen by the president and is usually the leader of the largest party in the parliament. Kyriakos Mitsotakis, head of the center-right party New Democracy (ND), took office as prime minister after the 2019 elections, replacing incumbent Alexis Tsipras of the Coalition of the Radical Left (SYRIZA). Katerina Sakellariopoulou, a longtime judicial official who had been nominated by ND but was also supported by SYRIZA and the center-left Movement for Change (KINAL), was elected president in January 2020.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The 300 members of the unicameral Hellenic Parliament are elected to serve four-year terms through a mixture of 8 single-member constituencies, 48 multi-member constituencies, and a national constituency with 12 seats. Under the electoral law in effect for the 2019 elections, the party with the most votes received a 50-seat bonus, making it easier to form a governing majority.

In the 2019 elections, ND won a single-party majority of 158 seats. SYRIZA lost its leading position, falling to 86 seats, while KINAL won 22. Among smaller parties, the Communist Party of Greece (KKE) took 15, the right-wing Greek Solution took 10, and the left-wing European Realistic Disobedience Front (MeRA25) secured 9. The far-right party Golden Dawn failed to win representation.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 4 / 4

The country generally has fair electoral laws, equal campaigning opportunities, and a weakly enforced system of compulsory voting. If passed with a two-thirds supermajority, changes to electoral law are implemented for the following elections. If passed with a simple majority, they go into effect in the following elections. An electoral law passed by the SYRIZA-led government with a simple majority in 2016 abolished the 50-seat bonus awarded to the winning party and was set to take effect during the elections after those in 2019. In January 2020, the ND government secured passage of legislation that would restore a bonus system, awarding between 20 and 50 bonus seats to the leading party depending on its share of the national vote. The new law also passed with a simple majority, meaning it would take effect only after the next elections.

In 2019, the ND government passed a law expanding the voting rights of diaspora and overseas Greek citizens. Citizens living abroad can participate in elections by proving residency in Greece for a two-year period within the last 35 years.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 15 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 4 / 4

The political system features vigorous competition among a variety of parties. Six parties were represented in Parliament as of 2021, and many others competed in the 2019 elections but did not pass the 3 percent threshold for representation.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 4 / 4

Greece has established a strong pattern of democratic transfers of power between rival parties, with the Panhellenic Socialist Movement (PASOK) and ND alternating in government for most of the past four decades.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 4 / 4

No group or institution from outside the political system exerts undue influence over the choices of voters and candidates.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 3 / 4

Greece's largest recognized minority population, the Muslim community of Thrace, has full political rights, and three members of the community won seats in the 2019 parliamentary elections. The authorities have rejected some ethnic groups' attempts to secure official recognition or to register associations with names referring to their ethnic identity, affecting their ability to organize and advocate for their political interests, though such associations are generally able to operate without legal recognition. Since 2010, documented immigrants have been allowed to vote in municipal elections.

In August 2021, the Central Board of Jewish Communities in Greece (KIS) expressed concern over the appointment of Athanassios Plevris as minister of health. KIS claimed Plevris made antisemitic remarks as a lawyer in a 2009 court case against his father, Constantinos Plevris, who was charged with inciting racism and violence for a book he published called "Jews: The Whole Truth." Plevris apologized for his comments, stating that the objections to his court statements were "understandable" and that he disagrees with his father's views.

Though there are no significant legal or practical barriers to women's political participation, women only hold a little more than a fifth of the seats in Parliament and sexist and patriarchal attitudes dissuade their active participation. In January 2020, Katerina Sakellariopoulou became the first woman to be elected as president of Greece.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 10 / 12C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 4 / 4

Greek elected officials generally set and implement government policies without undue interference, and the influence of international creditor institutions has receded over the past decade.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 3 / 4

Corruption remains a problem in Greece, and institutions tasked with combating it have inadequate resources. Tax officials in past years have been implicated in tax evasion schemes, which seriously complicate the government's fiscal reform efforts. A new criminal code and a new code of criminal procedure, adopted in 2019, allow prison time for the bribery of politicians and are more broadly aligned with relevant international conventions. However, the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD) expressed serious concerns that the main active bribery offense was converted from a felony to a misdemeanor.

In March 2021, a special committee was created to investigate accusations against former digital governance minister Nikos Pappas for receiving bribes and rigging television licensing competition. In July, Parliament voted in favor prosecuting Pappas through a special court in collaboration with the Judicial Council and the prosecutorial authority.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 3 / 4

Several laws and government programs are designed to ensure the transparency of official decisions and provide public access to information. Officials are required to make public declarations of their assets and income. The transparency of state procurement contracts remains a concern.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 50 / 60D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 14 / 16*D1. Are there free and independent media? 3 / 4

The constitution includes provisions guaranteeing freedom of the press, and these are generally upheld in practice, though the law imposes some limits related to defamation, hate speech, and other such content. While citizens continue to enjoy access to a broad array of print, broadcast, and online news outlets, ownership concentration and editorial interference from owners remain concerns, and the government has been accused of directing public funds toward friendly private media.

Journalists have been subject to assaults or other mistreatment, particularly while attempting to cover protests or report on migration issues. Crime reporter and journalist Giorgos Karaivaz was fatally shot outside his home in Athens in April 2021. Also in April, police arrested three suspects who had allegedly plotted to kill journalist and newspaper owner Kostas Vaxevanis, after authorities learned that someone had sought to pay for his murder. Vaxevanis had been placed under increased police protection, but no charges had officially been made against the suspects at year's end.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 3 / 4

The constitution guarantees freedom of religion, and this is generally respected in practice. However, the Orthodox Church of Greece—which has a special constitutional status as the “prevailing religion” of the country—receives government subsidies, and its clergy's salaries and pensions are paid for by the state. The constitution prohibits proselytizing, but this restriction is rarely enforced. Members of some minority religions face discrimination and legal barriers, such as permit requirements to open houses of worship.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

There are no significant constraints on academic freedom in Greece, and the educational system is free of political indoctrination. A law passed in February 2021 introduced police stations on university campuses, in what the government claimed was an effort to fight crime. However, students, faculty, and staff protested the law that month and prevented its enforcement for what they saw as a threat and violation of academic freedom and expression.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 4 / 4

The government does not engage in improper monitoring of personal expression. Individuals are generally free to discuss their views in practice.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 11 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 3 / 4

Freedom of assembly is guaranteed by the constitution, and the government generally protects this right. However, some protests have become violent, and police at times have used excessive force to disperse demonstrators. In March 2021, police violently dispersed protestors demonstrating in solidarity with Dimitris Koufontinas, a member of the November 17 terrorist organization who is serving multiple life sentences and went on a hunger strike after being denied a prison transfer. Protests broke out in October in Athens, Corinth, and Patra after a Romany man was killed by police while surrendering to them. Groups of Roma protesters blocked highways and clashed with riot police.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 4 / 4

Nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) generally operate without interference from the authorities. However, during 2020 the government made a series of changes to the registration requirements for organizations working on asylum and migration issues, generally increasing the regulatory burden on NGOs. In October 2021, 19 testimonies from a hearing of human rights defenders exposed a concerted effort by Greek authorities to undermine civil society groups that work on migration issues, including through the initiation of criminal investigations to harass groups investigating abuses of migrants.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 4 / 4

Most workers have the right to form and join unions, bargain collectively, and strike. The law provides protections against discrimination toward union members, and the government generally upholds union rights.

F. RULE OF LAW: 11 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 3 / 4

The judiciary is largely independent, though its autonomy is undermined somewhat by corruption. Judges are appointed by the president on the advice of the Supreme Judicial Council, which is mostly composed of other judges. They serve until retirement age and cannot be removed arbitrarily.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 3 / 4

The law provides safeguards against arbitrary arrest and detention, ensures access to defense counsel, and provides for fair trial conditions. Persistent problems include court backlogs that lead to prolonged pretrial detention as well as improper detention of asylum seekers.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 3 / 4

While overall rates of violent crime are low, there are occasional acts of politically motivated violence and vandalism by left- or right-wing extremist groups. In March 2021, police in Nea Smyrni Square in Athens violently attacked a citizen while enforcing COVID-19-related restrictions. A police officer was suspended following the incident.

Some prisons and detention centers suffer from substandard conditions, and law enforcement personnel have been accused of physical abuse, particularly against vulnerable groups such as migrants and asylum seekers.

Women generally enjoy equality before the law, though they continue to face workplace discrimination in practice. In January 2021, Greek Olympic gold medalist Sofia Bekatorou publicly discussed her experience being sexually assaulted by a former coach. Bekatorou's revelations paved the way for a nascent #MeToo movement in Greece, in which women more actively and publicly discuss instances of sexual harassment and assault they have experienced. The government responded by proposing legislation in February that facilitate people's ability to report these incidents and establish harsher punishments for perpetrators.

Violence targeting immigrants, refugees, and LGBT+ people remains a problem. Roma are also subject to discrimination and excessive policing despite legal protections. In October 2021, a young Romany man was killed by police after being caught driving a stolen vehicle. Testimony from a Romany youth in the car revealed that they had surrendered immediately with their hands over their heads after being stopped, but the police still shot at them with about 30 rounds of ammunition.

Christos Pappas, one of the main leaders of the far-right party Golden Dawn, was arrested in July 2021 after being on the run for nine months. Pappas and many other members of Golden Dawn, which failed to win representation in the 2019 elections, were convicted of running a criminal organization in October 2020.

Over 4,300 migrants and refugees entered Greece by sea and more than 4,800 entered by land during 2021, as reported by the Office of the UN High Commission for Refugees (UNHCR), the lowest numbers since the refugee crisis began several years ago. Many refugees are housed in Reception and Identification Centers on the Aegean islands or in camps on the mainland. Within those centers' inhumane living conditions, problems range from at times fatal violence, harassment of women, and endangerment of children. NGOs successfully pressured authorities to attempt to close the worst facilities by the end of 2021 and increase the use of urban accommodation on the mainland. Many relocation attempts are protested by Greek communities.

Greek authorities have been accused of forcibly returning migrants and asylum seekers who attempt to enter irregularly from Turkey by land and sea, and multiple cases of such pushbacks were documented in 2021. The government has denied these allegations, though the UNHCR and other organizations called for independent border monitoring in September 2021. In October, Afghani women and children refugees on the island of Lesbos had their documents and belongings confiscated and were returned to sea, later to be discovered by the Turkish Coast guard. Greek authorities claimed they were enforcing European Union (EU) immigration rules while complying with international law.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 14 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

Freedom of movement is generally unrestricted for most residents. The government imposed periodic public health restrictions in 2021, including a COVID-19 vaccine mandate for healthcare workers. Many healthcare workers criticized the mandate, protesting the decision in Athens in August.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 3 / 4

The government and legal framework are generally supportive of property rights and entrepreneurship, but bureaucratic obstacles can inhibit business activity. Those who have political connections or are willing to pay bribes can sometimes expedite official procedures. To pressure tax-evading property owners who misrepresent the value of their assets, the Independent Authority for Public Revenue announced significant fines for this offense in 2019.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 4 / 4

There are no major constraints on personal social freedoms, though domestic violence remains a problem. In May 2021, a controversial new law granted joint custody of children to divorced parents. Human rights groups warned that the law does not protect children from abusive parents.

In 2021, 17 women were murdered by current or former partners who are men. Rights groups have criticized a culture of impunity for gender-based violence and the fact that femicide is not a separate offence in the penal code. Despite pressure placed on the government to codify punishments for femicide, the issue was resolved unresolved at year's end. In December, President Sakellariopoulou inaugurated the Centre for the Fight against Gender-Based Violence in Athens to provide a safe place for victims and promote legal services.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 3 / 4

Most residents enjoy legal protections against exploitative working conditions, but labor laws are not always adequately enforced. Migrants and asylum seekers are especially vulnerable to trafficking for forced labor or sexual exploitation, and government efforts to combat the problem, while increasing, remain insufficient, according to the US State Department.

Grenada

Population: 100,000

Capital: St. George's

Freedom Status: Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Grenada is a parliamentary democracy that regularly holds credible elections. Ongoing concerns include corruption, discrimination against LGBT+ people, and violence against women and children.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- The credibility of the country's Citizenship by Investment (CBI) Program was damaged by two high-profile resignations from the program's board of directors in February and May. Local media outlets reported that the board members resigned due to the prime minister's alleged interference with the CBI's work, including ordering the board to approve applicants outside of standard procedures.
- Throughout the year, teachers and other public sector workers held large demonstrations, calling on the government to uphold a previously reached agreement to provide a salary increase for public sector employees. Though the protests were peaceful, participants were confronted by hundreds of Grenadian security forces in a "massive show of force" that opposition leaders claimed was intended to stifle criticism of the government.
- In June, the results of an investigation into the management of the Grenada Olympic Committee (GOC) were published, revealing that the GOC was unable to account for nearly $500,000 in grant funding. The investigation also found other irregularities within the GOC's finances, including instances of inflated invoicing allegedly issued by the GOC's general secretary, Veda Bruno-Victor; she remained in her post at year's end.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 37 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 11 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The prime minister, usually the leader of the largest party in Parliament, is head of government. The prime minister is appointed by the governor general, who represents the British monarch as head of state.

Following the March 2018 elections, New National Party (NNP) leader Keith Mitchell was sworn in for a second consecutive term as prime minister. Cécile La Grenade was sworn in as Grenada's first woman governor general in 2013.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The bicameral parliament consists of the directly elected, 15-seat House of Representatives, whose members serve five-year terms, and the 13-seat Senate, which is appointed by the governor general. Ten Senate seats are appointed on the advice of the prime minister, and the remaining three on the advice of the opposition leader; senators also serve five-year terms.

The NNP won the elections held in March 2018, capturing all 15 seats in the House of Representatives. The electoral observation mission of the Organization of American States (OAS) expressed concern over a lack of campaign finance regulations and other issues but deemed the polls credible.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 3 / 4

Electoral laws are generally fair, and they are usually implemented impartially by the supervisor of elections, who heads the Parliamentary Elections Office.

In Grenada's 2016 constitutional referendum, all proposals failed to pass—including setting a three-term limit for the prime minister, establishing fixed dates for elections, and reforming the electoral authority and the body that sets constituency boundaries.

The unbalanced size of constituencies has resulted in unequal voting power among citizens. For example, in a country of 100,000 people, the largest of Grenada's 15 constituencies has around 6,000 more registered voters than the smallest.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 16 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 4 / 4

Political parties can organize freely. While a number of small parties have competed in elections, the first-past-the-post system encourages two-party politics, and since 1999 only the NNP and National Democratic Congress (NDC) have won seats in Parliament. Additionally, weak campaign finance laws potentially create an unfair advantage for certain parties.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 4 / 4

There are realistic opportunities for opposition parties to increase their support or gain power through elections, and power has rotated on several occasions since the first election in 1984, after democracy was restored to Grenada. However, the NNP has won a majority of the elections since then, and the NDC failed to win any seats in the House of Representatives in both the 2013 and 2018 elections.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 4 / 4

People are generally able to express their political choices without encountering pressure from outside actors. However, the OAS has expressed concern about a lack of transparency and regulation of campaign finance procedures, which could create avenues for undue influence over candidates and voters by business or other special interest groups.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 4 / 4

Grenada's constitution guarantees universal suffrage for adult citizens. Political representation largely reflects a population that is over 90 percent of African or mixed descent. However, other ethnic groups have a voice in politics and are represented in Parliament. Women remain underrepresented in politics, though 7 out of 15 seats in the House of Representatives were won by women in 2018. Women's advocacy groups have influence in the general political sphere. The marginalization of LGBT+ people impacts their ability to engage fully in political and electoral processes.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 10 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 4 / 4

The appointed prime minister and cabinet and freely elected representatives are able to determine the policies of the government. However, because of concerns over the lack of an opposition in the House of Representatives, NDC members were appointed to the Senate after the 2013 and 2018 elections.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 3 / 4

Corruption remains a prominent issue in Grenada, despite safeguards enshrined in the Prevention of Corruption Act and the Integrity in Public Life Act. Several suggested amendments in the 2016 constitutional reform package would have strengthened anticorruption safeguards, but all were voted down by significant margins.

Grenada's CBI Program, which allows foreigners to gain citizenship through an economic investment in the country, continues to trouble some analysts due to the potential for fraud and abuse, despite the tightening of rules governing it in 2017. Concern about the CBI's susceptibility to corruption was heightened again in 2021, when two CBI board members resigned after accusing the prime minister of interfering in the program's work, including by ordering the board to approve applicants outside of standard procedures.

Opposition leaders also expressed concern about the confirmation of Justin Sun, a Chinese tech entrepreneur, as Grenada's permanent ambassador to the World Trade Organization (WTO) in December, calling for "transparency and accountability" in order to avoid the "mismanagement of national assets."

In June, an investigative report—ordered after the Grenada Olympic Committee (GOC) was unable to account for nearly $500,000 in funding from the International Olympic Committee (IOC)—was released, leading to renewed questions about the effectiveness of Grenada's anticorruption safeguards. The investigation, led by the GOC's finance committee, found that the GOC's finances contained "massive" irregularities, including fraudulent invoices allegedly issued by the GOC's general secretary, Veda Bruno-Victor. She remained in her post at year's end.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 3 / 4

The government of Grenada generally operates with transparency. All public officials are required to declare their assets. An appointed commission monitors and verifies declarations but does not disclose them publicly except in court. Grenadian laws permit authorities to request financial information about its citizens residing abroad in an effort to prevent tax avoidance. The Fiscal Responsibility Oversight Committee has noted that the opacity of data involving state-run entities and other financial liabilities has impeded the committee from fulfilling its role.

There is no law to ensure public access to information, even though the government has pledged to introduce such an act.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 52 / 60D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 15 / 16*D1. Are there free and independent media? 3 / 4

In 2012, Grenada became the first Caribbean country to decriminalize defamation, but seditious libel remains a criminal offense. Politicians have initiated lawsuits against the media, contributing to self-censorship among journalists.

Press freedom advocates have criticized censorship at the country's largest broadcaster, the Grenada Broadcasting Network (GBN), which is partly owned by the government. In September 2021, local media outlets reported that the government had ordered the National Lotteries Authority and the Housing Authority of Grenada to cease their advertising with GBN, allegedly in response to GBN's coverage of carnival activities, which took place in August despite a COVID-19-related ban on such gatherings.

In December 2019, NNP senator Winston Garraway was charged with assault after allegedly physically confronting a female journalist. In May 2021, the prime minister publicly condemned the charges as “frivolous”; Garraway’s trial began the same month after several delays.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 4 / 4

Freedom of religion is protected under the constitution and is generally respected in practice.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

The government generally respects academic freedom.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 4 / 4

Individuals are free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 11 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

Freedom of assembly is constitutionally guaranteed, and that right is generally respected. However, multiple COVID-19-related states of emergency temporarily limited social gatherings in 2020 and 2021. Though many emergency measures had been lifted by December 2021, including a government-imposed curfew, several restrictions remained in place at year’s end.

Throughout 2021, hundreds of teachers and other public sector workers protested against the government’s failure to comply with a previously agreed salary increase for public sector employees. The protests were met by hundreds of Grenadian security forces in a “massive show of force” that opposition leaders claimed was intended to intimidate protesters and discourage further criticism of the government. Jude Bartholomew, the head of the teachers’ union, also criticized the government’s actions during the protests, saying he feared that Grenada was turning into a “military state.” Bartholomew was briefly detained by police in April for allegedly breaching social distancing protocols during protests.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 4 / 4

Nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) are generally free to operate.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 3 / 4

The right of workers to form and join labor unions is constitutionally protected, though unions and labor activists face some obstacles. Workers have the right to strike, organize, and bargain collectively, though employers are not legally bound to recognize a union if a majority of workers do not join. Essential services workers may strike, but compulsory arbitration can be used to resolve disputes. The list of essential services is extensive and includes services that should not be considered as such according to International Labour Organization (ILO) standards.

F. RULE OF LAW: 13 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 4 / 4

An independent judiciary is constitutionally guaranteed. Courts have demonstrated independence in recent years. There has not been tangible evidence of political interference in the judiciary in recent years. In June 2021, a High Court judge ruled that the Grenada Bar Association (GBA) could proceed with a case asking for the government to properly fund the court system.

Grenada is a member of the Organization of Eastern Caribbean States court system and is a charter member of the Caribbean Court of Justice, but the judiciary relies on the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in London as its final court of appeal.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 3 / 4

Detainees and defendants are guaranteed a range of legal rights, including the presumption of innocence and the right to trial without delay, which are mostly respected in practice. However, case backlogs have rendered trial delays common in practice. Additionally, staffing shortages prevent the state from providing legal counsel to some indigent defendants.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 3 / 4

Grenada is free from war and insurgencies. Flogging remains a punishment for petty crimes. Prison conditions are poor, and as of August 2021, the occupancy rate was over 184 percent, very high by regional standards. Although considered one of the safer Caribbean islands, there has been a rise in reports of sexual assault in recent years.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 3 / 4

Same-sex sexual activity between men is a criminal offense, although the law is rarely enforced. In October 2020, the Director of Public Prosecutions declined to pursue charges against two men who were engaged in sex in a video that was circulated online, labeling the provision of the criminal code “obsolete.” Nonetheless, LGBT+ people face significant societal discrimination; one of the men in the video said that he had received death threats and experienced hostile treatment from the public.

The law does not prohibit discrimination in employment or occupation regarding sexual orientation, HIV-positive status, or gender identity.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 13 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

Freedom of movement is constitutionally guaranteed, and this right is generally respected in practice.

The right to change employment is also generally respected. However, since October 2021, the government has prohibited individuals who have not been vaccinated against COVID-19 from certain types of employment, including work in restaurants and hotels.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 3 / 4

The government of Grenada has encouraged both national and foreign investors to operate businesses in the country, but procedures involved in establishing a new business are onerous. In July 2021, the International Centre for Settlement of Investment Disputes (ICSID) agreed to hear a case brought by a development firm against the Grenadian government. The company, which planned to build a resort, claimed that the government’s arbitrary and unlawful conduct amounted to “indirect expropriation,” and had stopped the successful completion of the project. The proceedings were ongoing at year’s end.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 3 / 4

Violence against women and children is a widespread issue in Grenada. According to a 2018 survey released in August 2020, 29 percent of Grenadian women reported experiencing physical or sexual violence in their lifetime. Domestic violence legislation came into effect in 2011, but enforcement has been limited.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 3 / 4

Poverty and unemployment are pervasive and hamper the social mobility of many Grenadians. In 2018, Grenada ratified the ILO's Domestic Workers Convention, to improve work conditions of domestic workers, who are mainly women. It came into effect in November 2019. Children are not explicitly prohibited from doing hazardous work.

A 2015 law punishes human trafficking with up to 25 years in jail and large fines. However, reports of human trafficking are rare.

Guatemala

Population: 18,400,000

Capital: Guatemala City

Freedom Status: Partly Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: While Guatemala holds regular elections that are generally free, organized crime and corruption severely impact the functioning of government. Violence and criminal extortion schemes are serious problems, and victims have little recourse to justice. Journalists, activists, and public officials who confront crime, corruption, and other sensitive issues risk attack.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- In July, the attorney general arbitrarily fired the head of the of the Special Prosecutor's Office against Impunity (FECI), Juan Francisco Sandoval, in violation of local and international laws, causing him to leave the country for fear of further retaliation. Sandoval had been investigating individuals within the president's network for suspected acts of corruption. His removal was one of several measures taken by the attorney general to undermine efforts to curb corruption.
 - In March, Congress pushed through the election of a new Constitutional Court made up of magistrates with links to corrupt actors and with known conflicts of interest. The legislature has also refused to allow Gloria Porras, a leading figure in efforts to tackle corruption, to assume her position as head of the Constitutional Court despite winning reelection that month. Porras is one of at least five justice officials forced into exile in the last few years.
 - In October, the government decreed a 30-day state of siege in the El Estor municipality, where security forces clashed with peaceful Indigenous demonstrators protesting the continued operation of a mine despite a court order that suspended its license. Security forces used excessive force, including tear gas, against protesters, and the government enforced a curfew to end the demonstrators' roadblocks.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 21 / 40A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 7 / 12*A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 2 / 4

The constitution stipulates a four-year presidential term and prohibits reelection. In the August 2019 runoff, Alejandro Giammattei of the Vamos party won 58 percent of the vote, defeating former first lady Sandra Torres of the center-left National Unity for Hope party (UNE). While the results were judged as credible, Organization of American States (OAS) electoral observers noted irregularities including disturbances, ballot burning, voter intimidation, and acts of violence. Giammattei took office in January 2020.

The campaign was also marked by successful efforts to disqualify presidential candidates. Union of National Change (UCN) candidate Mario Estrada was disqualified after he was arrested on charges of drug trafficking in the United States in 2019, and Zury Ríos, the Valor party candidate and daughter of Efraín Ríos Montt, was disqualified because of a legal provision that bars members of his family from holding office. Former attorney general Thelma Aldana, who pursued a high-profile corruption case against former president Otto Pérez Molina, was barred and fled the country after receiving threats, allegedly issued by the targets of her investigations.

Members of the unicameral, 160-seat Congress are elected to four-year terms. Legislators were elected in June 2019, concurrently with the first round of the presidential election and mayoral races. The UNE won 53 seats while Giammattei's Vamos party won 16 seats. The UCN won 12, and the remaining 79 seats were split between 16 parties, none of which won more than 10 seats.

The 2019 election results were deemed credible, but observers noted irregularities, disturbances, and threats of violence. A number of local races were nullified or rescheduled by the Supreme Electoral Tribunal (TSE) due to death threats against electoral officials and violent incidents. Election monitors received complaints from women officeholders and candidates who reported discrimination.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 2 / 4

In March 2020, after months of delay, Congress elected new TSE magistrates (2020–26) in a session featuring little transparency. Several of those elected are reportedly associated with officials accused of corruption and drug trafficking, and have been accused of falsifying their academic titles.

In February 2021, the new TSE submitted to Congress reforms to the electoral law that would backtrack some of the key reforms adopted in 2016, including provisions that would reinstitute the practice of switching party affiliation, or transfugismo, for legislators, weaken the oversight role of the TSE, and reduce the sanctions against political parties that violate electoral norms. If approved by January 2023, the general elections scheduled to be held that year will be held under the new system.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 10 / 16B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 3 / 4

Political groups and organizations generally operate without encountering legal restrictions. However, new groups sometimes face bureaucratic delays from the TSE when attempting to register.

Elections take place within an inchoate multiparty system in which new parties are frequently created, often without sufficient resources and infrastructure to gain broad support. A historic lack of party finance regulations has allowed some candidates and parties access to vast resources.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 3 / 4

Elections at the national and local levels are competitive, and new parties routinely gain significant quotas of power. Guatemalan politics are unstable, and power rotates between parties frequently, which can discourage a traditional opposition from coalescing. Political candidates risk attack during campaign periods; civil society organization Electoral Watch reported that at least 10 candidates were killed during the 2019 election period.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 2 / 4

Verbal harassment and physical violence against voters are common during elections and can deter political participation. Weak campaign finance regulations have historically permitted lopsided resource advantages, as well as financing of candidates by special interests and organized criminal groups, distorting the political choices of citizens. Presidential candidate Estrada, who was arrested in the United States, was accused of promising cabinet positions to Sinaloa drug cartel associates in return for their support. Observers reported that armed groups and criminal organizations have attempted to sway the results of local races. Direct vote buying is also common.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 2 / 4

Members of ethnic and other minority groups struggle to fully exercise their political rights. There are no affirmative measures in place to promote the election of representatives of Indigenous peoples, who are underrepresented despite accounting for as much as 60 percent of the population. There are 16 Indigenous members of Congress, 4 of whom are women, and approximately 25 percent of mayors elected in 2019 were Indigenous. No Indigenous persons or Afro-Guatemalans currently hold cabinet-level positions.

Women are underrepresented in politics, though small women's rights groups, mainly those working on addressing violence against women, have some visibility in the political sphere. President Giammattei appointed three women ministers to his cabinet but two left their posts. Women hold only 31 seats in Congress, and only 11 mayorships out of 340.

The first openly gay man to enter Congress was elected in 2019; in 2020, he was the target of attacks and homophobic messages from fellow legislators. Political opportunities remain rare for LGBT+ people.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 4 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 2 / 4

The elected government and legislature determine government policies, but they are frequently subject to influence by outside interests. President Giammattei came to the presidency backed by a group of former military officials; such networks possess significant economic power and frequently oppose the peace process that Guatemala has been fitfully implementing since 1996.

Business groups continue to hold significant sway over the executive and legislative branches, and to serve on the governing bodies of various public institutions.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 1 / 4

Corruption, which is often related to organized crime, remains a serious problem. Since the 2019 closure of the government's anticorruption unit, called the International Commission against Impunity in Guatemala (CICIG), authorities and lawmakers have obstructed the fight against corruption; prosecutions have stalled; and many high-profile cases have lost momentum. Judges, prosecutors, and civil society actors committed to tackling corruption have increasingly been the targets of physical attacks, threats, malicious lawsuits, and defamation campaigns. In September 2021, the Constitutional Court overturned a law that attempted to hold corrupt officials accountable. The law had barred individuals from paying a fine instead of serving a prison sentence for corruption of five years or less.

Attorney General María Consuelo Porras has attempted to undermine efforts to curb corruption in recent years. In July 2021, Porras arbitrarily fired the head of the of the Special Prosecutor's Office against Impunity (FECI), Juan Francisco Sandoval, in violation of local and international laws, causing him to leave the country for fear of further retaliation. Sandoval had been investigating individuals within the president's network for suspected acts of corruption.

Recent investigations of electoral and party finance corruption have shed light on the influence of unelected and illicit groups over the government. Serious allegations link drug trafficking to political elites. In July 2021, a US State Department report claimed that several individuals, including current and former Guatemalan government officials, are suspected of corruption.

The government's easing of procurement regulations to combat the COVID-19 pandemic provided opportunities for corruption and decreased access to government information. In September, the minister of health resigned after weeks of demonstrations against the government's handling of the pandemic and the collapse of the hospital network.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 1 / 4

Public information offices frequently fail to publish data about public expenditures as required. The Law on Access to Information is poorly enforced, and dedicated nongovernmental organizations continue to file grievances over its nonapplication and, together with the Human Rights Ombudsperson's Office, work to encourage the government to adhere to its provisions.

Contracting and budgeting processes are opaque and racked with corruption, which worsened during the COVID-19 pandemic due to the easing of procurement requirements.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 30 / 60 (-1)

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 11 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 2 / 4

While the constitution protects freedom of speech, journalists self-censor when covering sensitive topics including drug trafficking, corruption, organized crime, and human rights violations. Public officials, illicit actors, the police, and individuals aligned with companies operating on Indigenous lands routinely threaten media workers. Physical attacks against journalists occur regularly. Throughout 2021, the Guatemalan Association of Journalists recorded 135 attacks and threats against journalists. At least one journalist was killed during the year; in July, activist and journalist Frank Stalyn Ramazzini was killed in Guatemala City. Reporters have demanded that the government implement a 2012 protection program, but little progress has been made.

Rural, Indigenous, and women journalists are afforded little protection from discrimination, threats, and frivolous legal action, and reporters covering regional news suffered attacks and detentions on several occasions in 2021. In October, at least four journalists from Prensa Comunitaria were allegedly attacked while covering the El Estor demonstrations, and others were also reportedly harassed and had equipment confiscated. Journalists Marvin del Cid and Sonny Figueroa, who have investigated alleged corruption within the current government, continued to face repeated threats and harassment throughout the year.

Media ownership is also highly concentrated. The country's cybercrime laws have failed to protect outlets and reporters from harassment by trolls for hire, while public officials abuse unrelated laws to censor media outlets.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 4 / 4

The constitution guarantees religious freedom, and individuals are free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 3 / 4

Although the government does not interfere with academic freedom, scholars have received death threats for questioning past human rights abuses or continuing injustices.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 2 / 4

Many Guatemalans take precautions when speaking about social and political issues outside of their homes due to a high level of insecurity in the country. Journalists and human rights defenders have reported incidents of harassment and surveillance, which, along with increased intimidation and harassment of perceived opponents of the government, has encouraged greater self-censorship among ordinary citizens.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 6 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 2 / 4

The constitution guarantees freedom of assembly, but this right is not always protected. Police frequently threaten and at times use violence against protesters. Protests related to environmental or Indigenous rights have been met with harsh resistance from the police and armed groups.

The Giammattei administration has declared states of prevention and siege, emergency measures that enable the government to restrict constitutional guarantees, in response to protests. In October 2021, the government decreed a 30-day state of siege in the El Estor municipality, where security forces clashed with peaceful Indigenous demonstrators protesting the continued operation of a mine despite a court order that suspended its license. Security forces used excessive force, including tear gas, against protesters, and the government enforced a curfew to end the demonstrators' roadblocks.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 2 / 4

The constitution guarantees freedom of association, and a variety of nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) operate. However, groups associated with Indigenous, environmental, and human rights face increasing violence and criminalization of their work. Between January and July 2021, the Unit for the Protection of Human Rights Defenders in Guatemala (UDEFE-GUA), a human rights NGO, documented 551 attacks against human rights defenders, 42 percent of which were against women. Five activists were murdered throughout the year.

The government has failed to fulfill the obligations of a 2014 ruling by the Inter-American Court of Human Rights (IACHR) requiring the development of a comprehensive public policy to protect human rights defenders. Advocates have criticized the closure of several agencies that were central to implementation of human rights provisions of the 1996 peace accords.

In February 2020, legislators amended the law governing NGOs to introduce a more onerous registration process, expand the state's authority to deregister groups, and restrict NGOs' control of funds received from abroad. Though the Constitutional Court suspended the amendment the next month, in May 2021, the new Constitutional Court overturned the previous court's decision. In August, the government issued new regulations requiring foreign NGOs to register with the Ministry of Interior, which was also given broad discretionary authority to disband civil society groups.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 2 / 4

Guatemala is home to a vigorous labor movement, but workers are frequently denied the right to organize and face mass firings and blacklisting. Trade union members are also subject to intimidation, violence, and murder, particularly in rural areas. Labor laws obstruct union membership and impede strikes.

F. RULE OF LAW: 5 / 16 (-1)

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 1 / 4 (-1)

The judiciary is hobbled by corruption, inefficiency, incapacity, and the intimidation of judges, prosecutors, and witnesses by outside actors and influential judicial figures.

In March 2021, Congress pushed through the election of a new Constitutional Court made up of magistrates with links to corrupt actors and with known conflicts of interest. The legislature also refused to allow Gloria Porras, a leading figure in nationwide efforts to tackle corruption, to assume her position as head of the Constitutional Court despite winning reelection that month. She is one of at least five justice officials forced into exile in the last few years.

Corruption also affected the process to select new Supreme Court and appellate court judges. In 2019, the Constitutional Court ordered Congress to restart and select magistrates to those courts, after the FECCI uncovered a network of corrupt actors, including individuals within the judicial system, who sought to influence judicial nominations. However, Congress has still refused to abide by the ruling as of the end of 2021. Prosecutors and judges who demonstrate independence have been targeted with politically motivated lawsuits.

International organizations have documented an increase in attacks, reprisals, and defamation campaigns against independent prosecutors and judges, particularly those tackling corruption and human rights abuses. According to UDEFEGUA and the IACHR, as of October 2021 independent judges had been targeted in 189 attacks and 51 judges had concerning legal proceedings against them, including motions to lift their immunity.

Score Change: The score declined from 2 to 1 due to politicized interference in the election of Constitutional Court magistrates, and because Congress continued to delay the installation of Supreme Court judges who had been set to assume office in 2019.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 1 / 4

Due process rights are guaranteed in the constitution, but those rights are inconsistently upheld, due in part to corruption in the judiciary and an ineffective police force in which many officers routinely violate the law and the rights of citizens. Access to justice remains difficult, especially for Indigenous people. Conviction rates are low.

Judges and prosecutors have reported an increase in threats and harassment, smear campaigns, and malicious criminal and disciplinary complaints in apparent retaliation for their work on sensitive cases related to corruption and human rights abuses. Head of the Office of the Human Rights Ombudsman (PDH) Jordán Rodas, regarded as an independent advocate for human rights, has faced criminal complaints, legislative motions for his removal for promoting sexual and reproductive rights (including abortion rights), and the rerouting of his funds for his office by Congress.

High levels of violence, kidnappings, and extortion at the hands of the police, drug traffickers, and street gangs continue, with related fears and violence routinely affecting the lives of ordinary people. Links between the state, politicians, the military, and illicit actors complicate a cohesive response to the country's security challenges. The country's homicide rate increased for the first time in 11 years in 2021; 2,843 homicides were recorded by the police. Prison facilities are grossly overcrowded and rife with gang and drug-related violence and corruption. Prison riots are common and are frequently deadly.

The Giammattei administration has also declared states of siege, which restrict constitutional guarantees and allow for the deployment of security forces. Authorities have at times justified such measures on the presence of armed groups and the need to restore order.

Efforts to bring perpetrators of past human rights abuses to justice experienced significant setbacks in 2021. In June, a judge ruled that 6 of 12 former security officials arrested in connection to the Death Squad Dossier would face trial for grave human rights violations. However, later that month, members of the Valor Party introduced a bill that would exempt perpetrators of grave human rights violations committed during the war from prosecution. Moreover, the judge and prosecutors assigned to the case were targeted by threats and intimidation, and in October the chief prosecutor was transferred to another unit.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 1 / 4

Equal rights are guaranteed in the constitution, but minorities continue to face unequal treatment. Indigenous communities suffer from high rates of poverty, illiteracy, and infant mortality. Indigenous women are particularly marginalized. Discrimination against the Mayan community is a major concern.

LGBT+ people face discrimination, violence, and police abuse and are unprotected by legislation. The PDH has stated that people living with HIV/AIDS also face discrimination.

The constitution prohibits discrimination based on gender, but women continue to face gender-based inequality; women are usually paid less for their labor than men, and sexual harassment in the workplace is not penalized.

In February 2021, the agreement with the US government that forced migrants passing through Guatemala to claim asylum there first was suspended.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 8 / 16G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 3 / 4

While there are no permanent restrictions on free movement, violence and the threat of violence by gangs and organized criminal groups inhibits this right in practice and has prompted the displacement of thousands of people. Guatemalans have their free movement restricted due to government-imposed states of siege and prevention.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 2 / 4

Protections for property rights and economic freedom rarely extend beyond Guatemalans with wealth and political connections. Land protections are especially limited for Indigenous people, particularly Indigenous women, despite a series of Constitutional Court rulings in 2020 that reinforced communal landholding rights in Indigenous communities. In October 2021, protests in El Estor denounced a mining project that continued to operate despite a Constitutional Court order that temporarily suspended operations. The 2019 court order cited the project's failure to implement proper consultations with the local Indigenous population and for oversight in its environmental impact report.

Business activity is hampered by criminal activity, including extortion and fraud. An inefficient state bureaucracy, rife with unclear and complicated regulations, also contributes to difficulties in establishing and operating a business.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 2 / 4

Physical and sexual violence against women and children remains high, with perpetrators rarely facing prosecution. According to the National Institute of Forensic Sciences (INACIF), 652 women were murdered in 2021.

The law permits abortion only when a pregnancy threatens the life of the woman. Teen pregnancy remains high; in 2017, underage marriages were outlawed, though the law is not effectively enforced.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 1 / 4

Indigenous peoples' access to economic opportunities and socioeconomic mobility remains limited, with more than 70 percent of the population living in poverty. Income distribution across the entirety of the Guatemalan population is among the most unequal worldwide, with the wealthiest 10 percent of the population receiving nearly 50 percent of the total income nationally. Significant barriers to accessing education persist, particularly for girls, Indigenous children, and rural residents. These obstacles were exacerbated by the COVID-19 pandemic, which shuttered classrooms throughout the country. Hurricanes Eta and Iota, which struck in November 2020 and left tens of thousands displaced, caused widespread damage largely in majority-Indigenous areas and further deepened these challenges.

Child labor persists, especially among Indigenous children. Sexual exploitation particularly affects vulnerable groups including children, LGBT+ people, and Indigenous people. Gangs often force children and young men to join their organizations or perform work for them.

Guinea

Population: 13,500,000

Capital: Conakry

Freedom Status: Not Free

Electoral Democracy: No

Status Change: Guinea's status declined from Partly Free to Not Free because military commanders seized power in a coup, removing President Alpha Condé and dissolving the legislature.

Overview: Guinea experienced a transition to civilian rule in 2010, following a 2008 military coup and decades of authoritarian governance. The subsequent years were marked by ethnic division, corruption, a crackdown on dissent, and the abuse of civilians by security forces. Military officers launched another coup in September 2021, suspending the constitution and detaining the president. The junta vowed to preside over a return to civilian rule but did not immediately set a date for elections.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- In September, the civilian government was overthrown in a coup led by Lieutenant Colonel Mamady Doumbouya, the head of the special forces. The military junta suspended the 2020 constitution, dissolved the National Assembly, and detained President Condé. Doumbouya was sworn in as interim president in October.
- The Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS) condemned the coup and suspended Guinea's membership. ECOWAS also moved to impose travel bans on coup leaders and freeze their financial assets.
- In late September, the junta released a transitional charter that specified the structure of the transitional government. The charter established a National Committee for Reunification and Development (CNRD), headed by Doumbouya, along with an 81-member National Transitional Council (CNT), which was tasked with drafting a new constitution. The charter did not include a date for new elections.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 10 / 40 (-4)

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 1 / 12 (-3)

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4 (-2)

The president was elected by popular vote for up to two six-year terms under the 2020 constitution. That constitution included language that was interpreted as a reset of the term count for then president Alpha Condé, who had already served two five-year terms under the previous constitution. Condé won a third term in the October 2020 election; the immediate postelection period was marred by a violent crackdown on opposition protests in Conakry along with disruptions to telecommunications service.

In September 2021, military commanders led by Lieutenant Colonel Mamady Doumbouya overthrew the government. Condé was initially held incommunicado by the junta, though he was sent to house arrest in November and remained there at year's end. Later in September, the junta introduced a transitional charter, which established the CNRD—headed by Doumbouya—as a transitional governing body. CNRD members are prohibited from contesting future elections. Doumbouya was sworn in as interim president on October 1, serving a term with no specified end date. Later that month, Mohamed Béavogui, a civilian, was appointed as prime minister.

Score Change: The score declined from 2 to 0 because a military junta seized executive power in a coup, replacing the elected civilian president with a military leader whose interim presidency had no fixed end date.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4 (-1)

The National Assembly had 114 seats; 76 members were elected via nationwide proportional representation, while another 38 were elected in individual districts. Members served five-year terms. Condé's Rally of the Guinean People (RPG) won 79 seats in the March 2020 elections, which opposition groups largely boycotted. The parliament was dissolved following the September 2021 military coup.

The transitional charter specified the establishment of the 81-member CNT, which was responsible for drafting a new constitution. CNT members were to be appointed from political parties, the security forces, the trade union movement, the business sector, and civil society. Members of the Condé administration were barred from participating in the CNT, while CNT members were prohibited from contesting future elections. The CNT's membership was not finalized by year's end.

Score Change: The score decreased from 1 to 0 due to the dissolution of the National Assembly following the military coup.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 1 / 4

The Guinean electoral framework has allowed credible elections to proceed in the past, though the composition of electoral bodies has caused disagreement.

The 2020 constitution, which was approved in a referendum held concurrently with that year's parliamentary elections, instituted six-year terms for the president, up from five years under the previous charter. Its new language on term limits was interpreted as a reset for Condé's tenure, and a clause allowing independent candidates to run for president was removed from the final text. The referendum itself was marred by attacks on polling stations in opposition areas.

The constitution and the Independent National Electoral Commission were both suspended by the military junta that seized power in September 2021. The transitional charter did not specify when new elections would be held. In the wake of the coup, Guinea's ambassador to the United Nations stated that the junta would revise the voter roll ahead of elections. A December decree from the interim president transferred responsibility for managing elections and referendums to the Ministry of Territorial Administration and Decentralization.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 7 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 2 / 4

Some 181 political parties were officially recognized as of December 2021, with most having clear ethnic or regional bases of support. While the elected National Assembly was dissolved following the September 2021 coup, political groups including the RPG and the opposition National Alliance for Democratic Change were allocated seats on the CNT.

Prior to the coup, members of the National Front for the Defense of the Constitution (FNDC), a coalition of civil society groups, political parties, and labor unions, faced intimidation and arrest. More than 350 FNDC supporters were arrested during the electoral period of late 2020, though civilian authorities released 40 supporters in April 2021, and the junta released another 79 in September. The junta allowed four FNDC members who had fled Guinea to return in September. The FNDC also received an allocation of CNT seats.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 2 / 4

A pattern of peaceful democratic transfers of power was not established between the 2010 transition to civilian rule and the September 2021 coup. Before becoming president in 2010, Condé was an opposition leader under longtime president Lansana Conté. However, rather than defeating an incumbent leader, Condé won the first election after a period of military rule that followed Conté's death in 2008.

Security forces have frequently attacked rallies and protests organized by the opposition, making it more difficult for opposition parties to mobilize their supporters.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 1 / 4

The military's role in politics waned under Condé, but it returned to political dominance with the September 2021 coup. Doumbouya, the officer who led that coup, became the interim president.

Ethnic loyalty played an outsized role in the political choices of voters and party leaders under Condé. Rather than organizing around policy platforms or political ideologies and trying to attract new supporters, each party tacitly pledged allegiance to its respective ethnic group, contributing to the threat of mutual hostility and violence.

Powerful external actors voiced their support for the Condé administration during its 2019–20 campaign to win the approval of a new constitution. For example, the Russian ambassador to Guinea endorsed Condé's constitutional project in a 2019 state television appearance. There is widespread speculation that foreign-owned mining interests in Guinea, including Russian and Chinese operations, backed Condé because they viewed him as best positioned to protect their interests.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 2 / 4

Women and members of minority groups have full political rights under the law, but ethnic divisions and gender bias limit their participation in practice. Under a law passed in 2019, women must constitute 50 percent of electoral lists. Parties did not adhere to older legal obligations requiring women to account for 30 percent of proportional representation lists for parliamentary elections. Female representation in the National Assembly stood at only 16.7 percent prior to the 2021 coup. The transitional charter included a 30 percent gender quota for the CNT.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 2 / 12 (-1)

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 0 / 4 (-1)

The legitimacy of executive and legislative officials serving under the civilian government was affected by the country's flawed electoral process. Their effectiveness was also impeded by corruption and impunity. The country has effectively been ruled by the military since the September 2021 coup, though the prime minister appointed by the junta is a civilian.

Score Change: The score declined from 1 to 0 because the military coup left the country under the control of unelected officials.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 1 / 4

The National Anti-Corruption Agency, which reported directly to the presidency, was underfunded and understaffed. The civil service was also affected by corruption during civilian rule; an audit released in 2016 revealed that thousands of civil service positions were held by absent or deceased workers. Doumbouya announced the creation of a new anticorruption body after becoming interim president in October 2021.

Some lower-level officials have been prosecuted on corruption charges in recent years, but major cases involving senior politicians and the lucrative mining industry have mainly been pursued in foreign courts. In January 2021, for example, a Swiss court handed Israeli businessman Benjamin Steinmetz a five-year prison term and a fine of 50 million Swiss francs ($54.1 million); Steinmetz and two codefendants were convicted of bribing the wife of late president Conté for control of iron ore deposits. Steinmetz vowed to appeal.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 1 / 4

Government operations are generally opaque. A 2010 access to information law was never implemented, and the National Assembly voted in favor of a new version in 2020. In October 2021, Reporters Without Borders (RSF) called on the junta to fully implement legislation on access to information.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 24 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 10 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 2 / 4

While the 2020 constitution guaranteed media freedom, the civilian government often failed to uphold this standard in practice. Under the 2016 criminal code, those convicted of defamation or insulting public figures faced up to five years' imprisonment, contributing to self-censorship among journalists. A 2016 cybersecurity law criminalized similar offenses online, as well as the dissemination of information that is false, protected on national security grounds, or "likely to disturb law and order or public security or jeopardize human dignity." Several dozen newspapers publish regularly in Guinea, though most have small circulations. More than 60 private radio stations and some private television stations compete with Radio Télévision Guinéenne (GRT), the public broadcaster. Due to a high illiteracy rate, most of the population accesses information through radio.

Members of the press faced interference from both civilian and military authorities in 2021. In March, GRT reporter Amadou Diouldé Diallo was charged with insulting the president after he accused Condé of working to "exterminate" the Fulani ethnic group on a radio program. Diallo was fined and released in May. Several television stations were prohibited from covering Prime Minister Béavogui's October installation. Special forces personnel raided the offices of Djoma Media, which is owned by a Condé associate, the day after Béavogui took office.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 3 / 4

Religious rights are generally respected in practice. Some non-Muslim government workers have reported occasional discrimination. People who convert from Islam to Christianity sometimes encounter pressure from their community.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 3 / 4

Academic freedom has historically been subject to political restrictions under authoritarian regimes. The problem was less severe under the 2010–21 civilian government, though self-censorship reduced the vibrancy of academic discourse.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 2 / 4

Ethnic tensions and laws restricting freedom of expression may deter open debate in some circumstances. Discussion on the 2020 constitution was discouraged as the civilian government moved to harass and detain activists who addressed the subject. Social media users also faced telecommunications service disruptions ahead of the March 2020 constitutional referendum and the October 2020 presidential election.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 4 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 1 / 4

Freedom of assembly was enshrined in the 2020 constitution, but the civilian government restricted demonstrations in practice. Assemblies held without prior notification were often violently dispersed, leading to deaths, injuries, and arrests. Protests were also restricted on public health grounds during the COVID-19 pandemic, with the civilian government banning large gatherings in July 2021. The military junta also banned demonstrations after seizing power in September, though a public gathering to meet four FNDC members returning from exile was held in Conakry that month. The junta criticized the event.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 1 / 4

Civil society is weak, ethnically divided, and subject to periodic interference and intimidation. Nongovernmental organization (NGO) workers and activists have faced threats, harassment, and imprisonment. Guinean NGOs have also suffered from poor access to funding, leadership struggles, the restriction of civic space, and security concerns. Civil society representatives were set to receive an allocation of CNT seats under the September 2021 transitional charter.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 2 / 4

Although workers are allowed to form trade unions, strike, and bargain collectively, they must provide 10 days' notice before striking, and strikes are banned in broadly defined essential services. In practice, unions are relatively active. They were expected to receive CNT representation under the September 2021 transitional charter.

F. RULE OF LAW: 4 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 1 / 4

While the judicial system has demonstrated a limited degree of independence since 2010, it remains subject to political influence and corruption. The judiciary also suffers from a lack of resources and personnel.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 1 / 4

Security forces are known to engage in arbitrary arrests, often disregarding legal safeguards. Most of the incarcerated population consists of people in prolonged pretrial detention, though reforms in recent years have reduced their numbers. Due process rights pertaining to trials are frequently denied, and many disputes are settled informally through traditional justice systems.

Security personnel implicated in abuses during the 2020 electoral periods did not face significant judicial scrutiny, due in part to limited institutional capacity and the unwillingness of witnesses to participate in subsequent proceedings.

The 2016 criminal code eliminated the death penalty and explicitly outlawed torture for the first time. However, human rights advocates noted that the criminal code categorized a number of acts that fall within the international definition of torture as merely “inhuman and cruel,” a category that does not carry any explicit criminal penalties. In practice, security forces have engaged in torture and other forms of physical violence with apparent impunity.

The civilian government’s justice system largely failed to hold perpetrators accountable for atrocities committed during previous periods of military rule. In 2019, then justice minister Mohammed Lamine Fofana said the trial of 13 suspects indicted for the 2009 Conakry stadium massacre, in which more than 150 opposition protesters were killed by security forces, would be held by June 2020. The junta also vowed to try those accused of involvement in the massacre in November 2021. However, the trial had not yet commenced at year’s end. Several defendants have been in custody longer than the legal pretrial limit.

The September 2021 coup itself was marked by violence, and 12 presidential guard members were reportedly killed.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 1 / 4

Women face pervasive societal discrimination and disadvantages in both the formal and traditional justice systems. Various ethnic groups engage in mutual discrimination with respect to hiring and other matters. Antidiscrimination laws do not protect LGBT+ people. Same-sex sexual activity is a criminal offense that can be punished with up to three years in prison. Although this law is rarely enforced, LGBT+ people have been arrested on lesser charges.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 6 / 16G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 2 / 4

Guineans enjoy some freedom of movement for both domestic and international travel, though rampant crime in some neighborhoods can be an impediment. The junta closed Guinea’s borders for one day after taking power in September 2021.

The civilian government imposed a pandemic-related overnight curfew in July 2021. The junta altered the curfew’s hours in September, though mining operations were exempt. Military authorities then lifted the general curfew in late October.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 2 / 4

Private business activity is hampered by corruption and political instability, among other factors. A centralized Agency for the Promotion of Private Investments aims to ease the business registration process. Following recent reforms, property registration processes have become faster and less expensive.

Women face gender-based disadvantages in laws and practices governing inheritance and property rights.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 1 / 4

Rape and domestic violence are common but underreported due to fears of stigmatization, and there is no specific legislation meant to address domestic abuse. Female genital mutilation (FGM) is common despite a legal ban; in 2016, the Office of the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights reported that 69 percent of 20- to 24-year-old women were subjected to FGM before their 10th birthday. The 2016 criminal code set the legal age for marriage at 18, but early and forced marriages have remained common.

In 2019, the parliament amended the civil code to make monogamy the general regime of marriage, except when there is “explicit agreement” on polygamy from the first wife. This represented a significant change from a bill passed in late 2018, which Condé had rejected because it simply legalized the widespread practice of polygamy.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 1 / 4

The 2016 criminal code specifically criminalized trafficking in persons and debt bondage, but reduced the minimum penalties for such crimes, and enforcement has been weak. In some mining areas, child labor is a major problem. Women and children are sometimes trafficked for sexual exploitation to other parts of West Africa, Europe, the Middle East, and the United States.

Guinea-Bissau

Population: 2,000,000

Capital: Bissau

Freedom Status: Partly Free

Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: Guinea-Bissau’s political system has been hampered in recent years by divisions between the president and the parliament, and within the main political party. Conditions for civil liberties have gradually improved as the country has recovered from the aftermath of a military coup in 2012, though police continue to disrupt some demonstrations. Corruption is a major problem that has been exacerbated by organized criminal activity, including drug trafficking.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- Activists and journalists who criticized the government reported facing harassment, arbitrary detentions, and physical assaults during the year. Those reporting such violations included Luís Vaz Martins, the former president of the Guinean League of Human Rights (LGDH), who was the target of an assassination attempt in August; Martins later accused the president of ordering the attack.

- Several strikes took place throughout the year, with workers protesting against unpaid wages and poor working conditions. In September, hospital workers went on strike, severely impacting the operations of Guinea-Bissau's main hospital; in October, authorities briefly detained several union leaders in what critics deemed an attempt to intimidate striking healthcare workers.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 17 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 7 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 2 / 4

The president is elected through a two-round voting system for up to two consecutive terms of five years. The prime minister is appointed by the president “in accordance with the election results” after consulting with the parliamentary parties, and the government must be dissolved if the parliament rejects its proposed budget.

Umaro Sissoco Embaló of the Movement for Democratic Alternation (Madem G15) party, supported by former president José Mário Vaz—who placed fourth in the first round—and a coalition of opposition parties, won the December 2019 presidential election's run-off with 53.6 percent of the vote, defeating Domingos Simões Pereira of the African Party for the Independence of Guinea-Bissau and Cabo Verde (PAIGC) who won 46.4 percent of the vote. According to the National Election Commission (CNE), voter turnout was 72.7 percent. The African Union's (AU) election observation mission found that the administration of the run-off vote was free and transparent, despite challenges with the first round of voting. International bodies such as the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS) acknowledged Embaló's victory in April 2020.

However, in January 2020, Pereira contested the results in the Supreme Court, alleging widespread fraud. The CNE refused to conduct a full audit of the results. In February, Embaló held an inauguration for his presidency despite the ongoing court appeal. Meanwhile, the parliament appointed an interim president, Cipriano Cassamá, resulting in a two-day period during which there were two presidents before Cassamá stepped down, saying he feared for his safety. The court was unable to meet due to the COVID-19 pandemic and because the presiding judge had fled the country, also saying he feared for his safety. The court ultimately rejected Pereira's appeal in September.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 3 / 4

Members of the 102-seat National People's Assembly are elected by popular vote for four-year terms. In the March 2019 elections, the PAIGC remained the largest single party with 47 seats, though it lost its outright majority. Madem G15 won 27, the Party of Social Renewal (PRS) took 21, the United People's Assembly–Democratic Party of Guinea-Bissau (APU-PDGB) took 5, and the Union for Change (UM) and the Party for a New Democracy (PND) each secured a single seat.

The United Nations (UN) and European Union (EU) praised the 2019 parliamentary elections as peaceful and orderly, and an observation mission from the AU deemed them free and fair, though it noted some flaws in the process.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 2 / 4

There are some problems with the country's electoral laws and framework, including weak controls on campaign spending, vote buying, and a lack of legal provisions for domestic poll observers. Elections have been subject to delays in recent years, due in part to lack of funding and stalled voter registration processes.

In the run-up to the first round of the 2019 presidential election, the PAIGC-led government decided to review the voter registry in order to include some 25,000 people who were not able to vote in the parliamentary elections due to technical errors. The PRS and Madem G15 claimed that the changes were fraudulent, but ECOWAS rejected the opposition's demand for a new registration process.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 8 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 3 / 4

There are no major constraints on party formation. Dozens of political parties are active in Guinea-Bissau, and 21 competed in the 2019 parliamentary elections, up from 15 in 2014. However, the political crisis since 2015—when former president Vaz dismissed then prime minister Pereira—has led to some instances of violence and intimidation among partisan groups.

PAIGC leader and former presidential candidate Pereira fled the country in May 2020, and in December of that year, the prosecutor general issued a warrant for his arrest on charges of corruption. Pereira returned to Guinea-Bissau in March 2021, where he remained at year's end, prevented from leaving the country by the government.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 2 / 4

Guinea-Bissau has a limited record of democratic power transfers between rival political parties, as the PAIGC or military rulers have governed for most of the period since independence. In 2014, Vaz succeeded an independent who had served as acting president in the wake of the 2012 coup. Nevertheless, opposition forces increased their representation in the 2019 legislative elections. President Embaló of the new party Madem G15 succeeded former president Vaz of the PAIGC, who lost in the first round of the 2019 presidential election. However, Embaló's use of the military to complete his installation in office raised concerns.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 1 / 4

The military has apparently refrained from interfering in politics since 2014, though it was used by President Embaló to complete his installment in office. The choices of voters and politicians continue to be influenced by corruption and patronage networks. Organized crime linked to drug trafficking and money laundering has contributed to the country's political instability in recent decades.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 2 / 4

Women enjoy equal political rights, but cultural obstacles limit their participation in practice, and they are underrepresented in leadership positions. Just 14 women won seats in the March 2019 parliamentary elections, the same number as in 2014. A 2018 law requires 36 percent of candidates on party lists to be women.

Ethnicity plays a role in politics, reducing the extent to which all groups' interests are represented. For example, one of the country's larger ethnic groups, the Balanta, has traditionally dominated the military and cast votes for the PRS.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 2 / 12C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 1 / 4

Governance has been impaired by the political crisis that began in 2015, and election delays have undermined the democratic legitimacy of incumbent officials. The original term of the parliament that was replaced by the March 2019 elections had expired nearly a year earlier. The full legislature has convened only sporadically in recent years.

In late February and into March 2020, a constitutional crisis emerged when Embaló organized his inauguration unconstitutionally. The PAIGC, which has a slim parliamentary majority but lost the presidential election, ignored Embaló's inauguration and appointed an interim president, Cipriano Cassamá. However, Cassamá resigned after one day in office, saying he feared for his safety. Embaló was eventually recognized by the parliament.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 1 / 4

Corruption is pervasive, including among senior government figures. Both military and civilian officials have been accused of involvement in the illegal drug trade. Critics of past corruption investigations targeting former high-ranking officials have argued that they were politically motivated.

In February 2020, minister of justice and human rights Ruth Monteiro and director of the Judiciary Police Filomena Lopes—who had been instrumental in the country's anticorruption efforts and praised by the United Nations for their work—were fired by President Embaló.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 0 / 4

There are no effective legal provisions to facilitate public access to government information, and government officials do not disclose their personal financial information as required by law. The political impasse and related parliamentary dysfunction have further obstructed oversight of government spending in recent years. The lack of transparency contributes to chronic budget shortfalls, frequent delays in public-sector wages, and doubts about the management of foreign assistance.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 26 / 60 (-1)D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 10 / 16*D1. Are there free and independent media? 1 / 4

The constitution provides for freedom of the press, and there is some media diversity. However, journalists regularly face harassment and intimidation, including pressure regarding their coverage from political figures and government officials.

In late February and early March 2020, soldiers occupied the facilities of the state radio and television broadcasters for several days. The stations were closed and under armed guard at the request of President Embaló. In July 2020, armed men in national guard uniforms smashed equipment and vandalized the property of the privately owned Radio Capital FM station, which is allied to the opposition PAIGC, temporarily silencing the broadcaster.

In March 2021, a group attacked and tried to abduct Adão Ramalho, a reporter for Radio Capital FM. The same month, pro-PAIGC blogger António Aly Silva was also attacked by a group of unknown men; Silva reported that the attack came days after he had received a threatening phone call from the president, allegedly in response to his work with media outlets critical of the government.

In April, the Committee to Protect Journalists (CPJ) called on Guinea-Bissau authorities to drop criminal defamation investigations into Radio Capital FM and two of its journalists, and to reform its defamation laws.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 3 / 4

Religious freedom is legally protected and usually respected in practice. Government licensing requirements are not onerous and are often disregarded. Some Muslims have reportedly raised concerns about the influence of foreign imams who preach a more rigorous or austere form of Islam, threatening religious tolerance.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 3 / 4

Academic freedom is guaranteed and generally upheld, though the education system is poor in terms of access, quality, and basic resources. Public schools were closed for much of 2018 and 2019 due to ongoing teachers' strikes, and in 2020 and 2021 as a consequence of COVID-19 restrictions.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 3 / 4

Individuals are relatively free to express their views on political topics in the private and social sphere, though some more public figures have faced the threat of arrest or charges in retaliation for their remarks in recent years.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 6 / 12 (-1)E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 1 / 4

Freedom of assembly is frequently restricted. The authorities repeatedly interfere with demonstrations linked to the political tensions between the presidency and the legislature. The state of emergency enforced due to the COVID-19 pandemic banned assemblies of more than 25 people during 2020. The restrictions were prolonged by President Embaló for most of 2021 and prevented protesters from gathering during a period of high political tension.

In July, police arrested three young activists in the city of Bafatá for allegedly planning an unauthorized protest; the activists reported that they were beaten by police before being released later that day.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 2 / 4 (-1)

Nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) are generally able to operate. Some groups have faced intimidation and other obstacles, particularly those that are associated with street demonstrations.

Several activists who criticized the government reported facing harassment, arbitrary detentions, and physical assaults throughout 2021. Those reporting such violations included Luís Vaz Martins—a lawyer and the former president of the Guinean League of Human Rights (LGDH)—who was the target of an assassination attempt in August. Martins has accused the president of ordering the attack.

Score Change: The score declined from 3 to 2 due to rising violence and intimidation against activists and NGOs.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 3 / 4

Workers are allowed to form and join independent trade unions, but few work in the wage-earning formal sector. Private employers sometimes engage in improper interference with union organizing and other activities. The right to strike is protected, and government workers frequently exercise it, although the prolonged state of emergency due to the COVID-19 pandemic restricted this right.

Several strikes took place throughout 2021, with workers protesting against unpaid wages and poor working conditions. In September, hospital workers went on strike, leading the government to replace striking workers with military medics. Despite the government intervention, the strike severely impacted the operations of Guinea-Bissau's main hospital, and in October, the authorities briefly detained several union leaders, in what critics deemed an attempt to intimidate striking healthcare workers.

F. RULE OF LAW: 5 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 1 / 4

Judges are highly susceptible to corruption and political pressure, and the court system as a whole lacks the resources and capacity to function effectively.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 0 / 4

Corruption is common among police, and officers often fail to observe legal safeguards against arbitrary arrest and detention. Very few criminal cases are brought to trial or successfully prosecuted, partly due to the limited material and human resources available to investigators. Most of the population lacks access to the justice system in practice.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 2 / 4

Conditions in prisons and detention centers are often extremely poor, and law enforcement personnel generally enjoy impunity for abuses. Because of its weak institutions and porous borders, Guinea-Bissau has become a transit point for criminal organizations trafficking various types of contraband. The armed forces and other state entities have been linked to drug trafficking. In recent years, authorities have made some progress in combating the drug trade and organized crime. Violence associated with political unrest has continued to recede since the restoration of elected civilian rule.

A low-intensity conflict in Senegal's Casamance region occasionally affects security across the border in Guinea-Bissau, where Senegalese rebels sometimes operate.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 2 / 4

Women face significant societal discrimination and traditional biases, despite some legal protections. They generally do not receive equal pay for similar work and have fewer opportunities for education and employment.

There are virtually no effective legal protections against discrimination on other grounds, including ethnicity, sexual orientation, and gender identity, though same-sex relations are not specifically criminalized.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 5 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 2 / 4

There are few formal restrictions on freedom of movement, but widespread corruption among police and other public officials can limit this right in practice, as can criminal activity. At times, Senegalese rebel activity may restrict movement in the border area.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 1 / 4

Illegal economic activity, including logging, by organized groups remains a problem. The quality of enforcement of property rights is generally poor, and the formal procedures for establishing a business are relatively onerous.

Women, particularly those from certain ethnic groups in rural areas, face restrictions on their ability to own and inherit property.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 1 / 4

There are multiple constraints on personal social freedoms. Early and forced marriages remain common, especially in rural areas. The government, international organizations, and community leaders have worked to eliminate female genital mutilation (FGM), though nearly half of the country's women have suffered from such violence. Despite the existence of legislation to address gender-based violence, the problem is reportedly widespread; victims of rape and domestic abuse rarely report the crimes to authorities.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 1 / 4

Guinea-Bissau is one of the world's poorest countries, with most families relying on unstable employment in the informal economy or remittances from migrant workers abroad. Public services have deteriorated in recent years amid irregular payment of public-sector workers.

Boys are vulnerable to organized exploitation through forced begging and to forced labor in sectors including mining and agriculture. A rising number of Muslim children from Guinea-Bissau are trafficked by money-making schemes disguised as religious Koranic schools, particularly into Senegal.

Girls are frequently victims of sexual exploitation or domestic servitude. Government officials have been accused of complicity in trafficking activity, including sex tourism schemes in the Bijagós islands.

Guyana

Population: 800,000

Capital: Georgetown

Freedom Status: Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Guyana is a parliamentary democracy with a lively press and a robust civil society. However, elections held in 2020 were marred by attempted fraud by the then incumbent government. Violent crime and discrimination against Indigenous and LGBT+ people remain significant problems. The exploitation of offshore oil and natural gas reserves has raised the stakes of anticorruption reforms and revived traditional ethnopolitical divisions.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- In January, a group of fishermen operating in Guyana's exclusive economic zone (EEZ) were arrested by the crew of a Venezuelan naval vessel. The fishermen were released in February.

- In June, opposition parliamentarian Annette Ferguson was arrested under the Cyber Crime Act (CCA) after saying that a Guyana Defence Force (GDF) officer was slated to take charge of a “killing squad.” Ferguson was bailed in July.
- In August, the Guyana Elections Commission (GECOM) dismissed Chief Elections Officer Keith Lowenfield, his deputy, and the returning officer for Region 4; Lowenfield had been accused of abetting a fraudulent vote tabulation during the 2020 elections. Former GECOM official Vishnu Persaud was chosen to succeed Lowenfield in December.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 30 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 9 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 3 / 4

The president, who serves as both chief of state and head of government, appoints the cabinet, though ministers are collectively responsible to the National Assembly. Parties designate a presidential candidate ahead of National Assembly elections, with the winning party's candidate assuming the presidency for a maximum of two five-year terms.

Presidential balloting was due in March 2019 after then president David Granger and the coalition of A Partnership for National Unity (APNU) and the Alliance for Change (AFC) lost a 2018 no-confidence vote. Elections were called in October 2019 and held in March 2020. The electoral results were based on a tally that included alterations to the count from Guyana's largest voting district, Region 4, leading to fraud allegations. The High Court ordered a recount, but political and courtroom maneuvering continued for months until the government ultimately accepted the results of a recount showing that Irfaan Ali of the People's Progressive Party/Civic (PPP/C) won the presidency. Ali took his post that August.

Members of the unicameral, 65-seat National Assembly are elected to five-year terms; 25 representatives are elected in 10 geographical constituencies, while 40 are elected by proportional representation in one nationwide constituency. Up to seven unelected cabinet ministers and parliamentary officials may also hold ex officio seats.

In the 2020 elections, the PPP/C won 33 seats, the APNU-AFC coalition won 31, and the union of A New United Guyana (ANUG), the Liberty and Justice Party (LJP), and The New Movement (TNM) was allocated 1 seat. European Union (EU) observers said the contest was competitive and generally free, although polarization, unregulated campaign finance, and a lack of transparency characterized the preelectoral period. EU observers said the poll's integrity was “seriously compromised” by the manipulation of Region 4 results by senior GECOM officials. The eventual allocation of seats was based on the recount that was completed in June and judged to be accurate by Caribbean Community observers.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 3 / 4

Although observers characterized the 2020 polls as generally free, EU observers described GECOM as dysfunctional, riven by polarization, opaque in its decision-making, and derelict in its duty to stop its officials from interfering with the results. In August 2021, GECOM dismissed Chief Elections Officer Keith Lowenfield—who had been accused of abetting the fraudulent vote tabulation in 2020—along with his deputy and the Region 4 returning officer. Former GECOM official Vishnu Persaud was chosen to succeed Lowenfield in December 2021.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 13 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 4 / 4

Political parties may form freely and they generally operate without interference. Party politics are defined by ethnic identity; the APNU is predominately Afro-Guyanese while the PPP/C is mainly Indo-Guyanese. Ethnopolitical divisions have sharpened as the anticipated influx of oil and gas revenue raises the stakes of controlling the distribution of state resources. New parties emerged to contest the 2020 elections, with the ANUG, LJP, and TNM gaining one shared seat. There are no legal provisions allowing independent candidates to stand for the presidency.

In June 2021, APNU-AFC parliamentarian Annette Ferguson was arrested under the CCA after saying that a GDF officer was slated to take charge of a “killing squad.” Ferguson was bailed in July.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 4 / 4

The PPP/C ruled from 1992 to 2015, and the APNU-AFC from 2015 to 2020. The PPP/C took power through elections in 2020, but significant pressure from the international community and civil society was required to ensure a declaration of the PPP/C as the winner based on the results of a recount.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 3 / 4

Voters are largely free to make their own political choices. However, there is concern that politics may be improperly influenced by the largely Indo-Guyanese economic elite.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 2 / 4

Women and ethnic minorities have equal political rights, though ethnic divisions have long played a powerful role in politics. At least a third of each party's candidate list must consist of women. Women won 25 of the National Assembly's 70 seats in 2020.

Indigenous people, who make up about 10 percent of the population, hold elected posts but are politically marginalized. The LJP nominated Indigenous activist Lenox Shuman for president but Shuman was disqualified in January 2020 for holding Canadian citizenship. Shuman became first Indigenous National Assembly deputy speaker that September.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 8 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 4 / 4

The president and the legislative majority are generally able to create and implement policy without improper interference. The post-2020 political stalemate has continued to affect governance, however. While President Ali took his post based on the results of the recount, he did not hold regular meetings with opposition leader Joseph Harmon, while the APNU-AFC continued to label the PPP/C administration as illegitimate. The government's ability to fill some official posts was consequently hindered.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 2 / 4

In recent years, successive governments have made progress in introducing durable safeguards against corruption, notably by strengthening money-laundering controls and empowering a new agency to audit state-owned companies. However, graft remains widespread, and the exploitation of oil and natural gas reserves beneath the country's coastal waters is adding urgency to the need for effective anticorruption reforms.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 2 / 4

Laws designed to ensure government transparency are inconsistently upheld. A 2013 Access to Information Act allows the government to refuse requests with little or no justification.

A government integrity commission tasked with reviewing officials' asset disclosures was reestablished in 2018 after a long dormancy.

In 2017, Guyana joined the Extractive Industries Transparency Initiative, which requires member states to report on the use of natural-resource revenue. In March 2021, the government released its second report, covering fiscal year 2018.

Critics have suggested that Georgetown's initial set of oil contracts, negotiated privately with individual companies, are unfavorable to the government. In August 2021, Vice President Bharrat Jagdeo vowed that the government would address that imbalance in future profit-sharing agreements.

In December 2021, the National Assembly voted to amend the Natural Resource Fund Act; under the updated legislation, the finance minister could face a 10-year prison term if they do not disclose the receipt of oil revenue within three months.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 43 / 60D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 15 / 16*D1. Are there free and independent media? 3 / 4

Although freedom of the press is generally respected, government officials have filed defamation cases and occasionally threatened journalists. Criminal defamation charges can draw up to two years in prison.

The Guyana National Broadcasting Authority, whose board is appointed by the president, has been accused of partisan bias in its regulatory and licensing decisions. According to EU observers, state-run print and television outlets openly favored the APNU-AFC during the 2020 election campaign, while several private outlets favored the PPP/C.

In April 2021, commentator Gavin Matthews was arrested for violating the CCA after calling Culture Minister Charles Ramson a murderer. Matthews was granted bail in June.

In August 2021, Guyana joined the Media Freedom Coalition, an international initiative that advocates for the safety of journalists.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 4 / 4

Religious freedom is constitutionally guaranteed and generally respected in practice. Rules limiting visas for foreign missionaries and barring blasphemous libel are not actively enforced. Religious groups can register places of worship and receive associated benefits without difficulty.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

Academic freedom is largely upheld.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 4 / 4

People are generally free to express their views without fear of retaliation or other repercussions. However, critics allege that the CCA is used to stifle dissent online.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 11 / 12E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

The authorities generally uphold the right to peaceful assembly. Guyanese authorities responded peacefully to a September 2021 protest prompted by the police killing of a businessman in Region 2. A September protest held by former forestry workers took place without incident in Georgetown.

In August 2021, police in Georgetown arrested eight demonstrators protesting against a COVID-19 vaccine mandate for teachers.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 4 / 4

Nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) operate freely. The government has consulted with NGOs on various policy initiatives, including measures designed to combat human trafficking.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 3 / 4

The rights to form labor unions, bargain collectively, and strike are generally upheld, and unions are well organized. However, laws against antiunion discrimination are poorly enforced. In September 2021, the Guyana Agricultural and General Workers Union (GAWU) alleged that oil-and-gas workers were discouraged from joining unions by their employers.

The Guyana Teachers' Union staged a three-day walkout in September over a vaccine mandate for teachers. The government vowed to dock the pay of participants. Also in September, Albion Estate sugar harvesters went on strike over pay concerns; the GAWU and Albion Estate's operator, the Guyana Sugar Corporation, struck a deal later that month.

F. RULE OF LAW: 8 / 16F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 2 / 4

The courts are impaired by political disputes, staff shortages, and lack of resources. The president must obtain the agreement of the opposition leader to appoint the chancellor of the judiciary and the chief justice; both positions were held by acting placeholders as of December 2021 due to the ongoing failure to agree on appointments. Other judges are appointed by the president on the advice of a Judicial Service Commission (JSC), which is also selected with opposition input. The JSC has remained unstaffed since 2017.

Guyanese courts played a mixed role during the 2020 election crisis. A Court of Appeal decision bolstered the Granger government's position that large numbers of votes should be invalidated. However, when the Caribbean Court of Justice—Guyana's apex judicial body—overruled this decision, the Court of Appeal confirmed that GECOM must declare a winner based on the recount-based vote tally, which favored the PPP/C.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 2 / 4

Observance of due process safeguards is uneven. Defendants are often held in pretrial detention beyond their maximum possible sentence; 46 percent of the prison population was in pretrial detention as of September 2021. Prisons are also overcrowded, with the system's population standing at 127.2 percent of capacity as of September. Nevertheless, the Inter-American Development Bank praised efforts to tackle these issues in August, including the use of alternative sentencing.

Police officers do not always operate with professionalism; some have reportedly accepted bribes and committed a variety of other crimes.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 2 / 4

Reports of police violence, abuse of detainees, and harsh prison conditions persist. Police in Region 2 killed businessman Orin Boston at his home in September 2021. The officer who allegedly killed Boston was arrested and the government vowed to investigate the killing.

The rate of violent crime has fallen somewhat in recent years but remains stubbornly high.

The threat of territorial conflict with Venezuela remained present in 2021. In January, Venezuelan president Nicolás Maduro Moros issued a decree asserting the country's rights in Guyanese waters. The crew of the Comandante Eterno Hugo Chávez arrested fishermen operating in Guyana's EEZ that month, though the fishermen were released in February.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 2 / 4

Indo-Guyanese people, who make up 40 percent of the population, predominate within the business sector. A history of interethnic violence and the organization of politics along ethnic lines make communal violence a perennial concern.

Laws barring discrimination based on race, gender, and other categories are not effectively enforced. Women continue to suffer from workplace bias and significantly lower pay.

Guyana's nine principal Indigenous groups still face disparities in the provision of health care, education, and justice.

Same-sex sexual activity is punishable with harsh jail terms, and the LGBT+ community faces police harassment and discrimination.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 9 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 3 / 4

There are no undue legal restrictions on freedom of movement, including with respect to residency, employment, and education. However, factors including bribery, racial polarization, and neglected infrastructure in some regions limit this right in practice.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 2 / 4

The legal framework generally supports the rights to own property and operate private businesses, but complex regulations are unevenly enforced, and corruption and organized crime sometimes inhibit business activity.

Indigenous communities face unauthorized encroachment and resource exploitation by outsiders. In September 2021, President Ali announced the creation of a government mechanism to address land disputes.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 2 / 4

Individual freedom on personal status matters such as marriage and divorce is generally respected, though same-sex marriage and civil unions are prohibited. Marriage before age 18 is allowed with judicial or parental permission, and such marriages are reportedly common. Domestic abuse is widespread, and conviction rates for such abuse and for sexual offenses are low.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 2 / 4

Legal protections against exploitative working conditions are not enforced consistently. Those working in the informal sector and extractive industries in the country's interior are particularly vulnerable to abuses.

The US State Department detailed Guyanese authorities' continued efforts to address human trafficking in 2021, citing a rise in investigations, increased victim assistance, and the establishment of a Spanish-language antitrafficking hotline. However, child and male victims go largely unsupported.

Haiti

Population: 11,500,000

Capital: Port-au-Prince

Freedom Status: Partly Free

Electoral Democracy: No

Status Change: Haiti's status declined from Partly Free to Not Free due to the assassination of President Jovenel Moïse, an ongoing breakdown in the electoral system and other state institutions, and the corrosive effects of organized crime and violence on civic life.

Overview: Worsening breakdowns of the Haitian electoral system in recent years have led to a series of expired mandates and constitutional impasses, leaving citizens without proper political representation. Rampant corruption and violence by armed criminal groups undermine basic services and contribute to physical insecurity for the population. The judiciary and law enforcement agencies lack the resources, independence, and integrity to uphold due process and the rule of law. Antigovernment protests often result in excessive use of force by police.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- The first half of the year was dominated by protests and political disputes over the expiration of President Jovenel Moïse's term, his plans to hold a referendum on constitutional reforms, and the continued postponement of overdue elections.
 - In July, Moïse was assassinated by a group of heavily armed men who entered his residence, and the resulting succession crisis was exacerbated by the lack of a sitting Parliament, as the terms of most lawmakers had expired in 2020.
 - Ariel Henry, who took office as acting prime minister and acting president with support from foreign diplomats, again postponed elections in September. Amid ongoing doubts about the legitimacy of his government, Henry was accused of obstructing the criminal investigation into Moïse's assassination, which remained stalled at year's end.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 11 / 40 (-4)A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 3 / 12 (-1)*A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 1 / 4 (-1)

In Haiti's semipresidential system, the president is directly elected for a five-year term. The prime minister is appointed by the president and confirmed by Parliament.

Jovenel Moïse of the Haitian Tet Kale Party (PHTK), the handpicked successor of then president Michel Martelly, won the 2015 presidential election, but the results were nullified due to extensive fraud. Moïse went on to win a repeat election in 2016, taking 55.6 percent of the vote. He was inaugurated in February 2017 after an electoral tribunal verified the outcome, citing irregularities but no evidence of widespread fraud. Some members of the political opposition and civil society groups claimed that fraud in the vote tally, inconsistent voter registration lists, and a low voter turnout of 21 percent undermined the new president's mandate.

The events surrounding the repeat election later resulted in a political and legal dispute over whether Moïse's term expired in February 2021, five years after the end of Martelly's term, or February 2022, five years after Moïse was inaugurated.

President Moïse frequently replaced the prime minister during his tenure, but after the terms of most lawmakers expired in early 2020, his appointees were unable to obtain parliamentary approval in keeping with the constitution. In April 2021, Moïse accepted the resignation of Prime Minister Joseph Jouthe and appointed Claude Joseph, the minister of foreign affairs and worship, to replace him. Joseph then submitted his resignation in early July, and Moïse, through a decree published in the official state newspaper Le Moniteur, appointed Ariel Henry as the new prime minister. Henry had not yet been installed when, days later, Moïse was assassinated at his residence.

The assassination set off a dispute among the local political, civic, and economic actors as to who should head the executive branch, but key diplomatic representatives in the country—known as the Core Group—called on Henry to lead a new government, and Joseph stepped down. In September, Henry dismissed the Provisional Electoral Council (CEP) and indefinitely postponed general elections, which were already overdue. He remained in place as acting prime minister and acting president at year's end.

Score Change: The score declined from 2 to 1 due to the assassination of President Moïse and the indefinite postponement of elections to replace him.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

The directly elected, bicameral Parliament is composed of a Senate, with 30 members who serve six-year terms, and a Chamber of Deputies, with 119 members who serve four-year terms. The 2015 legislative elections were plagued by disorder, fraud, and violence. Despite concerns about the elections' credibility, 92 lawmakers took office in early 2016. Elections for a portion of the Senate and the runoff elections for the remaining seats in the Chamber of Deputies were held in 2016 along with the repeat presidential election, and the contests were marred by low voter turnout and fraud. The PHTK emerged as the largest single party in both chambers, followed by Vérité (Truth), though most of the seats were divided among a large number of smaller parties.

Elections for the Chamber of Deputies, two-thirds of the Senate, and local mayoralities were canceled in October 2019. As a result, Parliament was dissolved in January 2020. Ten senators still had mandates, however, and after Moïse's assassination in July 2021, they supported Senate president Joseph Lambert's short-lived bid to serve as acting president. Following the dismissal of the CEP in September, fresh elections had yet to be scheduled at year's end.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 2 / 4

The CEP was established in the late 1980s as a temporary body, but it remains responsible for managing the electoral process. Despite constitutional safeguards against executive dominance of the CEP, the executive branch asserts significant control over it in practice. In September 2020, Moïse appointed a new CEP by presidential decree. Human rights observers argued that both the appointments and the decree's mandate for the council to organize a constitutional referendum were unconstitutional. Moïse's proposed constitutional reforms were reportedly designed to increase the power of the presidency, drawing harsh criticism from his opponents. Plans to hold the referendum and general elections in November 2021 were scuttled that September, when Henry, as acting president, dismissed the existing CEP and pledged to assemble a new council with broader legitimacy.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 5 / 16 (-2)

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 1 / 4 (-1)

Legal and administrative barriers that prevented some parties from registering or running in past elections have largely been eliminated. The number of members required to form a political party was reduced from 500 to 20 in 2014, leading to the creation of dozens of new parties. However, the risk of violence seriously impairs normal political activity. Opposition party leaders are subject to threats and abductions, and protests organized by opposition parties are regularly met with repressive force by the government.

Criminal violence increased sharply in 2021, with the estimated number of kidnappings more than tripling for the second consecutive year. President Moïse, meanwhile, was accused of using allied criminal groups to intimidate his political opponents and the neighborhoods that formed their bases of support. The insecurity continued after Moïse's assassination and remained a major obstacle to political mobilization.

Score Change: The score declined from 2 to 1 because political activity was severely hampered by an increased risk of violence and kidnapping by armed criminal groups.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 1 / 4

Haiti has a poor record of peaceful democratic transfers of power. It remains difficult for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections, which are regularly disrupted by violence, marred by accusations of fraud, and postponed. In recent years the PHTK has consolidated power in the legislature and at the local level, in part through alliances with smaller parties. However, it has also suffered from internal divisions, particularly between factions loyal to Moïse and to former president Martelly, respectively. The country's various opposition parties remain highly fragmented.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 1 / 4 (-1)

Haitians' political choices are subject to undue influence or effective marginalization by corrupt patronage networks, organized crime, and foreign actors. Many politicians rely on money linked to drug trafficking, gang activity, and other illegal sources of funding to finance their campaigns. Politicians from the PHTK as well as opposition parties have enlisted armed criminal groups to either incite or halt residents' involvement in protests and other political activities, according to local human rights activists.

The assassination of President Moïse and its aftermath represented a further degradation of the democratic autonomy of Haitian citizens and politicians. In addition to the violence and criminality associated with the murder itself, many observers decried the role of the Core Group—comprising ambassadors or representatives from Brazil, Canada, France, Germany, Spain, the United States, the European Union, the Organization of American States, and the United Nations—in confirming Ariel Henry as the new acting prime minister and acting president. In a September 2021 resignation letter, the US special envoy to Haiti, Daniel Foote, denounced the diplomatic endorsement of Henry, arguing that it improperly sidelined an alternative plan advanced by a commission of Haitian civil society representatives, which called for a longer transition period to enable thorough institutional reforms before any elections or political settlement.

Score Change: The score declined from 2 to 1 due to the increased role of criminal and foreign actors in shaping political outcomes.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 2 / 4

Haitian women are underrepresented in political life, with only four out of 149 parliamentary seats held by women from 2017 to 2019. The constitution mandates that 30 percent of public officials be women, but there are no penalties for noncompliance. Election-related violence and social and cultural norms discourage women from participating in politics. Due to societal discrimination, the interests of LGBT+ people are not represented in the political system, and there are no openly LGBT+ politicians.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 3 / 12 (-1)

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 1 / 4

Parliament was dissolved in January 2020 as the mandates of two-thirds of Senate members and all Chamber of Deputies members expired, and no new elections were held. President Moïse attempted to rule by decree until his July 2021 assassination, but the legitimacy of his actions was questioned, since only members of Parliament have the constitutional authority to pass laws. Similar legitimacy questions continued to undermine the mandates of the prime minister and various government ministries throughout the year. Corruption, instability, and security threats hinder the government's ability to carry out its own policies and provide basic services across the country.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 1 / 4

Corruption is widespread in Haiti, as are allegations of impunity for government officials. A 2017 law reduced the independence and powers of the Central Financial Intelligence Unit (UCREF), which was responsible for investigating money-laundering cases. Also that year, Moïse replaced the heads of the Anticorruption Unit (ULCC) and the UCREF with political allies and former members of the Martelly administration; both units had been investigating Moïse for potential money laundering.

In August 2020, the Superior Court of Auditors and Administrative Disputes (CSCCA) issued its third and final report on corruption among government officials involving a low-interest development-loan program operated by Venezuela, but the findings have not resulted in prosecutions. A month later, despite objections from the CSCCA's president, Moïse issued a decree that rendered the court's opinions on public procurement contracts advisory and nonbinding, which would allow for the awarding of state contracts without prior court approval.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 1 / 4 (-1)

Haitians' general distrust of the government stems in large part from the absence of transparency and accountability measures that are needed to reduce corruption. There are no laws providing the public with access to state information, and it is reportedly very difficult to obtain government documents and data in practice. All government officials must file financial disclosure forms within 90 days of taking office and within 90 days of leaving office, though these requirements are not well enforced, and the reports are not made public. A 2020 presidential decree that created the National Intelligence Agency (ANI) granted it total secrecy and the ability to conduct surveillance on individuals and businesses at any time, even if there is no relevant ongoing investigation.

The events and governance conditions of 2021—including disputes about the presidential term, executive rule in the absence of legislative oversight, and the investigation of Moïse's assassination—raised further transparency concerns. In September, Henry dismissed the justice minister and a chief prosecutor after investigators under their supervision uncovered evidence that appeared to link Henry himself to a top suspect in the case, prompting accusations that he was obstructing justice. The investigation remained stalled at year's end.

Score Change: The score declined from 2 to 1 due to the prolongation of opaque executive rule and allegations of obstruction surrounding the investigation into Moïse's assassination.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 22 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 9 / 16 (-1)

D1. Are there free and independent media? 2 / 4

The constitution includes protections for press freedom, and the media sector is pluralistic, but the work of journalists is constrained by threats and violence, government interference, and a lack of financial resources.

In 2020, a presidential decree prohibited the sharing of photos or videos of the bodies of people who died from COVID-19, drawing criticism from human rights groups.

Attacks on journalists occur frequently, and impunity for perpetrators is the norm. In June 2021, two journalists and activists, Diego Charles and Antoinette Duclair, were shot and killed by unidentified men in Port-au-Prince. Also in June, photojournalist Dieu-Nalio Chéry was forced to leave Haiti because of death threats from armed gangs.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 3 / 4

Freedom of religion is constitutionally guaranteed, and religious groups generally practice freely. However, the traditionally dominant Roman Catholic and Protestant churches and schools receive certain privileges from the state, while Vodou religious leaders have experienced social stigmatization and violence for their beliefs and practices. The government has denied registration to the country's small Muslim communities.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 2 / 4

Educational institutions and academics choose their curriculum freely, but university associations and student groups that protest government actions are often met with police violence. Academic freedom is also negatively affected by the general climate of insecurity, and some scholars may self-censor to avoid conflicts with powerful groups or individuals.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 2 / 4 (-1)

There are some formal constraints on the expression of personal views, including criminal defamation laws, and the risk of violent reprisals also serves as a deterrent to unfettered discussion of sensitive issues such as corruption, gangs, and organized crime. The government has been accused of using allied gangs to help suppress dissent. Security conditions grew worse during 2021, with the number of documented kidnappings surging to more than 1,200, further dampening citizens' sense of freedom to air their grievances.

Score Change: The score declined from 3 to 2 because an increase in gang violence and kidnappings has contributed to a climate of fear among ordinary citizens.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 4 / 12 (+1)E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 2 / 4 (+1)

The constitution enshrines freedom of assembly, but this right is often violated in practice, and police have used excessive force including live rounds of ammunition to disperse protesters. Despite the risk of violence, politicians, civil society groups, and ordinary citizens continued to mount demonstrations during 2021, with participants calling for Moïse's resignation and condemning criminal activity. Police regularly used tear gas and gunshots in response, but the severity of the protest-related violence and the number of casualties remained far lower than in 2019, when more than 80 people were killed.

Score Change: The score improved from 1 to 2 because activists continued to hold demonstrations against the government and organized crime, and the violence that accompanied such events was not as severe as in some previous years.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 1 / 4

Numerous domestic and international nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) operate in Haiti, but human rights defenders and activists who address sensitive topics are subject to threats and violence, which creates a climate of fear. Violence against activists is rarely investigated or prosecuted. Among other high-profile cases, an investigation into the 2020 assassination of Monferrier Dorval, a government critic and head of the Port-au-Prince Bar Association, remained unsolved in 2021.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 1 / 4

Workers' right to unionize is protected under the law, and strikes are not uncommon, though the union movement in Haiti is weak and lacks collective bargaining power in practice. Most citizens are informally employed. Workers who engage in union activity frequently face harassment, suspension, termination, and other repercussions from employers.

F. RULE OF LAW: 4 / 16F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 1 / 4

Despite constitutional guarantees of independence, the judiciary is susceptible to political pressure. A lack of resources has contributed to bribery throughout the judicial system, and weak oversight means that most corrupt officials are not held accountable. During his time in office, President Moïse repeatedly declined to renew the mandates of judges, and in February 2021—amid the dispute over the expiration of his term—Moïse forced three members of the Supreme Court to retire. Given Parliament’s inability to play its constitutional role in judicial appointments, the number of vacancies has continued to grow. The head of the Supreme Court died in June, after which the body lacked the quorum it needed to function.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 1 / 4

Constitutionally protected due process rights are regularly violated in practice. Arbitrary arrest is common, as are extortion attempts by police and at all levels of the legal system. Most suspects do not have legal representation, and even those who do suffer from long delays and case mismanagement. More than 80 percent of the prison population consisted of pretrial detainees as of 2021. Many have never appeared before a judge despite the legal requirement of a court hearing within 48 hours of arrest.

In November 2020, President Moïse published two decrees that expanded the definition of terrorism and created the ANI to gather information on and prevent terrorist acts that ostensibly threaten national security. Human rights groups criticized the vague new definition of “terrorist act,” which included robbery, extortion, arson, and the destruction of public and private goods. According to the decrees, the ANI would have broad discretion to conduct searches and surveillance, and its staff cannot be held legally accountable for abuses without prior authorization from the president.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 1 / 4

A culture of impunity in law enforcement leaves civilians in Haiti with little protection from the illegitimate use of force, and police themselves are subject to lethal attacks by heavily armed criminal groups. According to the United Nations, at least 36 officers were killed in the first eight months of 2021. Criminal groups fight one another for territory and prey on residents in areas under their control, earning revenue from kidnappings, extortion, and other illegal activities. Overall crime statistics are difficult to authenticate, and crimes are underreported, but more than 1,600 murders were registered during 2021, representing an 18 percent increase over the previous year’s total. The resulting homicide rate was about 13.7 per 100,000 residents. Police are regularly accused of abusing suspects and detainees. Conditions in Haiti’s prisons, which are among the world’s most overcrowded, are extremely poor.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 1 / 4

Discrimination against women, the LGBT+ community, and people with disabilities is pervasive. Among other problems, women face bias in employment and disparities in access to financial services.

A reformed penal code, published in June 2020 by executive decree and set to take effect in June 2022, prohibits gender-based violence, sexual harassment, and discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation, which occur regularly in practice. The reform was met with sharp resistance and public protest by conservative cultural and religious groups.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 5 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 1 / 4

The government generally does not restrict travel or place limits on the ability to change one's place of employment or education. However, insecurity has prevented free movement, particularly in Port-au-Prince, as roads are frequently blockaded by criminal groups, police, or protesters, and many residents avoid unnecessary travel due to widespread gang violence.

The government's flawed response to natural disasters has prevented many displaced residents from returning to their homes, forcing them to live in poor conditions for extended periods. As of early August 2021, according to the United Nations, about 19,000 people were internally displaced. Tens of thousands more were displaced as a result of an earthquake in mid-August. In addition, more than 6,125 people, or 1,500 households, had been displaced when their houses were burned down by armed gangs in October 2020.

Although the legal framework protects property rights and private business activity, it is difficult in practice to register property, enforce contracts, and obtain credit. Poor record keeping and corruption contribute to inconsistent enforcement of property rights, and business owners are subject to extortion by criminal groups.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 2 / 4

Basic freedoms related to marriage, divorce, and custody are generally respected. However, there are no laws specifically addressing domestic violence, which is a widespread problem. Both domestic violence and rape are underreported and rarely result in successful prosecutions, with justice officials often favoring reconciliation or other forms of settlement. Spousal rape is not recognized as a criminal offense.

The reformed penal code that was set to take effect in June 2022 would decriminalize abortion in the first 12 weeks of pregnancy, in cases of rape or incest, or when there is a threat to the physical or mental health of the pregnant woman. Abortion was prohibited entirely under existing law. The reformed code would also reportedly lower the legal age of sexual consent to 15.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 0 / 4

Socioeconomic mobility is obstructed by entrenched poverty and inequality. Legal protections against exploitative working conditions in formal employment are weakly enforced, and most workers are informally employed. As many as 300,000 children work as domestic servants, often without pay or access to education; they are especially vulnerable to physical or sexual abuse. Other forms of child labor are common.

To escape dire social and economic conditions at home, many Haitians have risked human trafficking and dangerous land and sea journeys to reach countries including the Bahamas, Brazil, Chile, the Dominican Republic, Mexico, and the United States.

Honduras

Population: 9,400,000

Capital: Tegucigalpa

Freedom Status: Partly Free

Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: Institutional weakness, corruption, violence, and impunity undermine the overall stability of Honduras. Journalists, political activists, and women are often the victims of violence, and perpetrators are rarely brought to justice. While Honduras holds regular elections, irregularities surrounding the 2017 presidential poll prompted election monitors to call the result into question.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- In May, the National Congress approved a new electoral law after two years of deliberation. The new legislation incorporated several reforms, including improvements to the voter registration process. Though the reforms enhanced the credibility of the year's general elections, some opposition figures have criticized the law, saying it does not go far enough in providing a framework for democratic election management.
- General elections were held in November and administered under the new electoral law, which increased transparency and confidence in the electoral process despite the unprecedented levels of political violence that marred the elections. Opposition candidate Xiomara Castro of the Liberty and Refoundation Party (Libre) was elected to the presidency with 51.1 percent of the vote; Libre also gained control of the National Congress, filling 50 seats.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 21 / 40 (+2)

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 8 / 12 (+1)

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 3 / 4 (+1)

The president is both chief of state and head of government, and is elected by popular vote to four-year terms. The leading candidate is only required to win a plurality; there is no runoff system.

In 2019, following severe irregularities in the 2017 presidential election, which saw President Juan Orlando Hernández of the National Party (PN) reelected by a narrow margin, Congress created two new electoral management bodies: the Electoral Court of Justice (TJE) and National Electoral Council (CNE). In May 2021, Congress passed new electoral legislation that aimed to improve electoral integrity in the run-up to the November 2021 general elections, which were the first to be administered by the TJE and the CNE.

In November 2021, the Libre Party's Xiomara Castro was elected to the presidency with 51.1 percent of the vote, ending 12 years of PN control of the office. Castro, who will become the nation's first woman president, was elected amid record high voter turnout after the electoral reforms enacted in May 2021 improved the voter registration process. The European Union (EU) election mission to Honduras reported that, though several critical problems remain, including high levels of politicization in the electoral process, the May 2021 reforms to the electoral system had allowed for increased transparency and improved confidence in the election results.

Score Change: The score improved from 2 to 3 because the presidential election, which ended with an opposition candidate's victory, was held with improvements to voter-registration and security measures and amid high turnout.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 2 / 4 (-1)

Members of the 128-seat, unicameral National Congress are elected for four-year terms using proportional representation by department.

All 128 seats were contested in the November 2021 elections. Castro's Libre party won 50 seats, followed by the PN with 44 seats. The remaining seats were filled by the Liberal Party (PL) with 22 seats, the Savior Party of Honduras (PSH) with 10 seats, and the Christian Democratic Party (DC) and the Anticorruption Party (PAC) with one seat each. The election was administered under the May 2021 electoral reforms, and the results were accepted both domestically and internationally.

Despite these reforms, the 2021 congressional and municipal elections were marred by severe political violence; at least 68 candidates were murdered in the run-up to the elections. Other forms of electoral interference, including the abuse of state resources and voter intimidation, were also reported.

Score Change: The score declined from 3 to 2 because legislative elections were affected by serious violence perpetrated against local elected officials.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 3 / 4 (+1)

The Supreme Electoral Council (TSE) came under heavy criticism for its administration of the 2017 presidential poll, which prompted protests and widespread allegations of TSE incompetence and bias toward the ruling party. In January 2019, Congress created two new electoral bodies to replace the TSE, the TJE and the CNE. In May 2021, after more than two years of deliberation, the congress passed a new electoral law, incorporating several reforms intended to improve public trust and encourage stability and transparency in the electoral process.

These reforms include improvements to voter-registration management, the modernization of the National Identification Document (DNI) program, and provided for the involvement of multiple parties (PN, PL, and Libre) in the management of all electoral institutions. Following the reforms, the 2021 elections enjoyed a heightened level of legitimacy; the severe irregularities of the 2017 elections were not repeated, and the results were widely accepted.

According to the EU election observation mission, the new electoral legislation generally complies with international and regional standards, and provided increased transparency and confidence in the election day proceedings and results of the November 2021 general elections. Though many critics have deemed the reforms insufficient, citing democratic deficits including high levels of politicization, unclear procedures, and a lack of necessary regulations, the reforms were widely considered to represent significant progress in the electoral process. Further reforms aimed at establishing new conflict-resolution processes are planned, but have not yet been enacted.

Score Change: The score improved from 2 to 3 because opposition parties more actively participated in the management of the CNE and because of improvements in voter-roll and voter-registration management.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 9 / 16 (+1)B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 3 / 4

Political parties are largely free to operate, though power has mostly been concentrated in the hands of the PL and the PN since the early 1980s. In 2013, Libre and the PAC participated in elections for the first time, winning a significant share of the vote and disrupting the dominance of the PL and the PN. In 2021, representatives from five parties were elected to the National Congress.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 3 / 4 (+1)

Opposition parties are competitive. Though opposition parties were affected by acts of political violence and electoral irregularities favoring the ruling party, several opposition candidates were able to gain power in the November 2021 elections.

In November 2021, the ruling PN was ousted from the presidency for the first time in 12 years by Castro, a member of the opposition party Libre. The PN also lost its congressional majority when Libre candidates won 50 seats.

Score Change: The score improved from 2 to 3 because an opposition candidate won the presidential election.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 1 / 4

Political and economic elites have traditionally exerted significant influence over political parties, limiting people's political choices. The military, after decades of ruling Honduras, remains politically powerful.

Political violence is widespread, and includes harassment, threats, and intimidation directed at candidates, politicians, and voters, especially women. In 2021, the University Institute for Democracy, Peace, and Security (IUDPAS) reported more than 30 deaths related to political and electoral violence.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 2 / 4

Adult citizens have the right to vote. Members of ethnic minority groups remain underrepresented in Honduras's political system and in the political sphere generally, though there have been modest efforts by the government to encourage their participation and representation.

Women are also underrepresented in politics. In the 2021 elections, of 3038 open positions, 61.1 percent were won by men and 38.8 percent by women.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 4 / 12C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 2 / 4

Beginning in 2014, several measures have been passed into law that have increasingly consolidated power in the executive branch. The military, which has traditionally maintained substantial autonomy from civilian oversight, has played an increasing role in both internal security and programs unrelated to security in recent years, prompting the UN Office of the High Commissioner on Human Rights (OHCHR) to call for demilitarization and a return of nondefense matters to civilian control.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 1 / 4

Corruption remains rampant in Honduras, despite efforts to bolster its anticorruption mechanisms in recent years. The Mission to Support the Fight against Corruption and Impunity in Honduras (MACCIH), which was established in 2016, was shuttered in 2020 despite public support for renewal, marking a pattern of regression in Honduran anticorruption efforts.

The new criminal code that took effect in June 2020 eased penalties for multiple crimes public officials are regularly accused of, including corruption and drug trafficking. The new code also contributed to the dismissal of charges or acquittal of officials implicated in several emblematic corruption cases, including one that exposed large-scale embezzlement in the public health sector.

President Hernández was directly implicated in corruption in 2019, when United States prosecutors identified him and former president Porfirio Lobo as coconspirators in a drug smuggling operation run by Juan Antonio Hernández, the president's brother. In October 2019, a United States jury convicted the president's brother; in March 2021, he was sentenced to life in prison and ordered to forfeit $138.5 million for his leadership role in what the US Department of Justice (DOJ) termed "a violent, state-sponsored drug trafficking conspiracy".

In October 2021, the legislature passed reforms limiting the public prosecutor's office access to financial information in cases of corruption and relaxing sanctions against those who do not present campaign finance reports. These reforms also define members of non-governmental organizations (NGOs) as politically exposed persons (PEPs), a measure that gives the government the power to place NGOs under investigation and freeze their bank accounts, which many groups fear will be abused in order to restrict their ability to fight against corruption.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 1 / 4

Government operations are generally opaque. Journalists and interest groups have difficulty obtaining information from the government. Secrecy laws passed in 2014 allow authorities to withhold information on security and national defense for up to 25 years. The laws cover information regarding the military police budget, which is funded by a security tax, as well as information related to the Supreme Court and the Foreign Affairs and International Cooperation Directorate.

The 2020 creation of a Ministry of Transparency was criticized by civil society representatives as an effort to undermine the efficacy of existing transparency mechanisms.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 26 / 60 (+1)D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 9 / 16*D1. Are there free and independent media? 1 / 4

Authorities systematically violate the constitution's press freedom guarantees. Reporters and outlets covering sensitive topics or who are perceived as critical of authorities risk assaults, threats, blocked transmissions, and harassment.

According to the National Commissioner for Human Rights in Honduras (CONADEH), more than 80 journalists have been murdered in the country since 2001; a local press freedom group, the Committee for Free Expression (C-Libre) reported that 97 percent of these murders have gone unsolved.

Journalists are also targeted by various types of defamation laws. According to the Committee to Protect Journalists (CPJ), while defamation was decriminalized under the new criminal code, insult and slander continue to be subject to criminal penalties.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 4 / 4

Religious freedom is generally respected in Honduras.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 2 / 4

Academic freedom is undermined by criminal groups, who control all or parts of schools in some areas and subject staff to extortion schemes. Authorities sometimes move to suppress student demonstrations by arresting participants and dispersing the events, and violent clashes between police and student protesters sometimes occur.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 2 / 4

Under the Special Law on Interception of Private Communications, passed in 2011, the government can intercept online and telephone messages. Violence, threats, and intimidation by state and nonstate actors curtails open and free private discussion among the general population.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 5 / 12 (+1)E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 2 / 4 (+1)

Freedom of assembly is constitutionally protected, but the government consistently uses force to disperse participants. Amnesty International has reported that authorities regularly used tear gas and live ammunition against demonstrators and bystanders during protests or government reprisals. The COVID-19-linked state of emergency included restrictions on freedom of assembly.

In December 2020, three UN special rapporteurs sent a joint letter calling for revisions of sections of the new criminal code that threaten assembly rights, including vague invocations of the word “terrorism” that potentially jeopardized protest organizers.

The UN High Commissioner for Human Rights (OHCHR) has expressed further concern regarding penal code reforms passed in October 2021 that impose heavier penalties on charges of usurpation and forced displacement, which the government has used in the past to arbitrarily arrest, criminalize, and prosecute protesters.

Violent crackdowns on electoral rallies and celebrations like those seen in 2017 were not repeated during the 2021 election period. Large political rallies by both the PN and opposition parties were undisturbed, and large public gatherings were held on election day without interference.

Score Change: The score improved from 1 to 2 because past disruptions of election-related gatherings by authorities were not repeated.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 1 / 4

NGOs and their staff, especially in the human rights and environmental fields, face significant threats, including harassment, surveillance, smear campaigns aimed at undermining their work, and violence. Since January 2014, the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights (IACHR) and the OHCHR have documented the murders of at least 75 human rights defenders. Activists from the Garifuna community have been especially targeted in recent years.

In 2018, a court convicted seven suspects in the prominent 2016 killing of environmental and indigenous rights activist Berta Cáceres; they received multidecade sentences in 2019. In July 2021, David Castillo, the former head of a dam company, was convicted of murder for his role in planning Cáceres's assassination.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 2 / 4

Labor unions are well organized and can strike, though labor actions have resulted in clashes with security forces. The government does not always honor formal agreements entered with public-sector unions. Union leaders and labor activists in both the public and private sector face harassment, dismissal, and violence for their activities. According to a report published in June 2020 by the Network Against Anti-Union Violence, 36 trade unionists were murdered between 2009 and 2019.

F. RULE OF LAW: 4 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 1 / 4

Political and business elites exert excessive influence over the judiciary, including the Supreme Court. Judicial appointments are made with little transparency, and the UN Special Rapporteur on the independence of judges and lawyers reported in June 2020 that the Supreme Court maintains excessive control over lower-level judicial appointments. The Special Rapporteur also noted Congress's excessive power over the judiciary. Judges have been removed from their posts for political reasons, and several lawyers have been killed in recent years.

In October 2021, Congress passed reforms limiting the public prosecutor's office access to financial information in cases of corruption, curtailing the ability of the office to operate effectively.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 1 / 4

Due process is limited due to a compromised judiciary and a corrupt and often inept police force, in which many officers have engaged in criminal activities including drug trafficking and extortion. The government has increasingly utilized the armed forces to combat crime and violence. Arbitrary arrests and detentions are common, as is lengthy pretrial detention.

The new criminal code entered into force in June 2020 despite criticism by human rights groups, including over the continued criminalization of insult and slander, definitions of torture and enforced disappearance that were inconsistent with international standards, and a litany of ambiguously worded provisions that could affect free association and assembly rights. According to the OHCHR, the code did contain alternative sentencing provisions that could alleviate severe overcrowding in the country's prisons.

The homicide rate has declined notably over the last decade, but violent crime and gang violence remain serious problems, and have prompted large-scale internal displacement and migration. More than 3,600 people were killed in 2021, resulting in a homicide rate of about 39 per 100,000 people.

In response to widespread violence, the government has empowered the Military Police of Public Order (PMOP) and other security forces to combat security threats, and these units often employ excessive force when conducting operations.

Prisons are overcrowded and underequipped, and prison violence remains rampant due in large part to pervasive gang presence. Despite the military taking control of prison security in late 2019, violence has continued to rise, leading to the murder of dozens of inmates.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 1 / 4

Violence and discrimination against LGBT+ people and Indigenous and Garifuna populations persist at high levels in Honduras. The Catrachas Lesbian Response Network (Catrachas), a local NGO, reported an impunity rate of 91 percent in the 373 murders of LBGT+ people between 2009 and 2020. According to the OHCHR, at least 28 LGBT+ people were killed in 2021, including at least five transgender people; Honduras has the world's highest rate of murders committed against transgender people.

In June 2021, the Inter-American Court of Human Rights (IACHR) issued a landmark ruling, determining that the government was responsible for failing to prevent, investigate, and prosecute the 2009 murder of Vicky Hernández, a transgender woman. This ruling also mandated that the government must allow transgender people to change their gender identity on personal documents and in public records, setting an important precedent in Central America.

According to the OHCHR and the UN Working Group on Business and Human Rights, lands inhabited by Indigenous and Afro-Honduran people are particularly vulnerable to expropriation for development projects without adequate prior consultation, and communities that contest such projects are unable to effectively assert their rights. In February 2021, the United Nations Working Group on Arbitrary Detentions called on the government to release eight human rights activists known as the Guapinol defenders, who had been detained for opposing an iron oxide mine inside a protected national park. The trial began in December, after more than two years of pretrial detention.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 8 / 16G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 2 / 4

While authorities generally do not restrict free movement, ongoing violence and impunity have reduced personal autonomy for the country's residents. Those living in gang-controlled territories face extortion, and dangerous conditions limit free movement and options for education and employment. The Office of the UN High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) estimated that over 247,000 people were internally displaced in Honduras at the end of 2021.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 2 / 4

Corruption, crime, and gang activity inhibits the ability to conduct business activities freely and dissuades entrepreneurs from establishing new businesses. Those who work in the transportation sector (taxi and bus drivers) are notable targets of gangs, but many are unable to flee for fear of retaliatory violence against themselves and their families. According to Human Rights Watch (HRW), the government uses force to prevent people from attempting to flee the country.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 2 / 4

Same-sex marriage remains illegal in Honduras. In 2019, a law came into force banning same-sex couples from adopting children despite the objection of activists, who called the bill superfluous and discriminatory.

Abortion is illegal in Honduras, including in cases of rape or incest, with criminal sanctions including imprisonment for those accused of terminating their pregnancies. Emergency contraception is also prohibited.

Domestic violence remains widespread, and most such attacks go unpunished. Honduras has among the highest femicide rates in the world, and these murders are rarely investigated. According to the Center for Women's Rights (CDM), a Honduran NGO, 342 women were killed in 2021.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 2 / 4

Lack of socioeconomic opportunities combined with high levels of crime and violence limit social mobility for most Hondurans and exacerbate income inequality. High youth unemployment and low levels of education help to perpetuate the cycle of crime and violence.

Human trafficking is a significant issue in Honduras, which serves as a source country for women and children forced into prostitution; adults and children are also vulnerable to forced labor in the agriculture, mining, and other sectors, and as domestic servants.

Hungary

Population: 9,700,000

Capital: Budapest

Freedom Status: Partly Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: After taking power in the 2010 elections, Prime Minister Viktor Orbán's Alliance of Young Democrats–Hungarian Civic Union (Fidesz) party pushed through constitutional and legal changes that have allowed it to consolidate control over the country's independent institutions, including the judiciary. The Fidesz government has since passed antimigrant and anti-LGBT+ policies, as well as laws that hamper the operations of opposition groups, journalists, universities, and nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) that are critical of the ruling party or whose perspectives Fidesz otherwise finds unfavorable.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- A June law banned the discussion of gender and sexual diversity in schools, the media, advertising, and other public places. The legislation, which conflates pedophilia with homosexuality and expressions of gender identity, was challenged by a European Commission infringement procedure in July. The government also initiated a referendum on further limiting LGBT+ representation in education, scheduled for 2022.
 - In July, an investigation by a team of international journalists, including the Hungarian outlet Direkt36, revealed that independent journalists, businessmen, lawyers, and politicians were the targets of secret surveillance conducted with the Israeli-made spyware, Pegasus. A Fidesz parliamentarian in November admitted the purchase of the spyware but denied allegations that it had been used on Hungarians.
 - In January, the Equal Treatment Authority—one of Hungary's most effective institutional mechanisms to fight discrimination—was abolished. Its powers were transferred to the Commissioner for Fundamental Rights, whose independence and effectiveness is highly questionable.
 - In February, the parliament voted to restructure institutions of higher education, allegedly to increase their competitiveness. Control of 11 public universities, along with billions of euros-worth of public assets, was transferred to quasi-public, government-controlled foundations whose boards are controlled by government allies.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 26 / 40A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 9 / 12*A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 3 / 4

The National Assembly elects both the president and the prime minister, meaning the democratic legitimacy of these votes rests largely on the fairness of parliamentary elections. The president's duties are mainly ceremonial, but they may influence appointments and return legislation for further consideration before signing it into law. The president is limited to a maximum of two terms. János Áder, a founding member of Fidesz, has been president since 2012, having won a second five-year term in 2017.

The prime minister holds most executive power. Viktor Orbán has been prime minister since 2010, winning reelection in 2014 and 2018.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 3 / 4

Voters elect representatives every four years to a 199-seat, unicameral National Assembly under a mixed system of proportional and direct representation (106 from single-member districts and 93 from compensatory party lists). The coalition of Fidesz and its junior partner, the Christian Democratic People's Party (KDNP), won the April 2018 parliamentary elections with 49.3 percent of the vote, capturing exactly two-thirds (133) of the seats. The far-right Movement for a Better Hungary (Jobbik) took 26 seats, a coalition led by the center-left Hungarian Socialist Party (MSZP) won 20 seats, and smaller parties and individuals divided the remainder.

An election monitoring mission performed by the Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE) acknowledged that the elections were generally well administered but noted an "overlap between state and ruling party resources," and added that opaque campaign finance, media bias, and "intimidating and xenophobic rhetoric" hampered voters' ability to make informed choices. While there was no evidence of electoral fraud that could have affected the elections' outcomes, some irregularities were reported, and the OSCE found that rigid adherence to formal regulations by the National Election Commission (NVB) had in effect limited access to legal remedy.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 3 / 4

Members of the NVB are nominated by the president and confirmed to nine-year terms by the parliament. There is no formal parliamentary debate or public consultation process to inform the selection of current NVB members, and observers have raised concerns about the body's impartiality. The OSCE 2018 election report noted the NVB's tendency to favor the ruling party when considering complaints over advertising materials. However, the NVB has on a few occasions ruled against Fidesz; they fined Prime Minister Orbán in 2018 for posting an election campaign video in a kindergarten classroom online without permission from the parents.

Nevertheless, Orbán's government has been largely successful in superseding impartiality requirements. In 2019, the Supreme Court effectively offset a long-standing neutrality requirement for state institutions during election campaigns.

The OSCE's 2018 assessment also indicated that citizens were not permitted to participate in election observation at polling places, and that "intimidating rhetoric by the government" discouraged public involvement in election-related activities. Numerous local election commissions operated without an opposition or nonpartisan presence during the 2018 polls.

Since 2010, Fidesz has used its parliamentary supermajority to redraw constituency boundaries in its favor. In November 2021, the Fidesz government amended the electoral law on registering permanent addresses, enabling individuals to create fictional permanent addresses, which could pave the way for possible voter tourism during the 2022 general elections.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 11 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 3 / 4

Political parties can organize legally, but they face some practical impediments to garnering popular support. Opposition parties are disadvantaged by the politicized distortion of the advertising market, including the market for the country's many billboards.

Individual politicians face smear campaigns in progovernment media outlets. Opposition parties faced bogus competitors in the 2014 and 2018 elections that may have been created by the government for the purpose of splitting the opposition vote. Authorities have also interfered with opposition figures' peaceful political activities.

The parliament further amended the electoral framework to require that political parties field candidates in 71 (instead of 27) single-member constituencies on a single list, forcing small opposition parties to combine and field one consolidated list of candidates.

Fidesz has dominated the political landscape since the 2010 election. The opposition remains fragmented, and opposition parties increasingly contend with obstacles and restrictions that detract from their ability to gain power through elections. These include unequal access to media, smear campaigns, politicized audits, and a campaign environment skewed by the ruling coalition's mobilization of state resources.

Opposition parties and candidates faced many obstacles in the 2018 parliamentary polls that diminished their ability to freely compete with Fidesz. The OSCE cited the "pervasive overlap between state and ruling party resources," which often made extensive government advertising campaigns indistinguishable from Fidesz promotional materials. Fidesz also disseminated its messages through the public broadcaster, which demonstrated "clear patterns of political bias" in its election-related programming. Further, the government maintains effective control of the State Audit Office (ÁSZ), which monitors campaign activities and party spending. In recent years, the ÁSZ has imposed sanctions only on opposition parties for financial irregularities, while condoning or overlooking problematic spending of state subsidies by Fidesz.

Nevertheless, Fidesz lost control of several cities, including the capital of Budapest, in 2019 local elections. In 2021, opposition parties banded together to organize primaries and select their candidates for the 2022 general elections.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 3 / 4

Individuals are largely able to participate in public affairs without encountering undue influence over their political choices. However, Fidesz has increasingly harnessed its members' political and economic power to sideline opposition groups and prevent them from presenting a meaningful challenge to its dominant position. The 2018 OSCE report found that Roma and other economically marginalized groups were vulnerable to pressure to vote for the ruling parties for "fear of losing access to the limited public works funds."

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 3 / 4

Women are underrepresented in political life, and the share of women in the parliament remains low. Only 26 of 199 National Assembly members and only 3 out of 14 cabinet ministers were women in 2021. Ruling party ministers and progovernment media occasionally make derogatory and sexist remarks toward women in the parliament.

Hungary's constitution guarantees the right of ethnic minority populations to form self-governing bodies, and all 13 recognized minorities have done so. Minorities can also register to vote for special minority lists—with a preferential vote threshold—in parliamentary elections. Minorities without a parliamentary mandate can send a "national minority advocate" to the parliament without voting rights. Only 1 of the 13 recognized minorities managed to elect a representative with voting rights to the National Assembly in 2018.

Roma have long been underrepresented in politics and government and have been the target of derogatory rhetoric from Fidesz members in recent years.

The political interests of LGBT+ people do not have successful representation in the parliament. In July 2021, Prime Minister Orbán announced that the 2022 polls would include a referendum on a "child protection" law, a euphemism for provisions of another recently passed, anti-LGBT+ law that bans any portrayal of LGBT+ people in materials meant for children.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 6 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 2 / 4

The governing coalition is effectively able to draft and implement laws and policies without undue interference. Fidesz continues to dominate governance through a parliamentary supermajority acquired by means of elections that were not fully competitive. Prime Minister Orbán, the party's leader, exerts considerable influence over the legislature. The ability of the opposition to check government activities remains limited.

Lawmakers have had their behavior in the National Assembly restricted in several ways since Fidesz won its third term. The speaker of the National Assembly has disciplined and fined lawmakers for occupying the lectern and bringing signs onto the floor.

In March 2020, in response to the COVID-19 pandemic, the government declared a "state of danger" and passed the widely denounced Authorization Act, conferring sweeping emergency powers to the executive. This emergency legal regime enabled the government to rule by decree and was prolonged several times in 2020 and 2021. During this time, the government used its power to seriously restrict civil liberties unrelated to public health. The Constitutional Court has failed to invalidate the questionable laws passed during the state of danger.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 2 / 4

Corruption remains a problem in Hungary, and instances of high-level government corruption have not been properly investigated. Prosecutors have also been reluctant to investigate long-standing allegations of the misuse of public development funds disbursed by the EU, despite the severity of the problem. Fidesz has also established broad control over auditing and investigative bodies, including the ÁSZ.

The December 2021 report of the Group of States against Corruption (GRECO) held that Hungary performed poorly in complying with its recommendations on implementing anticorruption measures in relation to members of the National Assembly, judges, and prosecutors. Transparency International has warned that a number of companies with close ties to the government are supported primarily by public funds.

In 2021, the Fidesz government continued to allocate a substantial amount of public funds for higher education to newly established foundations whose boards are controlled by government allies. In December, a high-ranking government official and member of Fidesz resigned from his post after being charged with accepting bribes.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 2 / 4

Hungary's Freedom of Information Act contains numerous exemptions, permits agencies to charge fees for the release of information, and is inconsistently enforced. In many cases, information is only made available as a result of litigation. In November 2020, the parliament amended the legal definition of what constitutes public funds. The new, narrower definition can hamper oversight of large amounts of public money.

Major legislation is frequently rushed through the parliament, leaving citizens and interest groups little time to provide feedback or criticism. Important proposals are hidden in long omnibus bills, and the government tends to submit substantial bills overnight. Journalists, meanwhile, have been curtailed from performing their duties while covering events in the parliament; the speaker prohibited audio and video recording in corridors surrounding the plenary chamber, entrances, and on-site cafeterias in October 2019.

When emergency laws were introduced in April 2020 because of the COVID-19 pandemic, the government significantly extended the deadline for fulfilling freedom of information requests. Critics denounced the extension as unconstitutional and a hindrance to effectively coping with the crisis. In April 2021, the Constitutional Court ruled that while exemptions from the normal deadlines must be limited and had to be justified in writing, extensions themselves were not unconstitutional. Critics have since complained that authorities have abused the exemptions. Since the beginning of the pandemic, the government has not released important epidemiological data to the public.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 43 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 10 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 2 / 4

The constitution protects freedom of the press, but Fidesz has undermined this guarantee through legislation that has politicized media regulation. While private, opposition-aligned media outlets exist, national, regional, and local media are increasingly dominated by progovernment outlets, which are frequently used to smear political opponents and highlight false accusations. Government advertising and sponsorships favor progovernment outlets, leaving independent and critical outlets in a financially precarious position.

The Fidesz governing coalition and their allies have worked to close or acquire critical media outlets. The 2016 closure of Hungary's largest independent daily, Népszabadság, represented a particularly serious blow to media diversity. In late 2018, around 470 progovernment media outlets were merged under the Central European Press and Media Foundation (KESMA). The government declared the merger to be of "national strategic importance" to exempt it from competition laws and won the court case that challenged the move. In 2020, Index, the country's largest independent news outlet, was also taken over by progovernment forces.

Changes to the "scaremongering" law in 2020, ostensibly to fight false or distorted information about COVID-19, ultimately challenged journalists' ability to secure reliable sources about the pandemic, as many individuals, especially health care workers, feared retaliation if they provided information publicly. In September 2020, the Media Council revoked the broadcasting license of Klubrádió, the country's biggest independent radio station, and forced it off the air in February 2021. Klubrádió has since operated only online, after a Hungarian court upheld the license revocation.

In July 2021, an investigation by a team of international journalists, including the Hungarian outlet Direkt36, revealed that independent journalists were surveilled by the Hungarian authorities using the Israeli-made spyware, Pegasus.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 3 / 4

The constitution guarantees religious freedom and provides for the separation of church and state, though these guarantees were weakened in the 2011 version of the constitution, the preamble of which makes direct references to Christianity. Constitutional amendments enacted in 2018 and 2020 reinforced those references, obliging all state organs to protect "Christian culture" and guaranteeing children's right to education based on Christian values.

The government has led xenophobic campaigns in recent years, which has anti-Muslim sentiment.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 2 / 4

The Fidesz-led government has maintained its efforts to bring schools and universities under close supervision. A gradual overhaul of the public education system raised concerns about excessive government influence on school curriculums, and legislation adopted in 2014 allows government-appointed chancellors to make financial decisions at public universities. The government has increasingly threatened the academic autonomy of well-established institutions, pulling support, interfering in their affairs, and landing progovernment supporters in leading positions. In 2018, the government revoked accreditation from all gender studies programs.

Progovernment media outlets commonly target activists, academics, programs, and institutions, often by calling them "Soros agents," referring to Hungarian-born financier and philanthropist George Soros. Legal changes enacted by the parliament in 2017 targeted the Central European University (CEU), a graduate school founded by Soros, by changing the requirements for foreign universities to operate in Hungary. The Court of Justice of the European Union (CJEU) later ruled the 2017 changes were incompatible with European Union (EU) law.

The Fidesz government also targeted the Hungarian Academy of Sciences (MTA), stripping the 200-year-old academy of its network of research institutions in 2019 and handing it over to a new governing body. The controversy later abated when the government agreed that the MTA would maintain much of its funding and operational autonomy. However, in 2020, the MTA elected a new president, well-known for his support of the Fidesz government.

In February 2021, the parliament voted to restructure institutions of higher education, allegedly to increase their competitiveness. Control of 11 public universities, along with billions of euros-worth of public assets, was transferred to quasi-public, government-controlled foundations.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 3 / 4

While freedom of expression is constitutionally protected, ongoing efforts to sideline voices and perspectives that authorities find unfavorable, including many found at the MTA, CEU, NGOs, and media outlets, have discouraged open criticism of the government and other politically sensitive speech.

In April 2020, at the onset of the COVID-19 pandemic, the parliament broadened the criminal code's definition of "scaremongering" to include the intentional spreading of false or distorted information during a state of emergency and extended the maximum prison sentence to five years.

In July 2021, an investigation by a team of international journalists revealed that journalists, businessmen, lawyers, and politicians were the targets of secret surveillance conducted with the Israeli-made spyware, Pegasus. A Fidesz parliamentarian in November admitted the purchase of the spyware but denied allegations that it had been used on Hungarians. Hungary has failed to fully execute a 2016 European Court of Human Rights ruling to incorporate effective institutional guarantees against improper surveillance.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 10 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

The constitution provides for freedom of assembly, and the government generally respects this right in practice. Fidesz's electoral victory in 2018 prompted large crowds to turn out for peaceful antigovernment demonstrations.

The government continued for months into 2021 the total ban on demonstrations introduced in 2020 to prevent the spread of COVID-19, despite permitting other forms of public events and gatherings.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 2 / 4

NGOs whose activities conflict with government priorities have come under continued pressure since Fidesz took power. Fidesz has instituted burdensome registration and reporting requirements for NGOs, and police have illegally raided NGO offices. Organizations assisting asylum seekers have also been subject to Hungary's "Stop Soros" laws in 2018, which heavily restricted the right to asylum and criminalized activities supporting asylum seekers. The CJEU ruled in November 2021 that the "Stop Soros" laws violated EU law.

The government continues to stigmatize NGOs as "foreign agents" or "Soros agents," and frequently scapegoats them for developments unfavorable to the government or deemed unpopular in the eyes of the public.

In 2020, the CJEU ruled that the 2017 Act on the Transparency of Organizations was incompatible with EU jurisprudence. In May 2021, in response to this judgment, a new law on the transparency of NGOs was adopted, requiring civil society organizations to submit to yearly financial audits by the ÁSZ should they report donations of more than 55,000 euros.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 4 / 4

Workers' rights to form associations and bargain collectively are generally recognized, but the 2012 Labor Code weakened the position of trade unions by curtailing their rights.

There are significant limitations on what can be considered a lawful strike, and the government has successfully blocked efforts to organize strikes in recent years. Union membership is low, trade unions are present in less than 25 percent of workplaces, and only 7 percent of workers belong to one.

F. RULE OF LAW: 10 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 2 / 4

Judicial independence remains a matter of concern. All 11 judges appointed to the Constitutional Court between 2010 and 2014 were named by the Fidesz government, and in 2016 a small opposition party was included in the nomination process for four other judges. Rulings in recent years on politically sensitive cases have favored government interests. High-ranking government officials and progovernment media berate judgments that are detrimental to Fidesz's interests.

The government has also interfered with the administration of the judicial branch in recent years. Significant powers are vested in the president of National Judicial Office (NJO), a position occupied by Tünde Handó from 2012 to 2020. The powers of the judicial self-governing body, the National Judicial Council (NJC), which supervises the president of the NJO, are relatively weak. Handó had been regarded as an ally of the Fidesz government in curtailing judicial independence and came into conflict with the NJC many times. He was appointed to the Constitutional Court in 2020 and was replaced by György Barna Senyei, another Fidesz ally.

The parliament sought to create a new administrative court system in 2018, which would have given the minister of justice broad powers to appoint and promote judges. Instead, in late December 2019, the government passed an omnibus bill effectively resurrecting the administrative court circuit. The legislation also restricted judicial interpretation of existing case law and allowed members of the Constitutional Court to assume a seat on the Supreme Court without nomination. In October 2020, Constitutional Court justice Zsolt András Varga, who had written several decisions favorable to the government, was elected president of the Supreme Court, despite the NJC's overwhelming opposition. In addition, administrative authorities were also given the chance to challenge unfavorable rulings directly before the Constitutional Court.

In July 2021, a junior judge who had been removed from her position challenged her dismissal through the European Commission, claiming it was politically motivated; she had challenged Hungarian asylum legislation before the CJEU. In November 2021, the CJEU ruled that exposing judges to disciplinary proceedings for referring questions to the EU court is incompatible with EU law and judicial independence.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 3 / 4

Due process rights are enshrined in the constitution and are generally respected. However, the former head of the NJO, Tünde Handó, was criticized for using her authority to transfer certain cases to courts of her choice. Litigation costs are relatively high, while access to legal aid is limited. There have been concerns about the quality of lawyers appointed for defendants who are unable or unwilling to retain legal counsel on their own.

Hungarian courts have shown some resistance to European judicial oversight on due process matters. In 2019, Hungary's Supreme Court sided with Prosecutor General Péter Polt in his efforts to limit the European Court of Justice (ECJ)'s oversight over a domestic criminal proceeding, in which a lower-level judge sought the ECJ's opinion on its compliance with EU regulations. Polt argued that the judge's request itself was unlawful. In November 2021, the CJEU found that EU law precludes such rulings of the Supreme Court.

In June 2021, the National Assembly passed a measure enabling defendants to claim a compensatory remedy for the excessive length of civil proceedings.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 3 / 4

Inadequate medical care and poor sanitation in the country's prisons and detention centers remain problems. The coronavirus presented further challenges to the safety of prisoners and prison staff. In 2020, the government created new facilities that added significantly more space in prisons and detention centers, bringing prison capacities under 100 percent.

Physical abuse by police is a problem, and there are systematic deficiencies in reporting, indicting, investigating, and sanctioning such conduct.

The rights of refugees and asylum seekers are routinely violated in Hungary, where frequent changes to asylum policy—including the uncontested declaration, by law, of Serbia as a safe third country—and the construction of barriers along the country's southern border made it nearly impossible for individuals to apply for asylum and receive protection. In the past, asylum seekers were frequently detained in poorly equipped transit zones, and few were recognized by Hungarian authorities as refugees. In May 2020, the CJEU ruled that Hungarian asylum procedures were incompatible with EU law and placing asylum seekers in the transit zones constituted unlawful detention. The government subsequently closed the transit zones but passed legislation requiring asylum seekers to present their documentation at diplomatic missions in other countries.

Despite EU court rulings, the government has maintained its stance; it continues to train special police units with wide powers to remove migrants from the country. The government has failed to discontinue the practice of "pushbacks," or the removal of asylum seekers to Serbia, in breach of EU law and in violation of the 2020 CJEU ruling. Consequently, in January 2021, the EU border control agency Frontex suspended its operations in Hungary.

Roma are Hungary's largest ethnic minority and face widespread discrimination, societal exclusion, violence, and poverty. Roma students continue to be segregated or improperly placed in schools for children with mental disabilities, a practice that led the European Commission to begin an infringement procedure in 2016. In early 2020, Prime Minister Orbán launched an anti-Roma campaign in response to a court awarding pecuniary damages to Roma pupils for school segregation in the town of Gyöngyöspata. That year, the National Assembly amended public education laws to prevent courts from awarding pecuniary damages for similar future claims. In September 2021, the newly appointed government commissioner for Roma relations publicly supported Orbán's reluctance to pay the damages.

Women in Hungary are subject to employment discrimination and tend to be underrepresented in high-level business positions.

The Fidesz government has been increasingly discriminatory towards LGBT+ people. In 2020, the parliament voted to end the legal recognition of gender identity, passed a law that severely restricts same-sex couples' ability to adopt children, and declared that the legal parents of a child are a woman and a man. Senior Fidesz politicians have made homophobic statements in public, and the government uses anti-LGBT+ rhetoric extensively. A June 2021 law banned the discussion of gender and sexual diversity in schools, the media, advertising, and other public places. The legislation, which conflates pedophilia with homosexuality and expressions of gender identity, was challenged by a European Commission infringement procedure in July. The government also initiated a referendum on further limiting LGBT+ representation in education, scheduled for 2022. Media and NGOs reported a rise in verbal and physical assaults against LGBT+ people since the 2021 law entered into force.

Antisemitism persists in Hungary, and the government's anti-Soros campaigns pander to individuals with those sentiments. Government representatives have sought to establish links between the spread of the COVID-19 pandemic and illegal migration.

In January 2021, the Equal Treatment Authority—one of Hungary's most effective institutional mechanisms to fight discrimination—was abolished. Its powers were transferred to the Commissioner for Fundamental Rights, whose independence and effectiveness is highly questionable.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 13 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

There are no significant restrictions on Hungarians' freedom of travel or their ability to change their place of residence or employment. However, a July 2019 law restricts the ability of students and parents to avoid the centralized school system and limits their access to alternative schools.

Movement restrictions and curfews related to the COVID-19 pandemic were instituted based on epidemiological data.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 3 / 4

Individuals have the right to own property and establish private businesses. However, the success of a business is somewhat dependent upon its owner's government connections. Businesspeople whose activities are not in line with the financial or political interest of the government are likely to face harassment and intimidation, and subject to increasing administrative pressure for a possible takeover.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 3 / 4

The constitution enshrines the concept of marriage as a union between a man and a woman. LGBT+ Hungarians are allowed to pursue civil unions, but they remain prohibited from adopting children.

In 2020, the National Assembly ended the legal recognition of gender identity for transgender people. As a result of the Ninth Amendment of the Fundamental Law, the constitution now stipulates that "the mother is a woman, the father is a man," and "Hungary protects the right of children to self-identify in line with their birth sex." Furthermore, the law effectively limits the right to adoption only to married couples, excluding single people and non-married partners—among them same-sex couples—from this right. Human rights NGOs condemned the amendments for stigmatizing and discriminating against LGBT+ people.

Domestic violence and spousal rape are illegal, but the definition of rape hinges on the use of force or coercion, not on lack of consent. NGOs describe government responses to violence against women as inadequate. In May 2020, the parliament rejected the ratification of the Istanbul Convention over what parliamentarians considered to be the destructive nature of the convention's gender ideology and the document's preferential treatment for asylum seekers on the basis of gender. While the government has opened victim support centers in recent years, there have been numerous media reports about domestic violence cases having fatal consequences. In October 2021, the government vetoed an EU strategy paper on children's rights and protection for its reference to the LGBT+ community.

Though the constitution defines life as beginning from conception, access to abortion is largely unrestricted.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 3 / 4

Hungary is a transit point, source, and to a lesser extent, destination for trafficked persons, including women trafficked for prostitution. Prevention, coordination efforts, and processes to identify and support victims remain inadequate, while trafficking investigations and enforcement of relevant laws are unreliable. In 2020, the government adopted a National Strategy against Human Trafficking for 2020–23, which included harsher sanctions for traffickers. The parliament also amended the relevant laws primarily to protect children against sexual exploitation.

A 2018 labor code amendment significantly raised the maximum hours of overtime employers are allowed to ask for per year.

Iceland

Population: 400,000

Capital: Reykjavik

Freedom Status: Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Iceland is a parliamentary democracy with a long history of upholding political rights and civil liberties. However, links between elected representatives and business interests remain a concern, as does the concentration of private media ownership.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- Parliamentary elections held in September were generally deemed free and fair, and resulted in the governing coalition—composed of the Independence Party (IP), the Left-Green Movement (LGM), and the Progressive Party—keeping its legislative majority. After several weeks of negotiations, the parties agreed to renew their coalition, allowing Prime Minister Katrín Jakobsdóttir to retain her position.
- Immediately following the election, a recount was conducted in Iceland’s north-west electoral district, reportedly due to very close initial results. The legality of the recount, which caused five candidates in that district to lose their seats to other candidates from the same parties, came into question after it was discovered that officials had failed to seal the ballots following the initial count; Parliament confirmed the recount’s validity in November.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 37 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 12 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The president serves as a largely ceremonial chief of state, is directly elected to a four-year term, and is not subject to term limits. President Guðni Thorlacius Jóhannesson was reelected in June 2020 with 92.2 percent of the vote.

The prime minister is the head of government. The leader of the ruling party or coalition usually becomes prime minister; the legitimacy of the prime minister rests primarily on the conduct of the parliamentary polls. The current prime minister, Katrín Jakobsdóttir of the LGM, first took office in 2017. The governing coalition led by Jakobsdóttir kept its majority following parliamentary elections in September 2021, and after several weeks of negotiations, agreed to continue working together for another term, with Jakobsdóttir retaining her position.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The 63-member unicameral Parliament is elected for four-year terms. The 2017 election was the third parliamentary election in four years, following the dissolution of the governing coalition in the wake of a scandal involving then prime minister Bjarni Benediktsson. The IP, the LGM, and the Progressive Party formed a coalition government after several weeks of talks.

Parliamentary elections were held in September, and saw the governing coalition keep its majority, with the IP winning 16 seats, the Progressive Party winning 13, and the LGM winning 8. After several weeks of negotiations, the parties agreed to renew their coalition to govern for another term.

The elections were generally considered free and fair, but were marked by procedural irregularities. In the country's northwest electoral district, extremely close results led to a recount the day after the election, resulting in five candidates—whose electoral victories had been announced earlier that day—losing their seats to five other candidates from the same parties. The legality of the recount, however, came into question after flaws in the district's vote counting process were discovered, including the officials' failure to seal the ballots following the initial count. Parliament confirmed the validity of the recount in November.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 4 / 4

The constitution, the election law of 2000, and related legislation establish a clear and detailed framework for conducting elections. Electoral laws are implemented impartially by a variety of national and regional authorities. However, the division of responsibilities between the relevant bodies is not always well defined.

Some of the candidates who lost their parliamentary seats following the recount of the September 2021 parliamentary election results announced plans to lodge a complaint with the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR) regarding alleged flaws in the counting process. The validity of the recount was confirmed by the parliament several weeks after the election took place.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 15 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 4 / 4

Political parties form and operate freely, rising and falling according to political developments and the will of the public. Several new parties contested the 2021 parliamentary election, though no representatives from those parties were elected.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 4 / 4

Opposition parties can gain power through free elections, as evidenced by the LGM's gains in 2017 and subsequent inclusion in the coalition government. However, the IP has only rarely lost its status as the largest party in Parliament and has been included in all but one ruling coalition government since 1991.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 3 / 4

No military, foreign, or religious entities exert undemocratic influence over voters' choices. However, some politicians and parties are closely linked with businesses, which in turn exert significant political influence. Fisheries Minister Kristján Þór Júlíusson is closely affiliated with Samherji, an Icelandic fishing company that was implicated in a scheme to bribe Namibian officials in 2019.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 4 / 4

All Icelandic citizens of adult age may vote in local and national elections. Foreigners can vote in municipal elections if they have been residents for at least five years, or three years if they are citizens of Nordic countries.

The interests of women and LGBT+ people are well represented in politics. Following the 2021 parliamentary election, women make up nearly 48 percent of Parliament; prior to the northwest district's recount, women were poised to hold more than 50 percent of the seats in Parliament, which would have made Iceland the first European country with more women legislators than men.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 10 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 4 / 4

The freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 3 / 4

While Iceland maintains robust anticorruption laws, public officials and major companies have engaged in corrupt behavior. Some officials implicated in corrupt or unsavory behavior have continued to serve in government.

In 2018, the Council of Europe's Group of States against Corruption (GRECO) published a report urging the government to strengthen regulations on accepting third-party gifts and criticizing the inadequate enforcement of conflict-of-interest rules. New conflict-of-interest legislation for ministers, their advisers, and permanent secretaries entered into force in January 2021 alongside a new law protecting whistleblowers that came into effect on the same date.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 3 / 4

Iceland made changes to its Information Act in 2013 to strengthen existing legislation on transparency and freedom of information. However, the act has been criticized by press freedom advocates as having weak provisions. In the past, public officials have sought to conceal information that may be embarrassing or implicate them in wrongdoing.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 57 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF 15 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 3 / 4

The constitution guarantees freedom of speech and of the press. The autonomous Icelandic National Broadcasting Service (RÚV) competes with private radio and television stations. Private media ownership is highly concentrated, with the media company 365 controlling most major private television and radio outlets, as well as free newspaper Fréttablaðið, which enjoys the highest circulation in the print market.

Reports emerged in May 2021 claiming that Samherji, a large Icelandic fishing company implicated in a 2019 corruption scandal, had tried to undermine and control public debate by spying on, intimidating, and attacking the credibility of journalists and civil society organizations that had reported on the corruption allegations. Samherji has also been accused of attempting to interfere in the Union of Icelandic Journalists' leadership elections.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 4 / 4

The constitution provides for freedom of religion, which is generally upheld in practice. About 60 percent of Icelanders belong to the Evangelical Lutheran Church.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

Academic freedom is respected, and the education system is free of excessive political involvement.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 4 / 4

People in Iceland may freely discuss personal views on sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 12 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

Freedom of assembly is generally upheld. In recent years, however, police have faced criticism for arresting or forcefully dispersing peaceful protesters under a broadly worded provision of the Police Law of 1996.

Icelandic authorities issued varying public-assembly restrictions based on the spread of COVID-19 during 2020 and 2021.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 4 / 4

Nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) may form, operate, and fundraise freely, and frequently inform policy discussions.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 4 / 4

The labor movement is robust, with more than 80 percent of all eligible workers belonging to unions. Most unions have the right to strike, except for the National Police Federation.

F. RULE OF LAW: 15 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 4 / 4

The judiciary is generally independent. Judges are proposed by an Interior Ministry selection committee, are formally appointed by the president, and are not subject to term limits. However, in 2017, former justice minister Sigríður Andersen interfered in the selection process for the Court of Appeals when she selected nominees who were considered unqualified to that court. In 2020, the Grand Chamber of the ECtHR ruled that the government violated the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR) when a defendant was judged by one of Andersen's nominees.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 4 / 4

The law does not provide for trial by jury, but many trials and appeals use panels of several judges. Prison conditions generally meet international standards.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 4 / 4

Police are generally responsive to incidents of violence. War and insurgencies are not a concern.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 3 / 4

The constitution states that all people shall be treated equally before the law, regardless of sex, religion, ethnic origin, race, or other status. However, in 2017, the European Commission against Racism and Intolerance (ECRI) noted an apparent rise in racist discourse in Iceland in recent years.

The rate of refugee recognition in Iceland is low compared to other northern European countries. In 2019, authorities deported an Albanian family—including a heavily pregnant woman who had received medical certification that she was unfit to fly—even though an appeal against their deportation was still under consideration. The family was ultimately removed from Iceland. The Directorate of Immigration has repeatedly been accused of using excessive force in carrying out deportations.

Immigrants who do not fluently speak Icelandic often face barriers to employment. Until 2019, noncitizens were prohibited from employment in the public sector.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 15 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

Freedom of movement is constitutionally protected and respected in practice. Although travel to and from Iceland has been affected by COVID-19-related regulations, a total lockdown has never been imposed.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 4 / 4

There is generally no undue government interference in business or private property ownership.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 4 / 4

Parliament unanimously passed a law legalizing same-sex marriage in 2010, and a 2006 law established full and equal rights for same-sex couples in matters of adoption and assisted pregnancy. A comprehensive law on transgender issues that was adopted in 2012 and expanded upon in 2019 simplified legal issues pertaining to gender reassignment surgery, ensured full and equal rights for transgender people, and guaranteed relevant health care. Additionally, Iceland allows individuals to change their legal gender identification on the basis of self-determination.

Abortion legislation was amended in 2019 to allow abortions through the 22nd week of pregnancy without requiring special approval.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 3 / 4

Citizens generally enjoy fair access to economic opportunity. However, the systematic exploitation of migrant workers, including underpaying employees and denying overtime, has become a significant problem in recent years, especially in the tourism industry. Employers who exploit workers have largely acted with impunity due to an inadequate government response. Wage theft is not punishable by law. There are reports of forced labor, primarily involving migrants, in the construction and service industries, and of forced sex work in nightclubs.

Iceland criminalized human trafficking in 2009. In the 2021 edition of its Trafficking in Persons Report, the US State Department reported that no one had been prosecuted or convicted of trafficking in Iceland since 2010. However, the State Department did note an increase in investigations into trafficking cases and in the identification of potential victims, as well as the creation of a centralized database for gathering victim information.

India

Population: 1,393,000,000

Capital: New Delhi

Freedom Status: Partly Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Note: The numerical scores and status listed above do not reflect conditions in Indian Kashmir, which is examined in a separate report. Freedom in the World reports assess the level of political rights and civil liberties in a given geographical area, regardless of whether they are affected by the state, nonstate actors, or foreign powers. Disputed territories are sometimes assessed separately if they meet certain criteria, including boundaries that are sufficiently stable to allow year-on-year comparisons. For more information, see the report methodology and FAQ.

Overview: While India is a multiparty democracy, the government led by Prime Minister Narendra Modi and his Hindu nationalist Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP) has presided over discriminatory policies and a rise in persecution affecting the Muslim population. The constitution guarantees civil liberties including freedom of expression and freedom of religion, but harassment of journalists, nongovernmental organizations (NGOs), and other government critics has increased significantly under Modi. Muslims, scheduled castes (Dalits), and scheduled tribes (Adivasis) remain economically and socially marginalized.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- In February, the government introduced new rules that made it easier for authorities to compel social media platforms to remove unlawful content. Among other removals during the year, Twitter was ordered to take down posts that criticized the government's handling of the COVID-19 pandemic.
 - Several states governed by the BJP passed or proposed "love jihad" laws meant to curb the alleged practice of Muslim men marrying Hindu women in order to convert them to Islam—a Hindu nationalist conspiracy theory. The legislation effectively created obstacles to interreligious marriage and came in the context of escalating threats and violence against the Muslim community.

- A media investigation found in July that Pegasus spyware had been detected on smartphones belonging to dozens of leading opposition politicians, activists, businesspeople, and journalists.
- Also in July, an 84-year-old Jesuit priest who had advocated for Adivasi rights died in custody, having been arrested on dubious terrorism charges under the Unlawful Activities Prevention Act (UAPA) in October 2020.
- Prominent opposition leaders were arrested in October while trying to visit the scene of a deadly incident in which a car in a government minister's convoy allegedly struck protesting farmers. The lengthy protests were organized in opposition to 2020 laws regulating the agricultural sector; Parliament ultimately repealed the laws in November.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 33 / 40 (-1)

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 12 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

Executive elections and selection procedures are generally regarded as free and fair. Executive power is vested in a prime minister, typically the leader of the majority party in the Lok Sabha (House of the People), and a cabinet of ministers nominated by the prime minister. They are appointed by the president and responsible to the Lok Sabha. Narendra Modi was sworn in for a second term as prime minister after the BJP's victory in the 2019 Lok Sabha elections.

The president, who plays a largely symbolic role, is chosen for a five-year term by state and national lawmakers. Current president Ram Nath Kovind, a Dalit and a veteran BJP politician, was elected in 2017.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

Members of the 543-seat Lok Sabha, the lower house of Parliament, are directly elected in single-member constituencies for five-year terms. Most members of the less powerful 245-seat upper house, the Rajya Sabha (Council of States), are elected by state legislatures using a proportional-representation system to serve staggered six-year terms; up to 12 members are appointed by the president.

The most recent Lok Sabha elections were held in seven phases in April and May 2019. The ruling BJP won 303 seats, giving its National Democratic Alliance coalition a stable majority of 353 seats. The opposition Indian National Congress party placed a distant second with 52 seats, for a total of 92 seats with its partners in the United Progressive Alliance. Smaller parties and independents took the remainder. Voter turnout was 67 percent. The elections were considered generally free and fair, though some violations of campaign rules were reported.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 4 / 4

Elections for the central and state governments are overseen by the independent Election Commission of India. The head of the commission is appointed by the president and serves a fixed six-year term. The commission is generally respected and had been thought to function without undue political interference. In recent years, however, its impartiality and competence have been called into question. In 2021, the commission's decisions concerning the timing and management of state elections in West Bengal, and its response to political violence ahead of those elections, were seen as biased toward the BJP.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 12 / 16 (-1)

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 3 / 4 (-1)

Political parties are generally able to form without interference, and a wide variety of parties representing a range of views and interests compete in practice. However, the ruling party has used various tools to limit campaigning by opposition parties. In October 2021, a number of opposition leaders were arrested in Uttar Pradesh as they attempted to visit the site of a lethal incident in which a car in a BJP cabinet minister's convoy allegedly struck protesting farmers.

The opaque financing of political parties is a serious source of concern. A system of electoral bonds, introduced in 2017, allows donor identities to be known to the State Bank of India but obscured from the public, and it has contributed to major fundraising advantages for the BJP. In addition, the government, through the Criminal Bureau of Investigation, has selectively pursued anticorruption investigations against opposition politicians while overlooking allegations against political allies.

Score Change: The score declined from 4 to 3 because the ruling BJP has disproportionately benefited from an officially sanctioned campaign-funding mechanism, and because the government has selectively used investigative bodies to target opposition parties.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 4 / 4

Different parties regularly succeed one another in government at the state and national levels. Modi and the BJP took power after the 2014 elections, ending 10 years of government by the Congress party, and were reelected by a wide margin in the 2019 parliamentary elections. In 2021, the BJP lost state elections in West Bengal, Tamil Nadu, and Kerala, but its coalition scored a victory in Assam.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 3 / 4

Political participation, while generally free, is hampered by insurgent violence in certain areas. Separately, some political actors have sought to inflame communal tensions with the goal of energizing their own supporters while potentially intimidating opponents.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 2 / 4

Women and members of religious and ethnic minorities vote in large numbers and have opportunities to gain political representation. In 2019, for the first time, the rate of women's voting in national elections equaled that of men. Quotas for the Lok Sabha ensure that 84 and 47 seats are reserved for the so-called scheduled castes and scheduled tribes, respectively. State assemblies and local bodies feature similar quotas for these historically disadvantaged groups, as well as for women representatives. However, marginalized segments of the population continue to face practical obstacles to full political representation. Muslim candidates notably won 27 of 545 seats in the 2019 Lok Sabha elections, up from 22 previously. However, this amounted to just 5 percent of the seats in the chamber, whereas Muslims make up some 14 percent of the population.

The political rights of India's Muslims continue to be threatened. In December 2019, Parliament adopted the Citizenship Amendment Act (CAA), which grants special access to Indian citizenship to non-Muslim immigrants and refugees from neighboring Muslim-majority states. At the same time, the government moved forward with plans for the creation of a national register of citizens. Many observers believe that the register's purpose is to disenfranchise Muslim voters by effectively classifying them as illegal immigrants. Importantly, Muslims disproportionately lack documentation attesting to their place of birth. Undocumented non-Muslims, meanwhile, would be eligible for citizenship through a fast-track process under the CAA.

The citizenship status of nearly two million residents of Assam remains in doubt after a citizens' register was finalized in the northeastern state in 2019. In 2021, detention camps continued to be constructed for those expected to be declared illegal residents. Assam is home to a significant Muslim minority population, as well as many people classified as members of scheduled tribes.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 9 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 4 / 4

India's elected leaders have the authority to set government policies, draft and enact legislation, and govern the country's territory in practice.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 2 / 4

Large-scale political corruption scandals have repeatedly exposed bribery and other malfeasance, but a great deal of corruption is thought to go unreported and unpunished, and the authorities have been accused of selective, partisan enforcement.

The Lokpal and Lokayuktas Act of 2014 created independent national and state bodies tasked with receiving complaints of corruption against public servants or politicians, investigating such claims, and pursuing convictions through the courts. However, the new agencies have been slow to begin operations; key positions remained unfilled during 2021, and little progress was made on investigations into graft allegations against public officials. Many fewer complaints were submitted to the Lokpal in 2021 than in previous years.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 3 / 4

The public generally has some access to information about government activity, but the legal framework meant to ensure transparency has been eroded in recent years. The 2014 Whistleblowers Protection Act was regarded as limited in scope, and subsequent amendments have drawn criticism for further undermining it.

Millions of requests are made annually under the 2005 Right to Information (RTI) Act, and responses have been used to improve transparency and expose corrupt activities. However, most requesters do not receive the information sought, including those seeking information about core government policies, and noncompliant officials generally go unpunished. Dozens of right-to-information users and activists have been murdered since the act's introduction, and hundreds have been assaulted or harassed. In 2019, Parliament adopted amendments to the RTI Act that placed the salaries and tenures of the central and state-level information commissioners under the control of the central government, potentially exposing the commissioners to political pressure. Vacancies also impede the workings of these commissions. In 2021, the information commissions of six states either lacked a head or were altogether inoperative.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 33 / 60D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 9 / 16*D1. Are there free and independent media? 2 / 4

The private media are somewhat vigorous and diverse, and investigations and scrutiny of politicians do occur. However, attacks on press freedom have escalated dramatically under the Modi government, and reporting has become significantly less ambitious in recent years. Authorities have used security, defamation, sedition, and hate speech laws, as well as contempt-of-court charges, to quiet critical voices in the media. Hindu nationalist campaigns aimed at discouraging forms of expression deemed “antinational” have exacerbated self-censorship. Online disinformation from inauthentic sources is ubiquitous in the run-up to elections. Separately, revelations of close relationships between politicians, business executives, and lobbyists, on one hand, and leading media personalities and owners of media outlets, on the other, have dented public confidence in the press. In 2021, leaked text messages indicated that a leading progovernment journalist had privileged access to top-secret information regarding national security.

Also during 2021, several journalists were arrested for their reporting on the farmer protests against government-backed agricultural reforms. A Muslim journalist, Siddique Kappan, remained in detention after his October 2020 arrest for attempting to cover the alleged gang rape of a Dalit woman. In addition to criminal charges, journalists risk harassment, death threats, and physical violence in the course of their work. Such attacks are rarely punished, and some have taken place with the complicity or active participation of police. Five deadly attacks on journalists were reported in 2021, according to the Committee to Protect Journalists—the highest figure for any country.

While Hindus make up about 80 percent of the population, the Indian state is formally secular, and freedom of religion is constitutionally guaranteed. However, a number of Hindu nationalist organizations and some media outlets promote anti-Muslim views, a practice that the government of Prime Minister Modi has been accused of encouraging. Attacks against Muslims and others in connection with the alleged slaughter or mistreatment of cows, which are held to be sacred by Hindus, continued in 2021. The BJP has faced criticism for failing to mount an adequate response to cow-related violence.

In 2020 individuals charged with orchestrating the illegal 1992 demolition of a prominent mosque in the state of Uttar Pradesh were acquitted by a special court, despite substantial evidence of their culpability. Among those exonerated were several high-profile members of the BJP. Modi had laid the foundation stone for a new Hindu temple on the site a month earlier, after a long-awaited 2019 Supreme Court judgment had permitted the construction of a temple there. The mosque had stood on the site for centuries prior to its unlawful destruction.

Legislation in several states criminalizes religious conversions that take place as a result of “force” or “allurement,” which can be broadly interpreted to prosecute proselytizers. Some states require government permission for conversion.

There was an apparent increase in attacks by Hindu extremists on India’s small Christian community in 2021, with aggressors reportedly motivated by hostility toward religious conversions and encouraged in their crimes by impunity or official complicity.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 2 / 4

Academic freedom has significantly weakened in recent years, as intimidation of professors, students, and institutions over political and religious issues has increased. Members of the student wing of the Hindu nationalist organization Rashtriya Swayamsevak Sangh (RSS)—from which the ruling BJP is widely regarded to have grown—have engaged in violence on campuses across the country, including attacks on students and professors. University administrators and faculty have been investigated, disciplined, or compelled to step down owing to their perceived political views. Academics face pressure not to discuss topics deemed sensitive by the BJP government, particularly India’s relations with Pakistan and conditions in Indian Kashmir.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 3 / 4

Personal expression and private discussion in India had long been open and free. However, colonial-era and other laws have increasingly been invoked in recent years to penalize perceived criticism of the government by ordinary citizens. Activists, Muslims, and members of other marginalized communities are routinely charged with sedition for criticizing the government and its policies.

Numerous sedition cases were initiated during 2021, including against a filmmaker who criticized the government’s pandemic-related policies and an environmentalist who used social media to share a document in support of the farmers’ protest movement. According to one organization, Article14, the number of sedition cases brought against individuals rose by an average of 28 percent annually between 2015 and 2020.

Online “troll armies” associated with the BJP routinely harass individuals—notably Muslims—and organizations for voicing criticism of the government and for engaging in behavior that supposedly deviates from Hindu orthodoxy.

During a surge in the COVID-19 pandemic in early 2021, the government ordered social media platforms to remove content that reflected poorly on its handling of the health crisis, citing its authority under the 2000 Information Technology (IT) Act. In February, the government successfully lobbied Twitter to block over 500 accounts, some of which were related to the farmers’ protests, and to make others invisible within India; Twitter employees within India were threatened with jail time if they did not comply. Also that month, the government introduced new regulatory rules that increased social media companies’ liability for material posted on their platforms and effectively encouraged more aggressive content restrictions.

A nationwide Central Monitoring System launched in 2013 is meant to enable authorities to intercept any digital communication in real time without judicial oversight, raising concerns about abusive surveillance practices. In 2021, a collaborative investigation by news organizations revealed that the government had likely planted Pegasus spyware on the mobile devices of more than 300 prominent individuals, including members of the main national opposition party, journalists, judges, businesspeople, and advocates for the rights of minority groups. The government repeatedly rejected demands for an official inquiry into the surveillance, although the Supreme Court took up the case.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 7 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 2 / 4

There are legal restrictions on freedom of assembly, including a provision of the criminal procedure code that empowers authorities to restrict public gatherings and impose curfews whenever “immediate prevention or speedy remedy” is required. State and central governments have repeatedly suspended mobile and internet service to curb protests in recent years, including in 2021.

While peaceful demonstrations take place regularly in practice, the national government and some state governments used assembly bans, internet blackouts, and live ammunition between December 2019 and March 2020 to quell widespread protests against the CAA and proposals to roll out a citizens' registration process across the country. Protesters, including students and academics, were detained, denied access to legal representation, and subjected to harsh treatment. In 2021, authorities at times used violence against participants in the farmers' protests.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 2 / 4

A wide variety of NGOs operate, but some, particularly those involved in the investigation of human rights abuses, continue to face threats, legal harassment, excessive police force, and occasionally lethal violence. Under certain circumstances, the Foreign Contributions Regulation Act (FCRA) permits the federal government to deny NGOs access to foreign funding, and authorities have been accused of using this power selectively against perceived political opponents. In 2020, Amnesty International shuttered its operations in India after authorities froze its bank accounts for alleged foreign funding violations. The FCRA licenses of more than 20,600 groups have been canceled in the past 10 years. Nearly 6,000 licenses were canceled in 2021 alone, including that of Missionaries of Charity, founded by Mother Teresa. Onerous reporting requirements for NGOs have reportedly hampered their efforts to respond to the COVID-19 pandemic.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 3 / 4

Although workers in the formal economy regularly exercise their rights to bargain collectively and strike, laws including the Essential Services Maintenance Act have enabled the government to ban certain strikes. Public employees have more limited organizing rights, and private employers are not legally obliged to recognize unions or engage in bargaining.

Mass strikes by farmers and others who objected to the government's 2020 agriculture laws continued into 2021 and were subject to clampdowns by security services.

F. RULE OF LAW: 8 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 2 / 4

The judiciary is formally independent of the political branches of government. Judges, particularly at the Supreme Court level, have traditionally displayed autonomy and activism in response to public-interest litigation. However, lower levels of the judiciary suffer from corruption, and the courts have shown signs of increasing politicization. Several key Supreme Court rulings in recent years have been favorable to the BJP, including the 2019 decision allowing the construction of a Hindu temple on the site of a historic mosque, and a 2020 decision to deny bail to a scholar and prominent critic of Modi who was charged with supporting a banned Maoist group.

In 2020, the president appointed a recently retired chief justice to the upper house of Parliament, a rare move that critics viewed as a threat to the constitutional separation of powers. In 2021, the government declined—apparently for political reasons—to appoint a number of senior judges who had been recommended by the Supreme Court body responsible for identifying appropriate judicial candidates, contributing to an accumulation of vacancies.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 2 / 4

Due process rights are not consistently upheld. Citizens face substantial obstacles in the pursuit of justice, including demands for bribes and difficulty getting the police to file a First

Information Report, which is necessary to trigger an investigation of an alleged crime. Corruption within the police force remains a problem. The justice system is severely backlogged and understaffed, leading to lengthy pretrial detention for suspects, many of whom remain in jail longer than the duration of any sentence they might receive if convicted.

A number of security laws allow detention without charge or based on vaguely defined offenses. The UAPA in particular has been used extensively in recent years to hold individuals for long periods without trial or specific evidence of guilt. The July 2021 death in custody of Stan Swamy, an ailing 84-year-old Jesuit priest and Adivasi rights advocate who had been detained since October 2020 for supposed terrorist activity, prompted renewed calls to repeal the UAPA.

Torture, abuse, and rape by law enforcement and security officials have been reported. A bill intended to prevent torture remains pending. Abuses by prison staff against people in custody, particularly those belonging to marginalized groups, are common. Figures reported to Parliament in August 2021 indicated that 5,569 people had died in judicial or police custody in the previous three years.

Security forces battling regional insurgencies continue to be implicated in extrajudicial killings, rape, torture, kidnappings, and destruction of homes. While the criminal procedure code requires that the government approve the prosecution of security force members, approval is rarely granted, leading to impunity.

The Maoist insurgency in the east-central hills region of India continues, though the annual number of casualties linked with it has decreased significantly since a peak in 2010. Among other abuses, the rebels have allegedly imposed illegal taxes, seized food and places of shelter, and engaged in abduction and forced recruitment of children and adults. Local civilians and journalists who are perceived to be progovernment have been attacked. Tens of thousands of civilians have been displaced by the violence and live in government-run camps.

Separately, in India's seven northeastern states, more than 40 insurgent factions—seeking either greater autonomy or complete independence for their ethnic or tribal groups—continue to attack security forces and engage in intertribal violence. Such fighters have been implicated in bombings, killings, abductions, and rapes of civilians, and they operate extensive extortion networks.

The constitution bars discrimination based on caste, and laws set aside quotas in education and government jobs for historically underprivileged scheduled tribes, Dalits, and groups categorized by the government as “other backward classes.” However, members of these populations face routine discrimination and violence, and the criminal justice system fails to provide equal protection to marginalized groups.

In parts of the country, particularly in rural areas, informal community councils issue edicts concerning social customs. Their decisions sometimes result in violence or persecution aimed at those perceived to have transgressed social norms, especially women and members of scheduled castes. Other forms of discrimination faced by women include workplace bias and sexual harassment. Indian participation in the international #MeToo movement against sexual harassment and assault has raised awareness of the problem, but women have also endured reprisals after reporting cases, and the movement's reach has largely been limited to the country's urban middle class.

In 2018, the Supreme Court ruled that the use of Section 377 of the Indian penal code to ban same-sex intercourse was unconstitutional, and courts have since pressed state and national authorities to combat discrimination against LGBT+ people. Such discrimination continues, however, sometimes including violence and harassment.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 9 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 2 / 4

The constitution grants citizens the right to reside and settle in any part of the territory of India. However, freedom of movement is hampered in some parts of the country by insurgent violence or communal tensions. Several states have recently enacted legislation requiring companies to reserve jobs for locals, limiting opportunities for interstate migration, although reports point to limited enforcement of the quotas thus far.

India's large internal migrant population suffered significant hardships during the early stages of the COVID-19 pandemic in 2020, as the government imposed an excessively harsh lockdown that offered little assistance or security to low-paid workers, millions of whom were consequently compelled to travel from cities to their native villages for lack of employment and essential supplies. During a new wave of the pandemic in 2021, migrants once again fled cities en masse in response to subnational lockdown measures and received minimal aid from official sources.

Although the legal framework generally supports the right to own property and engage in private business activity, property rights are somewhat tenuous for tribal groups and other marginalized communities, and members of these groups are often denied adequate resettlement opportunities and compensation when their lands are seized for development projects. While many states have laws to prevent transfers of tribal land to nontribal groups, the practice is reportedly widespread, particularly with respect to the mining and timber industries. Muslim personal status laws and traditional Hindu practices discriminate against women in terms of property rights and inheritance.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 2 / 4

Rape and other sexual abuse are serious problems, and scheduled-caste and tribal women are especially vulnerable. Mass demonstrations after the fatal gang rape of a woman on a Delhi bus in 2012 prompted the government to enact significant legal reforms, but egregious new rape cases continue to surface. The criminal justice system as well as prominent politicians have been repeatedly faulted for their poor handling of such matters.

Despite criminalization and hundreds of convictions each year, dowry demands surrounding marriage persist, sometimes resulting in violence. A 2006 law banned dowry-related harassment, widened the definition of domestic violence to include emotional or verbal abuse, and criminalized spousal sexual violence. However, reports indicate that enforcement is poor.

In 2020 and 2021, several BJP-led states passed or proposed laws meant to stem the alleged practice of "love jihad"—a baseless conspiracy theory according to which Muslims marry Hindu women with the goal of converting them to Islam. The legislation effectively created obstacles to interfaith marriages and raised the risk of legal penalties, harassment, and violence for interfaith couples.

Muslim personal status laws and traditional Hindu practices feature gender discrimination on matters such as marriage, divorce, and child custody. A Muslim divorce custom allowing a man to unilaterally and summarily divorce his wife was criminalized in 2019. The malign neglect of female children after birth remains a concern, as does the banned use of prenatal sex-determination tests to selectively abort female fetuses.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 2 / 4

The constitution bans human trafficking, and bonded labor is illegal, but estimates of the number of workers still affected by the practice range from 20 to 50 million. A 2016 law allows children below the age of 14 to engage in “home-based work,” as well as other occupations between the ages of 14 and 18. Children are not permitted to work in potentially hazardous industries, though the rule is routinely flouted. The use of child labor reportedly surged during the COVID-19 lockdowns, as schools were closed and families faced severe economic hardships. There have been reports of complicity by law enforcement officials in human trafficking.

Indonesia

Population: 275,100,000

Capital: Jakarta

Freedom Status: Partly Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Indonesia has made impressive democratic gains since the fall of an authoritarian regime in 1998, establishing significant pluralism in politics and the media and undergoing multiple, peaceful transfers of power between parties. However, the country continues to struggle with challenges including systemic corruption, discrimination and violence against minority groups, conflict in the Papua region, and the politicized use of defamation and blasphemy laws.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- In March and April, employees of the Corruption Eradication Commission were required to take a civics test to be inducted into the civil service; the test included religious, personal, and political questions. In May, it was announced that 75 employees had failed the test, with 51 dismissed and 24 allowed to be reinstated after an additional training program.
 - An October presidential regulation declared that Indonesia’s national, philosophical ideology, Pancasila, should be the guiding principle in research and innovation policy. Academics fear that authorities will use this decree to prohibit some types of research on grounds that they are incompatible with the ideological principles.
 - Amnesty International Indonesia reported an increase in attacks against human rights defenders throughout the year. In November, explosives were thrown at the home of the parents of human rights lawyer Veronica Koman. Koman lives in self-imposed exile in Australia due to criminal charges against her in Indonesia for circulating fake news and incitement—charges believed to be in retaliation for her human rights work in West Papua.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 30 / 40A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 11 / 12*A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The president is directly elected and serves as both head of state and head of government. Presidents and vice presidents can serve up to two five-year terms. Joko Widodo (known as “Jokowi”), the candidate of the Indonesian Democratic Party of Struggle (PDI-P), won a second term as president in the April 2019 election with 55.5 percent of the vote, defeating former general Prabowo Subianto, the Great Indonesia Movement Party (Gerindra) candidate.

Limited voting irregularities were reported, but the contest was largely considered free and fair by international election monitors. Prabowo’s campaign claimed the election was marred by widespread fraud and vote rigging, but this claim was rejected by the Constitutional Court in June 2019. Jokowi appointed Prabowo as his defense minister.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The House of Representatives (DPR), the main parliamentary chamber, consists of 575 members elected in 34 multimember districts. The 136-member House of Regional Representatives (DPD) is responsible for monitoring laws related to regional autonomy and may also propose bills on the topic. All legislators serve five-year terms with no term limits.

Legislative elections were held concurrently with the presidential race and local contests in April 2019. The PDI-P, led by former president Megawati Sukarnoputri, won 19.3 percent of the vote and 128 seats. Golkar, the party of former authoritarian president Suharto, won 85 seats with 12.3 percent of the vote, followed by Gerindra with 78 seats and 12.6 percent of the vote. Partai NasDem won 59 seats, while the Democratic Party (PD) of former president Susilo Bambang Yudhoyono won 54. Two Islamic parties—the National Mandate Party (PAN) and the United Development Party (PPP)—lost seats from the last parliament, returning with 44 and 19 seats, respectively. Two other Islamic parties, the National Awakening Party (PKB) and the Prosperous Justice Party (PKS), increased their representation, winning 58 and 50 seats, respectively.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 3 / 4

The legal framework for elections is largely democratic, and electoral authorities are mostly seen as impartial. However, some legal provisions are problematic. Under a 2012 law, the hereditary sultan of Yogyakarta is that region’s unelected governor.

A 2016 revision to the law governing local elections requires that the Election Oversight Agency (Bawaslu) and the General Elections Commission (KPU) conduct a binding consultation with the parliament and the government before issuing any new regulations or decisions. Activists expressed concerns that the rules would reduce electoral authorities’ independence.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 13 / 16B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 4 / 4

The right to organize political parties is respected, and the system features competition among several major parties. Four new parties contested the 2019 elections, two of them led by children of former president Suharto.

However, election laws favor large parties by increasing eligibility requirements. The 2017 General Elections Law requires new parties to undergo a “factual verification” process which involves confirming the accuracy of submitted documents on parties’ management, membership, and operations.

Communist parties are banned, and those who disseminate communist symbols or promote communism can face prison sentences of up to 12 years.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 4 / 4

Indonesia has established a pattern of democratic power transfers between rival parties since 1999. The most recent handover occurred in 2014, when the PDI-P returned to power after losing the previous two presidential elections. However, the 2017 General Elections Law requires parties or coalitions fielding presidential candidates to hold 20 percent of the seats in the parliament or 25 percent of the national vote in the most recent parliamentary election. The provision effectively bars new or smaller parties from fielding candidates in the presidential race.

B3. Are the people’s political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 2 / 4

While voters and candidates are generally free from undue interference, the military remains influential, with former commanders playing prominent, and growing roles in politics. President Widodo has increasingly appointed prominent military figures to positions within his cabinet, enabling people with a military background to further shape public discourse and policy. Intimidation by nonstate actors—including Islamist groups—remains a problem, as is the growing use of online propaganda in political campaigns.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 2 / 4

Women enjoy full political rights, and political parties are also subject to 30 percent gender quotas for steering committees and candidates. However, they remain underrepresented in electoral politics, holding 21 percent of the DPR’s seats, though they do sometimes win leadership positions. Puan Maharani, daughter of former president Megawati and granddaughter of former president Sukarno, was elected in 2019 as the first woman speaker of the parliament.

Ethnic Chinese are poorly represented in politics, and often abstain from voting. However, two parties with ethnic Chinese leaders, the Indonesian Solidarity Party (PSI) and United Indonesian Party (Perindo), contested the April 2019 elections. Both parties fell below the 4-percent threshold to earn seats.

Some local governments have discriminated against religious minorities by restricting access to identification cards, birth certificates, marriage licenses, and other bureaucratic necessities, limiting their political rights and electoral opportunities.

LGBT+ people are also poorly represented in electoral politics.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 6 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 3 / 4

Elected officials generally determine the policies of the government, though national authorities have faced difficulties in implementing their decisions due to resistance at the local level. Separately, observers have warned that the military is regaining its influence over civilian governance and economic affairs. These concerns increased following the beginning of the COVID-19 pandemic in 2020, as military generals served as the heads of both the National Task Force for COVID-19 Management and the Ministry of Health.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 1 / 4

Corruption remains endemic in the national and local legislatures, civil service, judiciary, and police. The most common offenses are embezzlement, bribery, and extortion. Acrimony between rival agencies—particularly the Corruption Eradication Commission (KPK) and the National Police—has hindered anticorruption efforts, and civilian investigators have no jurisdiction over the military.

In 2019, the parliament passed legislation weakening the KPK; requiring all employees to join the civil service and investigators to be from the National Police. As part of their induction into the civil service, in March and April 2021 KPK employees were required to take a civics test that also included religious, personal, and political questions. In May, it was announced that 75 KPK employees had failed the test, with 51 dismissed and 24 allowed to be reinstated after an additional training program.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 2 / 4

Although civil society groups can comment on and influence pending policies or legislation, government transparency is limited by broad exemptions in the freedom of information law and obstacles such as a 2011 law that criminalizes leaking vaguely defined “state secrets” to the public.

The 2020 omnibus bill included both new legislation and revisions to 79 existing laws. Critics argued that the government did not adequately consult the public on the content of the law; they claim consultations were deliberately avoided to sow confusion over the law’s provisions. Its passage was also rushed through the parliament. The Constitutional Court largely agreed, ruling the law conditionally unconstitutional in November 2021 due to flaws in the drafting process. The ruling did not revoke the laws passed as a part of the bill but required the government to redraft the legislation with greater adherence to legislative processes, including public consultations.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 29 / 60D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 9 / 16*D1. Are there free and independent media? 3 / 4

Indonesia hosts a vibrant and diverse media environment, though legal and regulatory restrictions hamper press freedom. The 2008 Law on Electronic Information and Transactions (known as UU ITE) extended libel to online media and criminalized the distribution or accessibility of information or documents that are “contrary to the moral norms of Indonesia,” or involve gambling, blackmail, or defamation. This legislation has been used to arrest journalists carrying out legitimate reporting.

Foreign journalists visiting Papua and West Papua continue to report bureaucratic obstacles and deportations. Internet blackouts during protests as well as self-censorship have inhibited press activity. Journalists covering sensitive subjects—including LGBT+ issues, organized crime, and corruption—face harassment, violence, and threats. In June 2021, the chief editor of an online news site in Sumatra was shot and killed while investigating a local night club’s links to organized crime. In March, a journalist from the news outlet Tempo was attacked and detained while investigating a story on corruption in Surabaya. Other journalists have reported attacks such as arson on their cars and homes.

There are growing concerns that the government has used the COVID-19 pandemic to tighten restrictions on journalists, including criminalizing criticism of the government. A 2020 directive issued by the Criminal Investigation Agency allows for up to 18 months of imprisonment for “hostile information about the president and government” or disinformation about the coronavirus.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 1 / 4

Indonesia officially recognizes Islam, Protestantism, Roman Catholicism, Hinduism, Buddhism, and Confucianism. Individuals may leave the “religion” section on their identity cards blank, but those who do—including adherents of unrecognized faiths—often face discrimination. Atheism is not accepted legally, and the criminal code contains provisions against blasphemy, penalizing those who “distort” or “misrepresent” recognized faiths.

National and local governments often fail to protect religious minorities and exhibit bias in investigations and prosecutions. Building a new house of worship requires the signatures of 90 congregation members and 60 local residents of different faiths. The government is redrafting the 2006 Joint Ministerial Decision on the creation and administration of houses of worship, which has been cited as a driver religious conflict. Researchers at the University of Melbourne reported that between 2015 and 2020, there were at least 122 recorded cases of communities across the country opposing the establishment of new places of worship.

Violence and intimidation against Ahmadi and Shiite communities persists. However, in December 2020, the newly appointed religious affairs minister, Yaqut Cholil Qoumas—chair of the Islamic group Nahdlatul Ulama’s youth wing, Ansor—pledged to protect Shia and Ahmadiyya minorities and, promote dialogue among different religious groups. In September 2021, an Ahmadiyya mosque in West Kalimantan was destroyed by a mob of local residents; Qoumas strongly condemned the attack.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 2 / 4

Threats to academic freedom have increased in recent years. Hard-line groups and others are known to threaten discussions on LGBT+ matters, interfaith issues, Papua, police violence, and the 1965–66 anticommunist massacres.

Academics have been charged with defamation and removed from their posts for criticism of public officials. In October 2021, President Jokowi pardoned an academic who had been jailed for defamation. The academic had been arrested after commenting on university hiring processes, without naming any particular hires, in a private WhatsApp group chat with other academics.

Public academic discussions on Papua and West Papua have been canceled and organizers surveilled and threatened. Students, student union leaders, and others involved in campus protests against anti-Papuan racism continued to face intimidation, arrest, and treason charges, with authorities linking the antiracism protests to secessionist movements.

The government conducts significant oversight of the university and research sector. University rectors have reported pressure from the Ministry of Education, Culture, Research and Technology to curb student protests. The minister of education’s vote accounts for 35 percent of the total vote share in the election of university rectors; candidates seek to maintain a positive relationship with the ministry and the minister in order to be selected.

An October 2021 presidential regulation declared that Indonesia’s national, philosophical ideology, Pancasila, should be the guiding principle in research and innovation policy. Academics fear that authorities will use this decree to prohibit some types of research on grounds that they are incompatible with the ideological principles. That same month, former president Megawati Sukarnoputri was appointed head of the Board of Directors of the Agency for Research and Innovation. Critics have questioned the legitimacy and motives of the appointment of a politician without an academic background to the leadership of the agency.

Laws against blasphemy, defamation, and certain other forms of speech sometimes inhibit the expression of personal views on sensitive topics, especially online. In 2020, the National Police issued instructions to surveil activists online and engage in creating progovernment counternarratives. Research from the Indonesia Survey Institute and the survey firm Indikator Politik Indonesia have both found that these laws and state practices have had a chilling effect with Indonesians, who reported increasing fears over expressing their opinions online.

Ministerial Regulation 5 (MR5), which came into force in November 2020, requires private digital services and platforms to register with the Ministry of Communication and Information Technology (MICT), or else risk being blocked. Critics allege that the regulation poses significant privacy and freedom of speech risks and provides a tool for the government to censor legitimate speech by placing undue burdens on platforms and services used in Indonesia.

In September, Indonesia's Coordinating Minister for Maritime Affairs and Investment Luhut Binsar Panjaitan filed defamation complaints against the former and current coordinators of the Commission for the Disappeared and Victims of Violence (KontraS), one of Indonesia's oldest and most well-respected human rights organizations. Panjaitan complained that a video published on YouTube made by KontraS, which claims that military operations in Papua are intended to protect mining operations, connects Panjaitan and mining companies in the region, suggesting his involvement in corrupt activities. The President's chief of staff, named Moeldoko, also made a defamation complaint in September against Indonesia Corruption Watch (ICW) because of an ICW study that examined potential corruption in the manufacture and distribution of Ivermectin, a drug to combat the COVID-19 illness. The ICW alleged that Moeldoko and other party members and public officials improperly promoted and distributed Ivermectin as a COVID-19 drug to the economic benefit of their associates and families.

Civil servants are subject to stringent restrictions on online activity. In late 2019, the government formed a task force to review "radical" social media comments from civil servants, including speech believed to insult or criticize the official Pancasila ideology, the state motto, the constitution, or the government. The decree governing this new task force also prohibits civil servants from joining organizations deemed to insult the country's governing principles.

The government is known to surveil and detain individuals who discuss separatism in Maluku or Papua or fly the Papuan Morning Star or the Republic of South Maluku (RMS) flag. In May 2021, Victor Yeimo, a spokesman for the West Papua National Committee, was arrested and charged with treason for a 2019 statement made at a protest where he called for a referendum on independence.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 6 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 2 / 4

Freedom of assembly is usually upheld, and peaceful protests are common. However, assemblies addressing sensitive political topics—such as the 1965–66 massacres or regional separatism—are regularly dispersed, with participants facing intimidation or violence from vigilantes or police. Eight students in Jayapura were charged with treason in December 2021 after a peaceful protest during which the Morning Star flag was raised. COVID-19 restrictions have also severely limited the space for protests.

During nationwide protests in 2019, security forces' actions injured 700 people and killed 8 people.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights– and governance-related work? 2 / 4

A 2013 law requires nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) to register with the government and submit to regular reviews of their activities. The law also targets NGOs that commit blasphemy or espouse ideas that conflict with the official Pancasila ideology, such as atheism and communism. The government can dissolve noncompliant organizations without judicial oversight.

Authorities and influential Muslim organizations continue to intimidate and harass LGBT+ people and activists. The cumulative effect of this campaign has been to drive the LGBT+ activist community underground and to hamper groups seeking to provide services to LGBT+ people.

Activists working to address human rights violations in Papua and to expose endemic corruption in the country are often targeted by authorities or progovernment supporters. Amnesty International Indonesia reported an increase in attacks against human rights defenders in 2021. In November, explosives were thrown at the home of the parents of human rights lawyer Veronica Koman. Koman lives in self-imposed exile in Australia due to criminal charges against her in Indonesia for circulating fake news and incitement—charges believed to be in retaliation for her human rights work in West Papua.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 2 / 4

Workers can join independent unions, bargain collectively, and with the exception of civil servants, stage strikes. Strikes can be unduly delayed by obligatory arbitration processes, and laws against antiunion discrimination and retaliation are not well enforced. As a result of a memorandum of understanding signed in 2018, the military can assist police in dealing with strikes and demonstrations.

The 2020 omnibus bill came into effect in 2021, challenging workers' rights by abolishing sectoral minimum wages and limiting labor unions' negotiating power, as wages are now set by geography rather than by sector. The bill considerably extended outsourcing permissions for companies. It also reversed hard-won labor protections and reduced job security, by decreasing the number of statutory days off from two to one per week. The government's lack of consultation with existing unions over the law and its opacity about its contents demonstrated the narrowing of space for trade unions and labor organizations.

F. RULE OF LAW: 5 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 2 / 4

The judiciary has demonstrated its independence in some cases, particularly in the Constitutional Court. However, the court system remains plagued by corruption and other weaknesses. Judicial decisions can also be influenced by religious considerations.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 1 / 4

Police reportedly engage in arbitrary arrests and detentions, particularly of protesters or activists suspected of separatism. Existing safeguards against coerced confessions are ineffective, and defendants are sometimes denied proper access to legal counsel, including in death penalty cases.

A number of districts and provinces have ordinances based on Sharia (Islamic law) that are unconstitutional and contradict Indonesia's international human rights commitments.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 1 / 4

Deadly confrontations between security forces remain common in Papua and West Papua, with security forces responsible for at least 84 unlawful killings of civilians between 2018 and March 2021. In April 2021, the government designated Papuan "armed criminal groups" as terrorist organizations, intensifying military operations in the region following the death of a brigadier general in Papua's Central Highlands that month—the first general killed in over 50 years of conflict.

Military service members accused of crimes against civilians are tried in military courts, which lack impartiality and often impose light punishments, even for serious human rights violations. Torture by law enforcement agencies is not explicitly criminalized.

Prisons are overcrowded and corrupt, leading to riots, protests, fires, and jailbreaks. Violence related to natural resource extraction remains a problem.

In Aceh, regulations under Sharia permit provincial authorities to use caning as punishment for offenses related to gambling, alcohol consumption, and illicit sexual activity.

Papuans face racial discrimination, including from authorities and political parties. In January 2021, Ambronicus Nababan, a former party official and active supporter of President Jokowi, was detained in police custody following a social media post depicting Papuan activist Natalius Pigai, a former commissioner of Indonesia's National Commission on Human Rights (Komnas HAM), alongside a photo of a gorilla.

Some national laws and numerous local ordinances discriminate against women either explicitly or in effect. LGBT+ people suffer from widespread discrimination, legal discrimination in some regions, inflammatory and discriminatory rhetoric from authorities, and attacks by hardline Islamist groups, sometimes with support from local authorities. In January 2021, two gay men were publicly flogged in Aceh, receiving 77 lashes each after vigilantes broke into their room and allegedly caught them engaged in sexual activity. Ethnic Chinese, who make up approximately one percent of the population but reputedly hold much of the country's wealth, are also vulnerable to harassment.

Indonesia grants temporary protection to refugees and migrants but is not party to the 1951 Refugee Convention and does not accept refugees for asylum and resettlement.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 9 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 3 / 4

The freedoms to travel and change one's place of residence, employment, or higher education are generally respected. However, Indonesians engaging in these administrative processes are sometimes vulnerable to bribery.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 2 / 4

A robust private sector exists, but business activity is hampered by corruption. Property rights are sometimes threatened by state appropriation and licensing of communally owned land to companies, particularly impacting indigenous communities and others with unregistered or customary land rights. Women have relatively poor rights to marital property, as well. Ethnic Chinese in Yogyakarta face restrictions on private property ownership under a 1975 decree that contravenes national laws.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 2 / 4

Abortion is illegal except to save a woman's life or in instances of rape. Adults over the age of 15 must have corroboration and witnesses to bring rape charges. The minimum age for marriage is set at 19. Marriages must be conducted under the supervision of a recognized religion, which obstructs interfaith marriages.

Local Sharia-based ordinances in many districts impose restrictions on dress, gambling, alcohol use, and sexual activity; these ordinances are disproportionately enforced against women and LGBT+ people. Public displays of affection are banned in Aceh Province under Sharia-based regulations.

In February 2021, the government issued a new regulation banning state schools from making religious attire part of the school dress code, effectively allowing students and teachers to decide whether to wear the hijab as part of their school uniform. However, the Supreme Court struck down the joint ministerial decree in May, claiming the government had failed to follow proper procedures and citing contradictions in existing law.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 2 / 4

National, provincial, and local authorities set standards for working conditions and compensation, but enforcement is inconsistent. Indonesian workers are trafficked abroad, including women in domestic service and men in the fishing industry.

Iran

Population: 85,000,000

Capital: Tehran

Freedom Status: Not Free

Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: The Islamic Republic of Iran holds elections regularly, but they fall short of democratic standards due in part to the influence of the hard-line Guardian Council, an unelected body that disqualifies all candidates it deems insufficiently loyal to the clerical establishment. Ultimate power rests in the hands of the country's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, and the unelected institutions under his control. These institutions, including the security forces and the judiciary, play a major role in the suppression of dissent and other restrictions on civil liberties.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- Judicial chief Ebrahim Raisi was elected president in June, winning 62 percent of the vote in a contest marred by the disqualification or withdrawal of major challengers and official pressure on the media to refrain from critical reporting. Turnout stood at 48.8 percent, the lowest for a presidential poll in the Islamic Republic's history.

- In July, the parliament began considering a bill that would criminalize the use and distribution of virtual private networks (VPNs) and require internet users to provide their legal identities to access online services, among other measures. The bill remained under consideration but was not passed by year's end.
- Demonstrators rallied to protest water shortages and poor living conditions in several provinces in the second half of July, with activity centered in the southern province of Khuzestan. Authorities used lethal force to disperse the protests, causing at least 11 deaths.
- In November, the Guardian Council ratified a law restricting access to abortion and banning the distribution of free contraceptives. The new law can be used on an "experimental" basis for seven years.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 4 / 40 (-2)

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 2 / 12 (-1)

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4 (-1)

The supreme leader, who has no fixed term, is the highest authority in the country. He is the commander in chief of the armed forces and appoints the head of the judiciary, the heads of state broadcast media, and the Expediency Council—a body tasked with mediating disputes between the Guardian Council and the parliament. He also appoints six members of the Guardian Council; the other six are jurists nominated by the head of the judiciary and confirmed by the parliament, all for six-year terms. The supreme leader is appointed by the Assembly of Experts, which monitors his work. However, in practice his decisions appear to go unchallenged by the assembly, whose proceedings are kept confidential. The current supreme leader, Ali Khamenei, succeeded Islamic Republic founder Ruhollah Khomeini in 1989.

The president, the second-highest-ranking official in the Islamic Republic, appoints a cabinet that must be confirmed by the parliament. He is elected by popular vote for up to two consecutive four-year terms. Judicial head Ebrahim Raisi won the presidency in June 2021 with 62 percent of the vote, in a contest marred by manipulation on the part of the establishment. The Guardian Council rejected most of the nearly 600 aspiring candidates—including 40 women—in May 2021, approving only 7 applicants. Among those rejected were outgoing first vice president Eshaq Jahangiri, a reformist, and former parliament speaker Ali Larijani, a conservative. Three approved candidates dropped out several days before the poll.

The contest was also affected by official pressure on the media, with journalists told to refrain from issuing reports criticizing the poll or Raisi. Turnout was the lowest in a presidential election in the Islamic Republic's history, at 48.8 percent.

Score Change: The score declined from 1 to 0 because the June presidential election featured unusually heavy regime manipulation to ensure the victory of President Raisi, including pressure on the media and the disqualification or withdrawal of all major challengers, which resulted in a lack of competition and record-low voter turnout.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 1 / 4

Members of the 290-seat parliament are elected to four-year terms. Elections for the body were held in February 2020, with most seats going to hard-liners and conservatives loyal to the supreme leader. Ahead of the vote, the Guardian Council disqualified more than 9,000 of the 16,000 people who had registered to run, including large numbers of reformist and moderate candidates. Voter turnout, the lowest for parliamentary elections in the history of the Islamic Republic at 42.6 percent, was likely depressed by factors including the mass disqualifications and the announcement of the first coronavirus cases just two days before the balloting. The outbreak was believed to have begun weeks earlier, raising suspicions that the authorities delayed disclosing it for political reasons; Khamenei denounced foreign “propaganda” for supposedly exaggerating the health threat to frighten voters.

Elections for the Assembly of Experts, a group of 86 clerics chosen by popular vote to serve eight-year terms, were last held in 2016. Only 20 percent of the would-be candidates were approved to run, a record low. A majority of the new assembly ultimately chose hard-line cleric Ahmad Jannati, head of the Guardian Council, as the body’s chairman. Jannati was reelected to the Assembly of Experts’ chairmanship in February 2021.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 1 / 4

The electoral system in Iran does not meet international democratic standards. The Guardian Council, controlled by hard-line conservatives and ultimately by the supreme leader, vets all candidates for the parliament, the presidency, and the Assembly of Experts. The council typically rejects candidates who are not considered insiders or deemed fully loyal to the clerical establishment, as well as women seeking to run in the presidential election. As a result, Iranian voters are given a limited choice of candidates.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 2 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 0 / 4

Only political parties and factions loyal to the establishment and to the state ideology are permitted to operate. Reformist groups have come under increased state repression, especially since 2009, and affiliated politicians are subject to arbitrary detention and imprisonment on vague criminal charges.

While some space for shifts in power between approved factions within the establishment has existed in the past, the unelected components of the constitutional system represent a permanent barrier to opposition electoral victories and genuine rotations of power. In May 2021, for example, then outgoing first vice president Jahangiri, who is considered a reformist, was disqualified from running for president.

Top opposition leaders face restrictions on their movement. Mir Hossein Mousavi, Zahra Rahnava, and Mehdi Karubi—leaders of the reformist Green Movement, whose protests were violently suppressed following the disputed 2009 presidential election—have been under house arrest without formal charges since 2011. Restrictions on Mousavi and Karubi have sometimes been loosened in recent years, however; Mousavi and Karubi were allowed to meet relatives in 2017, while Karubi made a public speech in October 2021. Reformist former president Mohammad Khatami is the subject of a media ban that prohibits the press from mentioning him and publishing his photos. Former hard-line president Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, who fell out of favor for challenging Khamenei, was barred from running in the 2017 and 2021 presidential elections.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 0 / 4

The choices of both voters and politicians are heavily influenced and ultimately circumscribed by Iran's unelected state institutions and ruling clerical establishment.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 1 / 4

Men from the Shiite Muslim majority population dominate the political system. Women remain significantly underrepresented in politics and government. While President Raisi appointed Ensieh Khazali as vice president for women and family affairs in September 2021, he nominated no women to serve in the cabinet the month before. No women candidates have ever been allowed to run for president.

Five seats in the parliament are reserved for recognized non-Muslim minority groups: Jews, Armenian Christians, Assyrian and Chaldean Christians, and Zoroastrians. However, members of non-Persian ethnic minorities and especially non-Shiite religious minorities are rarely awarded senior government posts, and their political representation remains weak.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 0 / 12 (-1)C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 0 / 4 (-1)

The elected president's powers are limited by the supreme leader and other unelected authorities. The June 2021 presidential election was tightly controlled by the regime, further reducing the democratic legitimacy of the executive.

The powers of the elected parliament are similarly restricted by the supreme leader and the unelected Guardian Council, which must approve all bills before they can become law. The council often rejects bills it deems un-Islamic. Nevertheless, the parliament has been a platform for heated political debate and criticism of the government, and legislators have frequently challenged presidents and their policies.

Score Change: The score declined from 1 to 0 because the tightly controlled June presidential election further reduced the democratic legitimacy of the executive branch and demonstrated the dominance of the state's unelected institutions.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 0 / 4

Corruption remains endemic at all levels of the bureaucracy, despite regular calls by authorities to tackle the problem. Powerful actors involved in the economy, including the Islamic Revolutionary Guard Corps (IRGC) and bonyads (endowed foundations), are above scrutiny in practice, and restrictions on the media and civil society activists prevent them from serving as independent watchdogs to ensure transparency and accountability.

The judiciary launched an anticorruption crackdown in 2019, which subsequently triggered high-profile prosecutions of former politicians and court officials. Raisi also made corruption a major theme of his 2017 and 2021 presidential campaigns. However, authorities have resisted recent scrutiny on official corruption; in July 2021, four journalists working for state-run news sites received false news and defamation convictions for reporting on suspected corruption within the Oil Ministry but reportedly received no prison terms.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 0 / 4

The transparency of Iran's governing system is extremely limited in practice, and powerful elements of the state and society are not accountable to the public. A 2009 access to information law, for which implementing regulations were finally adopted in 2015, grants broadly worded exemptions allowing the protection of information whose disclosure would conflict with state interests, cause financial loss, or harm public security, among other stipulations.

The ruling establishment has actively suppressed or manipulated information on important topics. For example, the IRGC initially denied involvement in the destruction of a Ukrainian passenger jet in January 2020. Several days after the incident, it admitted its personnel mistook the plane for a missile and shot it down.

The government also engaged in censorship to conceal the extent of the COVID-19 outbreak when it was detected in 2020, reportedly telling journalists to rely only on official statistics and warning health-care workers not to discuss infections or deaths with the media. Officials are known to promote COVID-19-related disinformation; in January 2021, Supreme Leader Khamenei called US- and UK-produced vaccines “completely untrustworthy,” banning their use in Iran.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 10 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 2 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 0 / 4

Media freedom is severely limited both online and offline. The state broadcasting company is tightly controlled by hard-liners and influenced by the security apparatus. News and analysis are heavily censored, while critics and opposition members are rarely, if ever, given a platform on state-controlled television, which remains a major source of information for many Iranians. State television has a record of airing confessions extracted from political prisoners under duress, and it routinely carries reports aimed at discrediting dissidents and opposition activists.

Newspapers and magazines face censorship and warnings from authorities about which topics to cover and how. Tens of thousands of foreign-based websites are filtered, including news sites and major social media services. Satellite dishes are banned, and Persian-language broadcasts from outside the country are regularly jammed. Police periodically raid private homes and confiscate satellite dishes. Iranian authorities have pressured journalists working for Persian-language media outside the country by summoning and threatening their families in Iran.

Iranian authorities placed significant pressure on journalists ahead of the June 2021 presidential election. That month, Reporters Without Borders (RSF) noted that journalists received at least 42 summonses or threats from prosecutors and intelligence agencies after the candidate-registration period ended in May. RSF also reported that foreign journalists were assigned government minders.

Several journalists were detained or imprisoned during 2021. In August, two journalists in western Iran received sentences of two-and-a-half-years’ imprisonment and 90 lashes over false-news accusations; their sentences still required the approval of an appeals court as of that month. Also in August, photojournalist Majid Saeedi was arrested after photographing camps housing Afghan refugees, though no charges were immediately disclosed. In September, financial reporter Amir-Abbas Azarmvand was arrested by intelligence officers on propaganda charges. In November, Manoochehr Aghaei, a reporter for a state-run news site and operator of an independent social media outlet, began an eight-month prison term for “spreading propaganda against the system.”

In November 2021, the Culture Ministry’s Press Supervisory Board revoked the license of state-run daily newspaper Kelid after it used a photograph of Supreme Leader Khamenei in an article on poverty.

The Islamic Republic has been known to target Iranian journalists operating abroad; in July 2021, US prosecutors alleged that four Iranians intended to kidnap journalist Masih Alinejad, who fled Iran in 2009, and return her to the country.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 0 / 4

Iran is home to a majority Shiite Muslim population and Sunni Muslim, Baha'i, Christian, and Zoroastrian minorities. The constitution recognizes only Zoroastrians, Jews, and certain Christian communities as non-Muslim religious minorities, and these small groups are relatively free to worship. The regime cracks down on Muslims who are deemed to be at variance with the state ideology and interpretation of Islam.

Sunni Muslims complain that they have been prevented from building mosques in major cities and face difficulty obtaining government jobs. In recent years, there has been increased pressure on the Sufi Muslim order Nematollahi Gonabadi, including destruction of its places of worship and the jailing of some of its members.

The government also subjects some non-Muslim minorities to repressive policies and discrimination, including Baha'is and unrecognized Christian groups. Baha'is are systematically persecuted, sentenced to prison, and banned from access to higher education. In May 2021, the Baha'i International Community reported on multiple raids of Baha'i homes, along with the detention of more than 20 people. Later that month, the Revolutionary Court of Borazjan issued prison sentences against six Baha'i; one defendant received an 11-year sentence for "propaganda activities against the regime" for discussing their faith, while the other five received 12-and-a-half-year sentences for "assisting in propaganda activities."

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 1 / 4

Academic freedom remains limited in Iran, and universities have experienced harsh repression since 2009. Khamenei has warned that universities should not be turned into centers for political activities. Students have been prevented from continuing their studies for political reasons or because they belong to the Baha'i community. Foreign scholars visiting Iran are vulnerable to detention on trumped-up charges.

In February 2021, Shahid Beheshti University professor Reza Eslami, a dual Iranian Canadian national, was sentenced to seven years' imprisonment for cooperating with an enemy state after he participated in a training course funded by a US-based nongovernmental organization (NGO). In October, the Court of Appeals in Tehran issued a modified five-year sentence against Eslami.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 1 / 4

Iran's vaguely defined restrictions on speech, harsh criminal penalties, and state monitoring of online communications are among several factors that deter citizens from engaging in open and free private discussion. Despite the risks and limitations, many do express dissent on social media, in some cases circumventing official blocks on certain platforms.

In July 2021, the parliament began considering a bill that would impose wide-ranging restrictions on Iranian internet users. The bill would criminalize the use and distribution of VPNs, while users would be required to provide their legal identification to access online services. The bill would also require the operators of foreign social networks and other services to open offices within the Islamic Republic. The bill remained under consideration as of October 2021 and is expected to achieve ratification in 2022.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 1 / 12E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 0 / 4

The constitution states that public demonstrations may be held if they are not “detrimental to the fundamental principles of Islam.” In practice, only state-sanctioned demonstrations are typically permitted, while other gatherings have in recent years been forcibly dispersed by security personnel, who detain participants.

Authorities responded forcefully to several protests during 2021. Demonstrators in several provinces, including Khuzestan, held rallies over water shortages and poor living conditions beginning in mid-July. Security forces responded by detaining participants and using lethal force as the month progressed. In early August, Amnesty International reported at least 11 deaths at the hands of security forces during the previous month’s protests.

Authorities also used force to disperse a peaceful protest in the city of Naqadeh in early August 2021. Amnesty International reported one death and several dozen injuries in that incident.

Protests over water shortages were held in Isfahan Province beginning in early November 2021. Authorities initially tolerated the protests before launching a crackdown later in the month, using tear gas and guns loaded with shrapnel and arresting 67 people.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 0 / 4

NGOs that seek to address human rights violations are generally suppressed by the state. For example, the Center for Human Rights Defenders (CHRD) remains closed, with several of its members imprisoned. In May 2021, CHRD vice president Narges Mohammadi was sentenced to two-and-a-half years’ imprisonment and 80 lashes by the Tehran Criminal Court in absentia. Mohammadi was taken into custody by intelligence agents in November, after which she was sent to Tehran’s Evin prison to serve her sentence.

Groups that focus on apolitical issues also face crackdowns. In March 2021, a court ordered the dissolution of the Imam Ali Popular Students Relief Society, a prominent NGO that supported the poor and natural disaster survivors. In its ruling, the court sustained an Interior Ministry assertion that the NGO had deviated from its mission and “questioned Islamic rulings.”

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 1 / 4

Iran does not permit the creation of labor unions; only state-sponsored labor councils are allowed. Labor rights groups have come under pressure in recent years, with key leaders and activists sentenced to prison on national security charges. Workers who engage in strikes are vulnerable to dismissal and arrest. Several detained labor activists received heavy prison terms of 14 years or more during 2019. One prominent figure, Sepideh Gholian, received temporary medical leave in August 2021 after reportedly receiving a COVID-19 diagnosis. However, Gholian was arrested in October after she publicly discussed the abuse of prisoners in Bushehr Central Prison.

Teachers held a three-day strike over pay and working conditions in December 2021. Rasoul Bodaghi, a board member of the Iran’s Teachers’ Trade Association, was arrested by security officers in Tehran in mid-December. Police officers forcefully dispersed a Tehran rally calling for his release two days later.

F. RULE OF LAW: 3 / 16F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 1 / 4

While the courts have a degree of autonomy within the ruling establishment, the judicial system is regularly used as a tool to silence regime critics and opposition members. The head of the judiciary is appointed by the supreme leader for renewable five-year terms. Deputy head Gholamhossein Mohseni Ejei was named to the judiciary's top post in July 2021, succeeding then president-elect Raisi. Ejei previously served as an intelligence minister and prosecutor general.

Political dissidents and advocates of human and labor rights have continued to face arbitrary judgments, and the security apparatus's influence over the courts has reportedly grown in recent years.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 1 / 4

The authorities routinely violate basic due process standards, particularly in politically sensitive cases. Activists are arrested without warrants, held indefinitely without formal charges, and denied access to legal counsel or any contact with the outside world. Many are later convicted on vague security charges in trials that sometimes last only a few minutes. Lawyers who take up the cases of dissidents have been jailed and banned from practicing, and a number have been forced to leave the country to escape prosecution. In 2019, prominent human rights lawyer Nasrin Sotoudeh was reportedly sentenced to an additional 33 years in prison and 148 lashes for her activities; she had been in prison serving a five-year sentence since mid-2018. In October 2020, Sotoudeh was temporarily released amid concerns about her health following a hunger strike; she remained on leave as of July 2021.

In August 2021, authorities arrested five lawyers, a journalist, and a human rights defender (HRD) who were preparing a lawsuit against officials, alleging mismanagement of the COVID-19 pandemic. While three lawyers and the HRD were released by the end of August, lawyers Arash Keykhosravi and Mostafa Nili remained imprisoned as of December, along with journalist Mehdi Mahmoudian.

Dual nationals and those with connections abroad have also faced arbitrary detention, trumped-up charges, and denial of due process rights in recent years. In August 2021, German Iranian Nahid Taghavi and British Iranian Mehran Raouf both received separate 10-year and 8-month prison sentences on national security charges.

Former detainees have reported being beaten during arrest and subjected to torture until they confess to crimes dictated by their interrogators. Some crimes can be formally punished with lashes in addition to imprisonment or fines. Political prisoners have repeatedly engaged in hunger strikes in recent years to protest mistreatment in custody. In September 2021, Amnesty International reported that at least 72 prisoners died in custody since January 2010; most of these deaths occurred due to torture, the use of firearms or tear gas, or ill-treatment.

Prisons are overcrowded, and prisoners often complain of poor detention conditions, including denial of medical care. Video footage taken in Evin prison and distributed in August 2021 captured incidents where prisoners were assaulted or mistreated, along with evidence of overcrowding. Criminal cases against six prison guards were opened later that month.

Prisoners risk contracting the novel coronavirus while in custody. Relatives of prisoners held in Evin reported an apparent rise in COVID-19 cases at the prison in July 2021 but also reported that COVID-19 testing was not consistently performed there. Writer and director Baktash Abtin, meanwhile, showed COVID-19 symptoms in April 2021 while imprisoned in Evin and was hospitalized in December after testing positive for COVID-19.

Iran has generally been second only to China in the number of executions it carries out, putting hundreds of people to death each year. Convicts can be executed for offenses other than murder, such as drug trafficking, and for crimes they committed when they were younger than 18 years old. Legislation enacted in 2017 significantly increased the quantity of illegal drugs required for a drug-related crime to incur the death penalty, prompting sentence reviews for thousands of death-row inmates. In August 2021, authorities executed Sajad Sanjari, who was originally arrested on murder charges as a minor in 2010. In November 2021, authorities executed Arman Abdolali, who was arrested on murder charges as a minor in 2014. Also in November, the United Nations noted that over 85 people were on death row for crimes they allegedly committed as minors.

Individuals who perform abortions may face the death penalty under a wide-ranging law ratified by the Guardian Council in November 2021. Under the law, large-scale abortion procedures may be considered acts of “corruption on earth,” a capital offense.

The country faces a long-term security threat from terrorist and insurgent groups that recruit from disadvantaged Kurdish, Arab, and Sunni Muslim minority populations.

Women do not receive equal treatment under the law and face widespread discrimination in practice. For example, a woman’s testimony in court is given half the weight of a man’s, and the monetary compensation awarded to a female victim’s family upon her death is half that owed to the family of a male victim.

A majority of the population is of Persian ethnicity, and ethnic minorities experience various forms of discrimination, including restrictions on the use of their languages. Some provinces with large non-Persian populations remain underdeveloped. Activists campaigning for the rights of ethnic minority groups and greater autonomy for their respective regions have come under pressure from the authorities, and some have been jailed.

Members of the LGBT+ community face harassment and discrimination, though the problem is underreported due to the criminalized and hidden nature of these groups in Iran. The penal code criminalizes all sexual relations outside of traditional marriage, and Iran is among the few countries where individuals can be put to death for consensual same-sex conduct.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 4 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 1 / 4

Freedom of movement is restricted, particularly for women and perceived opponents of the regime. Many journalists and activists have been prevented from leaving the country. Women are banned from certain public places and can generally obtain a passport to travel abroad only with the permission of their fathers or husbands.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 1 / 4

Iranians have the legal right to own property and establish private businesses. However, powerful institutions like the IRGC play a dominant role in the economy, limiting fair competition and opportunities for entrepreneurs, and bribery is said to be widespread in the business environment, including for registration and obtaining licenses. Women are denied equal rights in inheritance matters.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 1 / 4

Social freedoms are restricted in Iran. All residents, but particularly women, are subject to obligatory rules on dress and personal appearance, and those who are deemed to have violated the rules face state harassment, fines, and arrest.

Police conduct raids on private gatherings that breach rules against alcohol consumption and the mixing of unrelated men and women. Those attending can be detained and fined or sentenced to corporal punishment in the form of lashes.

Women do not enjoy equal rights in divorce and child custody disputes. In 2019, the Guardian Council approved a legal amendment that would enable Iranian women married to foreign men to request Iranian citizenship for their children. The first identification cards for such children were issued in July 2021.

Iranians can receive an abortion within the first four months of a pregnancy if three doctors decide the mother's life is at risk or if the fetus shows signs of severe disability. However, in November 2021, the Guardian Council ratified the Youthful Population and Protection of the Family Law; under the law, individuals seeking abortions will also require the approval of a committee that includes judicial representatives, Islamic jurists, doctors, and legislators. The law, which also bans the distribution of free contraceptives, can be used on an "experimental" basis for seven years.

The government provides no protection to women and children forced into sex trafficking, and both Iranians and migrant workers from countries like Afghanistan are subject to forced labor and debt bondage. The IRGC has allegedly used coercive tactics to recruit thousands of Afghan migrants living in Iran to fight in Syria. HRW has reported that children as young as 14 are among those recruited.

The population faces widespread economic hardship driven by a combination of US-led trade sanctions and mismanagement by the regime. The crisis has resulted in the rapid devaluation of the national currency and soaring prices for many basic goods. Some Iranian officials have blamed the country's poor handling of the COVID-19 pandemic on the effects of the sanctions. The Office of the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights (OHCHR) and the Secretary-General's office expressed concern over the sanctions' effects on living conditions in a May 2021 report. The United States did not make significant changes to its sanctions policy in 2021, however.

Iraq

Population: 40,100,000

Capital: Baghdad

Freedom Status: Not Free

Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: Iraq holds regular, competitive elections, and the country's various partisan, religious, and ethnic groups generally enjoy representation in the political system. However, democratic governance is impeded in practice by corruption, militias operating outside the bounds of the law, and the weakness of formal institutions. In the Kurdistan region, democratic institutions lack the strength to contain the influence of long-standing power brokers. Increasingly, Iran has been able to influence politics in Baghdad. Civil liberties are generally respected in Iraqi law, but in practice the state has limited capacity to prevent and punish violations, and authorities routinely infringe upon the rights of residents.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- Results for the October parliamentary elections, which observer missions deemed credible, were certified in November and upheld by the Supreme Court in December. Parties that largely represent Iran-backed militias challenged the results legally, but also attempted to storm government offices so as to force a recount. The Sairoon alliance, led by Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr, won 73 seats, up from 54 in the last election, while the Fatah alliance, which generally represents the Iran-backed militias, won only 17 seats, down from 48.
- In November, Iran-backed militias launched a drone strike against the home of Prime Minister Mustafa al-Kadhimi in Baghdad's Green Zone, wounding him. Iraqi authorities appear to know the identity of the perpetrators but have neither revealed nor apprehended those responsible.
- Throughout the year, Iran-backed militias continued to assassinate, kidnap, and assault activists, journalists, and lawyers affiliated with the Tishreen protest movement that began in 2019. In March, Jaseb Hattab al-Heliji, a popular poet and the father of human rights lawyer Ali al-Heliji who was kidnapped in October 2019, was assassinated.
- In February, a court in Erbil sentenced three journalists and two activists to six years in prison for criticizing Kurdish authorities on social media. The detainees were denied access to lawyers until minutes before the trial, and the internal security force loyal to the ruling party in Kurdistan refused to provide the lawyers with the detainees' files to prepare their defense.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 16 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 8 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 2 / 4

After national elections, the Council of Representatives (CoR) chooses the largely ceremonial president, who in turn appoints a prime minister nominated by the largest bloc in the parliament. The prime minister, who holds most executive power and forms the government, serves up to two four-year terms. In 2018, the CoR chose Kurdish politician Barham Salih as president and, in 2020, the parliament and foreign backers agreed to name Mustafa al-Kadhimi as prime minister. By the end of 2021, no new president or prime minister had been appointed after the October parliamentary elections. In November, Iran-backed militias launched a drone strike against the home of Prime Minister Mustafa al-Kadhimi in Baghdad's Green Zone, wounding him. Iraqi authorities appear to know the identity of the perpetrators but have neither revealed nor apprehended those responsible.

The Kurdistan Regional Government (KRG), composed of Iraq's northernmost provinces, is ostensibly led by a president with extensive executive powers. The draft Kurdish constitution requires presidential elections every four years and limits presidents to two terms. However, after eight years as president, Masoud Barzani of the Kurdistan Democratic Party (KDP) had his term extended in a 2013 political agreement with another party, the Patriotic Union of Kurdistan (PUK). After Barzani stepped down in 2017, the presidency remained vacant, and executive power was held by Prime Minister Nechirvan Barzani, his nephew. In 2019, Nechirvan Barzani was elected president by the Iraqi Kurdish parliament and sworn in a month later, after the position had been vacant for nearly two years. Masrour Barzani, Masoud Barzani's son, was appointed and sworn in as prime minister the same month. Both Barzanis, the current president and prime minister, are members of the KDP.

The 329 members of the CoR are elected every four years from multimember open lists in each province. The October 2021 elections were generally viewed as credible by international observers, despite documented cases of voter and candidate intimidation, bribing of voters, prevention of journalists from covering the voting, arrests of activists calling for an election boycott, and the lowest voter turnout since the end of the Saddam Hussein regime. In early November, supporters of Iran-backed militias challenged the election results in court and attempted to storm the Green Zone complex in Baghdad, which houses governmental institutions, to force a recount. The ensuing clashes with police resulted in the death of three people.

The Sairoon alliance, led by Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr, won 73 seats, up from 54 in the last election. Muhammad al-Halbousi's Taqadum Party won 37 seats, and the State of Law coalition headed by former prime minister Nouri al-Maliki took 33 seats. The two Kurdish parties, the KDP and PUK, won 31 and 18 seats, respectively. The Fatah alliance, which represents Iran-backed militias, took only 17 seats, down from 48 in the previous elections. The opposition parties Imtidad and Ishraqat Kanoon, which are associated with the Tishreen protest movement, won 9 and 5 seats, respectively, and the opposition Kurdish party, New Generation, secured nine seats. The remaining seats were divided among smaller parties and independents.

In Iraqi Kurdistan, the 111-seat Kurdish parliament is elected through closed party-list proportional representation in a single district, with members serving four-year terms. The 2018 elections, originally due in 2017, resulted in the governing KDP increasing its plurality to 45 seats. The PUK received 21 seats, the Gorran movement took 12, and several smaller parties and minority representatives accounted for the remainder. The elections were plagued by fraud allegations and other irregularities, and Gorran and other smaller parties rejected the results.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 3 / 4

The Independent High Electoral Commission (IHEC) is responsible for managing elections. The IHEC generally enjoys the confidence of the international community and, according to some polls, the Iraqi public.

The October 2021 elections were the first held under a new system dividing Iraq into 83 multimember electoral districts. This system is the result of December 2019 electoral reforms ostensibly passed to appease Tishreen protesters. The new electoral law was intended to facilitate entry into Parliament for independent candidates who do not have the backing of large parties.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 7 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 3 / 4

The constitution guarantees the freedom to form and join political parties, with the exception of the pre-2003 dictatorship's Baath Party, which is banned. A 2016 law strengthened the ban, criminalizing Baathist protests and the promotion of Baathist ideas.

The measure applies to any group that supports racism, terrorism, sectarianism, sectarian cleansing, and other ideas contrary to democracy or the peaceful transfer of power. Individual Iraqis' freedom to run for office is also limited by a vague "good conduct" requirement in the electoral law.

In practice, Iraqis can generally form parties and operate without government interference, and parties explicitly opposing the current sectarian apportionment political system are allowed to operate. Party membership and multiparty alliances shift frequently.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 2 / 4

Elections are competitive, but all major parties are dominated by one sectarian or ethnic group. Sectarian parties were expected to continue leading the formation of a new government following the October 2021 parliamentary elections.

However, several new more secular and nationalist parties participated in the 2021 elections, and two parties linked to the 2019 Tishreen protest movement won 14 seats, even as its candidates and activists faced threats. The Kurdish opposition party, the New Generation movement, also won nine seats. Despite its military force and loyal personnel, the Fatah alliance lost significant representation, demonstrating the ability of Iraqi voters to affect Parliament's makeup, even if they cannot shift the balance of armed power in the country.

In 2021, KRG authorities continued their repression of the activities of the New Generation party and its affiliated media outlet, Nalia Radio and Television (NRT), owned by party leader Shaswar Abdulwahid. In 2019, security forces detained over 80 party members, allegedly for defamation and insulting a state employee. In August and December 2020, authorities unlawfully shut and raided four NRT offices and suspended the outlet's broadcasting license. In May 2021, KDP-affiliated police in Erbil requested that the Sulaimaniya police arrest Abdulwahid, but he has remained out of prison.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 1 / 4

Iraq's political system remains distorted by interference from foreign powers, most notably Iran; Iranian authorities physically and politically threaten or buy the support of Iraqi policymakers who challenge Iranian interests. The Fatah alliance, which represents Iran-backed militias that do not follow the official command structure of Iraq's armed forces, has a persistent, albeit diminished presence in the parliament. However, the violent efforts of these militias to undermine the 2021 elections failed, as did their assassination attempt against Prime Minister al-Kadhimi.

In 2021, the Islamic State (IS) did not suppress or affect normal political activity, as they have done in previous years.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 1 / 4

Despite legal and constitutional measures designed to protect the political rights of various religious and ethnic groups, the dominant role of ethno-sectarian parties and the allocation of key offices according to informal religious or ethnic criteria reduce the likelihood that politicians will act in the interests of the whole population.

Sunni Arabs, the largest ethno-sectarian minority, are represented in the parliament but often argue that the Shiite majority excludes them from positions of real influence. The presidency and premiership are reserved in practice for a Kurd and a Shiite; the position of parliament speaker goes to a Sunni.

A system of reserved seats ensures a minimum representation in the CoR for some of Iraq's smaller religious and ethnic minorities. There are five seats reserved for Christians and one each for Fayli Kurds (added in 2018), Yazidis, Sabean Mandaean, and Shabaks. The Kurdish parliament reserves five seats for Turkmen, five for Christians, and one for Armenians. The political rights of minority groups have been severely impeded by widespread displacement from formerly IS-occupied areas.

The CoR and the Kurdish parliament reserve 25 percent and 30 percent of their seats for women, respectively, though such formal representation has had little obvious effect on state policies toward women, who are typically excluded from political debates and leadership positions. LGBT+ people are unable to enjoy equal political rights in practice due to harsh societal discrimination, and the main political parties do not advocate for the interests of LGBT+ people in their platforms.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 2 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 1 / 4

Several factors—including low institutional capacity, widespread corruption, and extensive Iranian influence—have hindered the ability of elected officials to independently set and implement laws and policies. Iran-backed militias, incorporated under the Popular Mobilization Forces (PMF), are officially part of Iraqi state institutions but in practice set their own policies. They planned the assassination attempt of Prime Minister al-Kadhimi in November 2021, repressed political protests, kidnapped and assassinated activists, and attacked US targets in Iraq. Their actions gravely undermine the government's ability to set and implement its own domestic and foreign agendas. The United States and its allies also exert some policy influence through their support for Iraqi Security Forces and other state institutions. Iraq's fragmented politics can lead to gridlock and dysfunction.

In the Kurdistan region, new representatives to the KRG were elected in 2018 and approved a new government in 2019, after a multi-year suspension of Parliament. Although representatives in the KRG have jurisdiction over the entire Kurdistan region, in practice, the region is split between the Erbil and Dohuk governorates, under KDP control, and Sulaimaniya, controlled by the PUK. Each region has its own politically affiliated internal security (Asayish) and military forces (Peshmerga).

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 0 / 4

Corruption remains a major problem in Iraq and was a key contributor to the Tishreen protest movement that erupted in 2019. Political parties siphon funds from the ministries they control, take kickbacks for government contracts, and resist anticorruption efforts. Prime Minister al-Kadhimi claimed in May 2021 that over $150 billion of public funds had been lost to corruption since 2003. The judicial system, itself hampered by politicization and corruption, acts on only a fraction of the cases investigated by the Integrity Commission, one of three anticorruption bodies. The KRG suffers from similar corruption problems. Under both the federal government and the KRG, whistleblowers, investigators, journalists, and private individuals raising corruption concerns have faced arrests, charges of defamation, violence, and intimidation.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 1 / 4

The government does not operate with transparency, despite a few official policies promoting openness, including an asset disclosure requirement. The CoR debates the budget, and interest groups are often able to access draft legislation. Government spending, in both Baghdad and the KRG, is not transparent. The PMF's large budget is particularly opaque. The number of fighters drawing salaries is unknown and likely significantly larger than the actual number of active soldiers. The public procurement system is not transparent and corrupt, with no legal recourse available for unsuccessful bidders. The oil and gas industry also lacks transparency, and the government has failed to make adequate progress in meeting its commitments to the Extractive Industries Transparency Initiative. There is no comprehensive law on public access to information.

ADDITIONAL DISCRETIONARY POLITICAL RIGHTS QUESTION

Is the government or occupying power deliberately changing the ethnic composition of a country or territory so as to destroy a culture or tip the political balance in favor of another group? -1 / 0

IS's loss of territorial control in 2017 largely halted its campaign to alter religious demography. However, over a million Iraqis who were displaced by IS remain unable to return to their homes, for both security and economic reasons. Kurdish authorities encouraged local and substate forces to prevent Arab families displaced by the IS conflict from returning to villages near the Syria-Iraq border and in disputed areas under de facto KRG control, in an apparent attempt to change the region's demography. Displaced families with perceived links to IS who continue to reside in and outside of camps are particularly vulnerable to assault and sexual abuse. Many cannot return to their homes because their original communities reject their return or Iraqi authorities prohibit it. As of December 2021, approximately 4.8 million Iraqis displaced by the 2014 IS offensive had returned to their home regions, while almost 1.2 million people remained internally displaced.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 13 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 4 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 1 / 4

Iraq's media environment appears lively and diverse, but there are few politically independent news sources. In recent years, social media, which was once dominated by alternative and independent voices, has been utilized by progovernment forces, and particularly, Iran-backed militias, to spread incitement, fake news, and explicit threats against activists. Journalists who do not self-censor can also face legal repercussions. Media outlets face restrictions and obstruction in response to their coverage.

The constitution allows limits on free expression to preserve "public order" and "morality." Iraqi government authorities have arrested journalists for conducting their work, at times charging them with defamation and insulting public institutions. In July 2021, the Iraqi Security Forces raided the Al-Baghdadiya TV office in Baghdad, suspended the channel's broadcast, arrested the news director and a news anchor, and confiscated equipment. No charges were presented to the detainees, who were released after one day.

Militias frequently shoot, kidnap, torture, and assassinate journalists for their work. Ahmed Hassan, a journalist working for Al-Forat TV in al-Diwaniya, survived an assassination attempt by masked gunmen in May 2021. Journalists Abbas al-Rifi'i and Ali al-Mikdam were kidnapped, tortured, threatened, and then released by militiamen in May and July 2021, respectively.

In Iraqi Kurdistan, authorities intensified their persecution of journalists who reported on government mismanagement, corruption, and antiregime protests in the region in 2021. The Metro Center for Defending the Rights of Journalists claimed that, by April, they had recorded 49 violations against 36 journalists in the region, including physical attacks against journalists covering antiregime protests. Authorities routinely illegally arrest and detain journalists, prevent them from speaking to a lawyer, and convict them on spurious charges without a legitimate trial. In February 2021, a court in KDP-controlled Erbil sentenced three journalists and two activists to six years in prison for criticizing authorities on social media. KRG Prime Minister Barzani (a KDP leader) claimed without evidence in a news conference that the detainees were not journalists but spies, which may have influenced the judge's decision to convict them of "destabilizing the security" in the region.

While the KDP engaged in the most egregious violations of press freedom in 2021, their rival party, the PUK, also persecuted journalists in regions they control. Despite their rivalry, the PUK arrested Hemin Baqer, a journalist who published about KDP corruption, after he fled Erbil to Sulaimaniya. The internal security service loyal to the PUK also arrested a journalist working for the Kurdistan Workers' Union (PKK)-affiliated Firat News Agency while covering an anti-Turkish protest in Sulaimaniya.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 1 / 4

The constitution guarantees freedom of belief, but in practice many Iraqis experience violence and displacement due to their religious identity. Places of worship have often been targets for terrorist attacks. Blasphemy laws remain in the legal code, although enforcement is rare. A 2015 religious conversion law automatically designates the children of a parent who has converted to Islam as Muslim, even if the other parent is a non-Muslim. Most political leaders expressed support for religious pluralism after IS's defeat, and minority religious groups living in liberated areas have largely been able to practice their religion freely since.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 1 / 4

Educators have long faced the threat of violence or other repercussions for teaching subjects or discussing topics that powerful state or nonstate actors find objectionable. The country's official curriculum is often augmented in the classroom by religious or sectarian viewpoints. Political activism by university students can result in harassment or intimidation.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 1 / 4

Social media posts on controversial topics sometimes result in retribution. Certain topics, including corruption and, to a somewhat lesser extent, criticism of Iran, are considered to be off limits and at times prompt arrest, docking of salaries, torture, and criminal lawsuits. Social media users and bloggers have faced defamation suits for criticizing corruption and misgovernance. Authorities have nonconsensually released video footage of detainees to humiliate and intimidate them.

Activists describe a climate of fear that has led them to self-censor what they post on social media or say in discussions on the mobile phone app, Clubhouse. Over 30 private citizens involved in the 2019 Tishreen protest movement, including at least one minor, were abducted between 2019 to 2021; their whereabouts remain unknown as of December 2021. Many vocal activists have fled the country or relocated to the Kurdistan region, fearing for their lives. Political speech in the Kurdistan region against local authorities can also prompt arbitrary detentions or other reprisals from government forces affiliated with the two ruling parties.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 4 / 12E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 0 / 4

The constitution guarantees freedom of assembly, but protesters are frequently at risk of violence or arrest. These dangers have become acute during the ongoing Tishreen protest movement against corruption, poor infrastructure and government services, and high unemployment that began in October 2019. Security forces have used curfews, tear gas, and live ammunition to suppress demonstrations in Baghdad and other southern cities. By mid-December 2021, hundreds of people had been killed due to protest activities; of them, dozens were killed in targeted assassinations outside of protest squares. Iraqi Security Forces routinely shot at, arrested, and tortured protesters. While the majority of those arrested are released after a few days due to public pressure, some have been sentenced to years in prison.

Iraqi officials and journalists reported that snipers under the command of Iran-backed militia units use live ammunition to shoot at protesters from rooftops and carry out a wave of assaults and assassinations against protest organizers and activists. Militiamen routinely kidnap activists, torture them for several days, and then release them, so as to coerce them to cease their antiregime activity. Iranian media and media outlets linked to Iran-backed militias spread false reports about activists to justify their targeting and issued explicit threats to activists and critics set to be targeted next.

In 2021, the number of protests in the Kurdistan region dropped significantly, which local activists claim was the result of security forces' use of unprecedented levels of violence against protesters in 2020. In 2021, Kurdish authorities linked both to the KDP and the PUK continued to attack and arrest peaceful protesters and journalists covering the protests.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 2 / 4

Nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) enjoy societal support and a relatively hospitable regulatory environment, though they must register with the government and obtain approval from the commission responsible for suppressing Baathism. For international NGOs, registration is cumbersome and often requires payment of bribes. In Kurdistan, NGOs must renew their registration annually.

Iran-backed militias have threatened, assaulted, kidnapped, tortured, raped in captivity, assassinated, and planted explosive devices at the homes of multiple critics and activists (and their family members) involved in the Tishreen protest movement. In March 2021, Jaseb Hattab al-Heliji, a popular poet and the father of human rights lawyer Ali al-Heliji, was assassinated. Ali himself was kidnapped in October 2019 and has not been heard from since. In July, gunmen assassinated Ali Karim, the son of prominent human rights defender Fatima al-Bahadli, who is the founder of the Al-Firdaws Association, which advocates for the protection of women and girls in Basra.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 2 / 4

Labor laws allow for collective bargaining (even by nonunionized workers), protect the rights of subcontractors and migrant workers, and permit workers to strike, among other rights. However, public sector workers are not allowed to unionize, there is no legal prohibition against antiunion discrimination, and workers do not have access to legal remedies if fired for union activity. Some state officials and private employers discourage union activity with threats, demotions, and other deterrents.

F. RULE OF LAW: 1 / 16F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 0 / 4

The judiciary is influenced by corruption, political pressure, violent intimidation, tribal forces, and religious interests. The lines between the executive, legislative, and judicial branches are frequently blurred, and executive interference in the judiciary is widespread. Due to distrust of or lack of access to the courts, many Iraqis have turned to tribal bodies to settle disputes, even those involving major crimes.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 0 / 4

Criminal proceedings in Iraq are deeply flawed. Arbitrary arrests, including arrests without a warrant, are common. Detainees are frequently denied access to lawyers, who when available are often prevented access to crucial public documents.

The three journalists and two activists who were sentenced in February 2021 by an Erbil court to six years in prison for criticizing authorities on social media were denied access to lawyers until minutes before the trial. The internal security force loyal to the ruling party in KDP-controlled Erbil refused to provide the lawyers with the detainees' files to prepare their clients' defense.

Terrorism cases have been prone to fundamental violations of due process, with human rights groups describing systematic denial of access to counsel and short, summary trials with little evidence that the defendants, who are often allegedly associated with IS, have committed specific crimes. In 2018, some trials of suspected IS members that resulted in death sentences lasted as little as 20 minutes, and hundreds of family members of suspected IS fighters have been arbitrarily detained.

Several senior military commanders were removed from their posts in October 2019 following a violent crackdown on Tishreen movement protesters. Their removals were rejected by many Iraqis as inadequate and proved an ineffective deterrent on members of security forces, who since then have continued to fatally wound demonstrators at protests.

Prime Minister al-Kadhimi has repeatedly promised to investigate and prosecute members of Iran-backed militias responsible for a wave of assassinations, assassination attempts, and kidnappings of activists across southern Iraq. While some suspects were arrested in 2021, the political and militia leaders who ordered the killings were not held responsible. Several named suspects are protected by political parties, and the overwhelming majority of cases remain unsolved. Protesters demanding accountability have themselves been killed, kidnapped, arrested, and threatened. Efforts to locate victims of kidnappings have not successfully obtained the release of those who have disappeared.

The end of large-scale combat with IS significantly improved the security environment in Iraq. Though the organization remained active as a clandestine terrorist group in 2020, it no longer controlled Iraqi territory or civilian populations, and its ability to operate was diminished. Throughout 2021, IS waged an insurgency in rural areas of western and northern Iraq, targeting both civilians and military personnel. The insurgency and the collective punishment policies adopted by the Iraqi Security Forces in response have threatened the physical safety of residents.

Militias have recaptured large swaths of Iraqi territory from IS, but they have also engaged in war crimes such as pillaging, forcible displacement of Sunnis, kidnappings, and torture. Over 600 Sunni men and boys who were kidnapped by the PMF during the recapture of western provinces of Iraq in 2016 have not been heard from since.

Tensions between Iran and the United States continued to play out on Iraqi soil in 2021, as Iran-backed militias used small-scale rockets and improvised explosive devices (IEDs) toward American forces and personnel, endangering Iraqi residents.

Starting in 2020, Turkish military forces launched operations into Kurdish territory to combat the Kurdistan Workers' Union (PKK) guerilla group. The operation resulted in civilian casualties and mass displacement from the Turkey-Kurdistan border region.

The use of torture to obtain confessions is widespread, including in death penalty cases. Detainees are often held in harsh, overcrowded conditions, and forced disappearances, particularly of suspected IS fighters, have been reported.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 0 / 4

Women face widespread societal bias and discriminatory legal treatment under the law. Sexual harassment in the workplace is prohibited, but victims rarely pursue formal complaints.

Members of a given ethnic or religious group tend to suffer discrimination or persecution in areas where they represent a minority, leading many to seek safety in other neighborhoods or provinces. Same-sex relations are not explicitly prohibited, but LGBT+ people risk violence if they are open about their identity. People of African descent suffer from high rates of extreme poverty and discrimination.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 4 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 1 / 4

Freedom of movement has improved somewhat as areas formerly controlled by IS were brought back under government control. However, large-scale destruction of housing and infrastructure, the presence of sectarian or partisan militias, and the ongoing threat of violence has made it difficult for many displaced people to return home. The renewed IS insurgency and the Iraqi Security Forces' corresponding response in 2021 has constrained the freedom of movement of residents in rural western and northern Iraq.

The KRG also continues to prevent Arab families from returning to villages on the border with Syria, from which they fled during fighting between the Peshmerga and IS in 2014.

The movement of women is limited by legal restrictions. Women require the consent of a male guardian to obtain a passport and the Civil Status Identification Document, which is needed to access employment, education, and many social services.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 1 / 4

Iraqis are legally free to own property and establish businesses, but observance of property rights has been limited by corruption and conflict. Families perceived to be affiliated with IS living in displacement are particularly vulnerable to confiscation or takeover of their property. Business owners face demands for bribes, threats, and violent attempts to seize their enterprises. In Iraqi Kurdistan, where there is a construction boom, this has sometimes come at the expense of local landowners and farmers whose fields are confiscated without notice or compensation. Contracts are difficult to enforce. Women are legally disadvantaged with respect to inheritance rights and may face pressure to yield their rights to male relatives.

The renewed IS insurgency and the collective punishment policies adopted by the Iraqi Security Forces has caused material damage to the property of civilians in rural western and northern Iraq.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 1 / 4

Forced and early marriages are common, especially in the context of displacement and poverty. Over one in four Iraqi women aged 20 to 24 were married by age 18, and marriage for those aged 15 is legal with parental approval. Laws on marriage and divorce favor men over women. In 2020, Iraq witnessed a spike in domestic violence cases. Renewed efforts by Iraqi women's rights organizations to compel Parliament to pass a law banning gender-based violence have been unsuccessful. Rapists can avoid prosecution if they marry their victims; spousal rape is not prohibited. The law also allows reduced sentences for those convicted of so-called honor killings, which are seldom punished in practice. Both men and women face pressure to conform to conservative standards on personal appearance.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 1 / 4

As of 2021, over 2,700 Yazidi women and children who had been kidnapped by IS during the 2014 genocide of the Yazidi community remain missing. Many of them were likely forced into sexual slavery or forced labor. Exploitation of children, including through forced begging and the recruitment of child soldiers by militias, is an ongoing problem. Foreign migrant workers frequently work long hours for low pay and are vulnerable to forced labor. According to the US State Department's 2021 Trafficking in Persons report, the Iraqi government and the KRG have stepped up enforcement efforts to prevent human trafficking, but it continues unabated—at times with the protection of corrupt officials—and internally displaced persons are particularly vulnerable.

Ireland

Population: 5,000,000

Capital: Dublin

Freedom Status: Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Ireland is a stable democracy in which political rights and civil liberties are respected and defended. There is some limited societal discrimination, especially against the traditionally nomadic Irish Travellers. Corruption scandals have plagued the police force, and domestic violence remains a problem.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- In a January report, the Commission of Investigation into Mother and Baby Homes noted “appalling level[s] of infant mortality” and discrimination against the residents of institutions which were managed by the state and by Catholic priests and nuns. A redress scheme for survivors was announced in November, though a large number of survivors were excluded.
 - In July, former minister Katherine Zappone was appointed as special envoy on the freedom of expression to the United Nations, in a manner considered non-transparent by opposition parties. Zappone declined the post in August, while Foreign Minister Simon Coveney apologized for the manner in which the appointment was made.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 39 / 40A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 12 / 12*A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The Taoiseach, or prime minister, is nominated by the House of Representatives (Dáil Éireann) and formally appointed by the president. Thus, the legitimacy of the prime minister is largely dependent on the conduct of Dáil elections, which historically have been free and fair. The Dáil elected Micheál Martin as Taoiseach in June 2020 following a general election in February, to lead the coalition government between Fianna Fáil, Fine Gael, and the Green Party.

The president is elected to up to two seven-year terms, and as chief of state has mostly ceremonial duties. Michael D. Higgins was reelected in 2018. Voting in presidential elections has historically been free and fair.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The Dáil's 160 members are elected in multimember districts through a proportional representation system, and their terms last five years. The Senate (Seanad Éireann) contains 60 seats; 43 members are indirectly chosen through an electoral college, while 11 are selected by the Taoiseach and 6 are selected from constituencies that represent some higher education institutions.

The February 2020 Dáil election saw no major irregularities or unequal campaigning. Sinn Féin won 37 seats (24.5 percent), its best result ever and only one less than Fianna Fáil's 38 seats (22.2 percent). Fine Gael won 35 seats (20.9 percent), and the Green Party 12 (7.1 percent).

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 4 / 4

Ireland's electoral framework is strong and government bodies hold credible polls. In January 2021, the government released details of the Electoral Reform Bill 2020, which would establish an independent Electoral Commission. The bill remained under consideration at year's end.

Ireland frequently holds referendums, especially on European Union (EU) treaties.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 16 / 16B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 4 / 4

Political parties in Ireland are free to form and compete. Among the main parties, Fianna Fáil and Fine Gael do not differ widely in ideology, despite their long history as rivals; they represent the successors of opposing sides in the nation's 1922–23 civil war. Other key parties include Sinn Féin—a left-wing republican party that leads the opposition—the Labour Party, and the Green Party.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 4 / 4

Opposition parties generally do not encounter restrictions or harassment that affects their ability to gain power through elections, and most of the main parties have been part of government at some point in the history of the state.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 4 / 4

People's political choices are generally free from domination by the military, foreign powers, religious hierarchies, and other powerful groups.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 4 / 4

Women are underrepresented, holding 23.1 percent of the Dáil's seats. Women are visible in electoral politics however, with Sinn Féin and the Social Democrats both having female leaders.

While ethnic minority and marginalized groups are generally free to participate in politics, Irish Travellers and Roma have little representation. Travellers were formally recognized as an Indigenous ethnic group in 2017, the same year a 2017–21 inclusion strategy was launched. In March 2021, Traveller representatives called on the government to renew its commitment, saying that many of the strategy's stated goals were not achieved.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 11 / 12C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 4 / 4

Elected officials freely determine government policy. The government introduced legislation to combat the coronavirus pandemic and gave emergency powers to ministries and the police in 2020. Pandemic-related legislation remained in force in 2021.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 3 / 4

Ireland has a recent history of problems with political corruption but has introduced anticorruption legislation in recent years. The Criminal Justice (Corruption Offences) Act 2018 modernized and consolidated existing anticorruption laws, though critics claimed that the legislation did not adequately address bribery.

Scandals involving Ireland's police (An Garda Síochána) have raised concerns about a lack of safeguards against corruption in that sector. In April 2021, four officers were charged with corruption-related offenses.

A multiagency review group examining anticorruption and antifraud structures was established after the government completed a 2017 study of white-collar crime. In April 2021, the Justice Department published an implementation plan based on the group's recommendations, which included the establishment of an anticorruption advisory council. The Justice Department announced the appointment process for the council's chairperson in September.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 4 / 4

The public has broad access to official information under the 2014 Freedom of Information (FOI) Act, though partial exemptions remain for the police and some other agencies. A Transparency Code requires open records on the groups and individuals that advise public officials on policy. The government announced a comprehensive review of FOI legislation in June 2021, which is expected to be completed by 2022.

The July 2021 appointment of former minister Katherine Zappone as a special envoy on freedom of expression to the United Nations was considered nontransparent by opposition parties. Zappone declined the post in August, while Foreign Minister Coveney apologized for the manner in which he appointed her.

The government has been criticized for failing to consult meaningfully with civil society groups and relevant stakeholders in policy formulation, particularly regarding the Roma, Travellers, and people living with disabilities.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 58 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 16 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 4 / 4

Irish media are free and independent, and present a variety of viewpoints. However, the media sector is highly concentrated, with Independent News and Media controlling much of the newspaper market.

Ireland's restrictive defamation laws have received criticism, including from the European Commission. The government has vowed to publish a report on potential reform which was still forthcoming at the end of 2021.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 4 / 4

Freedom of religion is constitutionally guaranteed. Although religious oaths are still required from senior public officials, there is no state religion, and adherents of other faiths face few impediments to religious expression. In recent years, the Roman Catholic Church has notably declined in the public eye, following a series of sexual abuse and other scandals involving the Church and its clergy.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

Academic freedom is respected. The Roman Catholic Church operates approximately 90 percent of Ireland's schools, most of which include religious education from which parents may exempt their children. The constitution requires equal funding for schools run by different denominations.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 4 / 4

There are no significant impediments to open and free private discussion, including in personal online communications. However, Ireland's national identity card, the Public Services Card (PSC), has elicited controversy due to data storage and privacy concerns. The data protection commissioner (DPC) launched an investigation into some aspects of the PSC system in August 2021.

Activists and volunteers from Fianna Fáil, Fine Gael, and Sinn Féin were revealed to have acquired information from voters by posing as polling-company employees in recent years. In June 2021, the DPC called on political parties to disclose such behavior.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 12 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

The right to assemble freely is respected, and peaceful demonstrations are held each year. However, COVID-19-related legislation continued to place restrictions on freedom of assembly in 2021. Arrests for violating lockdown regulations occurred at multiple protests. In March, the Irish Council for Civil Liberties (ICCL) criticized the government over its pandemic restrictions, calling its policy a "blanket ban."

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights– and governance-related work? 4 / 4

Freedom of association is upheld, and nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) can operate freely.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 4 / 4

Labor unions operate without hindrance, and collective bargaining is legal and unrestricted. Police were criticized for dispersing an April 2021 protest by workers of a shuttered department store in Dublin.

F. RULE OF LAW: 14 / 16F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 4 / 4

Ireland has a generally independent judiciary and a legal system based on common law. The Judicial Council, a body which promotes judicial excellence, good conduct, and judicial independence, began operating in 2020.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 4 / 4

Due process generally prevails in civil and criminal matters. However, the police force has been affected by repeated corruption scandals in recent years. A new police commissioner, Drew Harris, was appointed in 2018; his predecessor resigned in 2017 after questions about her approach toward whistleblowers stoked controversy. Harris remained in his post in 2021.

The police have received a range of additional powers to enforce COVID-19 restrictions. In its June report, the ICCL called for those powers to be rescinded, calling them ineffective.

A Special Criminal Court (SCC) has functioned since 1972 to hear cases related to paramilitary violence committed during the Troubles, a period of sectarian conflict in Northern Ireland. The ICCL has called for the SCC's abolition, noting that it does not employ a jury and can consider secret evidence. A final report from an inquiry on the SCC is due in 2022.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 3 / 4

Irish prisons and detention facilities are frequently dangerous, unsanitary, overcrowded, and ill-equipped for prisoners with mental illness. In June 2021, the Inspector of Prisons reported that COVID-19 measures disproportionately impacted inmates, resulting in isolation and limiting their access to basic amenities.

A series of official inquiries in recent years have detailed decades of past physical, sexual, and emotional abuse—including forced labor—against women and children in state institutions and by Catholic priests and nuns from the early 20th century until 1996, as well as collusion to hide the abuse. The Commission of Investigation into Mother and Baby Homes reported “appalling level[s] of infant mortality” and discrimination against residents when it published its final report in January 2021. Taoiseach Martin offered an official apology that month. An €800-million ($950-million) redress scheme for survivors was announced in November, but 24,000 survivors who spent less than six months in homes or were “boarded out” were excluded.

The Irish Network against Racism (INAR) counted 700 instances of racism in 2020, up from 530 in 2019. INAR noted that hate-speech reports nearly doubled between 2019 and 2020.

While existing legislation bans hate speech, Ireland lacks comprehensive hate-crime laws, and NGOs have criticized existing laws as dated and ineffective. The government proposed much-anticipated legislation in April 2021, which it intends to enact in 2022.

Supranational bodies have criticized ethnic discrimination within Ireland. In 2020, the EU Agency for Fundamental Rights reported that two-thirds of Irish Travellers and Roma face discrimination. The Council of Europe (CoE) called a 2017–21 inclusion strategy for both groups ineffective in a 2019 report. In August 2021, the Irish Traveller Movement reported on an ongoing housing crisis to the CoE.

People with disabilities face housing issues, are persistently institutionalized, and have suffered a severe reduction of social benefits in recent years. Advocacy groups criticized the government for operating disability services at reduced capacity during the COVID-19 pandemic. In July 2021, the Health Department published the results of a consultation that identified the need for substantially more investment.

Irish law prohibits discrimination based on sexual orientation, but some social stigma against LGBT+ people persists.

The asylum application process is complex, and asylum seekers can be housed for lengthy periods in poor living conditions in a system known as Direct Provision. In February 2021, the government published a white paper on replacing Direct Provision with a new model by the end of 2024.

The 2015 International Protection Law expedites asylum procedures but focuses on enabling deportations rather than identifying and processing cases. In a July 2021 report, the Irish Refugee Council highlighted extensive delays for protection-process applicants.

Discrimination in the workplace on the basis of gender is illegal, though there is still a substantial gender pay gap.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 16 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

There are ordinarily no restrictions on travel or the ability to change one's place of residence, employment, or education. Many COVID-19-related restrictions were gradually eased during 2021, though that process was delayed due to the spread of the Omicron variant.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 4 / 4

Private businesses are free to operate, and property rights are generally respected.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 4 / 4

Individuals in Ireland have gained expanded social freedoms in recent years. In a 2015 referendum, voters extended marriage rights to same-sex couples. That same year, the Children and Family Relationships Act extended adoption rights to same-sex and cohabiting couples, and the Gender Recognition Act allowed transgender individuals to obtain legal recognition without medical or state intervention, and—for married transgender people—without divorcing. In a 2018 referendum, voters abolished a constitutional amendment that made nearly all abortions illegal, and health providers began performing abortions in 2019.

In 2019, Ireland enacted the Domestic Violence Act 2018, which criminalized forms of emotional and psychological abuse. However, domestic and sexual violence against women remain serious problems, and marginalized and immigrant women have particular difficulty accessing support. The police's handling of emergency calls from victims of domestic abuse prompted an inquiry that was active in 2021. In June, Police Commissioner Harris apologized over the cancelling of calls related to domestic abuse.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 4 / 4

People generally enjoy equality of opportunity. Workers have rights and protections under employment legislation. Although the government works to combat human trafficking and protect victims, undocumented migrant workers remain at risk of trafficking and labor exploitation. In 2021, reports persisted around unsafe working conditions in Ireland's meat processing plants.

Israel

Population: 9,400,000

Capital: Jerusalem

Freedom Status: Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Note: The numerical scores and status listed above do not reflect conditions in the Gaza Strip or the West Bank, which are examined in separate reports. Although the international community generally considers East Jerusalem to be part of the occupied West Bank, it may be mentioned in this report when specific conditions there directly affect or overlap with conditions in Israel proper. Prior to its 2011 edition, Freedom in the World featured one report for Israeli-occupied portions of the West Bank and Gaza Strip and another for Palestinian-administered portions. Freedom in the World reports assess the level of political rights and civil liberties in a given geographical area, regardless of whether they are affected by the state, nonstate actors, or foreign powers. Disputed territories are sometimes assessed separately if they meet certain criteria, including boundaries that are sufficiently stable to allow year-on-year comparisons. For more information, see the report methodology and FAQ.

Overview: Israel is a parliamentary democracy with a multiparty system and independent institutions that guarantee political rights and civil liberties for most of the population. Although the judiciary is comparatively active in protecting minority rights, the political leadership and many in society have discriminated against Arab and other ethnic or religious minority populations, resulting in systemic disparities in areas including infrastructure, criminal justice, education, and economic opportunity.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- Parliamentary elections were held in March, after three previous elections since 2019 had failed to produce a stable governing majority. An alliance of parties from across the political spectrum formed a new government in June, with an Arab Islamist party—Ra'am—joining the coalition but not the cabinet. The right-leaning Likud party of outgoing prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu became the largest force in the opposition.

- In May, an outbreak of protests and violence related to a potential eviction of Palestinian residents in East Jerusalem escalated into broader intercommunal clashes in Israeli cities and towns with mixed Jewish and Arab populations, as well as rocket attacks from Palestinian militant groups in the Gaza Strip and retaliatory air strikes by the Israeli military.
- Opening arguments in Netanyahu's corruption trial were held in April, and witness testimony continued through the end of the year.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 34 / 40 (+1)

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 12 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

A largely ceremonial president is elected by the Knesset (parliament) for one seven-year term. In June 2021, Isaac Herzog, formerly the head of the Labor Party, was elected to replace outgoing president Reuven Rivlin, receiving 87 out of 120 votes.

The prime minister must have the support of a majority in the Knesset. In 2014, in a bid to create more stable governing coalitions, the electoral threshold for parties to win representation was raised from 2 percent to 3.25 percent, and the no-confidence procedure was revised so that opponents hoping to oust a sitting government must simultaneously vote in a new one. Despite this change, there are still many small parties in the political system, making it difficult to form majorities.

After the March 2021 elections, parties from across the political spectrum formed a new coalition government, ending the premiership of Likud's Benjamin Netanyahu, who had been in office since 2009. According to the coalition agreement, Naftali Bennett of the right-wing Yamina Party would serve as prime minister for about two years, after which Yair Lapid of the centrist Yesh Atid party would replace him until the next elections.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

Members of the 120-seat Knesset are elected to serve four-year terms through closed-list proportional representation using a single nationwide district, and elections are typically free and fair.

In the March 2021 elections, Likud won 30 seats, followed by Yesh Atid with 17. The rest of the parties captured fewer than 10 seats each: the ultra-Orthodox Shas and United Torah Judaism parties with 9 and 7, respectively; the centrist Blue and White with 8; the center-left Labor and the right-wing Yamina and Yisrael Beiteinu with 7 each; Religious Zionist, the Arab-led Joint List, the center-right New Hope, and the left-wing Meretz with 6 each; and the Arab Islamist party Ra'am with 4 seats.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 4 / 4

The fairness and integrity of elections are guaranteed by the Central Elections Committee (CEC), which is composed of delegations representing the various political groups in the Knesset, supported by a professional staff, and chaired by a Supreme Court judge. Elections are generally conducted in a peaceful and orderly manner, and all parties usually accept the results. Some Netanyahu allies made baseless claims of election fraud in 2021, and Netanyahu himself argued that the formation of the new coalition government amounted to fraud because it allegedly broke campaign promises and left the largest single party in opposition. However, the conduct of the elections, even amid the ongoing COVID-19 pandemic, was generally perceived as fair and successful.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 13 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 3 / 4

Israel hosts a diverse and competitive multiparty system. However, parties or candidates that deny Israel's Jewish character, oppose democracy, or incite racism are prohibited. These rules have occasionally been invoked against both far-right Jewish candidates and Arab candidates. The only such case to reach the Supreme Court ahead of the 2021 elections concerned an Arab candidate from the Labor Party, Ibtisam Mara'ana-Menuhin; the court voted 8–1 to uphold her candidacy in February.

Under a 2016 law, the Knesset can remove any sitting members who incite racism or support armed struggle against the state of Israel with a three-quarters majority vote; critics allege that the law is aimed at silencing Arab representatives.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 4 / 4

Israel has undergone multiple, peaceful rotations of power among rival political groups during its history, and the 2021 elections resulted in the replacement of the long-serving incumbent prime minister. Opposition parties have typically controlled many local governments, and Arab-majority towns are often run by independents or mayors from the Joint List.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 4 / 4

Israeli voters are generally free from coercion or undue influence by interest groups outside the political sphere. Political parties rely mostly on public subsidies for their financing. A 2017 law imposes funding restrictions on organizations that are not political parties but seek to influence elections. While it was aimed at limiting political interference by outside groups, critics of the law said its provisions could affect civil society activism surrounding elections and infringe on freedoms of association and expression. As of 2021, however, there was little evidence that the law was being actively enforced.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 2 / 4

Political power in Israel is held disproportionately by Jewish men; while Ashkenazim (Jews of European descent) have historically enjoyed particular advantages, Mizrahim (Jews of Middle Eastern descent) have gained representation in recent decades.

Women generally enjoy full political rights in law and in practice, though they remain somewhat underrepresented in leadership positions and can encounter additional obstacles in parties and communities—both Jewish and Arab—that are associated with religious or cultural conservatism. Shas and United Torah Judaism continued to exclude women from their candidate lists in 2021, while Ra'am elected its first woman Knesset member in 2020.

In 2018, the Knesset adopted a new “basic law” known as the nation-state law, which introduced the principle that the right to exercise self-determination in the State of Israel belongs uniquely to the Jewish people, among other discriminatory provisions. The basic laws of Israel are considered equivalent to a constitution, and critics of the nation-state law said it created a framework for the erosion of non-Jewish citizens' political and civil rights, though any such effects have been limited to date.

Arab citizens of Israel, who often identify as Palestinian, already faced some discrimination in practice, both legal and informal. Until 2021, no Arab party had ever been formally included in a governing coalition, and Arabs generally do not serve in senior positions in government. While Ra'am did join the governing coalition after the March elections, its members were not included in the cabinet. Members of other ethnic and religious minority populations, as well as LGBT+ Israelis, enjoy some representation in the Knesset and the political system more broadly.

The roughly 650,000 Jewish settlers in the West Bank and East Jerusalem are Israeli citizens and can participate in Israeli elections. Arab residents of East Jerusalem have the option of obtaining Israeli citizenship, though most decline for political reasons. While these noncitizens are entitled to vote in municipal as well as Palestinian Authority (PA) elections, most have traditionally boycotted Israeli municipal balloting, and Israel has restricted PA election activity in the city. A Palestinian Jerusalem resident who is not a citizen cannot become mayor under current Israeli law. Israeli law strips noncitizens of their Jerusalem residency if they are away for extended periods, and a law adopted in 2018 empowers the interior minister to revoke such residency for those deemed to be involved in terrorism or treason-related offenses. Citizenship and residency status are denied to Palestinian residents of the West Bank or Gaza Strip who are married to Israeli citizens.

Courts can revoke the citizenship of any Israeli convicted of spying, treason, or aiding the enemy. Separately, it was reported during 2017 that the Interior Ministry had revoked the citizenship of dozens and possibly thousands of Bedouins over several years, citing decades-old registration errors. Lawmakers have since raised questions about the legality of this ongoing practice.

Jewish immigrants and their immediate families are granted Israeli citizenship and residence rights. Other immigrants must apply for these rights, and it is extremely difficult in practice for non-Jewish migrant workers and asylum seekers to obtain citizenship.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 9 / 12 (+1)

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 4 / 4 (+1)

The government and parliament are free to set and implement policies and laws without undue interference from unelected entities.

In 2019, the failure of two successive elections to yield a governing majority meant that the country lacked a fully empowered government for the entire year, with the incumbents remaining in place in a caretaker capacity. The instability continued in 2020, as the government formed in the wake of elections that March collapsed after about seven months in office, necessitating the fourth round of balloting in just two years. However, the new coalition government that took office in June 2021 remained in place through the end of the year, and in November it won passage of the first budget bill since 2018.

Score Change: The score improved from 3 to 4 because the governing coalition that took power after the March elections was subsequently able to function and pass key legislation, ending a lengthy period of political instability.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 2 / 4

High-level corruption investigations are relatively frequent, with senior officials implicated in several scandals and criminal cases in recent years. In 2019, Netanyahu was indicted on separate charges of fraud, bribery, and breach of trust; police had recommended the charges in 2018 after conducting three investigations into his alleged acceptance of expensive gifts, his apparent attempt to collude with the owner of the newspaper Yedioth Ahronoth to secure positive coverage, and the granting of regulatory favors to telecommunications operator and media conglomerate Bezeq in return for positive coverage. Netanyahu denied the charges against him and accused law enforcement bodies of perpetrating “an attempted coup.” He refused to step down as prime minister after the indictment and continued to hold office through the first half of 2021, after which he became leader of the opposition. He also pursued legislative approval of an immunity bill that would shield him and other lawmakers from prosecution while in office, though the measure had not passed at year’s end. Opening arguments in Netanyahu’s trial were held in April 2021, and witness testimony continued through December.

Also during 2021, prosecutors filed indictments against several people in a long-running bribery case related to the purchase of naval vessels, though no charges were filed against two high-profile suspects—Netanyahu’s former personal attorney and a former navy commander. The new government was considering the formation of a commission of inquiry to further investigate the affair.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 3 / 4

Israel’s laws, political practices, civil society groups, and independent media generally ensure a substantial level of governmental transparency, though recent corruption cases have illustrated persistent shortcomings. The Freedom of Information Law grants every citizen and resident of Israel the right to receive information from a public authority. However, the law includes blanket exemptions that allow officials to withhold information on the armed forces, intelligence services, the Atomic Energy Agency, and the prison system, potentially enabling the concealment of abuses.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 42 / 60 (-1)

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 12 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 3 / 4

The Israeli media sector as a whole is vibrant and free to criticize government policy. While the scope of permissible reporting is generally broad, print articles on security matters are subject to a military censor. According to official statistics released in 2021, the military in 2020 partially redacted a total of 1,403 news items and fully barred publication of 116 others, out of 6,421 stories submitted for review; the figures represented a 10-year low. The Government Press Office has occasionally withheld press cards from journalists to restrict them from entering Israel, citing security considerations.

A 2017 law allows police and prosecutors to obtain court orders that require the blocking of websites found to publish criminal or offensive content. Freedom of expression advocates warned that the measure could permit the suppression of legitimate speech.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 3 / 4

While Israel defines itself as a Jewish state, freedom of religion is largely respected. Christian, Muslim, Druze, and Baha’i communities have jurisdiction over their own members in matters of marriage, divorce, and burial. The Orthodox establishment governs personal status matters among Jews, drawing objections from many non-Orthodox and secular Israelis. Most ultra-Orthodox Jews, or Haredim, have been excused from compulsory military service under a decades-old exemption for those engaged in full-time Torah study. The Supreme Court, having struck down the existing exemption law as unconstitutional in 2017, has called for the Knesset to adopt new guidelines or begin enforcing normal conscription rules, repeatedly extending deadlines for it to do so. Legislation intended to reach a compromise on the issue was under consideration during 2021.

Although the law protects the religious sites of non-Jewish groups, they face discrimination in the allocation of state resources as well as persistent cases of vandalism or harassment, which usually go unsolved.

Citing security concerns, Israeli authorities have set varying limits on access to the Temple Mount/Haram al-Sharif in East Jerusalem in recent years, affecting worshippers across the broader area. In 2021, it was reported that Israeli authorities had increasingly allowed Jewish prayer at the site without openly announcing a change in policy. At the Western Wall of the compound, long a site of Jewish prayer, rival advocacy groups have been engaged in an ongoing dispute over access for women and non-Orthodox Jewish worshippers.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 3 / 4

Primary and secondary education is universal, though divided into multiple public school systems (state, state-religious, independent religious, and Arabic) as well as private schools. School quality and resources are generally lower in mostly non-Jewish communities. A 2018 law bans groups that are in favor of legal action abroad against Israeli soldiers, or that otherwise undermine state educational goals by criticizing the military, from entering Israeli schools or interacting with students.

Israel's universities have long been centers for dissent and are open to all students, though security-related restrictions on movement limit access for West Bank and Gaza residents in practice. Any attempts to influence or restrict academic freedom at universities are generally blocked.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 3 / 4

While private discussion in Israel is generally open and free, there are some restrictions on political expression. For example, the 2011 Boycott Law exposes Israeli individuals and groups to civil lawsuits if they advocate an economic, cultural, or academic boycott of the state of Israel or West Bank settlements.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 8 / 12 (-1)

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 2 / 4 (-1)

Protests and demonstrations are widely permitted and typically peaceful. However, some protest activities—such as desecration of the flag of Israel or a friendly country—can draw serious criminal penalties, and police have sometimes attempted to restrict peaceful demonstrations. Protest activity continued throughout 2020 despite varying pandemic-related rules on social distancing. For several weeks during the year, the authorities prohibited individuals from participating in protests more than a kilometer from their homes.

In May 2021, the possible eviction of Palestinian families in the Sheikh Jarrah neighborhood of East Jerusalem sparked widespread protests, excessive police violence, and intercommunal clashes involving Arab and Jewish civilians in mixed towns within Israel. The unrest included destruction of property and vigilante attacks against unarmed residents. More than 2,000 people were arrested; while some Jews were among those detained, the vast majority were Arabs, suggesting likely police discrimination. Police were also accused of failing to protect Arab civilians from Jewish extremists.

Score Change: The score declined from 3 to 2 because a wave of protests in May were marred by excessive use of force by police, intercommunal mob violence, and incidents of vigilantism.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 2 / 4

The environment for nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) has deteriorated in recent years. A law that took effect in 2012 requires NGOs to submit financial reports four times a year on support received from foreign government sources. Under a 2016 law, NGOs that receive more than half of their funding from foreign governments must disclose this fact publicly and in any written or oral communications with elected officials. The measure mainly affects groups associated with the political left that oppose Israel's policies toward the Palestinians; foreign funding for right-leaning groups that support Jewish settlements in the West Bank, for example, more often comes from private sources.

A 2017 law bars access to the country for any foreign individuals or groups that publicly support a boycott of Israel or its West Bank settlements. The measure was criticized by civil society organizations as an obstacle to the activities of many pro-Palestinian and human rights groups. In 2019, the Supreme Court upheld a deportation order that authorities had issued the previous year against Human Rights Watch's regional director, Omar Shakir, in part because the organization had called on businesses to stop operating in West Bank settlements to avoid complicity in human rights abuses.

In October 2021, Israeli authorities designated six civil society organizations that work in the West Bank as terrorist organizations. The government provided little evidence that the groups, some of which received funding from European governments, had links to militant activity, and the move was criticized by international human rights organizations and UN experts as an attack on the broader Palestinian human rights movement.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 4 / 4

Workers may join unions and have the right to strike and bargain collectively. Most of the workforce either belongs to Histadrut, the national labor federation, or is covered by its social programs and bargaining agreements. Histadrut also competes with independent union organizations.

F. RULE OF LAW: 11 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 4 / 4

The judiciary is independent and regularly rules against the government. The Supreme Court has historically played a crucial role in protecting minority groups and overturning decisions by the government and the parliament when they threaten human rights. The court hears direct petitions from citizens and other individuals in Israel as well as Palestinian residents of the West Bank and Gaza Strip, and the state generally adheres to court rulings.

Some right-wing politicians have advocated reforms that would allow the Knesset to override the Supreme Court when it strikes down legislation. However, lawmakers overwhelmingly rejected such a bill in 2020.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 3 / 4

Although due process is largely guaranteed in ordinary cases, those suspected of security-related offenses are subject to special legal provisions. Individuals can be held in administrative detention without trial for renewable six-month terms. According to human rights groups, there were more than 4,000 Palestinians from the occupied territories held in Israeli facilities on security grounds as of October 2021, including nearly 500 in administrative detention. Under criminal law, individuals suspected of security offenses can be held for up to 96 hours without judicial review under certain circumstances, and be denied access to an attorney for up to 21 days.

Scores of Palestinian children (aged 12–17) from the occupied territories are held in Israeli military detention. Although Israeli law prohibits the detention of children younger than 12, some are occasionally held. Most Palestinian child detainees are serving sentences—handed down by a special military court for minors created in 2009—for throwing stones or other projectiles at Israeli troops in the West Bank; acquittals on such charges are very rare, and the military courts have been criticized for a lack of due process protections. East Jerusalem Palestinian minors are tried in Israeli civilian juvenile courts.

Israeli border communities receive occasional rocket and artillery fire from militant groups in the Gaza Strip, and more rarely from Lebanon and Syria. In May 2021, a spike in rocket attacks from Gaza in conjunction with the Sheikh Jarrah protests killed about a dozen Israeli civilians, prompting more deadly Israeli air strikes in return. Israeli security forces and civilians also face the ongoing threat of small-scale terrorist attacks, most often involving stabbings or vehicular assaults. Human rights groups have sometimes accused police of using deadly force against stone throwers or perpetrators of stabbing and vehicular attacks when they did not pose a lethal threat.

A record 126 murders were recorded in Arab communities in Israel in 2021, surpassing a previous record set in 2020. Arabs account for the vast majority of murder victims each year despite representing about a fifth of the population, and police are far less likely to solve murders with Arab as opposed to Jewish victims. As part of a coordinated government response to the problem, the November 2021 budget legislation included new spending on socioeconomic development and law enforcement in Arab communities, and the domestic intelligence service was deployed to help combat criminal activity, drawing mixed reactions from Arab politicians and activists.

The Supreme Court banned torture in a 1999 ruling, but said physical coercion might be permissible during interrogations in cases involving an imminent threat. Human rights organizations accuse the authorities of continuing to use some forms of physical abuse and other measures such as isolation, sleep deprivation, psychological threats and pressure, painful binding, and humiliation.

Jewish citizens of Israel, particularly those of Ashkenazi descent, typically enjoy practical advantages relative to the rest of the population on matters including legal treatment and socioeconomic conditions.

Arab or Palestinian citizens of Israel face de facto discrimination in education, social services, personal security, and access to housing and related permits. Aside from men who belong to the Druze minority, they are exempted from military conscription, though they may volunteer. Those who do not serve are ineligible for the associated benefits, including scholarships and housing loans. The 2018 nation-state law downgraded Arabic from an official language of the country to a language with “special status,” while another clause said the change would not “affect the status given to the Arabic language before this law came into force,” suggesting that it would be a largely symbolic demotion. In 2019, the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD) released a report that found a significant and growing gap between the abilities of Hebrew-speaking students and those of their Arabic-speaking peers in Israeli schools.

The 2018 nation-state law also declared that the state “views the development of Jewish settlement as a national value, and shall act to encourage and promote its establishment and strengthening.” The Jewish National Fund (JNF-KKL), which owns about 13 percent of the land in Israel, has effectively maintained a Jewish-only land-leasing policy thanks to a land-swap arrangement with the Israel Land Authority, which grants the JNF-KKL replacement property whenever an Arab bidder obtains a parcel of its land.

Many of Israel’s Bedouin citizens live in towns and villages that are not recognized by the state. Those in unrecognized villages cannot claim social services, are in some cases off the electricity grid, and have no official land rights, and the government routinely demolishes their unlicensed structures.

Israelis of Ethiopian origin suffer from discrimination—including in the criminal justice system—and lag behind the general population economically despite government integration efforts.

Women are treated equally in criminal and civil courts and have achieved substantial parity within Israeli society, though economic and other forms of discrimination persist, particularly among Arab and religious Jewish communities. Arab women are far less likely to be employed than either Arab men or Jewish women.

Discrimination based on sexual orientation is illegal, though LGBT+ people continue to face bias in some communities. Gay and transgender Israelis are permitted to serve openly in the military.

Individuals who enter the country irregularly, including asylum seekers, can be detained for up to a year without charges. Asylum applications, when fully processed, are nearly always rejected. In recent years the authorities have pressured thousands of African migrants and asylum seekers who entered the country irregularly—mostly from Eritrea and Sudan—to agree to be repatriated or deported to a third country, such as Rwanda or Uganda. There have been few new irregular entries since a barrier along the border with Egypt was completed in 2013, though there were more than 30,000 asylum seekers in the country as of 2021.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 11 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 3 / 4

Security measures can sometimes present obstacles to freedom of movement, though military checkpoints are restricted to the West Bank. Informal local rules that prevent driving on the Sabbath and Jewish holidays can also hamper free movement. Some movement restrictions have been imposed for public health purposes during the COVID-19 pandemic, but they were generally limited in duration and grounded in genuine epidemiological concerns.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 3 / 4

Property rights within Israel are effectively protected, and business activity is generally free of undue interference. Businesses face a low risk of expropriation or criminal activity, and corruption is not a major obstacle for private investors. However, the authorities’ general commitment to property rights has been called into question given their handling of unrecognized Bedouin villages and their settlement policies in the occupied territories.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 3 / 4

Personal social freedoms are generally guaranteed. However, since religious courts oversee personal status issues, women face some disadvantages in divorce and other matters. Many ultra-Orthodox Jewish communities attempt to enforce unofficial rules on gender separation and personal attire. Marriages between Jews and non-Jews are not recognized by the state unless conducted abroad, nor are marriages involving a Muslim woman and a non-Muslim man. Israel recognizes same-sex marriages conducted abroad. Nonbiological parents in same-sex partnerships are eligible for guardianship rights. A 2018 law extended surrogacy rights to women without a male partner but not to men without a female partner, effectively excluding gay men.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 2 / 4

Israel remains a destination for human-trafficking victims, and African migrants and asylum seekers residing in the country are especially vulnerable to forced labor and sex trafficking. The government works actively to combat trafficking and protect victims. Israel's legal foreign workers are formally protected from exploitation by employers, but these guarantees are poorly enforced. A smaller number of foreigners work in the country illegally. Histadrut has opened membership to foreign workers and called on employers to grant them equal rights. Discrimination against and exploitation of Palestinians from the occupied territories working in Israel remains commonplace.

Italy

Population: 60,300,000

Capital: Rome

Freedom Status: Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Italy's parliamentary system features competitive multiparty elections. Civil liberties are generally respected, but concerns about the rights of migrants persist, and regional inequalities are substantial and persistent. Endemic problems of corruption and organized crime pose an enduring challenge to the rule of law and economic growth.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- Following months of instability, the center-left governing coalition collapsed when coalition partner Italia Viva withdrew its support, leading to the resignation of prime minister Giuseppe Conte. After Conte stepped down, the president appointed the former head of the European Central Bank (ECB), Mario Draghi, to the role, calling on him to form a new unity government; Draghi's government was confirmed by a majority in both houses of parliament in February.
 - In October, a protest against vaccine mandates turned violent when members of the neofascist Forza Nuova (New Force) party vandalized the headquarters of a prominent labor union and attempted to break into prime minister Draghi's office. Nearly 40 police officers were injured during the protest, which resulted in at least 12 arrests.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 36 / 40A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 12 / 12*A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

Parliament and regional representatives elect the president, whose role is largely ceremonial but sometimes politically influential, for a seven-year term. The legitimacy of the presidential vote rests largely on the fairness of legislative elections. Sergio Mattarella, a former constitutional judge backed by the center-left Democratic Party (PD), was elected president in 2015.

The president appoints the prime minister, who serves as head of government and is often, but not always, the leader of the largest party in the Chamber of Deputies, Italy's lower house. The prime minister proposes a Council of Ministers that requires confirmation by parliament.

Giuseppe Conte, an independent law professor who was not a member of parliament, became prime minister in June 2018 as part of the coalition agreement between the Five Star Movement and the League. After the dissolution of the coalition in August 2019, Conte was reinstated as prime minister of the new government formed by the Five Star Movement, the PD, the Free and Equals (LeU), and Italia Viva.

Conte resigned as prime minister in January 2021 after the collapse of his second coalition government. Following Conte's resignation, Mattarella asked the former president of the ECB, Mario Draghi, to form a new unity government. Draghi, who was not a member of parliament, was able to secure the support of nearly all of Italy's major political parties, and was sworn into office in February. The same month, an overwhelming majority in both houses of parliament voted to confirm Draghi's government.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The bicameral parliament consists of the 630-member Chamber of Deputies and the 315-member Senate. Members of both houses are popularly elected for five-year terms, though the president can appoint five additional senators, and former presidents are also entitled to Senate seats. In a September 2020 referendum, 70 percent of Italians voted in favor of cutting the Chamber of Deputies to 400 seats, and the Senate to 200. The changes will take effect in 2023.

The March 2018 elections were considered free and fair by international observers. However, the resulting center-right coalition government led by the League party and the Five Star Movement collapsed in August 2019 amid a coalitional crisis provoked by League leader Matteo Salvini. That September, a new government was forged by a coalition including the Five Star Movement, the PD, and LeU, later joined by Italia Viva. The second coalition government collapsed in January 2021, after Italia Viva withdrew from the ruling coalition following months of instability. The political crisis was resolved in February, when a new unity government was formed, headed by Mario Draghi and backed by all of Italy's major political parties, with the exception of the far-right Brothers of Italy party. Draghi's government maintained the support of the majority of the parliament throughout the year, and has enjoyed relatively high levels of credibility and stability.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 4 / 4

While Italy's electoral framework and campaign finance regulations are complex, the elections they enable have consistently been deemed fair and credible.

The current electoral law, adopted by parliament in 2017, introduced a mixed system in both houses, with 36 percent of seats allocated using the first-past-the-post method, and 64 percent using a proportional, party-list method. The law encouraged coalition governments, as demonstrated by the 2018 election results.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 14 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 4 / 4

Political parties are generally able to form and operate freely, and the political landscape features a high level of pluralism and competition. Since the beginning of the 1990s, politics have been characterized by unstable coalitions and the frequent emergence of new parties.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 4 / 4

Italy has a long record of frequent changes in the governing coalition, with multiple transfers of power since the early 1990s.

Municipal elections held in October 2021 saw a shift toward center-left coalitions within the local governments of many of Italy's largest cities, with right-wing parties entering the opposition.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 3 / 4

The public is generally free to make political choices without undue interference. However, organized crime groups retain some ability to intimidate and influence politicians, especially at the local level, and to establish corruption networks abetted by public administrators. In 2021, the government dissolved several town councils over ties to local mafia-like groups.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 3 / 4

Electoral laws contain provisions designed to encourage political participation by linguistic minorities, and to promote gender parity, though progress toward full political representation for women and LGBT+ people remains slow.

The extremely limited political participation rights accorded to migrants limits their voice in national politics, a dynamic exacerbated by the emergence of a xenophobic and nationalist discourse in recent years. In October 2020, the government amended the tightened restrictions on citizenship and naturalization enacted in 2018, but maintained several provisions that imposed barriers to citizenship, including a lengthy processing period and an Italian-language proficiency requirement.

European Union (EU) citizens are entitled to vote in local elections.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 10 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 4 / 4

Elected officials are able to craft and implement policy without improper interference from unelected entities. However, Italy has not yet adopted comprehensive lobbying regulations at the national level.

The president selected Mario Draghi, who did not then hold elected office, to form a new government in February 2021. Draghi became prime minister later that month, and both houses of parliament confirmed his Cabinet in a landslide vote; his government enjoys wide-ranging political support, and is able to determine the country's policies.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 3 / 4

Corruption remains a serious problem despite long-term efforts to combat it, and its impact is exacerbated when officials and members of organized crime networks jointly carry out graft schemes. Since 2018, Italy has strengthened its anticorruption framework. An anticorruption law adopted in 2019 tightened sanctions for corruption, reformed statutes of limitation to limit stalling tactics, and extended existing antimafia investigative tools to include corruption offenses. Despite this increased capacity, many sectors require additional reforms to limit graft, including public procurement.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 3 / 4

The legal framework mandates administrative transparency and access to public information through the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) adopted in 2016. Although the legislation designates access to information as a fundamental right, efforts to ensure compliance with FOIA requests by public administrators remain incomplete.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 54 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 15 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 3 / 4

Freedom of the press is constitutionally guaranteed. Despite the rapid growth of the online news industry, traditional media still play a large role in news consumption. There are more than 100 daily newspapers, most of them locally or regionally based, as well as political party papers, free papers, and weekly publications. Concentration of ownership remains a major concern. Internet access is generally unrestricted.

Italy's Ministry of the Interior registered 232 acts of intimidation against journalists in 2021, representing a 42 percent increase from the 163 such events recorded the previous year. Organized crime threats—which have resulted in permanent police protection for a number of journalists—accounted for 11 percent of the acts, while 49 percent were attributed to social or political motivations.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 4 / 4

Religious freedom is constitutionally guaranteed and respected in practice. There is no official religion; while the Roman Catholic Church receives certain benefits under a treaty with the state, other groups have access to similar benefits through their own accords.

Some local governments have raised obstacles to the construction and recognition of mosques, and right-wing political parties have stoked anti-Muslim attitudes. Antisemitic acts have also trended upward in recent years.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

Academic freedom is generally respected.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 4 / 4

People are typically able to freely discuss controversial or sensitive topics in public without fear of surveillance or retribution.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 12 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

The freedom to assemble peacefully is guaranteed in the constitution and typically upheld in practice. COVID-19 containment measures included restrictions on freedom of assembly in both 2020 and 2021, though demonstrations against lockdown measures took place throughout both years. Some antilockdown demonstrations sparked violent clashes between protesters and police, including in October 2021, when members of the neofascist Forza Nuova party vandalized the headquarters of a prominent labor union and attempted to break into Draghi's office during a protest against vaccine mandates. Nearly 40 police officers were injured during the protest, which resulted in at least 12 arrests.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights– and governance-related work? 4 / 4

Nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) are generally free to organize and operate. In 2018 and 2019, Italian authorities engaged in repeated standoffs with NGO-operated ships involved in rescue operations of trafficked and smuggled migrants and refugees in the Mediterranean Sea. In 2019 new decrees limited access to Italian ports, leading to extended wait times for disembarkation that created serious health risks for migrants, and imposed large potential fines for noncompliance. In October 2020, the government amended the decrees, lowering—though not eliminating—the fines. In 2021, despite existing restrictions and repeated delays, a number of people rescued in NGO operations were allowed to disembark in Italian ports.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 4 / 4

Trade unions are generally free to organize and operate. The constitution recognizes the right to strike but places restrictions on strikes by employees in essential sectors like transportation, sanitation, and health, as well as by some self-employed individuals, including lawyers, doctors, and truck drivers.

COVID-19 containment measures did not include restrictions on the right to strike. In June 2021, the government lifted a COVID-19-related ban on firing workers in the construction and manufacturing industries; the protections were extended until October for textile and garment workers.

F. RULE OF LAW: 13 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 4 / 4

The judiciary is generally independent and autonomous. Allegations of abuse of power and corruption involving members of the High Council of the Judiciary, which controls internal governance of the judiciary, have led to reform efforts, including an August 2020 proposal to improve the Council's accountability and transparency; the bill remained pending in parliament as of the end of 2020.

Organized crime networks continue to threaten judges and prosecutors involved in anti-mafia processes, particularly in Calabria, but state protection measures function adequately, and both attacks and the incidence of mafia-related judicial corruption have declined overall in recent years.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 3 / 4

Due process rights are largely upheld. However, judicial procedures are often characterized by lengthy delays; Italy has one of the lowest numbers of judges per capita in the European Union. The government has been criticized for denying detained migrants access to lawyers. In September 2021, the parliament approved a number of criminal justice reforms, including a requirement that initial appeals be resolved within two years.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 3 / 4

While the population is generally free from major threats to physical security, there have been reports of excessive use of force by police and prison guards, particularly against undocumented migrants. Asylum seekers and undocumented migrants have been held in overcrowded and unhygienic conditions. In 2021, Italy suspended more than 50 prison guards after a news website published video footage that showed the guards physically assaulting inmates who were staging a protest to demand protection against the spread of COVID-19.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 3 / 4

The law prohibits discrimination based on gender, race, and sexual orientation, among other categories, and these protections are generally enforced. However, members of the Romany minority have unequal access to housing, and many live in segregated settlements that lack adequate infrastructure. LGBT+ people face societal discrimination and occasional acts of violence. In October 2021, the Senate blocked a bill that would define violence against women and LGBT+ people as a hate crime.

Italy's treatment of migrants, refugees, and asylum seekers has been subject to significant criticism in recent years. In late 2018, parliament approved legal changes that tightened conditions for granting asylum and humanitarian protection, reduced access to services, and eased deportation conditions. A decree enacted in October 2020 allows migrants and refugees to apply for residency on humanitarian protection grounds if they "risk being subjected to torture or inhumane treatment" at home and expands access to public services, but does not offer regularized status to those who lost legal residency under the 2018 decrees.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 14 / 16G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

Individuals are generally free to travel and to change their place of residence, employment, and education.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 3 / 4

The legal and regulatory framework supports property rights and the operation of private businesses, but corruption and organized crime can hinder normal business activity, as can onerous bureaucratic obstacles. Delays in court proceedings often undermine enforcement of protections for property rights.

According to experts on organized crime, mafia groups exploited the social and economic crises provoked by the COVID-19 pandemic, distributing goods and expanding control of cash-starved local businesses via loan-sharking and money-laundering operations.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 4 / 4

The law protects individual freedom on personal status issues such as marriage and divorce. Same-sex civil unions with nearly all the benefits of marriage are permitted, and courts have begun to recognize second-parent adoption rights for same-sex couples. Though public awareness of the problem of domestic violence is increasing due to advocacy campaigns, it remains a persistent issue, and calls to the national domestic violence rose significantly during the COVID-19 lockdown.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 3 / 4

In the last few years, Italy has adopted measures to combat human trafficking and labor exploitation, but both phenomena remain concerns, especially with respect to asylum seekers, refugees, and migrants from Eastern Europe. The COVID-19 pandemic increased migrants' vulnerability to exploitation and worsened labor and living conditions, even as many were excluded from large-scale government aid programs instituted in response to the crisis. During 2020, the government assented to demands by Italy's major trade union confederations and repeatedly extended a ban on firing workers amid the coronavirus emergency. The ban was extended to June 2021 for workers in the construction and manufacturing sectors, and through October for those in the textile and garment industries.

The trafficking of women and girls for sexual exploitation remains a concern. In a positive step, 2020 amendments to the 2018 immigration decrees ended asylum seekers' exclusion from access to reception centers, which had left victims of trafficking without assistance.

Jamaica

Population: 2,800,000

Capital: Kingston

Freedom Status: Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Jamaica's political system is democratic and features competitive elections and orderly rotations of power. However, corruption remains a serious problem, and long-standing relationships between officials and organized crime figures are thought to persist. Violent crime remains a concern, as does harassment and violence against LGBT+ people.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- In February, the Inter-American Commission of Human Rights (IACHR) published a ruling finding Jamaica to be in violation of the American Convention of Human Rights (ACHR) for its anti-LGBT+ legislation. The IACHR recommended that the government revise legislation to ensure that all forms of discrimination based on sexual orientation or gender identity or expression are prohibited; Jamaica's justice minister rejected the ruling, and the government had not moved to implement the IACHR's recommendations before year's end.
 - The minister of agriculture, Floyd Green, resigned in September after a video that showed him violating COVID-19-related lockdown regulations emerged. Various restrictions on movement, including curfews and "no-movement days," were intermittently imposed during the year as part of the government's strategy to curb the spread of the coronavirus.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 34 / 40A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 12 / 12*A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The British monarch is the ceremonial head of state and is represented by a governor general. The prime minister is the head of government; the position is appointed after elections by the governor general, and usually goes to the leader of the majority party or coalition. The prime minister's legitimacy rests largely on the conduct of legislative elections, which in Jamaica are generally free and fair. Jamaica Labour Party (JLP) leader Andrew Holness became prime minister after the party's narrow win in the 2016 election; he retained and strengthened his position in the 2020 election.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

Jamaica's bicameral Parliament consists of a 63-member House of Representatives, elected for five years, and a 21-member Senate, with 13 senators appointed on the advice of the prime minister and 8 on the advice of the opposition leader. Senators also serve five-year terms.

In 2020, the governing JLP won a convincing victory, taking 57 percent of the vote; given the dynamics of Jamaica's first-past-the-post electoral system, this translated to wins in 49 districts. The elections were considered free and fair. However, due to COVID-19 and voter apathy, turnout was by far the lowest in the country's history (other than the People's National Party [PNP]–boycotted election in 1983), at just 37 percent.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 4 / 4

Electoral laws are generally fair, and they are implemented impartially by the Electoral Commission of Jamaica.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 13 / 16B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 4 / 4

Political parties form and operate without restriction. Although various smaller parties are active, politics at the national level are dominated by the social democratic PNP and the more conservative JLP.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 4 / 4

Opposition parties operate freely, and political power has alternated between the PNP and JLP.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 2 / 4

Powerful criminal organizations can influence voters who live in areas under their control. These organizations have used intimidation or other tactics to ensure high voter turnout for particular candidates or parties in exchange for political favors; there were scattered reports of such activity in the 2020 election.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 3 / 4

Women are underrepresented in politics. Eleven women were elected to the lower house in 2016, amounting to 17.5 percent of the body. The situation improved somewhat in 2020, with a record eighteen women elected, or 29 percent.

The LGBT+ community experiences harassment and violence, and this limits the ability of openly LGBT+ people to engage in political and electoral processes. Political attacks are often couched in anti-LGBT+ rhetoric.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 9 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 4 / 4

The elected prime minister and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government. However, powerful criminal groups, as well as corruption in politics, can affect democratic policymaking.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 3 / 4

Long-standing links between officials and organized crime figures persist. Government bodies continue to pursue corruption investigations, and cases often end in convictions. However, there are criticisms in the media and from nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) that authorities are reluctant to pursue some cases, while others are subject to extensive delays. Government whistleblowers are not well protected.

New legal efforts to fight corruption have been mounted in recent years. These include the approval of the Integrity Commission Act of 2017, which requires lawmakers and public officials to disclose their income, liabilities, and assets; the act also streamlined anticorruption laws and empowered a single commission to monitor compliance. The Integrity Commission began its work in 2018, and in May 2021, publicly asserted its independence, saying that it would not accept political interference in “when or how” it chooses to carry out its mandate. However, its effectiveness has been limited by several high-profile resignations, delays in issuing reports, and a lack of prosecutions resulting from its work. Additionally, the parliamentary Integrity Commission Oversight Committee (ICOC), which is tasked with assessing the Commission’s recommendations on how to improve anticorruption legislation, has largely failed to fulfil its duties.

In a 2019 report to the Senate, the Integrity Commission warned that managers at oil refining firm Petrojam had spent J$2.6 million ($19,700) on birthday parties, and that the firm was unable to justify major outlays. Investigations into graft at Petrojam continued during 2021. Both the former chairman and general manager of Petrojam were arrested in March 2021 and charged with obtaining money via false pretenses and aiding and abetting that effort, respectively. Additional fraud-related charges were filed against both individuals in October.

In October 2019, former education minister Ruel Reid, two relatives, and Caribbean Maritime University (CMU) president Fritz Pinnock were arrested on suspicion of corruption, fraud, and the misappropriation of as much as J$50 million ($380,000) in public funds for their personal use. The case remained pending as of the end of 2021.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 2 / 4

An access to information law has been in effect since 2004, though it contains a number of exemptions. Legislative processes are often opaque.

In September 2020, the JLP government rescinded an informal convention that placed six pivotal parliamentary oversight committees under opposition leadership; officials cited alleged PNP ineffectiveness to justify appointing government legislators to head four of the committees.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 46 / 60D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 15 / 16*D1. Are there free and independent media? 4 / 4

The constitutional right to free expression is generally respected. Most newspapers are privately owned and express a variety of views. Broadcast media are largely publicly owned but espouse similarly pluralistic points of view. Journalists occasionally face intimidation, especially in the run up to elections.

In June 2020, Parliament passed a data protection bill that critics suggested was overly broad in scope and could allow authorities to compel journalists investigated under its provisions to reveal their sources.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 4 / 4

Freedom of religion is constitutionally protected and generally respected in practice. While laws banning Obeah—an Afro-Caribbean shamanistic religion—remain on the books, they are not actively enforced.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

The government does not restrict academic freedom.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 3 / 4

Individuals are generally free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics. However, the presence of powerful criminal groups in some urban neighborhoods can discourage people from talking openly about such groups' activities.

In 2017, the House of Representatives passed a bill establishing the groundwork for a National Identification System (NIDS). Privacy advocates expressed concern about possible overcollection of people's personal information, and in 2019, the Supreme Court ruled the NIDS unconstitutional, stating that a requirement that citizens submit biometric data infringed on Jamaicans' privacy. In 2020, the government revised the bill, making enrollment voluntary. The House of Representatives passed the legislation in October 2021, as did the Senate in November.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 11 / 12E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

Freedom of assembly is provided for by the constitution and is largely respected in practice. Protests are occasionally marred by violence or otherwise unsafe conditions, though such events in recent years have been held without major incident. During 2021, several unauthorized protests against the country's COVID-19 vaccination program led to arrests.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 4 / 4

Jamaica has a robust and vibrant civil society with many active community groups. However, some struggle financially or have difficulty attracting volunteers, negatively impacting their levels of engagement. Others are funded by the central government, but for the most part act autonomously. NGOs are well represented in the education, health, and environment sectors, and many provide support for the most marginalized groups in society.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 3 / 4

Around 20 percent of the workforce is unionized, and antiunion discrimination is illegal. Labor unions are politically influential and have the right to strike. However, workers in essential services must undergo an arbitration process with the Ministry of Labor and Social Security before they may legally strike, and the definition of the work constituting “essential services” is broad. There are reports of private employers laying off unionized workers and then later hiring them as contract workers.

The Industrial Disputes Tribunal (IDT) is allowed to reinstate workers whose dismissals are found to be unjustified, although cases before the IDT often take much longer to settle than the 21 days stipulated by the law.

F. RULE OF LAW: 9 / 16F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 4 / 4

Judicial independence is guaranteed by the constitution, and while the judiciary is widely considered independent, corruption remains a problem in some lower courts.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 2 / 4

A large backlog of cases and a shortage of court staff at all levels continue to undermine the justice system. The vast majority of arrests are made without a warrant, detainees frequently lack access to legal counsel, and trials are often delayed for many years or dismissed due to systemic failures. In order to reduce the backlog, the government passed the 2017 Criminal Justice (Plea Negotiations and Agreements) Act, which increased avenues for the resolution of cases outside of trial. Since its passage, prosecutors, judges, and government officials have noted an unwillingness from some defendants to consider plea deals.

Killings by police remain a serious problem in Jamaica. According to the government’s Independent Commission of Investigations, 127 people were shot and killed by security personnel in 2021. Prosecutions for illegal killings by members of the security forces are rare.

Gang and vigilante violence remain common. Police reported 1,463 murders in 2021—an increase of 10.6 percent compared to 2020—giving Jamaica the highest homicide rate (approximately 49.4 per 100,000) in the Americas in 2021. The country is a transit point for cocaine, and much of the island’s violence is the result of warfare between drug-trafficking organizations. Kingston’s insular “garrison” communities, home to scores of gangs, remain the epicenter of violence and serve as safe havens for criminal groups. Many initiatives to address the problem have been undertaken by successive governments, but crime and violence remain deeply entrenched.

States of emergency (SOEs), which provide expanded authority to the security forces, are frequently imposed in response to localized spikes in violence. In February 2021, the government announced that no SOEs would be issued until an appeal against a 2020

Supreme Court ruling—which declared the months-long detention of five men without charge under an SOE to be unconstitutional—had been resolved. However, the government announced new SOEs in seven police divisions in November, though the appeal remained undecided through year’s end.

Harassment and violence targeting LGBT+ people remains a major concern, and such instances are frequently ignored by the police. Anti-LGBT+ discrimination is pervasive.

In 2014, the government expanded the Offences Against the Person Act to criminalize the promotion of violence against any category of persons, including LGBT+ individuals, via audio or visual materials. Jamaica’s first public pride event took place in 2015, and subsequent events have grown larger, though they are still met with government reticence. Some high-profile politicians have also spoken out publicly in support of the Jamaica Forum of Lesbians, All-Sexuals and Gays (J-FLAG), a rights group, in recent years. In November 2020, the government accepted several recommendations made by the United Nations Human Rights Council (UNHRC), including strengthening antidiscrimination policies and improving investigations into cases of violence against LGBT+ people.

Legislation against sodomy, which is punishable by 10 years in prison with hard labor, has been challenged in court and at the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights (IACHR). In 2018, a parliamentary subcommittee proposed a national referendum on repealing Jamaica’s antisodomy law; a view supported by Prime Minister Holness. However, that approach was criticized by LGBT+ activists, who felt legislators should scrap the law themselves. In February 2021, the IACHR published a nonbinding decision stating that Jamaica’s laws against sodomy violate the American Convention of Human Rights (ACHR). The IACHR made several recommendations, including that the government repeal parts of the Offences Against the Person Act, ensuring that all forms of discrimination based on sexual orientation or gender identity or expression are prohibited. Jamaica’s justice minister rejected the ruling, and the government had not moved to implement the IACHR’s recommendations before year’s end.

Women enjoy the same legal rights as men but suffer employment discrimination and tend to earn less than men for performing the same job. Acceptance of Rastafarians is increasing, but discrimination persists, particularly in schools.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 11 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 3 / 4

Although there are constitutional guarantees of freedom of movement, political and communal violence frequently precludes the full enjoyment of this right. States of emergency are regularly enacted, with residents of affected areas facing roadblocks, random searches, and identity checks. There are no formal restrictions on people’s ability to change their place of employment or education.

Various restrictions on movement, including curfews and “no-movement days,” were intermittently imposed during 2020 and 2021 in response to the spread of COVID-19. In September 2021, then minister of agriculture Floyd Green resigned after a video that showed him violating COVID-19-related lockdown regulations was released.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 3 / 4

Jamaica has an active private sector and a powerful probusiness lobby. Individuals are free to establish businesses subject to legal requirements, which are not onerous. Recent reforms have included expediting the incorporation process, making electricity in Kingston more consistent, and easing the import process. However, corruption and crime can still hamper normal business activity.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 2 / 4

Legal protections for women and girls are poorly enforced, and violence and discrimination remain widespread. There is no blanket ban on spousal rape, nor are there laws against sexual harassment. Child abuse, including sexual abuse, is widespread.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 3 / 4

Residents of neighborhoods where criminal groups are influential are at a heightened risk of becoming victims of human traffickers. Because of the poverty in certain communities and high-profile tourism industry, child sex tourism is present in some of Jamaica's resort areas, according to local NGOs.

Japan

Population: 126,400,000

Capital: Tokyo

Freedom Status: Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Japan is a multiparty parliamentary democracy. The ruling Liberal Democratic Party (LDP) has governed almost continuously since 1955, with stints in opposition from 1993 to 1994 and 2009 to 2012. Political rights and civil liberties are generally well respected. Outstanding challenges include ethnic and gender-based discrimination and claims of improperly close relations between government and the business sector.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- The head of the Tokyo Olympics organizing committee resigned in February after his sexist remarks drew widespread criticism and renewed debate about gender discrimination in Japan. The Olympics, originally scheduled for 2020, proceeded in July and August despite the ongoing COVID-19 pandemic.
- In March, a Sri Lankan woman died in a detention facility after being held since August 2020 for overstaying her visa. An investigation found that immigration authorities had failed to provide appropriate medical care as her health deteriorated.
- In September, having lost public and party support, Prime Minister Yoshihide Suga announced that he would not seek reelection as the LDP's leader and would step down from his government post. The LDP held a party caucus later that month and chose Fumio Kishida as its new leader; Kishida then took office as prime minister.
- In October, the LDP retained its majority in elections for the lower house of parliament, confirming Kishida's premiership.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 40 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 12 / 12A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The prime minister is the head of government and is chosen by the freely elected parliament. The prime minister selects the cabinet, which can include a limited number of ministers who are not members of the parliament. Japan's emperor serves as head of state in a ceremonial capacity.

Yoshihide Suga, the prime minister since September 2020, announced in September 2021 that he would not stand for reelection as the LDP's leader later that month, having lost public and political support during his short time in office. The party chose Fumio Kishida as its new leader, and the parliament voted to confirm him as prime minister a few days later.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The parliament, or Diet, has two chambers. The more powerful lower house, the House of Representatives, has 465 members elected to maximum four-year terms through a mixture of single-member districts and proportional representation. The upper house, the House of Councillors, has 245 members serving fixed six-year terms, with half elected every three years using a mixture of nationwide proportional representation and prefecture-based voting. The prime minister and his cabinet can dissolve the lower house, but not the upper house. The lower house can also pass a no-confidence resolution that forces the cabinet to either resign or dissolve the lower house.

Legislative elections in Japan are free and fair. In the October 2021 lower house elections, the LDP won 259 seats, and an allied party, Komeito, took 32. Some independents later joined the LDP, adding to its majority. The opposition Constitutional Democratic Party (CDP) won 96 seats, and smaller parties and independents captured the remainder. In July 2019 elections for the upper house, the LDP-led coalition retained 71 seats out of the 124 contested, giving it a comfortable majority of 141 seats in the chamber, although it fell short of the two-thirds supermajority required to revise the constitution. The CDP won 17 seats, and other seats went to smaller parties and independents.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 4 / 4

Japan's electoral laws are generally fair and well enforced. Campaigning is heavily regulated, which typically benefits incumbents, although the rules are applied equally to all candidates. In March 2021, a former LDP justice minister announced his resignation from the lower house after pleading guilty to vote buying in connection with his wife's campaign for an upper house seat in 2019.

Malapportionment in favor of the rural districts from which the LDP draws significant support has been a persistent problem, despite a series of reforms to reduce the disparity with urban districts. A 2020 Supreme Court ruling upheld the constitutionality of the most recent upper house elections, but called on lawmakers to address the remaining gap in voting power between the most and least populated constituencies. A new round of redistricting was expected to take place in 2022.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 16 / 16B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 4 / 4

Parties generally do not face undue restrictions on registration or operation. Nine parties were represented in the Diet as of 2021, and independents also held a number of seats. Splits and mergers among existing parties are not uncommon.

While the LDP has governed for most of Japan's postwar history, there have been democratic transfers of power to and from alternative parties. Opposition parties are represented in the parliament and govern at the subnational level.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 4 / 4

People's political choices are generally free from improper interference by powerful interests that are not democratically accountable.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 4 / 4

Citizens enjoy equal rights to vote and run in elections regardless of gender, ethnicity, religion, sexual orientation, or gender identity.

Women remain underrepresented in government. There were two women contenders in the September 2021 contest to select a new LDP president. A nonbinding 2018 gender parity law urges parties to nominate equal numbers of male and female candidates. In the 2021 lower house elections, 17.7 percent of all candidates and 9.7 of winning candidates were women.

Around 600,000 ethnic Koreans born in Japan hold special residency privileges but not Japanese citizenship, meaning they are ineligible to participate in any elections at the national and local levels. Most but not all are South Korean nationals, and they have the option of applying for Japanese citizenship.

The Ainu, an Indigenous people numbering at least 20,000, live mostly on the northern island of Hokkaido. The Ainu Party was launched in 2012 to increase their political representation, though it has yet to win seats in the Diet.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 12 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 4 / 4

Elected officials are free to govern without undue interference, though senior civil servants have some influence over policy.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 4 / 4

The prevalence of corruption in government is relatively low, media coverage of political corruption scandals is widespread and vigorous, and officials who are implicated face criminal prosecution. For instance, a former agriculture minister was indicted in January 2021 on a charge of receiving bribes from an egg production company.

Some government officials have close relations with business leaders. Retiring bureaucrats often quickly secure high-paying positions with companies that receive significant government contracts. It was revealed in March 2021 that a television production company had treated officials from the Ministry of Internal Affairs and Communications to expensive meals in order to secure favorable regulatory decisions.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 4 / 4

The government generally operates with openness and transparency. Access to information legislation allows individuals to request information from government agencies, though in practice the law has not always been implemented effectively. Government officials have at times withheld information from lawmakers and the public in connection with political scandals. An internal file released in June 2021 by the Ministry of Finance revealed that a senior government official had directly instructed employees to alter documents related to a controversial sale of state-owned land.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 56 / 60D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 15 / 16*D1. Are there free and independent media? 3 / 4

Freedom of the press is guaranteed in the constitution, and Japan has a highly competitive media sector. However, press freedom advocates have expressed concern about a 2014 law that allows journalists to be prosecuted for revealing state secrets, even if the information was unknowingly obtained. A 2017 report by the UN special rapporteur on freedom of expression noted concern about pressure on the media from the government, and recommended the repeal of Article 4 of the Broadcast Act, which gives the government the power to determine what information is “fair” and thus acceptable for public broadcast.

Under the traditional kisha kurabu (press club) system, institutions such as government ministries and corporate organizations have restricted the release of news to journalists and media outlets with membership in their clubs. While the club system has been criticized for privileging the major dailies and other established outlets that belong to it and potentially encouraging self-censorship, in recent years online media and weekly newsmagazines have challenged the daily papers’ dominance of political news with more aggressive reporting.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 4 / 4

Freedom of religion is guaranteed by the constitution, and there are no substantial barriers to religious practice or the expression of nonbelief.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

Academic freedom is constitutionally guaranteed and mostly respected in practice, but education and textbooks have long been a focus of public and political debate. While there is not a national curriculum or single official history text, the Ministry of Education’s screening process has approved textbooks that downplay Japan’s history of imperialism and war atrocities.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 4 / 4

The government generally does not restrict personal expression or private discussion. Some observers have raised concerns that antiterrorism and anticonspiracy legislation that went into effect in 2017 could permit undue surveillance.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 12 / 12E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

Freedom of assembly is protected under the constitution, and peaceful demonstrations take place frequently. In 2021, protests were held on topics including opposition to proceeding with the Olympic Games in Tokyo amid the COVID-19 pandemic, gender discrimination, and racial discrimination against foreigners.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights– and governance-related work? 4 / 4

Nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) are generally free from undue restrictions and remained diverse and active in 2021.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 4 / 4

Most workers have the legal right to organize, bargain collectively, and strike. However, public-sector workers are barred from striking, and some, such as firefighters and prison staff, cannot form unions. Labor unions are active and exert political influence through the Japanese Trade Union Confederation and other groupings.

F. RULE OF LAW: 15 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 4 / 4

Japan's judiciary is independent, and judges cannot be removed arbitrarily. For serious criminal cases, a judicial panel composed of professional judges and saiban-in (lay judges), selected from the general public, render verdicts.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 4 / 4

Constitutional guarantees of due process are generally upheld. However, observers have argued that trials often favor the prosecution. There are reports that suspects have been detained on flimsy evidence, arrested multiple times for the same alleged crime, or subjected to lengthy interrogations that yield what amount to forced confessions. Police can detain suspects for up to 23 days without charge. Access to those in pretrial detention is sometimes limited.

Legislation adopted in 2017 added nearly 300 categories of conspiracy offenses to the criminal code in order to help unravel terrorist plots and organized crime networks. Critics of the changes raised concerns that they gave the government too much authority to restrict civil liberties.
