In March 2021, human rights defender Izzat Amon was stripped of his Russian citizenship and deported to Tajikistan at Dushanbe's request. In October, Amon was convicted of fraud and received a nine-year prison term.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 1 / 4

Citizens have the legal right to form and join trade unions and to bargain collectively, but these rights and the right to strike are effectively undermined by restrictions on freedoms of assembly and association. There are no laws against antiunion discrimination by employers, and the country's trade union federation is government-controlled.

F. RULE OF LAW: 1 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 0 / 4

The judiciary lacks independence. Many judges are poorly trained and inexperienced, and bribery is widespread. The 2016 constitutional amendments abolished the Council of Justice, transferring the authority for most judicial nomination and oversight functions to the Supreme Court. However, these powers remain under executive control in practice. The courts' opaque and biased adjudication of cases against opposition figures and other dissidents, particularly since 2015, has demonstrated their subordination to the regime.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 0 / 4

Arbitrary arrests and detentions are common, as is corruption among law enforcement agencies. Defendants are often denied timely access to an attorney, and politically fraught trials are frequently closed to the public. Nearly all defendants are found guilty.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 0 / 4

Civilians are subject to physical abuse by security forces and have no meaningful recourse against such abuse. Detainees are reportedly beaten in custody to extract confessions. In June 2021, three police officers were convicted of torturing an individual who confessed to murder in 2017 and was later released after the actual offender was found.

Tajikistani and Kyrgyzstani forces engaged in fighting during 2021. Forces from both countries clashed along the border over two days in April before a cease-fire was declared;

Tajikistani authorities reported 19 deaths and 87 injuries from the fighting. Other officers and soldiers were killed along the border in the following months.

Overcrowding and disease contribute to life-threatening conditions in prisons.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 1 / 4

Women face bias and disparate treatment in the workplace. LGBT+ people face discrimination and abuse by security forces. There is no legislation against discrimination based on sexual orientation or gender identity.

Dushanbe attempted to seal the Tajikistan-Afghanistan border after the elected Afghan government fell in August 2021, though women and children entered in small numbers. In mid-October, a government official reported that 15,000 refugees were present in Tajikistan.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 4 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 1 / 4

Most citizens can travel domestically but must register their permanent residence with local authorities. Students interested in studying Islamic theology are forbidden from seeking education abroad. Some areas, particularly Gorno-Badakhshan and other areas bordering Afghanistan, feature a heavier security presence, which hampers travel and provides opportunities for extortion and other abuses.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 1 / 4

By law, all land belongs to the state. Corruption and regulatory dysfunction affect enterprises of varying sizes. The president's extended family and others from Kulob District maintain extensive business interests and dominate key economic sectors, impeding business activity by those without such connections.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 1 / 4

Although forced marriage and polygamy are legally prohibited, marriages arranged by parents and religious marriages that allow polygamy are both common in practice. Because of local interpretations of Sharia (Islamic law), women are often unable to exercise their rights to divorce. Domestic violence is widespread, but cases are underreported and seldom investigated adequately.

Women reportedly face societal pressure to wear headscarves. Meanwhile, in addition to restricting hijabs for women and beards for men, the government interferes more broadly in matters of personal appearance. A 2018 guidebook outlined acceptable and unacceptable styles of dress for women, barring clothing that could be deemed immodest or "foreign" in origin.

Safeguards against forms of labor exploitation and hazardous working conditions are poorly enforced. Economic conditions have compelled citizens to seek work abroad in large numbers; these migrant workers are at risk of exploitation by human traffickers.

According to the US State Department's Trafficking in Persons 2021 report, authorities work to combat human trafficking by prosecuting traffickers and supporting survivors via a state-run shelter, among other activities. However, government officials suspected of involvement in trafficking are not investigated.

Tanzania

Population: 62,100,000

Capital: Dodoma

Freedom Status: Partly Free

Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: Tanzania has held regular multiparty elections since its transition from a one-party state in the early 1990s, but the opposition remains relatively weak. The ruling Chama cha Mapinduzi (CCM) has retained power for over 60 years. Since the election of late president John Magufuli in 2015, the government has cracked down with growing severity on its critics in the political opposition, the press, and civil society. Samia Suluhu Hassan, Magufuli's vice president, became the country's first ever female chief executive after Magufuli died in 2021.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- President Magufuli's death was announced on March 17 by his successor, then vice president Hassan. Opposition leaders and a Kenyan newspaper reported that Magufuli contracted COVID-19 and sought treatment in Kenya; however, the government initially denied reports that Magufuli was ill and later blamed his death on heart disease.
- The Hassan administration continued to target and restrict media outlets during the year, despite lifting a ban on media outlets in April. In August, the government suspended the CCM-owned Uhuru newspaper for reporting that Hassan may not seek a full term in 2025. In September, weekly publication Raia Mwema was suspended for 30 days for reporting purportedly false news.
- In July, Freeman Mbowe, the chairman of the opposition Chama cha Demokrasia na Maendeleo (Chadema), was arrested ahead of a speech on constitutional reform and was charged with terrorism. Mbowe, whose lawyer claimed that he was tortured after his arrest, remained in custody at year's end.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 12 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 3 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 1 / 4

The president is elected by direct popular vote for up to two five-year terms. In the event of the president's death, the vice president assumes the post and completes their predecessor's term. Samia Suluhu Hassan, vice president since 2015, became president in March 2021 after Magufuli died.

The late president won the October 2020 presidential election with 84.5 percent of the vote in a contest that was markedly less free and fair than the 2015 election, which he had won with 58 percent. The 2020 election was marred by widespread fraud and vote-rigging; threats of violence against opposition figures; the use of force by police against participants at opposition rallies; the suspension of media outlets and social media; the obstruction and dispersal of opposition candidate Tundu Lissu's rallies, and other irregularities. International and local observers were denied accreditation, as were many international media outlets. Turnout was just 50 percent, down from 67 percent in the previous poll.

Opposition parties rejected the results and called for protests. Soon after, opposition figures involved in organizing planned demonstrations were arrested, and a widespread protest movement never emerged. Lissu fled to Belgium in November 2020 with assistance from several European governments and the United States.

The semiautonomous region of Zanzibar elects its own president, who serves no more than two five-year terms. The 2020 Zanzibar presidential poll, held concurrently with the October general elections, was also marred in controversy. The Zanzibar Electoral Commission (ZEC) announced that CCM candidate Hussein Mwinyi defeated Alliance for Change and Transparency (ACT-Wazalendo) candidate Seif Sharif Hamad, taking 76.3 percent to Hamad's 19.9 percent. The ACT-Wazalendo rejected the results. Before the polls opened, the regime mobilized the army to Zanzibar, and Hamad was detained by the police. The army and police were accused of firing into a crowd days before the election, killing several people; members of the crowd were reportedly attempting to stop the delivery of ballots suspected to be fraudulent. Hamad was detained on his way to an early voting location and was held during the election period.

Reports of further detentions emerged after the election, with killings and torture of detainees reported. Some opposition politicians and activists were detained indefinitely and others were released severely injured from torture. That November, the ACT-Wazalendo agreed to form a unity government in Zanzibar, with Hamad becoming vice president. The development prompted co-optation accusations.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 1 / 4

Legislative authority lies with a unicameral, 393-seat National Assembly (the Bunge) whose members serve five-year terms. There are 264 seats filled through direct elections in single-member constituencies, while 113 are reserved for women elected by political parties, 10 are filled by presidential appointment, and 5 members are elected by the Zanzibar legislature. The attorney general holds an ex officio seat.

Unlike the 2015 poll, the 2020 legislative election was marred by extensive fraud and intimidation allegations. Widespread interference in nomination processes, both bureaucratic and physical, led to around 30 opposition candidates being denied a spot on the ballot. Numerous legislative and local government candidates were detained during the campaign period, including high-profile Chadema lawmakers Godbless Lema and Halima Mdee. On election day, opposition politicians complained of election interference and fraud; 97 percent of the directly elected seats went to the CCM, which substantially increased its majority.

The opposition was granted a small number of women's special seats in line with their share of the vote. Initially, Chadema refused to take those seats. However, a group of 19 female Chadema legislators defected, were seated in the legislature, and were then formally expelled from the party. Several of these women took their seats upon being released from police custody, prompting speculation of coercion.

Members of Zanzibar's 85-seat House of Representatives serve five-year terms and are installed through a mix of direct elections and appointments. The 2015 legislative elections were annulled along with the concurrent Zanzibari presidential vote, and an opposition boycott of the 2016 rerun left the CCM with full control of the regional legislature. The 2020 legislative elections in Zanzibar were also marred by allegations of fraud.

The CCM was believed to have won control of most of Tanzania's approximately 200 local authorities in 2020. Opposition parties previously controlled a significant minority of local governments, including almost all urban councils.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 1 / 4

The National Electoral Commission (NEC) is responsible for overseeing countrywide elections, while the ZEC conducts elections for Zanzibar's governing institutions.

The structures of both bodies contribute to doubts about their independence. The NEC is appointed by the Tanzanian president. Magufuli's appointment of a former CCM candidate as NEC director in 2019 was criticized by the Chadema and ACT-Wazalendo leaders. The NEC was criticized for poor administration of voter registration processes ahead of the 2020 elections, and it oversaw the rejection of dozens of legislative and local candidates on technicalities. That October, the NEC ordered the suspension of Lissu's presidential campaign for a week, saying he had used incendiary language. Opposition parties accused the NEC of complicity in widespread ballot stuffing and use of "ghost voters" to increase CCM vote shares. The NEC did not release the full results of local government or legislative elections in 2020.

Opposition parties and nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) have called for constitutional reform, saying the current constitution favors the ruling CCM. In May 2021, Chadema vowed to boycott the 2025 presidential election without a new constitution. In separate remarks in June, however, President Hassan and a high-ranking CCM official both said constitutional reform was not an immediate priority. In August, the NEC proposed a set of electoral reforms to Hassan at an event boycotted by opposition parties.

The ZEC is appointed by the Zanzibari president, though the opposition nominates two of the seven members. In 2018, then president Ali Mohamed Shein appointed seven new members to the commission. While some observers approved of Shein's choices, others accused the new members of being CCM partisans. ACT-Wazalendo presidential candidate Hamad accused the ZEC of failing to register over 100,000 young voters who reached voting age between 2015 and 2020.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 5 / 16B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 1 / 4

Tanzanians have the right to organize into political parties, but the ruling CCM enjoys considerable incumbency advantages that stifle competition. The system of state funding for parties under the Political Parties Act (PPA) of 2015 disproportionately benefits the CCM. Political parties are regulated by a presidentially appointed registrar whom the opposition criticizes for partisan bias.

Authorities have stepped up efforts to constrain opposition parties in recent years. In 2016, the government banned all political rallies and demonstrations outside election periods, sharply curtailing parties' ability to mobilize public support. In 2019, the CCM government passed PPA amendments that further eroded the rights of opposition groups. The amendments included empowering a government minister to regulate party coalition formation, a ban on internationally sourced political fundraising, a rule prohibiting parties from engaging in "activism," and the introduction of tools that the registrar can use to investigate and interfere with the internal operations of targeted parties. The amendments also gave the registrar legal immunity, further reducing that office's accountability.

The Hassan administration targeted opposition activities since taking power. In July 2021, Chadema chairman Freeman Mbowe and at least 10 other Chadema members were arrested before Mbowe was to give a speech on constitutional reform. Mbowe was charged with terrorism later that month and remained in custody at year's end. In September, police arrested nine Chadema members ahead of a planned meeting on constitutional reform. In October, Chadema claimed that the head of its Council of Elders, Hashimu Issa Juma, was held by police; police later confirmed that Juma was detained on charges including sedition.

The CCM has achieved growing success in its efforts to co-opt opposition politicians, which critics have attributed to bribery, coercion, and other inducements. A group of female Chadema members defected to take special parliamentary seats after the 2020 elections. Several were released from jail, where they faced politicized charges, in order to be sworn in.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 1 / 4

The CCM has governed without interruption for over 60 years. The opposition's electoral prospects are limited due to interference, harassment, co-optation, deadly violence against activists, and criminal prosecutions. Opposition candidates posted their best-ever electoral performance in the 2015 legislative elections, winning 45 percent of the vote, but secured only 29 percent of the National Assembly's seats. The political space for opposition parties narrowed further during the 2020 election, with severe repression leaving little opportunity to win support or gain power. Despite the accession of a new president in March 2021, there has been no improvement in opposition prospects.

Opposition parties are hindered by poor relations. ACT-Wazalendo leader Zitto Kabwe struck a conciliatory tone with President Hassan at a cross-party conference, requesting she use "all legal channels" to release Mbowe in December 2021. Chadema rejected Kabwe's comments as "begging," saying his request was akin to an apology on behalf of Mbowe.

Chadema lawmaker Tundu Lissu, who traveled abroad to recover after a 2017 attempted assassination, returned to Tanzania to stand as Chadema's presidential candidate in 2020. Lissu fled for Belgium after the polls and remained in exile as of the end of 2021. Lissu had also been named as a defendant in a 2016 sedition case against three journalists, though the director of public prosecutions said he would not pursue those charges in September 2021.

CCM efforts to convince or coerce opposition politicians to defect to government benches escalated significantly in 2020. Opposition politicians including Ester Bulaya and Halima Mdee agreed to cooperate with the government as independent politicians in parliament, breaking with Chadema. ACT-Wazalendo leader Kabwe agreed that his party would form a unity government in Zanzibar.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 1 / 4

Tanzanian voters and politicians are subject to significant undue influence from unaccountable entities using antidemocratic tactics. During his tenure, Magufuli exerted pressure through local administrative authorities, particularly presidentially appointed regional and district commissioners. These officials are technically nonpartisan, but most are CCM loyalists or former security personnel. They have significant power within their jurisdictions and have been especially repressive when overseeing opposition-oriented areas. President Hassan appointed new regional commissioners in May 2021 and new district commissioners in June. Some appointees came from opposition groups or were nonpartisan, though hard-liners maintained some posts.

Civil servants in opposition-controlled councils are under significant pressure to follow directives from CCM officials, rather than elected opposition politicians. The government has sought to remove elected municipal leaders, and arbitrarily threatened and barred the movements and activities of critical NGOs and human rights advocates. The 2019 local elections, which the opposition boycotted due to widespread candidate disqualifications, were notably managed by the government ministry that also supervises regional and district commissioners.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 2 / 4

Members of ethnic, religious, and other minority groups ostensibly have full political rights, but the participation of some groups is limited in practice. Magufuli, a member of the Sukuma ethnic group, often appointed fellow Sukuma to government positions during his tenure. This represented a departure from predecessors who balanced ethnic and religious groups. The Magufuli-era imbalance that favored the Sukuma remains to a lesser extent under President Hassan.

Women hold 36.8 percent of legislative seats as of March 2021; the constitution requires that 30 percent of seats are held by women. However, women are underrepresented in directly elected seats, which are consistently won by male candidates. Women who run for office face mistreatment; during the 2020 campaign, Chadema candidate Catherine Ruge was arrested, stripped, and beaten by police as she stood for election in the male-dominated Serengeti constituency.

Hassan, who became Tanzania's first female president after Magufuli's death, appointed Stergomena Tax as its first defense minister in September 2021. However, misogynistic discourse and behavior has persisted. In June, CCM legislator Condester Sichalwe was ordered to leave the chamber after a male colleague criticized her clothing. In August, Hassan made public comments denigrating the appearance of female athletes. In October, Catherine Ruge criticized the arrest of female Chadema supporters while they were jogging.

LGBT+ people, who face the risk of arrest and harsh discrimination, cannot openly advance their political interests.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 4 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 1 / 4

Magufuli consolidated political power in the presidency, sidelining the legislature—in part by suppressing dissent within the ruling party—and exerting greater control over cabinet ministers through dismissals and reshuffles. The CCM government actively manages the activities of legislators and has threatened those who are frequently absent. Bills are sometimes passed using “certificates of urgency,” which speeds the legislative process.

President Hassan and pro-Magufuli legislators clashed over COVID-19 policy during 2021. Three CCM legislators who openly dissented from Hassan's policies were censured in September.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 2 / 4

Corruption remains a problem in Tanzania, and reform efforts have yielded mixed results. The Prevention and Combating of Corruption Bureau (PCCB) has been accused of focusing on low-level corruption and doing little to address graft committed by senior officials.

In recent years, several scandals have exposed higher-level corruption. In 2020, nine senior PCCB staff and 22 senior officials at the Tanzanian Revenue Authority were suspended for major corruption in two separate incidents. In March 2021, the Tanzanian Ports Authority's director general was arrested for embezzlement.

Public funds are mismanaged; recent audits have revealed that funds were misappropriated or unaccounted for. In April 2021, the auditor general's office reported significant financial irregularities at local government authorities. The office also reported losses in publicly owned Air Tanzania, despite officials claiming it was profitable during the Magufuli administration.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 1 / 4

A weak access to information act was adopted in 2016. The law imposes prison terms on officials who improperly release information but assigns no clear penalties for those who improperly withhold information. The Statistics Act was amended in 2019 to remove criminal liability for publishing information that conflicts with the National Bureau of Statistics, but the government generally continued to resist transparency efforts and punish journalists and civil society groups that attempted to expose official wrongdoing. Live broadcasts of parliamentary sessions have been suspended in recent years.

The government has also been opaque about the COVID-19 pandemic, especially under Magufuli. Magufuli declared that the coronavirus was "defeated" in 2020, and suspended the head of the country's testing laboratory after questioning the accuracy of tests. Authorities stopped publishing figures of COVID-19 infections and deaths in April 2020. The government more openly endorsed COVID-19 mitigation measures after Magufuli's death. It began releasing statistics on deaths and infections in June 2021, though these figures are considered underestimates.

The government was not transparent about President Magufuli's health. Officials, including then vice president Hassan, denied rumors that he was severely ill in early 2021. Opposition leaders, however, claimed that Magufuli had contracted COVID-19 and sought treatment in Kenya. Then vice president Hassan announced Magufuli's death on March 17, blaming heart disease. Kenyan press accounts contradicted the government's announcement, with the Daily Nation reporting that Magufuli was sent to Nairobi for treatment before being returned to Tanzania and dying on March 11.

Before the pandemic, the government was suspected of manipulating economic statistics. In 2019, Tanzania was accused of blocking the publication of an International Monetary Fund report that criticized "unpredictable" economic policies, a claim that was denied by a government spokesman.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 22 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 7 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 1 / 4

Independent journalists and media outlets are subject to harsh repression in Tanzania. The 2016 Media Services Act grants the government broad authority over media content and the licensing of outlets and journalists. It also prescribes severe penalties, including prison terms, for publication of defamatory, seditious, or other illegal content.

Sustained legal and regulatory pressure on journalists and the expression of other public figures has contributed to self-censorship and other suppression of news coverage. In a December 2021 report, the University of Dar es Salaam cited government pressure as a factor in the media sector's pro-CCM bias during the 2020 elections. The government also threatened to arrest journalists who reported on Magufuli's health in early 2021.

There was initial hope that President Hassan would open the media environment. In April 2021, she ordered that a ban on media outlets be lifted. However, the government subsequently continued to target journalists and outlets. In August, it suspended Uhuru for 14 days, after it reported that Hassan may not seek a new term in 2025. In September, the government suspended Raia Mwema for 30 days for publishing news deemed false. That same month, political cartoonist Oppertus John Fwema was arrested after posting a cartoon critical of President Hassan to Instagram.

The 2018 Electronic and Postal Communications (Online Content) Regulations require bloggers and owners of online discussion platforms and streaming services to pay more than $900 in annual registration fees.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 3 / 4

Freedom of religion is generally respected and interfaith relations are largely peaceful, though periodic sectarian violence has occurred. Muslims are believed to be a minority nationwide, but almost all Zanzibaris practice Islam. Political tensions between mainland Tanzania and Zanzibar often play out along religious lines. The government occasionally raises the specter of interreligious conflict as an excuse to detain political rivals, contributing to a general sense that Muslims are sometimes treated unfairly by authorities.

Religious services were not restricted in Tanzania during the COVID-19 pandemic. Religious leaders resisted Magufuli's COVID-19 denialism during his rule, and actively opposed COVID-19 and vaccine skepticism after his death.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 2 / 4

Academic freedom in Tanzania was harmed by the passage of the 2015 Statistics Act. This law requires data released publicly to be first approved by the National Bureau of Statistics and prescribes fines, a minimum of three years in prison, or both for anyone who disputes official government figures. The law was amended in 2019 to remove criminal liability for publishing independent data, though it was unclear whether the change would strengthen academic freedom in practice. Tanzanian academics engage in self-censorship, though scholars sometimes release reports critical of the government.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 1 / 4

The government historically monitored the population through a neighborhood-level CCM cell structure and has policed personal expression on social media in recent years. Under laws including the 2015 Cybercrimes Act and the 2018 Electronic and Postal Communications (Online Content) Regulations, social media users have been prosecuted for offenses such as insulting the president. Vague prohibitions on communication that “causes annoyance” or “leads to public disorder” have confused users as to what constitutes a violation and empowered authorities to suppress unfavorable speech at their discretion. The Electronic and Postal Communications (Online Content) Regulations 2020 prohibits “spreading rumors” or insulting the nation online. In early 2021, several citizens were arrested for commenting on President Magufuli's illness and death online.

Under Magufuli, the Tanzanian government consulted with Hacking Team—a firm that provides electronic surveillance capacity—and signed cybersecurity collaboration agreements with the South Korean and Israeli governments. In 2019, recordings of CCM leaders criticizing Magufuli were publicly leaked in an apparent attempt to demonstrate pervasive surveillance and encourage self-censorship. Magufuli admitted in 2019 to monitoring the digital communications of some ministers. In 2020, the Tanzanian authorities reportedly used Twitter copyright rules to force regime critics off the service, which serves as one of the last remaining uncensored spaces for domestic discussion of Tanzanian politics.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 4 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 1 / 4

The constitution guarantees freedom of assembly, but the government limits this right through legal mechanisms, restrictions on social media platforms used to organize, and outright violence. Organizers must notify the police 48 hours in advance of any demonstration, and police have broad discretion to prohibit gatherings that could threaten public safety or public order. A ban on political rallies has been in place since mid-2016. The 2019 amendments to the PPA further restricted public assembly, in part by broadening the scope of activities that are deemed “political.”

In 2021, the government used heavy-handed tactics to disperse and prevent meetings related to constitutional reform. In July, police surrounded the Mwanza hotel where the opposition planned to hold a forum before arresting Freeman Mbowe. In August, police arrested Chadema members who protested Mbowe’s July arrest. In September, police in the town of Musoma arrested nine Chadema members who were organizing another event on the constitution.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights– and governance-related work? 1 / 4

Tanzania has a diverse and active civil society sector, but NGOs are subject to laws that give the government broad authority to deregister them. Human rights organizations and activists been subject to restrictions, deregistration, legal harassment, and unlawful arrests. NGOs are prohibited from filing public-interest litigation. NGOs are also subject to onerous financial reporting requirements. In September 2021, President Hassan called on NGOs to reduce their dependence on foreign funding while speaking at a national conference.

In 2020, the Tanzania Human Rights Defenders Coalition and the Legal and Human Rights Centre (LHRC) were threatened with deregistration and banned from election-related activities they had overseen in previous elections. Human rights lawyer and LHRC employee Tito Magoti and information technology specialist Theodory Giyani were arrested in 2019 and arraigned on spurious money laundering and cybercrimes charges. Magoti was released in January 2021 but was ordered to pay fines.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 2 / 4

Trade unions are nominally independent of the government and are coordinated by the Trade Union Congress of Tanzania and the Zanzibar Trade Union Congress. The Tanzania Federation of Cooperatives represents most of Tanzania’s agricultural sector. The government has significant discretion to deny union registration, and many private employers engage in antiunion activities. Essential public-sector workers are barred from striking, and other workers are restricted by complex notification and mediation requirements. Strikes are infrequent on both the mainland and Zanzibar.

F. RULE OF LAW: 4 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 1 / 4

Tanzania’s judiciary is underfunded. Judges are political appointees, and the judiciary does not have an independent budget, making it vulnerable to political pressure. The results of such pressure are particularly evident in cases involving opposition figures and government critics, as well as legal changes that suppress free and fair competition and protect the regime from prosecution. Politicized courts have enforced laws that attack human rights and are selectively invoked to keep the government in power. Lower-level courts are especially affected by political influence and corruption. Under a 2020 Court of Appeal ruling, the government can hold suspects without bail for several offenses including money laundering—a charge commonly levied against political opponents.

In June 2021, the High Court in Dar es Salaam ordered that several Chadema members, including Mbowe, should be reimbursed for fines related to 2018 convictions that the court overturned.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 1 / 4

Due process guarantees are not well upheld in civil and criminal matters. Policies and rules governing arrest and pretrial detention are often ignored, and pretrial detention commonly lasts for years due to case backlogs and inadequate funding for prosecutors. Legal activists have been known to suffer repercussions for seeking justice through courts. Arbitrary and often violent arrests of opposition politicians, journalists, and civil society leaders are commonplace.

Security offices and militia members engaged in violence against opposition activists and civilians in Zanzibar after being deployed during the 2020 election but have not faced justice since.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 1 / 4

Reports of abuse and torture of suspects in police custody are common, and police have been accused of extrajudicial killings and other violence in recent years. In August 2021, a lawyer representing Chadema leader Mbowe told a court that Mbowe was tortured while in custody. In October, Chadema activist Mdude Nyangali disclosed that he was subjected to torture.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 1 / 4

Women's rights are constitutionally guaranteed but not uniformly protected. Women face de facto discrimination in employment, including sexual harassment, which is rarely addressed through formal legal channels. Women's socioeconomic disadvantages are more pronounced in rural areas and in the informal economy.

Same-sex sexual relations are punishable by lengthy prison terms, and LGBT+ people face discrimination and police abuse, leading most to hide aspects of their identities. Men who are suspected of same-sex sexual activity have been arrested and forced to undergo anal examinations.

Nearly 126,000 Burundian refugees resided in Tanzania as of December 2021, while 150,000 resided there in late 2020. Burundian refugees have been forcibly repatriated; in 2020, Human Rights Watch (HRW) reported that Burundian and Tanzanian authorities collaborated to identify Burundian political opponents and those discouraging repatriation, and found that refugees were tortured and forcibly returned to Burundi in violation of international law. In April 2021, the United Nations reported that Burundian refugees and asylum seekers feared abduction by Tanzanian authorities.

Pastoralist ethnic groups do not enjoy equal treatment, particularly when it comes to land disputes. These groups often live near lucrative national parks, and the government has engaged in heavy-handed treatment of those who refuse to comply with government directives to move. In 2018, opposition leader Zitto Kabwe reported that around 100 people had died in clashes between local officials and pastoralists in Kigoma Region. In February 2021, the Livestock and Fisheries Ministry said it would work with local and regional authorities to demarcate grazing lands nationwide.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 7 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 2 / 4

Residents enjoy some basic freedoms pertaining to travel and changes of residence, employment, and education. The government has wide discretion in enforcing laws that can limit movement, particularly in Zanzibar, where the approval of local government appointees is often required for changes in employment, personal banking, and residency. Separately, the authorities in recent years have arbitrarily arrested and deported some Kenyans, many of whom had been granted Tanzanian citizenship. The government imposes travel restrictions on activists, human rights researchers, opposition figures, and other prominent individuals. Opposition politicians who were under threat of violence struggled to leave Tanzania after the 2020 election.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 2 / 4

Tanzanians have the right to establish private businesses but are often required to pay bribes to license and operate them. The state owns all land and leases it to individuals and private entities, leading to clashes over land rights between citizens and companies engaged in extractive industries. These laws have been used to expropriate the resources and lands of wealthy opposition politicians, including Freeman Mbowe's holdings in Hai and Dar es Salaam. President Hassan has sought to reassure domestic and international investors that the government would take a less active role in the economy.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 1 / 4

Rape, domestic violence, and female genital mutilation (FGM) are common but rarely prosecuted. An escalating pattern of rapes in which the attackers break into women's homes has been reported in recent years in western Tanzania. In September 2021, Tanzanian police opened an investigation into claims that several officers sexually harassed and raped nightclub patrons.

Laws and practices regarding marriage, divorce, and other personal status issues favor men over women, particularly in Zanzibar. Tanzania's adolescent fertility rate is more than twice the global average.

The government restricts access to family planning services. In 2019, the government encouraged women to help increase the country's birth rate and spur the economy. In 2017, the government prohibited those who had given birth from returning to school. The Hassan administration overturned this ban in a nonbinding decision in November 2021.

Sexual and labor exploitation remain problems, especially for children living in poor rural areas who are drawn into domestic service, agricultural labor, mining, and other activities. Child labor in gold mines, where working conditions are often dangerous, is common.

Most Tanzanians do not benefit from the country's extensive natural-resource wealth. Tanzania has one of the highest levels of income inequality in the world, and the poverty rate remains high.

Thailand

Population: 66,700,000

Capital: Bangkok

Freedom Status: Not Free

Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: Following five years of military dictatorship, Thailand transitioned to a military-dominated, semielected government in 2019. The combination of democratic deterioration and frustrations over the role of the monarchy in Thailand's governance has since triggered massive demonstrations. In response, the regime continues to employ authoritarian tactics, including arbitrary arrests, intimidation, lèse-majesté charges, and harassment of activists. Press freedom is constrained, due process is not guaranteed, and there is impunity for crimes committed against activists.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- Regular antigovernment protests were held beginning in June, with participants motivated by the ongoing COVID-19 crisis, calls to reform the government and monarchy, and economic difficulties. While most demonstrators were peaceful, a group known as Taluh Gas (Shattering Tear-gas) regularly clashed with Bangkok police in August. A teenager who was shot during an August incident in Bangkok died of his injuries in October.
- In November, the Constitutional Court ruled that activists who called for reform of the monarchy had effectively called for its overthrow, ruling their behavior unconstitutional. The court ordered no penalty against the activists, though it did order protest groups to cease related activity.
- In January, legislators amended the penal code to decriminalize abortions performed within the first trimester. The updated code took effect in February.
- In January, former civil servant Anchan Preeert received an effective 43-and-a-half-year prison term for lèse-majesté, after recording audio clips deemed defamatory of the monarchy. The sentence was the longest ever issued for a crime of lèse-majesté.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 5 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 1 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

Thailand is a constitutional monarchy ruled by King Maha Vajiralongkorn, who serves as head of state. Although the monarchy has limited formal power, the king is highly influential in Thai politics, and has significant clout over the military.

The constitution, which was developed by a committee appointed by the military's National Council for Peace and Order (NCPO), was approved in a tightly controlled 2016 referendum. According to the charter, the prime minister is selected by a majority vote of the combined 500-seat elected House of Representatives and the 250-seat Senate, whose members are entirely appointed by the military.

The promilitary Palang Pracharat Party (PPP), which won only 115 lower-house seats in the 2019 elections, nominated incumbent prime minister Prayuth Chan-ocha to again serve in that position. In 2014, as army chief, Prayuth staged a coup against the democratically elected government and designated himself prime minister. Prayuth retained his post in 2019 through the support of a promilitary bloc in the lower house and votes from 249 appointed senators.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 1 / 4

Under the military-drafted constitution, the bicameral National Assembly consists of the 250-seat Senate, whose members are appointed to five-year terms by the military, and the 500-seat House of Representatives.

Under a constitutional amendment that received legislative approval in September 2021, 400 lower-house members will be directly elected to four-year terms in single-seat constituencies by simple majority vote in future elections. Another 100 members will be elected in one nationwide constituency via party-list proportional representation.

In 2019, after almost five years of postponements, a House of Representatives election was contested by 77 political parties, most of which fell into promilitary or antimilitary camps. The campaign period was marred by political repression, media censorship, unequal media access, and a lack of independent and impartial oversight from the Election Commission of Thailand (ECT).

The results were tainted by irregularities, with ballots “lost” and initial vote tallies changed. Additionally, the formula for distributing party seats was altered after the election to reduce seats won by opposition parties and redistribute them to military-aligned parties. This resulted in the redistribution of sufficient seats to grant promilitary parties a supermajority.

Only one international election monitoring body, the Asian Network for Free Elections (ANFREL), was permitted to observe the election. Two domestic organizations, P-Net and We Watch, were also granted permission, but all three experienced severely restricted access to the polls and voting procedures. We Watch determined that the process was not free and fair.

In December 2020, Thailand held its first provincial elections since the 2014 coup; candidates associated with locally dominant groups fared well, while those linked to the reform movement made few gains. Municipal elections were held in March 2021, while subdistrict contests were held in November. ANFREL called the subdistrict elections smooth but noted the occurrence of vote-buying.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 0 / 4

The 2017 constitution was designed to weaken political parties and elected officials while strengthening unelected institutions. Citizens cast only one ballot in the 2019 elections rather than separate constituency and party-list ballots, as in previous elections; by design, that system made it difficult for large parties to win a majority.

The constitutional amendment supported by legislators in September 2021 will restore a two-ballot system. Later that month, however, Thai Pakdee Party leader Warong Dechgitvigrom challenged it, saying the new system would impact smaller parties. Legislators were in the process of updating two existing pieces of legislation to align with the constitutional amendment at year’s end.

All 250 senators were appointed by the military in 2019. The prime minister is selected through a combined vote of both houses, granting the unelected Senate a powerful role in the selection process.

The 2019 elections were overseen by the ECT, whose members were entirely appointed by the junta. Throughout the electoral process, the ECT was criticized by the public and civil society for its lack of independence and willingness to intervene on behalf of the military and promilitary parties. For instance, the ECT's postelection change of the seat distribution formula reassigned seats won by the opposition Future Forward Party (FFP) and Pheu Thai Party (PTP) to small military-aligned parties, all of which subsequently voted with the PPP and the Senate to retain Prayuth as prime minister.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 2 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 1 / 4

From 2014 to 2018, Thailand's military government effectively banned political parties from meeting and conducting activities. In late 2018, the NCPO lifted many restrictions on political parties, allowing them to hold meetings, recruit members, select candidates, and meet with the public. A slew of parties from across the political spectrum began organizing and campaigning in preparation for the 2019 elections, though those opposed to military rule experienced official harassment.

In 2019, after the FFP's success in that year's elections, party leader Thanathorn Juangroongruangkit was charged with crimes including sedition for allegedly "assisting" democracy activists after a 2015 protest. He was subsequently suspended by the Constitutional Court from taking his seat over a complaint that he had held shares in a media company while applying to serve in the legislature. In February 2020, the FFP was abolished following a Constitutional Court ruling that a loan it received from Thanathorn constituted an illegal donation.

Opposition parties aligned with exiled former prime minister Thaksin Shinawatra have also suffered government attack. The military-drafted constitution imposes rules designed to weaken existing large parties like the PTP, which led the pre-2014 government. To circumvent these limitations, PTP leaders established like-minded parties, including Thai Raksa Chart (TRC), to better compete in the 2019 elections. However, after TRC nominated Princess Ubolratana—the monarch's older sister—as its prime ministerial candidate, the party was dissolved by the Constitutional Court and its candidates were disqualified. In October 2021, a PPP member accused Thaksin of maintaining illegal influence over the PTP and asked the EC to disband it.

The junta's ban on activities of political parties, including those opposed to military rule, was lifted in 2018, and numerous parties competed in the 2019 elections. However, constitutional restraints greatly limited the ability of opposition parties to effectively campaign or gain significant political power through elections.

While parties opposed to military rule, most prominently the PTP and the FFP, won a combined 245 lower-house seats, they were unable to advance legislation due to the military's continued control over the chamber. The 2020 dissolution of the FFP, whose 80 seats made it the third-largest force in the House of Representatives, was accompanied by a 10-year ban on political participation for 16 party leaders, including Thanathorn and 10 other elected representatives. Following the ruling, the FFP's 55 remaining representatives joined a small political party and rebranded as the Move Forward Party.

In September 2021, the National Assembly passed an amendment reducing the number of lower-house party-list seats from 150 to 100, increasing the threshold needed to win them and making it more difficult for smaller opposition parties to win representation.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 0 / 4

While Thai citizens were able to vote in 2019, the resulting government did not reflect election results due to a rigged outcome enabled by the military-drafted constitution. The cabinet is stacked with former members of the military, leaders of the 2014 coup, and ministerial holdovers from the junta, including Prime Minister Prayuth.

The 2019 polls were also subject to repeated interventions by the monarchy, which exerts tremendous influence over Thai politics. For instance, the Constitutional Court's dissolution order targeting TRC came soon after King Maha Vajiralongkorn made a televised announcement condemning his sister Princess Ubolratana's prime ministerial bid as "extremely inappropriate." On the eve of the 2019 election, King Vajiralongkorn released an unprecedented statement urging citizens to vote for "good people" to prevent "chaos," a message widely understood as a royal endorsement of promilitary parties.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 1 / 4

In 2019, some political rights denied to the population during military rule were restored with the election of a semicivilian government. Nevertheless, members of minority groups, particularly ethnic minorities and stateless residents, are generally unable to choose their representatives or organize independently to assert their interests in the political sphere. Malay Muslims in southern Thailand remain politically marginalized.

Migrant workers, mostly from neighboring Myanmar, Cambodia, and Laos, were believed to number 4.9 million as of 2019, though many left Thailand amid the COVID-19-related economic slowdown. Migrant workers lack political rights and a path to citizenship.

Women are underrepresented in government at all levels, composing only 15.8 percent of the House of Representatives and 10.5 percent of the Senate. Few women hold leadership roles in political parties. Women's interests are generally not prioritized in political life, although recent antigovernment protests included demands for greater attention to such issues.

The interests of LGBT+ people are increasingly represented in national politics. The cabinet approved draft legislation that would give same-sex unions many of the benefits given in heterosexual marriages in 2020. In November 2021, a Foreign Ministry official reported that legislative efforts were still ongoing while giving remarks to a Universal Periodic Review working group.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 2 / 12C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 0 / 4

Since 2019, the policies of the Thai government have been determined by the prime minister and the National Assembly. Despite opposition parties garnering a significant share of lower-house seats in that year's elections, the government remains largely authoritarian due to the unelected Senate, which votes with the lower house to determine the government's long-term strategy and select the prime minister. Consequently, government policies and legislation are decided and implemented by a clique of former military leaders and their allies.

In recent years, the king has consolidated and expanded the monarchy's political and military powers. In 2019, King Vajiralongkorn ordered the transfer of two elite army units to the palace's direct command, citing Article 172 of the constitution, which allows a royal decree to be issued when an emergency threatens national security and the monarchy.

Thailand's anticorruption legislation is inadequately enforced, and bribes and gifts are common practice in business, law enforcement, and the legal system. The National Anti-Corruption Commission (NACC) receives numerous complaints each year, and the NCPO passed vague anticorruption laws while in power. However, the junta engaged in wide-scale corruption, cronyism, and nepotism, and these issues have gone unaddressed since the transition to semicivilian rule.

The government faced corruption suspicions over COVID-19 vaccine procurement efforts in 2021. In August, a PTP legislator claimed the government overpaid for doses of the Sinovac COVID-19 vaccine, prompting Prayuth to deny suggestions of embezzlement.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 1 / 4

Parliamentary oversight of the government that took power in 2019 has resulted in an increase in overall government openness and transparency. However, due to the military's continued sway over government operations and its legislative majority, high-level decisions continue to be made, and legislation passed, opaquely.

Procurement decisions are also opaque. In 2020, Siam Bioscience, which the monarch effectively owns via the Crown Property Bureau, won a contract to produce the University of Oxford–AstraZeneca COVID-19 vaccine for distribution in Southeast Asia under terms that were not made public.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 24 / 60 (-1)D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 6 / 16*D1. Are there free and independent media? 1 / 4

Under military rule, the government systematically used censorship, intimidation, and legal action to suppress independent media, and international and domestic news outlets were frequently censored during the 2019 campaign period. That July, several NCPO orders limiting free speech and independent media were lifted, including those banning reports considered to threaten national security and the NCPO's credibility. However, the new government has retained several laws introduced by the junta that restrict free and independent media, including criminal defamation laws.

In 2020, an emergency decree made it illegal to publish COVID-19 information deemed "false or capable of causing fear in the public," with violators subject to prison terms of up to five years. The decree also empowered authorities to demand that journalists and outlets "correct" reports deemed false or face charges under the Computer Crime Act (CCA).

The government also placed pressure on the media during the antigovernment protests that began in 2020. Several journalists were arrested while covering protests in 2020, while at least four outlets received shutdown orders. In November 2021, the National Broadcasting and Telecommunications Commission warned outlets to refrain from interviewing protest leaders, discussing their demands, or broadcasting long live reports on protests.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 3 / 4

There is no state religion, and religious freedom is respected in the majority of the country. However, some restrictions exist. Speech considered insulting to Buddhism is prohibited by law. A long-running civil conflict in the south, which pits ethnic Malay Muslims against ethnic Thai Buddhists, continues to undermine citizens' ability to practice their religions. The vast majority of Thais are Buddhist and the king is considered the protector of Buddhism in Thailand, which carries spoken and unspoken authority.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 1 / 4

Academic freedom is constrained in Thailand. University discussions and seminars on topics regarded as politically sensitive are subject to monitoring or outright cancellation by government authorities. Activist activities on university campuses remain constrained by the government, including through prosecutions for sedition and violations of draconian lèse-majesté laws.

Academics working on sensitive topics face oppressive tactics including summonses for questioning, home visits by security officials, surveillance of their activities, and arbitrary detention for the purpose of questioning. Several Thai academics fled into exile after the 2014 coup.

Thailand's public education system is rife with propaganda aimed at instilling obedience to the country's monarchy and military. The education system became a target of student protesters. New youth-led organizations such as Bad Students demanded the government halt harassment of student activists, while collaborating with students on reforms including the abrogation of abusive school regulations.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 1 / 4

Despite the 2019 transition to semicivilian control, perceived critics of the government, military, or the monarchy remain at high risk of surveillance, arrest, imprisonment, harassment, and physical attack. Thailand's postjunta government retained 140 NCPO laws, including laws that restrict freedom of expression. It also retained the CCA, which gives authorities broad powers to restrict online expression, impose censorship, and enforce surveillance, and extends enforcement of lèse-majesté provisions online.

In July 2021, the government promulgated Regulation 29, which prohibited speech that would "instigate fear." Regulation 29 also required internet service providers to surrender the internet protocol addresses of users engaging in such speech to the authorities. A civil court blocked the regulation's use in August, responding to a petition from activists and media outlets.

Enforcement of lèse-majesté laws under Section 112 of the criminal code decreased in the final years of direct military rule, but it returned as a tool of repression in 2020. Between November 2020 and the end of 2021, least 151 people were charged with violating Section 112. Thanathorn Juangroongruangkit was accused of violating Section 112 for comments regarding Siam Bioscience in January 2021. That same month, a former civil servant, Anchana Preeert, was sentenced to 87 years' imprisonment for recording audio clips deemed defamatory of the monarchy. The sentence, which was reduced to 43-and-a-half years after her confession, is the longest such sentence in Thai history.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 3 / 12 (-1)E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 1 / 4

In March 2020, Prime Minister Prayuth used COVID-19 as a pretext to employ broad powers granted by a 2005 emergency decree to protect the "safety of the people," including the power to restrict public gatherings. Restrictions have largely remained in effect through the end of 2021.

Authorities used considerable force, tolerated violence from progovernment sympathizers, and employed lèse-majesté laws in response to youth-led antigovernment demonstrations in 2020. While the authorities had some success in curtailing them, a new round of nationwide protests took place beginning in June 2021. Participants were motivated by the ongoing COVID-19 crisis, calls to reform the government and monarchy, and economic difficulties. While many protest groups were peaceful, one group, Taluh Gas, regularly clashed with officers in Bangkok in August. Bangkok police used water cannon, rubber bullets, and live ammunition during the clashes. At least one protest-related death was recorded in 2021; a teenager shot during an August incident in Bangkok died of his injuries in October.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 1 / 4

Thailand has a vibrant civil society, but groups focused on defending human rights and freedom of expression, and promoting democracy, continue to face restrictions, criminalization, and prosecution, including under sedition and lèse-majesté laws. Human rights nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) also faced government pressure after antigovernment protests began in 2020. Civil society groups holding republican views, such as the Organization for Thai Federation, remain forbidden.

Land and environmental activists risk serious and even deadly violence; environmental rights NGO Global Witness has described Thailand as among the most dangerous countries in Asia for such activists. Perpetrators of attacks generally enjoy impunity. In May 2021, land rights activist Somsak Onchuenjit was killed by an unidentified assailant in Trang Province.

In February 2021, the cabinet gave its initial approval for a bill that would require NGOs to register with the government, criminalize unregistered organizations, and allow the government to surveil the communications of NGO staff. The bill remained under consideration at year's end.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 1 / 4 (-1)

Thai trade unions are nominally independent and have the right to collectively bargain. However, most formal-sector workers are not unionized, with the International Labour Organization (ILO) reporting a 3.5 percent density rate in 2016. Employers engage in antiunion activity, employing lockouts and launching defamation cases against union members and organizers. Non-Thai nationals are prohibited from establishing unions. Migrant workers are also legally prohibiting from establishing unions or leading officially recognized unions.

Unions and union leaders are also criminally targeted. In 2019, the NACC launched an investigation against 22 State Railway Union of Thailand (SRUT) members over a 2009 safety campaign it launched after a 2009 train derailment. The State Railway of Thailand later accused the SRUT of launching an illegal strike and won 24 million baht ($724,000) in damages against 7 union leaders. In October 2020, 13 SRUT leaders were convicted of neglecting their official duties and received 3-year prison terms, though they received bail and launched an appeal.

Score Change: The score declined from 2 to 1 because union organizers and members continue to face antiunion actions from employers and the authorities, including lockouts and criminal prosecutions.

F. RULE OF LAW: 5 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 1 / 4

While judicial independence is constitutionally guaranteed, courts are politicized and corrupt. The Constitutional Court, which has been accused of favoring the military, has sweeping powers, including the ability to dissolve political parties, overthrow elected officials, and veto legislation. In 2018, the government enacted a law making criticism of the Constitutional Court with “rude, sarcastic, or threatening words” a criminal offense, further shielding the body from accountability. In 2020, the Constitutional Court abolished the FFP after what observers characterized as a highly politicized trial. In November 2021, the Constitutional Court ruled that three activists had intended to overthrow the monarchy after issuing calls for reform and ruled their acts unconstitutional. The court issued no explicit penalty against them but ordered protest groups to cease related activity.

In 2019, Kanakorn Pianchana, a Yala Province judge, shot himself in court immediately after acquitting five Muslim defendants on murder charges. Before shooting himself, Kanakorn stated that superiors placed intense pressure on him to convict the defendants, despite a lack of evidence.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 1 / 4

Restrictions implemented by the NCPO and retained by the semicivilian government severely undermine due process rights. Orders issued in 2015 permitted the detention of individuals without charge for up to seven days and expanded the military's authority in law enforcement, permitting them to arrest, detain, and investigate crimes related to the monarchy and national security, including drug-related crimes. In 2019, much of this authority was transferred to a newly empowered Internal Security Operations Command, which can also summon and detain individuals without a warrant. With the transfer of power to a semicivilian government, all court cases involving offenses against junta orders were transferred from military to civilian courts.

Antigovernment protesters who participated in 2020 and 2021 rallies were kept in pre-trial detention for prolonged periods, were denied bail, were offered bail under strict conditions, and faced criminal prosecution. Over 1,300 people faced charges including sedition and lèse-majesté over protest-related activity between July 2020 and late September 2021 according to Thai Lawyers for Human Rights.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 1 / 4

The police and military often operate with impunity, which is exacerbated by the absence of any law that explicitly prohibits torture. In August 2021, a video showing police officers in Nakhon Sawan Province killing a suspected drug dealer was released. Five officers were arrested over the incident, while another two voluntarily surrendered. In September, legislators began debating a draft bill outlawing torture and forced disappearance, which passed its first reading later that month.

While most of Thailand is free from terrorism or insurgency, a combination of martial law and emergency rule has been in effect for over a decade in the four southernmost provinces, where Malay Muslims form a majority and a separatist insurgency has been ongoing since the 1940s. Civilians are regularly targeted in shootings, bombings, and arson attacks, and insurgents have focused on schools and teachers as symbols of the Thai state. Thousands of suspected militants and sympathizers have been indiscriminately detained in counterinsurgency operations. Long-standing and credible reports of human rights violations, including extrajudicial killings, by government forces and insurgents also exist. The dominant militant group, the National Revolutionary Front, unilaterally declared a cease-fire in April 2020, citing the COVID-19 pandemic, but fighting resumed that month.

Following the 2019 elections, physical attacks on democracy activists by masked assailants widely assumed to have government ties increased, with the authorities conducting no credible investigations. Authorities also used considerable force to disperse antigovernment protesters in 2021, at times using live ammunition.

Extraterritorial executions and disappearances of Thai dissidents-in-exile have also increased in recent years. In June 2020, Wanchalerm Satsaksit, an exiled Thai activist living in Cambodia, was disappeared from Phnom Penh, presumably by agents connected to the Thai state, and remains missing.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 2 / 4

In Thailand's north, so-called hill tribes are not fully integrated into society. Many individuals lack formal citizenship, which renders them ineligible to vote, own land, attend state schools, or receive protection under labor laws. Thailand is known for its tolerance of LGBT+ people, though societal acceptance is higher for tourists and expatriates than for nationals, and unequal treatment and stigmatization remain challenges. Women face discrimination in employment, a problem that was highlighted the Royal Police Cadet Academy's 2018 decision to ban female cadets.

Thailand has not ratified the UN convention on refugees, who risk detention as unauthorized migrants and often lack access to asylum procedures. In November 2021, Thai authorities deported three Cambodian refugees who were members of the banned Cambodia National Rescue Party. In December, a Cambodian monk was arrested and charged with illegal entry.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 10 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 3 / 4

Thai citizens generally have freedom of travel and choice of residence. However, travel may be restricted in areas affected by civil conflict. Freedom of movement was greatly curtailed by COVID-19-related emergency decrees during 2021.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 2 / 4

The rights to property and to establish businesses are protected by law, though in practice business activity is affected by bureaucratic delays, and at times by the influence of security forces and organized crime. Court cases related to land and natural resources, particularly those deemed by the junta to be vital to the country's economic development, are susceptible to political interference.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 3 / 4

While women have the same legal rights as men, they are vulnerable to domestic abuse and rape. Victims rarely report attacks to authorities, who frequently discourage women from pursuing criminal charges against perpetrators.

In late January 2021, the National Assembly amended three sections of the penal code to decriminalize first-trimester abortions, which were gazetted in February. The articles had been ruled unconstitutional by the Constitutional Court in early 2020.

In November 2021, the Constitutional Court ruled that the existing civil code did not extend marriage rights to same sex-couples.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 2 / 4

Exploitation and trafficking of Thailand's large migrant worker underclass and refugees from Myanmar, Cambodia, and Laos are serious and ongoing problems, as are child and sweatshop labor. Migrant workers risk deportation; in November 2021, the Defence Ministry reported that over 30,000 people classified as illegal migrants were deported during the first 10 months of the year.

Sex trafficking remains a problem in which some state officials are complicit. However, the government has made some efforts to prosecute and seize the assets of those suspected of involvement in human trafficking, including police officers and local officials.

Thai companies facing criticism for human rights violations, labor rights abuses, and migrant rights violations continue to file libel lawsuits against activists and human rights defenders. Between 2016 and December 2021, poultry producer Thammakaset filed criminal and civil complaints against 23 individuals and entities, including migrant workers, human rights defenders, and media outlets.

The Gambia

Population: 2,500,000

Capital: Banjul

Freedom Status: Partly Free

Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: The Gambia was ruled for over two decades by former president Yahya Jammeh, who first seized power in a military coup and consistently violated political rights and civil liberties. The 2016 election resulted in a surprise victory for opposition candidate Adama Barrow. Respect for fundamental freedoms including the rights to free assembly, association, and expression initially improved under the Barrow administration, but it has faced criticism for continued corruption. Among other ongoing concerns, LGBT+ people face severe discrimination, and violence against women remains a serious problem.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- In May, the Supreme Court found that the National Assembly had exceeded its authority in late 2020 by amending the national budget to include a loan program for its own members.
- An ally of former president Jammeh, Yankuba Touray, was sentenced to death in July for his role in the extrajudicial killing of then finance minister Ousman Koro Ceesay in 1995. The conviction was appealed. The defendant had refused to cooperate with the Truth, Reconciliation, and Reparations Commission (TRRC), which submitted its final report to the government in November, after multiple delays; the government had six months to decide what to do with the report.
- In August, the president signed the Access to Information Act into law, raising the prospects for greater government transparency.
- In December, President Barrow won reelection after a contentious campaign in which his National People's Party (NPP) formed an alliance with the former ruling party, the Alliance for Patriotic Reorientation and Construction (APRC). Former president Jammeh had condemned the alliance and called for the APRC to side with Mama Kandeh's Gambia Democratic Congress (GDC) instead.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 21 / 40 (+1)

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 8 / 12 (+1)

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 3 / 4 (+1)

The president is directly elected to a five-year term and faces no term limits. In the December 2021 election, Adama Barrow won a second term with about 53 percent of the vote in a field of six candidates. Ousainou Darboe of the United Democratic Party (UDP) placed second with 28 percent, followed by Mama Kandeh of the GDC with 12 percent. Domestic and international observers were allowed to monitor the election and found the results to be credible. However, some irregularities were reported, and a number of deficiencies in the legal framework affected the campaign environment. Two of the opposition candidates rejected the outcome and filed a legal suit that was subsequently dismissed by the Supreme Court on procedural grounds.

Score Change: The score improved from 2 to 3 because the year's presidential election results were deemed credible by international and domestic observers, and unlike with the previous presidential election, the outcome was upheld without the need for external intervention.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 3 / 4

Of the 58 members of the unicameral National Assembly, 53 are elected by popular vote and the remainder are appointed by the president; members serve five-year terms. The 2017 parliamentary elections were transparent, peaceful, and impartially managed. Weaknesses included low turnout, incomplete updating of the voter registry, and poor organization of vote-collation processes. Nevertheless, most polling stations operated on time, and vote counting was transparent. The United Democratic Party (UDP), which at the time backed Barrow and had previously been in opposition, won 31 seats and an absolute majority. Five smaller parties and an independent divided the remainder, with no more than five seats each.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 2 / 4

The Independent Electoral Commission (IEC) adequately managed the 2017 National Assembly elections, the 2018 local elections, and the 2021 presidential election. However, it faces chronic challenges related to its finances, training of personnel, and access to supplies. International observers in 2021 highlighted weaknesses in the electoral framework, including poor regulation of campaign financing, though they praised key aspects of the polling process on election day. A nationwide registration campaign conducted by IEC ahead of the presidential election was widely seen as a success despite significant financial and logistical obstacles; in all, over 960,000 Gambians were registered to vote.

Proposed electoral reforms that were introduced in the National Assembly in March but not passed during the year would grant members of the diaspora the right to vote, among other changes. Critics found fault with some provisions, arguing in part that the bill would manipulate constituency boundaries.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 9 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 2 / 4

There were 18 political parties registered in The Gambia as of 2021. Organizers must pay a 1 million dalasi ($19,000) registration fee and garner the signatures of 10,000 registered voters, with at least 1,000 from each of the country's regions. Parties centered on a particular religion, ethnicity, or region are banned. Parties are required to submit annual audits to the IEC.

Candidate nomination requirements present an obstacle to party competition. Of 21 initial nominations in 2021, only six presidential candidates were approved by the IEC; while two parties successfully challenged the rejections in court, they did not ultimately field candidates.

Ruling parties have benefited from the advantages of incumbency, including misuse of state resources. Prior to the 2016 presidential election, Jammeh's APRC had dominated politics. The UDP then became the dominant party until Barrow fell out with party leader Ousainou Darboe and formed the NPP in 2019.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 3 / 4

The UDP won a legislative majority in 2017, displacing the APRC, and it has been in opposition to President Barrow since 2019. Discussions among smaller parties on the formation of broader opposition alliance did not bear fruit during 2021. With support from the NPP, Barrow easily won an outright majority in his reelection bid.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 2 / 4

Gambians have become more free from improper influences on their political choices since Jammeh's 22-year rule ended in 2017, but abuses such as the politicized distribution of money and goods to benefit the ruling party continued to be reported ahead of the 2021 election.

A military mission deployed by the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS) played a pivotal role in compelling Jammeh to yield to Barrow's victory in the 2016 election; the mission's mandate was extended multiple times at Barrow's request amid ongoing concerns about security and political stability, but it was scheduled to end at the close of 2021. The ECOWAS force has not had a discernible impact on the decisions of voters or politicians, though there are unproven allegations to the contrary.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 2 / 4

There is concern that Gambian politics are being defined by ethnic divisions, as major parties draw much of their support from particular ethnic groups. Former president Jammeh, an ethnic Jola, criticized members of the plurality Mandinka ethnic group before leaving office. There were allegations that the NPP's alliance with the APRC and several other smaller parties ahead of the 2021 election carried an undercurrent of anti-Mandinka mobilization, as the UDP is strongly associated with that ethnic group.

Women remain underrepresented in politics. The National Assembly elected in 2017 included a woman speaker as well as the first lawmaker with disabilities, but both were presidential appointees. Only five women held National Assembly seats as of 2021.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 4 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 2 / 4

The Barrow government does not appear to be subject to undue influence from nonstate actors, armed forces, or foreign governments. However, its critics have alleged that the government is under the influence of Senegal, citing the continued presence of the ECOWAS military mission and the preponderance of Senegalese commercial interests in the country. The parliament's limited ability to check executive authority remains a concern.

The Barrow government has undertaken limited initiatives to reduce corruption, which remains a serious problem. Allegations of corruption are frequently lodged against officials at all levels of government, and both state and semiofficial agencies have been accused of improperly funneling money to private citizens. While lawmakers have discussed anticorruption legislation, a proposed anticorruption commission has not yet been established, and an older anticorruption body is dormant.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 1 / 4

Government operations are generally opaque. Officials must make asset declarations to the ombudsman, but the declarations are not open to public and media scrutiny. There are widespread allegations of corruption in public procurement. Key licensing processes, especially for industries that rely on natural resources, are not transparent.

The National Assembly passed the Access to Information Act in July 2021, and President Barrow signed it into law in August. Civil society groups had championed the legislation as a means to improve transparency and accountability, but it remained unclear whether it would be fully implemented in practice.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 26 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 8 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 2 / 4

The media environment has improved under Barrow's presidency. More people are entering the profession, exiled journalists have returned to the country, and there has been a proliferation of private print, online, radio, and television outlets. Nevertheless, a number of laws that restrict freedom of expression remain in effect, including some that have recently been upheld by courts. Media outlets are subject to arbitrary suspensions, and journalists have at times faced arrest or physical assault in the course of their work.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 2 / 4

The Barrow government has maintained that The Gambia is a secular society in which adherents of all faiths can worship freely. In practice, non-Sunni Muslim groups experience discrimination. The 2019 draft constitution, which failed to win legislative approval in 2020, omitted a reference to The Gambia as a secular country, prompting concern among civil society actors. Traditional authorities have made disparaging comments about the Christian community—which comprises less than 5 percent of the population—in connection with the construction of churches and cemeteries. Some Christians argued in 2021 that a measure granting reduced working hours to women civil servants during the Ramadan fasting period was discriminatory, since no such accommodations were offered during Christian fasts.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 2 / 4

Academic freedom at the University of The Gambia has improved since Barrow took office, with a more open environment for the exchange of ideas among students and professors than under Jammeh. Lecturers still face political pressure, however, and other challenges persist. University staff have argued that funds are misused by senior leadership, and in September 2021 they announced plans for a strike to improve the governance structure of the university.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 2 / 4

Gambians have greater freedom to express political views under the Barrow administration. However, sedition laws that remain on the books could be used to criminalize criticism of the government, including on social media. In April 2021, a leader of the Three Years Jotna movement, which had called for Barrow to honor his earlier pledge to remain in office for only three years, was charged with sedition and violations of the Public Order Act (POA) after allegedly insulting the president and the judiciary. He was eventually cleared of the charges. In December, the Supreme Court dismissed a separate case concerning the constitutionality of a criminal code provision that makes it an offense to disparage a foreign dignitary, ambassador, or head of state.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 6 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 2 / 4

The constitution guarantees freedom of assembly, but the POA requires event organizers to obtain police permits for public assemblies. A resurgence of COVID-19 cases in February 2021 prompted the government to temporarily suspend the issuance of permits for political and social events. In April, a planned protest against the deportation of Gambian refugees from Germany was denied a permit on public health grounds, even though other recent events had been allowed to proceed. In May, the government dropped charges against the leadership of the Three Years Jotna movement that were linked to a protest in 2020. Human rights activists have alleged that the police use excessive force when disbanding protests.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 2 / 4

There are several nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) in The Gambia that focus on human rights and governance issues. NGO workers faced detention and other reprisals under Jammeh, and restrictive legislation remains on the books, but since 2017 NGOs have operated with less interference in practice, and some groups have successfully challenged the government on policy and legal matters without repercussion. International NGOs have also increased their presence in the country and are able to operate without interference.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 2 / 4

Workers—except for civil servants, household workers, and security forces—may form unions, strike, and bargain for wages, but the labor minister has the discretion to exclude other categories of workers. The Gambia has multiple trade unions that operate without government restrictions, though several lack organization and funds. In 2021, the University of The Gambia Faculty and Staff Association lost a court case in which it argued that an injunction to prevent its members from striking was unconstitutional.

F. RULE OF LAW: 6 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 2 / 4

The Barrow government has taken steps to improve the judiciary, which was hampered by corruption and inefficiency under Jammeh. These steps include ending the use of contract judges, the establishment of additional courts to address case backlogs, and giving courts greater budgetary autonomy. The government also reconstituted the Judicial Service Commission, which appoints lower-court magistrates and advises the president on higher-level appointments, court efficiency, and operations. While executive dominance remains a concern, the judiciary has shown some independence from the other branches of government in recent years. In May 2021, for example, the Supreme Court ruled in favor of a lawsuit brought by two NGOs, finding that the National Assembly had exceeded its authority by amending the national budget to include a 54 million GMD ($1 million) loan program for its own members and staff.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 1 / 4

Constitutional due process guarantees remain unevenly upheld, though political dissidents face less risk of persecution than during the Jammeh era. The government has pledged to arrest and prosecute security officers responsible for past human rights abuses, and in July 2021 Yankuba Touray, a Jammeh ally who eventually served in his cabinet, was sentenced to death for his role in the 1995 extrajudicial killing of the then finance minister, Ousman Koro Ceesay. However, there have been no other major cases against senior personnel.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 2 / 4

The use of illegitimate physical force by security agents has been less frequent under the Barrow administration. There have been some attempts to improve prison conditions, which remain dire. The hearings of the TRRC, established in 2018 to investigate Jammeh-era human rights abuses, have yielded little in terms of prosecutions, and the release of some perpetrators has been controversial. The commission submitted its final report to the government just over a week before the 2021 presidential election after multiple delays, prompting allegations that the government sought to suppress it in light of the NPP's alliance with the APRC. The Barrow government had six months to respond to the report.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 1 / 4

Several groups in Gambian society encounter serious difficulties in exercising their human rights. Women enjoy less access to higher education, justice, and employment than men. Legal protections for people with disabilities require strengthening and enforcement. LGBT+ people face severe societal discrimination, and same-sex relations remain criminalized. The 1997 constitution, which remains in effect, prohibits discrimination, but this "does not apply in respect to adoption, marriage, divorce, burial, and devolution of property upon death." Caste-based discrimination remains an issue in parts of the country.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 6 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 2 / 4

There are no legal restrictions on the freedom to change one's place of residence or employment. In practice, the endurance of strong kinship networks, unclear land-ownership rules, and economic speculation affect Gambians' ability to change residence.

Most of the coronavirus-related restrictions imposed on internal and external travel during 2020 were lifted later that year, but the government activated additional quarantine requirements for some international travelers in response to the emergence of a new COVID-19 variant in early 2021.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 2 / 4

Gambian law provides formal protections for property rights, but Sharia (Islamic law) provisions on family law and inheritance can facilitate discrimination against women.

Corruption hampers legitimate business activity. Land ownership is a contentious issue, with disputes sometimes escalating into violence. The problem is exacerbated by unclear division of responsibilities between traditional and state authorities.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 1 / 4

Rape and domestic violence are illegal but common. There are no laws prohibiting polygamy or levirate marriage, in which a widow is married off to the younger brother of her spouse. Female genital mutilation is still practiced despite a legal ban. The Barrow government has undertaken steps to address child marriage and gender-based violence. In 2021, it advocated repealing a ban on skin bleaching, originally enacted under Jammeh, arguing that it discriminated against women; the National Assembly voted in March to retain the ban.

Enforcement of labor laws is inconsistent. Although child labor and forced labor are illegal, some women and children are subject to sex trafficking, domestic servitude, and forced begging. In the 2021 edition of its Trafficking in Persons Report, the US State Department noted that while the government has taken steps to identify trafficking victims and improve security at shelters, its efforts are hampered by inadequate resources, and there have been no convictions linked to human trafficking for several years.

Population: 1,300,000

Capital: Dili

Freedom Status: Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Timor-Leste has held competitive elections and undergone peaceful transfers of power, but its democratic institutions remain fragile, and disputes among the major personalities from the independence struggle dominate political affairs. Judicial independence and due process are undermined by serious capacity deficits and political influence.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- Timor-Leste was severely affected by Cyclone Seroja, which caused heavy rainfall, flooding, and landslides over several days in late March and early April. The storm killed 41 people and forced nearly 16,000 people to shelter in evacuation facilities.
 - In December, Richard Daschbach, a defrocked Roman Catholic priest, was convicted of sexually abusing girls at a shelter he operated, as well as domestic violence and possession of child sexual abuse images. Daschbach received a 12-year prison term. Daschbach's conviction was achieved despite trial delays and former prime minister Xanana Gusmão's open support for the former priest.
 - Timor-Leste observed May-to-June and August waves of COVID-19 transmission. Authorities reported 19,796 cases and 122 deaths to the World Health Organization throughout the year.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 33 / 40A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 11 / 12*A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The directly elected president is a largely symbolic figure, with formal powers limited to the right to veto legislation and make certain appointments. The president may serve up to two five-year terms. Francisco Guterres, known as Lú-Olo, of the Revolutionary Front for an Independent East Timor (Fretilin) was elected president in 2017, following a generally peaceful campaign. European Union (EU) observers called the election well administered.

The leader of the majority party or coalition in Parliament becomes prime minister and serves as head of government. In June 2018, former independence fighter and former president José Maria Vasconcelos, popularly known as Taur Matan Ruak, was sworn in as prime minister. He remained in that post when Fretilin, the People's Liberation Party (PLP), and the Party for the Enhancement of Timorese National Unity (KHUNTO) formed a governing coalition in May 2020.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

Members of the 65-seat, unicameral Parliament are directly elected and serve five-year terms. Because the minority government seated after the 2017 election could not pass a budget, the president dissolved Parliament in January 2018 and called new elections, which were held that May. The sitting opposition parties—the National Congress for the Reconstruction of Timor-Leste (CNRT), KHUNTO, and the PLP—formed the Change for Progress Alliance (AMP) coalition and won an outright majority of 34 seats. Fretilin won 23, the Democratic Party won 5, and the Democratic Development Front won 3. EU observers called the elections “transparent, well-managed and credible.” The polls were generally peaceful and orderly, despite a few violent incidents during the campaign period.

Parliament failed to approve a budget in January 2020 after the CNRT abstained. The CNRT, led by Xanana Gusmão, then left the governing coalition. The CNRT's efforts to secure an agreement of its own failed that April, when KHUNTO—which originally supported the CNRT—broke from the alliance to support an extension of a COVID-19 state of emergency. A coalition consisting of the PLP, KHUNTO, and Fretilin was finalized that May.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 3 / 4

The 2017 and 2018 EU election observation missions generally praised the National Election Commission for its oversight of the years' polls but expressed concern that changes to the election laws in 2017 somewhat reduced its supervisory responsibilities. Provisions governing elections are found across several pieces of legislation, and observers have called for legal mandates governing elections to be harmonized into a more coherent framework.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 14 / 16B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 4 / 4

Political parties are generally free to operate. Some campaign-finance regulations favor larger parties. These include a lack of spending caps and a system in which government campaign subsidies are awarded after elections, according to the number of votes a party has won.

Two new parties, the youth-aligned KHUNTO and the PLP, won 13 parliamentary seats between them in 2017. They joined AMP in the 2018 elections and formed a governing coalition with Fretilin in 2020.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 4 / 4

The 2018 national elections marked the third transfer of power between parties since independence.

While some smaller parties hold parliamentary seats, parties associated with the independence movement dominate. Fretilin participated in governments formed in 2017 and 2020, while the CNRT participated in the AMP coalition government in 2018. The PLP, which is led by Taur Matan Ruak, participated in the 2018 and 2020 governments.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 3 / 4

Politics continue to be dominated by independence-movement figures who have formed political parties. Veterans often serve as power brokers and organizers, while local village leaders are known to mobilize voters despite their ostensible nonpartisan status.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 3 / 4

Ethnic minorities are generally well represented in politics.

While male independence leaders often hold key political roles and dominate elite political circles, some 40 percent of parliamentarians are women. One-third of electoral-list candidates must be female. Women are massively underrepresented at the local level. Observers suggest that few women would seek office except for the existence of gender-parity legislation.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 8 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 4 / 4

In 2017 and 2018, the government held competitive and peaceful elections without the supervision of a UN mission that had been deployed to help restore security following a 2006 political crisis.

Two governments have fallen over their inability to pass budgets in recent years. Six cabinet posts went unfilled between 2018—when Lú-Olo rejected several nominees—and 2020, when Taur Matan Ruak successfully appointed ministers to those roles.

Xanana Gusmão retains influence over the government, though he is not in the governing coalition. The Roman Catholic Church also maintains significant influence over government policy.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 2 / 4

The World Bank estimates that Timor-Leste loses from 1.5 to 2 percent of gross domestic product annually to corruption. Anticorruption bodies lack enough funding to operate effectively. The independent Anti-Corruption Commission was established in 2009 and has no powers of arrest or prosecution, relying on the prosecutor general, with input from police and the courts, to follow up on corruption investigations. However, a new anticorruption law that, among other things, includes protections for whistleblowers and witnesses came into force in February 2021.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 2 / 4

While the state has attempted to make budgets more accessible, procurement processes remain largely opaque. Requests for public information are not always granted, and at times require applicants to undertake inconvenient travel. Information is often issued exclusively in Portuguese, which most Timorese do not speak. The anticorruption law that took effect in February 2021 introduced new rules on wealth and asset declarations that apply to civil servants, state agents, and their relatives.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 39 / 60D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 14 / 16*D1. Are there free and independent media? 3 / 4

While media freedom is constitutionally protected, domestic media outlets are vulnerable to political pressure due to their reliance on government financial support, in a small media market with limited nongovernmental sources of support. However, in recent years, journalists have been more willing to produce articles critical of the government.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 3 / 4

Freedom of religion is protected in the constitution, and Timor-Leste is a secular state. Approximately 98 percent of the population is Roman Catholic. Protestants and Muslims have reported some cases of discrimination and harassment.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

Academic freedom is generally respected.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 4 / 4

There are few constraints on open and free private discussion, and citizens are free to discuss political and social issues. Topics related to the 2006 unrest, in which armed clashes between the police and mobilized civilian groups resulted in numerous deaths and the displacement of some 150,000 people, remain sensitive. During the 2021 trial against Richard Daschbach, victims reported they faced online attack.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 8 / 12E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 3 / 4

While freedom of assembly is constitutionally guaranteed and generally respected in practice, some laws can be invoked to restrict peaceful gatherings. Demonstrations must be authorized in advance, and those deemed to be “questioning constitutional order” or disparaging the reputations of the head of state and other government officials are prohibited.

Public gatherings were banned in March 2020 when the government imposed a COVID-19-related state of emergency. That state of emergency expired in November 2021, though gathering restrictions reportedly remained.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 3 / 4

Nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) can generally operate without interference, although all registered NGOs receiving government or donor funds are under the oversight of the Ministry of Planning and Finance. Few NGOs operate outside of the capital. The government is generally receptive to the input of NGOs and included civil society in its COVID-19 response.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 2 / 4

Workers, other than police and military personnel, are permitted to form and join labor unions and bargain collectively, though a 2011 law requires written notification of demands and allows for five days for a response from employers in advance of striking. If employers do not respond or if an agreement is not reached within 20 days, then five days' notice is required for a strike. In practice, few workers are unionized due to high levels of unemployment and informal economic activity.

F. RULE OF LAW: 8 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 2 / 4

Concerns over judicial independence remain for politically sensitive cases, and there is still reported political and religious interference in the judicial system.

The judicial system adjudicated the case of defrocked Roman Catholic priest Richard Daschbach, who faced 14 charges of sexual abuse along with domestic violence and possess of child sexual abuse images, in 2021. While Xanana Gusmão openly supported Daschbach, he was convicted and received a 12-year prison term in December. Daschbach is the first priest to face public accusation and trial for such accusations in Timor-Leste; the proceedings were viewed as a significant test of judicial independence.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 1 / 4

Due process rights are often restricted or denied, owing in part to a dearth of resources and personnel. The training of new magistrates following the 2014 dismissals of foreign judges has been slow, resulting in significant case backlogs, although this is improving with the resumption of training programs. The use of Portuguese for court administration poses an obstacle, and shortages of interpreters have sometimes forced the adjournment of trials.

The trial against Richard Daschbach did not begin until February 2021, even though he was arrested in 2019; his trial was also affected by delays caused in part by the COVID-19 pandemic.

Cases involving past human rights abuses are required by law to be heard by a panel including two international judges, though the 2014 dismissals interrupted these cases and no new cases have been brought since.

Alternative methods of dispute resolution and customary law are widely used, though they lack enforcement mechanisms and have other significant shortcomings, including unequal treatment of women.

Many municipalities have no fixed courts and rely on mobile services. The government has established mobile courts as an interim measure and has announced plans for the development of a hybrid justice system, with more harmonization between formal and customary dispute resolution mechanisms.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 3 / 4

Police officers and soldiers are regularly accused of excessive force and abuse of power, though the courts have had some success in prosecuting offenders. Public perception of the police has improved in recent years, as have general feelings of security.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 2 / 4

While hate crimes based on sexual orientation are considered an aggravating circumstance in the penal code, other protections against discrimination for LGBT+ people are lacking. Gay men and transgender women have trouble accessing employment opportunities due to low rates of access to education and discrimination. Lesbian, bisexual, and transgender women report cases of extreme physical violence from strangers and family members, including cases of “corrective” rape and forced marriage or relationships with members of the opposite sex. Equal rights for women are constitutionally guaranteed, but discrimination and gender inequality persist in practice and in customary law.

Religious minorities have reported difficulties in having marriage and birth certificates issued by religious entities readily accepted by the authorities. There have been recent complaints of discrimination against Muslims in civil service hiring.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 9 / 16G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 3 / 4

Citizens generally enjoy unrestricted travel, though travel by land to the enclave of Oecusse is hampered by visa requirements and Indonesian and Timorese checkpoints. Individuals enjoy free choice of residence and employment, but unemployment rates are high, especially among youth, and most of the population relies on subsistence farming. External borders were largely closed for much of 2020 and 2021 under official COVID-19 measures.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 2 / 4

Timorese have the right to establish businesses. However, practical aspects of establishing and operating a business are complicated by inefficiencies that make it difficult to gain appropriate permits and enforce contracts, as well as difficulties in obtaining credit.

Property rights are complicated by past conflicts, ongoing disagreements, and the unclear status of communal or customary land rights. A national land law designed to establish formal tenure and to help resolve disputes through arbitration was enacted in 2017.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 2 / 4

Gender-based violence (GBV) and domestic violence remain widespread. Civil society groups have criticized the courts’ use of prison sentences for only the most severe and injurious such cases, and few reported cases are investigated. A lack of GBV training hampers investigatory procedures into such cases, including investigators’ failure to recognize or collect evidence.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 2 / 4

Timor-Leste is both a source and destination country for human trafficking. Timorese from rural areas are vulnerable to sexual exploitation and domestic servitude, and children are sometimes placed in bonded labor. Despite government efforts, including the promulgation of the 2017 Law on Preventing and Combating Human Trafficking, investigations have declined in recent years. Some 267 cases were investigated in 2017 but that number fell to 65 in 2018, 13 in 2019, and 2 in 2020. No trafficking convictions have been achieved since 2018.

Population: 8,300,000

Capital: Lomé

Freedom Status: Partly Free

Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: While regular multiparty elections have taken place since 1992, Togo's politics have been controlled since 1963 by the late Gnassingbé Eyadéma and his son, current president Faure Gnassingbé. Advantages including security services dominated by the president's ethnic group and malapportioned election districts have helped Gnassingbé and his party retain power. Opposition calls for constitutional and electoral reforms have been harshly repressed for years.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- In January, police from the Central Service of Criminal Investigations (SRIC) arrested four trade unionists from the trade union Synergie des Travailleurs du Togo (STT) without warrants. That month, eight members of the teacher's union, Syndicat des Enseignants du Togo (SET), were detained after calling for a teachers strike.
- Also in January, the High Authority for Broadcasting and Communication (HAAC) shut down and withdrew the license of the newspaper L'Indépendant Express for publishing an article about four government ministers who were accused of stealing golden spoons at a reception organized by a financial institution. Its editor, Carolos Ketohou, was detained illegally for five days after the story was published.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 15 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 4 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 1 / 4

The president, who serves as head of state and holds most executive power, is elected for five-year terms. The president appoints the prime minister, who serves as head of government. Presidential term limits were eliminated in 2002, then restored through a constitutional amendment in 2019; they did not apply retroactively, meaning the incumbent Gnassingbé could seek two additional terms. The two-round presidential election system, requiring a runoff if no candidate wins a majority in the first round, was also restored.

Gnassingbé—initially installed as president by the military in 2005 after the death of his father, Gnassingbé Eyadéma—secured a fourth term in the 2020 election, ostensibly with 71 percent of the vote. Permits for domestic civil society groups to observe the polls were denied or revoked, representatives of the US-based National Democratic Institute were expelled before the election, and mobile messaging applications were blocked on election day. A relatively small number of observers from the African Union (AU) and the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS) were granted entry and produced largely uncritical reports.

The runner-up, former prime minister Agbeyome Kodjo of the opposition Patriotic Movement for Democracy and Development (MPDD), was credited with 19 percent of the vote. He and other opposition members alleged that the election was stolen, accusing the government of using fake polling stations and stuffing ballot boxes. Security forces surrounded Kodjo's house and that of retired archbishop Philippe Kpodzro to prevent them from leading protests.

After Kodjo's lawsuit challenging the election results was rejected by the Constitutional Court in March 2020, his parliamentary immunity was lifted, and he was arrested and temporarily detained in April—along with other members of his party—for asserting that he was the legitimate president. Kodjo was later released and is currently living in exile.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 2 / 4

The constitution calls for a bicameral legislature, but the Senate has never been established. Members of the current 91-seat National Assembly, which exercises all legislative powers, were elected for five-year terms through proportional representation in multimember districts. In the 2018 elections, the main opposition parties led a 14-party boycott, citing several unmet demands regarding constitutional and electoral reform. Gnassingbé's Union for the Republic (UNIR) won 59 of the 91 seats. The Union of Forces for Change (UFC), which led the opposition before aligning itself with the government in 2010, won 7 seats. Observers from the AU and ECOWAS said the elections had been held "properly" in a "calm environment," though opposition protests had been violently suppressed in the weeks before balloting, and voter turnout was low in opposition-leaning areas.

Municipal councilors were elected in 2019 in the first local polls since 1987. The UNIR won more than 60 percent of council seats; the ANC placed second. Regional elections scheduled for 2021 were postponed due to challenges in negotiations between the government and opposition.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 1 / 4

Elections are organized and supervised by the Independent National Electoral Commission (CENI), whose membership by law should be balanced with appointments by the ruling party and the opposition. However, only 2 of the 19 members were from the opposition in the 2020 election. Among other irregularities on election day, opposition members were reportedly denied access to some polling places to monitor the vote, and the CENI refused to publish detailed results for each precinct. The Constitutional Court, responsible for verifying election results, is stacked with close allies of the president. Prominent civil society groups have joined major opposition parties in their calls for a reliable electoral register, fairly apportioned legislative districts, a reorganized CENI, a more independent Constitutional Court, and the announcement of precinct-based election results.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 6 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 2 / 4

Opposition parties are generally free to form and operate and candidates can also run as independents. However, the dominance of the UNIR undermines the visibility and competitiveness of other parties. Opposition members are sometimes arrested in connection with peaceful political activities.

Since 2017, authorities have suppressed antigovernment protests organized by opposition parties with deadly force, arresting and torturing opposition supporters. Opposition leader Tikpi Atchadam, who led massive antigovernment demonstrations in 2017, remains hiding in exile. Leading up to the 2020 presidential election, opposition candidates faced obstacles such as denial of permits to hold rallies. In the weeks after the polls, several opposition leaders were arrested.

The court system is used to sideline prominent opposition members. An arrest warrant was issued against Kodjo following the 2020 election, and former minister and opposition party leader Djimon Ore was imprisoned in May 2021 for two years after criticizing the president.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 1 / 4

Gnassingbé's family has controlled Togo's powerful presidency since the 1960s. He and the UNIR have retained power thanks in large part to the structure of the electoral system, including district malapportionment in legislative elections and their de facto control over institutions such as the CENI and the Constitutional Court. The return to the two-round presidential election system did not unify the opposition during the 2020 contest.

Genuine opposition parties have no presence in the National Assembly following their boycott of the 2018 elections, though they did gain mayoralties and municipal council seats in the 2019 local elections.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 1 / 4

In 2005, the military installed Gnassingbé as president, in violation of the constitution. While security forces defend the regime through intimidation, the UNIR has been accused of relying on patronage and financial incentives, including the distribution of benefits to buy votes at election time.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 2 / 4

The Éwé, Togo's largest ethnic group, have historically been excluded from positions of influence; they are prominent within the opposition. Since 2010, the community has been politically split, as the Éwé-dominated UFC reached a power-sharing agreement with the government while the majority remained loyal to opposition forces. The government is dominated by members of Gnassingbé's Kabyé ethnic group, who also make up most security personnel.

Women face some societal pressure that discourages their active and independent political participation. Only 16 percent of the National Assembly members elected in 2018 were women. Candidate registration fees were halved for women ahead of the 2019 local elections. In 2020, Victoire Tomegah Dogbé became the first woman to serve as Togo's prime minister, and she named women to a record 30 percent of the ministerial posts in her cabinet.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 5 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 2 / 4

The president holds most policymaking power, and the National Assembly, which is controlled by the ruling party, does not serve as an effective check on executive authority. A pattern of flawed elections has undermined the legitimacy of both the executive and the legislature.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 1 / 4

Corruption is a serious and long-standing problem. The government has adopted legislation ostensibly designed to reduce corruption, such as a 2018 law on money laundering and funding terrorism, but these legal changes have not been effectively enforced, nor have high-ranking officials been convicted. Most members of the High Authority for the Prevention and Fight against Corruption and Related Offenses (HAPLUCIA) are presidential appointees, raising concerns about the body's independence. HAPLUCIA cannot prosecute cases itself and must make referrals to the public prosecutor.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 2 / 4

A 2016 freedom of information law guarantees the right to access government information, though some information is exempted, and the government does not always respond to requests. Most public officials are not required to disclose their assets.

There is a lack of transparency regarding state tenders. The newspaper that published a 2020 investigative report alleging that officials had embezzled hundreds of millions of dollars in a scheme involving petroleum import contracts was prosecuted and found guilty of defamation. However, the government did commence an audit of petroleum imports.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 27 / 60 (-1)D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 9 / 16*D1. Are there free and independent media? 2 / 4

Freedom of the press is guaranteed in the constitution but inconsistently upheld in practice. Although numerous independent media outlets offer a variety of viewpoints, restrictive press laws and a history of impunity for those who commit crimes against journalists encourage self-censorship. There is no mechanism to appeal decisions made by the HAAC, which can suspend outlets for violations of broadly worded regulations. In January 2021, the HAAC shut down and withdrew the license of the newspaper L'Indépendant Express for publishing an article about four government ministers who were accused of stealing golden spoons at a reception organized by a financial institution. Its editor, Carolos Ketohou, was detained illegally for five days after the story was published. Three other newspapers—L'Alternative, The Guardian, and La Symphonie—were suspended for two to four months for articles that included corruption allegations.

Police have used violence, cut mobile phone and internet service, and blocked messaging apps to discourage and hamper press coverage of opposition protests. Togolese journalists have also been targeted by Pegasus spyware.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 3 / 4

Religious freedom is constitutionally protected and generally respected in practice. Islam, Catholicism, and Protestant Christianity are recognized by the state; other groups must register as religious associations to receive similar benefits. The registration process has been subject to lengthy delays and a large backlog; approximately 900 applications from religious groups remained pending in 2021; no new applications had been accepted. Senior Catholic clergy are among the government critics who have reportedly been targeted with surveillance software.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 2 / 4

Academics are generally able to engage in political discussions. However, security forces have repeatedly used violence and arrests to quell student protests. The government may have used spyware to target critical academics.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 2 / 4

Though citizens speak openly in private discussion, they may be arrested on incitement or other charges for speaking critically about the government to journalists or human rights organizations.

A 2018 cybersecurity law criminalized publication of false information and breaches of public morality, among other problematic provisions that could affect freedom of expression online. The law also granted police greater authority to conduct electronic surveillance. In July 2021, reporters identified 300 Togolese phone numbers—belonging to activists, journalists, and members of the political opposition—as potential targets of Pegasus spyware.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 5 / 12 (-1)

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 1 / 4

While the constitution provides for freedom of assembly, several laws allow for its restriction. Police periodically use deadly violence to disperse assemblies in practice. A 2015 revision of the criminal code penalized participation in and organization of protests that had not gone through the necessary administrative procedures. In 2019, the parliament imposed new limits on the timing and location of public demonstrations and allowed authorities to restrict protests based on the availability of security personnel.

During and after the 2020 presidential election campaign, authorities denied permits for several opposition rallies and civil society events protesting the flawed electoral proceedings. Demonstrators who attempted to assemble were dispersed by police, reportedly with excessive force.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 2 / 4

Nongovernmental organizations are subject to registration rules that have sometimes been enforced arbitrarily to suppress activism on sensitive topics, such as torture and the rights of LGBT+ people. Several civil society leaders have been arrested and detained for their roles in the protest movement that began in 2017. In 2020, two members of an antitorture organization were arrested while observing security forces near Kodjo's home; they were released without charge. The mobile phones of prodemocracy activists have been targeted with surveillance software.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 2 / 4 (-1)

The government generally protects workers' rights to form and join labor unions, though unions have fewer legal protections in the country's special export-processing zone.

Police at times forcibly disperse union gatherings. In January 2021, police from the Central Service of Criminal Investigations (SRIC) arrested four trade unionists from the trade union Synergie des Travailleurs du Togo (STT) without warrants. Also that month, eight members of the teacher's union, Syndicat des Enseignants du Togo (SET), were detained after calling for a teachers strike. In May, police forcibly dispersed a meeting of teachers; some were beaten, and some were arrested.

Score Change: The score declined from 3 to 2 because police disrupted associational activity by teachers during the year, arresting without warrants the attendees of a teachers' union meeting in January and violently dispersing a separate meeting of teachers in May.

F. RULE OF LAW: 6 / 16F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 2 / 4

The constitution provides for an independent judiciary, but in practice courts are heavily influenced by the presidency. The Constitutional Court in particular is full of ruling party appointments and is seen as partial to the ruling party. Judges on other courts are appointed by the executive based on the recommendations of a judicial council dominated by senior judges.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 1 / 4

Executive influence and judicial corruption limit constitutional rights to a fair trial. Dozens of people arrested for participating in antigovernment protests in recent years have been charged, tried, and convicted in hasty proceedings. Detainees often have no access to counsel. An Irish citizen, Abdoul-Aziz Goma, has been detained without trial since 2018 and reportedly experienced torture by the police.

Corruption and inefficiency are widespread among the police, and there are also reports of arbitrary arrest. The 2018 cybersecurity law contains vague terrorism and treason provisions with heavy prison sentences and grants additional powers to the police without adequate judicial oversight.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 2 / 4

Prisons suffer from overcrowding and inadequate food and medical care, sometimes resulting in deaths among inmates from preventable or curable diseases. The government periodically releases prisoners to address overcrowding, but the process by which individuals are chosen for release is not transparent.

Security forces reportedly torture detainees, including participants in recent antigovernment demonstrations, despite laws that ban the practice in line with the UN Convention against Torture.

Islamist militants present a growing threat to security in Togo, with some fighters from Burkina Faso reportedly taking refuge in the country. In November 2021, Togolese forces fought off armed men who had crossed the border from Burkina Faso.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 1 / 4

Though ostensibly equal under the law, women continue to experience discrimination, and their opportunities for employment and education are limited. Official and societal discrimination persist against people with disabilities, certain regional and ethnic groups, and LGBT+ people, to whom antidiscrimination laws do not apply. Same-sex sexual activity is a criminal offense, and while the law is rarely enforced, LGBT+ people face police harassment.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 7 / 16G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 2 / 4

The law provides for freedom of internal movement and foreign travel, but these rights are sometimes restricted by the authorities in practice. Domestic travel can involve arbitrary traffic stops at which police collect bribes.

The government restricted travel and enforced curfews at times in 2020 and 2021 to prevent the spread of COVID-19.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 2 / 4

The country has made regulatory improvements to ease processes such as the registration of companies and property, but in general the business environment is poorly administered, creating opportunities for corruption and driving much economic activity into the informal sector. Women do not have equal inheritance rights under customary law, which is observed mainly in rural areas.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 1 / 4

Customary law puts women at a disadvantage regarding matters such as widowhood, divorce, and child custody. Polygamy is widely practiced and legally recognized. Child marriage remains a problem in some regions. Rape is illegal but rarely reported and, if reported, often ignored by authorities. Domestic violence, which is widespread, is not specifically addressed by the law. Female genital mutilation (FGM), though illegal, affects about 3 percent of women and girls aged 15 to 49, according to 2017 data.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 2 / 4

Protections against exploitative labor conditions, including rules on working hours, are poorly enforced, and much of the workforce is informally employed. Child labor is common in the agricultural sector and in certain urban trades; some children are subjected to forced labor. According to the US State Department 2021 Trafficking in Persons report, the government has made efforts to address human trafficking for forced labor and sexual exploitation but has struggled to secure convictions against perpetrators.

Population: 100,000

Capital: Nuku'alofa

Freedom Status: Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Tonga's constitutional monarchy has featured a prime minister backed by a mostly elected parliament since 2010. However, the king retains important powers, including the authority to veto legislation, dissolve the parliament, and appoint judicial officials. While civil liberties are generally protected, ongoing concerns include official corruption and land laws that discriminate against women.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- Tongan voters went to the polls in November to participate in the country's fourth general elections since the democratic reforms of 2010. The resulting 26-member parliament included 12 newly elected members.
 - Siaosi Sovaleni was chosen as prime minister in December, and he formed a new government that was composed mainly of people's representatives rather than nobles.

- Tonga's king had repeatedly expressed his displeasure with the performance of the parliament earlier in the year. In May he questioned the honesty of lawmakers, and in September he criticized a lack of government action in response to the illegal drug trade.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 30 / 40A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 9 / 12*A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 3 / 4

Though the monarch is no longer the chief executive authority, he retains significant powers, including the ability to veto legislation and dissolve the parliament. King 'Aho'eitu Tupou VI came to the throne in 2012 and is known to hold more conservative views than his late brother and predecessor, George Tupou V.

The prime minister, who chooses the cabinet, is formally appointed by the monarch on the recommendation of the parliament. Veteran democracy campaigner 'Akilisi Pōhiva, who initially took office in 2014, died in 2019 after a long illness; he was succeeded by then finance minister Pōhiva Tu'i'onetoa, who formed a cabinet that included commoners and members of the nobility. The new government survived a motion of no confidence in January 2021, 13 votes to 9.

Following the November 2021 general elections, a 16-member majority in the new parliament chose Siaosi Sovaleni as prime minister. He defeated a candidate supported by outgoing prime minister Tu'i'onetoa. The new 12-member cabinet included only one member from the nobility, who served as minister for lands and natural resources.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 3 / 4

The unicameral Legislative Assembly (Fale Alea) consists of 17 members who are directly elected by commoners in single-member districts, nine noble members elected by their peers across five districts, and up to four additional members whom the prime minister may appoint to the cabinet from outside the parliament and who hold their seats ex officio. All candidates technically run as independents. The speaker is appointed from among the noble members on the recommendation of the assembly.

Seventy-five candidates registered to contest the November 2021 general elections, which were the country's fourth since the democratic reforms of 2010. Nine of the 17 people's representatives elected were new members, as were three of the nine nobles' representatives. No women were elected.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 3 / 4

The Electoral Commission administers elections competently and fairly, though the framework for parliamentary elections falls short of universal suffrage due to the reservation of nine seats for the nobility.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 14 / 16B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 4 / 4

There are no major restrictions on political competition, and despite the lack of formal political parties, politicians have begun to form loose partisan affiliations in practice.

Lawmakers are also known to shift their allegiances; after former prime minister Pōhiva's death in 2019, four lawmakers who were associated with the Democratic Party of the Friendly Islands defected to the new Tonga People's Party, including founder Tu'i'onetoa, effectively leaving Democratic Party in opposition by year's end. During the January 2021 no-confidence vote, nobles were reluctant to cross the floor to join the Democratic Party in voting against the government, reportedly fearing further encroachments on their powers.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 4 / 4

Rival coalitions led by Pōhiva's popularly elected allies and more conservative politicians from the nobility have alternated in government in recent years, though Tu'i'onetoa governed with support from a mixture of popularly elected and noble members. Sovaleni's election as prime minister in December 2021 represented another change of government, as his only opponent, 'Aisake Eke, was backed by the outgoing prime minister.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 3 / 4

The monarchy, the nobility, and the country's churches exert considerable political influence, but this has not prevented majority support for prodemocracy candidates in recent elections.

In the months leading up to the November 2021 elections, Tonga's king repeatedly expressed his displeasure with the performance of the parliament. In May, at the opening of a legislative session, he questioned lawmakers' honesty and transparency and accused them of failing to implement adequate policies on health, education, and the economy; the parliament responded by suspending the usual live radio broadcast of the debate following the king's speech. In September the king criticized officials for lack of action in response to the illegal drug trade, and in October he addressed a national symposium on the drug crisis, potentially signaling an increase in the monarch's political involvement.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 3 / 4

Women have the same formal political rights as men, but no women won seats in the November 2021 parliamentary elections, down from two in the previous legislature. One woman was appointed in December to serve as minister of foreign affairs and tourism in the new 12-member cabinet. Cultural biases tend to discourage women's political participation, and women cannot inherit noble titles, meaning the seats reserved for nobility in the parliament are effectively reserved for men.

Members of ethnic minority groups face similar obstacles, though the population is mostly homogeneous, and many members of the small Chinese minority have been able to obtain citizenship and its associated political rights.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 7 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 3 / 4

The elected prime minister and his cabinet largely control the formulation and implementation of government policy, but the king continues to rely on the Privy Council—whose members he appoints himself—for advice regarding the use of his constitutional powers. The Privy Council operates like a shadow government, facilitating a continuing political role for the monarch.

Corruption and abuse of office are serious problems. While public officials and leaders of state-owned companies are sometimes held to account for bribery and other malfeasance, anticorruption mechanisms are generally weak and lacking in resources.

In June 2021, Minister for Infrastructure and Tourism ‘Akosita Lavulavu and her husband, ‘Etuete Lavulavu, himself a former minister, were convicted of fraud for falsifying student documents to secure $250,000 from the government for a private school they operated. They were sentenced to six years in prison in July, and an appeal was pending at year’s end. The prime minister notably continued to defend the couple after their conviction.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 2 / 4

Tonga does not have a law to guarantee public access to government information, which can be difficult to obtain in practice, and officials are not legally obliged to disclose their assets and income. The government has at times resisted public scrutiny of pending policies or auditor general’s reports, and in his May 2021 speech to the parliament, the king alleged a lack of transparency surrounding government ministries and state-owned companies. The parliament generally operates openly, and the media and civil society are typically able to monitor its proceedings and comment on legislation, though lawmakers drew criticism for preventing a live radio broadcast of their debate following the king’s speech.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 49 / 60D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 14 / 16*D1. Are there free and independent media? 2 / 4

The constitution guarantees freedom of the press, and a variety of news outlets operate independently, including online. However, politicians have a history of exerting pressure on the media in response to critical coverage.

In 2020, the Ministry of Communications imposed new regulations that prescribe fines for the publication or broadcast of “sensitive information,” a term that is vaguely defined. Journalists argued that the rules could enable the government to pressure media outlets and social media users and prevent them from raising sensitive political issues or critiquing the government.

In December 2020, the parliament passed a law on cyberbullying known as the Electronic Communication Abuse Offences Act, to which the king gave his formal assent in February 2021. The law called for fines and prison terms of up to three years for the use of a communication platform to abuse, harass, or otherwise harm another person, raising concerns that it could be enforced in a way that restricted journalistic activity or personal expression.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 4 / 4

Constitutional protections for religious freedom are generally upheld in practice. Religious groups are not required to register, but those that do receive various benefits. There are some restrictions on commercial activity on Sundays in keeping with a constitutional recognition of the Christian sabbath.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

Academic freedom is generally unrestricted. While there have been reports of self-censorship to avoid friction with the government in the past, no incidents of political interference have been reported in recent years. Among other higher educational institutions, Tonga hosts one of the regional campuses of the University of the South Pacific as well as the late Tongan scholar Futa Helu's 'Atenisi Institute, which offers tertiary courses, and Christ's University, which is owned by the Tokaikolo Church. In September 2021, the parliament passed legislation to merge existing publicly owned tertiary institutions into Tonga's first national university.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 4 / 4

The government is not known to monitor personal communications. Though Tongans are generally able to discuss political issues without reprisal, critics saw the 2020 media regulations and the cyberbullying law signed in February 2021 as tools that could be used by authorities to limit expression on sensitive topics.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 10 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

The constitution protects freedom of assembly, and demonstrations in recent years have generally proceeded peacefully.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 3 / 4

Nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) have not reported harassment or other restrictions by the authorities, but the civil society sector in Tonga remains relatively small and has limited influence.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 3 / 4

Workers have the legal right to organize in trade unions, but implementing regulations have never been issued, meaning the country's various de facto unions generally operate as associations. Related issues such as collective bargaining, strikes, and antiunion discrimination by employers are not specifically addressed by law. Tonga joined the International Labour Organization (ILO) in 2016.

F. RULE OF LAW: 12 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 3 / 4

The king retains authority over judicial appointments and dismissals. The Judicial Appointments and Discipline Panel, a committee of the Privy Council, provides advice on appointments, including for the lord chancellor, who has responsibility for administering the courts. The king in Privy Council has final jurisdiction over cases in the land court relating to hereditary estates and titles.

The judiciary is regarded as largely independent, but the royally appointed attorney general has previously been accused of interfering with judicial rulings. Broader judicial reforms that would have increased the cabinet's influence over judicial appointments were adopted by the parliament in 2014, but the king never gave his assent.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 3 / 4

Due process provisions and safeguards against arbitrary arrest and detention are typically respected by the authorities. However, there is no mechanism to guarantee access to counsel for indigent defendants.

The police commissioner, Stephen Caldwell, a New Zealander, retired in April 2021. His replacement, Lord Fielakepa, served in an acting role for the remainder of the year. The Police Act of 2010 gives control over the appointment of the police commissioner to the king's Privy Council, which has raised tensions with elected officials.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 3 / 4

Prison conditions are generally adequate, police brutality is rare, and crime rates remain relatively low. A number of police officers accused of misconduct have been investigated, dismissed, or convicted of crimes in recent years. However, public concern has increasingly focused on security problems including organized crime affecting the Chinese community, drug-related petty crime, and the country's growing role as a destination and production point—not just a transit point—for illegal drug trafficking.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 3 / 4

The constitution includes a general provision for equality before the law, and this is upheld in many respects. However, women still face some forms of discrimination, including in land and inheritance laws and with regard to employment in practice.

Same-sex sexual activity is criminalized, though the ban is not actively enforced. The May 2021 murder of an LGBT+ rights activist prompted renewed calls for a repeal of the law; the man suspected of committing the murder pleaded guilty and was sentenced to life in prison.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 13 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

There are no significant constraints on freedom of movement or the ability to change one's place of residence or employment. Beginning in March 2020, police enforced temporary movement restrictions to prevent the spread of COVID-19; the first confirmed case in the country was reported in October 2021, though there had been no community transmission by year's end.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 3 / 4

The legal framework generally supports private business activity. However, individuals cannot own or sell land outright, as all land is technically the property of the king. Land rights, once granted by nobles or directly by the crown through an allotment system, can only be leased or inherited, and while women can obtain leases, they are not eligible to receive or inherit land allotments.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 3 / 4

Personal social freedoms are typically respected. However, domestic violence remains a problem despite state and civil society efforts to prevent it, and girls as young as 15—the legal minimum age for marriage with parental permission—are sometimes compelled by their parents to marry. The law does not recognize same-sex marriages or unions.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 3 / 4

The population generally has access to economic opportunities and protection from abusive working conditions, though enforcement of labor laws is affected by resource limitations, and some employers have violated workers' rights.

Trinidad and Tobago

Population: 1,400,000

Capital: Port of Spain

Freedom Status: Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: The Republic of Trinidad and Tobago is a parliamentary democracy with vibrant media and civil society sectors. However, organized crime contributes to high levels of violence, and corruption among public officials remains a challenge. Discrimination against LGBT+ people and violence against women persist, and human trafficking is a significant concern.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- The January elections for Tobago's House of Assembly (THA) ended in a tie, with the People's National Movement (PNM) and the Progressive Democratic Patriots (PDP) each winning six seats. The national PNM-led government attempted to break the deadlock by enlarging the body via legislation. The PDP won a THA majority in a December rerun.
- The opposition United National Congress (UNC) attempted to impeach President Paula-Mae Weekes in October over the apparent withdrawal or suppression of a list of candidates for the post of police commissioner. The motion to impeach failed that month.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 33 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 11 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The president, the largely ceremonial head of state, is elected to a five-year term by a majority in the combined houses of Parliament. Paula-Mae Weekes, an independent former judge, was elected unopposed in January 2018 and took office that March.

The prime minister, who serves as head of government and is typically the leader of the majority party in Parliament, is appointed by the president. Keith Rowley became prime minister in 2015, after that year's parliamentary elections resulted in a victory for his party, the center-right PNM. Rowley retained his position after the PNM won the general elections in 2020.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

Parliament consists of the directly elected 41-member House of Representatives and the 31-member Senate, with members of both houses serving five-year terms. Of the 31 senators, 16 are appointed on the advice of the prime minister, 6 are appointed on the advice of the opposition leader, and 9 are appointed at the president's discretion based on merit.

In the 2020 parliamentary elections, the incumbent PNM won 49 percent of the vote, securing 22 seats. The UNC took 47 percent of the vote and 19 seats.

The semiautonomous island of Tobago has its own THA, with 15 members elected directly, 3 appointed on the advice of the chief secretary (the island's head of government), and 1 appointed on the advice of the minority leader. In the January 2021 elections, the PNM and the PDP, a local proindependence party, each won 6 seats, making for the first tie in the body's history; there were 12 elected members at that time. Subsequent efforts to elect a presiding officer or reach a power-sharing agreement failed. The Rowley government legislated to increase the number of directly elected THA seats to 15; a bill passed in March, while a related Elections and Boundaries Commission (EBC) report that addressed the new configuration passed in September. In a December rerun, the PDP won 14 seats and the PNM won 1, though the EBC received recount requests in 2 districts.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 3 / 4

Electoral laws are largely fair. The EBC organizes elections and is generally trusted by the public to fulfill its mandate impartially. However, electoral reforms suggested by 2015 observer missions apparently went unimplemented ahead of the 2020 elections.

The Rowley government legislated to break the THA deadlock after the January 2021 elections by increasing the number of directly elected seats. The UNC opposed the government's efforts, calling for the use of existing methods to address the issue.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 13 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 3 / 4

Several political parties operate in Trinidad and Tobago. While the PNM dominated the political landscape in the decades following independence, it has weakened in recent years; the national political arena is now largely divided between the PNM and the UNC, while the December 2021 elections in Tobago marked an end to the PNM's long-running dominance there.

Various factors, including the country's first-past-the-post voting system, have made it difficult for less established parties to gain seats in Parliament.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 4 / 4

Rival parties consistently transfer power peacefully, with multiple changes in government through elections since the 1980s.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 3 / 4

People's political choices are generally free from external pressure. However, observers have raised concerns about lack of transparency in campaign financing, which may enable improper influence and disadvantage opposition parties.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 3 / 4

All ethnic groups enjoy full political rights, and political parties are technically multiethnic, though the PNM is favored by Afro-Trinidadians and the UNC is affiliated with Indo-Trinidadians.

Women's political participation has increased somewhat in recent years, though they remain generally underrepresented. The speaker of the House of Representatives and 10 of the body's 41 members are women. In 2018, Paula-Mae Weekes became the first woman to be elected president. In January 2021, Tracy Davidson-Celestine of the PNM became the first female party leader in Tobago.

Discrimination against LGBT+ people is widespread, affecting their ability to fully engage in political and electoral processes.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 9 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 4 / 4

Freely elected executive and legislative officeholders generally determine and implement government policies without undue interference.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 2 / 4

Corruption remains a pervasive problem, especially within the police force and among high-ranking government officials and immigration officers. Several pieces of anticorruption legislation exist but are generally poorly enforced.

In 2019, former attorney general Anand Ramlogan and former senator Gerald Ramdeen, both of the UNC, were arrested on suspicion of money laundering; Ramlogan was accused of routing kickbacks and legal fees to outside lawyers during his tenure, while Ramdeen was accused of receiving some of the funds. The case remained open at the end of 2021.

Other cases of official corruption and mismanagement were revealed during 2021. In February, a government report identified corruption and financial mismanagement within the Water and Sewerage Authority. The government also investigated the possibly corrupt issuances of firearm licenses during the year.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 3 / 4

Public officials are required to disclose their assets, income, and liabilities, but penalties against those who fail to comply are limited. The Integrity Commission, which is tasked with overseeing these financial disclosures, has been criticized for being ineffective.

The public has the right to access government documents by law, although numerous public institutions are exempt. Furthermore, there is no enforcement of a provision that requires the government to respond to information requests within 30 days. A 2015 law regulating public procurements was implemented in late 2020, but with significant exemptions.

President Weekes came under criticism over the apparent withdrawal or suppression of a list of candidates for the post of police commissioner in August 2021. UNC leader Kamla Persad-Bissessar moved for President Weekes's impeachment in October, but the motion failed that month.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 49 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 16 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 4 / 4

Freedom of the press is constitutionally guaranteed and generally upheld in practice. Media outlets are privately owned and vigorously pluralistic. However, those regarded as most favorable to the government receive the bulk of state advertising. Under the 2013 Defamation and Libel Act, "malicious defamatory libel known to be false" is punishable by up to two years in prison as well as a fine, but prosecutions are uncommon.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 4 / 4

Religious freedom is constitutionally guaranteed and generally honored. Some restrictions are placed on foreign missionaries; up to 35 per registered religious group are allowed in the country at one time, and they cannot stay longer than three consecutive years.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

Academic freedom is generally upheld.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 4 / 4

Individuals are free to express their opinions in private conversations. The government has historically refrained from monitoring online communications; however, the national police launched a Social Media Monitoring Unit charged with monitoring social networks to detect evidence of child pornography, prostitution, and human trafficking, in 2019.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 11 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

The constitution provides for freedom of assembly, and the government generally respects this right. COVID-19 measures, which placed limits on the size and length of public gatherings, were imposed during 2021.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 4 / 4

Civil society is robust, with a range of domestic and international groups operating freely.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 3 / 4

Labor unions are well organized and politically active, though union membership has declined in recent years. Strikes are legal and occur frequently. The law contains a provision allowing the labor minister to petition the courts to end any strike deemed detrimental to national interests. Walkouts by workers considered essential, including hospital staff, firefighters, and telecommunication workers, are punishable by up to three years in prison and fines.

In December 2021, the government announced that a COVID-19 vaccine mandate for public-sector employees would be implemented in January 2022. Public-sector labor groups voiced their opposition to the mandate.

F. RULE OF LAW: 9 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 3 / 4

The judicial branch is generally independent but is subject to some political pressure and corruption.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 2 / 4

Due process rights are constitutionally provided for but are not always upheld. Rising crime rates and institutional weakness have produced a severe backlog in the court system. Corruption in the police force, which is often linked to the illegal drugs trade, is endemic, and inefficiencies have resulted in the dismissal of some criminal cases. Intimidation of witnesses and jurors has been reported by judicial officials.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 2 / 4

The government has struggled to address criminal violence, which is mostly linked to organized crime and drug trafficking. The US State Department issued a travel advisory for Trinidad and Tobago during 2021, urging “increased caution due to crime, terrorism, and kidnapping.” In April, Parliament passed a law meant to combat criminal gang activity.

The national police reported 448 murders in 2021, while 396 were reported in 2020.

Police have been criticized for excessive use of force.

Trinidadians have reportedly sought to join the Islamic State (IS) militant group in recent years.

Death penalties are mandatory in murder cases, though no executions were carried out in 2021. In November, the London-based Privy Council heard a case on the penalty’s constitutionality from a man who had received a death sentence in 2011; its ruling was pending at year’s end.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 2 / 4

Despite legal protections against discrimination on various grounds, racial disparities persist, with Indo-Trinidadians accounting for a disproportionate share of the country’s economic elite. Women continue to face discrimination in employment and compensation.

Human rights groups have criticized the government’s unwillingness to address discrimination and violence against LGBT+ people. However, in 2018, the High Court ruled that the provisions of the Sexual Offences Act that criminalized same-sex relations were unconstitutional. The government vowed to appeal that ruling to the Privy Council; the case remains pending.

Immigration law does not adequately protect refugees, and Trinidad specifically lacks a system to process asylum claims. As many as 40,000 Venezuelan asylum seekers and refugees have entered the country in recent years, but authorities regularly seek to detain and deport these individuals as illegal immigrants, including those who registered their status with the Office of the UN High Commissioner for Refugees. Local courts have intervened to block deportations. Officials have espoused derogatory rhetoric when discussing refugees. There are regular reports of Venezuelans drowning en route to Trinidad and Tobago.

Trinidadians were among those held by Kurdish forces in the Al-Hol camp in Syria, after the IS lost its territorial holdings there in 2019. Some 24 women and 70 children reportedly remained in Syrian camps as of July 2021. Family members of 12 Al-Hol detainees sought judicial review to force their repatriation, but the High Court ruled that the government could not be compelled to facilitate their return in April.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 13 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

Trinidadians and Tobagonians do not face significant constraints on freedom of movement or on their ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 3 / 4

While the government actively supports both domestic and foreign investment in the country, corruption and weak state institutions can make it more difficult to start and operate businesses.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 3 / 4

Most individual rights with respect to personal status issues like marriage and divorce are protected by law. The 2017 Marriage Act raised the legal marriage age to 18, officially making child marriage illegal.

Rape, including spousal rape, is illegal, and domestic violence is addressed by specific legislation. However, enforcement of these provisions remains inadequate. Other forms of gender-based violence occur; 47 women and girls were murdered in the first 11 months 2020, while a majority of missing persons at the time were women. A bill decriminalizing pepper spray was passed by the Senate in May 2021 and by the House of Representatives in June.

Abortion is illegal in most cases, and there is reportedly little public awareness of legal exemptions for abortions to save a woman's life or preserve her physical or mental health. A woman can be imprisoned for up to four years for obtaining an illegal abortion.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 3 / 4

The law provides basic protections against exploitative working conditions, though these do not apply or are poorly enforced for informal and household workers in particular. While the government has stepped up efforts to combat human trafficking, convictions have been lacking, and funding for services to trafficking survivors has been cut. Venezuelan women are especially vulnerable to sex trafficking.

The US State Department's Trafficking in Persons Report 2021 noted that a group of police officials and officials in other parts of government were suspected of involvement in trafficking, though no criminal investigation was launched against the latter group.

Tunisia

Population: 11,800,000

Capital: Tunis

Freedom Status: Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Status Change: Tunisia's status declined from Free to Partly Free because President Kaïs Saïed unilaterally dismissed and replaced the elected government, indefinitely suspended the parliament, and imposed harsh restrictions on civil liberties to suppress opposition to his actions.

Overview: After the ouster of a longtime autocrat in 2011, Tunisia began a democratic transition, and citizens now enjoy considerable political rights and civil liberties. However, endemic corruption, economic challenges, security threats, and unresolved problems related to gender equality and transitional justice remain obstacles to full democratic consolidation. Recent emergency measures imposed by President Kaïs Saïed, including a suspension of the elected parliament, have created deep uncertainty about the future of Tunisian democracy.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- During the first half of the year, public frustration increased in response to an ongoing economic crisis, mismanagement of the COVID-19 pandemic, and political and institutional rivalry among President Kaïs Saïed, Prime Minister Hichem Mechichi, and parliament speaker Rached Ghannouchi.

- Street demonstrations supporting and opposing different factions escalated, and countrywide protests in late July demanded the resignation of the government and parliament. Some of these protests turned violent, as participants burned or stormed the offices of Ghannouchi's Ennahda party in several cities.
- On July 25, President Saïed announced a number of emergency measures, including suspension of the parliament, the dismissal of Prime Minister Mechichi, the repeal of lawmakers' immunity, an expanded curfew, and a ban on public demonstrations. He cited Article 80 of the constitution, which allows the president to take necessary measures in the event of an imminent threat to the country's institutions, security, or independence, though the article also requires consultation with the prime minister and parliament speaker and prohibits dissolution of the parliament, among other constraints. In the absence of a Constitutional Court, whose creation remained stalled, there was no independent body capable of adjudicating the constitutionality of Saïed's actions. Public opinion polls in the months following July 25 found significant popular support for the president.
- In late August, Saïed extended the emergency measures, and in October, he announced a new prime minister and government, swearing them in without parliamentary approval.
- In December, Saïed announced plans for a constitutional revision process that would involve online public consultation, culminating in a referendum in July 2022. He also announced plans to hold parliamentary elections in December 2022. Major civil society organizations, including the General Tunisian Labor Union (UGTT), criticized this timeline, describing Saïed's plan as insufficient to protect democracy. In the meantime, security forces prevented members of parliament from gathering at their headquarters, and political figures who were critical of Saïed faced arrest warrants and travel bans.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 26 / 40 (-6)

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 9 / 12 (-3)

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 3 / 4 (-1)

The 2014 constitution lays out a semipresidential system in which a popularly elected president serves as head of state and exercises circumscribed powers, while the majority party in the parliament selects a prime minister, who serves as head of government, following parliamentary elections. The president is directly elected for up to two five-year terms.

The last presidential election took place in October 2019, following the death of President Beji Caid Essebsi that July. Kaïs Saïed, an independent candidate and former constitutional law professor who received an endorsement from the Islamist Ennahda party, won an October runoff against opponent Nabil Karoui with 73 percent of the vote. Karoui spent most of the campaign in prison on money laundering and tax evasion charges. Local observers concluded that the election was generally competitive and credible, but raised some concerns about Karoui's inability to campaign while in prison.

President Saïed took the unilateral decision to dismiss Prime Minister Hichem Mechichi in July 2021, and in October he installed a new government headed by Prime Minister Najla Bouden without parliamentary approval.

Score Change: The score declined from 4 to 3 because President Saïed unilaterally dismissed the elected prime minister and named a replacement without consulting the parliament.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 2 / 4 (-2)

Tunisia's 2014 constitution established a unicameral parliament, the 217-seat Assembly of the Representatives of the People (ARP); 199 members are directly elected in domestic multimember constituencies, while 18 represent multimember constituencies abroad via a party-list system. All members serve five-year terms.

The most recent legislative elections took place in October 2019. International and national observers declared the elections to be generally competitive and credible. Ennahda placed first with 52 seats, Karoui's Qalb Tounes (Heart of Tunisia) party took 38 seats, the progressive Democratic Current took 22, and Al-Karama (Dignity) Coalition took 21. The remaining seats were won by 11 other parties and 17 independent candidates. After a period of political gridlock, Elyes Fakhfakh became prime minister in February 2020. Hichem Mechichi succeeded Fakhfakh in July 2020, after a corruption scandal forced his resignation. A cabinet reshuffle approved by the parliament in January 2021 was rejected by President Saïed, whose allies were among the ministers slated for dismissal.

On July 25, President Saïed suspended the parliament and dismissed Mechichi over the objections of the Ennahda party and parliament speaker Ghannouchi. The president also revoked lawmakers' legal immunity, and several members later faced house arrest or detention and trials in military courts. Though Ghannouchi declared the parliament to be in session on October 1, lawmakers were prevented by security forces from gathering in the parliament building. The parliament remained suspended and unable to assemble at year's end.

Score Change: The score declined from 4 to 2 due to the president's unilateral suspension of the parliament.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 4 / 4

The Independent High Authority for Elections (ISIE), a nine-member commission, is tasked with supervising parliamentary and presidential elections. Since its inception in 2011, the ISIE's political independence and conduct of elections have been well regarded by Tunisian and international observers. In 2019, the ISIE successfully oversaw the early presidential election, including a televised debate between the two candidates in the second round, as well as parliamentary elections.

In December 2021, President Saïed announced his intention to hold a referendum on a revised constitution in July 2022 and parliamentary elections in December 2022. While no details had been released by year's end, Saïed was known to prefer a constitutional model in which directly elected local councils would select representatives for a weak national legislature. It remained unclear how the ISIE would participate in reforms of the electoral framework.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 13 / 16 (-1)B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 3 / 4 (-1)

Tunisia's numerous political parties represent a wide range of ideologies and interests. Though parties have generally been free to form and operate in the post-2011 period, recent events have called these freedoms into question. After the suspension of parliament and parliamentary immunity on July 25, 2021, some lawmakers and political figures were subjected to repressive measures including travel bans, detention, and house arrest. Critics of Saïed with diverse political leanings, including Seifeddine Makhlouf and Abdellatif Aloui of Al-Karama and independent Yassine Ayari, faced unexpected arrests based on old charges. In the first month after July 25, Amnesty International counted at least 50 people who received “arbitrary” travel bans. In November, Tunisian authorities issued an international arrest warrant for former president Moncef Marzouki, who had been publicly critical of Saïed, on charges of “undermining the external security of the state.” Marzouki remained in France, where authorities declined to extradite him to Tunisia. In late December, former justice minister Nouredine Bhiri and former Interior Ministry official Fathi Baldi were detained by plainclothes officers on unspecified charges; according to Human Rights Watch, Bhiri was the first high-ranking Ennahda member to be placed in custody since the 2011 revolution.

Score Change: The score declined from 4 to 3 because a number of political figures who criticized the president's actions faced arrests or travel bans.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 4 / 4

Opposition parties participate competitively in political processes, and the 2019 elections demonstrated that new parties and independents can win office and enter government. President Saïed is not affiliated with a political party, nor are the two most recent prime ministers, Mechichi and Bouden. It remained unclear at the end of 2021 how Saïed's actions since July 25 would affect the potential for future rotations of power.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 3 / 4

Voters are generally able to exercise their political choices without undue interference. However, campaign-finance laws are complex and often unclear, and parties occasionally bend, if not break, the rules in order to campaign effectively. Domestic economic oligarchies have a high degree of influence over politics. Foreign groups also reportedly supply funds to preferred parties and candidates, though these channels of support are opaque.

In 2021, the president's critics accused him of colluding with the regimes of the United Arab Emirates and Egypt to carry out his seizure of power, particularly in light of their common enmity toward Ennahda. Alliances between Tunisian political factions and foreign actors, and corresponding accusations of proxy status, have been a common feature of Tunisian politics since 2011. However, the precise nature of foreign influence on the events of 2021 remained unclear.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 3 / 4

Nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) and international organizations have worked to increase the political participation of marginalized groups. A 2017 law requires an equal number of men and women at the top of candidate lists, as well as at least one candidate with a disability and three people under the age of 35 on each list. Representation of women in subsequent elections has been high, and legislation aimed at protecting the rights of women has been passed. Fifty-four women held parliamentary seats after the 2019 elections. Eleven women and one openly gay man requested nomination to stand as candidates in the 2019 presidential election.

The Amazigh ethnic community is underrepresented in electoral politics, but the first party to address their interests, the Akal Movement, was formed in 2019.

Despite these positive developments, some segments of the population still lack full political rights. Only Muslims may run for president. Societal discrimination and laws criminalizing same-sex sexual activity exclude many LGBT+ people from active political participation, and political parties largely fail to address LGBT+ issues.

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 1 / 4 (-2)

Conflict over the division of powers between the legislative and executive branches has undermined policymaking and governance since 2011. Late president Essebsi manipulated the national budget in such a way that the parliament was deeply underfunded, leaving it with limited ability or resources to craft legislation on its own or check executive authority. Clashes between the executive and legislative branches continued under Saïed, culminating in his emergency powers declaration on July 25, 2021. The move to suspend the parliament effectively allowed Saïed to rule by decree, with elected lawmakers playing no role. The new government of Prime Minister Bouden took office in October without the constitutionally required approval from parliament, and it remained responsible only to the president.

Score Change: The score declined from 3 to 1 because the president's suspension of the parliament left national legislative representatives entirely unable to influence government formation or policymaking.

Anticorruption legislation has historically been considered weak. The Economic Reconciliation Law of 2017 effectively offered amnesty for those implicated in corruption under the pre-2011 regime of Zine el-Abidine Ben Ali, but it was amended due to public disapproval.

The National Commission for the Fight against Corruption (INLUCC) was established in 2011, and a permanent body, the Commission on Good Governance and the Fight against Corruption (IBGLCC), was meant to replace it under the 2014 constitution. While legislation intended to establish the IBGLCC was passed in 2017, the new body remained inactive. INLUCC thus continued its operations, though with inadequate funding and little authority to compel legal action. Political conflict surrounding the commission escalated in 2021. In June, Prime Minister Mechichi dismissed INLUCC president Imed Boukhris after Boukhris made corruption allegations against several ministers appointed by Mechichi in his January cabinet reshuffle. Mechichi's move to replace Boukhris with judge Imed Ben Taleb drew criticism from civil society organizations, including the anticorruption group I Watch, which had filed a lawsuit against Ben Taleb in 2020. President Saïed rejected the appointment, leading to further conflict over the division of executive powers. INLUCC headquarters were shuttered by police in August, though some operations continued. Separately, Chawki Tabib, a former INLUCC president who had been dismissed in 2020, was placed under house arrest for several weeks between August and October 2021.

In this context of weak enforcement, charges of corruption have significantly shaped recent elections and political dynamics. Nabil Karoui, the 2019 presidential candidate, spent much of the campaign period detained on suspicion of money laundering and tax evasion. (Karoui was released in June 2021, then detained in September by Algerian authorities on a charge of illegally crossing the border.) In July 2020, then prime minister Fakhfakh was forced to resign over a report that he held stakes in firms that were involved with public contracts. President Saïed justified his seizure of power in July 2021 in part by arguing that it was necessary to uproot corruption in the political establishment. The subsequent travel bans and arrest warrants against political figures and businessmen led critics to accuse Saïed of instrumentalizing anticorruption efforts to eliminate his political enemies.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 2 / 4

A 2016 freedom of information law was criticized by watchdog groups for its security-related exemptions. Cabinet ministries often refuse public requests for information. Members of the government frequently craft policy behind closed doors, without input from other parties or citizens. Al-Bawsala, a nonprofit organization that promotes transparency and accountability, has criticized ruling elites from all parties over their lack of responsiveness to the public, particularly during the COVID-19 pandemic.

A 2018 law requires the president, ministers, and high-level public officials, among others, to declare their assets to INLUCC; penalties for violating the law include large fines and prison terms of up to five years. Members of the Bouden government reportedly declared their assets in October 2021.

President Saïed's centralization of power after July 2021 led to a lack of transparency regarding official decision-making, actions by law enforcement agencies, and the future direction of the country. Journalists' groups criticized the new government's attempts to limit and control officials' interactions with the press.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 38 / 60 (-1)D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 12 / 16*D1. Are there free and independent media? 2 / 4

The constitution guarantees freedom of opinion, thought, expression, information, and publication, subject to some restrictions. Many independent outlets operate, including several online news sites that have launched since the 2011 revolution. However, it is difficult to obtain data about the ownership of media companies, their audiences, or the allocation of public advertising, and press freedom advocates have expressed concern about significant political influence on a number of major private outlets.

Journalists have faced increasing pressure and intimidation from government officials in connection with their work. Security forces closed the Tunis office of Qatar's Al-Jazeera news service on the day after Saïed declared his exceptional powers in July 2021. Reporters Without Borders noted several instances of harassment and detention of journalists in the days leading up to Saïed's announcement of a new government. The National Syndicate of Tunisian Journalists held protests against a trend of referring journalists and activists to military courts. Reporters covering the security forces or protests are particularly vulnerable to harassment, physical abuse, and arrest. In September 2021, employees of the digital content firm Instalingo were interrogated in connection with content that was critical of normalizing diplomatic relations with Israel. The television channel Zitouna, which is often associated with Ennahda, was raided in October after a host read an antidictatorship poem.

In addition to journalists, political bloggers have been prosecuted under insult and defamation laws. In May 2021, blogger Salim Jebali was arrested for criticizing the president on social media.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 3 / 4

The constitution calls for freedom of belief and conscience for members of all religions, as well as for the nonreligious, and bans campaigns against apostasy or incitement to hatred and violence on religious grounds. However, blasphemy remains illegal, and police may invoke it as a pretext for arrests. Islam is enshrined as the only religion of the state, and Islamic education remains a required component of the curriculum in public schools. Converts to Christianity often experience harassment and discrimination.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 3 / 4

Article 33 of the constitution explicitly protects academic freedom, which has improved in practice since 2011. However, self-censorship by academics persists in some instances. Students have reported being unable to pursue dissertation research on topics including sexuality and gender identity, or to engage in critiques of Islam's role in violent extremism.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 4 / 4

Private discussion is generally open and free, though there is some fear of reprisals for speech on certain topics, including criticism of the military. The criminal ban on same-sex sexual activity discourages open discussion of issues affecting LGBT+ people.

Social media users have faced a growing risk of prosecution for posts that are critical of the president and government policies, though most of those targeted have accounts with large audiences. Users who posted on political topics also reported online harassment and hacking attempts in 2021.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 7 / 12 (-1)E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 2 / 4 (-1)

The constitution guarantees the rights to assembly and peaceful demonstration. Public protests on political, social, and economic issues are frequent and well-attended. However, a 2015 counterterrorism law and successive states of emergency have imposed significant constraints on such gatherings. A state of emergency allows security forces to ban strikes, meetings, and large gatherings considered likely to incite disorder.

Following large and sometimes violent antigovernment protests in late July 2021, during which some participants burned or stormed Ennahda offices in several cities, President Saïed as part of his emergency powers declaration imposed a ban on public gatherings, an extensive curfew, and restrictions on travel between cities outside curfew. Even prior to July, freedom of assembly was curtailed under COVID-19-related emergency measures, including a nightly curfew.

The year also featured a pattern of police violence against protesters. Officers at various times used batons, tear gas, and armored vehicles against protesters in the capital and in the southern and interior regions. At least one man died as police violently dispersed a protest in January. In November, police in Agareb used extreme violence against demonstrators protesting against the government's decision to reverse the closure of a toxic waste dump.

Score Change: The score declined from 3 to 2 because authorities used excessive force in response to protests during the year, and President Saïed imposed curfews and other assembly restrictions beginning in July.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 2 / 4

A 2011 decree guarantees the freedom for NGOs to operate and outlines procedures governing the establishment of new groups. Tens of thousands of new NGOs began operating after the revolution, holding conferences, trainings, educational programs, and other events throughout Tunisia in subsequent years.

However, a 2018 law effectively equates NGOs with businesses and requires them to submit to onerous reporting requirements beyond those codified in the 2011 decree. Under the law, all NGOs (and businesses) are required to register with a National Registry of Institutions, and to provide data on staff, assets, decisions to merge or dissolve, and operations. Failure to register may result in a year of imprisonment and a fine. Critics of the rules argue that they increase state monitoring and oversight of civil society. Registration applications can be denied at the discretion of the Council of the National Registry.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 3 / 4

The constitution guarantees the right to form labor unions and to strike. Large-scale strike actions have occurred across all sectors of the economy since the revolution, with participants demanding labor reform, better wages, and improved workplace conditions. Unions have reported that some employers take steps to discourage union activities, including the dismissal of union activists.

The UGTT is the predominant union organization, though independent unions also exist. The UGTT has played a significant role in brokering political agreements during moments of crisis since 2011. In late 2021, after initially voicing support for many of President Saïed's actions, the union pressed him to move toward broader dialogue and early elections.

F. RULE OF LAW: 9 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 2 / 4

While the constitution calls for an independent judiciary, judicial reform has proceeded slowly since the 2011 revolution, with numerous Ben Ali-era judges remaining on the bench and successive governments regularly attempting to manipulate the courts. Legislation adopted in 2016 established the Supreme Judicial Council, a body tasked with ensuring the independence of the judiciary and appointing a third of the Constitutional Court judges. Council members were elected that year by thousands of legal professionals. However, a December 2021 report from the Middle East and North Africa director of the International Commission of Jurists accused Tunisian authorities of failing to adopt reforms that would uphold the judiciary's independence and empower the Supreme Judicial Council, as required by earlier laws on transitional justice.

The Constitutional Court, whose role is to evaluate the constitutionality of decrees and laws, had yet to be established in 2021. The parliament's efforts to press forward with the court's formation were rebuffed by President Saïed in the first half of the year, adding to the broader political impasse between the executive and legislature. The absence of a Constitutional Court complicated debate over the constitutionality of Saïed's emergency measures.

Since July 2021, the president has faced criticism from the legal community for his assertion of authority over the functioning of the courts and statements calling for the "purification" of the judiciary. While the details of any planned reforms had yet to be disclosed at year's end, the statements reportedly contributed to a hostile climate for judges, including on social media.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 2 / 4

Though civil and criminal procedures have improved significantly since the time of Ben Ali, a state of emergency in place since 2015 and renewed repeatedly has given police broad license to arrest and detain people on security- or terrorism-related charges, and arbitrary arrests continued to take place during the year. Civilians are still tried in military courts, particularly on charges of defaming the army. Those targeted for military trials in 2021 included lawmakers, businessmen, journalists, and bloggers.

In 2014, Tunisia established a Truth and Dignity Commission (IVD) to examine political, economic, and social crimes committed since 1956, and it soon began collecting testimony. In early 2018, the parliament voted against extending the commission's mandate, a decision that drew criticism from rights activists for weakening transitional justice efforts. The commission presented its final report in 2019 and officially published it in 2020, drawing on over 62,000 complaints filed by Tunisian citizens against the state for human rights abuses. Tunisian courts began reviewing 69 indictments and 131 referrals from the IVD, but the president's emergency measures in 2021 created uncertainty about the future of the transitional justice process.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 3 / 4

Physical security has threatened by periodic terrorist attacks in recent years, including some claimed by the Islamic State (IS) militant group.

The police force is the subject of long-standing complaints about officers abusing civilians and detainees with impunity, and the police unions have resisted reform efforts aimed at addressing the problem. Several well-publicized instances of police abuse and harassment were caught on video in 2021. Victims included a shepherd in Siliana Governorate, a young man in the Tunis neighborhood of Sidi Hassine who was publicly stripped and beaten by police, and another Sidi Hassine man who died in police custody. These events triggered large protests against police violence, which in turn faced repression by riot police.

While some offenses can still draw the death penalty under Tunisian law, the authorities have not carried out an execution since 1991.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 2 / 4

The constitution prohibits all forms of discrimination and calls for the state to create a culture of diversity. However, LGBT+ people continue to face legal discrimination. Same-sex sexual activity remains illegal, with the penal code calling for prison sentences of up to three years for “sodomy”; this law has been enforced in practice in recent years. Although the constitution guarantees gender equality, women experience discrimination in employment, and sexual harassment in public spaces remains prevalent.

Tunisia has no asylum law, leaving the United Nations as the sole entity processing claims of refugee status in the country. Irregular migrants and asylum seekers are often housed in informal detention centers, where they suffer from substandard living conditions. Delays in the issuance of residency permits make it impossible for many to work legally, forcing them to take informal jobs with no labor protections. The reported handover of an Algerian refugee in Tunisia to Algerian authorities in 2021 raised concerns about the safety of refugees in the country.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 10 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 3 / 4

The constitution guarantees freedom of movement within the country, as well as the freedom to travel abroad. In 2017, lawmakers approved measures that require authorities to go through more rigorous processes in order to issue travel bans or restrict passports. However, authorities have broad license under the state of emergency to restrict individuals' movement without initiating formal charges, and thousands of people have been affected by such orders. Freedom of movement has also been hampered by COVID-19-related measures since 2020, with some restrictions enforced by the military. Separately, human rights groups criticized the travel bans imposed after the president's seizure of power in July 2021 as arbitrary restrictions on freedom of movement.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 2 / 4

The protection of property rights and the freedom to operate businesses are impeded in part by high levels of corruption and a large court backlog of property disputes.

Under existing law, women are granted half the share of inheritance that men receive, and efforts to establish gender equality in inheritance rights have failed to make progress in the parliament.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 3 / 4

Tunisia has long been praised for relatively progressive social policies, especially in the areas of family law and women's rights. In 2017, the Justice Ministry repealed a decree that had banned Tunisian women from marrying non-Muslim men. However, women face high rates of domestic abuse. The 2017 Law on Eliminating Violence against Women addressed domestic violence and included language intended to protect women from harassment in public and from economic discrimination. The law's implementation has been limited by a shortage of trained agents to handle complaints, pressure on women from some agents to avoid taking abusive husbands to court, and logistical barriers to reporting abuse.

Public displays of affection can lead to charges of violating public morality laws, which carry penalties including jail time.

Despite efforts by civil society groups to combat such problems, Tunisian women and children are subject to sex trafficking and forced domestic work in both Tunisia and abroad. Refugees and other migrants are also susceptible to exploitation by traffickers. Cases of exploitation in the agriculture and textile sectors are prevalent; women often work long hours with no contracts, benefits, or legal recourse.

Recent protests have called attention to the lack of economic opportunity for average Tunisians due to high inflation, high unemployment, and a dearth of meaningful reform to address such issues. Protests throughout 2021 highlighted the continued problem of regional economic inequality, with marginalization, underdevelopment, unemployment, and deteriorating conditions plaguing the country's interior.

The COVID-19 pandemic has, by many measures, exacerbated Tunisia's social and economic challenges. According to the World Bank, unemployment increased from 15 percent prior to the pandemic to 17.8 percent by the end of the first quarter of 2021. Unemployment was particularly high among women (24.9 percent) and young people (40.8 percent for those aged 15–24).

Turkey

Population: 83,800,000

Capital: Ankara

Freedom Status: Not Free

Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: President Recep Tayyip Erdoğan's Justice and Development Party (AKP) has ruled Turkey since 2002. After initially passing some liberalizing reforms, the AKP government showed growing contempt for political rights and civil liberties and has pursued a wide-ranging crackdown on critics and opponents since 2016. Constitutional changes in 2017 concentrated power in the hands of the president, removing key checks and balances. While Erdoğan continues to dominate Turkish politics, a deepening economic crisis and opportunities to further consolidate political power have given the government new incentives to suppress dissent and limit public discourse.

- In January, President Erdoğan appointed a political ally as the rector of Turkey's top-ranking Boğaziçi University, prompting months-long protests by students and faculty that the police violently dispersed on multiple occasions. Erdoğan ultimately removed the rector in July, only to replace him the next month with a different political ally.
- In June, the Constitutional Court accepted a case to shut down the country's second-largest opposition party, the Peoples' Democratic Party (HDP). The charges accuse the HDP of having links to terrorism and threatening Turkey's territorial unity. Meanwhile, arrests of HDP officials carried out during the year added to the thousands of party members who have been detained since 2016.
- In March, President Erdoğan unilaterally withdrew Turkey from the Istanbul Convention, an international treaty to combat gender-based violence, sparking outrage from domestic and international advocacy groups and foreign governments. Turkey's opposition parties and most of the population remain opposed to the move, and civil society groups have attempted to appeal it as unconstitutional.
- Osman Kavala, Turkey's most prominent political prisoner, continued to have his due process rights denied throughout the year. In January, an appeals court revoked his 2020 acquittal, ostensibly because some evidence had been excluded from court. Authorities rearrested him in February under newfound charges of allegedly aiding a coup attempt and supporting terrorism. As of the end of 2021, Kavala remained in detention, despite a 2019 order by the ECHR for his immediate release.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 16 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 5 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 2 / 4

A 2017 constitutional referendum instituted a new presidential system of government in Turkey, eliminating the role of prime minister and making the president the chief national authority. The president is directly elected for up to two five-year terms but is eligible to run for a third term if the parliament calls for early elections. President Erdoğan has retained a dominant role in government since moving from the post of prime minister to the presidency in 2014. The 2017 constitutional changes granted the presidency newly expanded executive powers and eliminated the role of prime minister.

The snap June 2018 elections, originally scheduled for November 2019, were held under a state of emergency, in place after the 2016 coup attempt. Erdoğan, who leads the AKP, won a second term, earning 52.6 percent of the vote in the first round. Muharrem İnce of the opposition Republican People's Party (CHP) won 30.6 percent. Selahattin Demirtaş of the HDP won 8.4 percent, while Meral Akşener of the nationalist İyi Party won 7.3 percent; other candidates won the remaining 1.1 percent. Because Erdoğan's first term ended early, he is eligible for a third term in 2023, which would last until 2028.

The Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE) strongly criticized the election, reporting that electoral regulators often deferred to the ruling AKP, and that state-run media favored the party in its coverage. The OSCE also noted that Erdoğan repeatedly accused his opponents of supporting terrorism during the campaign.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 2 / 4

The Grand National Assembly, the unicameral parliament that was expanded by the 2017 referendum, has 600 seats. Lawmakers are elected to five-year terms by proportional representation. Parties must earn at least 10 percent of the national vote to join the parliament, an unusually high threshold by global standards.

In the 2018 elections, the AKP joined with the far-right Nationalist Movement Party (MHP) to form the People's Alliance, which won 53 percent of the vote, resulting in 344 seats. The main opposition CHP allied with İyi Party and two smaller parties to form the Nation's Alliance, which took 34 percent of the vote and 189 seats. The HDP entered the race alone and won 11 percent of the vote, which equaled 67 seats.

The OSCE found that the 2018 elections were marred by the AKP's misuse of state resources to gain an electoral advantage as well as an intimidation campaign against opposition parties. Reports of irregularities such as proxy voting were prevalent in the south and southeast, the HDP's stronghold.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 1 / 4

The judges of the Supreme Electoral Council (YSK), who oversee all voting procedures, are appointed by AKP-dominated judicial bodies and often defer to the AKP in its decisions; in May 2019, it ordered a rerun of the Istanbul mayoral election. The CHP candidate Ekrem İmamoğlu had narrowly won the race in the March election, but the YSK scrapped the result based on selective technicalities. İmamoğlu won the second vote that June, increasing his margin of victory over the AKP candidate.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 8 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 2 / 4

Turkey maintains a multiparty system, with five major parties in the parliament. However, the rise of new parties is inhibited by the 10 percent vote threshold for parliamentary representation—an unusually high bar by global standards. Parties can bypass this threshold by forming electoral alliances. Parties can be disbanded for endorsing policies that are not in agreement with constitutional parameters, and Turkey's Constitutional Court has a history of banning Kurdish and Islamist political parties for violating the constitution.

Members of the HDP have faced regular politically motivated prosecutions since 2015, after a peace process with the outlawed Kurdistan Workers' Party (PKK) collapsed and the government accused the HDP of serving as a proxy for the PKK, which is designated as a terrorist organization. The HDP's offices have since then been regularly attacked by far-right, anti-Kurdish mobs. In 2016, the government removed parliamentary immunity, and many HDP lawmakers—including former co-chair Demirtaş—have since been jailed on terrorism charges. In March 2021, HDP lawmaker and prominent human rights activist Ömer Faruk Gergerlioğlu was expelled from Parliament after he was convicted on terrorism charges. The Constitutional Court eventually revoked his conviction, and he reentered Parliament in July.

In June 2021, the Constitutional Court accepted a case to shut down the country's second-largest opposition party, the Peoples' Democratic Party (HDP). The charges accuse the HDP of having links to terrorism and threatening Turkey's territorial unity.

While HDP members face the most significant obstacles, other opposition leaders have also experienced politically motivated prosecutions and violent attacks. CHP lawmakers have also been arrested and expelled from parliament, and the party's chair has faced physical attacks during rallies. In August 2021, the İyi Party Chair Meral Akşener was attacked during a political rally in Sivas.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 2 / 4

President Erdoğan and the ruling AKP assert partisan control over the YSK, judiciary, police, and media. They aggressively used these institutional tools to weaken or co-opt political rivals in recent years, severely limiting the opposition's ability to build voter support and gain power through elections.

The 2019 municipal elections, in which the opposition won control of most major urban centers, including Ankara and Istanbul, suggested there remains space for the opposition to make progress despite the AKP's institutional advantages. Yet opposition leaders continue to face obstacles even after winning elections. The government has replaced dozens of HDP mayors with "trustees" since the 2019 election and obstructed several newly elected CHP mayors—including Istanbul Mayor İmamoğlu—from carrying out their duties.

The government has arrested and charged opposition leaders, accusing them of offenses ranging from terrorism to insulting the president. In December 2021, Turkey's ministry of interior launched a "special investigation" into hundreds of staff at the Istanbul municipal government for alleged links to militant groups, which Mayor İmamoğlu strongly criticized as a politically motivated form of harassment.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 3 / 4

While Turkey's military has a history of intervening in political affairs, the civilian leadership has asserted its control over the military in the last decade. However, the AKP's institutional dominance threatens to make the state itself an extension of the party that can be used to change political outcomes. The government's influence over the media also tilts the playing field heavily in favor of the ruling party; media networks allocate only a fraction of their campaign coverage of Erdoğan and the AKP to opposition leaders.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 1 / 4

Critics charge that the AKP favors Sunni Muslims, pointing to an overhaul of the education system that favored Islamic education in secular schools and promoted the rise of religious schools in the 2010s. The AKP also expanded the Directorate of Religious Affairs, using this institution as a channel for political patronage. Among other functions, the party uses the directorate to deliver government-friendly sermons in mosques in Turkey, as well as in countries where the Turkish diaspora is present.

While the Kurds, Turkey's largest ethnic minority, officially have political representation, pro-Kurdish parties face regular harassment by the government through hate speech, politically motivated prosecutions, and disinformation in progovernment media.

While members of Turkey's non-Sunni Alevi community and non-Muslim religious minorities hold seats in the parliament, the government's crackdown on opposition parties, where they are concentrated, has seriously harmed their political rights and electoral opportunities.

Women remain underrepresented in politics and in leadership positions in government. They occupy 104 parliamentary seats, or 17 percent of the assembly. A handful of openly LGBT+ candidates have run for office. Sedef Çakmak of the CHP was elected to Istanbul's city council as the first openly gay elected official, and the HDP supported Turkey's first openly gay parliamentary candidate in 2015. Still, LGBT+ people remain politically marginalized, and the government uses public morality laws to restrict advocacy for LGBT+ rights.

Refugees in Turkey, including an estimated 4 million Syrians, do not have political rights and although some refugees have gained citizenship in recent years, public opinion remains strongly against a path for citizenship.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 3 / 12

Erdoğan controls all executive functions, rules by decree, and makes all meaningful policy decisions. Since 2016, he has used presidential decrees to overhaul Turkey's key ministries and agencies, purging tens of thousands of civil servants in law enforcement and the ministries of justice, education, and foreign affairs, among others, replacing them with political loyalists. With his leadership of the AKP, which dominates the parliament, he has effective control over the legislature, whose capacity to provide policy contributions has greatly eroded under the new system. Erdoğan's close allies dominate Turkey's most important ministries and until November 2020, the finance minister was his son-in-law.

Erdoğan abuses his decree powers to frequently intervene against ministries and independent bodies that defy his wishes. Between 2019 and 2021, Erdoğan abruptly fired and replaced the head of the central bank three times due to policy disagreements; his most recent appointee, in March 2021, is a former AKP lawmaker. Less than seven months later, Erdoğan fired three top bank executives, including two deputy governors, by decree in the middle of the night. The moves prompted a rare and strong backlash from Turkey's top business association, which called on the president to respect the independence of the central bank.

Corruption remains a major problem in Turkey, including at the highest levels of government. Enforcement of anticorruption laws is inconsistent, and anticorruption agencies are ineffective, contributing to a culture of impunity. A handful of holding companies obtain a vast portion of public tenders, including for Erdoğan's mega-projects, and these same companies also control most of Turkey's media networks. Moreover, the government has seized hundreds of businesses and nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) since 2016, appointing trustees to manage billions of dollars in assets.

In May 2021, notorious mafia boss Sedat Peker published a series of videos in which he levied an array of accusations—including murder, rape, corruption, and drug trafficking—against prominent government figures. Peker, who became a part of AKP circles after his 2014 release from prison, spoke of over 20 years' worth of improper governance and illegal behavior among AKP politicians, including Minister of the Interior Süleyman Soyulu.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 0 / 4

Turkey's political and legal environment has made democratic oversight nearly impossible. Although there is an access to information law, in practice the government lacks transparency and arbitrarily withholds information on the activities of state officials and institutions. External monitors like civil society groups and independent journalists are subject to arrest and prosecution if they attempt to expose government wrongdoing. Government officials often refuse to respond to opposition lawmakers' questions, denying the legislative branch one of its few remaining tools to check the executive.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 16 / 60D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 5 / 16*D1. Are there free and independent media? 1 / 4

More than 90 percent of Turkish media networks depend on public tenders and are owned by large businesses with close personal ties to President Erdoğan. Mainstream media reflect government positions and often carry identical headlines as government-run media. Although independent outlets exist, they face tremendous political pressure and are routinely targeted for prosecution.

Media outlets are often censored, fined, or shut down, and journalists are detained regularly. In 2021, journalists were prosecuted for covering protests and corruption allegations against the government, among other topics. According to the Committee to Protect Journalists (CPJ), Turkey was the world's sixth-largest jailer of journalists in 2021, with 18 in prison at the end of the year. Journalists in Turkey also increasingly face violent attacks by mobs or security forces.

The High Council for Broadcasting (RTÜK), Turkey's broadcast regulator whose members are appointed by the AKP-controlled parliament, frequently fines independent networks that critique the government. Throughout 2021, RTÜK issued a total of 71 fines, all of which were against five television channels, while government-friendly media received no penalties. In August, amidst an outbreak of more than 200 forest fires across the country, RTÜK warned broadcasters to ensure coverage of the fires was sympathetic to the government or else face heavy fines. As of 2019, online video producers are also required to obtain licenses from RTÜK to broadcast in Turkey, even if they operate abroad.

The government continued to censor and block access to online media that are critical of the government's policies. In August 2021, authorities blocked the webpages of 141 news reports published by the independent news network Bianet, including stories documenting official government corruption, the trials of journalists, and the rise of gender-based violence in the country.

Following the passage of a restrictive new law in 2020, major social media companies such as Facebook, Twitter, and YouTube were forced to open offices in Turkey that would comply with government content takedown demands. Most companies refused to comply in late 2020, receiving hefty fines and advertising bans. By March 2021, all the major social media companies had yielded and opened offices in Turkey.

In May 2021, the government introduced new restrictions on press passes. A growing number of reports in recent years point to arbitrary press pass denials or cancellations targeting journalists critical of the government or its policies.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 2 / 4

While the constitution guarantees freedom of religion, Turkey's public sphere is dominated by Sunni Islam. Alevi places of worship are not recognized by the government and cannot access state subsidies provided to Sunni mosques. Religious schools that promote Sunni Islamic education have proliferated under the AKP, and the public curriculum mandates compulsory religious education; non-Muslim students are officially exempted from these courses, although they and Alevis have difficulty opting out of them in practice.

Three non-Muslim groups—Jews, Orthodox Christians, and Armenian Catholics—are officially recognized. However, disputes over property and prohibitions on training of clergy remain problems for these communities, and the rights of unrecognized religious minorities are limited. Alevis and non-Muslims continued to be targeted with hate speech and mob attacks in 2021.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 1 / 4

Academic freedom, never well respected in Turkey, has significantly weakened since 2016 as the government has summarily dismissed thousands of academics and educators for their perceived leftist, Gülenist, or PKK sympathies. More than a thousand scholars known as Academics for Peace have been investigated, with hundreds prosecuted, for declaring their support for peace between the government and the PKK. University students, are routinely detained for holding peaceful demonstrations against government policies.

The government and university administrations routinely intervene to prevent academics from researching sensitive topics, encouraging self-censorship among scholars. President Erdoğan obtained the power to appoint rectors at public and private universities in 2018 and has used it to intervene in academic institutions' affairs. In January 2021, the president appointed a political ally as the rector of Turkey's top-ranking Boğaziçi University, prompting a months-long protest movement by students and faculty that police violently dispersed on several occasions. Erdoğan ultimately removed the rector in July, only to replace him the next month with a different political ally.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 1 / 4

While citizens continue to voice their opinions openly in private, more exercise caution about what they say publicly. The government boasts that it monitors more than 45 million social media accounts in the country. The arbitrariness of prosecutions for alleged dissent, which often result in pretrial detention and carry the risk of lengthy prison terms, has created an atmosphere of self-censorship. In 2021, dozens of social media users were detained for sharing opinions on the Boğaziçi University protests or faced prosecution for complaining about the economy. Notably, in December, Turkey's banking watchdog filed a criminal complaint against 26 people—including a former central bank governor and several economists and journalists—for criticizing the central bank's policies on social media amidst a major currency crisis.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 3 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 1 / 4

Authorities routinely ban gatherings organized by government critics, while progovernment rallies are allowed to proceed. The city of Ankara has imposed restrictions on May Day celebrations, LGBT+ pride parades, protests by student and women's rights groups, and even political rallies. Police frequently use force to break up peaceful protests; throughout 2021, security forces used tear gas and other violent tactics to disperse student protesters at Boğaziçi University; demonstrators at the Istanbul pride parade; and women protesting the alarming rate of gender-based violence in the country.

Weekly vigils and commemorations by the Saturday Mothers, a group that protests forced disappearances associated with a 1980 coup d'état, have been routinely broken up by police; many participants, including elderly people, have been arrested. In March 2021, a trial began against 46 demonstrators who attended the 700th Saturday Mothers vigil in August 2018.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 1 / 4

The government frequently targets NGOs focused on human rights. Since 2016, it has shut down more than 1,500 foundations and associations. In December 2021, the government froze the assets of 770 NGOs on the spurious grounds of terrorism financing.

Leaders of NGOs—particularly those focused on human rights—face harassment, arrests, and prosecutions simply for carrying out their activities. A law passed by Parliament in December 2020 subjects NGOs to yearly audits and gives the ministry of the interior the power to appoint trustees to the boards of NGOs facing a criminal investigation. Civil society groups have denounced the law as pretext to take over human rights organizations that criticize the government.

Turkey's highly politicized judiciary has conducted trials against prominent human rights activists to intimidate civil society and stifle human rights advocacy. In 2020, a court convicted four human rights defenders, including former Amnesty International Turkey chair Taner Kılıç, on groundless charges of aiding a terrorist organization. Meanwhile, a group of 16 civil society leaders, including prominent philanthropist Osman Kavala, have been facing spurious charges and prosecution since 2017 for allegedly masterminding the 2013 mass "Gezi" protests and allegedly supporting a 2016 coup attempt. After a year-long show trial, all 16 were acquitted in 2020. However, an appeals court revoked the decision in January 2021. In February, prosecutors merged that case with another case involving Gezi protesters accused of perpetuating violence, expanding the prosecution's scope. The trial began in October. In December, the Council of Europe launched an infringement process against Turkey due to its failure to release Kavala per a 2019 European Court of Human Rights (ECHR) ruling.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 1 / 4

Union activity, including the right to strike, is limited by law and in practice; antiunion activities by employers are common, and legal protections are poorly enforced. A system of threshold requirements makes it difficult for unions to secure collective-bargaining rights. Trade unions and professional organizations have suffered from mass arrests and dismissals associated with the 2016–18 state of emergency and the general breakdown in freedoms of expression, assembly, and association. Union leaders were among those arrested while attempting to hold May Day demonstrations in 2020.

F. RULE OF LAW: 3 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 1 / 4

The post-coup purges of 2016 and structural changes introduced in the constitution in 2018 have severely compromised judicial independence. More than 4,200 judges and prosecutors have been removed since 2016 and replaced with government loyalists. Meanwhile, the new presidential system of 2018 has increased executive control over the judiciary; members of the Board of Judges and Prosecutors (HSK), which oversees judicial appointments and disciplinary measures, are now appointed by the parliament and the president, rather than by members of the judiciary. As a result, prosecutors and judges often toe the government's line; judges who rule against the government's wishes are removed and replaced.

The executive has vast powers over the higher courts, as the president and the ruling party make most appointments. Notably, the Constitutional Court has maintained some independence and overturned select political convictions in recent years. In July 2021, it ordered the release of HDP lawmaker Ömer Faruk Gergerlioğlu, finding that his rights had been violated.

The government's control over the judiciary, meanwhile, results in politically motivated prosecutions targeting members and supporters of opposition parties.

There are severe violations of due process rights in the judicial system. Defendants are often held in lengthy pretrial detention for periods lasting up to seven years. Prosecutors wait months before unveiling their charges and produce lengthy accounts that often lack concrete evidence. In many cases, lawyers defending people accused of terrorism face arrest themselves. More broadly, lower courts often defy rulings by higher courts that they are legally bound to implement.

In 2021, Osman Kavala, Turkey's most prominent political prisoner, continued to have his due process rights denied. Accused of organizing mass protests in 2013, Kavala was held in pretrial detention starting in 2017 for over a year before the prosecutor revealed the charges against him. During his trial, a judge who ordered Kavala's release was replaced without explanation, amidst other procedural anomalies. After a yearlong trial that began in 2019, in 2020 the court exonerated Kavala, ordering his release. However, in January 2021, an appeals court revoked his 2020 acquittal, ostensibly because some evidence had been excluded from court. Authorities then rearrested him in February under newfound charges of allegedly aiding a coup attempt and supporting terrorism. As of the end of 2021, Kavala remained in detention, despite a 2019 order by the ECHR for his immediate release.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 1 / 4

Turkish authorities are regularly accused of using torture on prisoners—particularly targeting Kurds, Gülenists, and leftists—with impunity. In 2020, two Kurdish farmers were allegedly thrown from a military helicopter after being detained by soldiers; one later died of his injuries. Prosecutors do not consistently investigate allegations of torture or abuse in custody, and the government has resisted the publication of a European Committee for the Prevention of Torture report on its detention practices.

The threat of terrorism decreased in 2018 with the weakening of the Islamic State (IS) militant group in neighboring Syria; no large-scale terrorist attacks have occurred since. However, civilians in the Kurdish southeast endured another year of conflict between security forces and the PKK. The conflict has killed more than 5,000 people within Turkey and in northern Iraq since July 2015, most of them soldiers or Kurdish militants.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 1 / 4

Although Turkish law guarantees equal treatment of all citizens, religious, ethnic, and sexual minorities suffer varying degrees of discrimination. Alevis and non-Muslims continue to face systemic discrimination in schools and in public sector employment. The Turkish government's war with the PKK, meanwhile, has long been used to justify discriminatory measures against Kurdish citizens, including the prohibition of Kurdish festivals and the reversal of Kurdish municipal officials' efforts to promote their language and culture. Many Kurdish-language schools and cultural organizations have been shut down since 2015.

Although women make up a growing part of the workforce, gender inequality in the workplace is a pressing issue. Erdoğan's unilateral decision in March 2021 to withdraw Turkey from the Istanbul Convention, the most important international treaty regarding gender-based violence, removed legal protections for women from assault and harassment, including sexual harassment in the workplace.

Same-sex relations are not legally prohibited, but LGBT+ people face widespread discrimination, police harassment, and violence. Laws do not protect people from discrimination based on their sexual orientation or gender identity, and LGBT+ people are banned from openly serving in the military.

In recent years, public officials have increasingly used homophobic language and hate speech targeting the LGBT+ community. In 2020, the head of Turkey's Religious Affairs Directorate delivered a sermon with anti-LGBT+ hate speech, while the head of Turkey's Red Crescent Society published posts on Twitter with discriminatory language toward LGBT+ people—both actions were publicly defended by President Erdoğan and his communications director. In September 2021, a public prosecutor reportedly launched a lawsuit against top members of the Ankara Bar Association who had critiqued the head of the Religious Affairs Directorate for his 2020 sermon. In February 2021, Minister of the Interior Süleyman Soyulu called student activists at Boğaziçi University "LGBT deviants" on Twitter, prompting the social media platform to issue a warning that the post violated its rules on hateful conduct. Government officials and progovernment media used similarly anti-LGBT+ language to justify Turkey's withdrawal from the Istanbul Convention in March 2021. The Turkish government also censors media that depict LGBT+ characters: In 2020, it forced Netflix to cancel a drama over a gay character in the series.

Turkey hosts some 4 million refugees, most from Syria. While the government has worked to provide them with basic services, many refugee children lack access to education, and few adults find formal employment. Popular resentment against refugees has been rising for years and is felt across the political spectrum.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 5 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 1 / 4

An upsurge in fighting between the government and the PKK since 2015 resulted in the displacement of hundreds of thousands of people in southeastern Turkey, and freedom of movement remains limited in the region as low-level clashes continue.

More than 125,000 public sector workers were fired or suspended in the purges that followed the 2016 coup attempt and have no effective avenue for appeal. Many victims are unable to find employment in the private sector due to an atmosphere of guilt by association and cannot travel abroad as their passports have been cancelled.

Refugees in Turkey continue to face legal and practical obstacles to free movement within the country.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 1 / 4

Private property rights are legally enshrined, but since 2013 many critics of the government have been subjected to intrusive tax and regulatory inspections. In the aftermath of the 2016 coup attempt, the assets of companies, NGOs, foundations, individuals, media outlets, and other entities deemed to be associated with terrorist groups have been confiscated.

According to a survey published in 2018, at least $11 billion in private business assets, ranging from corner stores to large conglomerates, had been seized.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 2 / 4

Child marriages, often performed at unofficial religious ceremonies, are widespread, and Syrian refugees appear to be particularly vulnerable. The Directorate of Religious Affairs briefly endorsed the practice in 2018, suggesting that girls as young as nine years old could marry, before retracting the statement after public outcry.

Turkey has one of the highest rates of domestic violence in the world. Although there are some legal safeguards, activists complain that they are not properly enforced. In March 2021, Erdogan withdrew Turkey from the Istanbul Convention, further removing much-needed legal protections against violence against women from Turkish law. Key problems include police reluctance to intervene in domestic disputes and a limited number of shelter spaces, which are often geographically inaccessible. The AKP has considered weakening domestic violence protections as part of a larger effort to dissuade women from seeking divorce; a parliamentary report published in 2016 recommended that women should be required to prove their partner's violence in order to receive extended police protection. The recommendation was retracted after public pressure.

Gender-based violence and femicides reached alarming levels in 2021, which women's rights activists largely blame on a culture of impunity for perpetrators enabled by the government and judiciary.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 1 / 4

The weakness of labor unions and the government's increasing willingness to act against organized labor have undermined equality of opportunity, protection from economic exploitation, and workplace safety. Workplace accidents have become more frequent in recent years, and laborers have little recourse if injured. According to the Workers' Health and Work Safety Assembly (İSİGM), 2,170 workers died in work-related incidents in 2021. The large refugee population is especially vulnerable to exploitative employment conditions.

Turkmenistan

Population: 6,100,000

Capital: Ashgabat

Freedom Status: Not Free

Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: Turkmenistan is a repressive authoritarian state where political rights and civil liberties are almost completely denied in practice. Elections are tightly controlled, ensuring nearly unanimous victories for the president and his supporters. The economy is dominated by the state, corruption is systemic, religious groups are persecuted, and political dissent is not tolerated.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- The first elections to the new 56-member Khalk Maslahaty, the upper chamber of parliament established by constitutional amendments passed in September 2020, were held in March. The indirectly elected body is composed of 48 members elected by local councils in the country's five provinces and the city of Ashgabat in addition to 8 presidential appointees.

- The government continued to deny the presence of COVID-19 in Turkmenistan throughout the year. This denial directly contradicted independent evidence of increased respiratory ailments and deaths in the country, as well as the government's introduction of measures such as mandatory mask wearing, school closures, and restrictions on public events.
- President Gurbanguly Berdimuhamedov promoted his son, Serdar Berdimuhamedov, to a variety of top government positions during the year, including that of deputy prime minister for economic and financial issues in July. Analysts have suggested that the promotions are intended to prepare the younger Berdimuhamedov to succeed his father as president.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 0 / 40A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 0 / 12*A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

The president is directly elected for an unlimited number of seven-year terms, extended from five years under a 2016 constitutional revision. Gurbanguly Berdimuhamedov, the incumbent, was reelected for a third term in 2017 with 97.69 percent of the vote amid turnout of over 97 percent, according to official results. His eight token opponents were either nominees of state-backed parties or members of the ruling Democratic Party of Turkmenistan (DPT) who ran as independents. The Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE) criticized the election process for failing to present voters with a genuine choice and noted that it took place in a strictly controlled political and media environment.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

The bicameral parliament, the National Council of Turkmenistan (Milli Geňes), includes a lower chamber, the Mejlis, as well as an upper chamber, the 56-seat Khalk Maslahaty. In September 2020, the parliament and president approved amendments to the constitution abolishing the previous Khalk Maslahaty, a 2,500-seat body that included Mejlis members as well as a variety of unelected officials and community leaders.

The Mejlis is composed of 125 members directly elected from individual districts to serve five-year terms. Elections to the Mejlis are tightly controlled by the state and feature no genuine competition from opposition candidates.

In the March 2018 elections, the DPT won 55 seats, the Party of Industrialists and Entrepreneurs and the Agrarian Party each took 11, and candidates nominated by groups of citizens secured 48. Voter turnout was reported to be approximately 92 percent. The OSCE found that the elections "lacked important prerequisites of a genuinely democratic electoral process." Observers said that while there was a semblance of pluralism, all parties and candidates supported the president, and the absence of media diversity interfered with citizens' ability to make a free and educated choice.

The first elections to the new Khalk Maslahaty were held in March 2021. Local councils in the country's five provinces and the city of Ashgabat elected 8 members each, filling 48 seats in the chamber; the remaining 8 seats were filled by presidential appointees. The constitutional amendments creating the new chamber also designate its chairman as interim successor in the event that the president was to become incapacitated.

Analysts have speculated that the constitutional amendments are related to plans for the president's son, Serdar Berdimuhamedov, to succeed him as president. Throughout the year, the president promoted his son to a variety of top government positions, including that of deputy prime minister for economic and financial issues in July.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 0 / 4

The legal framework for elections is neither fair nor impartially implemented. The Central Election Commission (CEC) is appointed by the president and operates with little transparency. The law allows virtually no opportunity for independent fundraising or campaigning. In the 2017 presidential and 2018 parliamentary elections, the CEC organized and funded all campaign activities, according to international monitors.

The constitution and electoral code were amended in 2016 to remove the upper age limit of 70 for presidential candidates, extend the presidential term from five to seven years, and eliminate the right of public associations to nominate presidential candidates.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 0 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 0 / 4

The party system is dominated by the ruling DPT and controlled by the executive branch. The 2012 law on political parties specified the legal basis for citizens to form independent parties, but barred parties formed on professional, regional, or religious lines, and those created by government officials. Nevertheless, Berdimuhamedov subsequently announced plans to form two new groups—the Party of Industrialists and Entrepreneurs and the Agrarian Party. Both were then openly organized by sitting members of the DPT and formally registered in 2012 and 2014, respectively. The Agrarian Party won its first parliamentary seats in 2018.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 0 / 4

Turkmenistan has never experienced a peaceful transfer of power between rival parties through elections. Berdimuhamedov had served in the government of his late predecessor, Saparmurat Niyazov, who in turn had ruled the country since before its independence from the Soviet Union. The Soviet-era Communist Party became the DPT in 1991 and remains in power to date. All genuine opposition groups operate either illegally or in exile.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 0 / 4

The authoritarian political system offers voters no meaningful alternatives to the ruling party. At an informal level, politics within the regime are thought to be influenced by regional patronage networks, or “clans,” that control different parts of the state and economy.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 0 / 4

Members of the ethnic Turkmen majority and the president's tribal subdivision in particular are favored for leadership positions. While women and members of ethnic or religious minority groups formally have full political rights, no segment of the country's population enjoys the practical ability to engage in independent political activity. About a quarter of candidates elected to the Mejlis in 2018 were women.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 0 / 12C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 0 / 4

The president, who is not freely elected, has ultimate decision-making authority. The executive branch determines laws and policies with no meaningful input or oversight from the rubber-stamp legislature, which mainly serves to endorse the president's decrees and policies.

There are no independent institutions tasked with combating corruption, which is widespread in Turkmenistan. Anticorruption bodies have allegedly been used to extort revenue from wealthy officials and businesspeople. Crackdowns on corruption are typically selective and related to conflicts within the ruling elite.

Genuine checks on nepotism and conflicts of interest are lacking. In May 2021, an investigative report released by the Organized Crime and Corruption Reporting Project (OCCRP) revealed that a company owned by Khadzhimurat Redjepov, the president's nephew, had been awarded a $27.5 million government contract to import subsidized food products as part of a policy to alleviate food shortages in the country. The report alleges that Redjepov used part of the funds to build a luxury home in Ashgabat for his family.

Decisions on monetary policy, large-scale contracts with foreign companies, and the allocation of state profits from hydrocarbon exports are largely opaque and ultimately controlled by the president, without effective legal limits or independent oversight. Government officials and state-owned companies are not required to disclose their basic financial information to the public.

Throughout 2020 and 2021, the government repeatedly denied the presence of the COVID-19 virus in Turkmenistan, and failed to publish any data regarding the number of cases and deaths in the country. This denial directly contradicts independent evidence of increased respiratory ailments and deaths, as well as the government's introduction of measures such as mandatory mask wearing, school closures, and restrictions on public events. Following a World Health Organization (WHO) mission to the country in July 2021, a senior officer in the organization stated that "it's unlikely that the virus is not circulating in Turkmenistan." Throughout the year, unofficial reports claimed that the rate of COVID-19-related infections and deaths in Ashgabat had risen, overwhelming the city's hospitals, and that a number of government officials had contracted and died from the illness. Further signs of the true status of COVID-19 in Turkmenistan emerged in June, when the World Bank approved a $20 million loan to Turkmenistan's government to combat the virus, and in August, when the president dismissed several Health Ministry officials for "serious shortcomings" in their work.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 2 / 60D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 0 / 16*D1. Are there free and independent media? 0 / 4

Press freedom is severely restricted. The state controls nearly all broadcast and print media, and the state-run internet service provider blocks websites that carry independent news coverage or opposition-oriented content. Some citizens are able to access foreign satellite broadcasts, but the government continues efforts to remove receivers from houses in the countryside.

Independent journalists, particularly those affiliated with Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty (RFE/RL), are subject to harassment, detention, physical abuse, and prosecution on trumped-up charges. The families of independent journalists working abroad are also sometimes subjected to harassment and threats; between March and May 2021, several family members of exiled journalists Rozybai Jumamuradov and Devlet Bayhan were questioned by security officers and threatened with incarceration.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 0 / 4

Legal restrictions, state monitoring and harassment, and the risk of penalties including fines and imprisonment have virtually extinguished the ability of individuals to freely practice religion. A 2016 law on religion maintained existing bans on religious activity outside state control, imposed a higher membership threshold for the registration of religious groups, and required all registered groups to reapply for registration. Senior Muslim clerics are appointed by the government, and Muslims who do not follow the officially approved interpretation of Islam are subject to persecution, including lengthy prison terms.

Members of unregistered religious minority groups continue to face raids, beatings, and other forms of harassment. Turkmenistanis who conscientiously object to compulsory military service for religious reasons risk imprisonment. Between January and March 2021, 16 conscientious objectors were jailed for refusing military service.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 0 / 4

The government places significant restrictions on academic freedom, limiting research on politically sensitive topics and imposing onerous obstacles to the recognition of degrees from foreign institutions. Curricula in schools and universities are controlled by the government.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 0 / 4

Private discussion and the expression of personal views are highly restricted due to intrusive supervision by state security services, including physical surveillance, monitoring of telephone and electronic communications, and the use of informers.

In recent years, the government has employed increasingly sophisticated methods to monitor the population. Authorities have reportedly used special software to eavesdrop on voice over internet protocol (VoIP) calls, operate computer cameras remotely, and record keystrokes. Social media users who post critical comments about the government are subject to intimidation and imprisonment, and restrictions on social media sites, cloud storage services, and VPNs have intensified. In August 2021, RFE/RL reported that the authorities have allegedly forced some Turkmenistani internet users to swear on the Quran that they will not use VPNs. The government also reportedly monitors the online contacts and posts of its citizens abroad.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 0 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 0 / 4

The constitution guarantees freedom of assembly, and the 2015 Law on Assemblies defines the right of individuals and groups to hold peaceful gatherings with prior authorization.

However, the law grants officials broad discretion to block assemblies, and the authorities do not allow organized antigovernment demonstrations.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 0 / 4

Onerous registration and regulatory requirements effectively prevent most independent NGOs from operating legally or receiving foreign funding, and activities by unregistered groups can draw fines, detention, and other penalties. Individual activists face intimidation and harassment, as do the family members of human rights activists working in exile.

In March 2021, two activists were arrested and detained for distributing antigovernment leaflets in Ashgabat, though criticizing the government is not officially a crime in Turkmenistan. Turkmenistani activists abroad also face pressure from the government. According to reports from RFE/RL and Memorial, a Russian human rights NGO, in September, a number of Turkmenistani activists living in Turkey were detained by Turkish police and threatened with deportation for their public criticism of the Turkmenistani government.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 0 / 4

Workers have a legal right to join trade unions, but there are no protections against anti-union discrimination, and strikes are prohibited. The government-controlled Association of Trade Unions of Turkmenistan is the only union organization permitted to operate.

F. RULE OF LAW: 0 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 0 / 4

The judicial system is subservient to the president, who appoints and dismisses judges unilaterally. In practice, the courts are commonly used to punish dissent and remove potential threats to the president's political dominance.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 0 / 4

Arbitrary arrests and detentions are common, particularly for dissidents, members of unapproved religious groups, activists, and journalists who work with foreign organizations. The authorities frequently deny defendants' basic rights of due process, including public trials and access to defense attorneys.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 0 / 4

Prison conditions are extremely harsh, and security forces routinely use torture to extract confessions or punish inmates, which can result in deaths in custody. Turkmenistanis are also subject to enforced disappearances; in 2019, the Prove They Are Alive! human rights campaign identified 121 people who remained missing after they had been forcibly disappeared. Physical abuse and hazing in the military has reportedly led to several deaths among conscripts in recent years.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 0 / 4

Employment and educational opportunities for members of non-Turkmen ethnic minorities are limited by the government's promotion of Turkmen national identity, and activists who advocate for minority rights have faced persecution. Traditional social and religious norms help to restrict women's access to education and economic opportunity; there are no legal protections against sexual harassment in the workplace.

The law does not protect LGBT+ people from discrimination, and sexual activity between men can be punished with up to two years in prison. In September 2021, a Turkmenistani human rights NGO reported that 30 men accused of “sodomy” were being held in a detention center in Turkmenabad; they remained in custody as of the end of October.

Homeless people are routinely forcibly removed or detained by police, often ahead of state celebrations. In September, police rounded up 176 homeless people in Turkmenabad and detained them in a psychiatric facility.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 2 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 0 / 4

Freedom of movement is restricted, with frequent reports of individuals being barred from traveling abroad; officials are reportedly instructed to prevent citizens under the age of 40 from leaving the country. The government is known to prohibit the families of dissidents and prisoners from leaving. Internal passports and a residency permit system also obstruct travel within the country. Despite these restrictions, unpublished government statistics suggest that nearly two million people emigrated during a 2008–18 reporting period, with many of them seeking to escape the dire economic situation.

Additional restrictions on the freedom of movement imposed during the COVID-19 pandemic were removed in April 2021, but reimposed in some regions in July.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 1 / 4

The constitution establishes the right to property ownership, but the deeply flawed judiciary provides little protection to businesses and individuals, and the president’s relatives monopolize key sectors of the economy that are not directly state controlled. Arbitrary evictions and confiscation of property are common.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 1 / 4

Domestic violence is reportedly common, but few victims file complaints with the authorities, and the government has not made significant efforts to monitor, prevent, or combat the problem. Reporting and prosecution of rape are similarly limited. While polygamy has long been illegal, it apparently persists in practice; a 2018 law was meant to reinforce the ban.

The government forces thousands of students, public employees, and other citizens to participate in the annual cotton harvest with little or no pay. Impoverished residents of rural areas are especially vulnerable to trafficking abroad for forced labor or sexual exploitation, and the government does little to address the problem. In March 2021, police in Mary Province were reported to be arbitrarily detaining citizens with a “disheveled appearance,” accusing them of being homeless, and sending them to work on state farms. Turkmenistani men between the ages of 18 and 25 are required to serve in the military for two years; in June, dozens of graduating students were reportedly removed from schools immediately following their final exams and forcibly conscripted into the army.

The state’s mismanagement of a weak economy, including soaring inflation, has inhibited opportunity and imposed hardship on the population. Persistently low oil and gas prices have driven down vital export revenues in recent years, leading to reports of unpaid wages and shortages of basic goods. To raise funds, the government has at times increased various fees, cut subsidies, and pressured officials, businesspeople, and ordinary workers to make “voluntary” contributions. In June, authorities in the Lebap region reportedly banned citizens that owed debts on natural gas from buying subsidized food products.

Tuvalu

Population: 10,000

Capital: Funafuti

Freedom Status: Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Tuvalu is a parliamentary democracy that holds regular, competitive elections. Civil liberties are generally upheld. Ongoing problems include a lack of antidiscrimination laws to protect women and LGBT+ people, and there are concerns about child labor in some industries.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- The government continued to manage the COVID-19 pandemic during the year by instituting tight border controls that restrict entry into the country. Throughout the year, commercial flights in and out of the country were limited.
- In May, the parliament established a committee to hold public consultations on a review of the constitution. Themes discussed with stakeholders throughout several consultations included removing the British monarch as head of state and to adopt a system in which the prime minister is directly elected. The process was ongoing at the end of the year.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 37 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 12 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

A governor general represents the British monarch as ceremonial head of state. The prime minister, chosen by Parliament, leads the government, thus the legitimacy of the presidential election depends in part on the conduct of parliamentary elections. Independent candidate Kausea Natano became prime minister after the 2019 elections, which were considered free and fair. He defeated another independent, Enele Sopoaga, in a secret ballot, receiving 10 of the 16 ministers’ votes.

In May 2021, the parliament established a committee to hold public consultations on a review of the constitution. Themes discussed with stakeholders throughout several consultations included removing the British monarch as head of state and to adopt a system in which the prime minister is directly elected. The process was ongoing at the end of the year.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The unicameral House of Assembly has 16 members who are directly elected through contests in eight geographical constituencies, each of which are represented by two members. The attorney general has an advisory role and does not vote. In the September 2019 elections, all candidates ran as independents. Two women ran for seats in Parliament, though only the incumbent Puakena Boreham was elected. Each of the main inhabited islands in Tuvalu is also governed by an elected local council. The 2019 elections were deemed free and fair.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 4 / 4

Tuvalu's legal framework provides for democratic elections, and the laws are fairly and impartially implemented. An appointed secretary to the government is responsible for the supervision of elections and maintenance of voter rolls. Local polling officers are authorized to adjudicate election-related disputes in their districts, and there is a mechanism through which appeals may be filed. The September 2019 elections were accepted by all relevant stakeholders and constituencies.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 15 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 4 / 4

There are no formal political parties, though no law bars their formation. Candidates typically run as independents and form loose, frequently shifting alliances once in office.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 4 / 4

Tuvalu has an established pattern of democratic transfers of power. Individual prime ministers and governments have seldom lasted a full term in office in recent decades, with intense political rivalries sometimes prompting no-confidence votes in Parliament.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 4 / 4

Traditional elders and the main Protestant church play an influential role in society, but they do not exercise undue control over the political choices of voters and candidates.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 3 / 4

All Tuvaluans aged 18 and over who are present in the country on polling day but not imprisoned are eligible to vote. Politics are generally dominated by older, well-educated men. While women formally have full political rights, in practice their participation is somewhat inhibited by discriminatory and widespread biases. Two women ran in the 2019 parliamentary elections, and one of them (an incumbent) won a seat. A move to add two reserved seats for women was considered as part of a constitutional review process in 2018 but has not since been acted upon.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 10 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 4 / 4

Tuvalu's elected officials develop and implement government policies and legislation without improper interference from any unelected entity. The country often receives funding from other countries and international entities to implement policies and programs. The Asian Development Bank (ADB), the World Bank, and partner countries provide the country with grants, but there have been no reported concerns of undue influence on government.

In 2019, the Tuvalu government reaffirmed its commitment to its relationship with Taiwan, which precludes any diplomatic ties with China, and thus any influence China might have on Tuvalu's government. China's influence has grown in the Pacific, which has raised concerns of undue influence on the independence of policymaking in several other countries in the region.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 3 / 4

Corruption is not a severe problem in Tuvalu, and the country's independent auditing and law enforcement bodies are generally effective in combating graft, though there have been some corruption scandals in recent years.

Tuvalu has received assistance from international donors to strengthen anticorruption laws.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 3 / 4

Government operations and legislative processes are generally transparent, though there is no freedom of information law to guarantee and regulate public access to official records. While officials are legally obliged to disclose their assets and income, the rules are not consistently enforced, according to the US State Department.

In 2019, the Tuvalu Parliament livestreamed government proceedings on social media for the first time. Information about changes in policy or circumstance in Tuvalu can take days to reach the body of the population, as well as the rest of the world; livestreaming parliamentary sessions sought to ameliorate these challenges.

In December 2020, the government announced plans to become a "paperless society," by using blockchain technology to create a national digital ledger in which all public data would be stored.

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 16 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 4 / 4

The constitution provides for freedom of the press, and there are no reported restrictions on this right, though the small media market does not support independent domestic news outlets. The government operates a radio station and a national newspaper. Many residents use satellite dishes to access foreign programming. Internet coverage has grown somewhat in recent years, though access is largely limited to the main island, and is expensive, inconsistent, and limited everywhere else.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 4 / 4

The constitution and laws provide for freedom of religion, and this right is generally respected in practice. A Protestant church, the Congregational Christian Church of Tuvalu, has official status under the law, and about 97 percent of the population belongs to it. Cultural leaders are empowered to regulate local religious activities, and on smaller islands they sometimes discourage minority groups from proselytizing or holding public events.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

Academic freedom is generally respected.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 4 / 4

There are no significant restrictions on freedom of expression. The government does not improperly monitor personal communications or social media activity.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 12 / 12E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

The constitution provides for freedom of assembly, and the government typically upholds this right in practice.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 4 / 4

Freedom of association is respected. Nongovernmental organizations operate without interference, providing a variety of health, education, and other services.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 4 / 4

Workers in the private sector have the right to organize unions, bargain collectively, and strike. Public-sector employees can join professional associations and engage in collective bargaining, but they are not permitted to strike. Most labor disputes are resolved through negotiations in practice. The only registered union represents seafarers.

F. RULE OF LAW: 15 / 16F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 4 / 4

The judiciary is independent. The chief justice is appointed by the head of state on the advice of the cabinet, and other judges are appointed in the same manner after consultation with the chief justice. Judges cannot be removed arbitrarily.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 4 / 4

The authorities generally uphold due process during arrests, detentions, and trials. A public defense lawyer is available to detainees and defendants. However, the limited capacity of the legal system can lead to delays in court proceedings and access to counsel.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 4 / 4

There were no reports of physical abuse by police or in the prison system during the year. Criminal activity does not pose a major threat to physical security.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 3 / 4

While women generally enjoy equality before the law, discriminatory biases and social norms limit women's role in society, and there are no specific legal protections against gender discrimination in employment.

Same-sex sexual activity is illegal and can be punished with imprisonment, though the law is not actively enforced. Discrimination based on sexual orientation or gender identity is not specifically banned.

There is no national legal framework for providing refuge to asylum seekers, nor were there any such applications reported in 2021.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 13 / 16G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

Tuvaluans are free to travel within the country and abroad, and to relocate for purposes including employment and education. The country's borders were closed to international travel in 2020 due to the COVID-19 pandemic. Commercial flights in and out of the country remained limited in 2021.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 3 / 4

Tuvalu's legal framework and government policies are generally supportive of property rights and private-business activity. However, laws and practices surrounding land ownership and inheritance favor men over women.

In June and July 2019, a dispute over a leasing agreement for the island's airport escalated between landowners on the island Funafuti and the government. The landowners believed that the lease had expired after 25 years—in 2017—while the government claimed the original lease for the airport was set for 99 years. After landowners blockaded the runway, and the two parties began negotiations, a case for the incident and dispute was filed in the High Court, which determined that the landowners had violated their lease agreement. Police were ordered to arrest anyone who interfered with flights, as the blockade was deemed to pose a “significant sovereign risk.”

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 3 / 4

Although personal social freedoms are generally respected, domestic violence often goes unreported because it is viewed as a private matter. There are no specific laws against spousal rape.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 3 / 4

Forced labor is prohibited, and the government mandates basic protections against exploitative or dangerous working conditions, though enforcement is not proactive or consistent. Most of the labor force works in the informal sector or in small-scale fishing and agriculture. No law addresses forms of harmful or hazardous child labor, and the US State Department's 2019 Findings on the Worst Forms of Child Labor, the most recent available, stated that there was evidence of child labor in the fishing industry and among domestic workers.

In 2018, Tuvalu created its first national human rights institution (NHRI) and will give the country's ombudsman additional powers to promote and protect human rights on the island. The new NHRI was created to be aligned with the Paris Principles for independent and effective human rights institutions.

Uganda

Population: 47,100,000

Capital: Kampala

Freedom Status: Not Free

Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: While Uganda holds regular elections, their credibility has deteriorated over time, and the country has been ruled by the same party and president since 1986. The ruling party, the National Resistance Movement (NRM), retains power through the manipulation of state resources, intimidation by security forces, and politicized prosecutions of opposition leaders. Uganda's civil society and independent media sectors suffer from legal and extralegal harassment and state violence.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- President Yoweri Museveni won reelection in January with 58.6 percent of the vote while Robert Kyagulanyi Ssentamu—better known as Bobi Wine—won 34.8 percent. The preelectoral and postelectoral periods were marked by repression, with authorities abducting opposition supporters, disrupting internet access, interfering with journalists, and preventing observers from monitoring the contest.
- The NRM won a clear parliamentary majority in the concurrent legislative contests, which were similarly marred by government repression. The opposition National Unity Platform (NUP) and Forum for Democratic Change (FDC) were the only other parties to win more than 10 seats.
- In April, the government announced that it would replace a 200 shilling ($0.05) social media tax, which was criticized as an attack on freedom of expression upon its 2018 introduction, with a 12 percent tax on internet data.
- In August, the government ordered the closure of 54 nongovernmental organizations (NGOs), accusing of them of failing to comply with legal requirements. Groups affected included the Citizens' Coalition for Electoral Democracy in Uganda (CCEDU) and human rights NGO Chapter Four.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 11 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 3 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 1 / 4

The president is directly elected to serve five-year terms. Incumbent Yoweri Museveni won the January 2021 election with 58.6 percent of the vote, while NUP candidate Bobi Wine won 34.8 percent. Turnout stood at 57 percent.

The campaign period, which began in late 2020, was marred by repression and violence, though polling day itself was calm besides a military presence in Kampala. Wine, who had been arrested several times in 2020, was placed under house arrest after casting his ballot, though the High Court of Kampala ordered his release later in January 2021. Authorities selectively used COVID-19 restrictions to disperse opposition rallies and arrest journalists, while NRM events were allowed to proceed. Ugandans lost internet access as the electoral period ended, with the Uganda Communications Commission (UCC) ordering a five-day blackout the day before polling. Internet access was largely restored by February 2021.

Few observers monitored the vote. The United States cancelled its own effort, while the European Union's offer to send experts was declined. Ugandan NGOs, meanwhile, reported that almost none of its accreditation requests were granted. The CCEDU warned the results were not fully credible due to preelectoral violence and COVID-19-related restrictions. While Wine accused the government of stuffing ballot boxes, the CCEDU did not report such incidents. Wine filed a legal challenge in early February, calling for the results to be rejected, but withdrew his case later that month.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 1 / 4

The 2021 elections for members of the unicameral Parliament were held concurrently with the presidential vote. A total of 499 representatives were directly elected, including parliamentarians for 353 single-member constituencies and 146 holders of seats reserved for women. Another 30 were chosen to represent special interest groups (youth, the elderly, workers, the military, and persons with disabilities). Ex officio members hold 27 seats.

The ruling NRM won 336 directly elected seats in January 2021, while the NUP won 57 and the FDC won 32. No other party won more than 10 seats. As with the concurrent presidential election, parliamentary contests were affected by violence, selectively enforced COVID-19 restrictions, internet shutdowns, and restrictions on journalists.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 1 / 4

Independent observers, civil society, and opposition leaders have long called for substantive electoral-law reforms. Following the flawed 2016 elections, the Supreme Court called on the attorney general to implement electoral reforms, though no meaningful changes were advanced by a 2018 deadline. In early 2020, Parliament passed five overdue electoral reform bills, four of which received assent that July.

Opposition politicians criticized the management of the January 2021 elections. The NUP noted the Electoral Commission's (EC) admission that it did not add results from over 1,200 polling sites, many of them in Kampala, to its count. The NUP also accused authorities of confiscating a computer containing voting data after polling day, which it claims would have shown evidence of fraud. Residents of the northern village of Apaa, the site of a long-running land-rights dispute, were unable to vote after the EC excluded them from the voter roll.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 5 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 1 / 4

The formation of political parties is protected by law, and multiple parties exist and compete in practice. However, the activities of opposition groups are hindered by restrictive party registration requirements and candidate eligibility rules, a lack of access to state media coverage, and violence or harassment by state authorities and paramilitary groups.

In June 2020, the government prohibited all political gatherings, ostensibly to curtail the spread of COVID-19, but disproportionately enforced the ban on the opposition. Candidates were forced to campaign using media that are heavily influenced by the NRM, like radio and television. While opposition rallies were dispersed, the NRM held events without interference. Following the November 2020 arrest of Wine at a rally, security forces violently dispersed protests organized by Wine's party, killing 54 people.

The government maintained pressure on the opposition after polling day in January 2021. Several days after the polls, the NUP reported that military personnel raided its headquarters. In early February, Wine claimed that over 3,000 NUP members had been abducted by the authorities, though the government claimed that only 31 members had been arrested. Academic Stella Nyanzi, a 2021 FDC parliamentary candidate, claimed that her partner, an NUP member, was abducted and tortured days ahead of the vote. Nyanzi and her children fled for Kenya in February.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 1 / 4

The NRM dominates all levels of government. There are several dozen opposition lawmakers, as well as numerous independents, though some of the latter support the NRM.

Election campaigns are characterized by violence, intimidation, and harassment toward opposition parties.

Leaders of opposition parties and political movements are sometimes arrested on trumped-up criminal charges. Wine was arrested several times during the 2020–21 campaign period and was placed under house arrest on polling day. Wine had previously been charged with treason over a 2018 incident; police alleged that Wine and his supporters obstructed Museveni's motorcade and threw stones at the vehicles. In September 2021, two NUP parliamentarians accused of murder earlier in the year were arrested on treason charges. In December 2021, Wine reported that authorities surrounded his home as he prepared to travel to Kayunga District ahead of a local by-election.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 1 / 4

The military, which is closely aligned with Museveni and the NRM, holds 10 seats in Parliament. The government and ruling party reportedly use public resources and patronage networks to build political support among religious leaders and other influential figures.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 2 / 4

Although Uganda has many diverse ethnic groups, they lack equal representation and opportunities. Groups like Alur, Ik, Bagungu, Bakonzo, Kakwa, Batwa, and Karamojong are disproportionately affected by violent conflicts, have less access to education, and receive inadequate health care. The NRM's dominant position and coercive tactics impede free political participation and advocacy of interests by various ethnic groups, including those affiliated with subnational kingdoms and smaller Indigenous groups.

An assessment of women's participation in the 2016 elections by the Women's Democracy Group, a coalition of Ugandan NGOs, noted a widespread perception that "[women] should not contest for direct positions... to reduce on the competition for male contestants" because some seats are reserved for women. Women hold 33.8 percent of Parliament's seats as of September 2021.

Due to severe legal and societal discrimination, the interests of LGBT+ people are not represented in politics.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 3 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 1 / 4

Power is concentrated in the hands of the NRM leadership, the security forces, and especially Museveni, who retains office through deeply flawed electoral processes. Lawmakers have little practical ability to influence legislation in which the government has a particular interest, though there is more consultation on ordinary policy matters. The executive has secured passage of key legislation through inducement, harassment, and intimidation of the legislative branch.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 1 / 4

Corruption is a serious problem. There are laws and institutions designed to combat official malfeasance, including the Anti-Corruption Act of 2009 and the Inspectorate of Government, and instances of alleged graft have led to investigations and intense media attention. However, the system has not been effective at addressing corruption in a sustained manner, and top government officials are rarely prosecuted in practice.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 1 / 4

Many government departments deny requests for information under the Access to Information Act (AIA). Other laws related to national security and confidentiality also impede open access to information in practice. The AIA is not uniformly applied. Government agencies seem to release information that only favors the regime. For example, in September 2020, the EC made public the academic documents of Bobi Wine while refusing to release those of President Museveni, despite numerous petitions.

Public procurement decisions are generally opaque.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 23 / 60D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 8 / 16*D1. Are there free and independent media? 1 / 4

The media sector features many independent outlets. Ugandans rely heavily on local radio stations. Journalists and authors face arrest, harassment, intimidation, and assault in reprisal for their work. Authorities routinely raid and shut down radio stations and other outlets and remove accreditation from journalists in retribution for their reporting.

During the 2020–21 electoral period, journalists covering Wine's campaign events were harassed, assaulted, and detained on various charges. At least four journalists were harassed and detained between January 12 and January 20, 2021. One journalist, New Vision reporter Emmanuel Ojok, was physically attacked and detained by soldiers when he filmed their confrontation with an opposition candidate. In February, security forces assaulted at least 10 journalists covering Wine's delivery of a petition to the Office of the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights (UNHCR) in Kampala.

Outlets were also targeted during the electoral period. In November 2020, military and police personnel forced Wine to leave the studio of Spice FM in Hoima District; by then, Wine had been prevented from speaking on 13 radio stations. That December, Jinja radio station Busoga One was threatened with closure for hosting Wine. Busoga One was closed on polling day in January 2021, with police claiming it was inciting violence; it resumed broadcasting later that month. Jinja-based Baba FM was shut down several days after the polls, with the authorities making similar accusations.

In December 2021, author Kakwenza Rukirabashaija was detained by authorities after making satirical comments about President Museveni and Lieutenant General Muhoozi Kainerugaba, his son, on social media. Rukirabashaija remained in custody at year's end.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 3 / 4

There is no state religion, and freedom of worship is both constitutionally protected and generally respected in practice. However, the government has restricted religious groups whose members allegedly pose security risks. It has also sought to control political statements by religious leaders, tolerating those who express support for Museveni and the NRM while subjecting those with more critical views to intimidation, harassment, and arrest.

A number of Muslim clerics have been murdered in recent years, and the investigations into the crimes have not yet led to any convictions.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 2 / 4

Academic freedom has been undermined by alleged surveillance of university lectures by security officials, and by the need for professors to obtain permission to hold public meetings at universities. In 2018, 45 staff members at Makerere University in Kampala were dismissed for indiscipline, but critics argued that the dismissals were meant to silence government critics. In September 2021, Victoria University vice chancellor Lawrence Muganga was detained over espionage suspicions. Muganga, a member of the Banyarwanda ethnic group, previously campaigned to rename the community in Uganda to lessen government discrimination. Muganga was released a day later.

Authorities often respond harshly to campus protests by student groups.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 2 / 4

Private speech is relatively unrestrained, and Ugandans openly criticize the government on social media. However, individuals risk criminal penalties for such speech, and the government reportedly monitors social media platforms. Media reports in December 2021 indicated that Ugandan intelligence officials used the Pegasus spyware suite against journalists, at least one opposition figure, and US government employees working in Uganda or on matters there.

In 2018, the government implemented a controversial social media tax, requiring users on platforms like Facebook, Twitter, and WhatsApp to pay a prohibitively expensive 200 shilling ($0.05) daily fee. The tax was repealed in April 2021, with that decision taking full effect in July. However, Parliament also voted to introduce a 12 percent internet data tax in April.

In late 2020, the UCC announced that online content creators must register and pay a $27 fee. Critics claim the regulations curtail freedom of speech for Ugandans who criticize the government online.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 4 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 1 / 4

In March 2020, the Constitutional Court annulled the Public Order Management Act (POMA), the 2013 public order law that required groups to register with local police in writing three days before any gathering to discuss political issues. The government prevented opposition rallies using POMA, which gave police the authority to deny approval for meetings that were not deemed to be in the “public interest” and to forcefully disperse assemblies judged unlawful.

Unlawful, unjustified, and disproportionate uses of force against protesters were common occurrences in 2020. That November, the authorities killed 54 people during protests in Kampala and other towns. Authorities continued to interfere with protests in 2021; in March, police and military personnel briefly detained Wine as he participated in a Kampala protest.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 1 / 4

Civil society in Uganda is active, and several NGOs address politically sensitive issues. However, their operations are vulnerable to various legal restrictions, burdensome registration requirements, and occasional threats. NGOs that work on human rights issues have reported break-ins at their offices and burglaries in recent years, with police failing to adequately investigate the incidents.

In 2019, the government required NGOs to submit information to the National Bureau for NGOs on their staffing, finances, and activities. That November, the interior minister ordered some 12,000 NGOs to close for failing to renew their registration, though the bureau said the groups would still have an opportunity to reregister. In August 2021, the government ordered the closure of 54 NGOs, including the CCEDU and Chapter Four, ostensibly for failing to comply with legal requirements.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 2 / 4

Workers' rights to organize, bargain collectively, and strike are recognized by law, except for workers providing essential government services. As of 2018, there were 42 trade unions in Uganda, representing close to one million people. Most are grouped under two umbrella entities—the National Organization of Trade Unions (NOTU) and the Central Organization of Free Trade Unions (COFTU). Despite their legal and institutional protections, trade unions have been undermined in practice by co-optation, intimidation, and manipulation designed to frustrate their organizing and bargaining efforts.

F. RULE OF LAW: 4 / 16F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 1 / 4

Executive influence and systemic corruption weaken judicial independence. In 2019, the chief justice established an internal task force to investigate corruption allegations, but the FDC called for an independent probe. In 2020, the US State Department sanctioned two judges over allegedly corrupt behavior linked to an adoption program.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 1 / 4

Police routinely engage in arbitrary arrests and detentions, despite legal safeguards against such practices. Due process is also affected by prolonged pretrial detention, inadequate access to counsel for defendants, and corruption. A number of reform initiatives in recent years, including the introduction of plea bargaining in 2015, have reportedly had some success in reducing case backlogs. Police are known to rearrest suspects who have been released from detention.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 1 / 4

Rape, extrajudicial violence, and torture and abuse of suspects and detainees by security forces are persistent problems, and perpetrators are rarely prosecuted.

The Lord's Resistance Army (LRA), a militant group that sought to overthrow the government, was active from the 1980s until its forced withdrawal from Ugandan territory in the mid-2000s. In February 2021, the International Criminal Court convicted LRA leader Dominic Ongwen of crimes against humanity. Ongwen received a 25 year prison term in May.

Prison conditions are poor. The prison system operates at triple its intended capacity, with pretrial detainees constituting nearly half of the inmate population.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 1 / 4

Ugandan laws prohibit discrimination based on ethnic origin, religion, age, race, disability, color, and sex. However, the LGBT+ community faces overt hostility from the government and much of society. Same-sex relations are criminalized under a colonial-era law. Men and transgender women accused of consensual sex are sometimes forced to undergo an anal exam that Human Rights Watch (HRW) says could amount to torture. In May 2021, Parliament approved the Sexual Offences Bill of 2019, which would criminalize same-sex intercourse and anal sex regardless of gender. Museveni declined to sign it in August, saying its provisions effectively exist in the penal code.

The law prohibits employment discrimination based on gender and other criteria, but it does not cover the informal sector, in which most women work, and women are subject to de facto discrimination in employment and other matters.

There were 1.6 million refugees living in Uganda as of November 2021, and the United Nations has praised the government for its progressive asylum policies. However, it struggles to fund basic services for some refugee populations.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 7 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 3 / 4

Freedom of movement is largely unrestricted, including for refugees, most of whom live outside of camps. However, bribery is common in many facets of life, such as interacting with traffic police, gaining admittance to some institutions of higher education, and obtaining government jobs.

During the COVID-19 pandemic, the Ugandan government implemented strict measures and movement restrictions, which were at times violently enforced.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 2 / 4

Customary land tenure is widespread in the north, and land disputes—some of them violent—are common, particularly when private development projects are at stake. Forced evictions sometimes occur in northern and central Uganda. The law allows women to inherit land, but local customary rules and societal practices put women at a disadvantage regarding land tenure and inheritance.

In 2020, the government received a commission of inquiry's (CoI) report on land rights, which recommended the establishment of land courts and of an ombudsman among other measures. In April 2021, Museveni said the government would legislate based the CoI's findings.

In August 2021, Museveni and local leaders in Apaa agreed to launch a CoI to address a long-running land dispute; authorities have evicted residents for years after land there was devoted to conservation in 2002.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 1 / 4

Domestic violence is widespread and underreported, and underage marriages are common in some communities. Some 34 percent of women aged 20 to 24 are married by age 18 and more than 60 percent of young adults experienced physical abuse as children, according to a 2019 UN Children's Fund report.

A Nordic Africa Institute report published in May 2021 noted that Ugandan girls were at higher risk of gender-based violence (GBV) during COVID-19-related school closures. Nearly 645,000 teenage pregnancies were reported between March 2020 and September 2021 according to the UN Population Fund.

Poor enforcement of labor laws contributes to unsafe or exploitative conditions for some workers, including extremely low pay. Child labor in agriculture, domestic service, and a variety of other industries is a significant problem, and the issue is most prevalent in rural areas. Sexual exploitation of minors is also an ongoing problem.

While Uganda maintains domestic laws to promote workers' rights, the government has failed to regulate the recruitment and transfer of Ugandan domestic workers to Middle Eastern countries. Accounts that surfaced in 2019 described workers experiencing sexual abuse, beatings, exploitation, and torture. In September 2021, The Gender, Labour, and Social Development Ministry introduced draft regulations meant to address this issue.

Ukraine

Population: 41,400,000

Capital: Kyiv

Freedom Status: Partly Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Note: The numerical scores and status listed above do not reflect conditions in Crimea and Eastern Donbas, which are examined in separate reports. Freedom in the World reports assess the level of political rights and civil liberties in a given geographical area, regardless of whether they are affected by the state, nonstate actors, or foreign powers. Disputed territories are sometimes assessed separately if they meet certain criteria, including boundaries that are sufficiently stable to allow year-on-year comparisons. For more information, see the report methodology and FAQ.

Overview: Ukraine has enacted a number of positive reforms since the protest-driven ouster of then president Viktor Yanukovych in 2014. However, corruption remains endemic, and the government's initiatives to combat it have met resistance and experienced setbacks. Attacks against journalists, civil society activists, and members of minority groups are frequent, and police responses are often inadequate. Russia occupies the autonomous Ukrainian region of Crimea, which it annexed in 2014, and its military supports armed separatists in the eastern Donbas area.

- President Volodymyr Zelenskyy targeted several television stations aligned with pro-Russia politician and businessman Viktor Medvedchuk during the year. In February, Zelenskyy signed an order blocking the broadcasts of NewsOne, ZIK, and 112, while First Independent and UkrLive were similarly targeted by the government in late December.
- President Zelenskyy continued in his efforts to remove Constitutional Court Chief Justice Oleksandr Tupytsky, who had been implicated in corruption, during the year. In March, Zelenskyy signed a decree dismissing him and another Constitutional Court member, which was overturned by the Supreme Court in July. The president then attempted to appoint two new Constitutional Court members in late November, but the court declined to swear them in.
- In February, former PrivatBank executive Volodymyr Yatsenko was arrested on embezzlement charges, while former board chairman Oleksandr Dubilet was arrested in absentia in June. Anticorruption investigators suspected that Dubilet perpetrated the disappearance of PrivatBank funds before it was nationalized in 2016.
- Zelenskyy and two close associates were implicated in offshore financial activity in October with the release of the Pandora Papers, a cache of documents revealing the offshore activities of political leaders and other prominent individuals worldwide. That month, the Organized Crime and Corruption Reporting Project (OCCRP) reported that Zelenskyy formed offshore companies before becoming president but continued to profit from them after taking office. The president denied involvement in money laundering later that month.

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 9 / 12A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The president is directly elected for a maximum of two five-year terms. In the 2019 election, held in two rounds in March and April, Volodymyr Zelenskyy defeated incumbent president Petro Poroshenko with 73.2 percent of the second-round vote, winning a majority of votes in all but one Ukrainian region. International observers deemed the vote competitive and credible, although polling could not take place in Crimea and separatist-held parts of Donbas.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 3 / 4

The 450 members of the unicameral Supreme Council (Verkhovna Rada) are elected to five-year terms through a mixed system in which half of the members are chosen by closed-list proportional representation and the other half in single-member districts. Future elections will be held under a new system approved in December 2019.

In early elections held in July 2019, President Zelenskyy's Servant of the People party won 254 seats, giving them an outright majority—the first time any party crossed that threshold since independence. The Poroshenko bloc, which had rebranded as European Solidarity, took 25 seats. The Opposition Platform–For Life grouping took 43 seats, Fatherland 26, and the Voice Party 20.

The elections were deemed generally competitive and credible, despite some problems. Voting was impossible in Crimea and separatist-held parts of Donbas. Consequently, the elections filled only 424 of the 450 seats. Additionally, approximately one million Ukrainian citizens were unable to vote because for lack of a registered address. An Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE) election monitoring mission cited irregularities including “widespread vote-buying, misuse of incumbency, and the practice of exploiting all possible legislative loopholes” that contributed to inequalities among competitors.

In October 2020, Ukraine held its first local elections under electoral reforms and revisions passed in 2019. A plurality of elected local councilors nationwide were independent candidates. Servant of the People was largely unsuccessful when contesting the mayoralties of larger cities, though it maintained representation on most city councils. Despite the Central Election Commission's (TVK) generally timely and professional administration of the election during the COVID-19 pandemic, OSCE observers expressed concern about the often-politicized work of territorial commissions, widespread vote-buying allegations, and abuse of state resources, among other issues.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 2 / 4

The mixed electoral system for the parliament that has governed past polls, including those in 2019, has been criticized as prone to manipulation and vote-buying. President Zelenskyy attempted to introduce an entirely party list–based system prior to the 2019 parliamentary election but could not garner enough parliamentary support. That December, the new parliament adopted an electoral code that partially implemented a proportional-representation voting system, with open party lists for both parliamentary and local elections. Zelenskyy enacted it at that year's end.

Local elections were held under the new code, which was modified several times in 2020, that October. The TVK decided not to conduct local elections in 18 communities in the Donetsk and Luhansk regions of eastern Ukraine, located close to the contact line with noncontrolled territories. The decision affected 475,000 voters, who continued to be governed by military-civil administrations, which are appointed directly by the president. In December 2021, the TVK began discussions with the Donetsk and Luhansk military-civil administrations on the possibility of holding elections there in March 2022.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 12 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 3 / 4

With the exception of a ban on the Communist Party, there are no formal barriers to the creation and operation of political parties. In November 2021, for example, Dmytro Razumkov announced the formation of the Smart Politics party after parliamentarians had removed him as speaker. Also in November, Razumkov announced that 24 parliamentarians joined Smart Politics, 21 of them members of Servant of the People.

A law that took effect in 2016 provides parliamentary parties with state funding, but effectively favors established groups. Under that law, parties must win at least 5 percent of votes to receive funding.

Party financing in Ukraine remains opaque, despite robust laws to regulate it. In September 2021, the parliament passed a law banning politically connected business magnates, known as oligarchs, from funding political parties. President Zelenskyy signed it into law in November.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 4 / 4

Ukrainian politics feature dynamic competition among parties. Opposition groups are represented in the parliament, and their political activities are generally not impeded by administrative restrictions or legal harassment. Generally, grassroots parties have difficulty competing with more established parties that have enjoyed the support and financial backing of oligarchs.

In the second election round held in April 2019, Zelenskyy won the presidency by a large margin, defeating then incumbent president Poroshenko. In the July 2019 elections, Servant of the People took an absolute majority of parliamentary seats, defeating the incumbent European Solidarity group.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 2 / 4

Russian influence in Ukraine declined in the years after Yanukovych's ouster, though Moscow continues to wield influence in some eastern and southern regions.

Oligarchs exert significant influence over politics either directly or indirectly, including through financial support for various political parties and lobbying for the appointment of loyalists to key institutional positions. However, individuals defined as oligarchs under legislation signed into law in November 2021 were prohibited from funding political parties.

Although electoral laws forbid the use of public resources in election campaigns, incumbent officials have used administrative resources during the local election campaign, while law enforcement turned a blind eye to the practice.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 3 / 4

There are no formal restrictions on the participation of women and members of ethnic, racial, or other minority groups in political life. However, their voting and representation are hindered by factors including discrimination that discourages political participation, the conflict in the east, and the lack of identity documents for many Roma. Internally displaced persons (IDPs), who number 1.5 million, face legal and practical barriers to voting. Independent candidates cannot run for local council positions in towns with over 10,000 inhabitants. Societal discrimination against LGBT+ people affects their ability to engage in political and electoral processes.

A record 87 women were elected to the parliament in 2019, though this amounted to only 20 percent of all seats. Local elections held in October 2020 were the first to be held with a mandatory 30 percent party-list gender quota, though some local lists did not comply with that requirement. Female representation in city councils stood at 30.2 percent after those elections, an improvement over the 18.1 percent figure in their previous terms. Female regional council representation, meanwhile, increased from 15 percent to 27 percent.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 5 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 3 / 4

Elected officials craft and implement reforms, though many initiatives stall due to opposition from powerful business groups and other special interests. The main obstacle to effective governance in government-controlled parts of Ukraine is corruption.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 1 / 4

Corruption remains a serious problem, and the political will to fight it is eroding despite strong pressure from civil society. Anticorruption agencies have repeatedly been ensnared in politically fraught conflicts with other state entities and elected officials. In a ruling published in October 2020, the Constitutional Court restricted many of the powers held by the National Agency on Corruption Prevention, restricting its ability to function.

The Ukrainian anticorruption framework faced continued obstacles in 2021. In late December, the Kyiv District Administrative Court ended a competitive process to select the head of the Special Anti-Corruption Prosecutor's Office. A day after the court's ruling, a committee evaluating candidates reported that anticorruption official Oleksandr Klymenko scored its highest rating, but he did not assume that post by year's end.

Major corruption cases nevertheless continued during 2021. In February, Volodymyr Yatsenko, a former PrivatBank deputy chief executive, was arrested and charged with embezzlement while trying to leave Ukraine. Former board chairman Oleksandr Dubilet was placed on a wanted list in March and was arrested in absentia in June. Kyiv nationalized PrivatBank, then owned by oligarch Igor Kolomoisky, in 2016 over capital shortfalls; anticorruption investigators claimed that $315 million in funds had gone missing from PrivatBank soon before its nationalization, allegedly at Dubilet's instruction. The PrivatBank investigation was ongoing at year's end.

President Zelenskyy was implicated in profiting from offshore companies after the October 2021 release of the Pandora Papers, a large cache of documents revealing the offshore activity of leaders and other prominent individuals worldwide for purposes that may include tax evasion. That month, the OCCRP reported that Zelenskyy formed offshore companies before his election and continued to profit from them after taking office. Presidential aide Serhiy Shefir and Security Service of Ukraine head Ivan Bakanov, who were associates of the president since before his election, were reportedly involved in the offshore network. Zelenskyy denied that he or his associates engaged in money laundering that month.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 1 / 4

In previous years, Ukraine made some progress in advancing transparency, for example by requiring that banks publish the identity of their owners, and by passing a 2016 law obliging politicians and bureaucrats to file electronic declarations of their assets. However, in October 2020, the Constitutional Court annulled the asset-declaration law, as well as a law that dictates criminal punishments for falsified asset reporting. Law enforcement agencies were forced to close some corruption cases and remove the full database of official declarations from public access. Parliament reinstated a weakened version of the law that December.

Ukraine has made progress enhancing the accessibility of information about public procurements in recent years but failed to set up a centralized system for purchasing medical equipment—including vaccines—to fight the COVID-19 pandemic in a timely and transparent manner. COVID-19-related procurement processes have been susceptible to misuse. In April 2021, the State Audit Office reported that some procurements secured through a COVID-19 fund lacked needed documentation, while others were secured by ineligible bidders.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 35 / 60 (+1)D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 11 / 16*D1. Are there free and independent media? 2 / 4

The constitution guarantees freedoms of speech and expression, and libel is not a criminal offense. The media landscape features considerable pluralism and open criticism of the government and investigation of powerful figures. However, business magnates own and influence many outlets, using them as tools to advance their agendas. President Zelenskyy has previously received significant support from Kolomoisky-controlled media outlets. Other parties also receive favorable coverage from “friendly” media.

A number of Russian news outlets and their journalists are prohibited from entering the country. Various language laws require news outlets to produce certain content in the Ukrainian language.

The Zelenskyy administration targeted several news outlets operating in Ukraine over purported connections to Russia during 2021. In February, Zelenskyy signed an order effectively blocking the transmission of three television channels—NewsOne, ZIK, and 112—which are believed to be indirectly controlled by Viktor Medvedchuk, a leader of the pro-Russian Opposition Platform—For Life political group. The office of European Commission vice president Josep Borrell Fontelles voiced concern over the move later that month, calling for “proportional” decisions from Kyiv. In August, Zelenskyy banned news site Strana.ua; editor in chief Ihor Huzhva, who lives in exile in Austria after being sanctioned in 2018, was accused of disseminating “pro-Russian propaganda” by the National Security and Defense Council (RNBO). In late December, the president sanctioned Medvedchuk-aligned television channels First Independent and UkrLive, taking them off the air.

Journalists continued to face threats of violence and intimidation in 2021. In October, guards at the offices of the State Export-Import Bank of Ukraine (Ukreximbank) physically detained two journalists affiliated with Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty (RFE/RL) after they asked chief executive Yevhen Metzger about Ukreximbank’s lending activity. The National Police launched a criminal case later that month, while Metzger resigned from Ukreximbank.

In early October 2021, the independent Institute of Mass Information counted 139 freedom-of-speech violations against journalists during the year to date, including 73 obstruction cases, 17 physical attacks, 12 threats, 11 access-to-information restrictions, and 10 cybercrimes. Only seven court decisions on freedom-of-speech violations were recorded during the same period.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 3 / 4

The constitution and a 1991 law define religious rights in Ukraine, and these are generally respected. However, smaller religious groups continue to report some discrimination. Vandalism of Jewish structures and cemeteries continues. Acknowledging one's atheism may result in discrimination.

In 2018, Ukrainian Orthodox clerics received permission from religious authorities in Istanbul, the historical seat of the Eastern Orthodox Church, to create their own autocephalous church and remove it from the Russian Orthodox Church's canonical jurisdiction. A new Orthodox Church of Ukraine was formed that December to unite existing factions. While the Kremlin and church leaders in Moscow objected, tensions between the Orthodox Church of Ukraine and the Ukrainian branch of the Russian Orthodox Church have decreased in recent years.

In October 2021, President Zelenskyy signed a law that legally defines and combats antisemitism. The law also defines the destruction of buildings and monuments as antisemitic and prohibits denial of the Holocaust.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 3 / 4

A 2014 law dramatically reduced the government's control over education and allowed universities much greater freedom in designing their own programs and managing their own finances. A law adopted in 2017 was designed to align the country's education system with those in the European Union (EU), but it drew criticism for provisions that mandate the use of Ukrainian as the primary language of instruction in most publicly funded secondary schools by 2020, affecting numerous schools taught in minority languages.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 3 / 4

Ukrainians generally enjoy open and free private discussion, although the polarizing effects of the conflict have weighed on political expression, especially relating to questions of individual and national identity. Heated exchanges in the media and instances of violence against those expressing views considered controversial are not uncommon, likely contributing to self-censorship among ordinary people.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 8 / 12 (+1)E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 3 / 4 (+1)

The constitution guarantees the right to peaceful assembly but requires organizers to give the authorities advance notice of demonstrations. Ukraine lacks a law governing the conduct of demonstrations and specifically providing for freedom of assembly.

Public gatherings and protests were commonly held during 2021, as COVID-19 restrictions were loosened during the year. However, COVID-19 measures did affect a January gathering in Kyiv marking the 2009 murders of human rights lawyer Stanislav Markelov and journalist Anastasiya Baburova. Participants, some of whom were forcibly placed onto a police bus and physically assaulted, were charged with violating pandemic restrictions.

Nationwide women's rights rallies were held on March 8, International Women's Day, but were also accompanied by counterprotests organized by Tradition and Order, a right-wing nationalist group. The March 8 events were largely peaceful, with marchers and counterprotesters kept separate by police. Several participants in the Kyiv march were injured by counterprotesters, however.

Several pride parades were held in 2021, though counterprotesters attempted to attack authorities and participants during some of the year's events. An August pride parade in Odesa was marred by clashes between police and Tradition and Order members, who deployed tear gas against officers. Some 51 group members were detained, including the group's Odesa chapter head, while 29 officers were injured. An attempt to interfere with a pride event in Kharkiv in September was stymied by the authorities. No incidents were reported during the September pride parade in Kyiv. This was a marked improvement over previous parades in the capital, where marchers and police officers were attacked by right-wing and nationalist assailants.

Score Change: The score improved from 2 to 3 because the police were more effective in ensuring that public assemblies, including LGBT+ parades, proceeded with limited interference from counterprotesters during the year.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 2 / 4

Numerous civic groups emerged or were reinvigorated following the departure of Yanukovich in 2014, and many can influence decision-making at various levels of government. The 2020 edition of the CSO Sustainability Index for Central and Eastern Europe and Eurasia reported that Ukrainian nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) were among the most stable and effective in the region, though civil society was affected by the COVID-19 pandemic.

In 2019, the Constitutional Court struck down a law that had required NGO leaders, staff, and contractors focused on corruption to submit asset and income declarations. However, NGOs are required to disclose their ultimate beneficiaries and ownership structure under money-laundering legislation. In October 2021, as the deadline for compliance approached, more than 200 NGOs claimed the law unjustly interfered with their work in an open letter. An amendment passed later that month extended the deadline to July 2022.

Civil society activists face intimidation and threats; law enforcement fails to bring all perpetrators to justice. In September 2021, the ZMINA Human Rights Centre recorded 88 incidents targeting activists in government-controlled territory during the first nine months of the year, an increase over the 77 incidents recorded during the same period in 2020.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 3 / 4

Trade unions function in the country, but strikes and worker protests are infrequent, as the largest trade union, stemming from the Soviet-era labor federation, lacks independence from the government and employers. Factory owners still pressure their workers to vote according to the owners' preferences.

In October 2021, Federation of Trade Unions of Ukraine members rallied against planned changes to the labor code in Kyiv. While the rally blocked traffic, it was conducted peacefully.

F. RULE OF LAW: 6 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 1 / 4

Ukraine has long suffered from corrupt and politicized courts, and reform initiatives meant to address the issue have stalled or have fallen short of expectations.

In October 2020, President Zelenskyy unsuccessfully attempted to dissolve the Constitutional Court after it annulled anticorruption laws. That December, Zelenskyy issued a decree suspending Constitutional Court Chief Justice Oleksandr Tupytsky, who was being investigated for bribery and witness tampering. Zelenskyy attempted to dismiss him and another justice outright in March 2021. While the Supreme Court overturned the dismissal in July, Zelenskyy attempted to appoint two new judges to the Constitutional Court in late November. The court declined to swear the president's appointees in.

In November 2021, President Zelenskyy announced the members of the Ethics Council, which is responsible for judicial integrity within the High Council of Justice. The Ethics Council was created via a judicial reform law passed by parliamentarians in July.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 1 / 4

Although due process guarantees exist, in practice individuals with financial resources and political influence can escape prosecution for wrongdoing. According to the World Prison Brief, 36 percent of prisoners were in pretrial detention as of October 2021. Judges have also stymied corruption investigations into high-profile officials, including within the judiciary.

In June 2020, the parliament adopted a law allowing prosecution of “thieves in law”—people who exert criminal influence and coordinate the criminal activities of others. In May 2021, the government identified and sanctioned 557 individuals as “thieves in law,” most of them residing outside Ukraine. In October, however, RNBO secretary Oleksiy Danilov reported that 108 people were wrongfully added to the list.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 2 / 4

The security situation is generally stable outside of the occupied areas. However, the trafficking of weapons and ammunition from conflict zones has contributed to the proliferation of weapons throughout Ukraine. In March 2021, a parliamentary committee chairman warned that anywhere from 2 to 6 million unregistered weapons were present in Ukraine, compared to 1.2 million registered weapons.

Targeted assassinations and assassination attempts also occur, and perpetrators are known to escape justice. In August 2021, prominent Belarusian activist Vitaliy Shishov was found dead in a park in Kyiv. In late September, a car carrying presidential aide Serhiy Shefir was shot at near Kyiv, though he survived the incident.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 2 / 4

A 2012 law introduced a nonexclusive list of grounds on which discrimination is prohibited. Gender discrimination is explicitly banned under the constitution. However, these protections are inconsistently enforced. The Romany minority and LGBT+ people experience significant discrimination in practice. Roma and LGBT+ people and groups generally only receive police protection or justice for attacks against them when there is intense pressure from civil society or international observers. Rights groups have reported that employers openly discriminate on the basis of gender and age.

Women who left the military have more difficulty receiving pensions, as they were prohibited from combat duty until 2018. Women serving in the military also face discrimination while in uniform.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 10 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 3 / 4

Freedom of movement is generally not restricted in areas under government control. However, Ukraine's cumbersome system requiring individuals to be legally registered at an address in order to vote and receive other important services creates a barrier to full freedom of movement and employment. Movement restrictions in Ukraine due to the COVID-19 pandemic disproportionately impacted the elderly, the poor, and families with children.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 2 / 4

The government has taken steps to scale back regulation of private businesses in recent years, though the business environment is affected by widespread corruption. A reform law allowing the sale of agricultural land went into effect in July 2021, ending a moratorium. Under the law, only individual Ukrainian citizens can currently buy and sell farmland; organizations will be able to acquire such land beginning in 2024, so long as their participating members are all Ukrainian citizens.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 3 / 4

The government generally does not restrict personal social freedoms, though same-sex marriage remains unrecognized in Ukraine.

Domestic violence is widespread, and police responses to the few victims who report such abuse are inadequate. COVID-19 lockdowns led to a surge in domestic violence; the number of reported cases increased by 66 percent in 2020 through November when compared to 2019. In July 2021, President Zelenskyy signed a law allowing domestic abuse survivors to receive compensation while making it easier to prosecute security officers and other officials who are accused of domestic violence.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 2 / 4

The trafficking of women domestically and abroad for the purpose of prostitution continues. IDPs are especially vulnerable to exploitation for sex trafficking and forced labor.

Labor laws establish a minimum wage that meets the poverty level, as well as a 40-hour work week and workplace safety standards. However, workers at times go unpaid, and penalties for workplace safety violations are lenient.

United Arab Emirates

Population: 9,800,000

Capital: Abu Dhabi

Freedom Status: Not Free

Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: The United Arab Emirates (UAE) is a federation of seven emirates led in practice by Abu Dhabi, the largest by area and richest in natural resources. Limited elections are held for a federal advisory body, but political parties are banned, and all executive, legislative, and judicial authority ultimately rests with the seven hereditary rulers. The civil liberties of both citizens and noncitizens, who make up an overwhelming majority of the population, are subject to significant restrictions.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- In January, the UAE resumed diplomatic relations with Qatar. The countries' ties were severed in 2017 over Qatar's support for the Muslim Brotherhood, which the UAE had declared a terrorist organization.

- Also in January, UAE prime minister Sheikh Mohammed bin Rashid al-Maktoum announced that some foreigners, namely investors and professionals in certain fields, could seek naturalization under a citizenship-law amendment.
- In July, the Guardian, a British newspaper, reported on the UAE's likely use of the Pegasus spyware suite against individuals including British academic Matthew Hedges and the late Alaa al-Siddiq, a UK-based activist.
- In November, the emirate of Abu Dhabi announced a law that would, among other things, allow for civil marriages and the joint custody of children for non-Muslims. The emirate also announced the creation of a court to adjudicate matters under the new law.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 5 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 1 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

The Federal Supreme Council, comprising the dynastic rulers of the seven emirates, is the country's highest executive body. It selects a president and vice president from among its members, and the president appoints a prime minister and cabinet. The emirate of Abu Dhabi has controlled the federation's presidency since its inception in 1971; the current president, Sheikh Khalifa bin Zayed al-Nahyan, succeeded his father in 2004. In 2006, Sheikh Mohammed bin Rashid al-Maktoum succeeded his late brother as ruler of the emirate of Dubai and as vice president and prime minister of the UAE.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 1 / 4

The unelected Federal Supreme Council is also the country's highest legislative authority, but it is advised by the 40-seat Federal National Council (FNC), which can review proposed laws and question government ministers.

Since 2006, half of the FNC's members have been elected for four-year terms on a nonpartisan basis by an electoral college chosen by the rulers of each emirate, while the government directly appoints the other half. The size of the electoral college has expanded over time. For the October 2019 elections it grew to 337,000 members, up from 224,000 in 2015, though this still fell far short of the entire voting-age citizen population. Close to 500 candidates vied for the 20 elected seats. Voter turnout remained low at about 35 percent, matching the 2015 level.

There are no elected legislative bodies in the individual emirates.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 0 / 4

The UAE's electoral framework applies only to the advisory FNC, and it lacks universal suffrage. While the electoral college has expanded, and overseas voting was permitted for the first time in 2015, there is no accountability for the procedures by which the rulers of each emirate draw up the lists of eligible voters. The geographical allocation of FNC seats results in significant overrepresentation for the smaller emirates.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 2 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 0 / 4

Political parties are banned. All electoral candidates run as independents.

Since 2011, the UAE has aggressively cracked down on opposition activists, particularly if they are suspected of belonging to the Association for Reform and Guidance (Al-Islah), a group formed in 1974 to advocate for democratic reform. The government has accused Al-Islah members of being foreign agents of the Muslim Brotherhood intent on overthrowing the regime and designated the Muslim Brotherhood as a terrorist organization in 2014. Qatar's support for the Muslim Brotherhood has been a factor in efforts by the UAE, Saudi Arabia, and their regional allies to isolate that country in 2017. In January 2021, the UAE and Qatar reestablished diplomatic relations.

Despite the shift in regional relations, dozens of activists, civil society leaders, academics, and students remained imprisoned during 2021, including the prominent economist Nasser bin Ghaith, lawyer Mohammed al-Roken, and human rights advocate Ahmed Mansoor. In September, the UAE government labeled four prominent exiled dissidents terrorists.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 0 / 4

The political system grants the emirates' hereditary rulers a monopoly on power and excludes the possibility of a change in government through elections.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 1 / 4

The political choices available to eligible voters are severely limited in practice, and the alignments of both voters and candidates are heavily influenced by tribal networks.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 1 / 4

Approximately 90 percent of the UAE's population consists of noncitizens who lack political rights and electoral opportunities, including thousands of stateless residents. There is no clear process for obtaining citizenship without Emirati parentage or marriage to an Emirati man; children of Emirati mothers and foreign fathers must apply for naturalization. In January 2021, Prime Minister bin Rashid al-Maktoum announced that some foreigners, namely investors and some trained professionals, could seek naturalization under a citizenship-law amendment.

Women make up about 50 percent of the FNC electoral college, and approximately 180 women ran as candidates in the 2019 elections, more than double the 78 who ran in 2015. Women won seven of the elected seats on the council, and the authorities appointed 13 women in keeping with a pledge to ensure equal representation in the 40-member body. In practice, however, ordinary women have little opportunity to organize independently and advance their interests through the political system.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 2 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 0 / 4

Government policies are determined by the dynastic rulers of the seven emirates. The FNC performs only advisory functions and has struggled to arrange hearings with government ministers. In practice, policymaking authority has coalesced around the crown prince of Abu Dhabi, Mohammed bin Zayed al-Nahyan, since the titular UAE president suffered a stroke in 2014. The president, Khalifa bin Zayed al-Nahyan, made occasional appearances in state media in recent years, but there has been no obvious change to the crown prince's de facto leadership.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 2 / 4

The UAE is considered one of the least corrupt countries in the Middle East, and the government has taken steps to increase efficiency and streamline the bureaucracy. Nevertheless, there are no genuinely independent anticorruption mechanisms, and senior members of the ruling families are able to shield themselves and their associates from public scrutiny.

The 2018 collapse of the Abraaj Group private equity firm, several months after institutional investors questioned its alleged mismanagement of funds, highlighted regulatory and oversight weaknesses in Dubai's financial sector, which could also have implications for the strength of the country's safeguards against public-sector malfeasance.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 0 / 4

The government generally lacks transparency, and despite legal provisions for access to public information, it remains difficult in practice. The State Audit Institution does not release public information about its reports, and its remit is limited to federal entities and state-owned companies, whereas most spending takes place in the individual emirates; the institution can conduct audits of an emirate's entities if asked by its ruler.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 12 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 3 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 0 / 4

The 1980 Publications and Publishing Law, considered one of the most restrictive press laws in the Arab world, regulates all aspects of the media and prohibits criticism of the government. Journalists commonly practice self-censorship, and outlets frequently publish government statements without criticism or comment. Media operate with more freedom in certain "free zones"—areas in which foreign media outlets can produce news content intended for foreign audiences—but the zones remain subject to UAE media laws and have additional regulatory codes and authorities.

Emirati-owned and UAE-based media outlets actively participated in a years-long government-backed media campaign against Qatar. The attorney general warned in 2017 that anyone who showed sympathy or favoritism toward Qatar in any medium could be punished with 3 to 15 years in prison and a fine of at least 500,000 dirhams ($136,000) under the penal code and a highly restrictive 2012 cybercrime law. The government sought to influence reporting on Qatar even after relations with that country were restored in January 2021; in June, the Federation of African Journalists accused UAE officials of pressuring African press outlets to criticize Qatar's hosting of the 2022 World Cup.

A number of well-known commentators have been jailed in recent years for criticizing the authorities, expressing support for dissidents or human rights, or calling for political reform. Leading human rights activist Ahmed Mansoor, who received a 10-year prison term in 2018 for using social media to "publish false information that damages the country's reputation," remained imprisoned in 2021. Following the 2020 agreement to normalize relations with Israel, Emirati authorities barred writer Dhabia Khamis al-Maslamani from leaving the country, and prosecutors began an investigation into her for social media posts that allegedly threatened national security by criticizing normalization.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 1 / 4

Islam is the official religion, and the majority of citizens are Sunni Muslims. Blasphemy is a criminal offense, as is proselytizing to Muslims by non-Muslim groups. The General Authority of Islamic Affairs and Endowments provides regular guidance to Muslim preachers; it and a Dubai counterpart appoint the country's Sunni imams. Shiite clergy have their own council to manage religious affairs.

There have been some allegations of noncitizen Shiite Muslims facing discrimination or deportation in recent years. Christian, Hindu, and Sikh places of worship have been built on plots of land donated by ruling family members. Pope Francis became the first Roman Catholic pontiff to visit the Arabian Peninsula when he traveled to the UAE in 2019 as part of a bid by Emirati officials to emphasize the country's religious tolerance. Later that year, the authorities announced plans to open an Abrahamic Family House, to include a mosque, a church, and a synagogue, in 2022.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 1 / 4

The Ministry of Education censors textbooks and curriculums in both public and private schools. Islamic education is required in public schools and for Muslims in private schools. Several foreign universities have opened satellite campuses in the UAE, although faculty members are generally careful to avoid criticizing the government. New York University (NYU) faculty members, students, staff, and support personnel have been denied entry into the country to fulfill roles at NYU's Abu Dhabi campus. The UAE authorities have placed scholars and students who have criticized aspects of government policy on a unified Gulf Cooperation Council (GCC) security list, barring them from the wider region.

In 2018, British doctoral student Matthew Hedges was arrested after completing a research trip to the country. He was held in solitary confinement in Abu Dhabi for five months, convicted on espionage charges after a minutes-long trial, and sentenced to life imprisonment. Under international pressure, he was then pardoned by the UAE president and promptly deported.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 1 / 4

A number of laws give authorities broad discretion to punish individuals' speech on sensitive topics. The 2012 cybercrime law, which amended and replaced a 2006 law, introduced lengthy prison terms for vaguely worded offenses such as damaging "the reputation or the stature of the state or any of its institutions." A 2014 counterterrorism law prescribes punishments including the death penalty for offenses like "undermining national security" and possession of material that opposes or denigrates Islam. A 2015 law against hate speech and discrimination contained loosely worded definitions and criminalized a wide range of free-speech activities. These and other criminal laws have been actively enforced, including against ordinary social media users. In 2020, a court sentenced Ahmed Etoum, a Jordanian living in the UAE, to 10 years' imprisonment for violating the 2012 cybercrime law; Etoum had criticized the Jordanian royal family in a Facebook post.

Human Rights Watch (HRW) reported in 2019 that the authorities had systematically persecuted the relatives and associates of jailed or exiled dissidents, for example by revoking their citizenship, withholding identity documents, banning travel, denying them access to education and employment, and subjecting them to surveillance and intimidation. Such practices serve as a further deterrent to unfettered speech.

The UAE government engages in surveillance and hacking activities. In 2019, Reuters reported on “Project Raven,” a surveillance and hacking initiative that targeted government opponents. In December 2021, the Electronic Frontier Foundation sued DarkMatter, a UAE firm involved in Project Raven, on behalf of Saudi activist Loujain al-Hathloul; al-Hathloul alleged that DarkMatter hacked into her mobile phone. The UAE is also believed to use the Pegasus spyware suite. In July 2021, the Guardian reported on the government’s apparent use of Pegasus against individuals including Matthew Hedges and the late Alaa al-Siddiq, a UK-based human rights activist, between 2017 and 2019.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 2 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 1 / 4

The government places restrictions on freedom of assembly. Public meetings require government permits, and unauthorized political or labor protests are subject to dispersal by police. Demonstrations are rare in practice.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 0 / 4

Nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) must register with the Ministry of Social Affairs and can receive government subsidies, though they are subject to many restrictions. International human rights groups have been denied entry to the UAE. Local human rights activists are at serious risk of detention, prosecution, and mistreatment in custody, and their relatives may be subject to various forms of harassment.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 1 / 4

Workers—most of whom are foreign—do not have the right to form unions, bargain collectively, or strike. They can seek collective redress for grievances through state mediation or the courts, and the government sometimes arranges concessions and settlements. Workers occasionally protest against unpaid wages and poor working and living conditions, but such demonstrations are typically dispersed by security personnel, and noncitizens who participate risk deportation. Professional associations require government licenses and are closely monitored by the authorities.

F. RULE OF LAW: 3 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 0 / 4

The judiciary is not independent, with court rulings subject to review by the political leadership. Judges are appointed by executive decree, and the judiciary as an institution is managed largely by executive officials. Many judges are foreigners working on short-term contracts.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 1 / 4

Detainees are often denied adequate access to legal counsel during interrogations, and lengthy detention without charge is not uncommon. Judges are empowered to extend such detention indefinitely. Systematic violations of international due process standards have been observed in numerous high-profile trials involving political dissidents, human rights defenders, and foreigners, among others. Some of those convicted have their detentions arbitrarily extended after their sentences are complete. Four prisoners were released in April 2021, years after their scheduled release dates.

In August 2021, a Chinese woman claimed that Dubai hosted a Chinese-run detention center; she claimed to have been detained there after being abducted from a Dubai hotel and imprisoned along with ethnic Uyghur detainees.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 1 / 4

Authorities have been criticized by international human rights organizations for failure to investigate allegations of torture and mistreatment in custody, including denial of medical care. Detainees regularly report abuse by the authorities. Ahmed Mansoor went on hunger strikes during 2019 to protest the conditions of his detention, having been harshly beaten by prison authorities for his complaints. In January 2021, HRW reported that Mansoor lacked protection from the cold or hygiene products while imprisoned. In May, Matthew Hedges accused UAE authorities of torturing him during his 2018 imprisonment, when he sued four officials in a UK court.

Sharia (Islamic law) courts sometimes impose flogging sentences for offenses including drug use, prostitution, and extramarital sex.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 1 / 4

Noncitizens and foreign workers commonly experience discrimination and risk deportation for relatively minor offenses. Women face legal and societal discrimination on a variety of issues, including employment. Same-sex sexual relations can draw harsh criminal penalties under vaguely worded laws, and LGBT+ people are subject to widespread social stigma.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 4 / 16G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 1 / 4

Emirati citizens face few apparent restrictions on movement within the UAE or on their ability to change their place of employment, though societal norms sometimes constrain a woman's ability to work or travel without the consent of her husband, father, or other male guardian.

Under the kafala system, migrant workers' legal status is tied to their employers' sponsorship, meaning they can be punished or deported for leaving employment without meeting certain criteria. Stateless residents' freedom of movement is limited by their lack of travel documents; under a government program, many stateless people have received passports from the Comoros that ease travel and other activities but do not confer full citizenship. Qatari nationals were barred from the UAE while diplomatic ties between the countries were cut, though they were allowed to visit the UAE in January 2021.

Pandemic-related movement restrictions varied among the emirates. Relatively strict lockdowns were imposed for part of 2020, but tourism-dependent Dubai opened to international visitors later that year, even as Abu Dhabi maintained tighter travel rules.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 1 / 4

The UAE has enacted reforms in recent years to ease procedures for establishing and operating businesses. However, the government and ruling families exercise considerable influence over the economy and are involved in many of the country's major economic and commercial initiatives, limiting the space for genuinely private business activity.

Citizens of the UAE and other GCC states are able to own property, though Qatari citizens' property rights were affected by the UAE's diplomatic rift with Qatar. In 2019, the emirate of Abu Dhabi allowed foreigners to own freehold property in designated investment zones. Dubai has permitted non-GCC nationals to own property in designated zones since 2001.

Women generally receive smaller inheritances than men under Sharia, and women are excluded from state benefits aimed at supporting home ownership. A law implemented in the emirate of Abu Dhabi in November 2021 allowed non-Muslim residents to benefit from new inheritance rules.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 1 / 4

Women are generally placed at a distinct disadvantage under laws governing marriage and divorce. Among other disparities, a Muslim woman's male guardian must approve her marriage. Muslim women are forbidden to marry non-Muslims, while Muslim men may marry Christian or Jewish women. Some categories of extramarital sex are criminal offenses, which deters victims from reporting rape. No laws prohibit spousal rape. A measure adopted in 2019 introduced orders of protection and new criminal penalties to address domestic violence, but its wording appeared to allow some forms of control or punishment by male guardians.

In 2020, the government announced changes to Sharia-based laws that decriminalized cohabitation by unmarried couples; eliminated penalties for the possession, purchase, or consumption of alcohol by people age 21 or older; and repealed legal provisions that assigned lighter penalties for "honor crimes" against women. The amendments would also allow couples who married in another country to adhere to that country's divorce and inheritance laws. In November 2021, the emirate of Abu Dhabi announced a new law on divorce, inheritance, and child custody concerns for non-Muslims; among other things, the law allowed for joint-custody arrangements and civil marriage. The emirate also announced a new court to adjudicate matters under the new law.

Foreign workers are often exploited and subjected to harsh working conditions, physical abuse, and withholding of passports with little to no access to legal recourse. A series of ministerial decrees issued in 2015 aimed to give migrant workers more flexibility to terminate employment under certain conditions. Foreign household workers were not covered by those decrees or by labor laws in general, leaving them especially vulnerable. A law adopted in 2017 guaranteed such household workers basic protections and benefits including sick leave and daily rest periods, though they were inferior to those in the national labor law, and household workers would still be unable to leave their employers without a breach of contract.

Large numbers of foreign workers reportedly left or sought to leave the country during 2020 after losing their jobs due to economic dislocation caused by the COVID-19 pandemic and related lockdowns.

A competitive rivalry between Abu Dhabi and Dubai for eye-catching development projects masks deeper sensitivities in relations between these two emirates and the five less affluent emirates in the northeast. Economic disparities also persist among UAE citizens across the seven emirates and between citizens and the noncitizen majority.

United Kingdom

Population: 67,500,000

Capital: London

Freedom Status: Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: The United Kingdom (UK)—which includes the constituent countries of England, Scotland, and Wales along with the territory of Northern Ireland—is a stable democracy that regularly holds free elections and is home to a vibrant media sector. While the government enforces robust protections for political rights and civil liberties, recent years have seen concerns about increased government surveillance of residents, as well as rising Islamophobia and anti-immigrant sentiment. In a 2016 referendum, UK voters narrowly voted to leave the European Union (EU), through a process known colloquially as “Brexit,” which will have political and economic reverberations both domestically and across Europe in the coming years.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- Numerous officials in the governing Conservative Party were involved in high-profile political scandals during the year, including Prime Minister Boris Johnson, who was accused of misusing political donations and holding parties in violation of COVID-19-related lockdown rules, and several members of Parliament (MPs), who allegedly breached lobbying regulations. In December, the Electoral Commission fined the party for failing to properly disclose political donations.
- In March, Parliament introduced a controversial draft law that includes provisions that would broaden the powers of the police and restrict protest and assembly rights in England and Wales. The proposed legislation sparked mass “kill the bill” protests across the country, which continued throughout the year; the bill remained under consideration in Parliament at year’s end.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 39 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 12 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

Executive power rests with the prime minister and cabinet, which must have the support of the House of Commons. The leader of the majority party or coalition usually becomes prime minister, and appoints the cabinet. A snap general election was held in December 2019, where a majority Conservative government, led by Prime Minister Boris Johnson, was elected. The monarch, Queen Elizabeth II, holds a ceremonial role as head of state.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The UK has a bicameral Parliament. The more powerful lower chamber, the House of Commons, has 650 members directly elected to serve five-year terms. The 788 members of the unelected House of Lords are appointed by the monarch. The body largely plays an oversight role in reviewing legislation passed by the House of Commons.

A general election was not due until 2022, but Prime Minister Johnson, who led a minority government after winning the premiership in July 2019, secured a new election from Parliament, held in December 2019. The Conservatives secured an 81-seat majority. The opposition Labour Party won 202 seats, down from 262 in the last Parliament. The Scottish National Party, which campaigned to remain in the EU and advocates for Scottish independence from the UK, remained the third-largest party in the House of Commons.

Elections for some local councils, police commissioners, and mayoralities in parts of England and Wales, which had been postponed due to COVID-19, took place in May 2021. Assembly elections took place in Scotland and Wales on the same day.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 4 / 4

The UK's electoral framework is robust and well implemented. An Electoral Commission report on the 2019 General Election noted the presence of "misleading content and presentation techniques" in online campaigning. In September 2020, the Electoral Reform Society (ERS), a nongovernmental organization (NGO), called for the regulation of internet-based campaign and financing activities.

Parliament maintains a direct role in electoral management, notably through its involvement in the seat boundary drawing process. The Parliamentary Constituencies Act 2020, which was enacted in December 2020, will limit its future involvement. In May 2021, the government formally introduced a bill to repeal the Fixed-term Parliaments Act 2011, which limits the prime minister's ability to force a snap election.

Conservative governments have moved towards requiring voters to produce identification in order to vote. The Elections Bill 2021-22 was introduced in July, and if enacted, will require voters to present identification for all elections in England and Wales. In 2019, the ERS noted that 2,000 prospective voters participating in a pilot voter identification scheme were turned away from polling stations in that May's local elections, and that a permanent requirement would disproportionately impact Black, Asian, and minority ethnic (BAME) voters.

In June 2021, the government announced a series of plans that some say would undermine the independence of the Electoral Commission. A former electoral commissioner alleged that the new Elections Bill would subject the commission to political oversight, representing "serious threats to the fairness of all future elections in Britain."

Following the local and mayoral elections in May 2021 the government announced that it plans to change the electoral system for mayoral elections to a "first-past-the-post" system, which critics claim will provide an undue advantage to Conservative candidates in future elections.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 16 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 4 / 4

Parties do not face undue restrictions on registration or operation. The Conservative and Labour parties have dominated politics for decades, though other parties regularly win seats.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 4 / 4

Opposition parties operate freely, and have a realistic opportunity to increase their support and gain power through elections.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 4 / 4

People's political choices are generally free from domination by groups using extrapolitical means.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 4 / 4

Under the UK's system of devolution, Parliament has granted different degrees of legislative power to the Northern Ireland Assembly, the Welsh Assembly, and the Scottish Parliament, augmenting the political representation of regional populations.

Women, LGBT+ people, and members of racial and ethnic minority groups are active in UK politics. After the December 2019 general election, a record 220 MPs, representing 34 percent of the lower house, are women. LGBT+ and BAME representation also improved.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 11 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 4 / 4

Freely elected officials can generally make and implement national policy without significant influence from actors who are not democratically accountable.

Elections to the Northern Ireland Assembly took place in March 2017, but legislators did not form a functioning government for a record-breaking 1,045 days after that poll. An agreement, which was facilitated by the UK and Ireland, was finalized in January 2020.

In February 2021, an investigation by The Guardian revealed that the Queen had repeatedly invoked an obscure constitutional mechanism referred to as "Queen's consent" to lobby for changes to draft laws that may otherwise have affected her assets.

Large-scale official corruption is not historically pervasive, and anticorruption bodies are generally effective. However, conflict-of-interest and bias concerns over the awarding of COVID-19 tenders to politically connected recipients persisted in 2021. In February, the High Court ruled that former health secretary Matt Hancock acted unlawfully when he failed to publish details of government contracts within the legally mandated timeframe. Hancock also failed to declare his own interest in awarding an NHS contract to a firm owned by members of his family. Prime Minister Johnson was also accused of breaking ministerial code by failing to publish the same contracts, though he was later cleared of wrongdoing. The High Court ruled in June that awarding a state contract to a marketing agency connected to senior government figures was unlawful.

After former prime minister David Cameron was accused of lobbying the current government for economic assistance in March, a Treasury Committee inquiry found that though Cameron did not break any rules, existing lobbying regulations were inadequate. In October, MP Owen Paterson was accused of an "egregious" break of lobbying rules after an investigation revealed that he had financially gained from lobbying activities that directly breached the ministerial code of conduct. Although Paterson ultimately resigned, Parliament voted to reject his suspension and halt the investigation into the matter.

In December, the Electoral Commission fined the Conservative Party £17,800 ($23,500 US dollars) for improperly reporting a donation that was used to finance the redecoration of the prime minister's official residence. An inquiry into the matter cleared Johnson of breaking ministerial code.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 4 / 4

MPs are required to disclose assets and sources of income, and this information is made available to the public. Freedom-of-information legislation is reasonably well implemented, and journalists can generally access information to report to the public. However, in November 2020, NGO OpenDemocracy reported that requests deemed sensitive are vetted by a government office known as a “clearing house.” In June 2021, a judge ruled that the government had displayed a “profound lack of transparency about the operation” of the clearing house and had not been justified in failing to comply with over 100 freedom-of-information requests.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 54 / 60D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 14 / 16*D1. Are there free and independent media? 4 / 4

Press freedom is legally protected. The media environment is lively and competitive, espousing viewpoints spanning the political spectrum. The publicly owned British Broadcasting Corporation (BBC), which relies on dedicated license fees for most of its funding, is editorially independent and competitive with its commercial counterparts.

In 2020, the Council of Europe (CoE) criticized the government after the Ministry of Defence blacklisted journalists from online news outlet Declassified UK. The ministry apologized to the CoE later that month, and promised to conduct a review.

A National Action Plan including measures intended to enhance the safety of journalists was published in March 2021. Throughout the year, journalists received death threats and were subjected to harassment from antilockdown activists. Paramilitary groups in Northern Ireland have also issued threats against journalists in recent years; in both 2020 and 2021, Amnesty International condemned the harassment of journalists by such groups, stating that their actions undermine press freedom.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 4 / 4

Freedom of religion is protected in law and practice. A 2006 law bans incitement to religious hatred, with a maximum penalty of seven years in prison. Nevertheless, minority groups, particularly Muslims, continue to report discrimination, harassment, and occasional assaults. In October 2021, the Home Office recorded 124,091 hate crimes in England and Wales during its 2020–21 reporting period, a 9 percent increase over the 2019–20 reporting period.

Muslims have been reluctant to discuss religious subjects or their identity in some settings, especially in the classroom, due to Prevent, a strategy designed to divert individuals vulnerable to terrorist or extremist recruitment. Educators and human rights groups have criticized the policy for forcing Muslims to self-censor, for fear of being referred to the program. In January 2021, William Shawcross—who was accused of fostering an “institutional bias against Muslims” in his previous role as the head of the UK’s Charity Commission—was appointed to chair an independent review into Prevent. His appointment was controversial, and prompted widespread criticism from rights groups and Muslim community leaders, who expressed concerns that Shawcross will institute policies harmful to Muslims.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 3 / 4

Academic freedom is generally respected, though the government has recently made political forays into the academic curriculum. In October 2020, Women and Equalities Minister Kemi Badenoch commented that teaching critical race theory was partisan and illegal and the Department for Education issued guidance calling anticapitalism an “extreme political stance.”

A new draft law on freedom of speech remained under consideration in Parliament throughout 2021. The bill, which would introduce fines for English universities deemed to have restricted free speech, has been criticized by freedom of expression groups on grounds that it would potentially allow the government to define “acceptable speech” at universities.

The Counter-Terrorism and Security Act 2015 requires schools and universities to help divert students from recruitment into terrorist groups, as part of the government’s long-standing Prevent strategy. Educators are expected to report students suspected of terrorist or extremist sympathies to a local government body, and vet the remarks of visiting speakers, among other obligations. Human rights NGO Liberty criticized the strategy in 2019, saying it stifled open debate and academic inquiry.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 3 / 4

Concerns about the effects of mass surveillance on unfettered private discussion have persisted for several years. The Investigatory Powers Act 2016 required communications companies to store customer metadata for 12 months and, in some cases, allowed this information to be accessed by the authorities without a warrant. The government later limited access to metadata for serious criminal investigations with the approval of an independent commission after the High Court ruled the legislation incompatible with EU jurisprudence in 2018.

The government has advocated for the use of automated facial recognition (AFR), which builds “faceprints” of individuals based on recordings taken in public gatherings. In August 2020, the Court of Appeal ruled the South Wales Police’s use of AFR unlawful, but did not preemptively ban its use throughout the UK.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 12 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

Freedom of assembly is generally respected, though peaceful protesters have found themselves under police surveillance for attending public events in recent years. Draft legislation that would place new restrictions on protest rights was introduced in Parliament in March 2021. The Police, Crime, Sentencing and Courts Bill includes provisions that would criminalize certain acts of protest, including blocking roads, and would allow authorities to suspend the assembly rights of people convicted of “protest-related” crimes. Widespread protests against the bill took place throughout the year, and in June, a parliamentary committee on human rights warned that the bill may violate protesters’ human rights. The proposal remained under consideration in the House of Lords at year’s end.

Police were accused of using lockdown restrictions to suppress protests in 2021. In March, police forcibly dispersed a public vigil held in memory of Sarah Everard, a woman who was killed by a serving police officer earlier that month; authorities claimed that participants had violated social distancing requirements. Demonstrations against police misconduct and use of excessive force continued throughout the year.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 4 / 4

NGOs generally operate freely. However, in recent years, disclosures of police surveillance of NGOs and political organizations have drawn criticism. A public inquiry into the conduct of undercover officers, which began in 2015, remained in session throughout 2021.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 4 / 4

Workers have the right to organize trade unions, which have traditionally played a central role in the Labour Party. The rights to bargain collectively and strike are also respected.

F. RULE OF LAW: 13 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 4 / 4

The judiciary is generally independent, and governmental authorities comply with judicial decisions. A new Supreme Court began functioning in 2009, improving the separation of powers by moving the highest court out of the House of Lords.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 3 / 4

Due process generally prevails in civil and criminal matters. However, funding for legal aid has been cut several times since 2013, leaving many vulnerable people without access to legal counsel and prompting criticism from rights groups and some figures within the judiciary.

The Coronavirus Act 2020 provided police with new enforcement powers, which have been criticized as disproportionately broad in scope. Many of these powers were phased out in 2021. In July 2020, The Guardian reported that the Metropolitan Police had been disproportionately fining BAME London residents for violating COVID-19 measures.

UK police have also been accused of using stop-and-search powers disproportionately: in 2020–21, Black people in England and Wales were seven times more likely to be searched by police than White people. . Data published by the Home Office in November 2021 shows a 24 percent rise in the use of the controversial policing practice during COVID-19-related lockdowns. The government expanded the stop-and-search powers of the police in July, “permanently relaxing” existing restrictions on the practice. In March, the Independent Office of Police Conduct ordered that the City of London Police reinvestigate an allegation of racial profiling made by a man who had been stopped and searched over 20 times without charge.

The Counter-Terrorism and Security Act 2015 allows authorities to seize the travel documents of individuals attempting to leave the country if they are suspected of planning to engage in terrorist-related activities abroad, and to forcibly relocate terrorism suspects within the country. The Counter-Terrorism and Border Security Act 2019 makes viewing terrorist content online punishable by up to 15 years in prison, and allows law enforcement agencies to keep the fingerprints and DNA of terrorism suspects for up to five years, even if no charges are filed.

The UK justice system still grapples with cases stemming from the Troubles, the 1968–98 conflict over the partition of the island of Ireland. In July 2021, the UK government confirmed that it plans to end all prosecutions linked to the Troubles. The same month, charges against “Soldier F,” who had been accused of murder and attempted murder during the 1972 Bloody Sunday massacre, were dismissed by the Public Prosecution Service (PPS). The government has also declined to open an inquiry into the 1989 murder of Belfast lawyer Pat Finucane, who was allegedly killed by a loyalist organization with the assistance of a soldier and a police informant. In December, the Supreme Court ruled that a 2014 Police Service of Northern Ireland (PSNI) decision not to investigate the alleged state-sanctioned torture of 14 men during the Troubles was “wrong” and “irrational.”

The Covert Human Intelligence Sources (Criminal Conduct) Act, which allows undercover police officers to commit crimes to obtain intelligence, was enacted in March. The so-called “Spy Cops” bill has been strongly criticized by civil rights groups, and a parliamentary human rights committee warned it would allow agents to engage in especially violent activity.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 3 / 4

Individuals living in the UK are largely free from violence, but acts of terrorism did occur in 2021. In October, David Amess, a Conservative MP, was killed in an alleged terrorist attack. The following month, a bombing outside a Liverpool hospital was declared an act of terror.

Northern Ireland saw continued paramilitary activity throughout the year. In March, the PSNI reported 3 security-related deaths, 13 bombing incidents, and 83 terrorism-related arrests in the 2020-21 reporting period. During the same period, 230 households were rehomed due to intimidation from paramilitary groups.

While prisons generally adhere to international guidelines, problems of overcrowding, violence, self-harm, and drugs in prisons have worsened in recent years. In January 2021, it was reported that the use of force by prison staff against prisoners had doubled since 2011. In a July report, Her Majesty’s Inspectorate of Prisons (HMI Prisons) noted that prisoners had been subjected to extended periods of isolation in order to curb the spread of COVID-19, but such measures were being progressively relaxed. Following a freedom-of-information request from The Guardian, the Ministry of Justice revealed in July that over 50 inmates were being held in isolation in “close supervision centers” under conditions that the UN has argued are degrading, inhuman, and illegitimate.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 3 / 4

Foreign residents in the UK have been subject to increasing scrutiny in recent years. Under the ongoing “hostile environment” policy, which aims to persuade undocumented immigrants to voluntarily leave the UK or refrain from immigrating, individuals seeking public and private services face stringent immigration checks.

In a February 2021 report, the Institute for Public Policy Research (IPPR) concluded that immigrants faced heightened racist treatment and poverty due to the policy. A proposed amendment to the new draft of the Nationality and Borders Bill, added in November, would allow the Home Secretary to strip individuals of their British citizenship without notice; rights advocates have expressed concern that BAME individuals would be disproportionately affected by the legislation. In 2020, a parliamentary public accounts committee accused the Home Office of formulating biased immigration policies.

Asylum seekers and migrants can be detained indefinitely, and there have been persistent reports of poor conditions and abuse in immigration detention centers. In July 2021, NGO Bail for Immigration Detainees (BID) criticized the Home Office for keeping asylum seekers, some of whom were torture survivors, in isolation for indefinite periods of time. In February, media outlets reported allegations of sexual harassment and exploitation of asylum seekers in government detention facilities. The High Court ruled in June that the Home Office had unlawfully detained asylum seekers in inadequate and unsafe conditions. In July, the government introduced legislation that would “severely restrict” family reunion rights, which provide a path for minor refugees and asylum seekers to join family members living in the UK.

Though women receive equal treatment under the law, gender discrimination persists in the workplace and elsewhere in society. The authorities actively enforce a 2010 law barring discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation and gender identity. However, the UK has recorded a sustained rise in hate crimes against LGBT+ residents over the past decade. The Home Office recorded more than 17,000 hate crimes against LGBT+ people during the 2020–21 reporting period in England and Wales, a 7 percent increase over the 2019–20 reporting period.

BAME residents face continued discrimination, including by the authorities. Stop-and-search powers are disproportionately used against BAME people; the Metropolitan Police initiated over 228,000 such stops in 2021. In 2020–21, Black people in England and Wales were seven times more likely to be stopped by police than white people.

Members of the Irish Traveller minority community have historically faced discrimination in the UK. In March 2021, the Equality and Human Rights Commission (EHRC) reported that Pontins, a vacation resort chain, had instructed its booking operators to refuse bookings to people with Irish accents or surnames, violating antidiscrimination laws.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 15 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

While UK residents generally enjoy freedom of internal movement, travel was affected by COVID-19-related lockdowns throughout 2021. Though strict lockdowns were imposed in 2020 and early 2021, most restrictions on movement and assembly had been lifted by mid-July 2021. Some restrictions were reintroduced in November in response to the spread of the Omicron variant.

UK passport holders saw their freedom to travel to EU member states lessened when an agreement on the UK's departure from the bloc was reached in December 2020. Since January 2021, visitors from the UK have required a visa for extended travel to EU member states in the Schengen border area.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 4 / 4

Individuals may freely exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 4 / 4

The government generally does not place explicit restrictions on personal social freedoms. Abortion and same-sex marriage were heavily proscribed or prohibited in Northern Ireland until Parliament passed the Northern Ireland (Executive Formation) Act 2019. However, the law has not been fully implemented, and abortion services remained largely unavailable in Northern Ireland during 2021.

The Office for National Statistics (ONS) reports that nearly a third of English and Welsh women between the ages of 16 and 59 have experienced domestic abuse. Domestic violence increased during COVID-19-related lockdowns, with police data showing that two-thirds of women in abusive relationships experienced more violence during the first national lockdown. Fewer than one in 60 cases of rape reported to the police in 2020 resulted in charges being filed.

A 2016 report by a government commission expressed concern about the social and economic isolation of many members of ethnic and religious minorities, and of the poor. According to the ONS, income inequality rose to 34.6 percent in 2020.

The Modern Slavery Act 2015 increased punishments for human traffickers and provides greater protections for victims, but implementation has been weak. Children and migrant workers are among those most vulnerable to forced labor and sex trafficking. In an April 2021 report, the Modern Slavery and Exploitation helpline reported that a significant increase in cases of sexual and criminal exploitation had occurred during the COVID-19 pandemic.

UK workers have encountered unsafe and exploitative conditions during the COVID-19 pandemic. Allegations of worker exploitation in the Leicester garment industry persisted in 2021.

United States

Population: 332,300,000

Capital: Washington, DC

Freedom Status: Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: The United States is a federal republic whose people benefit from a vibrant political system, a strong rule-of-law tradition, robust freedoms of expression and religious belief, and a wide array of other civil liberties. However, in recent years its democratic institutions have suffered erosion, as reflected in rising political polarization and extremism, partisan pressure on the electoral process, bias and dysfunction in the criminal justice system, harmful policies on immigration and asylum seekers, and growing disparities in wealth, economic opportunity, and political influence.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- The transfer of power from the administration of President Donald Trump to that of President Joseph Biden in January was seriously threatened by a series of anti-democratic actions intended to thwart it. Although Trump's claims of fraud in the November 2020 presidential election had been consistently rejected by electoral officials from both parties and by the courts, he and some of his political allies in the administration, in Congress, and at the state and local levels sought to misuse various authorities and procedural tools to overturn the election results. They also attempted to apply pressure by mobilizing Trump's supporters, and on January 6, the final step in the confirmation of the results by Congress was violently disrupted when a mob marched from a rally outside the White House and broke into the US Capitol building. Congress reconvened hours later and completed its count of the Electoral College ballots, and Biden's inauguration proceeded without incident on January 20. However, Trump's false assertions about large-scale fraud continued to pervade Republican Party discourse throughout the year, leading to intraparty tensions and the threat of political marginalization for Republicans who vocally rejected the claims.
 - A number of state laws on this and other topics sparked controversy during the year. At least 19 states, nearly all controlled by Republicans, passed problematic electoral laws that made voting more difficult, in some cases raising the risk of greater partisan interference in election management, vote counting, and certification. Separately, at least a dozen Republican-led states imposed binding restrictions on content related to race or gender in public school or university settings, and a Texas law banning most abortions after six weeks of pregnancy took effect in September. Unlike with similar restrictions in other states, the Supreme Court allowed the Texas law to enter into force while challenges to its unusual citizen-enforcement mechanism proceeded through the lower courts.

- Criminal cases stemming from widely publicized police killings of Black civilians continued to make their way through the courts in 2021. In April, former officer Derek Chauvin was convicted on several counts including second-degree murder for the May 2020 killing of George Floyd in Minnesota, which had galvanized nationwide protests against racial injustice that year. Chauvin was sentenced in June to 22 years and six months in prison.
- The COVID-19 pandemic continued to sweep the country, causing a two-year total of more than 825,000 deaths and 55 million confirmed cases. A significant level of public resistance to vaccination—encouraged by misinformation from some influential political and cultural figures—contributed to persistently high numbers of infections and deaths overall. The Biden administration promoted accurate information and voluntary vaccination throughout the year, but in September it also announced a rule requiring vaccinations for employees at large businesses across the country; a legal challenge of the mandate was pending at year's end.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 32 / 40A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 10 / 12*A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 3 / 4

The president, who serves as both head of state and head of government, is elected for up to two four-year terms. Presidential elections are decided by an Electoral College, with electors apportioned to each state based on the size of its congressional representation. In most cases, all of the electors in a particular state cast their ballots for the candidate who won the statewide popular vote, regardless of the margin. Two states, Maine and Nebraska, have chosen to divide their electoral votes between the candidates based on their popular-vote performance in each congressional district. The Electoral College makes it possible for a candidate to win the presidency while losing the national popular vote, an outcome that took place in the presidential elections of 2000 and 2016.

In the 2020 election, Biden won 306 Electoral College votes, leaving Trump with 232, and Biden defeated Trump by more than seven million votes, or approximately 4.4 percentage points, in the national popular balloting. Turnout was the highest recorded in more than a century, with roughly two-thirds of the eligible population casting a ballot.

The COVID-19 pandemic compelled many states to increase access to early and mail-in voting, partly to help prevent dangerous crowding at polling sites. This led to a series of legal battles, with the Trump campaign and other Republican litigants generally arguing against the changes and claiming that they would open the door to fraud. The balloting itself unfolded with few significant disruptions, though existing obstacles to voting—such as strict voter-identification requirements and inadequate numbers of polling sites—remained a factor, with long lines exacerbated by both the high turnout and pandemic-related shortages of poll workers.

The federal government assisted states in their efforts to safeguard ballots and computer networks against foreign and other illegal interference, while social media companies, which had been criticized for failing to prevent foreign actors from using their platforms to fraudulently influence the political process in the past, made greater efforts to thwart disinformation campaigns. These measures were deemed successful in many respects: despite some reported attempts by foreign actors to hack voting infrastructure and spread disinformation on social media, there was little evidence that they had a meaningful impact.

Rejecting a vote-tabulation process that was lauded by observers as transparent and professional, Trump refused to concede defeat and demanded a halt to the count in states where the late tally favored Biden. In the weeks after the election, Trump continued to allege fraud and openly pressured election officials, particularly Republicans, in pivotal states to make decisions that would support his claims regardless of the facts and the law. During the counting and certification process, state election workers reported intimidation and death threats. A raft of lawsuits by the Trump campaign and its allies—alleging wide-ranging misconduct, challenging the legality of various electoral rules, and seeking to block states from certifying Biden's victory—were almost universally dismissed by state and federal courts. Evidence of large-scale fraud was nonexistent, but the Trump camp's disinformation, complemented by the reluctance of leading Republicans to explicitly acknowledge Biden as the president-elect, helped to convince many Trump supporters that voter fraud was widespread and Biden was not the rightful winner.

New revelations later emerged regarding last-ditch efforts to overturn the results, including machinations by the outgoing president and allied officials or lawyers to involve the Justice Department and other government agencies in supporting Trump's fraud claims, a memorandum by a Trump lawyer arguing that then vice president Mike Pence had the authority to stop Congress from completing the Electoral College vote count, and related attempts by the Trump campaign and Republican Party activists to put forward illegitimate pro-Trump slates of electors in states that Biden won.

Trump administration officials and allies also encouraged resistance to Biden's victory from voters and citizen groups, coordinating with a range of supporters to disseminate disinformation and promote "Stop the Steal" rallies. This activity peaked on January 6, 2021, when several thousand Trump supporters assembled near the White House for a "Save America" rally. Following incitement by Trump and other speakers, the crowd converged on the US Capitol as the counting of the Electoral College ballots proceeded. Upon encountering an inadequate deployment of police, the group turned violent, using both concealed and improvised weapons to break through barricades, assault police officers, and forcibly enter the Capitol, where scores of intruders searched for lawmakers, vandalized offices, and occupied the Senate chamber as members were evacuated. The group was dispersed after several hours, following the delayed arrival of the National Guard. In all, seven people died in connection with the attack, including a policeman who suffered strokes after clashing with the mob and a rioter who was shot by police near the House chamber. Nearly 140 police officers were injured, as were scores of civilians. By year's end, approximately 700 people had been arrested on a range of charges, though no trials had been completed, and it remained unclear whether charges would eventually extend to Trump or his more prominent allies.

Among Republicans, a divide emerged in the weeks after the election between state officials involved in administering the balloting, who generally defended the fairness of the process and the accuracy of the results, and many members of Congress, who gave credence to Trump's claims and cast doubt on Biden's victory. When Congress reconvened to complete the Electoral College count on the night of January 6–7, just eight senators lodged objections to state results, but 139 of the 211 Republicans in the House of Representatives at the time supported baseless objections to the count in at least one state.

The events of January 6 prompted several institutional responses. The following week, the House voted to impeach Trump on the charge of incitement of insurrection, with 10

Republicans joining all Democrats to approve the measure. The Senate trial concluded in February with Trump's acquittal, as only 57 of the required 67 senators, including seven Republicans, voted to convict. In July, a House select committee was formed to investigate the January 6 attack; Democrats had initially sought to form an independent commission of outside experts, but most Senate Republicans voted to block that effort. The select committee, which only two Republican House members agreed to join, defined its mandate broadly, aiming to clarify both the events of January 6 and the wider efforts to overturn the election results. By year's end, the committee had interviewed scores of witnesses and issued an array of subpoenas for documents and testimony by Trump administration officials and allies. Republican critics derided the investigation as a partisan smear campaign, and Trump instructed his allies to refuse cooperation on the basis of executive privilege, leading to court challenges that remained underway at year's end.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

Elections for the bicameral Congress are generally free and competitive. The House of Representatives consists of 435 members serving two-year terms. The Senate consists of 100 members—two from each of the 50 states—serving six-year terms, with one-third coming up for election every two years. All national legislators are elected directly by voters in the districts or states that they represent.

The capital district, Puerto Rico, and four overseas US territories are each represented by an elected delegate in the House who can perform most legislative functions but cannot participate in floor votes.

Following the 2020 elections, the Republican Party retained control of 50 Senate seats, a loss of one. After winning two Senate seats in runoff elections in Georgia in January 2021, Democrats held 48 Senate seats, and there were two independent senators who generally vote with the Democrats, giving Democrats control of the chamber via the tie-breaking vote of Vice President Kamala Harris. In the House, the Democratic majority was reduced to 223, while the number of Republicans rose to 212.

Unlike in 2018, when the election in a North Carolina House district was nullified on grounds of fraud committed by the Republican side, there were no serious accusations of result-altering fraud in any race in 2020. Republican lawmakers who supported Trump's objections to the presidential results did not question the validity of the concurrent congressional elections.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 3 / 4

The electoral framework is generally fair, though it is subject to partisan manipulation. The borders of House districts, which must remain roughly equal in population, are redrawn regularly—typically after each decennial census. In the practice known as partisan gerrymandering, House districts, and those for state legislatures, are crafted to maximize the advantage of the party in power in a given state. The redistricting system varies by state, but in most cases it is overseen by elected officials, and observers have expressed alarm at the growing strategic and technical sophistication of partisan efforts to control redistricting processes and redraw maps. Historically, gerrymandering has also been used as a tool of racial disenfranchisement, specifically targeting Black voters, as well as Hispanic and Native American populations. The Voting Rights Act (VRA) of 1965 generally prohibits racially discriminatory voting rules, and racial gerrymandering is subject to reversal by federal courts, but it remains a problem in practice, in large part because partisan gerrymandering efforts tend to identify Black voters and other members of racial and ethnic minority groups as likely supporters of the Democratic Party.

In 2019 the Supreme Court ruled that the federal judiciary has no authority to prevent politicians from drawing districts to preserve or expand their party's power. However, some state courts have struck down partisan-gerrymandered maps based on their own constitutions, and state-level reforms have begun to address the issue, with a handful of states establishing independent bodies to manage redistricting in recent years. Following the finalization of the 2020 census results and corresponding reapportionment, states began redistricting efforts in 2021, setting the stage for legal disputes over gerrymandered maps ahead of the 2022 midterm elections. Although both major parties continued to engage in partisan gerrymandering, Republicans had greater opportunity to redraw state-level maps because they controlled more state legislatures. Democrats in Congress proposed legislation aimed at ending the practice for House districts.

Some states have adopted strict voter-identification laws. These documentation requirements can disproportionately limit participation by poor, elderly, or racial minority voters; people with disabilities; and university students. Proponents of such laws argue that they prevent voter fraud, despite research showing that fraud is extremely rare. Separately, reductions in the number of polling places in several states in recent years are thought to have suppressed turnout by groups such as low-income hourly workers, who are less able to travel to distant polling locations or wait in long lines. Restrictions on voter identification and access to polling places tend to affect demographic groups that are seen as likely to support Democratic candidates, and they are typically adopted by Republican state lawmakers. Some of these obstacles may have had less effect in 2020, in part because the requirements for voting by mail were eased in most states and localities. At the same time, COVID-19 contributed to shortages of poll workers and changes to polling locations, and long lines remained a problem.

Trump's refusal to acknowledge the legitimacy of his defeat and his promotion of false fraud claims spurred a new wave of state electoral legislation during 2021, with sponsors arguing that the changes were needed to prevent any repetition of the supposed malfeasance in 2020. By December, 19 states—nearly all with Republican-controlled legislatures—had passed 34 new laws that restricted access to voting, with provisions including stricter voter-identification requirements; reduced eligibility for mail-in ballots; and limits on interactions at polling places, such as a ban on offering water to voters waiting in line. Some Republican state legislatures also introduced bills that, according to their opponents, could be used to facilitate the partisan subversion of legitimate electoral outcomes in the future, for instance by concentrating election management authority in the hands of state lawmakers or their appointees rather than local officials, or by empowering partisan poll watchers in ways that could disrupt the ballot-counting process. At the same time, prominent Trump allies encouraged vote-fraud conspiracists to run for local-level posts involved with election administration. Separately, many federal lawmakers, including Democrats and some leading Republicans, emphasized the need to reform the Electoral Count Act, an 1887 law governing congressional validation of the Electoral College votes from the states. The act's ambiguous language was widely criticized for allowing spurious objections to the 2020 results and creating opportunities for a much worse constitutional crisis than ultimately occurred.

Critics have argued that some components of the US constitution are undemocratic because they violate the principle that each citizen's vote should carry equal weight. For example, the allocation of two Senate seats to each state regardless of size has meant that senators representing a minority of the population are often able to control the chamber. Because the Electoral College allocates votes to the states based on the size of their congressional delegations, it too is affected by the makeup of the Senate. Defenders of these systems argue that they are fundamental to the United States' constitutional tradition and federal structure, in which the states enjoy a substantial degree of autonomy.

The six-member Federal Election Commission (FEC) is tasked with enforcing federal campaign finance laws, but vacancies on the panel meant that it lacked a quorum during nearly the entirety of the 2020 campaign. While a quorum was restored in December 2020, partisan deadlock impeded the commission's work throughout 2021. Also during the year, Democratic lawmakers advanced but were unable to pass an electoral reform package that included a restructuring of the FEC and measures to strengthen enforcement of campaign finance rules.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 13 / 16 (-1)

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 4 / 4

The intensely competitive US political environment is dominated by two major parties: the Republicans on the right and the left-leaning Democrats. The country's prevailing "first past the post" or majoritarian electoral system discourages the emergence of additional parties, as do a number of specific legal and practical hurdles. The two parties' primary elections allow for a broad array of views and candidates to enter the political system, although those in many states exclude unaffiliated voters from this important stage of the electoral process. The 2020 primaries and general elections featured participation by ideologically diverse candidates across the country; a similar pattern characterized balloting in the set of states and localities that held elections during 2021.

For the many seats at all levels that are regarded as "safely" Democratic or Republican, due to a combination of partisan gerrymandering and geographical sorting, primaries often represent the main battleground for opposing views. Republican incumbents, especially in the House, have faced sharp competition from more right-wing, sometimes Trump-backed challengers in recent voting cycles, and left-wing Democrats—many of them aligned with or endorsed by the Democratic Socialists of America—challenged a number of moderate, party-backed candidates in 2020. In 2021, early primary challenges were announced against the handful of House Republicans who voted for Trump's impeachment in January; these and other Republican officeholders who vocally criticized Trump's election-fraud claims or his role in the events of January 6 also faced threats and intimidation and were marginalized within the party, as illustrated by the May ouster of Representative Liz Cheney from her position in the House Republican leadership.

Independent or third-party candidates have sometimes influenced presidential races or won statewide office, and small parties and ideological factions—such as the Libertarian Party, the Green Party, and the Democratic Socialists of America—have also modestly affected state and local politics in recent years. Several jurisdictions, including Maine and New York City, have adopted ranked-choice voting systems for some posts, which could prove more hospitable to third parties than the majoritarian system, though in practice the results matched those of the traditional plurality system in key races in 2020 and 2021.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 4 / 4

Power changes hands regularly at the federal level, and while certain states and localities are seen as strongholds of one party or the other, even they are subject to intraparty competition and interparty power transfers over time. Gubernatorial elections held in November 2021 in Virginia and New Jersey featured a strong shift toward Republicans relative to the 2020 presidential tally in each state, leading to a victory for the Republican candidate in previously Democrat-led Virginia. The elections left Democrats with 22 state governorships, while Republicans held 28; Republicans maintained control over a majority of state legislatures. In several states, including North Carolina in 2016 and Wisconsin in 2018, outgoing Republican-led legislatures have stripped powers from executive offices that had just been captured by Democrats.

President Trump's efforts to overturn his loss to Biden in 2020 and early 2021 put extreme pressure on the political and electoral systems, eroding the long-standing tradition of respect for official results and highlighting potential structural weaknesses that could be exploited by future candidates. These efforts were ultimately unsuccessful, with Republican officials in the targeted states generally adhering to their legal duties, and transfers of power below the presidential level proceeded without similar contestation. However, some of the legal changes in Republican-controlled states in 2021—and the lack of reform at the federal level during the year—raised concern that transfers of power after the 2022 or 2024 elections could be disrupted.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 2 / 4 (-1)

Various interest groups have come to play a potent role in the nominating process for president and members of Congress, partly because the expense and length of political campaigns place a premium on candidates' ability to raise large amounts of funds from major donors, especially at the early stages of a race. While there have been a number of attempts to restrict the role of money in political campaigning, most have been thwarted or watered down as a result of political opposition, lobbying by interest groups, and court decisions that equate political donations with free speech.

The 2020 election campaigns were by far the most expensive ever. As with other recent campaigns, much of the spending was routed through various types of "super PACs" (political action committees), nonprofit organizations, and other legal entities that tend to protect donor anonymity and carry few restrictions on the size and source of donations. Small donations made up an important share of candidates' fundraising, but extremely wealthy contributors played an outsized role in overall spending. Expenditures did not always correlate with electoral success: Democratic Senate candidates challenging Republican incumbents in states such as Kentucky, Iowa, Maine, and South Carolina were defeated despite far outspending their opponents.

Concerns about undue influence have also focused on lobbyists and other figures working for foreign governments who associate themselves with political campaigns. A Justice Department probe into foreign interference with the 2016 presidential election uncovered a number of cases of undisclosed consultant work for foreign powers and led to increased enforcement of the Foreign Agents Registration Act (FARA). Proposals to strengthen the law were introduced in Congress in 2021 and remained pending at year's end.

The January 6 attack on Congress underscored a broader rise in violence and intimidation as a tool of political influence in the United States. Numerous known affiliates of right-wing extremist groups participated in the attack, and many Republicans and far-right media figures later sought to recast it as a patriotic protest or a defense of election integrity. The documented participation of military veterans in the violence prompted the Defense Department to order a broad review of measures necessary to minimize extremist behavior among active-duty troops. Meanwhile, reports of threats against elected officials proliferated during the year, continuing a pattern from 2020 and contributing to a related increase in local election administrators who stated that they were considering resigning.

Score Change: The score declined from 3 to 2 due to the January 6 assault on the Capitol, in which Trump supporters violently attempted to prevent Congress's formal confirmation of the presidential election results, as well as a broader increase in threats and intimidation aimed at politicians and election officials across the country.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 3 / 4

A number of important laws are designed to ensure the political rights of members of racial and ethnic minority groups, and the 2020 elections featured increased participation as candidates by women and representatives of such groups. The Congress elected in 2020 included the first openly gay Black House members and record or near-record numbers of Black, Hispanic, Native American, Asian American and Pacific Islander, LGBT+, and women lawmakers. Kamala Harris, whose mother and father were Indian and Jamaican immigrants, respectively, became the first Black American, the first Asian American, and the first woman to win election as vice president. Nevertheless, White Americans and men have remained highly overrepresented in Congress, in state legislatures, and in senior policymaking positions.

Racial and ethnic minority communities are disproportionately affected by laws and policies that create obstacles to voting and winning elected office. In 2013 the Supreme Court invalidated portions of the VRA of 1965, allowing certain states that previously had to submit legal changes for preclearance by federal authorities to adopt election laws without prior review. In the years since, in addition to adopting voter-identification requirements and limiting polling locations, a number of states—including some that were never subject to the preclearance rule—have partially rolled back innovations like early voting that contributed to higher rates of participation among minority groups. In June 2021, the Supreme Court upheld restrictive Arizona rules against a VRA challenge, signaling a further weakening of the VRA as a safeguard against discriminatory state laws. Throughout 2021, Democrats in Congress advanced proposals intended to address both the Supreme Court decisions and the raft of voting restrictions passed in recent years at the state level, but Senate Republicans used procedural tactics to block the legislation. Separately, the Justice Department filed lawsuits challenging the laws passed in some states.

Various other state election-management policies have been criticized for having a disparate impact on racial and ethnic minority communities, including voter-roll purges and arbitrary bureaucratic hurdles to registration. Partisan state-level redistricting processes in 2021 also prompted complaints in North Carolina, Georgia, Ohio, and other states that the power of Black voters and elected officials was being diluted.

State laws that deny voting rights to citizens with felony convictions continue to disproportionately disenfranchise Black Americans, who are incarcerated at significantly higher rates than other populations. All but two states suspend voting rights during incarceration for felonies; a growing number of states have eased restrictions on voting rights after incarceration or during probation and parole, but the issue remains controversial. Overall, researchers estimated that more than five million people remained disenfranchised for the 2020 elections due to felony convictions.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 9 / 12 (+1)

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 3 / 4

The president and Congress are generally empowered to determine government policies and craft legislation. However, partisan polarization and obstruction in Congress has repeatedly delayed appropriations bills in recent years, resulting in a series of partial shutdowns of federal government operations, most recently in 2018–19. While no such shutdowns occurred in 2021, the country narrowly avoided a spending and debt crisis in December when some Senate Republicans agreed to a short-term spending bill and allowed a party-line vote to lift the cap on federal debt.

Congress's ability to serve as a check on potential abuses by the executive was challenged during the Trump administration. After Democrats gained a majority in the House of Representatives in the 2018 elections, the administration frequently clashed with Congress in ways that undermined the legislature's constitutional authority. For example, in 2019 Trump's irregular obstruction of appropriated military aid to Ukraine and his orders to defy congressional subpoenas led to an impeachment process that ultimately failed to remove the president in early 2020. For the remainder of that year, the administration continued its refusal to comply with a host of congressional reporting requirements, information requests, and subpoenas on various oversight matters. Proposed reforms meant to address these problems by strengthening Congress's oversight powers had yet to win passage in 2021.

The Trump administration consistently left large numbers of vacant positions across the higher levels of government departments and agencies, undercutting Congress's authority to confirm such appointees and making it difficult or impossible for the agencies to operate as intended by law. Following the November 2020 elections, executive branch functions and continuity were hindered when the outgoing administration—as part of its groundless contestation of the election results—broke precedent by hampering cooperation with incoming Biden administration officials. Throughout 2021, Republicans in the Senate effectively slowed the confirmation of Biden's executive branch nominees, leaving the pace of appointments slightly ahead of the Trump administration's in its first year but far behind the previous two administrations.

The United States benefits from strong safeguards against official corruption, including a traditionally independent law enforcement system, a free and vigorous press, and an active civil society sector. A variety of regulations and oversight institutions within government are designed to curb conflicts of interest and prevent other situations that could lead to malfeasance.

Beginning in 2017, however, the Trump administration presented a number of challenges to existing norms of government ethics and probity. Anticorruption watchdogs criticized President Trump for shifting management of his real-estate development empire to his children rather than divesting ownership or establishing a stronger structural barrier between himself and his businesses. The president, his staff, and special interest groups of foreign and domestic origin all frequently visited and held events at Trump-branded properties in the United States throughout his term in office, generating publicity and millions of dollars in revenue. The Trump administration also notably undercut conflict-of-interest restrictions for other White House and executive branch appointees. Although the president issued an executive order in 2017 that limited appointees' ability to shift to lobbying work after leaving government, many Trump nominees received waivers, and journalistic and congressional investigations routinely found conflicts of interest and other ethical violations among nominees and appointees.

Whistleblowers faced extreme pressure during the Trump administration. The Central Intelligence Agency official who filed a complaint that touched off the Ukraine-related impeachment inquiry in 2019 was forced into protective surveillance amid threats of violence. Following his February 2020 acquittal in the Senate, President Trump fired or forced the resignation of several officials who offered inculpatory testimony during the House impeachment process.

In 2021, lawmakers advanced a number of bills meant to address the gaps in ethics rules that were exploited by members of the Trump administration, but these legislative reforms had yet to pass at year's end. The Biden administration issued an executive order in January that strengthened some ethics rules in the executive branch, and watchdog groups described efforts to limit cabinet members' conflicts of interest as effective, though critics continued to highlight ethics questions involving Biden's son Hunter. Separately, the House ethics committee released a report in October that denounced campaign finance practices and stock trades by four members of Congress, and investigations continued through the end of the year.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 3 / 4 (+1)

The United States was the first country to adopt a Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) over 50 years ago, and the law is actively used by journalists, civil society groups, researchers, and members of the public. A 2016 reform law was designed to improve government agencies' responsiveness to FOIA requests, and reporters and activists were able to use FOIA filings to obtain important documents on the Trump administration that congressional investigators could not access through normal oversight requests or subpoenas. Nevertheless, government performance on FOIA requests declined during Trump's presidency, and in 2020 the coronavirus-induced transition to remote work by government employees produced a sharp drop in responsiveness to information requests at the federal, state, and local levels, though complaints about delays diminished somewhat in 2021.

Lack of transparency characterized multiple facets of the Trump administration. The president and his aides frequently made statements that were either misleading or untrue, and typically failed to correct the record when such statements were challenged by the press and others. The administration operated with greater opacity than its immediate predecessors, for example by making policy and other decisions without meaningful input from relevant agencies and their career civil servants, and removing information on certain issues—such as climate change—from government websites. It also intruded on technical matters like the decennial census for political reasons, threatening the accuracy of data used for a wide variety of governance purposes. Throughout 2020, Trump and a number of his aides consistently promoted false and misleading information about COVID-19, and political appointees in the administration interfered with the analysis and recommendations of federal public health professionals, seeking to control data collection and official guidance. Such practices were echoed by some likeminded governments at the state and local levels.

After taking office in 2021, the Biden administration sought to combat misinformation and provide accurate public health data, emphasizing the safety and efficacy of COVID-19 vaccines in particular. It also returned to the traditional practice of holding formal daily press briefings, which the Trump administration had often dispensed with in favor of irregular, ad hoc appearances by the president.

The executive branch includes a substantial number of auditing and investigative agencies that are independent of political influence; such bodies are often spurred to action by the investigative work of journalists. In 2020, Trump arbitrarily fired or replaced a series of agency inspectors general who had documented or investigated malfeasance by administration officials. Legislative proposals to reinforce the authority and independence of inspectors general and ensure government transparency more broadly were under consideration in Congress during 2021.

Score Change: The score improved from 2 to 3 because the Biden administration did not repeat its predecessor's promotion of false and misleading information about COVID-19 or attempt to interfere with expert analysis and recommendations on health and other matters, though a number of deficiencies in transparency safeguards that were exposed by the Trump administration had not been remedied at year's end.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 51 / 60D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 14 / 16 (-1)*D1. Are there free and independent media? 3 / 4

The United States has a free and diverse press, operating under some of the strongest constitutional protections in the world. The media environment retains a high degree of pluralism, with newspapers, newsmagazines, traditional broadcasters, cable television networks, and news websites competing for readers and audiences. Internet access is widespread and unrestricted. While many larger outlets have prospered, however, independent local sources of news have struggled to keep up with technology-driven changes in news consumption and advertising, contributing to significant ownership consolidation in some sectors, and a number of communities with just one or no local news outlet.

News coverage has also grown more polarized, with certain outlets and their star commentators providing a consistently right- or left-leaning perspective. Although the mainstream media have continued to provide strong and independent coverage of national politics despite increased hostility from political figures in recent years, some outlets' editorial policies effectively shifted to the left as they were drawn into adversarial relationships with the Trump presidency. The highly influential cable network Fox News has been unique, however, in its close alignment with the Republican Party in general and former president Trump in particular; several prominent on-air personalities and executives migrated to government jobs under Trump's administration, and key hosts openly endorsed Republican candidates or participated in campaign rallies. Following the 2020 elections, Fox News joined other networks in calling the presidential race for Biden, prompting Trump to denigrate the outlet and direct his followers to smaller, more extreme alternatives. In 2021, Fox News returned to favorable coverage of Trump, his false claims about the fairness of the 2020 election, and various conspiracy theories about the January 6 riot.

Although the government's rhetorical hostility toward the press declined markedly under the new administration in 2021, the potential for government intrusion on the work of journalists remained a concern. In July, Attorney General Merrick Garland issued new rules barring the Justice Department—with narrow exceptions—from seizing the records of journalists or requiring their testimony in order to identify confidential sources as part of leak investigations. The move came in response to revelations that the department under Trump had secretly sought or obtained the records of journalists from multiple news outlets while investigating leaks. Separately, it was reported in December that, according to the Department of Homeland Security's inspector general, a Customs and Border Protection unit had freely used government databases in previous years to investigate journalists as well as politicians, congressional staff, and others. The unit was under review at year's end.

A growing number of Americans look to social media and other online sources for political news, increasing their exposure to disinformation and propagandistic content of both foreign and domestic origin. The larger platforms have struggled to control false or hateful material without harming freedom of expression or their own business interests, though they have engaged in mass removals of far-right and foreign accounts that are used to spread disinformation. Following the January 6 attack, the perceived risk of further incitement of violence by Trump prompted Twitter to ban his account, and Facebook and YouTube imposed indefinite suspensions; in July Trump filed a lawsuit against the three companies, alleging violations of his constitutional right to free speech. Facebook came under significant scrutiny in 2021 from members of both political parties, with Republicans alleging censorship of accounts featuring conservative perspectives and Democrats assailing executives over their reported reluctance to vigorously combat conspiracy theories about the 2020 election and the COVID-19 vaccines. The Republican-led states of Florida and Texas adopted laws that aimed to restrict social media platforms' ability to moderate content, though enforcement of both measures was blocked pending judicial review.

While violence against journalists in the United States has been rare in recent decades, media watchdog groups registered widespread press freedom violations—including police violence and arbitrary arrests targeting journalists—in the context of the nationwide protests sparked by the police killing of George Floyd, a Black civilian, in Minnesota in May 2020. According to the US Press Freedom Tracker, a joint project of multiple nongovernmental organizations (NGOs), the number of violations declined sharply in 2021, falling to 59 arrests or detentions of journalists and 142 assaults on journalists, from 123 arrests and 334 assaults recorded during 2020. The latest incidents occurred during political protests, rallies against vaccine mandates, and a variety of other reporting assignments. Despite the decline from 2020, the 2021 figures still represented a sharp uptick compared with the 9 arrests and roughly 40 assaults documented for 2019.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 4 / 4

The United States has a long tradition of religious freedom. The constitution protects the free exercise of religion while barring any official endorsement of a religious faith, and there are no direct government subsidies to houses of worship. The debate over the role of religion in public life is ongoing, however, and religious groups often mobilize to influence political discussions on the diverse issues in which they take an interest. The Supreme Court regularly adjudicates difficult cases involving the relationship between religion and the state.

In 2020, multiple state and local governments imposed restrictions on the size of religious gatherings to slow the spread of the coronavirus, prompting legal challenges. The Supreme Court, faced with differing details, issued somewhat conflicting rulings on the subject, but a series of rulings in 2021 confirmed a pattern in which the justices curbed state restrictions on religious assemblies.

Hate crimes based on religion are generally prosecuted vigorously by law enforcement authorities. Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) statistics for 2020, released in October 2021, showed a decrease of some 15 percent in such crimes from 2019; incidents involving Jewish targets constituted over 56 percent of the year's religion-based hate crimes. Anti-Muslim crimes were the next most common, and Christian churches with predominantly Black congregations have also experienced attacks in recent years.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 3 / 4 (-1)

The academic sphere has long featured a high level of intellectual freedom. While it remains quite robust by global standards, this liberty has come under pressure from both ends of the political spectrum. University faculty have reported instances of professional repercussions or harassment—including on social media—related to curriculum content, textbooks, or statements that some students strongly disagreed with. As a consequence, some professors have engaged in self-censorship. Students on a number of campuses have obstructed guest speakers whose views they find objectionable. In the most highly publicized cases, students and nonstudent activists have physically prevented presentations by controversial speakers, especially those known for their views on race, gender, immigration, Middle East politics, and other sensitive issues.

On most university campuses and in some other educational settings, such pressures came largely from the progressive left, but social and political forces on the right have increasingly applied pressure of their own in recent years. The Trump administration in 2020 ordered recipients of federal funds, including universities, to avoid diversity training that includes “divisive concepts” related to racism and sexism, prompting expressions of concern regarding impingements on academic freedom from numerous university administrators. A federal judge blocked implementation of the order, but in 2021 state-level officials initiated a wave of similar legislation pertaining to both universities and public schools. These efforts were especially focused on restricting the teaching of “critical race theory” (CRT), an academic framework for examining a variety of issues including structural racism. According to PEN America, lawmakers in at least a dozen states had adopted “educational gag orders” restricting the forms and substance of classroom race discussions by year’s end, and additional bills were under consideration in numerous other jurisdictions. Moreover, educators and administrators concerned about accreditation, legal liability, and parental anger were reportedly acting preemptively to eliminate or alter courses and remove previously well-regarded texts from school libraries.

These debates took place against the backdrop of a sharp rise in threats and intimidation aimed at school officials, as parents—and in some cases, members of far-right groups—voiced their anger at pandemic-related school closures, mask mandates, and the content of classroom lessons, leading the Justice Department to announce the formation of a task force to protect school personnel in October.

Score Change: The score declined from 4 to 3 due to a multiyear rise in pressure on educators and educational institutions, including the obstruction of on-campus speech that some find objectionable, attempts to dismiss or punish scholars for their views or work, efforts to limit student access to certain books, and a series of government restrictions and citizen threats related to the classroom discussion of race and other controversial topics.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 4 / 4

Americans are generally free to engage in private discussion and air their personal views in public settings, including on the internet, though there are a number of threats to this freedom.

Civil libertarians, many lawmakers, and other observers have pointed to the real and potential effects of the collection of communications data and other forms of intelligence-related monitoring on the rights of US residents, despite the adoption of significant reforms since such activities surged following the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001. Separately, surveillance programs run by federal and local law enforcement agencies have long raised concerns among civil liberties groups, due in part to allegations of a disproportionate focus on religious, racial, and ethnic minority communities. A growing number of law enforcement and other government agencies are monitoring public social media content, with targets including applicants for US visas and participants in protests.

A public debate about law enforcement access to encrypted communication services continues, with some officials warning that their technical inability to break encryption even with a judicial warrant posed a threat to the rule of law, and opponents arguing that any weakening of encrypted services' security would expose all users to criminal hacking and other ill effects.

Aside from concerns about government surveillance, internet users in the United States have faced problems such as aggressive disinformation efforts, intimidation, and frequently sexualized harassment on social media that may deter them from engaging in online discussion and expressing their views freely.

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4 (+1)

In general, officials respect the constitutional right to public assembly. Demonstrations on political and other topics are common and typically proceed without incident, though local authorities often place restrictions on the location or duration of large protests. Since 2017, legislative initiatives aiming to criminalize or stiffen penalties for certain forms of protest, or to shield perpetrators of violence against protesters from legal liability, have been proposed in most states. Such legislation was adopted in at least nine states during 2021, including laws in Oklahoma and Iowa that would partially shield drivers from liability for hitting protesters with their vehicles.

In recent years, large protests and aggressive law enforcement responses have been sparked by highly publicized police killings of Black civilians, many of which were recorded on video. In May 2020, outrage over the killing of George Floyd by police in Minneapolis inspired one of the largest waves of protests in US history. Under the banner of the decentralized Black Lives Matter (BLM) movement, marches occurred in hundreds of cities and smaller communities. Estimated participation in May and June of that year ranged from 15 to 26 million people. An overwhelming majority of the protests were peaceful, but in some settings they were accompanied by violence against police and significant damage to public and private property. Aggressive police tactics often contributed to violent episodes, and hundreds of instances of unprovoked or disproportionate police violence were documented on video.

The Trump administration and its political allies frequently denounced the BLM movement and offered unqualified support to police, downplaying the extent of police violence. The president threatened to deploy active-duty military units in cities experiencing unrest, and federal law enforcement agents were accused of applying excessive force in June 2020 in Washington, DC, and using abusive and inflammatory tactics during a series of protests in Portland, Oregon.

Police violence against protesters rarely results in accountability, including in cases of apparent abuse caught on camera during the 2020 protests. Observers that year also noted that police often exercised greater restraint toward anti-BLM counterprotesters and participants in separate demonstrations against COVID-19-related restrictions, many of whom were armed and displayed far-right or White supremacist symbols.

With the exception of the January 6 attack, conditions surrounding mass assemblies were generally more peaceful in 2021. Unlike in 2020, there were few prominent examples of people being killed in confrontations involving armed protesters, counterprotesters, or vigilantes, though repercussions from events in 2020 continued: in November, a teenager who killed two people near an August 2020 protest in Wisconsin was acquitted on all charges after arguing self-defense.

Score Change: The score improved from 3 to 4 because the surge in civilian violence and police abuses that accompanied a subset of the protests against racial injustice in 2020 largely subsided during 2021, though accountability for the previous year's violations reportedly remained lacking.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 4 / 4

US laws and practices give wide freedom to NGOs and activists to pursue their civic or policy agendas, including those that directly oppose government policies. Organizations committed to the protection of civil liberties, immigrants' rights, equality for women and minority groups, and freedom of speech became more active during the Trump administration and remained so in 2021, mounting campaigns and filing lawsuits to block government actions that they considered harmful. A number of privately supported projects have also been established in recent years to address deficiencies in the electoral and criminal justice systems.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 3 / 4

Federal law generally guarantees trade unions the right to organize and engage in collective bargaining. The right to strike is also protected, though many public employees are prohibited from striking. Over the years, the strength of organized labor has declined, and just 6.1 percent of the private-sector workforce belonged to unions in 2021. While public-sector unions had a higher rate of membership, with 33.9 percent, they have come under pressure from officials concerned about the cost of compensation and pensions to states and municipalities. The overall unionization rate in 2021 was 10.3 percent, the same as in 2019. The country's labor code and decisions by the National Labor Relations Board (NLRB) during Republican presidencies have been regarded as impediments to organizing efforts, but even Democratic administrations have largely failed to reverse the deterioration. Union organizing is also hampered by resistance from private employers. Among other tactics, many employers categorize workers as contractors or use rules pertaining to franchisees to prevent organizing.

A 2018 Supreme Court decision that government employees cannot be required to contribute to unions that represent them in collective bargaining has led to further losses in union membership, and 27 states have "right-to-work" legislation in place, allowing private-sector workers who benefit from union bargaining to similarly opt out of paying union dues or fees. In March 2021 the House of Representatives passed the Protecting the Right to Organize Act, which would strengthen organizing and bargaining capacity by overriding right-to-work laws and giving more categories of workers the right to unionize, among other changes; the bill remained stalled in the Senate at year's end.

A labor shortage that accompanied the economic recovery from the pandemic in 2021 emboldened workers to make demands in negotiations with employers, leading to a series of highly publicized strikes and increased media coverage of labor disputes, though the total number of strikers remained relatively small.

F. RULE OF LAW: 11 / 16F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 3 / 4

The American judiciary is largely independent. The courts regularly demonstrated their autonomy during the Trump presidency by blocking or limiting executive actions, and the Biden administration also faced adverse rulings during 2021.

However, the pattern of judicial appointments in recent years has added to existing concerns about partisan distortion of the appointment and confirmation process. Republican leaders in the Senate had stalled many federal judicial nominations in the final years of Barack Obama's presidency, resulting in an unusually large number of vacancies at the beginning of 2017. The most prominent was a seat on the Supreme Court that the Senate had held open during 2016 by refusing to allow hearings on Obama's nominee. In 2017, the Senate confirmed Trump's nominee for the position, but only after the Republican leadership changed Senate rules that had required a supermajority to end debate on Supreme Court nominations, meaning the confirmation could proceed with a simple-majority vote. Democrats had enacted a similar rule change for lower court nominations in 2013.

President Trump filled two additional vacancies on the Supreme Court in 2018 and 2020 after deeply contentious Senate hearings and nearly party-line votes. These appointments cemented a conservative Supreme Court majority; many Democrats suggested that the Republicans' pattern of obstructing Democratic nominees and filling the resulting vacancies with their own nominees warranted the introduction of legislation to expand the size of the court and add new justices under a Democratic president, but while President Biden created a commission to study various judicial reform options in 2021, no such changes were adopted during the year.

By the end of 2020, Trump had successfully appointed a record 234 federal judges in all, including 54 appellate court judges. In a break with precedent, a number of his nominees were confirmed by the Senate even after he lost the November election. President Biden made judicial appointments a priority in 2021, and during the year he made more nominations and achieved more confirmations than either Trump or Obama in the first year of their respective terms.

During his time in office, Trump repeatedly used his pardon power in an arbitrary or politicized fashion, bypassing Justice Department processes, overturning the convictions of several individuals whose cases were championed by his political allies, and publicly discussing possible pardons for himself or other individuals in a position to provide evidence against him in various investigations. Between his defeat in the November 2020 election and Biden's inauguration in January 2021, Trump pardoned multiple close associates who had been convicted or charged in connection with investigations into Russian interference in the 2016 election. These were among a larger raft of pardons issued to individuals with personal or political connections to Trump, including five former Republican congressmen convicted of fraud or misusing funds, four former military contractors convicted for their roles in a notorious 2007 massacre of civilians in Iraq, and former adviser Steve Bannon, who was awaiting trial on fraud charges.

In many states, judges are chosen through either partisan or nonpartisan elections, and a rise in campaign fundraising and party involvement in such elections over the last two decades has increased the threat of bias and favoritism in state courts. In addition, executive and legislative officials in an increasing number of states have attempted to increase their control over state courts; according to New York University's Brennan Center for Justice, 14 states passed legislation that narrowed judicial independence in 2021.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 3 / 4

The United States has a deeply rooted rule-of-law tradition, and legal and constitutional protections for due process are widely observed. However, the criminal justice system suffers from a number of chronic weaknesses, many of which are tied to racial discrimination and contribute to disparities in outcomes that disadvantage people of color, particularly Black Americans. Media reports and analyses in recent years have drawn new attention to the extensive use of plea bargaining in criminal cases, with prosecutors employing the threat of harsh sentences to avoid trial and effectively reducing the role of the judiciary and juries; deficiencies in the parole system; long-standing funding shortages for public defenders, who represent low-income defendants in criminal cases; racial bias in risk-assessment tools for decisions on pretrial detention; and the practice of imposing court fees or fines for minor offenses as a means of raising local budget revenues, which can lead to jail terms for those who are unable to pay.

These problems and evolving enforcement and sentencing policies have contributed to major increases in incarceration over time. The population of sentenced state and federal prisoners soared from about 200,000 in 1970 to more than 1.6 million in 2009, then gradually decreased to roughly 1.2 million as of mid-2021. The incarceration rate based on such counts rose from around 100 per 100,000 US residents in 1970 to a peak of more than 500 in the late 2000s, then fell to 361 as of mid-2021. There are also hundreds of thousands of pretrial detainees and short-term jail inmates behind bars. Despite gradual declines in the number of Black prisoners, Black and Hispanic inmates continue to account for a majority of the prison population, whereas Black and Hispanic people account for roughly a third of the general US population. Lawmakers, elected state attorneys, researchers, activists, and criminal justice professionals have reached a broad consensus that the current level of incarceration is not needed to preserve public safety. Civil liberties organizations and other groups have also argued that prison sentences are often excessive and that too many people are incarcerated for nonviolent drug offenses.

In 2018, under pressure from a bipartisan coalition advocating for reforms to curb mass incarceration, Congress passed and the president signed a law that eased federal mandatory-minimum sentencing rules, among other modest changes. A majority of states have also passed laws in recent years to reduce sentences for certain crimes, decriminalize minor drug offenses, and combat recidivism; such gradual steps continued in 2021. Some states have restricted the use of cash bail, which can unfairly penalize defendants with fewer resources and enlarge pretrial jail populations. In 2020, voters in Oregon approved a ballot measure to decriminalize possession of all drugs, the first state to take such a step; several others have decriminalized or fully legalized the recreational use of marijuana.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 3 / 4

The US homicide rate—at 6.5 per 100,000 inhabitants as of 2020, according to FBI data—remains low by regional and historical standards, and overall crime rates have declined substantially since the 1990s. However, the figures are high when compared with other wealthy democracies, and the homicide rate rose by 30 percent between 2019 and 2020, with even higher spikes in a number of large cities, and continued to rise nationally at a slower pace in 2021.

The increased policy focus on reforming the criminal justice system in recent years has coincided with a series of widely publicized incidents in which police actions led to civilian deaths. Most of these prominent cases involved Black civilians, while Native Americans are reportedly killed by police at a higher rate per capita than any other group. Only a small fraction of police killings lead to criminal charges; when officers have been brought to trial, the cases have typically ended in acquittals or sentences on reduced charges. In many instances, long-standing and rigid labor protections prevent municipal governments and police departments from imposing significant administrative sanctions on allegedly abusive officers. Nevertheless, in April 2021, former officer Derek Chauvin was convicted on several counts including second-degree murder for the May 2020 killing of George Floyd in Minnesota, and in June he was sentenced to 22 years and six months in prison.

Opinion polling suggested that the 2020 protests against police violence and racial injustice were initially successful in shifting White Americans' attitudes and raising their awareness of the problems. The protests also succeeded in drawing media and advocacy attention to many police departments' deep resistance to any reform or accountability mechanisms, and in putting a spotlight on the presence within law enforcement of some officers with direct links to far-right militias and White supremacist groups. A push by some reform advocates to cut police departments' funding and direct it to other public services faced criticism amid rising crime rates, however, and many such efforts were diluted or reversed in 2021.

Conditions in prisons, jails, and pretrial detention centers are often poor at the state and local levels, and the COVID-19 pandemic spread through facilities across the country, with more than a third of the incarcerated population having tested positive by April 2021. Many jurisdictions and the federal government took steps to ease crowding by releasing to home confinement those suspects and convicted inmates who were deemed less dangerous.

Use of the death penalty has declined significantly in recent years. There were 11 executions carried out by five states and the federal government in 2021—down from 17 in 2020 and a peak of 98 in 1999. The death penalty has been formally abolished by 23 states, with Virginia joining the list in 2021; in another 15 states where it remains on the books, executions have not been carried out for the past five years or more. In July 2020 the federal government resumed executions for the first time since 2003, and 13 federal executions were carried out before the Biden administration imposed a moratorium in June 2021. Factors encouraging the decline of the death penalty include clear racial disparities in its application, with death sentences far more likely in cases involving White murder victims than Black murder victims; a pattern of exonerations of death-row inmates, often based on new DNA testing; states' inability to obtain chemicals used in lethal injections due to objections from producers, as well as legal challenges to the constitutionality of the prevailing methods of lethal injection; and the high costs to state and federal authorities associated with death penalty cases. The US Supreme Court has effectively ruled out the death penalty for crimes other than murder and in cases where the perpetrator is a juvenile or mentally disabled, among other restrictions.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 2 / 4

An array of policies and programs are designed to protect the rights of individuals against discrimination based on race, ethnicity, gender, and other categories, including in the workplace. However, women and some minority groups continue to suffer from disparities on various indicators, and a number of recent government policies have infringed on the fundamental rights of refugees, asylum seekers, and immigrants.

Although women constitute almost half of the US workforce and have increased their representation in many professions, the average compensation for female workers is roughly 82 percent of that for male workers, a gap that has remained relatively constant over the past several decades. Meanwhile, the wage gap between White and Black workers has grown in recent decades, meaning Black women, who are affected by both the gender and racial components of wage inequality, made about 69 cents for every dollar earned by White male workers as of 2020. Women are also most often affected by sexual harassment and assault in the workplace. A popular and ongoing social media campaign that began in late 2017, the #MeToo movement, has encouraged victims to speak out about their experiences, leading to accountability for some perpetrators and underscoring the scale of the problem in American society.

In addition to structural inequalities and discrimination in wages and employment, racial and ethnic minority groups face long-running and interrelated disparities in education and housing. De facto school segregation is a persistent problem, and the housing patterns that contribute to it are influenced by factors such as mortgage discrimination, which particularly affects Black and Hispanic homeowners. Black homeownership has fallen steadily from a peak in 2004, despite gains for other groups in recent years. This in turn influences overall gaps in wealth and social mobility. For example, the median wealth of White families is 12 times the median wealth of Black families. Black people also face discrimination in health care and experience worse outcomes than their White counterparts, and during the COVID-19 pandemic, people of color experienced strikingly higher mortality from the virus. Asian Americans were the victims of a surge in discrimination and hate crimes in 2020 and 2021, attributed in part to President Trump's attempts to focus blame for the pandemic on China, where the initial outbreak occurred.

Although LGBT+ people remain subject to significant discrimination, they have made strides toward legal equality in recent years. In 2020, the Supreme Court ruled that federal civil rights legislation includes LGBT+ people as a class protected from workplace discrimination. In January 2021, the Biden administration lifted a Trump-era ban on transgender people serving in the military, and in June the government announced that a nonbinary gender option would be available on US passports. However, disputes over the rights of transgender people at the state level have resulted in a series of restrictive laws. In October, Texas became the ninth state that year to bar transgender girls from participating in women's scholastic sports.

The Trump administration worked to reduce the number of legal immigrants, refugees, asylum seekers, and undocumented immigrants entering and residing in the country. Many of its moves were hasty, uncoordinated, and underfunded, and they often conflicted with existing laws, constitutional protections, and international human rights standards. While the administration typically cited exaggerated security concerns as justification for its policies, in 2020 the COVID-19 pandemic provided a new rationale and helped the administration achieve large declines in the number of newly arriving immigrants and asylum claimants. Although the Biden administration attempted to reverse some Trump-era policies, court challenges complicated its efforts, and it chose to leave other policies in place.

The Biden administration immediately overturned its predecessor's executive orders that had barred most entries by citizens of a group of Muslim-majority countries on security grounds; the original order had been repeatedly revised amid criticism that the bans were blatantly discriminatory. The new administration also sought to reverse President Trump's sharp and discriminatory reductions in the number of refugees admitted to the United States for resettlement, which had reached its lowest point since the program began in 1980; while the cap was raised to 62,500 people, fewer than 12,000 refugees were actually resettled by the end of the fiscal year in September 2021.

A number of controversial policies enacted by Trump administration that focused on blocking asylum seekers at the southern border were preserved under the Biden administration, and they continued to draw legal challenges on the grounds that they denied asylum seekers basic due process, violated statutory rules on asylum applications, and breached international prohibitions on returning asylum seekers to unsafe countries. Amid an increase in migration from Mexico, Central America, and Haiti, the Biden administration continued to use COVID-19-related public health restrictions to rapidly expel or deport most migrants throughout the year, including thousands of Haitians whose treatment was widely criticized as inhumane. Earlier, in January 2021, the administration ended the Trump administration's "Remain in Mexico" program, which allowed border authorities to force non-Mexican asylum seekers to wait in Mexico while their claims were adjudicated in the United States. Tens of thousands of people had been returned to Mexico under the program, with many living in difficult and dangerous conditions there. In August, however, the Supreme Court upheld a ruling that the program had been improperly rescinded, and it restarted in December.

The Biden administration signaled its commitment to reverse the Trump-era emphasis on maximizing arrests and deportations of undocumented immigrants, regardless of whether they had committed crimes, and of legal immigrants or refugees who committed crimes in the United States. In 2021, immigration authorities moved back toward the Obama-era policy of focusing deportation efforts on those individuals who pose the greatest threat to public safety. Nevertheless, immigration detentions rose during the administration's first year, and the backlog of cases in immigration courts continued to balloon; as of December 2021 there were some 1.6 million pending cases, with average wait times of more than two years for a case to be heard. Human rights and immigrant advocacy groups criticized the administration for taking inadequate steps to address poor conditions in immigration detention facilities. In September, the Biden administration announced steps intended to strengthen the legal standing of the Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals (DACA) program, which prevents the deportation of undocumented immigrants who were brought to the United States as children. The program had been the subject of court challenges since it was first implemented in 2012, and the Trump administration had tried unsuccessfully to end it.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 15 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

There are no significant undue restrictions on freedom of movement within the United States, and residents are generally free to travel abroad without improper obstacles. A patchwork of temporary movement restrictions were imposed across the country in response to the COVID-19 pandemic in 2020, with states acting independently based on local conditions and strategies, though the rules were loosely enforced and relied mainly on voluntary compliance. The remaining restrictions were mostly lifted as vaccination rates rose in 2021.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 4 / 4

Property rights are widely respected in the United States. The legal and political environments are supportive of entrepreneurial activity and business ownership. There were concerns during the Trump administration that political favoritism was distorting markets and government contracts, but these receded after the Biden administration took office. Coronavirus-related business restrictions at the state and local levels, which caused significant disruption and prompted civil disobedience and public protests by some private business owners in 2020, declined as vaccination rates rose and businesses reopened in 2021. In September the Biden administration issued a mandate requiring larger companies to ensure that their employees were either vaccinated or regularly tested, affecting an estimated 84 million workers. A business federation and many states challenged the authority of the federal Occupational Safety and Health Administration to impose such a mandate, and the matter was under judicial review at year's end.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 4 / 4

Men and women generally enjoy equal rights in divorce and custody proceedings, and there are no undue restrictions on choice of marriage partner, particularly after a 2015 Supreme Court ruling that all states must allow same-sex marriage. In recent years, a growing number of states have passed laws to eliminate exemptions that allowed marriages of people under age 18 in certain circumstances. Rape and domestic or intimate-partner violence remain serious problems. The applicable laws vary somewhat by state, though spousal rape is a crime nationwide. Numerous government and nongovernmental programs are designed to combat such violence and assist victims.

In the past several years, a series of new state laws have reduced access to abortion without overtly breaching prior Supreme Court decisions on the issue, and some have survived judicial scrutiny, adding to state-by-state variation in access. During 2021 alone, nearly two dozen states passed new abortion restrictions, and the Supreme Court's conservative majority—strengthened by Trump-era appointments—signaled a greater willingness to uphold such legislation. In several rulings starting in September, the court allowed the enforcement, pending a full judicial review, of a new Texas law that banned most abortions after six weeks of pregnancy and empowered citizens rather than the state to file lawsuits against those who perform or “abet” illegal abortions; litigation over this and other restrictive laws continued at year's end.

The “American dream”—the notion of a fair society in which hard work will bring economic and social advancement, regardless of the circumstances of one's birth—is a core part of the country's identity. In recent decades, however, studies have shown a widening inequality in wealth and a narrowing of access to upward mobility. Inequality concerns mounted in 2020 as a recession linked to the COVID-19 pandemic caused a massive spike in unemployment, especially for Black and Hispanic workers. A series of economic stimulus and relief packages, including a spending bill passed by Congress in March 2021, mitigated the damage and successfully reduced overall poverty rates, in part by providing expanded unemployment benefits and other protections against severe income loss.

One key aspect of inequality in the United States is the growing income and wealth gap between Americans with university degrees and those with a high school degree or less; the number of well-compensated jobs for the less-educated has fallen over time as manufacturing and other positions are lost to automation and lower-cost foreign production. These jobs have generally been replaced by less remunerative or less stable employment in the service and retail sectors, where there is a weaker tradition of unionization. The coronavirus-related economic shock amplified that dynamic, disrupting employment and income for lower-earning, less-educated workers far more than for college-educated professionals. In 2021, a lockdown-induced spike in household savings, combined with fiscal and monetary stimulus policies, produced strong demand, greater bargaining power, and higher wages for such workers. However, the same factors, along with persistent supply-chain disruptions caused by the pandemic, also produced high levels of inflation that tempered the effect of wage increases. As of October 2021, the employment-to-population ratio remained below pre-pandemic levels across racial and gender categories.

Although the country has legal safeguards against unsafe working conditions, workers in essential industries such as meat processing faced a high risk of contracting COVID-19, with inadequate protective equipment and hazard pay. Meanwhile, poorer children whose families lacked the resources to adapt to remote learning were most harmed by pandemic-linked school closures, which threatened to exacerbate educational inequality.

The inflation-adjusted national minimum wage has fallen substantially since the 1960s, with the last nominal increase in 2009, though many states and localities have enacted increases since then. An effort to include a federal minimum wage increase in the March 2021 relief legislation failed in the Senate. Other obstacles to gainful employment include inadequate public transportation and the high cost of living in economically dynamic cities and regions. The latter problem, which is exacerbated by exclusionary housing policies in many jurisdictions, has also contributed to an overall rise in homelessness in recent years.

Uruguay

Population: 3,500,000

Capital: Montevideo

Freedom Status: Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Uruguay has a historically strong democratic governance structure and a positive record of upholding political rights and civil liberties while also working toward social inclusion. Although all citizens enjoy legal equality, there are still disparities in treatment and political representation of women, transgender people, Uruguayans of African descent, and the Indigenous population.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- During the year, organized labor advocates were among the most vocal opponents of the Law of Urgent Consideration (LUC), passed in 2020, which could facilitate the police's use of unnecessary force at protests and strikes. In September, they helped gather signatures to place 135 articles of the LUC before a national referendum for possible repeal in 2022. The signatures were verified by the Electoral Court in December.
- Violence against women remains a serious concern, and cases of femicide increased during the coverage period. For the first ten months of the year, the Ministry of the Interior recorded 31,661 complaints of domestic and associated violence, approximately a 4 percent decrease from the same period the year prior.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 40 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 12 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The president is directly elected to a five-year term and may hold nonconsecutive terms. The most recent general elections were held in two rounds in 2019. Luis Lacalle Pou—a senator and son of a former president—and Beatriz Argimón of the center-right Partido Nacional captured the presidency and vice presidency by defeating former Montevideo mayor Daniel Martínez of the center-left Frente Amplio and his running mate in a close runoff decided by approximately 37,000 votes. The election took place peacefully and stakeholders accepted the results. Lacalle Pou was inaugurated in March 2020.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The bicameral General Assembly consists of the 99-member Chamber of Representatives and the 30-member Senate, with all members directly elected for five-year terms. No single party achieved a majority in the October 2019 elections. The Frente Amplio retained the most representatives but dropped from 50 seats in the Chamber of Representatives to 42, and from 15 to 13 seats in the Senate. Lacalle Pou's Partido Nacional built a predominantly center-right coalition with four other parties—the Partido Colorado, the newly formed Cabildo Abierto, the Partido de la Gente, and the Partido Independiente—that together won 57 seats in the Chamber of Representatives and 17 seats in the Senate. The elections took place peacefully, and stakeholders accepted the results.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 4 / 4

Uruguay's Electoral Court serves as the highest authority on elections and supervises the National Electoral Office, which oversees voter registration and has one office in each of the country's regional departments. Electoral laws are generally fair, and the Electoral Court, whose nine members are elected by both houses of Parliament with a two-thirds majority, is generally viewed as impartial. Voting is compulsory.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 16 / 16B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 4 / 4

Uruguay's multiparty system is open and competitive. The major political groupings are the Partido Colorado, the Frente Amplio coalition, and the Partido Nacional (also known as Blanco). Several smaller parties also compete in elections and have gained representation, as well. The Partido Nacional, accompanied by its coalition partners, took power in early 2020.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 4 / 4

Opposition parties are competitive. The conservative Cabildo Abierto was founded in 2019 and obtained the most seats in the 2019 elections, outside the three major parties.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 4 / 4

People's political choices are generally free from undue influence from undemocratic actors.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 4 / 4

The Afro-Uruguayan minority, which accounts for approximately 8 percent of the population, is significantly underrepresented in government. In 2019, voters elected the first Afro-Uruguayan woman as senator. Indigenous groups are also severely underrepresented, although there is a currently a grassroots campaign that aims to gain formal government recognition of the Indigenous Charrúa people.

Representation of women in national, regional, and local government is low; women hold approximately 25 percent of seats in the Chamber of Representatives and 32 percent of seats in the Senate. As of December 2021, Uruguay ranked 93rd out of 189 countries in Women in Parliament list created by the Inter-Parliamentary Union, a global organization of the national parliaments. Two bills to increase women's participation were introduced to, but not passed by Parliament in 2021, the first since a 2014 law was passed mandating 30 percent of representatives be women.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 12 / 12C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 4 / 4

The head of government and national legislature determine the policies of the government without undue interference.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 4 / 4

The level of corruption in Uruguay is low by regional standards. Uruguay was ranked first in Latin America in the 2021 Capacity to Combat Corruption Index released by Americas Quarterly, for its ability to detect, punish, and prevent corruption. However, the country's main anticorruption agency, the Transparency and Public Ethics Board (JUTEP), faces budgetary constraints that many worry could impede its ability to fulfill its mission.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 4 / 4

Government institutions have established a robust record of accountability to the electorate. Enforcement of the Transparency Law, which prohibits a range of offenses related to abuse of office, is relatively strong at the national level. However, civil society groups criticized the government in 2020 and 2021 for insufficient transparency in the administration of the COVID-19 Solidarity Fund.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 57 / 60 (-1)D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 16 / 16*D1. Are there free and independent media? 4 / 4

Constitutional guarantees regarding free expression are generally respected. The press is privately owned; the broadcast sector includes both commercial and public outlets. There are numerous daily and weekly newspapers, some of which are connected to political parties. The Center for Archives and Access to Public Information registered concern in 2021 over lawsuits, and threats of lawsuits, against journalists for defamation that has the potential to limit freedom of expression and the free flow of information. Many of these cases were initiated by state officials or legislators.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 4 / 4

Freedom of religion is legally protected and broadly respected.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

Academic freedom is upheld. Tensions remain, however, for academics who push for information about and inquiries into the crimes committed during the military dictatorship that ended in 1985.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 4 / 4

Discussion of personal and political topics is generally open and robust, and there is little fear of government surveillance or retribution. The government's potential use of facial recognition software has some civil society groups worried about exactly how it would be used by the Interior Ministry.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 12 / 12E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

Freedom of assembly is protected by law, and the government generally respects this right in practice. The broadly worded LUC, passed in 2020, contains provisions that, according to human rights advocates, could pose a threat to the right to peaceful protest and could result in greater police use of force to disperse protests.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 4 / 4

A wide array of community organizations and national and international human rights groups are active in civic life, and do not face government interference.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 4 / 4

Workers are free to exercise the right to join unions, bargain collectively, and hold strikes. Unions are well organized and politically powerful. Labor advocates are among the most vocal opponents of the LUC and in September 2021, they helped gather signatures to place 135 articles of the LUC before a national referendum for possible repeal. The signatures were verified by the Electoral Court in December.

F. RULE OF LAW: 14 / 16 (-1)F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 4 / 4

Uruguay's judiciary is generally independent.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 3 / 4

Due process rights are generally respected in Uruguay. However, the courts face a significant case backlog, which results in a high rate of pretrial detention.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 3 / 4 (-1)

Uruguay is free from large-scale violence and civil conflict. However, warfare between rival gangs in Brazil has at times migrated across the border, most often in the department Rivera, where crime rates increased in 2021.

Prisons are often overcrowded, with poor living conditions. The Interior Minister in September 2021 reported that conditions had deteriorated to the point that they violate human rights standards, and he called for a long-term strategic plan to overhaul the system. In 2021, there were a record number of deaths in prisons.

Criminal violence and insecurity have increased in Uruguay in recent years, although many crimes such as robbery and homicides dropped during the first half of 2021.

Score Change: The scored declined from 4 to 3 because overcrowding and other harsh conditions in the prison system have contributed to a multiyear increase in deaths in custody.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 4 / 4

Afro-Uruguayan people continue to face economic and social inequalities. While a 2013 affirmative action law was enacted to combat persistent inequality, Afro-Uruguayans experience high unemployment rates and were disproportionately affected by the economic hardships caused by the COVID-19 pandemic. The state also still falls well short of its quota goals for jobs for individuals of African descent.

Transgender people have historically been discriminated against in Uruguay. However, in 2018 the executive branch promulgated a law allowing transgender people to change relevant information on their identification documents. The law also allows minors to have gender confirmation hormone therapy without parental or guardian permission; sets aside funds to help ensure that transgender people have access to education and health care; and provides a pension for transgender people who were persecuted by the military dictatorship.

However, violence against transgender people remains widespread and COVID-19 exacerbated issues of inequality, poverty, and violence against them.

Women enjoy equal rights under the law but face discriminatory attitudes and practices, including a persistent wage gap.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 15 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

Freedom of movement is protected, and individuals are free to change their residence, employment, and institution of higher education without interference.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 4 / 4

The right to own property and establish private business is respected.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 4 / 4

Violence against women remains a serious concern. While there was a slight drop in cases of femicide in recent years, 2021 saw another increase with more cases of femicide in the country than in the previous years. For the first ten months of 2021, there were 31,661 complaints about domestic and associated violence, according to the Ministry of the Interior, approximately a 4 percent decrease from the same period in 2020. Amid high levels of gender-based violence in the country, organizations advocated for better police training and reporting procedures. Attempts to change protocols, however, also received fierce criticism and continue to be under review. The government also has suggested plans to launch courts that specialize in gender-based violence.

The legislature voted overwhelmingly to legalize same-sex marriage in 2013. Abortion for any reason during the first trimester has been legal since 2012. However, many women, especially in rural areas, face obstacles to receiving abortion services, particularly amid the COVID-19 pandemic.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 3 / 4

Individuals generally enjoy equality of opportunity, although certain barriers persist for Afro-descendants, women, transgender, and Indigenous Uruguayans.

According to reports, the government is not doing enough to combat transnational human trafficking, and laws do not prohibit internal trafficking. However, authorities did arrest 12 individuals involved in an alleged trafficking ring originating in Cuba in September 2021.

Uzbekistan

Population: 34,900,000

Capital: Tashkent

Freedom Status: Not Free

Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: While reforms adopted since President Shavkat Mirziyoyev took office in 2016 have led to improvements on some issues, Uzbekistan remains an authoritarian state with few signs of democratization. No opposition parties operate legally. The legislature and judiciary effectively serve as instruments of the executive branch, which initiates reforms by decree, and the media are still tightly controlled by the authorities. Reports of torture and other ill-treatment persist, although highly publicized cases of abuse have resulted in dismissals and prosecutions for some officials, and small-scale corruption has been meaningfully reduced.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- Presidential elections held in October had predictable results: Mirziyoyev won reelection with over 80 percent of the vote.
- Uzbekistan officially became a member of the UN Human Rights Council (HRC) in January, after being elected in October 2020. The country's membership prompted mixed reactions, including criticism of existing legislature curtailing religious freedom, overly burdensome registration requirements for nongovernmental organizations (NGOs), and the lack of meaningful support for press freedom.
- After the fall of the government in neighboring Afghanistan in August, President Shavkat Mirziyoyev announced that Uzbekistan would not accept Afghan refugees, but offered the country as a transit hub for humanitarian assistance to Afghanistan.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 2 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 1 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

The president, who holds most executive power, is directly elected for up to two five-year terms. Longtime prime minister Shavkat Mirziyoyev was named acting president through an irregular parliamentary process in 2016, after Islam Karimov, who had held the presidency since Uzbekistan's independence from the Soviet Union in 1991, suffered a stroke and died. The constitution called for the Senate chairman to serve as acting president, but the chairman declined the post. Mirziyoyev won a special presidential election at the end of 2016, taking a reported 88.6 percent of the vote and defeating nominal challengers whose parties in some cases openly campaigned for the incumbent.

Mirziyoyev was reelected in the October 2021 presidential elections with 80.1 percent of the vote. Though five candidates participated, the election was not competitive, and candidates avoided challenging or criticizing Mirziyoyev. Only registered parties may nominate candidates, and the parties of two individuals who intended to run were denied registration, preventing any opposition or independent candidates from contesting the election.

The Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE) election observation mission found the 2021 presidential elections to be neither fair nor free, noting a lack of meaningful engagement among candidates and an absence of transparent electoral procedures. OSCE observers also reported significant irregularities during the campaign and on election day, including the registration of voters on election day without employing safeguards; people voting without presenting the required identification documents; people voting on behalf of others; and ballot box stuffing in many polling stations.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

Uzbekistan has a bicameral legislature. The lower house is composed of 150 seats, with members directly elected in individual constituencies. The 100-member upper house, or Senate, includes 84 members who are elected by regional councils and 16 who are appointed by the president. All members of the parliament serve five-year terms.

The December 2019 lower house elections offered voters no meaningful choice, as all participating parties supported the government. The final results that followed January 2020 runoffs in 25 districts closely mirrored those from the previous lower house elections. The president's party, the Liberal Democratic Party of Uzbekistan (O'zLiDeP), maintained the largest share with 53 of 150 seats. Milliy Tiklanish (National Revival) won 36, the Adolat (Justice) Social Democratic Party won 24, and the People's Democratic Party (XDP) won 22. The Ecological Party of Uzbekistan, which directly competed for the first time after previously having its seats automatically allocated, won the same total of 15 delegates that it had been granted in the previous parliament. OSCE election monitors noted numerous irregularities, including procedural violations, the use of multiple ballots by voters, and ballot-box stuffing.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 1 / 4

The electoral laws and framework are implemented in ways that offer no opportunities for independent political actors or parties to participate in elections at any level. Election management bodies are closely controlled by the government.

Mirziyoyev has presided over some electoral reforms during his tenure. A 2017 law allowed the election of 11 district councils within Tashkent, in addition to the existing council for the city as a whole; Tashkent has the status of a region, and districts in the country's other regions already had elected councils. Another set of reforms enacted in 2019 ended indirect representation for the Ecological Party, removed voting restrictions on those with past criminal convictions, and allowed voters to add their names to more than one party roll; these lists are required for political parties to participate in elections.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 0 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 0 / 4

Only five political parties are registered—O'zLiDeP, the XDP, Adolat, Milliy Tiklanish, and the Ecological Party. They engage in mild criticism of one another and occasionally of government ministers, but all are effectively progovernment. Two opposition parties, the Erk Democratic Party and the Truth and Development Party, operate unofficially, having been repeatedly denied registration.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 0 / 4

No genuine opposition parties operate legally. Unregistered opposition groups function primarily in exile. Domestic supporters or family members of exiled opposition figures have been persecuted, and they are barred from participating in elections.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 0 / 4

Regional alliances of political elites hold the levers of government at all levels, creating economic oligarchies and patronage networks that stifle political competition. There is some intra-elite competition, but without the patronage of the established networks, political and economic advancement is all but impossible.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 0 / 4

No registered party represents the specific interests of ethnic or religious minority groups, and no other parties or actors have the opportunity to achieve political representation. Women formally enjoy equal political rights, but they are unable to organize independently to advance their political interests in practice, and they remain underrepresented in leadership positions.

A component of the electoral reform package enacted in 2019 required 30 percent of legislative candidates to be women. Women now hold 33 percent of the seats in the lower house and 23 percent of the seats in the Senate. One woman, a member of the XDP, ran for president in 2021, taking 6.6 percent of the vote.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 1 / 12C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 0 / 4

The country's leadership is not freely elected, and the legislature serves as a rubber stamp for the executive branch.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 0 / 4

Corruption is pervasive. Graft and bribery among low- and mid-level officials remain common and are at times conducted overtly and without subterfuge. However, petty corruption among traffic police and officials granting identification documents and registrations has been notably reduced in recent years by pilot programs that introduced video surveillance and traffic cameras.

President Mirziyoyev has overseen an ongoing purge of the notoriously corrupt security and law enforcement services. Analysts contend that the purge is largely meant to neutralize security officials from the Karimov era and shift power to the president's personal security service and the reformed National Guard, both of which are overseen by Mirziyoyev's family members.

In November 2021, Mirziyoyev removed former security services chief Rustam Inoyatov from his cabinet; Inoyatov, at the time one of Uzbekistan's longest serving officials, is widely associated with abuse and corruption within the security services, for which a number of his former subordinates have been prosecuted in recent years.

Media discussion of corrupt practices has cautiously expanded since Karimov's death, but in some cases the journalists and commentators involved have come under pressure. In 2020, the Senate admitted that public health officials in five different regions may have embezzled COVID-19 emergency funds. A few weeks earlier, Miraziz Bazarov, a Tashkent-based blogger, had been summoned for questioning by the security services after he made similar allegations on social media and called on Uzbekistan's international creditors to investigate. Evidence to support Bazarov's claims was later provided to the Asian Development Bank (ADB) by Bankwatch, an international anticorruption organization.

In March 2021, Bazarov was seriously injured in an assault committed by unknown attackers. Following the attack, police charged Bazarov with hooliganism and slander, and placed him under house arrest, where he remained at year's end. Bankwatch has publicly linked Bazarov's anticorruption activism to his current legal charges.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 1 / 4

Government operations remain mostly opaque, but one of Mirziyoyev's first acts as president in late 2016 was the creation of new online mechanisms that offered citizens the opportunity to file complaints, report problems, and request services. The initial program was overwhelmingly popular and was quickly expanded to all ministries and local government offices, requiring local officials to interact with citizens and demonstrate responsiveness. The innovations contributed to a cultural change in governance, though they frequently encountered resistance at the local level.

While the government was considered to have communicated well with the public during the early months of the COVID-19 pandemic in 2020, dubious official statements and statistics during later outbreaks conflicted with direct evidence of a more severe crisis that temporarily overwhelmed the health care system.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 9 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 3 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 1 / 4

Despite constitutional guarantees, press freedom remains severely restricted. The state controls major media outlets and related facilities, and independent outlets were mostly shuttered or blocked under Karimov. However, domestic media, including news websites and live television programs, now cautiously discuss social problems and criticize local officials, reflecting a slight reduction in media repression since Mirziyoyev took power. Some independent news sources have emerged and are not subject to overt censorship, though most outlets still avoid openly criticizing Mirziyoyev and the government.

The presence of independent international outlets is limited; several foreign reporters have been granted press passes since 2017, although other journalists working for outlets like Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty (RFE/RL) have been denied entry. One of the few international journalists based in the country, Agnieszka Pikulicka-Wilczewska, was effectively deported in November 2021, one day after the newly reelected Mirziyoyev promised to enact further reforms enhancing press freedom; authorities had previously refused to renew her press accreditation, accusing her of violating Uzbek media laws with her coverage of LGBT+ rights in Uzbekistan. Pikulicka-Wilczewska had earlier reported she had faced sexual harassment from the security services and pressure from officials to report positively about Uzbekistan.

Access to news and information via popular social media sites like YouTube and Facebook has become more reliable in recent years, and social media platforms have become lively forums for political discussion. However, in July 2021, the state communications agency, Uzkomnazorat, blocked access to almost all major international platforms, claiming the social networks had violated legal requirements in the processing of Uzbek citizens' personal data. After the restrictions were briefly reimposed in November, Mirziyoyev announced that access to the social media networks would be restored, and fired the head of Uzkomnazorat, claiming that he had illegally and unilaterally imposed the restrictions. Despite public outcry, some restrictions remained in place at year's end.

Journalists continue to face criminal penalties for a variety of possible offenses related to their work. In 2020, the president signed legal amendments that eliminated prison terms for libel and insult, but compulsory labor and other penalties remained in place, and dissemination of false information was added to the criminal and administrative codes. An earlier law adopted the same year had criminalized dissemination of false information related to COVID-19.

Under Mirziyoyev, a number of journalists have been released from prison, and 2018 marked the first year in two decades that no journalists were imprisoned, but the government handed down a jail sentence to a blogger in 2019. According to the Committee to Protect Journalists (CPJ), two journalists were imprisoned in Uzbekistan in 2021. The state has also continued to occasionally use the Soviet-era practice of forced psychiatric hospitalization against journalists.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 0 / 4

The government permits the existence of approved Muslim, Jewish, and Christian denominations, but treats unregistered religious activity as a criminal offense. Suspected members of banned Muslim organizations and their relatives have faced arrest, interrogation, and torture. Arrested believers are frequently accused of founding previously unknown religious organizations, a charge that carries high penalties. In most cases, little evidence of the existence of such organizations is presented at the closed trials. Since Mirziyoyev became president in 2016, government regulations curtailing religious freedom have lessened, though significant restrictions remain in place as of 2021.

In July 2021, Mirziyoyev signed new amendments to the law on religious freedom, relaxing a controversial prohibition on wearing religious clothing in public, including in state and educational institutions, as well as simplifying the registration requirements for religious organizations. However, human rights activists and international monitors have noted that the reforms do not fundamentally change the state's authority to license religious organizations, censor religious literature, and prosecute anyone participating in religious activities or teaching outside state-approved forums.

Despite the changes to the law on religious freedom, in December 2021, following the presidential election, Muslim bloggers and activists published multiple videos taken in state universities showing staff attempting to convince female students not to wear the hijab and telling others they were not allowed to pray in dormitories or on other university property. There were also reports during the year from Tashkent and other regions, both before and after the changes to the law on religious freedom, that police were forcibly shaving some young men who had grown beards. In addition, mahalla committees in several provinces were pressuring girls to remove their hijab. The government denied that the events were related to a national policy.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 1 / 4

The government has long limited academic freedom, in part by controlling contacts between universities or scholars and foreign entities. Universities in Uzbekistan have slowly expanded their cooperation with foreign counterparts since 2016.

Texts that glorify former president Karimov are no longer required reading at universities.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 1 / 4

The freedoms of personal expression and private discussion have long been limited by mahalla committees—traditional neighborhood organizations that the government transformed into an official system for public surveillance and control. The government also engages in extensive surveillance of electronic communications.

Through its various reforms since 2016, the Mirziyoyev administration has signaled a greater tolerance for public criticism, modestly improving the climate for expression of personal views on sensitive topics. However, the 2020 legal amendments that criminalized dissemination of false information, including about COVID-19, indicated ongoing pressure to set limits on public debate.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 1 / 12E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 0 / 4

Despite constitutional provisions for freedom of assembly, authorities severely restrict this right in practice, breaking up virtually all unsanctioned gatherings and detaining participants.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 1 / 4

Unregistered NGOs have faced severe repression and harassment. Though the government claims that many NGOs operate in Uzbekistan, most are state-sponsored organizations; excessive registration requirements prevent independent NGOs from legally operating, and allow authorities to interfere in the work of human rights organizations.

A new organization designed to oversee the activities of registered NGOs, the Center for the Development of Civil Society (CDCS), was formed in 2019. The following year, new legislation governing NGO registration was finalized; however, the draft law, which did not remove existing registration restrictions, had yet to be adopted as of 2021.

In March 2021, Mirziyoyev issued a decree approving the Concept on Development of Civil Society in 2021–2025, a proposal introducing measures that would improve the legal framework for civil society groups and provide for partnerships between NGOs and the government; he also approved a road map for the proposal's implementation.

The government frequently and arbitrarily denies registration requests made by both local and international NGOs that engage in human rights-related work. In September 2021, Human Rights House, a local human rights NGO, filed a lawsuit against the Ministry of Justice after being denied official registration eight times since 2019.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 0 / 4

The Federation of Trade Unions is controlled by the state, and no genuinely independent union structures exist. Organized strikes are extremely rare.

F. RULE OF LAW: 1 / 16F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 0 / 4

The judiciary remains subservient to the president. In 2017, however, a number of judicial reforms were enacted through constitutional and legislative amendments, establishing specific terms in office for judges and creating a Supreme Judicial Council (OSK) to oversee appointments and disciplinary action, among other changes. The council, whose chairperson is approved by the Senate on the president's recommendation, replaced a commission that was directly subordinate to the president.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 0 / 4

Due process guarantees are extremely weak. Law enforcement authorities have routinely justified the arrest of suspected religious extremists or political opponents by planting contraband, filing dubious charges of financial wrongdoing, or inventing witness testimony. The Lawyers' Chamber, a regulatory body with compulsory membership, serves as a vehicle for state control over the legal profession. The judicial reforms adopted in 2017 gave judges rather than prosecutors the authority to approve certain investigative steps, such as exhumations and some forms of surveillance. In 2020, a presidential decree introduced an option for defendants to enter plea bargains for a range of offenses and included provisions to improve detainees' access to lawyers.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 1 / 4

A 2016 law on police prohibits torture, and a 2017 presidential decree that bars courts from using evidence obtained through torture took effect in 2018. In both 2020 and 2021, Mirziyoyev issued additional decrees introducing mechanisms to eliminate the use of torture against detainees. Despite the reforms, credible reports of physical abuse against detainees continued to appear in the media throughout 2021.

In June 2020, the family of Andijon businessman Alijon Abdukarimov, who had been detained the previous month by police investigating a theft, published videos on social media showing him in an intensive care unit as a result of severe torture during interrogation. Abdukarimov died from his injuries days later, sparking widespread public outrage. The prosecutor general's office brought charges against the officers implicated in the case, and six officers received sentences ranging from one to 10 years in prison. The prosecutor general's office publicized data on torture investigations for the first time in June 2020, admitting that of 757 cases investigated in three years, only 33 had led to prosecution. It promised additional reforms and a state commission to prevent police torture. The human rights ombudsman acknowledged the same month that torture remained a serious problem, and the Interior Ministry announced that video cameras would be installed in police interrogation facilities across the country.

Prisons suffer from severe overcrowding and shortages of food and medicine. As with detained suspects, prison inmates—particularly those sentenced for their religious beliefs—are often subjected to torture and other ill-treatment.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 0 / 4

Although racial and ethnic discrimination are prohibited by law, the belief that senior positions in government and business are reserved for ethnic Uzbeks is widespread. Women's educational and professional prospects are limited by discriminatory cultural and religious norms. Women are also barred from certain jobs under the labor code.

Sex between men is punishable with up to three years in prison. The law does not protect LGBT+ people from discrimination, and social taboos deter the discussion of LGBT+ issues.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 4 / 16G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 1 / 4

Permission is required to move to a new city, and bribes are commonly paid to obtain the necessary documents. Bribes are also frequently required to gain entrance to and advance in exclusive universities. The government took steps to ease travel within the country and to neighboring states beginning in 2017, when it removed police checkpoints at internal borders, resumed direct flights to Tajikistan, and opened border crossings as part of an agreement with Kyrgyzstan. The Mirziyoyev administration abolished exit visas in 2019, ending a system that was used to proscribe travel beyond other member states of the Commonwealth of Independent States.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 1 / 4

Widespread corruption and extensive state control over the economy limit private business opportunities and make property rights tenuous in practice.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 1 / 4

While the law generally grants men and women equal rights in matters such as marriage and divorce, women often face de facto disadvantages. Extralegal child marriage is reportedly practiced in some areas. Victims of domestic violence are discouraged from pressing charges against perpetrators, who rarely face prosecution. Rape is also seldom reported or prosecuted, and spousal rape is not explicitly criminalized.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 1 / 4

Economic exploitation remains a serious domestic problem, as does the trafficking of men and women abroad for forced labor and sex work. A 2009 law imposed stronger penalties for child labor, and in 2012 Mirziyoyev, then the prime minister, pledged to end the practice completely. In 2017, the president issued a decree to formally ban forced agricultural labor by students, health workers, and teachers. During the subsequent cotton harvests, the government increased incentives for voluntary labor and granted access to international observers. In 2018, the International Labor Organization (ILO) noted that 93 percent of cotton workers were voluntarily employed for that year's harvest, while child labor was not an issue.

In 2020, President Mirziyoyev signed a decree to fully end the state quota system for cotton that had motivated local officials to require forced labor. Despite these improvements, some evidence of forced labor has continued to be reported in recent years, and prosecutions of suspected traffickers remain rare.

Vanuatu

Population: 300,000

Capital: Port Vila

Freedom Status: Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Vanuatu conducts democratic elections but suffers from a pattern of unstable coalition governments. Although political corruption is a major problem, the largely independent judiciary has been able to hold elected officials accountable in high-profile cases. Other persistent problems include domestic violence and societal discrimination against women.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- In June, Prime Minister Bob Loughman and 18 other members of Parliament (MPs) boycotted parliamentary proceedings for three consecutive days. Parliament Speaker Gracia Shadrack ruled that they had vacated their seats, effectively resigning, and the Supreme Court initially upheld Shadrack's decision.
 - In July, the MPs appealed, challenging Shadrack's right to make such a decision, but were rejected by the Court of Appeal. However, the court allowed a further trial regarding whether the MPs had indeed vacated their seats; the Supreme Court ruled in favor of the MPs in September. In November, Parliament voted to suspend Shadrack for two years, which Shadrack planned to challenge in court.
 - In August, President Tallis pardoned three former prime ministers: Charlot Salwai, Joe Natuman, and Serge Vohor. All three had been convicted of various forms of official misconduct, including corruption, and became eligible to contest elections again.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 33 / 40A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 10 / 12*A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 3 / 4

The prime minister, who holds most executive authority and appoints their own cabinet, is chosen by Parliament from among its members. Prime ministerial elections and votes of no confidence often feature improprieties, as rival coalitions seek to entice members to shift allegiances with offers of cash or ministerial portfolios. Bob Loughman became prime minister in April 2020, after the March general elections, winning 31 of the 52 votes in Parliament.

The largely ceremonial president is elected to serve a five-year term by an electoral college consisting of Parliament and the heads of the country's provincial councils. A two-thirds majority is required, and multiple rounds of voting can be held to reach this threshold. In 2017, Presbyterian pastor Tallis Obed Moses was elected president after Baldwin Lonsdale died in office.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The 52-seat unicameral Parliament is directly elected for four-year terms in 18 constituencies ranging from one to seven members in size. In the March 2020 elections, Graon Mo Jastis Pati won nine seats, the Union of Moderate Parties and Leaders Party of Vanuatu both won five seats, and the National United Party won four. In total, 18 different parties and individuals were seated in Parliament, including Vanua'aku Pati, which formed a coalition government with the Union of Moderate Parties, the National United Party, the Nagriamel political movement, and the Green Confederation Party. Bob Loughman of Vanua'aku Pati was elected prime minister in April. The COVID-19 pandemic, as well as an extreme weather event, significantly impacted voter turnout, which was around 51 percent.

In June 2021, Prime Minister Loughman and 18 other government MPs boycotted parliamentary proceedings for three consecutive days. Parliament Speaker Shadrack ruled that they had vacated their seats, effectively resigning, and the Supreme Court initially upheld Shadrack's decision. The MPs' appeal challenging the Speaker's right to make such a decision was rejected by the Court of Appeal in July. However, the court allowed a further trial regarding whether the MPs had indeed vacated their seats; the Supreme Court ruled in favor of the MPs in September. In November, Parliament voted to suspend Shadrack for two years, which Shadrack planned to challenge in court.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 3 / 4

The electoral framework is generally fair, and elections are administered without bias, but international observers have noted problems including an inaccurate voter roll and understaffing of election management bodies. Moreover, the use of the single-nontransferable-vote system, particularly in larger multimember constituencies, is believed to weaken political parties and encourage fragmentation. It is especially problematic during by-elections when voters may be filling only one vacant seat in a multiseat district.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 15 / 16B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 4 / 4

Numerous political parties operate without restrictions in Vanuatu. Politicians frequently switch allegiances. In mid-2018, the government withdrew proposed constitutional reforms that were meant in part to address party switching and political instability, having failed to reach consensus with the parliamentary opposition. Plans to put these reform proposals to a referendum were abandoned in 2019.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 4 / 4

The country has a record of frequent democratic transfers of power between rival parties.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 4 / 4

There are no major undue constraints on the choices of voters or candidates from outside the political system. Traditional chiefs—represented by the National Council of Chiefs, a consultative body for customary and language matters—exert some influence, but they do not control electoral decisions.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 3 / 4

Ethnic minorities enjoy equal political rights. Political groupings have historically been divided in part along linguistic lines, with an Anglophone majority and a Francophone minority.

Women's political participation is impaired by systemic biases, and they are severely underrepresented in elected offices. No women were elected to Parliament in 2020. Only 18 women contested seats in the elections. Some seats are reserved for women at the municipal level, and women's rights groups have also lobbied for a national-level quota.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 8 / 12C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 3 / 4

The elected prime minister and cabinet determine and implement government policies without improper interference, and the legislature serves as a check on executive power. However, party fragmentation and frequent no-confidence votes have long disrupted governance. Charlot Salwai's government was the first since 1995 to complete a full four-year term (2016–20).

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 2 / 4

Abuse of office and corruption are serious problems, though prosecutors, the ombudsman, and other independent institutions are occasionally effective in combating them. In August 2021, President Tallis pardoned three former prime ministers: Charlot Salwai, Joe Natuman, and Serge Vohor. Salwai had been convicted of perjury in 2020 for making a false sworn statement to mislead the court. Natuman had been convicted in 2018 of interfering with a police inquiry when he was prime minister in 2014. Along with 13 other MPs, Vohor had served 18 months in prison on bribery and corruption charges from 2015. All three became eligible to contest elections again. Another former prime minister, Moana Carcasses, who was the central figure in the 2015 bribery scandal, was not pardoned.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 3 / 4

The government largely operates with transparency. Parliament sessions are streamed live on the internet, and elected officials are required to submit financial disclosure reports that can be investigated by the ombudsman's office, but the documents are not made public.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 49 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 14 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 2 / 4

The government generally respects freedom of the press, though elected officials have sometimes been accused of threatening journalists for critical reporting. Publicly and privately owned newspapers publish in English and French. There are a small number of private broadcasters, but the state-owned broadcaster has a dominant position in the sector. Foreign news services are also available, and about a quarter of the population has access to the internet.

In 2019, the government rejected a work-permit renewal request from Canadian journalist Dan McGarry, publisher of the Daily Post newspaper, and barred him from returning to the country. McGarry claimed that the government retaliated against the newspaper's coverage of Chinese influence in Vanuatu, which the government denied; the Supreme Court revoked the travel ban in December of that year, allowing McGarry to return to Vanuatu. His work permit had still not been renewed by the end of 2021.

The Bill for the Statute Law (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act No. of 2021, passed in April, provides criminal penalties of up to three years' imprisonment for threatening language, libel, and slander. The Melanesia cochair of the Pacific Freedom Forum Robert Iroga expressed concern that the amendment could be used to restrict media freedom.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 4 / 4

The constitution's preamble states that the republic is founded on "Christian principles," but there is no official religion, and adherents of other faiths can worship freely. Authorities do not enforce a legal registration requirement for religious groups.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

There are no constraints on academic freedom.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 4 / 4

The government does not monitor personal communications, and individuals are able to discuss politics and other matters without interference.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 11 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

The law provides for freedom of assembly, and the government typically upholds this right in practice. Public demonstrations generally proceed without incident.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 4 / 4

There are no significant constraints on the formation and operations of nongovernmental organizations (NGOs), which are not required to register with authorities.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 3 / 4

Workers can join unions, bargain collectively, and strike. The right to strike is somewhat impaired by notification rules and the government's ability to bar such actions in essential services; violations can draw criminal penalties. The umbrella Vanuatu Council of Trade Unions (VCTU) is an affiliate of the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC). Union leaders have raised concerns about antiunion pressure on seasonal workers who travel to New Zealand, including from recruiting agents within Vanuatu.

F. RULE OF LAW: 13 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 4 / 4

The judiciary is largely independent, but a lack of resources hinders the hiring and retention of qualified judges and prosecutors. The president appoints the chief justice after consulting with the prime minister and the opposition leader. Other judges are appointed by the president on the advice of the Judicial Service Commission (JSC); judges cannot be removed arbitrarily. Tribal chiefs and island courts empowered to hear customary law cases adjudicate local disputes. Vanuatu's courts have demonstrated impartiality in recent years through their adjudication of cases involving senior political figures.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 3 / 4

Due process rights are guaranteed by law. However, police do not always uphold legal safeguards against arbitrary arrest and detention. Long periods of pretrial detention are not uncommon, largely due to case backlogs in the courts. However, Vanuatu's pretrial population is relatively low for the region.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 3 / 4

The police paramilitary unit, the Vanuatu Mobile Force (VMF), has a reputation for heavy-handed treatment of citizens. Civilian authorities have not been effective in punishing and preventing cases of police brutality. Joe Natuman's 2018 conviction stemmed from interference with an investigation regarding high-ranking officers charged with mutiny. In his defense, Natuman claimed he was seeking to bring unity to the troubled police force.

Prisons have suffered from overcrowding, violence, poor living conditions, and lax management that contributes to frequent escapes.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 3 / 4

Women are guaranteed legal equality, but in practice they continue to face societal discrimination that affects their access to employment and economic opportunity. LGBT+ people are not protected by antidiscrimination laws.

The rapid expansion of Chinese-owned businesses has sometimes fueled resentment toward Chinese residents. Certain occupations are reserved for ni-Vanuatu as part of a policy to boost employment for the native population.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 11 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

The constitution protects freedom of movement, which is also respected in practice. In March 2020, President Obed Moses declared a state of emergency to respond to the COVID-19 pandemic, which included travel restrictions and other public health measures to prevent the spread of the virus. This was extended through December 2021.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 3 / 4

The legal framework is generally supportive of property rights and private business activity. However, irregularities surrounding land deals, and corruption in the Lands Ministry, are persistent problems.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 2 / 4

Domestic violence is widespread. Social stigma and fear of reprisal inhibits reporting, particularly in more remote rural areas, and police and courts rarely intervene or impose strong penalties. Government and civil society efforts to combat the problem are inadequately funded. Spousal rape is not specifically criminalized. Women pursuing civil cases related to personal status matters face difficulties paying the required court fees. Only fathers can automatically pass citizenship to their children at birth.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 2 / 4

Poverty is extensive, and more than three-quarters of the population rely on subsistence agriculture. The government does not properly enforce health and safety standards, leaving employees in construction, logging, and other industries exposed to hazardous working conditions. Children often perform agricultural work at the family level, and laws on child labor do not meet international standards.

Venezuela

Population: 29,100,000

Capital: Caracas

Freedom Status: Not Free

Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: Venezuela's democratic institutions have deteriorated since 1999, but conditions have grown sharply worse in recent years due to harsher crackdowns on the opposition and the ruling party relying on widely condemned elections to control all government branches. The authorities have closed off virtually all channels for political dissent, restricting civil liberties and prosecuting perceived opponents without regard for due process. The country's severe humanitarian crisis has left millions struggling to meet basic needs, and driven mass emigration.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- The ruling United Socialist Party of Venezuela (PSUV) and allied parties won a majority of gubernatorial and mayoral positions in November elections, despite opposition groups winning a majority of votes nationwide. While election monitors said the polls were better run than in the past, they were marred by the misuse of state resources, bans on candidates, and low turnout.

- In March, Caracas launched a military campaign against the 10th Front, a Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia (FARC) splinter group active in Venezuela. During the campaign, security forces engaged in arbitrary arrests, torture, and extralegal executions of civilians. The campaign subsided in late May with the military's effective retreat.
- Security forces engaged in protracted fighting with a criminal gang in Caracas over several days in July, with the government reporting the deaths of 22 criminals and 4 police officers. Residents in the affected area were trapped in their homes during the fighting.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 1 / 40

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

The president serves six-year terms and is not subject to term limits. In January 2019, incumbent Nicolás Maduro Moros was sworn in for a new term after winning the 2018 snap presidential election. The poll saw a record-low turnout of 46 percent and by most international accounts lacked even a veneer of competitiveness. That month, the democratically elected National Assembly declared its head, Juan Guaidó, interim president as a constitutional response.

The ruling PSUV attempted to undercut Guaidó's legitimacy by engineering the election of Luis Parra as National Assembly president in January 2020, with military forces barring opposition members from entering the chamber to participate in the vote. The Constitutional Chamber of the Maduro-aligned Supreme Tribunal of Justice (TSJ) ratified Parra's election that May. Over 50 countries initially recognized Guaidó as interim president, though some critics subsequently questioned Guaidó's ability to challenge chavismo. Maduro was initially recognized by fewer than 20 countries, generally historical allies and governments with an economic or other interest in the country—most prominently Russia, China, and Cuba.

The old opposition-controlled legislature, which attempted to keep control of the legislative branch by voting to extend its term in December 2020, reaffirmed Guaidó as interim president that month. International recognition of Guaidó has waned during 2021, however, with European Union (EU) member states rescinding their recognition in January.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

The unicameral National Assembly is popularly elected for five-year terms, using a mix of majoritarian and proportional-representation voting. Three seats are reserved for Indigenous representatives. Ahead of the December 2020 elections, electoral authorities announced that the new National Assembly would have 277 seats, up from 167.

The major opposition parties refused to participate in the vote for the 2021–26 National Assembly term, saying they had no reason to believe the Maduro regime would oversee a fair election and pointing to the installation of election commissioners without opposition input. The PSUV and its allies won 91 percent of seats, though most of the world's democracies, including the United States, rejected the results as illegitimate. In late December, the outgoing, opposition-controlled National Assembly voted to extend its term into 2021.

Also in December, Maduro announced that the National Constituent Assembly (CNA)—a body established in 2017 to supplant the National Assembly and filled with regime loyalists elected in a nondemocratic process—would be shuttered.

Regional and local elections were held in November 2021. The government and opposition groups held negotiations in Mexico beginning in August, which were meant in part to address the coming poll. Negotiators reached preliminary agreements on some agenda items in September. In October, the government suspended talks in response to the extradition of Álex Saab Morán, a Colombian businessman affiliated with Caracas, from Cabo Verde to the United States. Progovernment candidates won 20 out of 23 governorships and 212 out of 335 mayoralties. Several opposition coalitions contested the elections and won a majority of votes nationwide, but splits within the opposition impeded their overall performance. An EU election observation mission (EOM) reported that turnout stood at 42.5 percent, the lowest in 25 years.

The EOM called the elections relatively well conducted compared to previous polls but noted the use of state resources to support progovernment candidates. The elections were also marred by judicial interference: In late November, the TSJ ordered the National Electoral Council (CNE) to hold a new election in Barinas State after the Voluntad Popular (Popular Will) candidate appeared to lead that state's gubernatorial contest. That contest will be held a second time in 2022. EU observers were compelled to leave Venezuela in early December, after the authorities declined to renew their visas.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 0 / 4

The electoral system is heavily influenced by political manipulation and pro-PSUV institutional interference. While the opposition had no influence over the slate of CNE commissioners selected ahead of the 2020 legislative elections, the slate announced in May 2021 did include opposition members, though its progovernment slant remained.

Recent polls, including the 2018 presidential election and the 2020 legislative elections, have been characterized by disqualifications of prominent opposition candidates, government abuse of public resources, uneven access to the state-dominated media, the diminished presence of international observers, and intimidation of state employees. The November 2021 local and regional elections were similarly marred by the misuse of resources and bans on candidates.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 1 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 0 / 4

While opposition coalitions and parties exist, the ruling PSUV uses state resources as well security forces and the judiciary to disrupt them. In 2020, the TSJ suspended the leaders of two prominent opposition parties—Acción Democrática (Democratic Action) and Voluntad Popular—replacing them with figures who were previously suspended from those parties for supporting Parra's engineered election to the National Assembly. The deposed leaders remained out of their posts as of the November 2021 local and regional elections. The Mesa de la Unidad Democrática (Democratic Unity Roundtable) ticket was banned in 2018, though the CNE reinstated it in June 2021, allowing it to contest the November elections.

Opposition leaders have long been harassed, attacked, imprisoned, and otherwise impeded from participating in political processes or leading political parties in peaceful activities. Prominent members of the Guaidó-led Voluntad Popular were targeted by authorities in July 2021. Fabiana Rosales Guerrero, Guaidó's wife, claimed that members of the Special Action Forces (FAES) attempted to arrest Guaidó at their home but were stopped by neighbors. Guaidó ally Freddy Guevara was arrested on terrorism and treason charges in July but was released in August. Former Chacao mayor Emilio Graterón Colmenares sought refuge in a Chilean diplomatic office in Caracas in July.

Family members were also targeted by authorities during 2021. In June, Guaidó claimed that security officers harassed Rosales when she traveled to a medical appointment.

According to nongovernmental organization (NGO) Foro Penal (Criminal Forum), there were 244 political prisoners in Venezuela as of December 2021. Foro Penal also counted another 9,422 people facing potential proceedings.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 0 / 4

While discontent with the Maduro regime remains widespread, the government has cut off virtually all avenues for political change. The opposition has boycotted recent national elections after claiming that international criteria of competitiveness could not be met, though opposition groups did contest the November 2021 local and regional elections.

Prominent opposition figures like Leopoldo López—who fled to Spain in 2020—and former Miranda state governor Henrique Capriles Radonski have been banned from holding public office, though President Maduro called on Capriles to participate in the November 2021 elections.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 0 / 4

The Maduro regime relies on the military, paramilitary forces, and opaque support from foreign states to retain political power. Military leaders have taken control of numerous offices, and Maduro has continued to strengthen the Bolivarian Militia, a civilian militia group established by late president Hugo Chávez Frías in 2008 to support the military; Maduro claimed the militia had over 4.5 million members in April 2021.

Separately, irregular, state-affiliated armed groups known as colectivos routinely commit acts of violence against civilians, particularly at antigovernment protests, and carry out government-backed voter intimidation efforts. The Office of the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights (OHCHR) attributed deaths that occurred during protests in 2019 to colectivos.

The Maduro regime has become increasingly dependent on economic, medical, military, and other assistance from foreign allies to maintain power, particularly from Russia, Cuba, Turkey, and Iran. Russian military personnel reportedly supported Caracas's campaign against the 10th Front on the Venezuela-Colombia border beginning in March 2021. In September, Caracas reached a deal with the Iranian government to swap oil products.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 1 / 4

The PSUV's political dominance leaves little opportunity for ethnic, minority, and other groups to advocate for their interests.

Indigenous people in Venezuela are poorly represented in politics, and members of these groups struggle to bring government attention to issues of importance, including economic inequality and destructive incursions on ancestral lands. Indigenous people were further marginalized in 2020 through changes to the National Assembly: While the total number of legislators was significantly increased from 167 to 277, the number of seats reserved for Indigenous representatives remained the same. In July 2020, the CNE revoked Indigenous groups' right to vote directly and secretly to choose National Assembly representatives, without consulting Indigenous communities. After an outcry, the reform was rolled back in August.

Though several women hold senior positions in government, there remains a lack of policy discussion regarding issues that primarily affect women. Almost no openly LGBT+ people hold senior political or government positions in Venezuela. The first openly transgender member of the National Assembly, Voluntad Popular member Tamara Adrián, held a seat in the 2015–20 body.

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 0 / 4

Venezuela does not function as a representative democracy. The opposition-controlled legislature had no practical ability to carry out its constitutional mandate between 2015 and 2020 and was also supplanted by the proregime CNA, which was established under undemocratic conditions. After the opposition announced that it would boycott the 2020 National Assembly elections, effectively securing PSUV control of the chamber, Maduro announced the closure of the CNA.

Corruption is rampant in Venezuela. The government's economic policies—particularly its currency and price controls—offer significant opportunities for black-market activity and collusion between public officials and organized crime networks. The United States, Canada, Panama, the EU, and others have sanctioned Venezuelan officials for corruption and other offenses that go uninvestigated in Venezuela. In June 2021, US, Canadian, and EU representatives suggested they would reconsider those policies if the country held more transparent elections.

Corruption has also affected the Venezuelan COVID-19 response. In April 2021, NGO Transparencia Venezuela reported that military and police personnel sought bribes while enforcing pandemic measures.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 0 / 4

There is virtually no transparency regarding government spending. The Maduro regime has moreover consistently failed to publish reliable crime and economic data, including monthly inflation statistics and annual gross domestic product.

Watchdogs and others raised serious doubts about the veracity of government COVID-19 data, with NGOs and educational institutions calling official pandemic death figures noncredible. In May 2021, Transparencia Venezuela reported that the government withheld information on the recipients of COVID-19 vaccines imported from China and Russia. The NGO also reported that government officials made inconsistent statements on how many vaccines were administered.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 13 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 6 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 1 / 4

Independent journalists operate within a highly restrictive regulatory and legal environment, and risk arrest and physical violence in connection with their work. Venezuela formerly possessed a vibrant newspaper sector, though large numbers of publications have closed or have narrowed their operations. In June 2021, NGO Prodavinci reported that 22 print newspapers were still operating, while 121 operated in 2013.

Journalists continued to face government pressure and arrest during 2021. In March, journalist Milagros Mata-Gil and poet Juan Manuel Muñoz were arrested after an article criticizing Attorney General Tarek William Saab was disseminated on social media. In July, the Press and Society Institute (IPYS) counted 213 press freedom violations committed by the Maduro regime and its followers in the first half of the year, targeting 88 journalists and 48 outlets along with NGOs. The IPYS counted 10 illegal arrests, 85 physical incidents, and 14 legal cases opened against journalists and outlets.

In April 2021, the TSJ's Civil Cassation Chamber ruled in favor of PSUV vice president Diosdado Cabello Rondón over his defamation claim against newspaper El Nacional. El Nacional was ordered to pay Cabello $13.2 million, though the newspaper did not comply. In May, the TSJ authorized the seizure of the outlet's Caracas headquarters, allowing Cabello to take control of the facility.

The Maduro regime maintains a state communications infrastructure used to propagate its political and ideological program. Maduro made 224 televised appearances in 2021 through December 20. In contrast, live-streamed speeches by Guaidó are frequently blocked. State-owned media also provided favorable coverage to the government during the November 2021 local and regional elections.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 3 / 4

Constitutional guarantees of religious freedom are generally respected, though tensions between the government and the Roman Catholic Church remain high. According to the 2020 edition of the US State Department's Report on International Religious Freedom, Roman Catholic and evangelical Christian groups reported government harassment, intimidation, and retaliation against their members, including members of the clergy. The report also noted that progovernment supporters espoused antisemitic attitudes on social networks, while progovernment media outlets carried antisemitic content during the reporting year.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 1 / 4

Academic freedom has come under mounting pressure since chavismo arrived to power. Budget cuts and other funding problems have undermined universities' autonomy and prompted an exodus of academics from the country.

The regime continued to exert its influence on academic activity during the year. In January 2021, then higher education minister César Trómpiz Cecconi announced that the regime would prioritize specific fields of study based on its economic priorities. In March, the government announced that salaries for university staff would be dispersed through Sistema Patria (Fatherland System), a centralized online platform for accessing government benefits and services. In July, the Inter-American Court of Human Rights (IACHR) cited the use of Sistema Patria when warning that budget troubles were threatening academic freedom in Venezuela. In September, the National Council of Universities appointed a new rector of Simón Bolívar University in an irregular session.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 1 / 4

Free private expression is severely constrained in Venezuela. A May 2021 report issued by IPYS noted the government maintained strict control over telecommunications providers.

The government has also used social-service and health-care systems to surveil Venezuelans. Health-related measures were linked to the Fatherland ID card, which is required to access social services. In 2020, the government activated so-called Popular Prevention Brigades to identify people potentially infected with COVID-19 and to monitor their adherence to health advice. Brigade members are usually community members who maintain close PSUV ties. These brigades continued to operate in 2021.

In some cases, citizens continue to be targeted for their social media activity. In April 2021, Luis Morales, an Ezequiel Zamora rail system employee, was interrogated by intelligence agents for a satirical comment about the effects of a Chinese-produced COVID-19 vaccine. Morales was dismissed from his job and deleted his TikTok account on the recommendation of government officials.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 2 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 0 / 4

While guaranteed by the constitution, freedom of assembly is severely restricted in practice. Protests were nevertheless common despite government restrictions, with many politically motivated protests occurring in recent years. Violent clashes between protesters and security forces are known to occur. The number of protests have fallen due to COVID-19 restrictions, however.

The Venezuelan Observatory of Social Conflict (OVCS) counted 3,393 protests in the first half of 2021, a 23 percent decline from the first half of 2020. The OVCS also reported that 59 protests held in the first half of 2021 were violently repressed, counting 25 arrests, 7 injuries, and 1 death during the period. In November, the International Criminal Court (ICC) opened an investigation over the government's response to demonstrations.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 1 / 4

Activists and NGOs are routinely harassed, threatened, and subject to legal and administrative sanctions for their work. In January 2021, PSUV vice president Cabello denounced the Venezuelan Action Education Program on Human Rights (Provea) when the NGO claimed that the party benefited from British funds, calling for an investigation into one of the NGO's staff members. That same month, six staff members of Azul Positivo (Blue Positive), which provides medical services in Zulia State, were arrested by intelligence personnel. In July, the director of Fundaredes (Foundations), Javier Tarazona, was arrested after discussing possible links between Caracas and Colombian guerrillas operating in Venezuela. A pretrial hearing against Tarazona, who remained in detention, was held in mid-December.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 1 / 4

Workers are legally entitled to form unions, bargain collectively, and strike, with some restrictions on public-sector workers' ability to strike. Control of unions has shifted from traditional opposition-allied labor leaders to new workers' organizations that are often aligned with the government. The competition has contributed to a substantial increase in labor violence as well as confusion and delays during industry-wide collective bargaining.

In July 2021, a member of the Trade Union Coalition of Venezuela reported that 11 arrests against labor leaders took place during the year to date. In September, the UN high commissioner for human rights in Venezuela voiced concern over the ongoing criminalization faced by labor leaders.

F. RULE OF LAW: 1 / 16F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 0 / 4

Politicization of the judicial branch increased dramatically under Chávez and has progressed further under Maduro. Political control of the judiciary was reinforced through the appointment of new, regime-loyal judges during the 2010s.

In recent years, the TSJ has issued numerous decisions that favored the Maduro regime. In 2020, it voided the extension of the opposition-controlled National Assembly's mandate, overruled the reelection of Juan Guaidó as the body's president, and changed the leadership of major opposition political parties. In September 2021, members of the UN's human rights mission in Venezuela criticized the judiciary's lack of independence.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 0 / 4

Opponents of the government and the PSUV are routinely detained and prosecuted without regard for due process, and victims of violence at the hands of the state have no realistic avenue for redress.

In its June 2021 report, the OHCHR documented 17 killings "consistent with previously documented patterns of extrajudicial executions" between June 2020 and April 2021. In most of these cases, security officers broke into the homes of the victims. The OHCHR named three government agencies as primarily responsible: the Bolivarian National Police's Bureau for Scientific, Criminal, and Forensic Investigations; the Directorate of Criminal Investigations; and FAES. A September 2021 UN report noted that prosecutors and judiciary members effectively aided the regime's human rights abuses.

The military has also assumed roles previously reserved for civilian law enforcement institutions. According to Provea and Foro Penal, 870 civilians have been tried in military court proceedings between 2014 and August 2020.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 0 / 4

Venezuelans face physical insecurity and violence from several sources, including irregular armed groups, security forces, and organized gangs.

In March 2021, the government launched a military campaign in the southwestern state of Apure, targeting the 10th Front, a FARC splinter group that is believed to engage in drug trafficking. The military launched aerial bombing campaigns and deployed soldiers, while the 10th Front employed guerrilla tactics. In late April, Human Rights Watch (HRW) reported that Venezuelan security forces engaged in arbitrary arrests, extralegal executions, and torture against those suspected of collaborating with the 10th Front. While Caracas did not consistently disclose casualty figures, an opposition figure claimed that several dozen soldiers were killed during the campaign, which subsided in late May with the military's effective retreat.

Statistics for 2020, released that December by the Venezuelan Violence Observatory (OVV), placed the country's rate of violent death—including homicides, deaths at the hands of the authorities, and other suspicious deaths—at 45.6 per 100,000 people, the highest figure in Latin America. The OVV report also noted a "sustained increase" in deaths caused by authorities since 2016; 2020 was the first year the OVV recorded more deaths by police than by other perpetrators.

Gang-related violence also puts Venezuelans at risk. Security forces engaged in protracted fighting with the Koki gang in Caracas over several days in July 2021. While the government reported the deaths of 22 "criminals" and 4 police officers, human rights advocates claimed that 4 people were killed by stray bullets. Residents were trapped in their homes during the fighting. In December, the Fourth State Court convicted 9 people over the fighting, while another 15 were facing charges including terrorism and arms trafficking.

Prison conditions in Venezuela remain among the worst in the Americas. Pranes, or gang leaders who operate from prisons, freely coordinate criminal networks throughout Venezuela. Prisoners face poor medical treatment and risk contracting COVID-19. In January 2021, Salvador Franco, a member of the Indigenous Pemón group, died in custody after suffering poor health, despite a November 2020 court order requiring him to be sent to a medical facility. In September 2021, imprisoned journalist Roland Carreño was diagnosed with COVID-19. In October, Chávez-era defense minister Raúl Isaías Baduel died of COVID-19. Isaías, who had later opposed Chávez, was imprisoned since 2017 on conspiracy charges.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 1 / 4

The rights of Indigenous people, who make up 2.5 percent of the population, are upheld by the constitution but poorly protected by authorities. In practice, Indigenous groups face discrimination and unequal treatment, especially in Bolívar, where Indigenous people experience labor exploitation, extortion by paramilitary groups, sex trafficking of some women, and land grabs related to illegal mining, which also results in the destruction of forests and other natural features on Indigenous lands. According to a 2021 World Heritage Watch report, over 18,000 acres within Canaima National Park, which is home to several thousand Pemón, have been affected by illegal mining.

Although discrimination based on sexual orientation is barred, LGBT+ Venezuelans face widespread intolerance and violence. At least four transgender, nonbinary, or gender nonconforming Venezuelans were murdered in the first eight months of 2021 according to NGO Nunca Dejes de Soñar (Never Stop Dreaming).

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 4 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 1 / 4

A COVID-19-related state of emergency, in effect between March 2020 and March 2021, placed harsh movement restrictions on Venezuelans. Authorities and paramilitary groups arbitrarily detained, physically attacked, and tortured civilians who did not follow quarantine and other security instructions during the state of emergency.

People continued to flee Venezuela in massive numbers due to the country's ongoing social and economic crises. The Office of the UN High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) reported that over 5.9 million Venezuelans had fled as of October 2021. Children are known to leave Venezuela unaccompanied by adults; in May 2021, the Center of Human Rights at Andrés Bello Catholic University (CDH UCAB) reported that at least 430 children did so between October 2020 and February 2021.

Venezuelans living near the Colombian border fled while security forces waged an armed campaign against the 10th Front between March and May 2021. As many as 7,000 people fled across the border during the fighting.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 1 / 4

Property rights have been damaged by years of price controls, nationalization, over-regulation, and corruption. Accusations of mismanagement, underinvestment, graft, and politicized hiring practices within state-owned enterprises are common.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 2 / 4

The politically driven economic collapse in Venezuela has reduced the availability of reproductive health care. Maternal and infant mortality has increased. Due to restrictive legislation on abortion, many women and girls resort to frequently unsafe and unsanitary clandestine abortions or travel abroad.

Women who have been political prisoners have reported attacks by security forces including sexual violence, threats of rape, and forced nudity. Women relatives of political prisoners have faced gender-based violence (GBV) and humiliation during visits in detention centers, security operations, and house raids.

A 2007 law was designed to combat violence against women, but domestic violence and rape remain common and are rarely punished in practice. During the first half of 2021, 116 women were killed, while 137 were killed in the first half of 2020, according to NGO Femicide Monitor.

The LGBT+ community in Venezuela still lacks fundamental rights like legal marriage, child adoption, and the right to one's gender identity.

Venezuelan women and children are increasingly vulnerable to sex trafficking within Venezuela and abroad, with the problem exacerbated by worsening economic conditions and the COVID-19 crisis. In August 2021, the CDH UCAB reported that 21 percent of Venezuelan migrants in Costa Rica, the Dominican Republic, Guyana, Panama, and Trinidad and Tobago were subjected to slavery-like conditions, including forced sex work.

With scarce job opportunities and hyperinflation outpacing wages, more Venezuelans have sought employment in the informal sector, where they are exposed to dangerous or exploitative working conditions. Among businesses that are legally registered, sanctions for labor law violations, when levied, generally target private-sector operations instead of those that are state-run.

Vietnam

Population: 96,200,000

Capital: Hanoi

Freedom Status: Not Free

Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: Vietnam is a one-party state, dominated for decades by the ruling Communist Party of Vietnam (CPV). Although some independent candidates are technically allowed to run in legislative elections, most are banned in practice. Freedom of expression, religious freedom, and civil society activism are tightly restricted. The authorities have increasingly cracked down on citizens' use of social media and the internet to voice dissent and share uncensored information.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- In January, Nguyễn Phú Trọng was reelected to a third term as the CPV's general secretary, despite reports of Trọng's significant health issues and rules within the ruling party preventing general secretaries from serving more than two terms. In April, the National Assembly formally confirmed Pham Minh Chinh, a longtime hardline security official, as prime minister and Nguyễn Xuân Phúc as president.

- The government further limited internet freedom during the year, pushing forward a draft law in July that would restrict livestreaming and launching a national code of conduct for people using social media in June. The rights group Vietnamese Human Rights Network noted that Facebook, Google, and YouTube have increasingly complied with the government's "escalating demands to censor dissidents."

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 3 / 40A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 0 / 12*A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

The president is elected by the National Assembly for a five-year term, and is responsible for appointing the prime minister, who is confirmed by the legislature. However, all selections for top executive posts are predetermined in practice by the CPV's Politburo and Central Committee.

In January 2021, Nguyễn Phú Trọng was reelected to a third term as the CPV's general secretary, a post with significant power, despite reports of Trọng's significant health issues and rules within the ruling party preventing general secretaries from serving more than two terms. In April, the National Assembly formally confirmed Pham Minh Chinh, a longtime hardline security official, as prime minister and Nguyễn Xuân Phúc as president.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

Elections to the 499-seat Quoc Hoi, or the National Assembly, are tightly controlled by the CPV, which won 485 seats in the May 2021 largely rubber-stamp elections. Candidates who were technically independent, but were in fact vetted by the CPV, took the other 14 seats. Fewer independent candidates stood in the 2021 elections than in the 2016 poll.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 0 / 4

The electoral laws and framework ensure that the CPV, the only legally recognized party, dominates every election. The party controls all electoral bodies and vets all candidates, resulting in the disqualification of those who are genuinely independent.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 1 / 16B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 0 / 4

The CPV enjoys a monopoly on political power, and no other parties are allowed to operate legally. Members of illegal opposition parties are subject to arrest and imprisonment.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 0 / 4

The structure of the one-party system precludes any democratic transfer of power. The Vietnam Fatherland Front (VFF), responsible for vetting all candidates for the National Assembly, is ostensibly an alliance of organizations representing the people, but in practice it acts as an arm of the CPV.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 0 / 4

The overarching dominance of the CPV effectively excludes the public from any genuine and autonomous political participation.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 1 / 4

Although members of ethnic minority groups are nominally represented within the CPV, they are rarely allowed to rise to senior positions, and the CPV leadership's dominance prevents effective advocacy on issues affecting minority populations. Vietnam has enacted policies and strategies aimed at boosting women's political participation, but in practice the interests of women are poorly represented in government.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 2 / 12C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 0 / 4

The CPV leadership, which is not freely elected or accountable to the public, determines government policy and the legislative agenda.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 1 / 4

CPV and government leaders have acknowledged growing public discontent with corruption, and there has been an increase in corruption-related arrests in recent years, as fighting graft has been a priority for the general secretary. Multiple senior officials, including two members of the Central Committee, have faced discipline including jail time.

Despite the crackdown, enforcement of anticorruption laws is generally selective and often linked to political rivalries. Many top officials who have been detained or jailed belonged to a different political faction than Trọng. The CPV does not tolerate journalistic investigations, independent courts, or other autonomous bodies that might serve as a check on corruption.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 1 / 4

The CPV leadership operates with considerable opacity. The National Assembly passed an access to information law in 2016, but its provisions are relatively weak. Information can also be withheld if it is deemed to threaten state interests or the well-being of the nation. Independent journalists and civil society groups are not permitted to scrutinize or critique government activities, and authorities jailed numerous people in 2021 who criticized its COVID-19 response.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 16 / 60D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 3 / 16*D1. Are there free and independent media? 0 / 4

Although the constitution recognizes freedom of the press, journalists and bloggers are constrained by numerous repressive laws and decrees. Those who dare to report or comment independently on controversial issues also risk intimidation and physical attack.

The criminal code prohibits speech that is critical of the government, while a 2006 decree prescribes fines for any publication that denies revolutionary achievements, spreads "harmful" information, or exhibits "reactionary ideology." Decree 72, issued in 2013, gave the state sweeping new powers to restrict speech on blogs and social media. The state controls all print and broadcast media.

A cybersecurity law that was adopted in 2018 and took effect in 2019 includes several provisions that could restrict access to uncensored news and information. It requires companies like Facebook and Google to store information about Vietnamese users in Vietnam and allows the government to block access to a broad range of content that could be defined as allegedly dangerous to national security. In 2021, the government further limited internet freedom, pushing forward a draft law in July that would restrict livestreaming and in June launching a national code of conduct for people using social media. The Vietnamese Human Rights Network noted in a 2021 report that Facebook, Google, and YouTube have increasingly complied with the government's "escalating demands to censor dissidents."

Arrests, assaults, and criminal convictions of journalists and bloggers continued to be reported in 2021. In January, authorities sentenced three journalists to over a decade in prison each, on charges of "making and disseminating propaganda." In April, the government sentenced a journalist to eight years in jail for posting "anti-state" writing. In August, five journalists were charged with "abusing democratic freedoms" for, among other stories, writing articles critical of the government's land use policies.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 1 / 4

Religious freedom remains restricted. All religious groups and most individual clergy members are required to join a party-controlled supervisory body and obtain permission for most activities. The 2016 Law on Belief and Religion reinforced religious registration requirements, allowed extensive state interference in religious groups' internal affairs, and gave authorities broad discretion to penalize unsanctioned religious activity. Unregistered and unrecognized religious groups face routine harassment, including violence, criminal charges, and property damage.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 1 / 4

Academic freedom is limited. University professors must refrain from criticizing government policies and adhere to party views when teaching or writing on political topics. A university in Danang fired one of its lecturers for "wrong statements" about the government's lack of aid to help citizens weather the economic consequences of the COVID-19 pandemic. A student had taken a video of the lecturer arguing with a student and criticizing the lack of government relief efforts for those affected by the pandemic, which they then posted online.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 1 / 4

Although citizens enjoy more freedom in private discussions than in the past, authorities continue to attack and imprison those who openly criticize the state, including on social media. The government engages in surveillance of private online activity.

In 2021, authorities fined and jailed ordinary citizens for critiquing the state's COVID-19 response. In July, multiple Facebook users were arrested and detained in July for posting articles critical of the government. The Vietnam Human Rights Network claimed that in 2021 authorities held nearly 300 prisoners of conscience, an increase from 2020.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 1 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 1 / 4

Freedom of assembly is tightly restricted. Organizations must apply for official permission to assemble, and police routinely use excessive force to disperse unauthorized demonstrations. After nationwide anti-China protests in 2018, during which dozens of participants were assaulted and arrested, the courts convicted well over a hundred people of disrupting public order, and many were sentenced to prison terms.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 0 / 4

A small but active community of nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) promotes environmental conservation, land rights, women's development, and public health, including extensive work on COVID-19 in 2021. However, human rights organizations are generally banned, and those who engage in any advocacy that the authorities perceive as hostile risk imprisonment.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 0 / 4

The Vietnam General Conference of Labor (VGCL), the only legal labor federation, is controlled by the CPV. The right to strike is limited by tight legal restrictions.

A 2019 revision of the labor code, adopted to comply with international trade agreements, would theoretically allow workers to form their own representative bodies after it took effect in January 2021, but it remained clear that labor organizations were harshly repressed in practice.

F. RULE OF LAW: 4 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 1 / 4

The judiciary is subservient to the CPV, which controls the courts at all levels. This control is especially evident in politically sensitive criminal prosecutions, with judges sometimes displaying greater impartiality in civil cases.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 1 / 4

Constitutional guarantees of due process are generally not upheld. Defendants have a legal right to counsel, but lawyers are scarce, and many are reluctant to take on cases involving human rights or other sensitive topics. Defense lawyers do not have the right to call witnesses, and often report insufficient time to meet with their clients. In national security cases, police can detain suspects for up to 20 months without access to counsel.

Amendments to the penal code that took effect in 2018 included a provision under which defense lawyers can be held criminally liable for failing to report certain kinds of crimes committed by their own clients.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 1 / 4

There is little protection from the illegitimate use of force by state authorities, and security personnel are known to abuse suspects and prisoners, sometimes resulting in death or serious injury. The death penalty can be applied for crimes other than murder, including drug trafficking.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 1 / 4

Members of ethnic minority groups face discrimination in Vietnamese society, and some local officials restrict their access to schooling and jobs. They generally have little input on development projects that affect their livelihoods and communities. Members of ethnic and religious minorities also sometimes face monitoring and harassment by authorities seeking to suppress dissent and suspected links to exile groups.

Men and women receive similar treatment in the legal system. Women generally have equal access to education, and economic opportunities for women have grown, though they continue to face discrimination in wages and promotions.

The law does not prohibit discrimination based on sexual orientation or gender identity, and societal discrimination remains a problem. In a 2020 report, Human Rights Watch noted that “Pervasive myths about sexual orientation and gender identity in Vietnam contribute to violence and discrimination which is felt strongly among lesbian, gay, bisexual, and transgender (LGBT) youth.” Nevertheless, LGBT+ pride events are held annually across the country.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 8 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 2 / 4

Although freedom of movement is protected by law, residency rules limit access to services for those who migrate within the country without permission, and authorities have restricted the movement of political dissidents and members of ethnic minorities on other grounds. Vietnamese citizens who are repatriated after attempting to seek asylum abroad can face harassment or imprisonment.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 1 / 4

All land is owned by the state, which grants land-use rights and leases to farmers, developers, and others. Land tenure is one of the most contentious issues in the country and is the subject of regular protests. The seizure of land for economic development projects is often accompanied by violence, accusations of corruption, and prosecutions of those who voice objections.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 3 / 4

The government generally does not place explicit restrictions on personal social freedoms. Men and women have equal rights pertaining to matters such as marriage and divorce under the law. In 2015, Vietnam repealed a legal ban on same-sex marriage, but the government still does not grant such unions legal recognition.

Domestic violence against women remains common, and the law calls for the state to initiate criminal as opposed to civil procedures only when the victim is seriously injured.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 2 / 4

Human trafficking is a problem in Vietnam. The US State Department reported in its 2021 Trafficking in Persons report that although the government has taken some steps to boost antitrafficking efforts, it was not meeting minimum standards for combating the practice. Internationally brokered marriages sometimes lead to domestic servitude and forced prostitution. Male and female Vietnamese migrant workers are vulnerable to recruitment for forced labor abroad in a variety of industries. Enforcement of legal safeguards against exploitative working conditions, child labor, and workplace hazards remains poor.

Yemen

Population: 30,500,000

Capital: Sanaa

Freedom Status: Not Free

Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: Yemen, previously home to a long-running series of smaller internal conflicts, has been devastated by a civil war involving regional powers since 2015. Saudi Arabia, the United Arab Emirates (UAE), and their allies intervened that year to support the government of President Abd Rabbu Mansur Hadi against Ansar Allah (Supporters of God), also known as the Houthis—an armed rebel movement that is rooted in the Zaidi Shiite community, which forms a large minority in northwestern Yemen. The civilian population has suffered from direct violence by both sides, as well as from hunger and disease caused by the interruption of trade and aid. Elections are long overdue, normal political activity has halted, and many state institutions have ceased to function.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- The civil war continued for a seventh year, with the most intense fighting concentrated in Marib Governorate, where the Houthi rebels reportedly made costly gains against progovernment forces. Tens of thousands of civilians were displaced as a result.
- Yemen's humanitarian crisis again grew worse during the year, with civilians facing hardships including cholera, malnutrition, and fuel shortages in addition to the COVID-19 pandemic. By the end of 2021, more than 10,000 coronavirus cases and nearly 2,000 related deaths had been confirmed, though the country's capacity to track the spread of the pathogen was extremely limited, and both the Hadi government and Houthi officials allegedly withheld data related to the pandemic.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 1 / 40

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

Under the existing constitution, the president is elected for seven-year terms. In 2011, after sustained pressure from the United States, the United Nations, and the Gulf Cooperation Council, longtime president Ali Abdullah Saleh signed a Saudi-brokered agreement that transferred his powers to then vice president Hadi in exchange for immunity from prosecution for his role in a violent crackdown on antigovernment protests. In 2012, Yemeni voters confirmed Hadi, who ran unopposed, as interim president with a two-year term. In 2014, the multiparty National Dialogue Conference (NDC), a months-long initiative in which more than 500 delegates aimed to reach agreement on Yemen's political future, concluded with a plan to transform the country into a federated state of six regions. The NDC also extended Hadi's term by one year so that the proposed reforms could be finalized in a new constitution.

However, the constitutional drafting process and election schedule were thrown into disarray by the Houthis, who took over large swaths of the country, eventually occupying Sanaa in September 2014. The Houthis subsequently refused to evacuate the capital as part of a tentative power-sharing agreement, leading Hadi and his cabinet to flee into exile in early 2015. Meanwhile, the Houthis assumed control of state institutions in the areas they held. Hadi retained international recognition as president but had no clear mandate and little control over the country.

In keeping with the Saudi-brokered Riyadh Agreement of 2019, a power-sharing government was formed by anti-Houthi factions in December 2020. Hadi loyalists retained control of the most powerful ministries, but the government included representatives from the Southern Transitional Council (STC), a separatist group backed by the UAE; the Islamist party Al-Islah; and other political blocs. Maeen Abdelmalek Saeed, Hadi's prime minister since 2018, kept his post.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

According to the constitution, the president selects the 111 members of the largely advisory upper house of Parliament, the Majlis al-Shura (Consultative Council). The 301 members of the lower house, the House of Representatives, are elected to serve six-year terms. The original six-year mandate of the last Parliament expired in 2009, and elections were put off again in 2011 amid the popular uprising against Saleh. In January 2014, the NDC declared that parliamentary elections would occur within nine months of a referendum on the new constitution then being drawn up. The constitutional drafting committee completed its work in January 2015, but due to the outbreak of the civil war and the Saudi-led intervention in March of that year, no vote has yet taken place. The incumbent Parliament was disbanded after the Houthis seized control of the capital.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 0 / 4

Presidential and legislative elections are now many years overdue, and no side in the civil war has been able to assert enough territorial control to implement any electoral framework.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 1 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 1 / 4

Political parties continue to exist in Yemen, but they face severe repression by different authorities and armed groups across the country.

The Houthis have harshly suppressed political dissent in areas under their control since 2015. Yemeni forces associated with the UAE have used arbitrary arrests, detentions, and enforced disappearances to persecute certain political groups, including members of Al-Islah, an offshoot of the Muslim Brotherhood in Yemen.

In 2019, after clashes broke out in the southern city of Aden between the Saudi-backed Hadi government and the STC, an ally of convenience against the Houthis that enjoys Emirati support, the STC detained dozens of progovernment politicians, clerics, and activists. The Saudi-brokered Riyadh Agreement, reached in late 2019, temporarily ended the infighting, but a new round of clashes broke out in the first half of 2020 after the STC pulled out of the deal and declared self-rule in Aden. It eventually returned to the Riyadh Agreement process in July of that year.

The power-sharing government formed by anti-Houthi factions in December 2020 included Hadi's General People's Congress (GPC) party, the STC, Al-Islah, the Socialist Party, and a number of smaller parties and independents. It remained unclear in 2021 whether the arrangement would lead to a meaningful decrease in political persecution for the participating groups in areas outside Houthi control.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 0 / 4

Parliamentary elections have not been held in Yemen since 2003 and were last due in 2009. The most recent presidential election, in 2012, featured only one candidate. No date had been set for future elections as of 2021, and peaceful political opposition has been suppressed in the context of the civil war.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 0 / 4

Ordinary political activity is impeded by the presence of multiple armed groups throughout Yemen, including Houthi-led rebel forces, extremist groups, southern separatists, foreign troops from the Saudi-led coalition, Hadi government troops, and local or partisan militias.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 0 / 4

All segments of the population lack political rights under current conditions in Yemen. Thirty percent of the NDC's delegates were women, and its final agreement called for similar representation in all branches of government under a new constitution, but the draft constitution has been on hold since the outbreak of war. Only one woman won a seat in the last parliamentary elections, and no women were appointed to the December 2020 power-sharing government. A caste-like minority group with East African origins, known as the Akhdam or Muhamasheen, accounts for as much as 10 percent of the population but has long been marginalized in politics and in society. The group had one representative at the NDC.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 0 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 0 / 4

Yemen has no functioning central government with full control over its territory, and any state institutions that continue to operate are controlled by unelected officials and armed groups. The Hadi government is largely dependent on its foreign patrons, particularly Saudi Arabia and the UAE, which also have parallel relationships with other anti-Houthi groups. The Houthis receive at least some support from Iran.

Saudi and Emirati military forces have occupied several strategic portions of Yemeni territory, including Al-Mahrah Governorate and the island of Socotra, respectively. Emirati and STC forces have reportedly disregarded the Hadi government's objections to their presence and quasi-governmental activities on Socotra.

Government probity was minimal even before the outbreak of war in 2015, as a network of corruption and patronage established under Saleh remained entrenched in public institutions, and formal anticorruption mechanisms were largely ineffective. The disruption to legal commerce caused by the civil war has increased the role of smuggling and created further opportunities for graft. In May 2021, the Houthis began a campaign to collect funds for Palestine, leading many observers to question whether the money was given voluntarily and how it would actually be used. Food aid is often stolen and sold illegally by officials on all sides of the civil conflict, exacerbating a food-security crisis that has left millions at risk of malnutrition. The obstruction of aid also increased the difficulty of international efforts to contain and treat COVID-19 in the country.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 0 / 4

Government transparency, already limited prior to 2015, has deteriorated along with state institutions during the war. The only truly national institution that had initially continued to function during the conflict, the central bank, has been split between a government-backed version in Aden and a rebel-backed version in Sanaa since 2016. This has caused politicized disruptions to public-sector salaries, aid, and commerce, and further reduced the transparency of state finances and monetary policy. Both the Houthis and the Hadi government have allegedly undercounted COVID-19 cases and withheld related data.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 8 / 60 (-2)

D1. Are there free and independent media? 0 / 4

The state has historically controlled most terrestrial television and radio, though there have been several privately owned radio stations. Since the outbreak of the war, the belligerents have either taken over or enforced self-censorship at any surviving media outlets in the country. Houthi-backed authorities reportedly block certain news websites, online messaging and social media platforms, and satellite broadcasts.

The Houthis, the Saudi-led coalition, and Hadi government forces have harassed and detained journalists, and several new arrests were reported in 2021. In April 2020, the Houthi-controlled Specialized Criminal Court in Sanaa issued death sentences against four journalists accused of espionage; they remained in custody as of December 2021. All sides in the conflict have subjected journalists to violent attacks and enforced disappearances. Among other incidents during the year, STC forces raided the offices of the state news agency in Aden in June 2021.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 1 / 4

Islam is the official religion, and the constitution declares Sharia (Islamic law) to be the source of all legislation. A small number of Yemenis belong to non-Muslim religious groups; their rights have traditionally been respected in practice, though conversion from Islam and proselytizing to Muslims is prohibited. Members of the Baha'i community in the north have reported increased persecution under Houthi rule. Legal proceedings against a group of 24 Baha'is arrested in 2017 apparently continued during 2021, though at least five had been released and deported in 2020, and it was unclear whether the others were still in custody.

Since the outbreak of the war in 2015, assassinations and other violent attacks on religious clerics have increased, and combatants on all sides have destroyed many religious buildings across the country.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 0 / 4 (-1)

Since 2015, Houthi officials have been accused of skewing the curriculum in schools and universities to promote their political ideology. Houthi authorities have also dismissed and replaced faculty and administrators who are deemed politically disloyal, and repeatedly detained and prosecuted scholars and students as part of their crackdown on dissent. Outspoken academics face a heightened risk of physical violence from the Houthis as well as other armed groups and progovernment forces, and some scholars have been killed by unidentified assailants in recent years.

The war has caused damage to educational facilities across the country, suspension of classes and other activities at many schools and universities, and deaths of children caught in either errant or deliberate military attacks on schools. Millions of students no longer attend school due to the war, and thousands have been recruited by armed groups.

Score Change: The score declined from 1 to 0 due to the Houthi authorities' growing assertion of ideological control over education in recent years, including through replacement of staff, suppression of dissent, and political indoctrination.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 1 / 4

Freedom of personal expression and private discussion is severely limited as a result of intimidation by armed groups and unchecked surveillance by the Houthi authorities, who have detained critics of their rule and used courts under their control to issue harsh penalties, including death sentences, for some perceived opponents.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 3 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 1 / 4

Yemenis have historically enjoyed a degree of freedom of assembly, limited by periodic restrictions and at times deadly interventions by the government. Demonstrations against both the Hadi government and Houthi authorities have occurred in recent years, resulting in arrests and alleged torture of detainees in some cases.

In September 2021, Yemenis took to the streets in Taiz, Aden, and other cities in the southern governorates to protest worsening economic conditions. STC and progovernment forces opened fire on demonstrators, leading to multiple deaths. In response to the unrest, STC leader Aidarus al-Zoubaidi declared a state of emergency and authorized southern security forces to open fire on protesters.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 1 / 4

A number of nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) work in the country, but their ability to function is restricted by interference from armed groups, and the spread and politicization of COVID-19 has made their work even more dangerous. Houthi forces have closed or raided NGO offices and detained workers, and both main sides in the civil war have blocked or seized humanitarian aid. Human rights defenders risk arrest and detention by both Houthi and anti-Houthi forces, and several arrests were reported during 2021, including by Hadi government forces in Marib Governorate.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 1 / 4

The law acknowledges the right of workers to form and join trade unions, but in practice these organizations have had little freedom to operate. Virtually all unions belong to a single labor federation, and the government is empowered to veto collective bargaining agreements. Normal union activity has been disrupted by the civil war and the related breakdown of the economy.

F. RULE OF LAW: 1 / 16 (-1)F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 1 / 4

The judiciary, though nominally independent, is susceptible to interference from various political factions and armed groups. Authorities have a poor record of enforcing judicial rulings, particularly those issued against prominent tribal or political leaders. Lacking an effective court system, citizens often resort to tribal forms of justice and customary law—practices that have increased as state institutions continue to deteriorate. Criminal courts in Houthi-controlled areas remain active, but they are used as a political instrument by the Houthi leadership, according to UN experts. The judicial system is mostly inoperative in some other parts of the country.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 0 / 4

Arbitrary detention is common, with hundreds of cases documented in recent years. Many amount to enforced disappearances, with no available information about the victims' status or location. Detainees are often held at unofficial detention sites. As with other state institutions, security and intelligence agencies like the Political Security Organization have been split into parallel structures aligned with the different sides in the civil war. In areas that lie within the UAE's sphere of influence in southern Yemen, Emirati special forces have operated a network of secret prisons and detention centers where torture is said to be rife. Human rights lawyers have faced detention or intimidation by both Houthi and Hadi government authorities, particularly when they attempt to represent high-profile defendants.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 0 / 4

The civil war has included periods of acute violence across the country. Saudi-led coalition air strikes have failed to distinguish between military and civilian targets, and artillery fire from Houthi forces has been similarly indiscriminate. A number of other armed factions, including foreign military units and extremist groups like Al-Qaeda in the Arabian Peninsula (AQAP), operate in the country with impunity for any abuses. According to the Armed Conflict Location & Event Data Project, some 145,000 people have been killed in the conflict since the beginning of 2015, including more than 15,000 in 2021. Fighting and related casualties during the year were concentrated in Marib Governorate, where a Houthi offensive made gains against government forces.

In addition to reports of torture and other abuse in prisons and detention centers, detainees have faced a heightened risk of disease due to the COVID-19 pandemic since 2020. In September 2021, Houthi authorities carried out a public execution of nine individuals they said were involved in the 2018 death of a senior Houthi official during an air strike by the Saudi-led coalition. UN representatives condemned the killings, noting that the trial process had not met international standards of due process.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 0 / 4 (-1)

Despite the growing sectarian rift between the Sunni Muslim majority and the large Zaidi Shiite minority, Yemen is relatively homogeneous in terms of language and ethnicity. However, the Muhamasheen face severe social discrimination and poverty. Women also continue to face discrimination in many aspects of life, and their testimony in court is equivalent to half that of a man. Same-sex sexual activity is illegal, with possible penalties including lashes, imprisonment, and death. Due to the severe threats they face, few LGBT+ Yemenis reveal their identity.

Migrants and refugees fleeing war and poverty in the Horn of Africa continue to arrive in Yemen. Many of those entering were seeking work in the Gulf states but faced harsh conditions, violence, and barriers to further travel once in Yemen. The combination of war and the pandemic has worsened conditions for migrants. In March 2021, at least 45 detained migrants died during a fire caused by Houthi security forces, who had attacked their immigration detention center in Sanaa with unidentified projectiles after the detainees organized a hunger strike to protest overcrowded, unsanitary, and abusive conditions at the facility.

Effective legal protections and basic supplies are also lacking for internally displaced persons (IDPs), who have been disproportionately affected by loss of livelihood due to the COVID-19 pandemic. Most perform unskilled jobs in the informal economy, and many have been blamed for spreading the virus.

Score Change: The score declined from 1 to 0 because in the absence of effective legal protections, the country's growing populations of refugees, foreign migrants, and displaced people have faced worsening living conditions, mistreatment, and violence during the civil conflict.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 2 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 0 / 4

There were more than four million IDPs in Yemen by the end of 2021, according to figures released by the Office of the UN High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR). Nearly 100,000 people were displaced during 2021 in Marib Governorate alone, according to some estimates.

Movement within the country is impaired by combat, landmines, damage to infrastructure, and checkpoints at which a variety of armed groups engage in harassment and extortion. Even in peacetime, a woman must obtain permission from her husband or father to receive a passport and travel abroad.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 1 / 4

Property rights and business activity have been severely disrupted by the civil war and unchecked corruption, as well as the retreat of state authorities from large areas of Yemen and the division of the country into spheres of influence controlled by different armed groups. Women do not have equal rights in inheritance matters. Land disputes in the Houthi-held areas are handled by Houthi-controlled courts, which can lead to the rejection of government-issued documentation and the seizure of land.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 1 / 4

Women face disadvantages in divorce and custody proceedings and require a male guardian's permission to marry. Child marriage is a widespread problem. There are some restrictions on marriage to foreigners; a woman can confer citizenship on a child from a foreign-born spouse if the child is born in Yemen. The penal code allows lenient sentences for those convicted of "honor crimes"—assaults or killings of women by family members for alleged immoral behavior. Although female genital mutilation is banned in state medical facilities, it is still prevalent in some areas. Extremist groups have attempted to impose crude versions of Sharia in territory under their control, harshly punishing alleged violations related to sexual activity, personal appearance, and other matters.

The war has increased the risk of human trafficking, and after 2015 the government was no longer able to pursue antitrafficking efforts it had previously begun. Migrants, refugees, and IDPs are especially vulnerable to exploitation. Children have reportedly been recruited as fighters by all sides in the war.

Border controls and naval blockades imposed by the Saudi-led coalition have contributed to shortages of food, medicine, fuel, and other essential imports, leaving the public more exposed to famine and disease as well as coercion and deprivation by armed groups and illegal traders. The World Food Programme reported that as of December 2021, 16.2 million people were food insecure in Yemen, with 47,000 of them believed to be living in famine-like conditions. A cholera outbreak continued in 2021. By the end of the year, the World Health Organization had reported more than 10,000 confirmed cases of COVID-19 and nearly 2,000 deaths, though limited testing and other factors meant that both cases and deaths were likely undercounted.

Zambia

Population: 19,100,000

Capital: Lusaka

Freedom Status: Partly Free

Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: Zambia's political system features regular multiparty elections, and some civil liberties are respected. However, opposition parties face onerous legal and practical obstacles to fair competition, and the government regularly invokes restrictive laws to narrow political space. In 2021, Zambia experienced its third democratic transfer of power when the opposition United Party for National Development (UPND) won presidential and legislative elections.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- In August, UPND candidate Hakainde Hichilema defeated incumbent Edgar Lungu of the Patriotic Front (PF) in the presidential election. The election was marred by widespread violence, the selective enforcement of the 1955 Public Order Act (POA) and COVID-19-related regulations, and a polling-day social media blackout.
- In August, the UPND won legislative elections held concurrently with the presidential contest, displacing the PF as the largest party in the National Assembly. While the results were considered credible, the contests were similarly marred by violence and the selective enforcement of the law to impede the opposition.
- In March, the PF government enacted the Cyber Security and Cyber Crimes Act (CSCCA). The law requires telecommunications providers to install hardware and software that can facilitate the interception of messages, among other measures.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 21 / 40 (+1)

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 6 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 2 / 4

The president is directly elected to serve up to two five-year terms. In August 2021, UPND candidate Hakainde Hichilema defeated incumbent Edgar Lungu of the PF in what was Hichilema's third attempt against Lungu. Hichilema won 59 percent of the vote, while Lungu won 38.7 percent. Turnout was high, at 70.6 percent. Lungu initially questioned the results but later conceded; Hichilema assumed office in late August.

The electoral period was marred by violence, with PF and UPND supporters clashing in several provinces as the vote approached. In mid-June, the Electoral Commission of Zambia (ECZ) ordered a halt to PF and UPND campaigning in four districts, including Lusaka, because of violence, though those restrictions ended by late July. Lungu deployed military forces in parts of Zambia in early August, and military personnel remained on patrol through polling day.

The electoral period was also affected by hate speech. In late June, the ECZ suspended former information minister Chishimba Kambwili from campaign activities for engaging in hate speech against the Tonga ethnic group. The restriction was lifted after Kambwili apologized in July, though he continued to espouse those views afterwards.

Zambian internet users were unable to access social networks including Facebook and WhatsApp on election day, though some users were able to connect using virtual private networks. The High Court of Lusaka overturned the order to disrupt connectivity the day after polling.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 2 / 4

The unicameral National Assembly comprises 156 elected members, up to 8 members appointed by the president, and 3 seats allocated for the vice president, the speaker, and a deputy speaker.

The August 2021 polls were held concurrently with the presidential election and featured the same problems. The UPND won 82 seats, up from 58 in the last legislature. The PF initially won 59 seats, a fall from 80 in the last legislature. The Party of National Unity and Progress won 1, while independents won 13. The PF won a special election for an Eastern Province seat in October, bringing their total to 60.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 2 / 4

The ECZ is responsible for managing the election process but lacks capacity. The US-based Carter Center, which monitored the August 2021 polls, noted that the government did not implement previous observers' recommendations to independently select commissioners. The Carter Center also criticized the ECZ for managing the electoral process "without proper consultation with stakeholders."

The ECZ conducted a voter-registration drive in 2020 to build a new voter roll. As part of that process, over 16,000 prisoners were also registered to vote as of that December. The ECZ's overall management of that process was criticized by observers and the UPND. In March 2021, Hichilema claimed that younger Zambians were underrepresented and that the ECZ was more effective in registering PF voters. African Union (AU) observers noted that the ECZ dismissed calls to audit the roll.

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 2 / 4

Political parties are registered under the Societies Act and do not regularly face onerous registration requirements. Independent candidates may also run for office. However, the authorities selectively enforced COVID-19 restrictions and the POA to impede opposition rallies during the 2021 electoral period.

Political party members faced official harassment and arrest as well as violence during the electoral period. In March, authorities in Copperbelt Province arrested 25 members of a UPND youth cadre as they reportedly prepared to take part in a rally. The UPND criticized the arrest, noting that PF youth cadres appeared to operate without official interference. In late July, two PF members were killed, with police suspecting that UPND members had murdered them. On election day, PF provincial chairman Jackson Kung'u was killed; UPND members who suspected Kung'u of possessing premarked ballots were allegedly responsible for killing him.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 3 / 4 (+1)

In 2021, Zambia experienced its third democratic transfer of power between rival groups. Opposition parties regularly win National Assembly seats. Laws against election-related violence are poorly enforced, however.

The UPND won the August 2021 presidential and legislative elections despite PF efforts to impede their campaign. The PF benefited from bias among state media and some private media outlets, along with the selective enforcement of the POA and COVID-19 regulations and restrictions on the movement of then candidate Hichilema.

Score change: The score improved from 2 to 3 because opposition candidates won the presidential and legislative elections despite government efforts to impede their campaigns.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 3 / 4

The people's political choices are largely free from domination by groups that are not democratically accountable, though the PF has at times been accused of undemocratic tactics including vote-buying to ensure election victories.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 3 / 4

Suffrage in Zambia is universal for adult citizens. Women have equal political rights under the constitution. Gender-equity legislation took effect in 2015, though regulations to enact its measures have not been put into force since its passage.

Women have been dissuaded from seeking office due to candidate-registration fees and educational requirements, though registration fees fell in March 2021. Women held only 15 percent of National Assembly seats as of September. Female cabinet representation is also low; in September, President Hichilema appointed only five women to cabinet posts. Legislators also approved the abolishment of the Ministry of Gender later that month, with its functions moving to the president's office.

Presidents since independence have failed to honor the 1964 Barotseland Agreement, which promised the Lozi ethnic group of Western Province limited local self-governance. In August 2021, Barotse separatist leader Akufuna Mumbotwa, who was arrested for treason in 2014, was pardoned by outgoing president Lungu.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 4 / 12C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 2 / 4

Flawed elections have undermined the democratic legitimacy of executive and legislative officeholders. The executive has also exhibited dominance over legislators in the past. Candidates who won posts in the August 2021 elections were able to assume power smoothly, however. The UPND, which became the largest party in National Assembly after the elections, is able to pass legislation with little effective resistance from opposition legislators.

Corruption in government is widespread, and impunity is common. Prosecutions and court decisions on corruption charges, when they do occur, are often thought to reflect political motivations. Limited funding and enforcement restrict the efficacy of institutional safeguards against corruption, and PF leaders have sometimes undermined anticorruption efforts. In September 2021, President Hichilema moved the Anti-Corruption Office, the economic crimes commission, and the public prosecutor's office under his own office.

In 2020, the Financial Intelligence Centre (FIC), a government anticorruption watchdog, disseminated 14 reports covering suspected corruption worth as much as 2.2 billion kwacha ($121 million) to authorities. The FIC reported that government officials awarded noncompetitive contracts for payment and that overvalued contracts were often awarded without the expectation of work being completed.

In September 2021, Transparency International called on law enforcement agencies to investigate a patronage network allegedly profiting from the illegal trade in mukula wood.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 1 / 4

Zambia continues to struggle with government transparency and accountability. There is no access to information law. The Anti-Corruption Act requires some public officeholders to make financial declarations, but is only loosely enforced.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 30 / 60 (-2)D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 8 / 16 (-1)*D1. Are there free and independent media? 1 / 4

Press freedom is constitutionally guaranteed but restricted in practice. Public outlets have exhibited a pro-PF bias while private outlets are largely polarized. Self-censorship remains common.

Outlets that are perceived as aligned with PF opponents have faced arbitrary closure, while critical journalists risked damage to equipment, frivolous lawsuits, arrest, and harassment from the PF and its supporters. In 2020, for example, the Independent Broadcasting Authority (IBA) shuttered privately owned Prime TV following a protracted dispute with the PF government. In mid-August 2021, the IBA restored Prime TV's broadcasting license.

Several outlets were targeted by PF supporters during 2021. In early February, PF supporters reportedly attacked Liberty Community Radio in the northern district of Mporokoso after it hosted Democratic Party leader Harry Kalaba. In early March, PF supporters forcibly entered the facility of Chete FM, which featured UPND members in a broadcast. Opposition members at the station were assaulted, while PF supporters used tear-gas and pepper spray against station staff. In early June, equipment at Kalungwishi Radio was damaged by unidentified arsonists.

Journalists may also be affected by the CSCCA, which took effect in March 2021. In May, the Collaboration on International ICT Policy in East and Southern Africa (CIPESA) criticized the CSCCA, warning that journalists could face surveillance under the new law.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 3 / 4

Constitutional protections for religious freedom are generally respected. However, the constitution declares Zambia to be a Christian nation. The PF government was criticized for blurring the separation of church and state, including by attempting to include “Christian morality” in the constitution, backing an annual National Day of Prayer, building an inter-denominational church, and appointing a minister of national guidance and religious affairs. In September 2021, the UPND government abolished that ministry, though it maintained the National Day of Prayer in an October decision.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 2 / 4 (-1)

The government generally does not restrict academic freedom. However, authorities have pressured student unions in response to protests, while student demonstrators have risked arrest by police. University professors face intimidation for pursuing academic activities of a political nature.

The PF government targeted academic Sishuwa Sishuwa for authoring a March 2021 opinion piece in which he discussed the possibility of unrest following the August elections. In late March, Emmanuel Mwamba, then Zambia’s ambassador to Ethiopia and the AU, implied that an opposition party paid Sishuwa for his article. In April, Mwamba accused Sishuwa of sedition in a letter to the inspector general of police, reportedly prompting an investigation into the academic.

Score change: The score declined from 3 to 2 because a professor faced a police investigation in connection with his political commentary.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 2 / 4

There is some freedom of private discussion and personal expression in Zambia, though the PF government appeared to monitor citizens’ speech on social media, at times resulting in arrests. Zambians can also face prosecutions for defamation.

Zambians also face surveillance under the CSCCA, which was enacted in March 2021. Under the law, service providers must install hardware and software that allow for the interception of communications. Section 59 of the CSCCA, meanwhile, prohibits communications that can “corrupt morals.”

Access to social media was restricted on polling day in August 2021, though the High Court of Lusaka ordered an end to the restrictions the day after.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 6 / 12 (-1)

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 1 / 4 (-1)

Freedom of assembly is constitutionally guaranteed but has not been consistently respected by the government. Peaceful anti-PF protests and opposition meetings were frequently restricted under the POA. Police must be notified in advance of all public gatherings and often denied permission for political events to proceed.

Political rallies and assemblies were affected by the PF government’s use of the POA and COVID-19 regulations ahead of the August 2021 elections. In its report, the Carter Center noted that authorities disproportionately halted or restricted UPND events using pandemic-related rules, while PF events were largely unrestricted.

Assemblies were also impacted by violence during the year. Cadres of PF and UPND supporters engaged in acts of violence, property destruction, and intimidation to disrupt peaceful assemblies during the electoral period, though PF supporters were likelier to perpetrate such acts against their opponents. The ECZ suspended campaigning in Lusaka and three other districts because of violence between June and July 2021, while then president Lungu deployed the military in parts of Zambia in August for the same reason. Authorities also used force to disperse some opposition rallies.

Score change: The score declined from 2 to 1 because COVID-19 restrictions and a public-order law were disproportionately used to restrict opposition gatherings and because authorities forcefully dispersed opposition election rallies.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 2 / 4

Nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) operate in a restrictive environment and are required to register every five years under the 2009 NGO Act. In November 2020, the PF government amended the law to increase monitoring of NGO funds for possible illegal activities such as money laundering and the financing of terrorism. Human rights defenders and activists often experience intimidation and cyberharassment from political party supporters.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 3 / 4

The law generally provides for the right to join unions, strike, and bargain collectively, though workers in essential services do not have the right to strike, and the category is defined to include the mining industry. Zambian trade unions, which were once among Africa's strongest, faced interference and marginalization under the PF.

F. RULE OF LAW: 8 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 2 / 4

Judicial independence is guaranteed by law, but in practice the judiciary is subject to political pressure. In late 2018, the Constitutional Court, then composed entirely of Lungu appointees, issued a unanimous ruling that appeared to support Lungu's eligibility for another term.

President Hichilema appointed judge Mumba Malila as Supreme Court chief justice after taking office, a decision legislators ratified in December 2021. Legislators also ratified President Hichilema's appointment of a Judicial Complaints Commission member that month.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 2 / 4

Pretrial detainees are sometimes held for years without trial owing to case backlogs. Many of the accused lack legal representation. Bail is frequently denied to detainees. In rural areas, customary courts of variable quality and consistency—whose decisions often conflict with the constitution and national law—decide many civil matters.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 2 / 4

Allegations of police brutality, including the use of torture to extract confessions, are widespread. Security forces generally operate with impunity. Conditions in pretrial detention facilities and prisons are poor, with reports of forced labor, abuse of inmates by authorities, and deplorable health conditions.

While the death penalty remains on the books, no executions have taken place since 1997. In January 2021, then president Lungu commuted the death sentences of 246 people.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 2 / 4

Women are constitutionally guaranteed the same rights as men, but gender-based discrimination and sexual harassment are prevalent in practice.

Same-sex sexual activity is punishable by up to life in prison. A same-sex couple sentenced to 15 years' imprisonment in 2019 was pardoned in 2020.

Refugees are protected under local and international law but often suffer from limited access to basic services and gender-based violence (GBV). Some 75,000 refugees resided in Zambia as of December 2021.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 8 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 3 / 4

The government generally respects the constitutionally protected right to free internal movement and foreign travel. However, internal movement is often impeded by petty corruption, such as police demands for bribes at checkpoints. Authorities also restricted the movement of UPND supporters and then candidate Hichilema during the 2021 electoral period.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 2 / 4

Agricultural land in rural areas is mostly administered under traditional authorities. However, the president retains ultimate authority over all land and can intercede to block or compel its sale or transfer. Women are frequently discriminated in property and inheritance matters. The process of meeting regulatory requirements for starting and operating businesses can be lengthy and opaque.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 2 / 4

Personal status issues such as marriage and divorce are governed by either statutory or customary law, with customary practices varying among different ethnic groups. Due in large part to a government-backed strategy in place since 2016, the rate of child marriage has decreased significantly in recent years, though more than 30 percent of women aged 20 to 24 were married before age 18 according to 2018 UN Children's Fund data.

Domestic abuse is common, and traditional norms inhibit many women from reporting assaults. While rape can draw a maximum penalty of life in prison with hard labor, the problem is widespread, and the law is not frequently enforced. Police recorded a 19.8 percent increase in GBV between the third quarters of 2019 and 2020. In January 2021, police recorded a 10.7 percent rise in GBV between the third and fourth quarters of 2020.

Labor exploitation, child labor, and human trafficking remain prevalent despite laws meant to prevent them. Zambian authorities continue to struggle in sustaining antitrafficking efforts. Most human trafficking in Zambia reportedly entails cross-border trafficking of young men and exploitation of women and children from rural areas in economic pursuits ranging from domestic work to mining and agriculture.

The 2021 edition of the US State Department's Trafficking in Persons Report noted that while some trafficking survivors received assistance, few male survivors were accommodated in shelters. Some forms of sex trafficking are criminalized, though sex-trafficking survivors were often charged with prostitution while alleged traffickers escaped investigation. The State Department also noted that Zambian children faced higher risks of sex trafficking and forced labor during COVID-19-related school closures.

Zimbabwe

Population: 15,100,000

Capital: Harare

Freedom Status: Not Free

Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: The Zimbabwe African National Union–Patriotic Front (ZANU-PF) has dominated Zimbabwean politics since independence in 1980, in part by carrying out severe crackdowns on the political opposition, critical media, and other sources of dissent. President Emmerson Mnangagwa took power in 2017 after the military intervened to remove longtime president Robert Mugabe amid factional divisions within the ruling party. However, the new administration has largely retained the legal, administrative, and security architecture inherited from the Mugabe regime, and after an initial period of improvement, stepped up repression to consolidate its authority. Endemic corruption, weak rule of law, and poor protections for workers and land rights remain among Zimbabwe's critical challenges.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- In May, Parliament passed a constitutional amendment that eliminated direct elections for the vice president, and established a new procedure under which the vice president is appointed by the president. Opposition groups condemned the amendment, saying that it was designed to further consolidate power in the office of the president.
- The ruling ZANU-PF party continued to silence dissenting voices through arbitrary arrests of opposition leaders, human rights activists, and journalists.
- COVID-19 lockdown restrictions continued to limit Zimbabweans' freedom of movement. Activists were targeted by the authorities for violating lockdown measures. The opposition Movement for Democratic Change Alliance (MDC Alliance) was systematically denied clearance to hold meetings due to lockdown regulations.
- In clear breach of the Provincial Councils and Administration Act and the Private Voluntary Organisations (PVO) Act, Harare provincial development coordinator Tafadzwa Muguti banned all nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) and PVOs that defied his June instructions to report directly to his office. The organizations were accused of operating outside their mandates and working in opposition to the current government. This ban was lifted in September after a High Court ruling.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 11 / 40

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 1 / 4

The president is directly elected and limited to two five-year terms under the 2013 constitution. Former president Robert Mugabe was forced to resign after 37 years in power as a result of the 2017 coup. ZANU-PF then selected Mnangagwa, whom Mugabe had dismissed as vice president, to succeed him. A presidential election, alongside parliamentary and local polls, was held as planned in July 2018. Mnangagwa was credited with 50.8 percent of the vote, followed by MDC Alliance candidate Nelson Chamisa with 44.3 percent and Movement for Democratic Change–Tsvangirai (MDC-T) candidate Thokozani Khupe, with 0.9 percent.

International and local observers reported a peaceful campaign but raised concerns about the election's overall conduct and integrity. Southern African Development Community (SADC) and European Union (EU) observers noted challenges including parties having difficulty accessing voter rolls, progovernment bias by state media, contested postal voting, the denial of the diaspora's right to vote, reports of assisted voting, and intimidation meant to aid the ruling party.

Vote-tallying irregularities and delays led to postelection tensions. The MDC Alliance leadership declared victory in the presidential election before the official results were released, and accused ZANU-PF of attempting to rig the vote. Postelection opposition protests erupted in Harare, and the military was deployed to disperse them, leading to several deaths. The Zimbabwe Electoral Commission (ZEC) ultimately declared Mnangagwa the winner but the MDC, whose factions had reunited after the elections, refused to recognize the legitimacy of Mnangagwa's victory.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 1 / 4

Zimbabwe has a bicameral legislature. In the lower chamber, the 270-seat National Assembly, 210 members are elected through a first-past-the-post system with one member per constituency, and 60 women are elected by proportional representation. The 80-seat Senate includes six members from each of Zimbabwe's 10 provinces who are elected through proportional representation. Sixteen are indirectly elected by regional councils, two seats are reserved for people with disabilities, and two are reserved for tribal chiefs. Members in both houses serve five-year terms.

ZANU-PF won 180 of the 270 National Assembly seats in the 2018 parliamentary elections. The MDC Alliance won 87, and the MDC-T won 1 via proportional representation. An independent former ZANU-PF member and the National Patriotic Front, a ZANU-PF splinter faction, each took one seat. In the Senate, ZANU-PF secured 34 elected seats, the MDC Alliance took 25, and the MDC-T took 1. Bureaucratic irregularities and media bias also marred the parliamentary elections. Traditional leaders ignored the constitutional ban on their participation in partisan politics.

In March 2020, the Supreme Court ruled that Chamisa was not the legitimate opposition leader, replacing him with MDC-T leader Khupe. Khupe subsequently recalled 31 MDC Alliance legislators of both houses in 2020, forcing them to surrender their seats. Another 15 MDC Alliance members defected to the MDC-T to retain their seats.

ZANU-PF won most local and national by-elections held during 2019, though observers raised concerns about the interference of traditional leaders, reports of violence, alleged ballot-box stuffing, and the distribution of food and medicine to secure votes. By-elections have been suspended indefinitely since 2020 due to COVID-19-related restrictions.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 1 / 4

The ZEC is responsible for election management and oversight, but its independence from ZANU-PF is questionable. International election monitors criticized its management of the 2018 polls, noting issues with vote-count stewardship, opaque procurement processes, and the irregular arrangement of the ballots themselves. Political parties and civil society had difficulty accessing voter rolls, affecting audit and verification processes envisioned by the Electoral Act.

The introduction of biometric voter registration in 2017 remains problematic, and on election day in 2018 there was no biometric voter authentication. There was a noticeable decline in voter registration in Harare and Bulawayo, possibly due in part to fewer registration kits being allocated there.

Weeks ahead of the 2018 elections, the Constitutional Court ruled that Zimbabweans abroad must return to the country to register to vote, effectively contravening constitutional provisions guaranteeing every citizen the right to vote.

In July 2019, the ZEC appointed a former military figure as its chief elections officer. The opposition criticized the move, noting his long history of overseeing flawed elections during his tenure as acting chief elections officer during the 2018 balloting.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 5 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 2 / 4

Political parties generally form without interference. However, state media tend not to cover opposition parties, impacting their competitiveness. Authorities often suppress opposition gatherings. While opposition groups were able to hold most meetings with limited disruption in the run-up to the 2018 elections, the MDC and its supporters faced postelection raids, arrests, and prosecutions. MDC members continued to be targeted in 2021.

Groups such as Mthwakazi Liberation Front (MLF) are blocked from conducting memorial meetings for victims of the 1980s Gukurahundi massacres. The MLF is regarded by the government as a secessionist political party, and its leaders have faced persecution.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 1 / 4

ZANU-PF has dominated the government since independence, though the MDC held the post of prime minister as part of a power-sharing deal with Mugabe between 2009 and 2013.

The MDC managed to increase its share of parliamentary seats in the 2018 elections despite the uneven playing field, and Chamisa secured almost a million more votes in the 2018 presidential contest than the MDC candidate had in 2013. However, postelection violence limited the opposition's ability to operate and gain support, as reflected in the 2019 by-election results.

The opposition has recently been weakened by factional infighting, which ZANU-PF reportedly fostered. By the end of 2020, Douglas Mwonozora had taken over the MDC-T presidency from Khupe and as leader of the opposition, his faction benefits from government funding.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 1 / 4

The military continues to play a critical role in political affairs since Mugabe's ouster in 2017. Many senior military officials assumed leadership positions in ZANU-PF and the government.

Traditional leaders, who wield influence over public resources such as food aid, have intimidated villagers, restricted opposition access to their areas, and issued political statements in support of the ruling party, despite constitutional provisions and court orders requiring them to abstain from partisan politics. The president of the National Council of Chiefs, Fortune Charumbira, publicly supported Mnangagwa and ZANU-PF ahead of the 2018 elections, and defied a court order to retract his statements.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 1 / 4

Zimbabwe's ethnic Shona majority dominates ZANU-PF, and members of the Ndebele minority have at times expressed frustration about political marginalization by both ZANU-PF and the MDC.

Women and their interests are underrepresented in the political system. The 2018 elections resulted in a decline in the number of women elected outside proportional representation. After the vote, women made up 34 percent of the parliament, down from the post-2013 35 percent figure. The proportional representation quota expires in 2023, raising questions about whether progress in women's representation will be sustained. Four of 23 presidential candidates in 2018, or 17 percent, were women.

LGBT+ advocacy groups exist, but severe discrimination limits their ability to advance their interests in the political sphere.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 3 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 1 / 4

The president and parliament generally determine policies and legislation, but they lack strong electoral legitimacy, and the parliament does not serve as an effective check on executive power. In October 2019, after MDC lawmakers staged a walkout during Mnangagwa's state of the nation address, the speaker imposed heavy financial penalties.

The military continues to interfere in civilian governance. Some officers received cabinet appointments following the 2017 coup, and senior commanders were rewarded with ambassadorships during 2019. The government denied rumors of another coup in June 2020, which were prompted by the military's involvement in seizing MDC property and enforcing COVID-19-related lockdown measures.

Corruption is endemic, and past revelations of large-scale graft did not lead to successful prosecutions. In early 2019, President Mnangagwa dismissed the existing Zimbabwe Anti-Corruption Commission (ZACC) board and appointed the wife of a former general, a retired major, former opposition politicians, and civil society leaders to the body. Though ZACC continues to refer corruption cases to prosecutors, opposition leaders have called for it to be disbanded, accusing the commission of lacking the independence, capacity, and will to carry out its mandate.

Corruption featured heavily in the government's COVID-19 response. In June 2020, Health Minister Obadiah Moyo was arrested after ZACC accused him of steering a $42 million contract to a firm outside the pharmaceutical sector. Moyo was dismissed from his post in July.

In September 2020, ZACC reported that the National Pharmaceutical Company allegedly violated procurement rules when acquiring equipment and chemicals for COVID-19-related work earlier in the year, and Deputy Health Minister John Mangwiro unsuccessfully steered a related tender to a firm that offered inflated prices. Despite calls for Mangwiro to be prosecuted, he has remained in that post through 2021.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 1 / 4

Government processes are generally opaque. Access to information is constitutionally protected, but restrictive laws limit the ability of media outlets and ordinary citizens to obtain government information. In July 2020, new freedom-of-information legislation, which aimed to make some information freely available by replacing the restrictive Access to Information and Protection of Privacy Act, was enacted.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 17 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 7 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 1 / 4

The constitution protects media freedom, but restrictive laws undermine this guarantee. Harsh penalties, including prison sentences, for violations of laws like the Criminal Law (Codification and Reform) Act (CLCRA) contribute to self-censorship among journalists.

The state-controlled Zimbabwe Broadcasting Corporation (ZBC) has historically dominated broadcast media. Many Zimbabweans rely on radio for information, but media diversity is limited by sustained refusals to grant licenses to community radio stations. Commercial radio licenses usually go to state-controlled companies or individuals connected to ZANU-PF. The government controls the two main daily newspapers, though there are several independent print outlets. In November 2020, the Broadcasting Authority of Zimbabwe broke the ZBC's monopoly by issuing new television broadcasting licenses. All six awardees were connected to the government or ruling party, and one was owned by the Defense Ministry.

Journalists continued to face detention and arrest throughout the year. In May 2021, Jeffrey Moyo, a freelance journalist working for a number of international media outlets, was arrested in Harare and charged with violating Section 36 of Zimbabwe's Immigration Act by allegedly helping two New York Times journalists obtain false media accreditations. Earlier that month, Zim Morning Post editor Elias Mambo and reporter Farai Machamire were arrested under Section 95 of Zimbabwe's Criminal Law (Codification and Reform) Act of 2004, for alleged criminal insult after interviewing a politician. In September, 10 journalists were arrested for covering a demonstration against the unconstitutional exclusion of MDC Alliance representatives from ZEC stakeholder meetings.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 3 / 4

Freedom of religion is generally respected in Zimbabwe. However, congregations perceived to be critical of the government have faced harassment. In August 2020, Roman Catholic bishops criticized the government in pastoral letter, and authorities called on congregants to "ignore" the letter later that month.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 2 / 4

The Ministry of Higher Education supervises education policy at universities, and the president serves as chancellor of all eight state-run universities. The government has the authority for enforcing discipline at state-run universities. Students face violent police responses to campus protests.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 1 / 4

Zimbabweans have enjoyed some freedom and openness in private discussion, but official surveillance of political activity is a deterrent to unfettered speech. Individuals have been arrested for critical posts on social media, prompting self-censorship online.

In September 2021, Parliament passed the Cyber Security and Data Protection bill, which President Mnangagwa signed into law in December. Several NGOs have criticized the law for infringing on individuals' rights to freedom of expression online and providing avenues that allow authorities to monitor private communication and target opposition figures.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 3 / 12E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 1 / 4

Freedom of assembly is constitutionally guaranteed but poorly upheld in practice. In November 2019, the Maintenance of Peace and Order Act (MOPA) replaced the more repressive Public Order and Security Act, though MOPA retains heavy assembly restrictions. Authorities instituted a strict COVID-19 lockdown in March 2020, limiting the size of public gatherings. While such restrictions remained in place throughout 2021, the strictest lockdown measures were lifted in September.

Opposition groups continue to struggle to organize meetings, but their efforts are routinely frustrated by authorities. The Zimbabwe Peace Project (ZPP) recorded widespread event disruption, harassment, and intimidation efforts targeting opposition groups and leaders throughout 2021.

In July 2021, well-known activist Makomborero Haruzivishe was granted bail after being arrested earlier in the year for allegedly inciting public violence. Haruzivishe has a long history of spearheading peaceful protests and speaking out against government repression; he has been arrested 38 times over the past decade, though he has never been convicted of any crime. Despite being granted bail, Haruzivishe remained incarcerated through the end of the year, making this the longest period of detention he has faced.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 1 / 4

NGOs face restrictions under laws including the CLCRA and the Private Voluntary Organisations (PVO) Act, despite rights laid out in the constitution. Any organization that engages in charitable or humanitarian work is required to register as a PVO, and the disruption of PVO and NGO activity by the authorities is relatively common. NGO leaders and members faced detentions, abductions, and continued scrutiny in 2021.

In June 2021, Harare's provincial development coordinator Tafadzwa Muguti issued a directive ordering all NGOs to submit their work plans to his office for regulation and approval. This order directly contravened provisions made for NGOs in the PVO Act, and was met with widespread noncompliance. In response, Muguti's office issued an order banning hundreds of NGOs. A September High Court decision reversed this ban, ruling that Muguti's order was unlawful and declaring it null and void, removing legal constraints on NGOs that had not complied with the order.

In November, the government proposed an amendment to the PVO Act, which seeks to expand the definition of PVOs and further limit how NGOs can operate, including by prohibiting any political involvement or affiliation and requiring additional governmental oversight for certain types of organizations.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 1 / 4

The Labour Act gives the government broad authority to veto collective bargaining agreements it deems economically harmful, and to regulate unions' internal operations. Strikes are banned in "essential" industries and subject to procedural restrictions. Due to the unemployment and heightened informal employment that have accompanied Zimbabwe's economic crisis, unions are grossly underfunded. Strikes are sometimes tolerated, though union leaders are often charged with subversion for such activity.

In March 2020, doctors and nurses working in public hospitals launched a strike over a lack of protective equipment. In June, the Zimbabwe Nurses Association launched a strike aimed at securing pay in US dollars. In October, teachers held a strike over pay and working conditions.

F. RULE OF LAW: 2 / 16F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 1 / 4

Pressure on the courts to endorse executive actions and protect ZANU-PF's interests has eroded the judiciary's independence. Judges occasionally rule against the government in sensitive cases, but this is rare, and such rulings are not always respected.

Individual judges faced a further loss in independence when Chief Justice Luke Malaba issued a directive instructing them to clear rulings with superiors in July 2020. Malaba rescinded his directive after fierce criticism later that month.

In May 2021, a constitutional amendment introduced new changes affecting the judiciary. Judges of the Constitutional Court and the Supreme Court will now retire at 75 instead of at 70, allowing the president to extend Malaba's contested position. Senior judges joining the bench for the first time are now appointed by the president in consultation with the Judicial Service Commission instead of being subjected to public interviews. The introduction of the amendment contravened the constitution, as it did not follow procedures requiring a 90-day notice period to allow for public input.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 0 / 4

Constitutionally stipulated due process protections are not enforced. Security personnel frequently ignore basic rights regarding detention, searches, seizures, and accused persons are often held and interrogated without legal counsel or explanation of the reason for arrest. Lawyers also face detention and arrest on spurious charges. Perceived opponents of the regime faced arrests and detentions throughout 2021.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 0 / 4

Security forces backed by ZANU-PF have long engaged in acts of extralegal violence, including against opposition supporters, with impunity. Detainees and protesters often face police brutality, sometimes resulting in death. Overcrowded prisons are unsanitary, food shortages are rampant, and prisoners risk contracting illnesses including COVID-19.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 1 / 4

While discrimination is prohibited under the 2013 constitution, it is not expressly prohibited on the basis of sexual orientation or gender identity. Sex between men is a criminal offense and can be punished with a fine and up to a year in prison. Land and indigenization policies have previously been criticized for discriminating against white Zimbabweans.

Despite legal protections against gender discrimination, women face significant disadvantages in practice, including in employment and compensation.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 5 / 16G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 2 / 4

Movement has been restricted by the extensive use of police roadblocks, which have been deployed in recent years to impede protests. Roadblocks and documentation checks have also been used to enforce COVID-19 lockdown measures.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 1 / 4

Land rights are poorly protected, and in rural areas, the nationalization of land has left both commercial farmers and smallholders with limited security of tenure. Women face discrimination in terms of access to and ownership of land, particularly communal or family land controlled by traditional leaders or male relatives.

In August 2020, the government launched a compensation scheme to support White and foreign-born farmers affected by a 2000s land reform program. Under the program, some landowners may regain lost property.

In June 2021, the government began the process of seizing a privately owned farm belonging to three Black Zimbabweans, including Siphosami Malunga, a well-known human rights activist and critic of the government, reflecting long-standing concerns regarding the security of property rights for all Zimbabweans.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 1 / 4

Laws on personal status matters such as marriage and divorce are generally equitable, but customary practices put women at a disadvantage. Domestic violence is a problem, and sexual abuse is widespread, especially against girls.

Child marriages were banned in 2016, but factors including poverty, certain religious views, and lack of enforcement have sustained the practice; a third of girls are married by age 18. In June 2020, UK-based NGO CAMFED reported that more children were considering marriage in response to the COVID-19 pandemic's economic effects.

The Termination of Pregnancy Act makes abortion illegal except in very limited circumstances. Same-sex marriages are constitutionally prohibited.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 1 / 4

Due to an ongoing economic crisis, many workers are not adequately compensated, and can go unpaid for months. Inflation has accelerated, with the government reporting a figure of 837 percent in August 2020. The International Trade Union Confederation Global Rights Index categorized Zimbabwe as one of the worst countries to work in its 2021 assessment.

The government has continued efforts to combat the problem of human trafficking. Men, women, and children can be found engaged in forced labor in the agricultural sector, forced begging, and forced domestic work. Women and girls remain particularly vulnerable to sex trafficking.

Territory Reports

Abkhazia

Population: 243,000

Freedom Status: Partly Free

Note: Freedom in the World reports assess the level of political rights and civil liberties in a given geographical area, regardless of whether they are affected by the state, nonstate actors, or foreign powers. Disputed territories are sometimes assessed separately if they meet certain criteria, including boundaries that are sufficiently stable to allow year-on-year comparisons. For more information, see the report methodology and FAQ.

Overview: Abkhazia, a breakaway region of Georgia, has maintained de facto independence since the end of a civil conflict in 1993. The government is financially dependent on Russia, which has a military presence in Abkhazia and is one of a handful of the UN member-states that recognizes the territory's independence. The tumultuous political environment features significant opposition and civil society activity. Ongoing problems include a flawed criminal justice system, discrimination against ethnic Georgians, and a lack of economic opportunity.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- Authorities deployed the army and riot police in December to prevent opposition protesters from taking over the parliament building during an antigovernment demonstration. The protesters, who demanded the resignation of President Aslan Bzhania, were forcibly dispersed; despite the use of tear gas and batons, there were no reports of protesters or police being hospitalized.
- In June, the parliament adopted legislation requiring all public officials and their close relatives to submit annual declarations of income, property, and expenses. The declarations were submitted in July before being made public the following month.
- Abkhazian authorities opened the main crossing with Georgia for certain residents in February almost a year after it had been closed as a COVID-19-related health measure. The crossing was opened for all residents who possess locally authorized travel documents in July.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 17 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 5 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 2 / 4

Abkhazia's 1999 constitution established a presidential system, in which the president and vice president are directly elected for five-year terms.

In 2019, then-president Raul Khajimba appeared to win reelection in a runoff of the year's presidential poll, which had been rescheduled after his opponent Aslan Bzhania was hospitalized with mercury poisoning. Bzhania ended his candidacy and was replaced by former Sukhumi mayor Alkhas Kvitsinia, who unsuccessfully sued to overturn the results of the election after he lost by 1 percent of the vote. In a rapid series of events in January 2020, opposition protesters broke into government headquarters to demand Khajimba's resignation, a majority of lawmakers called on him to resign, and the Supreme Court overturned its 2019 decision and annulled the results of the 2019 runoff. Khajimba resigned a few days later.

Bzhania won a snap election called for March 2020, taking more than 56 percent of the vote in the first round. Two lesser-known candidates divided the remainder; Khajimba did not participate. Most established election monitors do not assess Abkhazia's elections. However, informal observations indicated that the balloting and campaign period were relatively free.

Under the constitution, the prime minister and cabinet are appointed by and accountable to the president. In April 2020, President Bzhania appointed former president Aleksandr Ankvab as prime minister.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 2 / 4

The parliament, or People's Assembly, comprises 35 members elected for five-year terms from single-seat constituencies. The 2017 parliamentary elections were marred by instances of intimidation, with violent attacks on two candidates. The voting was voided and rescheduled in one district due to ballot irregularities. Independent deputies dominated the new legislature, including many who were oriented toward the opposition, though about 20 legislators were considered supporters of Khajimba.

Following the March 2020 snap presidential election, four lawmakers left their seats to join the executive branch, including the new president and his prime minister. Their seats were filled through snap elections in July and September 2020. In December 2021, Bzhania announced that parliamentary elections would be held in March 2022.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 1 / 4

The legal framework does not support fully democratic elections. Eight members of the Central Electoral Commission (CEC) are chosen by the parliament, and seven are appointed by the president. While elections in recent years have been competitive, all elections are predicated on the exclusion of ethnic Georgians.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 8 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 2 / 4

Many parties and social organizations participate in Abkhazia's fractious political system, and these movements generally enjoy freedom of association. Organizations representing veterans of the 1992–93 war with the Georgian government are particularly influential.

However, corruption within parties hampers their democratic functioning, and a 2009 law forbids the formation of parties catering to the interests of any particular ethnic, religious, racial, or professional group. Parties are relatively weak as electoral vehicles and as forces within the parliament, with most candidates campaigning and serving as independents. In the 2017 parliamentary contest, 112 of 137 candidates ran as independents.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 3 / 4

Although independent candidates are not able to draw on the sort of support or infrastructure typically associated with membership in an established political party, those running against incumbents have enjoyed some success. For example, while no candidates for the opposition groups Amsakhara or United Abkhazia were elected in 2017, most incumbent legislators—including government ministers—lost their seats.

After winning the 2020 presidential election, Bzhania invited representatives of alternative political groups to join his government, including Ankvab, who became prime minister, and Sergey Shamba of United Abkhazia, who became secretary of the Security Council. Meanwhile, Khajimba supporters quickly formed several political groups with the goal of contesting the 2022 parliamentary elections.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 2 / 4

While voters' choices influence domestic politics, the functioning of Abkhazia's political institutions remains dependent on economic and political support from Moscow.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 1 / 4

Under the constitution, only a person of Abkhaz nationality who speaks the Abkhaz language and is a citizen of Abkhazia can be elected to the presidency. The Armenian and Russian communities traditionally have an informal agreement whereby parties nominate members of ethnic minorities to represent districts where they predominate. Ethnic Abkhaz dominate the political sphere; of the 35 members of the parliament, 32 have Abkhaz surnames and 3 are Armenian. The ethnic Georgian population is routinely excluded from elections and political representation. As with other recent elections, authorities argued ahead of the 2021 local elections that most residents in the ethnic Georgian district of Gali were Georgian passport holders and therefore not permitted to cast ballots.

Societal norms discourage women from running for office, and women and their interests remain underrepresented in the political sphere. In 2020, only one cabinet-level position and one parliamentary seat were held by women, and only 16 of the 179 seats contested in the 2021 local elections were filled by women. Few politicians have participated in discussions about introducing legislative quotas to increase the presence of women in the parliament.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 4 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 1 / 4

While Abkhazia's president sets the tone for most domestic policy, the overall ability of elected authorities to determine and implement policies is limited by the economic and political influence of Moscow. The Russian government supplies most of the state budget, though its contributions have started to decline.

Several thousand Russian troops are permanently stationed in the territory. However, there has been significant pushback against a 2014 Russian-Abkhazian treaty, with critics arguing that some of its provisions threaten Abkhazia's autonomy. In November 2020, faced with a pandemic and an economic downturn, Abkhazian leaders withdrew many of their previous concerns and signed an agreement with Russia that called for changes to a number of laws, including amendments that would give broader rights to Russian investors and impose restrictions on local nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) that receive foreign funding. The Russian state remains influential in Abkhazia's security apparatus; the territory's State Security Service (SGB) includes a representative of the Russian government in its leadership.

In addition to foreign influence, Abkhazia's government has been affected by a pattern of political instability in recent years. Prime ministers have been frequently replaced, and Khajimba was the second consecutive president to be forced out of office amid antigovernment protests. Despite Bzhania's initial promises to pursue constitutional reforms that would shift some power from the executive branch to the parliament, no such change occurred in 2021.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 1 / 4

Corruption is believed to be extensive and is tolerated by the government, despite promises to combat it. In recent years, Russian officials have voiced concern about the large-scale embezzlement of funds provided by Moscow, but efforts to investigate and punish such malfeasance have been largely ineffective.

After the change in government in 2020, prosecutors launched investigations into allegations of embezzlement and fraud at state-owned companies. One of these investigations resulted in the Sukhumi City Court sentencing a former official to a seven-year prison term in May 2021. In February, the Prosecutor General's Office alleged that a small number of doctors at one of Sukhumi's hospitals had taken bribes and embezzled state funds and deployed a special forces unit to detain them. Opposition politicians and Abkhazian medical workers condemned the excessive force used to detain the doctors, accusing the chief prosecutor of ordering an unlawful police operation; the case remained unresolved at year's end.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 2 / 4

Legal amendments from 2015 allow citizens to request information about any government decisions that are not classified as state secrets, and to receive a response within a month. Nevertheless, the territory's political culture is nontransparent, and social stigmas prevent citizens from requesting information.

In June 2021, after roughly two years of discussion, the parliament adopted legislation requiring all public officials and their close relatives to declare their income, property, and expenses. After the law came into force in July, the government published the declarations on an official website. Local activists questioned data in the declarations, which they said omitted information about the ownership of shares in private companies and expressed concern that local authorities would not be able to verify information about property and bank accounts registered outside of Abkhazia.

In 2021, the Office of the Commissioner for Human Rights released its second annual report on human rights conditions in Abkhazia. The report, which was presented to the parliament in March and published online in May, noted that law enforcement agencies continued to ignore the concerns the office raised, refused to provide complete and relevant information, and did not respond to requests in a timely manner. Despite earlier promises to use the work of the commissioner as the basis of planned law enforcement reform, the government pursued very little engagement with the office's work in 2021 and refused to authorize the commissioner's request for an increase in the office's budget.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 23 / 60D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 8 / 16*D1. Are there free and independent media? 2 / 4

The local media sector is dominated by the government, which operates the Abkhaz State Television and Radio Company (AGTRK), a newspaper, and a news agency, though there are also some private outlets. Journalists have criticized AGTRK for failing to air material that could be perceived as unflattering to the government. News websites and social media have become increasingly popular sources of information. Major Russian television stations broadcast into Abkhazia, and residents of the Gali district have access to Georgian broadcasts. Some legal restrictions apply to both traditional and online media, including criminal libel statutes.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 2 / 4

Orthodox Christianity is the dominant religion in Abkhazia, but the Georgian Orthodox Church faces discrimination and restrictions. Most practicing Christians adhere to one of two branches of the Abkhazian Orthodox Church. Though the Abkhazian Orthodox Church declared its separation from the Georgian Orthodox Church in 2009, its autonomy has not been officially recognized. In February 2021, Abkhaz Orthodox leaders temporarily suspended most religious services, saying that they would resume once the independent status of the church was confirmed by the Moscow Patriarchate. Services resumed several days later, but the autonomy of the Abkhazian Orthodox Church remained unrecognized by other Orthodox groups.

Muslims are allowed to practice freely, though some community leaders have been attacked in the past. In 2020, local Muslim leaders reported ongoing difficulties in their efforts to obtain permission for the construction of an official mosque; Islamic religious services have generally been held in private homes, some of which were renovated and expanded to accommodate increased participation.

There are no widely reported restrictions on the minority who identify with Abkhazia's traditional pre-Christian religion. Jehovah's Witnesses are formally banned under a 1995 decree. In June 2021, a Hare Krishna-run boarding school and education center was shut down following allegations that students were being sexually abused.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 1 / 4

The education system is affected by the de facto government's political priorities. Schools providing instruction in Russian, Abkhaz, and Armenian generally operate without interference. However, Georgian-language schools in Gali have been undergoing reorganization since 2015 with the aim of replacing Georgian with Russian. In September 2021, teaching in Georgian was banned in Abkhazia, though it is still taught as a foreign language in many schools throughout the predominantly Georgian east.

Universities in the capital have recently become more lenient about the enrollment of Gali Georgians, who are educated in Russian and lack Abkhaz passports. Nevertheless, bureaucratic complications still arise with respect to obtaining a diploma, and some argue that requiring aspiring university students to take Abkhaz-language proficiency exams as part of their graduation from secondary school disadvantages members of ethnic minorities.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 3 / 4

The freedoms of personal expression and private discussion are not severely restricted in practice. Social media platforms host vibrant discussions on political and other topics in Abkhazia. However, there is some self-censorship on sensitive subjects, especially those relating to ethnic Georgians and relations with Tbilisi, or to the families of senior officials or local businessmen. In October 2020, a young ethnic Georgian was detained in Gali after setting fire to the Abkhaz flag during public celebrations marking the anniversary of the end of the 1992–93 war; he was sentenced to a nine-year prison term that December.

In March 2021, a young ethnic Abkhaz woman posted a short video in which she stated that "Abkhazia is Georgia." The Interior Ministry launched an official investigation, interrogated the woman and her parents, and released footage of them apologizing and condemning the woman's earlier statement. The same month, another video appeared of a local businessman, who had been a presidential advisor, in which he toasted Georgia during a trip to Tbilisi. The video provoked two days of street rallies in front of governmental headquarters, which ended after the man stated that he had not traveled to Tbilisi as a representative of the government.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 6 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 3 / 4

Freedom of assembly is largely respected, and opposition and civil society groups regularly mount protests.

In December 2021, the authorities deployed both riot police and the army to prevent opposition protesters from violently taking over the parliament building during an anti-government demonstration in Sukhumi. The rally had been organized in protest of the government's response to the COVID-19 pandemic, the energy crisis in Abkhazia, and the persecution of opposition members; the protesters demanded the resignation of President Bzhania. Despite the use of tear gas and batons, there were no reports of protesters or police being hospitalized; however, members of a television crew were injured. Although a criminal investigation was launched against the leaders of the protest, no opposition leaders were arrested by year's end.

A similar opposition rally took place in March to protest against a former presidential advisor's visit to Tbilisi. That protest ended without the use of force, but one of its organizers, Akhra Avidzba, was arrested. In June, Avidzba was found guilty of illegally possessing weapons, including grenade launchers; he was released after being given a fine and three years' probation. Though some politicians suggested that Avidzba had planned to forcibly take over government headquarters, no related charges were filed.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 2 / 4

Civil society organizations, particularly groups representing Abkhazia's war veterans, exert influence on government policies. Some 300 NGOs are registered, though only a fraction of these is active. NGOs that receive funding from foreign governments or entities that do not recognize Abkhazia's independence face criticism from local journalists and authorities. While its November 2020 policy agreement with Russia called for special restrictions on groups that receive foreign funding, the government had not adopted such legislation by the end of 2021.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 1 / 4

Trade unions exist, but unions and labor activists have struggled to effectively defend the rights of workers and typically have little say in policies or decisions made by the government or private businesses. Workers often rely on informal networks to settle disputes. In recent years the Federation of Independent Trade Unions of the Republic of Abkhazia (FNPR) has clashed with the government over the distribution of social insurance funds. During the FNPR's May 2021 conference, union leaders criticized the government, saying that a lack of official support continues to negatively affect the federation's work.

F. RULE OF LAW: 4 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 1 / 4

Despite attempts to introduce more parliamentary oversight of the judiciary, nepotism and corruption reportedly have a significant impact on judicial independence. Implementation of judicial decisions remains inconsistent.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 1 / 4

The criminal justice system is undermined by limited defendant access to qualified legal counsel, violations of due process, and lengthy pretrial detentions.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 1 / 4

Isolated acts of criminal and political violence occur in Abkhazia, though government data have shown declines in the overall crime rate in recent years. Conditions in prisons and detention centers are reportedly poor, and the 2021 report by the human rights commissioner's office highlighted cases of alleged torture and mistreatment of detainees.

Organized crime remains a significant problem. In November 2019, two suspected members of a criminal organization, along with one bystander, were killed by assailants in Sukhumi. After the change in leadership in 2020, at least one of the former president's private bodyguards was arrested for alleged involvement in the incident.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 1 / 4

Ethnic Georgian residents of the Gali district continue to face discrimination, including police harassment and unequal access to documentation, education, and public services. In 2017, Sukhumi began issuing residence permits to Gali Georgians for five-year renewable terms. Permit holders may retain Georgian citizenship, reside in Gali, and cross the de facto border into Georgia proper. Local officials warned Gali Georgians against attempting to hold both passports.

Many women in Abkhazia reportedly experience gender-based violence, with higher rates in rural areas. The territory lacks robust legal protections against discrimination affecting LGBT+ people.

Beginning in 2011, the government facilitated the travel of hundreds of ethnic Abkhaz, Aдыгhe, and Circassian people from Syria to Abkhazia. Most of them reportedly soon left the region due to local economic problems, but a small number still lived in the territory at the end of 2021. Although all refugees were granted Abkhaz passports, they have maintained a distinct status as "repatriates" and still receive a monthly stipend from the government.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 5 / 16G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 1 / 4

Freedom of movement is limited by the ongoing dispute over Abkhazia's status. Travel permits remain expensive and burdensome to obtain. More than 70 percent of Abkhazia's residents hold Russian passports, as Abkhaz travel documents are not internationally recognized.

Crossings between Georgian-controlled territory and Abkhazia that had been closed in March 2020 reopened in February 2021 for the elderly, the poor, and people with health problems. In July, the crossings reopened for all other categories. Abkhazian authorities claimed that the closures had been necessary to prevent the spread of the coronavirus; the crossings were opened for short periods during 2020 to allow essential travel and the return of local residents. Abkhazia's border with Russia remained open throughout 2021.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 1 / 4

Criminal activity hampers the operations of local businesses. The constitution forbids foreigners, including Russians, from buying real estate in Abkhazia, a rule that has broad support in Abkhazian society. Uncertainty persists regarding property rights for ethnic Georgians in Gali, whose residency permits do not allow them to officially own or inherit property. The legal status of properties whose owners were expelled from Abkhazia during the 1990s is also unclear, as displaced people cannot return to claim them.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 2 / 4

Personal freedoms are somewhat inhibited by conservative social mores and societal disapproval of certain identities and behavior, including “nontraditional” sexual orientations and gender nonconformity. A 2016 law banned abortions in all circumstances apart from prior fetal death. In July 2021, the human rights commissioner filed an official request for the Constitutional Court to rule on the constitutionality of the law.

NGOs have expressed concern about so-called honor killings of young women accused of moral transgressions. Domestic violence and rape are serious problems, and victims lack access to effective aid. There is no specific law to address domestic violence.

Equality of opportunity is limited by Abkhazia’s international isolation, as well as by corruption and criminality. In recent years, Russian and other foreign businessmen complained that criminal activity and arbitrary expropriations severely impaired their ability to work and invest in the territory. NGOs have expressed concern about human trafficking in Abkhazia.

Note: Freedom in the World reports assess the level of political rights and civil liberties in a given geographical area, regardless of whether they are affected by the state, nonstate actors, or foreign powers. Disputed territories are sometimes assessed separately if they meet certain criteria, including boundaries that are sufficiently stable to allow year-on-year comparisons. For more information, see the report methodology and FAQ.

Overview: In early 2014, Russian forces invaded the autonomous Ukrainian region of Crimea and quickly annexed it to the Russian Federation through a referendum that was widely condemned for violating international law. The occupation government severely limits political and civil rights, has silenced independent media, and employs antiterrorism and other laws against political dissidents. Many Ukrainians have been deported from or otherwise compelled to leave Crimea. Members of the Indigenous Crimean Tatar minority, many of whom continue to vocally oppose the Russian occupation, have faced acute repression by the authorities.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- A draft UN General Assembly resolution distributed in October noted continued rights abuses in Crimea, including the use of Russian military courts to try

Crimeans and the provision of basic military training for schoolchildren in the territory. The body passed a resolution on human rights in Crimea in mid-December.

- In September, Nariman Dzhelialov, the first deputy chairman of the Mejlis—the representative body of the Crimean Tatar community—was detained along with four other people over an alleged sabotage plot. While two of the detainees were released by mid-September, Dzhelialov remained in detention at year’s end.
- In January, supporters of Russian opposition figure Aleksey Navalny rallied in Sevastopol and Simferopol after Navalny was arrested in Russia. Authorities detained participants in at least one Sevastopol rally and two Simferopol rallies.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: -2 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 0 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

Under the administrative system established by Russia, the Crimean Peninsula is divided into the Republic of Crimea and the federal city of Sevastopol, a port of nearly 437,000 residents. Sevastopol’s political institutions largely mirror those of Crimea proper.

The head of the Republic of Crimea is elected by its legislature, the State Council of Crimea, for up to two consecutive five-year terms. Lawmakers choose the leader based on a list of nominees prepared by the Russian president. In October 2014, the legislature unanimously elected Sergey Aksyonov as the head of the republic in a process that did not conform to democratic standards. (Aksyonov had led Crimea since February 2014, when a group of armed men forced legislators to elect him prime minister at gunpoint.) He was unanimously reelected in 2019.

An Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE) election monitoring mission noted that polling for Ukraine’s presidential election, held in two rounds in March and April 2019, could not be organized in Crimea.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

The State Council consists of 75 members elected to five-year terms. Two-thirds of the members are elected by party list and one-third in single-member districts. Legislative elections in 2014 under the Russian-organized Crimean constitution were contested exclusively by candidates who backed the Russian occupation, and Ukrainian parties were banned. Conditions for the September 2019 elections were similar, though the ruling party in Russia, United Russia, lost some support, and won 60 seats, down from 70 previously. The ultranationalist Liberal Democratic Party of Russia secured 10 seats, and the Communist Party won 5.

OSCE election monitors noted that polling for the 2019 Ukrainian parliamentary election could not be organized in Crimea, leaving 12 single-member districts vacant. Crimeans were similarly unable to participate in Ukraine’s October 2020 local elections.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 0 / 4

The Russian occupation authorities have tailored the electoral system to ensure maximum control by Moscow. Legislators electing the chief executive are limited to candidates chosen by the Russian president. In the legislative elections, legitimate opposition forces are denied registration before the voting begins, leaving voters with the choice of either abstaining or endorsing pro-Russian candidates.

Russian elections have been held in Crimea since its 2014 annexation, with residents voting in the 2016 and 2021 State Duma elections, the 2018 presidential election, and the 2020 referendum on extending term limits for the Russian president.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 0 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 0 / 4

Ukrainian political parties are banned, allowing United Russia and other Kremlin-approved factions to dominate the political system. The Russian Federal Security Service (FSB), local police, and pro-Russian “self-defense” units use intimidation and harassment to suppress any political mobilization against the current government or the annexation of Crimea.

As in Russia, the authorities in the territory consistently crack down on opposition political activity. Crimean Tatars have continued to voice dissent and openly oppose the Russian occupation, but they risk harassment, arrest, and imprisonment for their actions. Other opposition figures experience intimidation and police surveillance. In 2019, Yevgeniy Karakashev, an opposition political activist, was convicted on terrorism charges by a Russian court and sentenced to six years in a penal colony. In March 2021, pro-Ukraine activist Oleh Prykhodko was convicted on terrorism charges and sentenced to five years in a penal colony.

Supporters of Russian opposition figure Aleksey Navalny were also targeted by the occupation government. Participants at January 2021 rallies held in Sevastopol and Simferopol were detained by authorities.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 0 / 4

Because Ukrainian political parties are not allowed to compete in elections and Russia tightly controls the political and electoral systems, there is no opportunity for a genuine political opposition to form, compete, or take power in Crimea.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 0 / 4

Chief executive Sergey Aksyonov was originally installed by Russian security forces, and subsequent elections have been carefully controlled by the Russian government, which pressures citizens to vote. Among other abuses, during the 2018 Russian presidential election and 2019 local elections, public employees were threatened with termination if they did not vote. During the 2021 State Duma elections, school principals were expected to pressure their subordinates to register to vote and to vote for United Russia.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 0 / 4

Occupation authorities deny full political rights to all Crimea residents, but Crimean Tatars and ethnic Ukrainians are regarded with particular suspicion and face greater persecution than do ethnic Russians.

The headquarters of the Mejlis, the Crimean Tatars’ representative body, was closed by the authorities in 2014. The Mejlis’s incumbent chairman, Refat Chubarov, and Crimean Tatar leader Mustafa Dzhemilev have since been banned from the territory. The Mejlis was officially banned by Crimea’s Supreme Court in 2016. In June 2021, Chubarov was convicted of organizing riots for participating in a 2014 demonstration and was sentenced in absentia to six years’ imprisonment in a penal colony. Dzhemilev, meanwhile, was charged with “illegally crossing the state border of the Russian Federation” in 2020. That case was ongoing at the end of 2021. In September 2021, Mejlis first deputy chairman Nariman Dzhelialov was one of five people arrested for allegedly planning to sabotage a gas pipeline near Simferopol in August. Two of the five were released by mid-September, though Dzhelialov and two others remained in custody. In late October, a court extended Dzhelialov’s detention into January 2022.

The prohibition on Ukrainian political parties leaves ethnic Ukrainians with limited options for meaningful representation.

Women formally have equal political rights, but they remain underrepresented in leadership positions in practice, and government officials demonstrate little interest in or understanding of gender-equality issues. After the September 2019 election, women held 21 percent of the seats in the State Council.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 0 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 0 / 4

All major policy decisions are made in Moscow and executed by Russian president Putin’s representatives in Crimea or the local authorities, who were not freely elected and are beholden to the Kremlin.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 0 / 4

Corruption is widespread in Crimea and occurs at the highest levels of government. Generally, efforts to investigate and prosecute corruption are inadequate. Some elements of the Russian-backed leadership, including Aksyonov, reputedly have ties to organized crime. In recent years, the Russian FSB has arrested a number of Crimean officials as part of an ostensible antigraft campaign; many of the arrests were related to allegations that local authorities embezzled Russian funds meant to support the occupation. However, some have also been linked to infighting between Crimean and Russian officials over control of the peninsula’s assets.

In September 2021, Crimean deputy prime minister Yevgeny Kabanov was dismissed from his post and was detained on corruption-related charges.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 0 / 4

With strict controls on the media and few other means of holding officials accountable, residents struggle to obtain information about the functioning of their government. Budget processes are opaque, and input from civil society, which is itself subject to tight restrictions, is limited.

Authorities are similarly opaque about the COVID-19 pandemic. In late 2020, Crimean health-care workers warned that the occupation authorities underreported pandemic-related deaths. Former Mejlis chairman Chubarov claimed that Russian authorities withheld pandemic-related information and that health-care services in Sevastopol had been overwhelmed.

ADDITIONAL DISCRETIONARY POLITICAL RIGHTS QUESTION

Is the government or occupying power deliberately changing the ethnic composition of a country or territory so as to destroy a culture or tip the political balance in favor of another group? -2 / 0

Since the occupation began, the Russian government has taken decisive steps to solidify ethnic Russian domination of the peninsula and marginalize the Ukrainian and Crimean Tatar communities. The elimination of the Ukrainian language from school curriculums and the closure of most Ukrainian Orthodox churches since 2014 are indicative of this attempt to Russify the population.

Russian and local pro-Russian officials' policies and actions in Crimea have led to an influx of hundreds of thousands of people from Russia, including Russian troops, civilian personnel, and their families. People displaced by fighting and deprivation in eastern Ukraine—home to many ethnic Russians—have also come to Crimea. Ukrainian citizens from Crimea have been drafted into compulsory military service in the Russian armed forces, in contravention of international law. By 2021, more than 34,000 Crimeans had been drafted into the Russian military, with many of them forced to serve far from Crimea.

Meanwhile, political persecution has led to an outflow of ethnic Ukrainians and Crimean Tatars. Russia instituted a policy of mass Russian naturalization for all residents of Crimea in 2014, in violation of international law. Once the policy was enacted, Crimeans had only 18 days to opt out of Russian citizenship. Ukrainian citizens, many of them long-term residents with immediate family on the peninsula, continue to be deported from Crimea, often for opting out of Russian citizenship.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 9 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 2 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 0 / 4

Media freedom is severely curtailed in Crimea. In addition to other restrictive Russian laws, a penal code provision prescribes imprisonment for public calls for action against Russia's territorial integrity, which has been interpreted to ban statements against the annexation, including in the media.

Journalists in Crimea risk harassment, arrest, and imprisonment for carrying out their work. In 2019, Crimean Tatar citizen journalist Nariman Memedeminov was handed a two-and-a-half-year prison sentence over YouTube videos he posted in 2013 about Hizb ut-Tahrir, a pan-Islamist movement that seeks to establish a caliphate but does not advocate violent methods to achieve it. Hizb ut-Tahrir operates legally in Ukraine but is designated as a terrorist group in Russia. Memedeminov's YouTube channel has also covered abuses against Crimean Tatars. Memedeminov was released from a Russian prison in September 2020. That December, a territorial court handed Lenur Islyamov, owner of Crimean Tatar television station ATR, a 19-year prison sentence in absentia on charges including "sabotage."

In March 2021, Vladislav Yesypenko, a freelance journalist associated with Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty (RFE/RL), was arrested on charges of possessing an explosive device and espionage. Yesypenko, who was reportedly tortured by authorities, remained in custody as of mid-December.

In April 2021, Bekir Mamutov, editor in chief of Crimean Tatar newspaper Qirim, was fined for disseminating "information about a banned organization." In October 2020, Qirim published an article referring to a UN report on human rights in Crimea which mentioned the Mejlis; the article did not mention that the body was banned in Russia.

Independent and pro-Ukraine media outlets do not openly function on the peninsula. A 2015 reregistration process overseen by the Russian media and telecommunications regulator Roskomnadzor effectively reduced the number of media outlets in Crimea by more than 90 percent. The occupation authorities have cut Crimea off from access to Ukrainian television, and Crimean internet service providers must operate under draconian Russian media laws. Russian authorities continued to block a number of Ukrainian news sites and interfered with Ukrainian radio signals by transmitting Russian programming on the same frequencies in 2021.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 0 / 4

The occupation authorities forced religious organizations to reregister under new rules, sharply reducing the number of registered groups. All 22 Jehovah's Witnesses congregations were deregistered after the Russian Supreme Court ruled in 2017 that the group had violated laws against extremism. In 2020, authorities began issuing prison sentences to adherents for their activity. As of late December 2021, five Jehovah's Witnesses were imprisoned, while seven were under house arrest and nine faced restrictions on their movement.

Mosques associated with Crimean Tatars have been denied permission to register, and Muslims have faced legal discrimination. In August 2021, a Russian military court issued prison sentences to four Crimean Tatars for their alleged Hizb ut-Tahrir membership. The same court issued sentences to another four defendants for their alleged membership in October. A December 2021 report from the Crimean Human Rights Group (KPH) counted the detention of 79 individuals accused of membership in Muslim organizations deemed "terrorist" or "extremist" in nature.

Occupation authorities have confiscated numerous properties in Crimea from the Orthodox Church of Ukraine (OCU). In 2019, a de facto court nullified a prominent Simferopol cathedral's lease with Ukrainian authorities; it was the last cathedral in Crimea to have maintained an affiliation with the Ukrainian church authorities. In 2020, authorities ordered the demolition of an OCU structure in Yevpatoria. In August 2021, a territorial court fined an OCU archbishop after he held religious services in a cathedral in the village of Balki.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 1 / 4

Schools must use the Russian state curriculum. Schoolchildren in Crimea are exposed to Russian military propaganda. Some schoolchildren have received basic military training in recent years. The October 2021 text of a UN General Assembly draft resolution on human rights in Crimea noted the continuation of these trends.

Instruction in the Ukrainian language has been almost completely eliminated. In a 2017 ruling, the International Court of Justice ordered Russia to ensure the availability of education in Ukrainian, but the authorities did not comply with this order. Access to education in the Crimean Tatar language has been more stable, declining only slightly since 2014.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 1 / 4

The FSB reportedly encourages residents to inform on individuals who express opposition to the annexation, and a climate of fear and intimidation seriously inhibits private discussion of political matters. Social media comments are reportedly monitored by authorities. The FSB frequently opens criminal cases against those who criticize the occupation and the oppression of Crimean Tatars.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 1 / 12E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 0 / 4

Freedom of assembly is severely restricted. Public events cannot proceed without permission from the authorities, and the Crimean government lists only 366 locations where they can be held. Permission to hold demonstrations is frequently denied, and when protests do proceed, participants are often arrested. Authorities have at times handed activists advance warning notes threatening them with administrative or criminal prosecution for holding events. Crimean Tatar activists have been known to receive such notes before the anniversary of the Stalin-era mass deportations and Crimean Tatar Flag Day. Authorities further restricted public gatherings beginning in 2020 in response to the COVID-19 pandemic. These restrictions are selectively enforced.

Supporters of Aleksey Navalny held rallies in Sevastopol and Simferopol after Navalny was arrested in Russia in January 2021. Authorities detained 13 people after a January 23 event in Sevastopol. At least 16 people were detained at a Simferopol rally on January 23, while another 7 were detained during a January 31 rally there.

In September 2021, authorities, including at least one man in a Russian police uniform, used Russian COVID-19 restrictions to detain 53 people in front of an FSB office in Simferopol; some of them were relatives of Crimean Tatars who had been detained earlier that month on sabotage charges.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 0 / 4

The de facto authorities, including the FSB, repress all independent political and civic organizations. Nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) are subject to harsh Russian laws that enable state interference and obstruct foreign funding. NGO leaders are regularly harassed and arrested for their activities.

In 2020, Server Mustafayev, a coordinator for NGO Crimean Solidarity, was sentenced to 14 years' imprisonment in a Russian penal colony for his alleged ties to Hizb ut-Tahrir. In November 2021, Crimean Solidarity coordinator Diliaver Memetov was detained in front of a court building. Memetov was placed under administrative arrest for 12 days.

In August 2021, activist Ludvika Papadopulu was placed under house arrest for a month after being charged with libel under the Russian criminal code. Papadopulu's home had been searched in February in connection with a social media post that his lawyer said he did not author.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 1 / 4

Trade union rights are formally protected under Russian law but limited in practice. As in both Ukraine and Russia, employers are often able to engage in antiunion discrimination and violate collective-bargaining rights. Pro-Russian authorities have threatened to nationalize property owned by labor unions in Crimea.

F. RULE OF LAW: 0 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 0 / 4

Under Moscow's rule, Crimea is subject to the Russian judicial system, which lacks independence and is effectively dominated by the executive branch. Russian laws bar dual citizenship for public officials, and Crimean judges were required to obtain Russian citizenship in order to retain their positions after the annexation.

In recent years, Russian judges have been transferred to from Russia to work in Crimea. These judges regularly hand down politically motivated judgments against residents who oppose the annexation.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 0 / 4

Russian authorities replaced Ukrainian laws with those of the Russian Federation. In 2020, Russian president Putin enacted criminal code amendments allowing for harsher punishments against those accused of "violating" or "alienating" Russian territorial integrity.

Many detainees and prisoners are transferred from occupied Crimea to Russia, in violation of international law. The October 2021 draft text of a UN General Assembly resolution noted that Crimean residents continue to face trial in military courts located in Russia proper.

Arbitrary arrests and detentions, harsh interrogation tactics, falsification of evidence, pressure to waive legal counsel, and unfair trials are common. A 2020 Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights (OHCHR) report noted that prosecutors are heavily favored in military court proceedings, and separately noted that state-appointed defense lawyers participating in cases in Crimea were often ineffective.

The ability to attend court hearings as a spectator can be limited by authorities. Attendees of open-court hearings regarding cases against Crimean Tatars were detained on several occasions in October and November 2021.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 0 / 4

The Russian occupation authorities commonly engage in torture of detainees and other abuses. A 2020 OHCHR report noted accounts of “mock executions, beatings, electric shocks, and sexual violence.” Victims of torture have little legal recourse, allowing security forces to act with impunity. A 2020 KPH report noted that few references to violence committed by officials appeared in the territory’s court records.

In September 2021, Asan Akhtemov, who was accused of sabotage along with Nariman Dzhelialov, was tortured until he agreed to confess. A November OHCHR report noted that three of the five detainees in that incident were subjected to torture or ill-treatment.

Detention centers are often overcrowded and unhygienic, and detainees do not consistently receive medical attention.

The work of lawyers to protect clients from illegal actions by the police or FSB is limited. In October 2021, lawyer Edem Semedliaev was arrested while visiting clients detained in a Simferopol police station. In November, a Simferopol court sentenced him to 12 days’ administrative detention and issued a fine for “disobeying the lawful orders of a police officer.”

Ongoing Russian-Ukrainian tensions threaten Crimea’s security. In 2018, Russian forces attacked and seized three Ukrainian naval vessels in the Black Sea near Crimea as they attempted to enter the Sea of Azov through the Kerch Strait. Russia then took the 24 Ukrainian military personnel on board into custody; they were released in 2019 as part of a prisoner swap, several months after the International Tribunal for the Law of the Sea ordered their release. Russia continues to conduct large-scale war exercises in Crimea.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 0 / 4

In addition to official discrimination and harassment against ethnic Ukrainians and Crimean Tatars, women face de facto discrimination in the workplace, and the legal situation for LGBT+ people has worsened under the Russian occupation. After 2014, Crimea became subject to Russia’s 2013 law banning dissemination of information that promotes “nontraditional sexual relationships,” which tightly restricts the activities of LGBT+ people and organizations.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 6 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 1 / 4

The occupation authorities have sought to compel Crimea’s residents to accept Russian citizenship and surrender their Ukrainian passports. Those who fail to do so face the threat of dismissal from employment, loss of property rights, inability to travel to mainland Ukraine and elsewhere, and eventual deportation as foreigners.

As many as 4,700 people have been forcibly deported since the beginning of the occupation; half of the deportees are Ukrainian citizens, while citizens of another 37 countries and stateless persons represent the remainder.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 1 / 4

Property rights are poorly protected, and the Russian annexation has resulted in a redistribution of assets in favor of Russian and pro-Russian entities. After the occupation, the properties of many Ukrainian companies were seized by Russian authorities. In 2018, a court in The Hague ordered Russia to pay $159 million to Ukrainian companies that had their property confiscated. The properties of Crimean Tatars who returned in the 1990s—after a Soviet-era mass deportation—and built houses without permits are also vulnerable to seizure by Russian authorities.

In 2020, Putin signed an edict banning foreign individuals from owning coastal land in the territory; the edict also included new restrictions on property rights which do not apply for Crimean residents holding Russian passports. The edict took effect in late March 2021.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 2 / 4

Domestic violence remains a serious problem in Crimea, and Russian laws do not offer strong protections. In 2017, Putin signed legislation that partly decriminalized domestic abuse in Russia, prescribing only small fines and short administrative detention for acts that do not cause serious injuries. Russian law does not recognize same-sex marriage or civil unions.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 2 / 4

Economic opportunity has been limited since the occupation due to international sanctions, restrictions on trade via mainland Ukraine, and reliance on trade with Russia. Pollution problems in Crimea are associated with sulfur dioxide emitted from a chemical factory, which led to the evacuation of over 4,000 children in the town of Armyansk in 2018. Residents' access to goods and services remains constrained, and vital industries like tourism and agriculture have stagnated.

As in both Ukraine and Russia, migrant workers, women, and children are vulnerable to trafficking for the purposes of forced labor or sexual exploitation.

Eastern Donbas*

Population: 2,000,000 (estimated)

Freedom Status: Not Free

Note: The numerical scores and status listed here do not reflect conditions in either government-controlled Ukraine or Crimea, which are examined in separate reports. Freedom in the World reports assess the level of political rights and civil liberties in a given geographical area, regardless of whether they are affected by the state, nonstate actors, or foreign powers. Disputed territories are sometimes assessed separately if they meet certain criteria, including boundaries that are sufficiently stable to allow year-on-year comparisons. For more information, see the report methodology and FAQ.

Overview: Eastern Donbas comprises the portions of Ukraine’s Donetsk and Luhansk regions that have been occupied by Russian and Russian-backed separatist forces since 2014. It covers about a third of the two regions’ territory and was home to more than half of their prewar population of roughly 6.5 million people, though the current population cannot be determined with precision. Local authority lies in the hands of the so-called People’s Republics of Donetsk and Luhansk (DNR and LNR, respectively), which claim to be independent states but are not recognized by any country, including Russia. Both are entirely dependent on Moscow for financial and military support, and their leaders have openly proposed joining the Russian Federation. Politics within the territories are tightly controlled by the security services, leaving no room for meaningful opposition. Local media are also under severe restrictions, and social media users have been arrested for critical posts. The rule of law and civil liberties in general are not respected.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- Russia’s policies towards Donbas focused on political “integration,” amounting in practice to Russification and creeping annexation more than ever before. By the year’s midpoint, Russia had issued more than half a million passports to Ukrainian nationals residing in the occupied areas, and invited them to vote in Russia’s tightly controlled parliamentary elections in September.
- The coronavirus pandemic had severe consequences for both public health and the economy. Promises by separatist leaders that Russia would ship enough vaccine to achieve herd immunity by the end of the year were not fulfilled and COVID death-rates soared in the fall, as the delta variant swept across the open border from Russia.
- Crossing points with government-controlled Ukraine remained closed, making it very hard for pensioners to pick up state payments in government-controlled areas. Aid shipments from the United Nations and the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) were delivered, while Russian aid was massively reduced.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: –1 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 0 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

Under the two separatist entities’ constitutions, executive authority is exercised by a directly elected “head of the republic,” who appoints a prime minister and cabinet with the consent of the legislature.

The winners of the deeply uncompetitive and fraudulent leadership elections in November 2018 remained in place during the year. Both Donetsk leader Denis Pushilin and Luhansk leader Leonid Pasechnik are believed to be widely unpopular but sufficiently loyal to Moscow.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

The DNR and LNR constitutions call for “People’s Councils” of 100 and 50 seats, respectively. Legislative elections in November 2018 were held under the same flawed conditions as the concurrent leadership elections, with no meaningful competition permitted. Both entities feature only two authorized political “movements.” In the DNR, the ruling Donetsk Republic movement was credited with 72.5 percent of the vote, while Peace for Luhansk took 74.1 percent in the LNR. The remaining seats went to the two secondary and equally loyal movements, Free Donbas and the Luhansk Economic Union.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 0 / 4

The separatist electoral authorities implemented their entities’ laws and regulations arbitrarily in 2018, allegedly manipulating the declared election results and using technicalities to exclude unapproved challengers who might be capable of attracting support. For example, the DNR election commission approved each of the officially sanctioned candidates’ lists of signatures, but it rejected the list submitted by separatist businessman Pavel Gubarev on the grounds that it contained fake signatures.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 0 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 0 / 4

The separatist entities feature political duopolies, with both officially sanctioned parties supporting roughly the same policy agenda. Any other political organizations, even if they are also pro-Russian in orientation, are effectively banned. The Communist Party, for instance, has been denied registration in occupied Donetsk.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 0 / 4

The run-up to the 2018 elections showed that meaningful competition, even within the pro-Russian separatist movement, is not tolerated. And while a few dissident separatists have been rehabilitated, those who criticize the current leadership, like former Donetsk separatist figures Pavel Gubarev and Andrei Purgin, remained sidelined.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 0 / 4

Russia has established a complex albeit opaque web of control over the “People’s Republics” that affects all aspects of daily life, including political affairs. Local media, schools and universities, public services, and business structures are dominated by people loyal to the separatist leadership. While many of them are locals, some key positions are held by Russian citizens. Political control is ultimately enforced by the secretive “state security” ministries of the two entities, which are thought to be directed by Russia’s Federal Security Service (FSB). The military formations known as “people’s militias,” which have tens of thousands of men under arms, are believed to be commanded by regular Russian military officers.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 0 / 4

While the republics’ constitutions guarantee equal rights regardless of ethnicity, race, or religious beliefs, in practice ethnic and religious groups not affiliated with Russia are excluded from politics, and no segment of society is able to organize independently to advocate for its interests in the political sphere. Professing pro-Ukrainian sentiment is outright dangerous.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 0 / 12C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 0 / 4

None of the separatist officials in Donbas are freely elected, and their de facto governments operate with extreme opacity, making it difficult to discern how much autonomy they have in practice vis-à-vis the Russian government. However, there are numerous indications that major policy decisions are made in Moscow rather than in Donetsk or Luhansk. This is discernible when both “republics” announce similar decisions without any prior deliberation—including, recently, the organization of the Russian Duma elections in September 2021.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 0 / 4

Corruption is thought to be widespread in occupied Donetsk and Luhansk, and there are no effective mechanisms in place to combat it. While separatist authorities regularly report arrests among customs and police officials, there is no evidence that corruption is effectively curtailed.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 0 / 4

A persistent lack of transparency in all spheres of public life is an overarching feature of both separatist regimes. Levels of secrecy have steadily increased over past years. In 2021, DNR authorities drafted a bill that would further restrict the publication of basic statistical data, citing “information security.” Both “republics” continued the practice of communicating the removal of cabinet members simply by presenting successors without explanation or public discussion.

ADDITIONAL DISCRETIONARY POLITICAL RIGHTS QUESTIONIs the government or occupying power deliberately changing the ethnic composition of a country or territory so as to destroy a culture or tip the political balance in favor of another group? -1 / 0

Professing Ukrainian identity in the separatist-controlled areas of Donbas is considered dangerous, and most residents who identified as Ukrainian have left since 2014. Both entities have abolished official-language status for Ukrainian, making Russian the sole official language. School and university curricula are gradually being brought in line with those used in the Russian Federation.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 5 / 60D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 2 / 16*D1. Are there free and independent media? 0 / 4

No free and independent media have operated in the occupied Donbas since 2014 and the local media landscape remains firmly in the hands of “official” DNR and LNR broadcasters, websites, and print media. Separatist outlets largely republish information and quotes from separatist and Russian officials. Reports about the armed conflict are exclusively based on statements from separatist militias, who blame the Ukrainian side for every cease-fire violation. Coverage of government-controlled Ukraine is almost always negative, whereas reporting on the “Republics” is fawningly positive.

Pro-Ukrainian bloggers and journalists have been silenced by long prison sentences and eventual deportation to government-controlled Ukraine during prisoner exchanges. Pro-Russian bloggers critical of the separatist leadership operate anonymously and under the constant threat of detention and imprisonment.

Ukrainian journalists generally do not enter the DNR and LNR for safety reasons, and most foreign media remain subject to extremely restrictive accreditation policies, meaning that they are practically barred from reporting.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 1 / 4

Although both the DNR and LNR guarantee freedom of religion in their constitutions, adherents of faiths not affiliated with the Russian Orthodox Church remain subject to persecution. The most severely affected are Jehovah's Witnesses, who in 2018 were banned completely as an extremist organization and had their properties seized. Since that year, a mandatory reregistration process has left many groups without recognition, and raids or other pressure have been directed at Baptists, members of the Orthodox Church of the Kyiv Patriarchate, the Greek Catholic Church, and some Muslim communities. Most members of religious minorities, including Roman Catholics and Jews, are thought to have left the separatist-held areas since 2014.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 0 / 4

Local universities were brought under separatist control in 2014. Some, like Donetsk National University, split into two rival institutions, with one established in government-controlled territory and the other run by separatist authorities at the old location. Political indoctrination is rampant in the occupied areas; high schools were forced to switch to Russian standards in September 2020, having previously introduced new curricula with revised history lessons and reduced Ukrainian-language instruction.

Political indoctrination is targeted at the younger generation. Both republics set up militarized youth organizations for this purpose. Membership in the Young Guards–Yunarmia is open from 8 years onward, prompting allegations of a children's army.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 1 / 4

Any public expression of criticism is highly risky and private citizens' online activities are monitored. In June 2021, Donetsk-based pro-Russian commentator Roman Manekin was apparently sentenced to 2.5 years in jail for "justifying terrorism." Manekin, who regularly criticized the local leadership on social media, had been in detention since December 2020. Testimony from former prisoners about torture and abuse in custody also serves to deter free expression.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 0 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 0 / 4

The de facto authorities have not tolerated any protests in the separatist-held areas since 2014, when most pro-Ukrainian activists fled. Rare attempts to hold rallies, as last happened during a miners' strike in 2020, are usually quickly thwarted by agents of the self-proclaimed state security ministries.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 0 / 4

Independent nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) are not permitted to operate. The last independent NGO in the separatist-held areas, the Responsible Citizens volunteer group, stopped functioning in 2016 when several of its leaders were forcibly deported to government-controlled Ukraine. Foreign organizations like the Czech organization People in Need were also expelled. The only remaining international organizations are the ICRC, UN agencies, and the Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE).

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 0 / 4

The DNR and LNR have official trade union federations, and both are headed by separatist lawmakers who defer to the local leadership. The officially sanctioned unions' purpose is to rally workers' support for separatist authorities, rather than to defend their labor rights. In 2020, for example, LNR miners' union leaders supported the "restructuring" of 56 mines, a process that came with significant wage and job losses.

F. RULE OF LAW: 0 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 0 / 4

There are no signs of judicial independence in the two separatist entities. Courts routinely hand down lengthy prison sentences against alleged Ukrainian agents and other perceived enemies of the local authorities, validating spurious charges regardless of the evidence. The work of the judiciary is entirely opaque, as outside observers are not known to have attended court hearings.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 0 / 4

Basic due process guarantees are not observed by separatist authorities or affiliated armed groups. Arbitrary arrests and detentions remain common, and interrogators have reportedly used force and torture to extract confessions. The UN Human Rights Monitoring Mission in Ukraine said in a September 2020 report that interviews with released prisoners "confirmed patterns of torture and ill-treatment."

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 0 / 4

Violence between Russian-backed separatist forces and the Ukrainian military worsened in 2021, as a new ceasefire brokered in 2020 was increasingly disregarded. More than 13,000 people have been killed since the conflict began in April 2014, including more than 3,350 civilians, according to the most recent figures (issued in 2020) from the Office of the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights (OHCHR). The OSCE Monitoring Mission recorded 88 civilian casualties between January and mid-December 2021: 16 fatalities and 72 injuries. The OHCHR has condemned the lack of institutional mechanisms to prevent and punish enforced disappearances.

There have been numerous reports of abuse, sexual violence, and torture in separatist prisons and detention centers. The self-proclaimed state security ministries of both entities regularly publish videos in which detainees confess to spying and other forms of subversive activity while showing signs of physical abuse or severe psychological pressure.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 0 / 4

The deeply flawed legal system operating in the occupied regions offers little recourse for women facing gender-based discrimination, and the basic rights of LGBT+ people are not recognized. In 2018, two Russian transgender activists traveled to Donetsk with the aim of carrying out an art performance in support of such rights. They were quickly arrested and expelled.

In addition to the prevailing hostility toward Ukrainian ethnic identity, there are no provisions to protect the separatist-held areas' other ethnic minority groups—such as Greeks, Azerbaijanis and Armenians—from discrimination.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 3 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 0 / 4

Travel restrictions between the separatist-held areas and government-controlled Ukraine deteriorated severely during the COVID-19-pandemic. All five crossing points remained largely closed for much of 2021, opening only with severe restrictions. The DNR allowed only previously approved individuals to enter, while the LNR allowed individuals to exit only once per month. Crossings between the two remained closed for the first half of 2021. Most of those affected were the more than one million old-age pensioners, who can no longer travel directly to government-controlled Ukraine to pick up state payments. Travel to and from Russia remained less impeded, but senior separatist officials must still inform their leaders before leaving the territories.

The Russian government's distribution of Russian passports to residents of the occupied territories continued in 2021, and the number of issued passports exceeded 600,000 by the summer. An intensifying campaign against the Ukrainian language and identity has raised fears that Ukrainian passport holders will face increasing difficulties in the future.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 0 / 4

The separatist authorities continue to ignore property rights. In 2021, faced with massive wage arrears and mounting debt, the de facto authorities announced the disbanding of Vneshtorgservis, the secretive holding company that operated plants confiscated from private Ukrainian companies. They announced that the factories would be run by a little-known Russian investor. There have been numerous reports of other property seizures, including the expropriation of apartments whose lawful owners have fled.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 2 / 4

Domestic violence is a serious problem, and both separatist entities have taken nominal steps to improve the protection of women and children. However, the loss of Ukrainian government and NGO services has negatively affected conditions for victims. Neither separatist entity recognizes same-sex marriage. A report published in 2016 found drastic worsening of the environment for LGBT+ and transgender people, but there has been little information since.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 1 / 4

Economic opportunity is impaired by the ongoing conflict, trade barriers with government-controlled Ukraine, international sanctions, and the concentration of wealth and resources in the hands of Russian- and separatist-affiliated elites. Many residents are dependent on humanitarian assistance. Exploitative working conditions, including low or unpaid wages, have been reported even by separatist-controlled media. Separatist forces have allegedly trained and enlisted minors for participation in armed conflict.

Gaza Strip

Freedom Status: Not Free

Note: Prior to its 2011 edition, Freedom in the World featured one report for Israeli-occupied portions of the West Bank and Gaza Strip and another for Palestinian-administered portions. Freedom in the World reports assess the level of political rights and civil liberties in a given geographical area, regardless of whether they are affected by the state, nonstate actors, or foreign powers. Disputed territories are sometimes assessed separately if they meet certain criteria, including boundaries that are sufficiently stable to allow year-on-year comparisons. For more information, see the report methodology and FAQ.

Overview: The political rights and civil liberties of Gaza Strip residents are severely constrained. Israel's de facto blockade of the territory, periodic military incursions, and rule-of-law violations have imposed serious hardship on the civilian population, as has Egypt's tight control over the southern border. The Palestinian political and militant group known as Hamas, or the Islamic Resistance Movement, gained control of the Gaza Strip in 2007, following its victory in the preceding year's legislative elections and a subsequent conflict with Fatah, the ruling party in the West Bank. The entrenched division between Hamas and the Fatah-led Palestinian Authority (PA) since then has contributed to legal confusion and repeated postponement of elections, which have not been held in the Gaza Strip since 2006.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- Regionally sponsored talks aimed at bridging the divide between Hamas and Fatah broke down after the PA announced in April that Palestinian legislative elections scheduled for May and a presidential election scheduled for July would be indefinitely postponed.
- PA president Mahmoud Abbas scheduled municipal elections for December, but they proceeded only in the West Bank, with Hamas boycotting the process and insisting on comprehensive legislative, presidential, and municipal elections.
- In May, after protests over the threatened eviction of Palestinian families in East Jerusalem prompted Hamas to fire rockets into Israel, Israeli forces launched a campaign of air strikes in the Gaza Strip. The offensive, which ended with a ceasefire after 11 days, killed about 250 Palestinians, including scores of civilians.
- The population continued to suffer during the year from the Israeli-imposed blockade, conflict-related destruction, high levels of poverty, unemployment, and food insecurity, and the COVID-19 pandemic. As of the end of December 2021, the Gaza Strip had accumulated some 190,000 confirmed cases of the coronavirus and more than 1,700 deaths, with less than a third of the population fully vaccinated.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 3 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 0 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

The PA has not held a presidential election since 2005, when the Fatah faction's Mahmoud Abbas won with 62 percent of the vote. Following its win in 2006 legislative elections and a violent rift with Fatah and the West Bank-based PA in 2007, Hamas seized control of the Gaza Strip. Abbas's four-year electoral mandate expired in 2009, though he has continued to govern in the West Bank.

In January 2021, following negotiations with Hamas, Abbas announced that a presidential election would be held in July, following legislative elections in May, but he indefinitely postponed the entire election process in April, citing Israel's refusal to allow PA election activity in East Jerusalem. Many analysts argued that the elections were actually halted because political fragmentation within Fatah raised the risk that Hamas or Fatah splinter groups would win.

Under PA laws, the prime minister is nominated by the president and requires the support of the Palestinian Legislative Council (PLC). Hamas leader Ismail Haniyeh was nominated and sworn in as prime minister following the 2006 elections, and again in 2007 as part of a short-lived unity government, but he was dismissed by President Abbas after the Fatah-Hamas conflict that year. Hamas did not recognize the dismissal. Because repeated attempts to form new PA unity governments have failed, Hamas has continued to exercise de facto executive authority in the territory. The chief of Hamas in the Gaza Strip, Yahya Sinwar, was confirmed for a second term as de facto head of government in a closed election by Hamas leadership in March 2021; he had first been chosen in 2017. Ismail Haniyeh was similarly confirmed as the overall leader of Hamas for a second four-year term in August.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

The PA has not held elections for the 132-seat PLC since 2006, when Hamas won 74 seats and Fatah took 45. The subsequent Fatah-Hamas schism and Israel's detention of many lawmakers left the full PLC unable to function, and the body's electoral mandate expired in 2010. Nonetheless, a Hamas-led rump legislature continued to operate in the Gaza Strip. In 2018, President Abbas ordered the formal dissolution of the PLC, backed by a Supreme Constitutional Court ruling that also called for legislative elections within six months. Hamas rejected the decision.

In January 2021, alongside his announcement that a presidential election would be held in July, Abbas called PLC elections for May. However, he canceled both sets of elections in April, and no new date was set, leaving Gaza residents without an elected legislature for another year.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 0 / 4

No open elections for any office have been held in Gaza since 2006. Decisions about the conduct and administration of elections are highly politicized and dependent on agreements between partisan factions. For example, Hamas refused to participate in the 2017 PA municipal elections, which had been postponed from the previous year amid disputes between Hamas and Fatah over candidate lists. PA municipal voting was held again in the West Bank in December 2021, with a second round set for early 2022, but Hamas did not allow the elections to proceed in the Gaza Strip, insisting that it would participate only in comprehensive legislative, presidential, and municipal elections.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 2 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 1 / 4

Since 2007, the Gaza Strip has functioned as a de facto one-party state under Hamas rule, although smaller parties—including Islamic Jihad, the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine (PFLP), the Democratic Front for the Liberation of Palestine (DFLP), and a faction of Fatah that opposes President Abbas—are tolerated to varying degrees. Some of these groups have their own armed wings and media outlets, and hold rallies and gatherings. However, those affiliated with Abbas and his supporters in Fatah are subject to persecution.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 0 / 4

The repeated postponement of elections, despite opinion polls showing strong public demand for presidential and legislative balloting, has prevented any opportunities for a change in the political status quo. The ongoing rift between Fatah and Hamas has also prevented municipal elections in the Gaza Strip that might give non-Hamas factions an opportunity to govern at the local level.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 0 / 4

Israel's ongoing blockade of Gaza, which comprises strict limits on the movement of goods and people in and out of the territory, and the ongoing Hamas-Fatah rift hamper the development of normal civilian political competition. Armed groups, including the Israeli military and militias such as those affiliated with Hamas and Islamic Jihad, exercise disproportionate control over the day-to-day lives of Palestinians in the Gaza Strip and leave them with virtually no ability to shape policies that affect them. Political and militant groups in Gaza are also influenced by more distant foreign powers; Qatar provides crucial financial aid to the territory and Hamas in particular, and the Iranian regime supports Islamic Jihad.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 1 / 4

Hamas makes little effort to address the rights of marginalized groups within Gazan society. Women enjoy formal political equality under PA laws, and some women won seats in the PLC in 2006. However, women are mostly excluded from leadership positions in Hamas and absent from public political events in practice. Gazan women do actively participate in civil society gatherings that touch on political issues. The political interests of LGBT+ people, who face widespread discrimination and the threat of violence in Gaza, are not addressed by those in power.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 1 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 0 / 4

The expiration of the presidential and parliamentary terms has left Gaza's authorities with no electoral mandate. In 2021, Hamas continued to govern the territory's internal affairs unilaterally, assigning responsibilities to its own officials as the reconciliation process with Fatah remained stalled.

The ability of Palestinian officials to make and implement policy in Gaza is severely circumscribed by Israeli and Egyptian border controls, Israeli military actions, and the ongoing schism with the PA in the West Bank. Israel maintains a heavy security presence around Gaza's land and sea perimeters, using live fire to keep anyone from entering buffer zones near these boundaries, which further reduces local control over the territory.

Hamas has been accused of corruption in public service delivery and aid distribution, which is crucial to daily life in Gaza given that over 80 percent of the population depends on international assistance due to the blockade. Multiple reports by the Coalition for Accountability and Integrity (AMAN), a civil society organization, have noted that the continuing Fatah-Hamas schism, issues related to judicial integrity, and specific problems with the procurement process have impeded the prosecution of corruption cases.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 0 / 4

The Hamas-controlled government has no effective or independent mechanisms for ensuring transparency in its funding, procurements, or operations. AMAN's reports have noted that political decision-making occurs out of public view.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 8 / 60D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 4 / 16*D1. Are there free and independent media? 0 / 4

The media are not free in Gaza. West Bank-based newspapers have been permitted in the territory since 2014, and a number of political factions have their own media outlets. However, Gazan journalists and bloggers continue to face repression from the Hamas government's internal security apparatus and from Israeli forces. In a 2018 report, Human Rights Watch (HRW) detailed a pattern of arrests, interrogations, and in some cases beatings and torture of journalists in Gaza. This pattern has continued, and journalists are especially vulnerable during moments of friction between Fatah and Hamas.

In 2021, Fatah-affiliated journalists were arrested or harassed following the failure of reconciliation talks. In April, Hamas security forces beat local radio reporter Rewaa Mershid with a tree branch for not wearing a headscarf, triggering a public outcry and pledges that the man responsible would be punished. Among other cases during the year, journalist Alaa al-Mashharawi was arrested without explanation in October.

A number of media freedom violations were associated with the May conflict between Israeli forces and Palestinian militant groups in Gaza. Israeli air strikes destroyed buildings that reportedly housed the offices of more than 20 media outlets, including Palestinian outlets and international news services like the Associated Press. After the cease-fire, more than a dozen journalists in the territory found that the social media platform WhatsApp had blocked their accounts.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 1 / 4

Freedom of religion is restricted. The PA Basic Law declares Islam to be the official religion of Palestine and states that "respect and sanctity of all other heavenly religions (Judaism and Christianity) shall be maintained." Blasphemy is a criminal offense. Hamas authorities have enforced conservative Sunni Islamic practices and attempted to exert political control over mosques. However, they have not enforced prayers in schools or compelled women to wear hijab in Gaza's main urban areas to the extent that they did in the early years of Hamas control.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 1 / 4

Primary and secondary schools in the Gaza Strip are run by Hamas, the UN Relief and Works Agency (UNRWA), or private entities. In the Hamas-run Islamic University, people are separated by gender, and women are obliged to cover their hair. Hamas intervenes in the schools under its control to uphold its views on Islamic identity and morality. It does not intervene extensively in private universities, but Hamas-led police have violently suppressed student demonstrations. Some Gazan academics are believed to practice self-censorship. Israeli and Egyptian restrictions on trade and travel limit access to educational materials and academic exchanges.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 2 / 4

Intimidation by Hamas militants and other armed groups has some effect on personal expression and private discussion in Gaza, and the authorities monitor social media for critical content. A 2018 HRW report documented a number of incidents in which Hamas intimidated, detained, or abused individuals in response to their social media activity or attendance at political events, most notably those perceived to be supportive of Fatah or opposed to the Hamas government. Such practices continue to occur regularly. Social media users, particularly women, also reportedly face online harassment for expressing political views. The risk of repercussions for free expression has led some residents to self-censor.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 2 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 0 / 4

Israeli forces use violent and frequently lethal methods to disperse demonstrations near the de facto border. According to data from the UN Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs (UNOCHA), at least four Gazans were killed and some 140 were injured by Israeli forces in the context of demonstrations during 2021. Injuries are often caused by shrapnel, rubber-coated bullets, or direct hits from tear-gas canisters in addition to live gunfire.

Hamas also significantly restricts freedom of assembly, with security forces violently dispersing unapproved public gatherings.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 1 / 4

There is a broad range of Palestinian nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) and civic groups, and Hamas operates a large social-services network. However, Hamas has restricted the activities of organizations that do not submit to its regulations, and many civic associations have been shut down for political reasons since the 2007 PA split. Aid and reconstruction efforts by NGOs after periodic conflicts with Israel have been held up in part by disagreements over international and PA access to the territory and control over border crossings. The Israeli government also imposes restrictions on access to Gaza for human rights researchers and NGO staff.

In October 2021, the Israeli government designated six Palestinian NGOs and human rights organizations as “terrorist” groups, though it provided little evidence that the groups, some of which received funding from European governments, had links to militant activity. While the six organizations operated mostly in the West Bank, some were also active in Gaza, and the designation was criticized by international human rights organizations and UN experts as an attack on the broader Palestinian human rights movement.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 1 / 4

The Fatah-aligned Palestinian General Federation of Trade Unions, the largest union body in the territories, has seen its operations curtailed in Gaza. Workers have little leverage in labor disputes due to the dire economic situation, extremely high unemployment, and the dysfunctional court system, which impedes enforcement of labor protections.

Hamas sometimes intervenes in labor union elections or in the activities of professional associations that are linked to Fatah. Hamas has established its own, parallel professional associations to compete with existing organizations that are more strongly affiliated with Fatah and rival groups. The civil servants' union for the Hamas-controlled public sector occasionally holds rallies and strikes.

F. RULE OF LAW: 0 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 0 / 4

Hamas maintains an ad hoc judicial system that is separate from the PA structures headquartered in the West Bank, which do not operate in Gaza. The system is subject to political control, and its judges lack proper training and experience. There are also reportedly long delays in hearing cases related to a range of issues, including land disputes and personal status matters.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 0 / 4

Hamas security forces and militants regularly carry out arbitrary arrests and detentions. The court system overseen by Hamas generally fails to ensure due process, and in some cases civilians are subject to trial by special military courts.

Some 230 Palestinian security detainees and prisoners from Gaza were held in Israeli prisons as of the end of December 2021, according to the Addameer Prisoner Support and Human Rights Association. The Israeli human rights group B'Tselem has noted that transporting prisoners outside of occupied territory is a breach of international law. Israeli military courts, which handle the cases of such detainees, lack the full due process guarantees of civilian courts.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 0 / 4

About 250 Palestinians were killed in Gaza by Israeli forces during 2021, according to UNOCHA, and more than 2,300 were injured. At least 120 of those killed were civilians. This sharp increase, from only three conflict-related fatalities in 2020, was due largely to the Israeli offensive in May, though several Palestinians were also killed by artillery and rocket fire from Palestinian militants that did not reach Israel. UN high commissioner for human rights Michelle Bachelet stated that Israel's attacks on the Gaza Strip could constitute war crimes if they were shown to be disproportionate.

Individuals who approach the de facto border with Israel, including those fishing in the waters off of Gaza, are at risk of live fire from Israeli forces. UNOCHA documents regular shooting incidents near the border and in coastal fishing areas.

Hamas-led authorities have applied the death penalty without due process or adequate opportunity for appeals and without the legally required approval from the PA president. At least 15 people were sentenced to death in 2021, though no executions were carried out.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 0 / 4

The legal system operating in Gaza offers few protections against harassment and discrimination for women and other vulnerable groups, including LGBT+ people. Laws dating to the British Mandate era authorize up to 10 years' imprisonment for sexual acts between men.

Gaza residents living with disabilities face significant barriers. A 2020 HRW report noted pervasive stigma against this population and found that Israeli import restrictions impeded their access to medical and other equipment.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 2 / 16G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 0 / 4

Freedom of movement for Gaza residents is severely limited. Israel and Egypt exercise tight control over border areas, and Hamas imposes its own restrictions on travel. Israel often denies Gaza residents permits to travel outside of the territory on security grounds, authorizing only certain medical patients and other individuals to leave. University students have difficulty acquiring the necessary permits to leave the territory to study abroad. Corruption and the use of bribes at crossing points is common.

The Rafah crossing between Gaza and Egypt was opened more regularly in 2021 compared with 2020, but conditions remained largely unpredictable and restrictive. The May conflict led to a total shutdown of Israeli-controlled crossings, with partial openings initiated later in the year. In December, Israeli officials announced the completion of a more robust physical barrier separating Israel from Gaza, with surveillance devices and an underground wall to deter tunneling. The Israeli army prevents Palestinians from approaching the fencing itself and a surrounding “buffer zone” that extends up to 300 meters into the territory, though the de facto border is not recognized by the international community or key stakeholders. Israeli authorities also periodically restrict or close Gaza’s offshore fishing zone. During 2021, the zone was reduced from 15 to as little as 6 nautical miles from shore in response to militant activity.

Since 2020, local authorities have imposed curfews and other temporary restrictions on internal movement to limit the spread of COVID-19, generally adjusting the measures in light of increasing or decreasing case numbers.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 1 / 4

While Gaza residents are able to own property and engage in business activity, their rights have been seriously undermined by the effects of periodic conflicts between Hamas and Israel, among other factors. Reconstruction of homes that were damaged or destroyed during past rounds of fighting has lagged for many years, leaving thousands of people displaced or in temporary housing. Impediments to private enterprise in Gaza include persistent Israeli bans on imports of many raw materials. These restrictions are unilaterally adjusted by Israeli authorities based on political and security criteria.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 1 / 4

Palestinian laws and societal norms, derived in part from Sharia (Islamic law), put women at a disadvantage in matters such as marriage and divorce. Hamas has enforced restrictions on personal attire and behavior it deems immoral, though enforcement has relaxed in recent years. A 2019 PA decree set 18 as the minimum age for marriage, but child marriage reportedly remains a problem.

So-called honor killings continue to occur, though information on the situation in Gaza is limited. Domestic violence is common, with nearly four in 10 Gazan women facing such violence according to a 2019 PA survey. Rape and domestic violence go underreported and often unpunished, as authorities are allegedly reluctant to pursue such cases. While women’s rights activists in 2021 called on the PA to adopt a long-delayed law on domestic violence, Hamas has resisted the imposition of new PA laws in the absence of the PLC.

The blockade of the Gaza Strip's land borders and coastline has greatly reduced economic opportunity in the territory. Half of Gaza's labor force was unemployed as of the third quarter of 2021, with an unemployment rate of 70.4 percent among youth aged 15–29. Israel's intermittent restrictions on the entry of construction materials have hampered growth and recovery from conflicts, and Israeli patrols limit farming near the border fence as well as fishing in coastal waters. Hamas has imposed price controls that may further dampen economic activity.

Inconsistent access to fuel imports and electricity due to Israeli, PA, and Egyptian policies hinders all forms of development in the territory, including domestic desalination that could improve access to clean water. Qatari aid to Gaza, including in the domain of fuel and electricity, is inconsistent and dependent on the status of political agreements with Israel and Egypt.

PA officials have little ability to enforce legal protections against exploitative labor conditions in Gaza, and most private-sector wage earners receive less than the legal minimum, which is itself lower than the poverty threshold.

Hong Kong*

Freedom Status: Partly Free

Note: Freedom in the World reports assess the level of political rights and civil liberties in a given geographical area, regardless of whether they are affected by the state, nonstate actors, or foreign powers. Disputed territories are sometimes assessed separately if they meet certain criteria, including boundaries that are sufficiently stable to allow year-on-year comparisons. For more information, see the report methodology and FAQ.

Overview: The people of Hong Kong, a special administrative region of China, traditionally enjoyed substantial civil liberties and the rule of law under their local constitution, the Basic Law. However, the implementation of the National Security Law (NSL) in 2020 has amounted a multifront attack on the “one country, two systems” framework. The territory's most prominent prodemocracy figures have been arrested under its provisions, and NSL charges or the threat of charges have resulting in the closure of political parties, major independent news outlets, peaceful nongovernmental organizations (NGOs), and unions. The NSL also paved the way for Beijing to overhaul Hong Kong's electoral system in 2021; the new rules permit mainland authorities to vet candidates, and contain other provisions that ultimately ensure Beijing near-total control over the selection of Hong Kong authorities.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- In January, over 50 activists were arrested for participating in a nonbinding primary election in 2020, during which prodemocracy parties had selected candidates to run for seats on the Legislative Council (LegCo); 47 were charged with subversion under the NSL. The events left Hong Kong's most prominent and outspoken prodemocracy opposition behind bars.

- In March, China's National People's Congress Standing Committee (NPCSC) changed the annexes of the Basic Law to alter Hong Kong's electoral system. Dubbed "patriots governing Hong Kong," the new system allows Beijing to vet candidates for the LegCo and the Election Committee that selects the chief executive, and contained other provisions that ultimately ensured Beijing authorities near-total control over the selection of local Hong Kong authorities.
- In June, police froze the bank accounts of the prodemocracy newspaper Apple Daily, raided its offices, and arrested top editors on charges of violating the NSL. Soon after, Apple Daily shut down its website and social media accounts and announced its closure. In December, the prodemocracy outlet Stand News was raided and six senior staff were arrested on sedition charges, resulting in its closure.
- Dozens of civil society organizations and unions have disbanded since the NSL took effect in 2020. Prominent organizations that closed in 2021 include the Civil Human Rights Front (CHRF) and the Hong Kong Alliance in Support of Patriotic Democratic Movements of China, both known for organizing peaceful protests, as well as the Hong Kong Confederation of Trade Unions (HKCTU) and Hong Kong Professional Teachers' Union (HKCTU).

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 10 / 40 (-5)

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

In 2017, Carrie Lam, a former deputy to outgoing chief executive Leung Chun-ying and Beijing's favored candidate, was chosen as Hong Kong's fourth—and first woman—chief executive, with 777 Election Committee votes. Her main opponent, former financial secretary John Tsang, received just 365 votes despite drawing far more support than Lam in public opinion polls. As in the past, the selection process featured reports of heavy lobbying by central government representatives.

The next chief executive election is scheduled for March 2022, and will take place following a sweeping overhaul of electoral laws approved by China's National People's Congress (NPC) in March 2021 and described as "patriots governing Hong Kong." The new system diminished the scope of direct suffrage, allows Beijing to vet candidates for Hong Kong's Legislative Council and Election Committee, and contains other modifications that effectively ensure Beijing authorities near-total control over the selection of local Hong Kong authorities.

Under the new system, the chief executive is still chosen by the Election Committee but the number of committee members was increased from 1,200 to 1,500. Of the 300 new representatives, 190 are delegates of either the NPC, the Chinese legislature, or the Chinese People's Political Consultative Conference (CPPCC), China's top government advisory body. The remaining 110 members represent "Hong Kong members of relevant national organizations." The 117 Election Committee members who had represented Hong Kong's 18 district councils—most of whom were from the territory's prodemocracy camp—were removed from the Election Committee. The number of eligible voters who select Election Committee members was cut from some 200,000 "functional constituency" voters—representatives of elite business and social sectors, many with close Beijing ties—to only around 4,800. Most individual votes were replaced with organizational votes, meaning that unions and other groups may cast only one vote on behalf of all their members.

Voting for the Election Committee—the first poll under the new electoral system—took place in September 2021. Candidates competed for 967 seats in 36 separate elections within subsectors that represent a variety of special interest groups. Candidates for more than three-quarters of those seats ran uncontested, and all but three nominated candidates were considered to be aligned with the Beijing-backed authorities. The remaining 533 committee seats were to be occupied by individuals nominated directly from designated organizations and by ex officio members. Analysts reported following the September 2021 election that the electoral changes ultimately resulted in the addition of more than 500 Election Committee seats designated for Chinese business, political, and grassroots groups.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4 (-1)

The new electoral system introduced by Beijing in 2021 significantly altered the composition and power dynamic of the LegCo. The number of seats increased from 70 to 90, with 40 elected by the pro-Beijing Election Committee, 30 by the functional constituencies, and only 20 elected directly by Hong Kong voters in the five geographical constituencies. This reduced the proportion of seats open for direct election from 50 percent to 22 percent. Members serve four-year terms.

LegCo elections were originally scheduled for September 2020. The prodemocracy camp organized a nonbinding primary election for its candidates, and more than 600,000 Hong Kongers voted peacefully in the primary that July.

The same month, Chief Executive Lam invoked emergency powers to postpone the LegCo election by a year, citing the threat of COVID-19. In November 2020, the NPC Standing Committee issued a directive allowing the Hong Kong government to summarily remove—without judicial review—lawmakers whom it deemed to have engaged in behaviors that endangered national security. Lam’s government quickly ousted four prodemocracy LegCo members, prompting all 15 of the remaining prodemocracy lawmakers to resign in protest. Dozens of people involved in organizing the primary were arrested in January 2021 under the NSL, most on charges of “subversion of state power” that can carry a sentence of life imprisonment.

LegCo elections eventually took place in December 2021, offering voters a pool of overwhelmingly pro-Beijing candidates who were vetted for compliance with a “patriots only” policy. Numerous major prodemocracy candidates arrested for involvement in the 2020 primary remained in jail. The pro-Beijing camp won all but one seat, and turnout was a record low of 30 percent. Several individuals who called for an election boycott were arrested.

Score Change: The score declined from 1 to 0 because the Legislative Council elections almost exclusively featured candidates who were vetted to comply with a “patriots only” policy to ensure loyalty to Beijing.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 0 / 4 (-1)

The restrictive electoral reforms implemented in 2021 offer the Chinese government far-reaching authority to shape electoral outcomes. The Election Committee is newly empowered to vet and preapprove candidates based on national security background checks that ensure they are “patriots.” This new mechanism is more restrictive than the prescreening system for the 2016 LegCo election, in which the Electoral Affairs Commission (EAC) required candidates to attest in writing their belief that Hong Kong is unquestionably a part of China; six localist candidates had been disqualified for failure to comply. Far fewer seats in the LegCo and in the Election Committee are directly elected by voters under the new system. The overhaul itself was written by authorities in Beijing.

Prodemocracy candidates were absent from 2021 LegCo elections. The seven-member Candidate Eligibility Review Committee approved all but one of the 154 candidates, most of whom were part of the pro-Beijing camp.

Score Change: The score declined from 1 to 0 because the electoral reform enacted in March diminished the scope of direct suffrage and empowered authorities to exclude candidates based on political criteria.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 5 / 16 (-2)

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 1 / 4 (-1)

The political choices of Hong Kong residents are limited by an electoral system that ensures the dominance of pro-Beijing camp by stifling prodemocracy oppositions. The banning of the proindependence Hong Kong National Party (HKNP) in 2018 marked the first blanket prohibition of a political party since the territory's 1997 handover from Britain to China. The government since then has taken even more aggressive steps to outlaw prodemocracy political activities.

The largest pro-Beijing party is the Democratic Alliance for the Betterment and Progress of Hong Kong. The new, pro-Beijing Bauhinia Party caters to mainland Chinese who have relocated to Hong Kong. The Chinese Communist Party (CCP) is not formally registered in Hong Kong but exercises enormous influence.

The main prodemocracy parties are the Civic Party and the Democratic Party. However, their most prominent members remain in jail for participating in the July 2020 primary election. In April 2021, four Civic Party members facing national security charges issued an open letter calling for the dissolution of the party, citing concern for the safety their colleagues. Civic Passion, a localist party critical of Beijing, disbanded in September after its chairman was ejected from the LegCo after failing to clear the Election Committee's vetting for patriotism. By year's end, leading prodemocracy figures had been effectively removed from the political arena under provisions of Beijing's "patriots only" electoral makeover, or via charges under the NSL.

Score Change: The score declined from 2 to 1 because members of prodemocracy groups are excluded from politics under the new electoral system and subject to arrest and intimidation under the National Security Law.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 0 / 4 (-1)

Prodemocracy legislators historically enjoyed substantial minority representation alongside their pro-Beijing counterparts. However, after a series of disqualifications and expulsions that culminated in the mass resignation of prodemocratic lawmakers in November 2020, there were no democratic opposition candidates in the LegCo at year's end.

The subjective nature of the NPC's standards for oath taking; the expansive criminalization of speech and political activity under the NSL; and the chief executive's discretionary authority to remove proindependence LegCo members under the NPC's November 2020 directive all invite arbitrary enforcement and pose serious obstacles for the opposition in future elections. The opposition has been battered by arrests and detentions since Beijing imposed the NSL in 2020. Arguably the strongest blow was the arrest of 53 prodemocracy politicians and activists in January 2021 for participating in the primary elections, which Beijing considers a national security crime for aiming to overthrow the Hong Kong government by winning a majority in LegCo elections. Forty-seven people involved in the primary were charged with subversion under the NSL and have been in detention since March 2021; most remained behind bars at year's end.

The 2021 electoral reforms closed remaining avenues for the opposition to win political representation, including by reducing the number of elected seats, increasing the proportion of appointed seats, and implementing a vetting process to ensure that only "patriotic" candidates who accept Beijing's rules for Hong Kong are permitted to run in elections.

Score Change: The score declined from 1 to 0 due to the arrest and detention of most prominent opposition leaders and a new electoral system that effectively prevents the opposition from winning or maintaining a presence in the legislature.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 1 / 4

The unelected CCP leadership in Beijing exerts a powerful influence on politics in Hong Kong through a variety of channels, including the NPC's ability to issue interpretations of the Basic Law, the cooptation of Hong Kong business leaders through their mainland assets and membership in the NPC or CPPCC, and lobbying or harassment of election committee members and other political figures to ensure favorable electoral outcomes. The NSL, imposed without consultation by the central government, gives Beijing vastly expanded powers in Hong Kong, in part by establishing a centrally controlled security apparatus in the territory, and by allowing defendants in some NSL cases to be transferred to the mainland for prosecution and punishment.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 3 / 4

While there are no formal restrictions preventing women or members of ethnic minority groups from voting or running for office, their participation is limited in practice.

Two of Hong Kong's most prominent LGBT+ leaders, Raymond Chan Chi-chuen, and Cyd Ho, faced prosecution for participating in peaceful demonstrations. In September 2021, Chan was freed on bail; Ho was sentenced to several months in prison around the same time.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 5 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 0 / 4 (-1)

Directly elected officials have little ability to set and implement government policies under the territory's political system, and unelected mainland authorities are highly influential. The Basic Law restricts the LegCo's lawmaking powers, prohibiting legislators from introducing bills that would affect Hong Kong's public spending, governmental operations, or political structure.

Under the new electoral rule, a vetting process ensures that only "patriotic" candidates who accept Beijing's rules for Hong Kong may run in elections. Prodemocracy candidates have been barred from running for office, jailed, or forced into exile, and there was no genuine competition in the 2021 polls. With the NSL in full force, and Beijing's makeover of electoral rules to ensure its grasp on the city's political life, what remains of the LegCo offers no meaningful checks on executive authority.

Score Change: The score declined from 1 to 0 because the lack of competitive elections deprived the local authorities of democratic legitimacy, and because the exclusion of opposition forces from the legislature reduced its ability to serve as a check on the executive.

Hong Kong is regarded as having generally low corruption rates, and some high-ranking officials have been successfully prosecuted for graft-related offenses in the past. However, residents perceive the government to be lagging in the fight against corruption.

An increasing source of concern has been the apparently politicized application of anti-money laundering and anticorruption laws against organizations connected with the 2019 protest movement. In October 2021, the 612 Humanitarian Relief Fund, set up to provide financial assistance for protesters who were arrested, ceased operations following calls from Chinese state-backed media for authorities to investigate it for illegal activity. In 2019, a similar group, Spark Alliance, saw its accounts frozen and its staff arrested on charges of money laundering.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 2 / 4

Hong Kong has no freedom of information law, nor does it have any specific legislation relating to the management of government records and archives. An administrative Code of Access to Information is intended to ensure open access to government records but includes broad exemptions.

Consultations between Hong Kong officials and the Beijing government, represented by a Liaison Office in the territory, are largely opaque. There is no transparency regarding central government processes that directly affect Hong Kong. The NSL was drafted in secret and announced without public consultation, taking effect almost immediately after the text was first published.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 33 / 60 (-4)D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 8 / 16 (-1)*D1. Are there free and independent media? 1 / 4 (-1)

The Basic Law has historically acted as a bulwark for press freedom, and the mainland's internet censorship regime does not yet apply in Hong Kong. Residents have long had access to a variety of print, broadcast, and digital news sources.

However, following several years of sustained political and economic pressure on independent media by the Hong Kong and Chinese governments, press freedom has deteriorated even more severely since 2020. In August of that year, prodemocracy media owner Jimmy Lai was arrested on suspicion of "colluding with foreign forces," and police executed search warrants at the headquarters of his Apple Daily newspaper. In June 2021, police froze the newspaper's accounts, raided its offices, and arrested top editors on charges of violating the NSL; staff were accused of "colluding with foreign forces" by publishing articles since 2019—prior to the NSL's implementation—that called for foreign sanctions against Hong Kong and Chinese government officials. Soon after, Apple Daily shut down its website and social media accounts and announced its closure, as well as the closure of a sister publication, Next Magazine. In December, the prodemocracy outlet Stand News was raided and six senior staff were arrested on sedition charges, resulting in its closure.

Radio Television Hong Kong (RTHK), the public broadcaster once known for its independent reporting, is being increasingly reined in. In February 2021, it removed all content older a year on YouTube and Facebook—a significant erasure of news ahead of the year's elections. The broadcaster also canceled the long-running current affairs show City Forum, and rejected an award for its coverage of the 2019 Yuen Long mob attacks on prodemocracy protesters. Chief Executive Carrie Lam was given her own series to explain changes to electoral laws, but it was criticized as failing to meaningfully address citizens' concerns.

Other constraints on the media implemented in 2021 included an antidoxing law approved by the LegCo in September, which gave authorities broad license to arrest anyone who published personal information recklessly or with the intent of causing harm; rights groups expressed concern that it could be invoked against journalists and activists. The following month, the Companies Registry and Land Registry announced that individuals who searched their public records must provide identifying information and acknowledge that their identities and other details could be made available to authorities, prompting criticism from HKJA, which said the requirements posed unnecessary legal risks to journalists. Also in October, the LegCo passed the Film Censorship (Amendment) Bill 2021, which allows films to be banned, including retroactively, on national security grounds. And, HKJA announced that police had declined to investigate 26 of 27 complaints filed over officers' conduct towards reporters during the 2019 protests.

Score Change: The score declined from 2 to 1 due to increased government pressure on independent media outlets, including the forced closure of Apple Daily and the arrest of its senior staff.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 4 / 4

Religious freedom is generally respected in Hong Kong. Adherents of the Falun Gong spiritual movement, which is persecuted in mainland China, are free to practice in public. However, they have faced counterdemonstrations and harassment by members of the Hong Kong Youth Care Association (HKYCA), which has ties to the CCP. In July 2021, a top Hong Kong official called for Falun Gong to be investigated on suspicion of violating the NSL.

Several Christian groups that had supported 2019 protestors or human rights in China, such as the Hong Kong Pastors Network and the longstanding Hong Kong Christian Patriotic Democratic Movement disbanded in 2021.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 1 / 4

University professors were historically able to write and lecture freely, and political debate on campuses was lively. However, a crackdown on free speech on campus, academic freedom, and student activity persisted throughout 2021.

The NSL has been used aggressively to suppress discussions of Hong Kong independence and the 2019 protest movement at all levels of education. Several prodemocracy scholars have been fired by Hong Kong universities since 2020, while in February 2021 the Education Bureau instructed public universities to bring curriculums in line with the NSL and “prevent and suppress” on-campus acts that could violate its provisions. The same month, the Chinese University of Hong Kong withdrew recognition of its student union over criticism of the NSL by newly elected union leaders, a decision that effectively suspended the union's funding. In December, university administrators on three campuses removed sculptures commemorating the 1989 Tiananmen Square massacre. Additionally, prior to the LegCo election, Beijing-controlled newspapers threatened the Hong Kong Public Opinion Research Institute (HKPORI) for including the option of “blank vote” when polling the public about their voting intentions.

The chief executive serves as the chancellor of all public universities, and local authorities appoint university council members, who are similar to trustees.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 2 / 4

Hong Kong has a tradition of free personal expression and private discussion, but local and mainland security agencies have been suspected of monitoring the communications of prodemocracy activists for some years, and they now have a specific mandate to do so under the NSL, which permits warrantless surveillance and wiretapping. The law also allowed mainland authorities to establish security agencies in the territory under their own jurisdiction, and people charged with NSL offenses can be detained and tried on the mainland. The NSL's enactment has prompted many social media users to self-censor, shutter their accounts, or delete existing content that could run afoul of the law.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 3 / 12 (-3)

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 1 / 4

The Basic Law guarantees freedom of assembly, but the Public Order Ordinance requires organizers to give police seven days' notice before protests and to obtain official assent. Since its emergence, the government has repeatedly used the COVID-19 pandemic as a pretext to ban public assemblies, including the annual June 4 vigil to commemorate the 1989 Tiananmen Square massacre, which in 2021 was banned for the second year in a row. Some 7,000 police were deployed to enforce the ban on protests and gatherings that day, and 24 would-be organizers of the vigil were arrested for promoting an unauthorized assembly.

The NSL has been invoked to arrest individuals for actions as minor as carrying stickers that read "liberate Hong Kong," and for holding blank placards.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 1 / 4 (-2)

Historically, Hong Kong hosted a vibrant nongovernmental organization (NGO) sector, including a number of groups that focus on human rights in mainland China. However, the introduction of the NSL in 2020 dramatically changed the environment for civil society: the entire staff of some organizations quit on the eve of the law's introduction, and a number of prominent prodemocracy organizations have since rapidly disbanded due to safety concerns.

Among the most notable closures in 2021 were the Civil Human Rights Front (CHRF), the nonviolent prodemocracy group known for organizing an annual mass protest on July 1, which disbanded in August; the group was accused of responsibility for violent clashes between demonstrators and police in 2019, and one of its leaders had been sentenced to 18 months in prison for participating in a banned rally. The Hong Kong Alliance in Support of Patriotic Democratic Movements of China, best known for organizing candlelight vigils in Hong Kong on the anniversary of the Tiananmen Square massacre, disbanded in September after its assets were frozen and it was charged with subversion under the NSL. Amnesty International announced in October that it would shutter two Hong Kong offices by year's end, saying the NSL made it impossible to conduct human rights work without risk of reprisals.

As of November 2021, Amnesty International said at least 35 groups had disbanded since the NSL took effect, while Agence France-Presse (AFP) estimated more than 50.

Score Change: The score declined from 3 to 1 because numerous NGOs have curbed their activities or disbanded to avoid potential prosecution under the National Security Law.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 1 / 4 (-1)

Trade unions are independent, but collective-bargaining rights are not recognized, and protections against antiunion discrimination are weak.

Some trade unions took an active role in the 2019 protest movement, and attempted to organize an unofficial referendum on whether to call a general strike in June 2020, but the effort fell short of its turnout goal and drew warnings from government ministers. Lee Cheuk-yan, general secretary of the Hong Kong Confederation of Trade Unions (HKCTU), was among those arrested and charged for their involvement in organizing protests during that year. The HKCTU announced its dissolution in October 2021, with members saying they experienced intimidation and leaders citing outright threats to their safety. The Hong Kong Professional Teachers' Union, the largest teachers' union in the city, disbanded in August after Chinese state media called it "a malignant tumor," and the city's Education Bureau accused it of "spreading propaganda" and encouraging students' participation in illegal activities. In the announcement of its closure, the union cited "changes in the social and political environment" and "recent rapid developments" that put it "under tremendous pressure."

Score Change: The score declined from 2 to 1 because a major labor confederation and many individual unions, including the largest teachers' union, disbanded during the year to avoid potential prosecution.

F. RULE OF LAW: 9 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 2 / 4

The Hong Kong judiciary is largely independent but looming threats remain as several provisions of the NSL undermined judicial autonomy, such as allowing the government to select judges for NSL trials.

The NPC has historically reserved the right to make final interpretations of the Basic Law, limiting the independence of the Court of Final Appeal. Such interventions were rare prior to the NPC's 2016 interpretation regarding oaths of office, which was also unusual for being issued without a request from the Hong Kong government and before the local courts had ruled on the matter in question. The 2020 NSL was imposed on Hong Kong through a Basic Law provision that allows the NPC to list national laws that must be applied locally, bypassing both the LegCo and Hong Kong's courts.

Under the NSL, the chief executive is empowered to designate a pool of judges specially to try NSL cases. They are selected for a one-year term but can face removal should they make statement that "endanger national security." The chief executive's office refused to make the criteria for selection and the judge list public, raising serious concerns about judicial independence.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 2 / 4

The courts typically upheld due process rights and adjudicated civil and criminal matters fairly and efficiently in the past. Following the thousands of arrests made during the protests that began in 2019, courts came under pressure to process cases faster, and pro-Beijing politicians and media called on them to side with the prosecution and hand down heavier sentences.

Under the NSL, individuals charged with national security offenses are tried by judges selected by the chief executive, and the central government wields influence over the appointment of prosecutors. In cases involving offenses against public order or state secrets, the trials may be closed to the public. The central government's new Office for Safeguarding National Security in Hong Kong can assert jurisdiction over some cases and have them tried on the mainland. There is a much higher threshold for bail for NSL cases than others. The NSL also gave police powerful new legal tools including enhanced investigatory power to search premises and electronic devices, freeze or confiscate assets, and demand people and groups provide information.

In July 2021, the first NSL court case commenced, without a jury. Tong Ying-kit—who drove a motorcycle bearing a flag with the banned "Liberate Hong Kong, revolution of our times" into a crowd of police officers—was found guilty by a three-judge panel and sentenced to nine years in prison on charges of incitement and terrorist activity. Three people were injured in the incident.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 2 / 4

Police are forbidden by law from employing torture, disappearance, or other forms of abuse. However, the 2019 protest movement featured frequent episodes of police violence, which have generally gone unaddressed. There were also credible allegations of arbitrary detention and even torture of protesters in 2019. In addition to police violence, the protest movement brought about a more general climate of unrest, due to both clashes that accompanied demonstrations and violent attacks committed by nonstate actors against protesters, activists, and bystanders at locations far from where protest actions were taking place.

The 2015 disappearances of five Hong Kong booksellers into police custody on the mainland continue to cast doubt on the local government's capacity to protect residents from abuses by Chinese authorities, a concern exacerbated by the new jurisdictional powers provided by the NSL. Four of the booksellers were eventually released, but they reportedly faced surveillance and harassment in Hong Kong; the fifth, Swedish citizen Gui Minhai, remained in detention on the mainland and was sentenced to 10 years in prison in February 2020 for supposedly providing intelligence to foreign entities.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 3 / 4

Citizens are generally treated equally under the law, though people of South Asian origin or descent face language barriers and de facto discrimination in education and employment. Women are also subject to some employment discrimination in practice. Antidiscrimination laws do not specifically protect LGBT+ people.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 13 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 3 / 4

Hong Kong residents generally enjoy freedom of movement, though authorities periodically deny entry to visiting political activists and Falun Gong practitioners, raising suspicions of Beijing-imposed restrictions. Some Hong Kong activists and politicians have also faced difficulty traveling to the mainland. In 2019, there were reports that people traveling into China from Hong Kong were subjected to checks by mainland authorities, who searched their phones for protest photos and related communications.

In 2020, a number of countries, including Britain and Australia, offered special visas and other pathways for Hong Kong residents to escape political repression, though in retaliation Beijing refused to recognize British National (Overseas) passport. Legal experts have expressed concerns about updates to immigration law enacted in 2021, which they say could pave the way for local authorities to enact exit and entry bans like those found on the mainland.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 3 / 4

While property rights are largely respected, collusion among powerful business entities with political connections is perceived as an impediment to fair competition.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 4 / 4

Hong Kong residents are legally protected from rape and domestic abuse, and police generally respond appropriately to reports of such crimes. Men and women enjoy equal rights in personal status matters such as marriage and divorce. A constitutional challenge to Hong Kong's restrictions on same-sex marriage was rejected by a court in 2019. In two separate cases in September 2020, a court ruled in favor of inheritance rights for a gay couple but rejected a bid to compel the territory to fully recognize same-sex marriages undertaken abroad.

While most Hong Kong residents enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation, certain marginalized groups face substantial risks of exploitation and abuse. For instance, foreign household workers, who make up roughly 4.4 percent of Hong Kong's population, remain vulnerable to a wide range of exploitative practices. Since they may face deportation if dismissed, many are reluctant to bring complaints against employers. Hong Kong is also a significant site for human trafficking, but the city still lacks comprehensive antitrafficking legislation.

After the implementation of the NSL, businesses in Hong Kong's "yellow economy," which support prodemocracy protesters, faced scrutiny including police warnings and extra inspections for compliance with pandemic safety guidelines.

Indian Kashmir

Freedom Status: Not Free

Note: Freedom in the World reports assess the level of political rights and civil liberties in a given geographical area, regardless of whether they are affected by the state, nonstate actors, or foreign powers. Disputed territories are sometimes assessed separately if they meet certain criteria, including boundaries that are sufficiently stable to allow year-on-year comparisons. For more information, see the report methodology and FAQ.

Overview: Control of Kashmir has been divided between India and Pakistan since 1948, and Indian-administered Kashmir long enjoyed substantial autonomy under India's constitution. However, the region's autonomous status was revoked in 2019, and what had been the state of Jammu and Kashmir was reconstituted as two union territories under the direct control of the Indian central government. The move stripped residents of many of their previous political rights. Civil liberties have also been curtailed to quell ongoing public opposition to the reorganization. Indian security forces are frequently accused of human rights violations, but few are punished. Separatist and jihadist militants continue to wage a protracted insurgency.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- Internet access and freedom of assembly remained restricted during the year in the wake of the region's 2019 political reorganization. However, 4G internet service was largely restored to the region in February.
 - In October, a new wave of militant attacks against members of minority religious communities in the region, and against migrant workers, caused many to flee. Security forces responded to the surge in militant violence by briefly detaining hundreds of civilians; the increase in violence caused by both militants and security forces resulted in the deaths of at least 33 people in under three weeks.

- Indian officials signaled in June that statehood for Jammu and Kashmir—a union territory under the direct control of the central Indian government—would be restored, with elections for a new legislature to be held following the redrawing of constituency boundaries. However, no specific timetable had been announced at year’s end.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 7 / 40A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 2 / 12*A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

Prior to 2019, the state of Jammu and Kashmir enjoyed special autonomy under Article 370 of the Indian constitution. A chief minister—typically the head of the largest party in the state legislature’s lower house—was entrusted with executive power. Under the Jammu and Kashmir Reorganisation Act 2019, adopted by the Indian Parliament that August, the region’s autonomous status was revoked, it was downgraded from a state to a union territory, and the Ladakh area was separated to form a second union territory. Executive authority in each now rests with a lieutenant governor appointed by the president of India on the advice of the Indian prime minister. In Jammu and Kashmir, the lieutenant governor is to be assisted by a chief minister and cabinet responsible to an elected legislature, though no such legislature had been elected by the end of 2021. Manoj Sinha, a former Indian minister belonging to India’s ruling Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP), was appointed as lieutenant governor of Jammu and Kashmir in 2020. Radha Krishna Mathur, a former bureaucrat, was appointed as lieutenant governor of Ladakh in 2019 and remained in office during 2021.

The process by which Jammu and Kashmir’s autonomous status and statehood were revoked drew criticism and doubts about its legality. Opponents and other observers argued that the central government had improperly delayed state elections beginning in 2018 and then hastily adopted the reorganization law with little debate.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

Until the passage of the Jammu and Kashmir Reorganisation Act in 2019, the region had a bicameral legislature. The lower chamber, the Legislative Assembly, was composed of 87 members directly elected for six-year terms to single-member districts. The upper chamber, called the Legislative Council, comprised 28 indirectly elected members and eight members nominated by the governor. The 2014 elections were broadly free and fair, with reduced levels of voter intimidation, harassment, and violence compared to past elections. The state legislature was dissolved by the governor in late 2018, ending attempts by local parties to form a new governing majority after the BJP’s withdrawal brought down the last coalition government, but central authorities then extended direct rule and postponed new state elections through the summer of 2019, when the Reorganisation Act rendered them moot.

Under the arrangements adopted in 2019, the new union territory of Jammu and Kashmir would have a unicameral legislature with limited powers and at least 83 elected members. (As in the old assembly, another 24 seats associated with constituencies in Pakistani-controlled Kashmir would be left vacant.) In June 2021, senior Indian officials announced that elections will be held following the demarcation of 114 constituencies for Jammu and Kashmir, and that full statehood would be restored, but no specific timeline was given. Critics have accused the authorities of manipulating the delimitation process to award

Jammu—a Hindu majority region—a disproportionately high number of seats. The new union territory of Ladakh will continue to be administered solely by the lieutenant governor, with no legislature of its own.

Local elections to Block Development Councils in October 2019 were extensively boycotted by local mainstream political parties. However, in elections for District Development Councils that were held in November and December 2020, an alliance of Kashmiri parties that supported regional autonomy won control of 13 of the 20 councils.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 2 / 4

The legal framework governing statewide elections prior to 2019 was broadly perceived as fair. While intimidation of election workers and electoral authorities by militant groups sometimes interfered with the orderly implementation of electoral laws and regulations, the process was overseen by the Election Commission of India, a respected and largely independent body.

The Indian Parliament adopted the Jammu and Kashmir Reorganisation Act swiftly and without significant input from Kashmiris, fundamentally altering the electoral system and effectively stripping residents of substantial voting power.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 3 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 1 / 4

Until 2019, a competitive multiparty system had operated in the region. While new political parties had to register with the Election Commission, parties were generally able to form freely, and there were mechanisms by which independent candidates could stand for office. Notable impediments to normal party politics included militant violence, intimidation, and separatist boycotts.

Political activities were almost completely suspended after August 2019, as security forces detained thousands of party members and activists without charge, including the leaders of mainstream Kashmiri parties and the local branch of India's opposition Congress party. Former chief ministers and incumbent lawmakers were among those detained. In March 2021, Mirwaiz Umar Farooq, leader of the All Parties Hurriyat Conference (APHC), a prominent separatist coalition, was released from house arrest; he had been detained for 19 months following his arrest in 2019.

After the last elected chief minister, Mehbooba Mufti, was released in 2020, her People's Democratic Party (PDP) helped form the People's Alliance for Gupkar Declaration (PAGD) with several other Kashmiri parties, including its former rival, the Jammu and Kashmir National Conference (JKNC). The group hopes to restore the region's autonomy under the Indian constitution. Its leaders were once again placed under house arrest in December 2021.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 1 / 4

For more than a decade, state-level power had rotated between the two largest Kashmiri parties: the PDP and the JKNC. The Hindu nationalist BJP, which currently governs in New Delhi, has made significant electoral inroads in recent years; it participated in a coalition government with the PDP from 2015 to 2018.

The postponement of state elections, the 2019 reorganization of the region, and the related mass detentions effectively reduced the ability of opposition groups to compete and enter government in Jammu and Kashmir for the foreseeable future. The PAGD accused the government of curtailing its ability to campaign freely ahead of the District Development Council elections in 2020. While the alliance won those elections overall, the councils manage local development matters and have little governmental authority.

The union territory of Ladakh has a centrally appointed executive and no legislature, meaning no rotations of power through elections are possible at the territory level. Elections are still held for district-level development councils, but their powers are greatly overshadowed by those of appointed officials.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 0 / 4

The activities of separatist militants and a heavy Indian security presence have long impaired the ability of people in certain areas to participate freely in political processes. Since August 2019, tens of thousands of additional Indian troops have been deployed to the region to quash any public expressions of opposition to the Reorganisation Act. The deployment was accompanied by reports of intimidation and violence against civilians. Authorities detained—and subsequently released—hundreds of civilians in response to a surge in violent attacks by separatist militants in October 2021; the increase in violence caused the deaths of at least 33 people in under three weeks.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 1 / 4

The former state constitution granted all permanent residents over 18 the right to vote in state assembly elections. While the region had a female chief minister until early 2018, women have generally been underrepresented in politics.

Prior to the 2019 reorganization, historical refugees from Pakistan, who are disproportionately Hindu, were not entitled to permanent residency rights and could not vote in state elections, though they were able to vote in Indian parliamentary elections. In 2020, such individuals were allowed to vote in the development council polls in Jammu and Kashmir for the first time.

During the campaign period for the council elections in 2020, Muslim Kashmiri candidates and their parties were allegedly disadvantaged by continued detentions, police interference, and movement restrictions, many of which were imposed for security reasons.

The 2019 reorganization left the largely Buddhist and Shiite Muslim population of Ladakh without elected government institutions at the territory level. There are still two Autonomous Hill Development Councils representing Ladakh's two districts, Leh and Kargil, but many in Kargil vocally opposed the 2019 changes.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 2 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 0 / 4

India has never held a referendum on allowing Kashmiri self-determination, as called for in a 1948 UN resolution. Jammu and Kashmir long enjoyed substantial autonomy under India's constitution, but since 2019 it has been ruled directly by the central government through an appointed lieutenant governor, as has the newly separated territory of Ladakh. There are legal provisions for an elected legislature in Jammu and Kashmir, although its powers will ultimately be limited, and no legislature was in place during 2021. Many laws that had been passed by the state government have been subject to repeal or amendment under the new system, and more laws passed by the Indian Parliament now apply to Jammu and Kashmir. The union territory is not permitted to formulate its own laws regarding policing and public order.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 1 / 4

Corruption is widespread. A 2011 law established an anticorruption commission with far-reaching investigatory powers. The panel, known as the State Vigilance Commission, processed more than a thousand complaints after the first commissioners were appointed in 2013, and it filed a handful of bribery charges against public officials. However, few corruption cases result in convictions. In 2020, the commission was dissolved after the Jammu and Kashmir territorial government repealed the underlying law. In August 2021, the government tentatively began pursuing the implementation of a series of anticorruption recommendations passed by the Central Vigilance Commission.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 1 / 4

The administration generally operates with opacity, and the changes in the administrative status of the region in 2019, coupled with severe restrictions on press freedom, have further impeded transparency. Several official agencies intended to promote transparency and good governance, including the State Information Commission, were shut down in 2019 and 2020.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 20 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 6 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 1 / 4

Until mid-2019, print media were thriving in Jammu and Kashmir. Online media had proliferated, providing new platforms for news and information. The announcement of the region's changed administrative status was accompanied by a severe clampdown on the activities of local and foreign journalists. The authorities continued to disrupt internet service during 2021. In January 2020, 2G internet resumed in some areas for certain websites approved by the government—a list that did not include numerous news outlets. In February 2021, 4G internet service was largely restored in the region. Additional connectivity blackouts were briefly imposed in October, making it difficult for media outlets to operate.

A new media policy introduced in June 2020 gave government officials the authority to examine and censor content for “fake news, plagiarism, and unethical or antinational activities.” Journalists have faced harassment, intimidation, and arbitrary detention in connection with their work in recent years. In 2021, several journalists were summoned by security services to account for their activities; some reported being physically assaulted by police. A number of journalists who report from the region are barred from leaving India. A reporter for the magazine Kashmir Narrator, Asif Sultan, has been detained since 2018, reportedly for publishing work critical of the government.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 2 / 4

Freedom of worship is generally respected by the authorities. However, violence between Muslims and Hindus periodically flares up, and many have been injured or killed as a result. A ban on Shiite Muslims' Muharram processions, which take place during a period of mourning at the Islamic new year, has been upheld for decades. In August 2021, dozens of Shiite Muslims were detained and assaulted by police while attempting hold Muharram processions in Srinagar.

Authorities closed some mosques for months in the wake of the 2019 revocation of autonomy. Many were shuttered again in October 2021, allegedly to help control a new COVID-19 outbreak.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 1 / 4

Academic freedom is circumscribed. Authorities monitor the research produced at Kashmiri universities, and a combination of censorship and self-censorship discourages students and professors from pursuing sensitive topics of inquiry. Colleges, universities, and schools were shuttered for much of 2020 and 2021, both on security grounds and because of the coronavirus pandemic. A limited reopening of schools was announced in September 2021. Remote learning has been severely hampered by ongoing restrictions on internet access.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 2 / 4

While private discussion was previously robust, fear of reprisals by government or militant forces has increased in recent years, and serves as a deterrent to uninhibited speech. The mass arrests of politicians, activists, protesters, and others after the revocation of autonomy in 2019 were apparently aimed at curbing free expression and likely had a chilling effect on the rest of the population. In March 2021, all government employees in the region were ordered to provide the details of their social media accounts, which were then “scrutinized” by police in an apparent bid to suppress dissent.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 3 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 0 / 4

Freedom of assembly is frequently restricted during times of unrest. The authorities often reject requests for permits for public gatherings submitted by the separatist APHC. Separatist leaders are frequently arrested prior to planned demonstrations, and violent clashes between protesters and security forces are not uncommon.

Curfews were in force in parts of the region during 2021, and lockdowns intended to stem the spread of the coronavirus further curtailed people’s ability to congregate. Ongoing disruptions to phone and internet services served to prevent the planning of protests. Nevertheless, security forces clashed with protesters on multiple occasions, using tear gas and shotguns that fire metal pellets to disperse crowds. In August, citizens in Ladakh protested for full statehood for the union territory. The following month, the funeral of secessionist leader Syed Ali Shah Geelani was accompanied by harsh restrictions on free movement in an effort to curb protests.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 1 / 4

Although local and national civil rights groups are generally permitted to operate, they are routinely harassed by security forces. The separatist APHC is technically allowed to function, but its leaders are frequently subjected to detention. In 2019, the central government imposed a five-year ban on the group Jamaat-e-Islami (Jammu and Kashmir) and arrested its top leadership, claiming that it was engaged in separatist activities.

Many of the arrests that followed the revocation of autonomy in 2019 targeted independence advocates, human rights lawyers, and other civic activists. In November 2021, security forces arrested Khurram Parvez, a Kashmiri human rights activist, under the provisions of a controversial antiterrorism law; international rights organizations condemned Parvez's arrest, citing concerns that Indian authorities are abusing antiterrorism legislation to "quash dissent."

Throughout the year, restrictions on NGO activities severely curtailed efforts by civil society groups to assist with COVID-19 relief efforts.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 2 / 4

Although workers have the right to form unions and engage in collective bargaining under Indian law, union rights are inconsistently upheld in practice.

In September 2021, the Jammu Chamber of Commerce and Industries (JCCI) announced a day-long strike to "protest government restrictions against traders" in the region. The strike remained peaceful, and was met with widespread support from regional trade unions and opposition groups.

In November, the government finalized a new set of labor codes, which are likely to be implemented in the region in 2022. Labor leaders and trade unions criticized the new legislation, saying it was formulated without meaningful input from labor groups.

F. RULE OF LAW: 4 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 1 / 4

Courts in the region are politicized and typically act as an extension of Indian executive and military authority. The government and security forces frequently disregard court orders that impose constraints on their actions. In January 2020, following a long delay, the Indian Supreme Court ruled that the indefinite internet shutdown in Kashmir was unjustified and violated constitutional rights to free speech and expression, but authorities were slow to ease the shutdown, and mobile internet access was not restored until February 2021.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 1 / 4

Due process rights, including access to a timely trial, are hampered in part by large backlogs of cases and intermittent lawyers' strikes. The backlog increased in 2020 and 2021 due to COVID-19-related delays. Broadly written legislation, such as the unpopular Armed Forces Special Powers Act (AFSPA) and the Disturbed Areas Act, allow security forces to search homes and arrest suspects without a warrant, shoot suspects on sight, and destroy buildings believed to house militants or arms. Under the AFSPA, prosecutions of security personnel cannot proceed without the approval of the central government, which is rarely granted. Following the 2019 reorganization of the region, the central government now has the sole authority to declare an area "disturbed" under the AFSPA, which activates enhanced powers for security forces. The Public Safety Act allows detention without charge or trial for up to two years, though 2012 amendments barred the detention of minors. The law was used to jail mainstream political leaders and others in 2019 and 2020. Many such detainees were held in parts of India outside Kashmir.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 1 / 4

After several years of relative stability, security deteriorated sharply following the 2016 killing of Burhan Muzaffar Wani, a popular separatist militant leader. The situation remained volatile in 2021. At least 274 civilians, security personnel, and militants were reportedly killed in conflict-related violence over the course of the year.

Indian security personnel have continued to engage in torture, forced disappearances, and custodial killings of suspected militants and their alleged civilian sympathizers, and they generally enjoy impunity for such abuses. In 2019, the Office of the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights (OHCHR) released a report highlighting human rights violations in the Kashmir region over the previous year, updating a similar 2018 document; the report condemned excessive and extrajudicial violence committed by Indian security forces, and criticized the Indian government's refusal to investigate reported violations.

Militant groups have killed pro-India politicians, public employees, suspected informers, members of rival factions, soldiers, and civilians. The militants also engage in kidnapping, extortion, and other forms of intimidation. The OHCHR report detailed severe rights violations committed by active militant groups. Among other types of incidents during 2021, militants were suspected of having killed dozens of people belonging to the region's Hindu and Sikh communities in October.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 1 / 4

A pattern of violence targeting Pandits, or Kashmiri Hindus, has forced several hundred thousand Hindus to flee their homes in the region over the years, and many continue to reside in refugee camps. Other religious and ethnic minorities, including Sikhs and Gujjars, have been targeted, with several attacks and killings reported in 2021. Women face societal discrimination. They are also subject to harassment, intimidation, and violent attacks, including rape and murder, at the hands of both the security forces and militants. LGBT+ people are generally marginalized in Kashmiri society.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 7 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 1 / 4

Freedom of movement has been heavily curtailed by the authorities. Strict curfews were imposed in connection with the region's 2019 reorganization, and coronavirus-related lockdowns were added during 2020 and 2021, with the severity varying somewhat by location and over time. Even when curfews are not in place, internal movement is disrupted by roadblocks, checkpoints, and periodic protest-related impediments. Kashmir residents face delays of up to two years to obtain and renew passports due to heightened levels of scrutiny.

In 2020, the Indian government altered domicile legislation to make it easier for refugees and Indian nationals from outside Kashmir to establish permanent residency and obtain government jobs in the region, extending eligibility to those who had lived there for 15 years or studied there for seven years. The change would benefit many long-term residents who had lacked domicile status, but critics alleged that the government's aim was to alter the Muslim-majority territory's demographic composition. Tens of thousands of new domicile certificates have been issued. However, in October 2021, attacks on "non-locals" in the region caused the government to move thousands of migrants to safer locations and to assist some in returning to their places of origin.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 2 / 4

Property rights are undermined by displacement and military activity related to the conflict, and the regulatory environment constrains the establishment and operation of new businesses.

In 2020, the Indian government substantially altered dozens of laws governing land ownership in Jammu and Kashmir, ending long-standing restrictions on property acquisition by people who were not permanent residents of the region. Ladakh was not immediately affected by those changes. The new legal framework also gave the government and the military enhanced powers to reserve and manage land for development and strategic purposes. In December 2021, the government held a real estate summit to encourage “external investment” in land in Jammu and Kashmir. The initiative was widely criticized by Kashmiri civil society groups and politicians, who expressed concern that the new laws would disadvantage the region’s Muslim majority.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 2 / 4

Many women face domestic violence and other forms of abuse. There have been reports of women being killed in dowry disputes, and conservative social customs limit the choice of marriage partners for individuals.

Same-sex relations and same-sex marriage are both illegal in Jammu and Kashmir. In 2021, reports indicated that pandemic-related lockdowns produced a spike in domestic violence against LGBT+ individuals in the region.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 2 / 4

Certain social groups are subject to economic marginalization, though some are also eligible to benefit from affirmative-action policies in areas such as employment and education. Child labor is reportedly prevalent in the region, and the government has taken few steps to combat it. In 2021, local NGOs reported that children were regularly lured to the region by traffickers who promised to provide them with education, but instead forced them to work as domestic servants. Militant groups have been accused of recruiting children as fighters.

Nagorno-Karabakh*

Freedom Status: Partly Free

Note: Freedom in the World reports assess the level of political rights and civil liberties in a given geographical area, regardless of whether they are affected by the state, nonstate actors, or foreign powers. Disputed territories are sometimes assessed separately if they meet certain criteria, including boundaries that are sufficiently stable to allow year-on-year comparisons. For more information, see the report methodology and FAQ.

Overview: The Republic of Nagorno-Karabakh, which also calls itself the Republic of Artsakh, has enjoyed de facto independence from Azerbaijan since a 1994 cease-fire agreement that ended roughly two years of open warfare, though its independence is not recognized by any UN member states. The territory’s population is mostly ethnic Armenians, and given its geographic and diplomatic isolation, it has been dependent on close political and economic ties with Armenia. However, a third of Nagorno-Karabakh and some adjacent land came under Azerbaijani control in 2020 under a cease-fire agreement that ended a weeks-long conflict that year.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- As many as 70,000 Nagorno-Karabakh residents who fled for Armenia during the 2020 conflict returned by March. Residents from areas transferred to Azerbaijani control were unable or unwilling to return to those locations, however.
- Opposition groups organized regular rallies to address a variety of concerns during the year; protesters called for the resignation of President Arayik Harutyunyan, voiced dissatisfaction with the Armenian government, and called for more transparency in government-backed loans to affiliated businesspeople. Authorities made no attempts to disperse these events.
- While the 2020 cease-fire largely held, insecurity and violence still affected life in Nagorno-Karabakh. In August, the Azerbaijani prosecutor general reported that 23 Azerbaijani civilians were killed and another 36 were injured by mines in areas that were previously under Armenian control. In October, Russian peacekeepers reported that a farmer was killed by gunfire originating from Azerbaijani-controlled land.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 16 / 40A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 7 / 12*A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 2 / 4

The president is directly elected for up to two five-year terms and is both head of state and head of government, with authority to appoint and dismiss cabinet members.

The most recent presidential election took place in March and April 2020, several months before Azerbaijani forces launched an attack on the territory. It was widely acknowledged as the most competitive in Nagorno-Karabakh's recent history. An unprecedented 14 candidates engaged in an intense electoral campaign that featured extensive in-person and social media campaign activities. Weeks of televised presentations of candidates' programs culminated in the territory's first-ever televised debates. First-round turnout stood at 72 percent and second-round turnout stood at 45 percent.

Arayik Harutyunyan, a former prime minister and local businessman, won a majority of votes in the second round. His main rival, acting foreign minister Masis Mayilyan, was one of only two candidates who refused to participate in the televised debates. Mayilyan received 12 percent of votes in the second round even after calling on supporters not to cast a vote, to prevent the further spread of the COVID-19 in the region. Both candidates criticized Nagorno-Karabakh's previous leadership figures allied with former Armenian president Serzh Sargsyan, who himself had resigned amid the 2018 protests in that country.

Many foreign observers were unable to attend due to the COVID-19-related closure of international borders. Local observers, including those trained and supported by Armenia's leading nongovernmental organizations (NGOs), said the vote was free and fair despite reports of administrative irregularities and verbal clashes at some polling stations. Past elections were marred by problems including a lack of genuine competition and alleged abuses of administrative resources.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 3 / 4

Of the unicameral National Assembly's 33 members, all are elected by party list. Elections took place in 2020 in parallel with the presidential race. Ten political parties—almost twice more than in the 2015 elections—participated, organizing into two blocs. Parties campaigned freely in towns and villages and participated in televised presentations and debates.

The Harutyunyan-founded Free Motherland (Azat Hayrenik) party maintained its dominant legislative position, winning 16 seats. The newly formed Miasnakan Hayrenik (United Motherland) party, led by opposition politician Samvel Babayan, won nine. The remaining seats went to three other parties—the Armenian Revolutionary Federation–Dashnaksutyun, which won three seats; Ardarutyun (Justice), which also won three; and Artsakhi Zhoghovrdarakan Kusaksutyun (Democratic Party of Artsakh), which won two; these were generally associated with politicians from past ruling coalitions.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 2 / 4

Amendments passed in 2014 led to some improvements to the electoral code. Among other changes, the number of parliamentary seats under the proportional system increased, and the vote threshold for representation decreased to 5 percent for political parties and 7 percent for electoral coalitions, allowing for broader political participation. Electoral-code changes adopted in July 2019 for the 2020 elections shifted the parliament to a fully proportional system, eliminating individual constituencies. No electoral-code changes have occurred since the 2020 cease-fire and shift in territorial control.

In contrast to past elections and the 2017 referendum, the 2020 presidential and parliamentary votes were not marred by significant criticism of electoral administration.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 7 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 3 / 4

There are few formal restrictions on political-party formation and membership, but the political landscape in past years has been constrained in practice. Given the territory's contested status, open dissent and vigorous competition have been regarded as signs of disloyalty or even as a security risk. This has been especially true after the 2020 conflict, which ended with a decline in Armenian military support.

Before the 2020 conflict, Nagorno-Karabakh had seen greater political activity since the 2018 revolution in Armenia. The 2020 electoral campaign featured open and vigorous competition between existing and newly formed political parties. Politicians freely discussed domestic issues, and some presented detailed plans to improve transparency, implement anticorruption reforms, and improve diversity in government. There were no reports of serious, undue pressure or attacks against candidates during the campaign. Local politicians remained vocal and united in their criticism of any attempt to propose unilateral concessions in peace talks with Azerbaijan and called for international recognition of the region's independence.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 2 / 4

During the past decade, the leading political parties have tended to form broad coalitions and co-opt potential rivals, precluding genuine opposition. However, the political opening in Armenia in 2018 brought considerable change to Nagorno-Karabakh's political environment, with a number of prominent politicians refraining from forming coalitions with the ruling elites ahead of the 2020 elections and instead campaigning independently.

The elections saw a record number of presidential candidates and political parties competing for power. Two leading presidential candidates stood in open opposition to the region's previous leadership. Five of the 14 presidential candidates ran as independents. Two new parties gained parliamentary representation, including Miasnakan Hayrenik, which polled second and won nine seats.

The 2019 local elections also featured strong performances by independent and opposition candidates. Many seats went to candidates with no party affiliation, who made up more than half of the registered contenders for local leadership posts.

The results of the 2020 conflict provoked widespread discontent among residents who blamed current and former leaders of Nagorno-Karabakh and Armenia. This prompted local opposition activists and groups to mobilize supporters to hold frequent protests. Some opposition politicians have joined the territorial government's cabinet to monitor assistance programs aimed at displaced residents.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 1 / 4

Politics in Nagorno-Karabakh are heavily influenced by the threat of military aggression, which has influenced the territory's political and financial dependence on Armenia. This dependence provided leverage for interference by Yerevan in Nagorno-Karabakh's domestic political affairs. Local elites also have political influence, including over the selection of senior leaders.

Relations with Yerevan have been significantly affected by the 2020 conflict and subsequent developments. After the close of hostilities, a number of Armenian and Nagorno-Karabakh officials complained about poor relations between Yerevan and Stepanakert, which they claimed was a key reason for the defeat in fighting with Azerbaijan. Soon after the cease-fire, President Harutyunyan returned several controversial politicians, who left due to conflicts with Armenian prime minister Nikol Pashinyan, to senior posts.

In contrast to past years, few senior Armenian officials have traveled to Nagorno-Karabakh during 2021, allegedly to avoid open attacks from local residents or possible problems with the Azerbaijani government. Yerevan has continued to provide subsidies and has financed programs that benefit Nagorno-Karabakh residents, however.

Following the 2020 conflict, Russian peacekeepers have played a significant security role in Nagorno-Karabakh. Russian peacekeepers maintain checkpoints throughout the region and are present at the Lachin transit corridor between Nagorno-Karabakh and Armenia; Russian peacekeepers also maintain close contact with Armenian and Azerbaijani military counterparts, escort residents, and mediate local disputes. In March 2021, Nagorno-Karabakh's National Assembly unanimously voted to make Russian an official language in the territory, citing a need to facilitate communication with peacekeepers and aid workers. Despite their growing influence in Nagorno-Karabakh, Russian peacekeepers have not interfered in local political life.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 1 / 4

Before the 2020 conflict, the population was almost entirely ethnic Armenian as a result of displacement during the war in the 1990s. In accordance with the November 9, 2020, cease-fire agreement, thousands of Armenians fled from territories assigned to Azerbaijan, not including residents from about one-third of Nagorno-Karabakh itself. Tens of thousands of those who fled Nagorno-Karabakh for Armenia have returned, though returnees who lived in areas under Azerbaijani control have been unable or unwilling to return.

Formally, women have equal political rights, but social constraints and a prevailing sense of militarization in local life limit their participation in practice, and they are poorly represented in leadership positions. While the 2014 electoral code required parties to ensure that women hold one in five of the places on their parliamentary lists, only five women won parliamentary seats in 2015. Before the 2020 elections, the gender quota was further increased to one in every four candidates on party lists, resulting in seven women taking seats in the new National Assembly. For the first time ever, the 2020 race included two female presidential candidates. Both received hundreds of votes. One of them, Bella Lalayan, campaigned for women's and social rights. In the 2019 local elections, women won about 11 percent of council seats and 2 percent of local leadership posts.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 3 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 1 / 4

The ability of locally elected officials to set and implement government policies is limited in practice by security threats along the line of contact between Nagorno-Karabakh and Azerbaijani forces, warnings from Baku, and the dominant role played by the Armenian government. The constitution calls for close cooperation with Armenia on political, economic, and military policy.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 1 / 4

Nagorno-Karabakh continues to suffer from significant corruption, particularly in the construction and infrastructure-development sectors. Officials practice favoritism in filling civil service positions.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 1 / 4

A freedom of information law was adopted in 2004, but the government operates with little transparency in practice. Key decisions are negotiated by political actors, with few meaningful opportunities for public input. After the 2020 elections, President Harutyunyan invited his main opponents to take key government positions, suggesting this could result in more transparency for decision-making processes. Harutyunyan made a similar offer after the 2020 conflict.

After the cease-fire agreement was reached, local leaders asked Armenia-based and diaspora organizations to limit discussion on projects within the territory to avoid criticism from Baku.

In April 2021, protesters called on the government to disclose the fate of state-backed loans given to affiliated businesspeople. In September, a court in Stepanakert instructed the government to disclose information on the loans, though the government apparently did not comply by year's end.

ADDITIONAL DISCRETIONARY POLITICAL RIGHTS QUESTION

Is the government or occupying power deliberately changing the ethnic composition of a country or territory so as to destroy a culture or tip the political balance in favor of another group? -1 / 0

The Azerbaijani military's 2020 operation, which was aimed at gaining control of Nagorno-Karabakh, ruptured a cease-fire that, while frequently violated, had mostly prevented large-scale violence since 1994. That Russian-brokered agreement had been reached after Armenian forces captured the territory and seven adjacent Azerbaijani districts, and ethnic Azerbaijani residents fled or were expelled from the affected region.

During the six weeks of fighting between September 17 and November 9, 2020, human rights groups as well as local and international journalists documented attacks or evidence of attacks against the ethnic Armenian civilian population, as well as atrocities against ethnic Armenian soldiers. Tens of thousands of ethnic Armenian civilians consequently fled Nagorno-Karabakh, with many saying they felt that their lives would be at risk if they stayed. Some 70,000 people who fled to Armenia had returned to Nagorno-Karabakh as of March 2021, though many returnees who previously lived in areas that came under Azerbaijani control during the conflict have been unable or unwilling to return to those locations.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 20 / 60 (+1)D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 7 / 16*D1. Are there free and independent media? 2 / 4

The most popular local television station is the government-run Artsakh TV. The station's editorial policy has changed significantly since the political opening in Armenia in 2018, and it has in recent years hosted a greater plurality of opinion, notably during the intense campaign period before the 2020 elections. Critics of the territory's leadership who were previously prevented from making even short appearances became regular guests on current-affairs programs. In addition, regular debates were organized to address prominent topics in local public life, including the first-ever debate of presidential candidates that March. Following the 2020 conflict, local media outlets continued to produce vibrant output, covering opposition rallies and government critics.

Social media platforms are increasingly used by the public and government officials for the dissemination and discussion of news. Young opposition leaders are well connected with independent media outlets in Armenia, which are able to convey their views to news consumers in Nagorno-Karabakh. In 2020, the Armenian media outlet CivilNet opened a permanent office in Stepanakert and hired local reporters to cover developments in Nagorno-Karabakh.

Nevertheless, many domestic journalists continue to practice self-censorship, primarily on subjects related to security and the peace process. The internet penetration rate is low and has been slow to increase. Mobile internet service remains unaffordable for most residents.

Foreign journalists saw their access to Nagorno-Karabakh restricted during 2021. In March, correspondents from the British Broadcasting Corporation (BBC) and US-based Vice News reported that they were denied permission to visit the territory. In April, Reporters Without Borders (RSF) noted that Russian peacekeepers prevented at least 10 foreign journalists from traveling into Nagorno-Karabakh via the Lachin corridor, calling on Moscow to ensure access.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 1 / 4

The constitution guarantees religious freedom but allows for restrictions in the name of security, public order, and other state interests. The charter also recognizes the Armenian Apostolic Church as the "national church" of the Armenian people. The religious freedom of other groups is limited in practice. A 2009 law banned religious activity by unregistered groups and proselytism by minority faiths and made it more difficult for minority groups to register.

The main mosque in the town known as Shushi to Armenians and Shusha to Azerbaijanis was restored and reopened in 2019. Services resumed when the Azerbaijani military took over the town during the 2020 conflict. During the conflict, the Azerbaijani army fully or partially destroyed a number of Armenian religious objects, notably Sourp Ghazanchetsots Cathedral and Kanach Zham, in the same town.

Russian peacekeepers took control of the Armenian monasteries of Amaras and Dadi-vank, which are near or within Azerbaijani-controlled territory as a result of the cease-fire agreement, and escorted groups of pilgrims to attend services at these cathedrals after the cease-fire. Azerbaijani authorities ordered Armenian Apostolic clergy to provide lists of pilgrims to Dadivank in February 2021. Azerbaijani forces prevented visits to Dadivank beginning in May.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 1 / 4

Schools and universities are subject to political influence and pressure to avoid dissenting views on sensitive topics, particularly those related to the territory's status and security. Educators engage in a degree of self-censorship on such issues.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 3 / 4

Private discussion is generally open and free, though expression of dissent may be inhibited somewhat by the prevailing nationalist sentiment in politics and society.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 6 / 12 (+1)

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 3 / 4 (+1)

While Nagorno-Karabakh authorities have disrupted rallies in the past, freedom of assembly has been recently respected. In 2020, Stepanakert saw major election-related rallies, including those calling for the vote to be postponed due to the COVID-19 pandemic and decrying alleged electoral irregularities. Those rallies were held without interruption from the authorities.

Since the 2020 conflict, Nagorno-Karabakh has seen regular protest activity. Since February 2021, a variety of groups organized marches; among other things, participants called for the resignation of President Harutyunyan, voiced dissatisfaction with the government in Yerevan, and called for more transparency in government-backed loans. Authorities made no attempts to disperse these protests.

Score Change: The score improved from 2 to 3 because public assemblies were generally able to proceed without disruption from authorities during the year.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 2 / 4

More than 250 NGOs are registered in Nagorno-Karabakh, but most are inactive. Many groups struggle to secure sustainable funding, in part because partnerships with foreign or international NGOs are complicated by Nagorno-Karabakh's disputed status. Civil society groups also face competition from government-organized entities.

The Armenian government funded the monitoring of Nagorno-Karabakh's 2020 elections by Transparency International's (TI) affiliate in Armenia and the Stepanakert office of the Yerevan-based Union of Informed Citizens. Shortly before the vote, the TI affiliate refused to send observers, citing the spread of COVID-19 in the region. Nevertheless, some of their local activists still participated in observation missions and in some cases continued cooperating with the NGOs after the elections.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 1 / 4

Trade unions are allowed to organize, but in practice they are weak and relatively inactive, with little practical ability to assert workers' interests. Many labor disputes are resolved through personal connections and family links before they reach local courts.

F. RULE OF LAW: 3 / 16F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 1 / 4

The judiciary is not independent in practice. The courts are influenced by the executive branch as well as by powerful political, economic, and criminal groups.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 1 / 4

The constitution guarantees basic due process rights, but police and the courts do not always uphold them in practice. Outspoken political dissidents have been subject to harassment by the authorities.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 0 / 4

The civilian population of Nagorno-Karabakh was subjected to indiscriminate violence and targeted atrocities by Azerbaijani forces during the 2020 conflict. Abuses included the use of cluster munitions, white phosphorous bombs, and other heavy weapons in attacks that failed to distinguish between military and civilian targets, including against residential areas in the main towns and villages. Rights groups and journalists reported instances of civilians facing physical attack, detention, torture, and degrading treatment by Azerbaijani forces; the British Guardian newspaper reported on the beheading of two noncombatants by Azerbaijani forces, videos of which had been shared on social media. Attacks on dual-use infrastructure, such as telecommunications and electricity facilities, damaged civilian sites such as churches, schools, and private businesses. Nagorno-Karabakh's human rights ombudsman reported that 52 ethnic Armenian civilians were killed by Azerbaijani attacks on the territory. In accordance with the November 9, 2020, cease-fire statement, Azerbaijan gained control over seven adjacent territories and parts of Nagorno-Karabakh itself, with the new line of contact running near or within civilian-populated areas.

Local officials and international human rights groups documented beheadings of Armenian soldiers, mutilation of their corpses, and torture of prisoners of war (POWs) by Azerbaijani soldiers, with footage of many such instances shared widely on social media. Footage also circulated of Azerbaijani soldiers desecrating graveyards. Over 100 Armenian POWs and detained civilians were released by Azerbaijani authorities during 2021, though the Armenian ombudsman reported that at least 41 POWs and 4 civilians remained in custody in September.

Amnesty International reported instances where ethnic Armenian forces committed abuses against their counterparts during the conflict, including several instances of corpse mutilation and the death of a POW. In June 2021, the International Partnership for Human Rights reported on the existence of videos that apparently depict the extrajudicial killings of Azerbaijani soldiers by Armenian or Nagorno-Karabakh fighters.

Violence and insecurity continued to affect life in Nagorno-Karabakh since the cease-fire took effect. In August, the Azerbaijani prosecutor general reported that 23 Azerbaijani civilians were killed and another 36 were injured by mines in areas that were previously under Armenian control. In October, Russian peacekeepers reported that a farmer was killed by gunfire originating from Azerbaijani-controlled land.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 1 / 4

The constitution bans discrimination based on gender, ethnicity, religion, and other categories. However, women are underrepresented in the public and private sectors and remain exposed to discrimination in practice. Before the 2020 conflict, to preserve the Armenian character of the territory, state policies promoted Armenian language and culture and had encouraged ethnic Armenians to migrate to Nagorno-Karabakh, partly through housing and other subsidies. However, this practice has been halted due to the increased demand for housing, prompted by the displacement of residents from Azerbaijani-controlled areas.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 4 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 0 / 4

Freedom of movement within Nagorno-Karabakh is hindered by its ambiguous legal and diplomatic status, the instability of the cease-fire, and the presence of land mines, which continue to cause deaths and injuries.

During the 2020 conflict, half to over 70 percent of the population of Nagorno-Karabakh fled the conflict zone. Some 70,000 of those who fled for Armenia in 2020 returned by March 2021, though many returnees remain internally displaced within Nagorno-Karabakh.

Individuals who do not hold Armenian citizenship require a visa from the Nagorno-Karabakh government as of February 2021. Russian peacekeepers are able to review visa applications.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 1 / 4

Most major economic activity is tightly controlled by the government or a small group of powerful elites with political connections. The property rights of Azerbaijanis displaced in the 1990s and Armenians after the 2020 conflict have yet to be adequately addressed.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 2 / 4

Men and women have equal legal rights with respect to marriage and divorce, though the constitution defines marriage as a union between a man and a woman, precluding same-sex marriage. The government offers material incentives to encourage couples to have children. Domestic violence is common and not effectively prosecuted.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 1 / 4

Employment opportunities remain scarce and are mostly confined to the state sector or state-subsidized businesses.

Note: Freedom in the World reports assess the level of political rights and civil liberties in a given geographical area, regardless of whether they are affected by the state, nonstate actors, or foreign powers. Disputed territories are sometimes assessed separately if they meet certain criteria, including boundaries that are sufficiently stable to allow year-on-year comparisons. For more information, see the report methodology and FAQ.

Overview: The Turkish Republic of Northern Cyprus (TRNC) is a self-declared state recognized only by Turkey. Civil liberties are generally upheld, and the multiparty political system is largely democratic, though it has experienced growing interference from the Turkish government. Other ongoing concerns include corruption, discrimination against minority communities, and human trafficking.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- The internal checkpoints between the island's north and south reopened in June, after several months of strict limitations prompted by the COVID-19 pandemic.
- In May, the government announced an investigation in response to press reports alleging that TRNC citizenships were being granted through bribery or for political reasons in advance of parliamentary elections.
- After a series of parliamentary boycotts and coalition difficulties that deprived the government of a working majority, Prime Minister Ersan Saner of the right-wing nationalist National Unity Party (UBP) resigned in October. He was replaced in November by newly selected UBP leader Faiz Sucuoğlu, who formed an interim minority government, and elections were formally scheduled for January 2022.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 27 / 40 (-1)A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 9 / 12*A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 2 / 4

The president, who serves as head of state and represents the TRNC internationally, is popularly elected to five-year terms. In the 2020 presidential election, incumbent Mustafa Akıncı ran as an independent with the backing of the social democratic Communal Democracy Party (TDP). He was defeated by then prime minister Ersin Tatar of the UBP, the Turkish government's preferred candidate, who took nearly 52 percent of the vote in the second round.

The election period featured highly unusual and overt interference by Turkish authorities on Tatar's behalf; during his term as president, Akıncı had repeatedly criticized the Turkish government, including for meddling in TRNC politics. Among other actions by Turkish representatives, the communications adviser for the Turkish vice president arrived to aid Tatar's campaign, and the Turkish embassy allegedly contacted mayors and village leaders to ask them what they needed in exchange for their support. Reports later emerged that Turkish government and intelligence officials had threatened Tatar's opponents, including Akıncı, as well as Turkish Cypriot businesses with interests in Turkey. In the week before the second-round vote, the UBP distributed favors in villages, while Tatar's government disbursed financial aid, ostensibly to compensate for losses during the COVID-19 lockdown.

The president appoints the prime minister and cabinet members, who must have the support of a legislative majority. After winning election as president, Tatar resigned as prime minister and head of the UBP. Ersan Saner became the new UBP leader and eventually formed a ruling coalition with the center-right Democratic Party (DP) and the Rebirth Party (YDP), a right-wing group backed primarily by settlers from Turkey. However, the coalition struggled to achieve a quorum amid parliamentary boycotts by opposition parties, and it lost its slim majority in July 2021, when a leader of YDP announced his resignation and his intention to form a new party. Finally, in October 2021, the prime minister resigned. Faiz Sucuoğlu was chosen as the new UBP leader that month, and in early November President Tatar gave him the mandate to form an interim government that would serve until parliamentary elections could be held. The early elections were then scheduled for January 2022.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

For elections to the 50-seat Assembly of the Republic, the TRNC employs a mixed voting system, with the proportional representation component setting a 5 percent vote threshold for parties to win seats. Members serve five-year terms. In the 2018 elections, which were generally regarded as open and competitive, the UBP led with 21 seats, followed by the center-left Republican Turkish Party (CTP) with 12 seats, the People's Party (HP) with 9, the TDP and DP with 3 each, and the YDP with 2.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 3 / 4

The Supreme Election Committee is an independent body composed of judges, and elections in the TRNC have generally been considered free and fair, though the degree of Turkish government interference in the 2020 presidential vote called this into question.

A complex new election law that came into effect in 2018 allowed voters to choose a single party, individual candidates from multiple parties, or a combination of the two; voters were also able to choose candidates across more than one multimember constituency. The law made it more complicated to vote for individual candidates and therefore encouraged party voting.

During the 2020 presidential election, several hundred citizens were prohibited from voting because they were under quarantine in connection with the COVID-19 pandemic.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 12 / 16B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 4 / 4

Turkish Cypriots are free to organize in political parties, and several parties compete in practice. Six parties were represented in the legislature as of 2021, including two—HP and YDP—that entered the chamber for the first time after the 2018 elections. Under a 2015 law, parties that receive at least 3 percent of the vote may obtain state funding.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 4 / 4

There have been multiple transfers of power between rival parties over the past two decades, with shifts in both the presidency and the premiership. Akıncı ousted the incumbent president in the 2015 election, only to lose office himself in the 2020 balloting. A series of different governing coalitions have controlled the cabinet since the 2018 legislative elections, and opposition parties retained a strong position in the assembly as of 2021.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 2 / 4

Although the Turkish government has always exercised considerable influence over the TRNC, in the past it had little direct control over voters, many of whom have supported candidates and parties that displayed independence from Ankara. In the 2020 presidential election, however, the Turkish government engaged in an explicit campaign of inducements and threats against Akıncı and in support of his main rival, Tatar. Support for Tatar's UBP had already been strong in rural areas, particularly among those who viewed the party's patronage network as a way to access jobs and favors. That network, in turn, depended in part on a steady flow of economic support from Turkey, and Ankara's open opposition to Akıncı raised the prospect that such support could be cut off if he won reelection.

The Turkish government's interference in the process reportedly continued when, following Tatar's election as president in October 2020, the UBP began an intraparty contest to decide on a new party leader and prime minister. Pressure from Turkish government representatives allegedly resulted in the withdrawal of the two leading candidates and an interim selection, Saner, who was supported by Ankara. After Saner's premiership ended with his resignation in October 2021, Sucuoğlu—who had been the favorite to win the original contest in 2020—was elected party leader and became interim prime minister in November.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 2 / 4

All adult citizens may vote, but the rights of minority populations remain a concern. The few hundred Maronite and Greek Cypriots living in the TRNC are issued special identity cards and are unable to vote in TRNC elections. While small numbers of Maronites from the south have been allowed to resettle in their ancestral villages in the north since 2017, there has been no significant progress on expanding Maronite political rights.

Women have full political rights, and a 2015 law requires 30 percent of a party's parliamentary candidate list to consist of women. However, women's political participation is limited in practice, particularly in leadership positions. In the 2018 elections, women won nine seats out of 50, an improvement from four in the previous legislature. No female candidates ran in the 2020 presidential race.

There have been recurring questions about the number of naturalized TNRC citizens originally from Turkey, their voting habits, and the manner in which they acquired citizenship. Immediately after the Turkish invasion and Cyprus's division in 1974, an agreement between the Northern Cyprus administration and the Turkish government brought around 25,000 Turkish farmers and workers to the island and gave them citizenship rights. This group primarily comprised people who had been displaced by development projects in Turkey and came from many ethnic backgrounds and political persuasions. After 1979, this facilitated migration ended, and Turkish civilians arriving in Northern Cyprus since then have come on their own initiative. Naturalized citizens account for about a third of the citizen population, according to some estimates. Their voting patterns remain pluralistic, with most endorsing conservative parties but many also supporting the CTP.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 6 / 12 (-1)

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 2 / 4 (-1)

While elected officials have generally developed and implemented policies and legislation without direct interference from Ankara, the TRNC remains diplomatically, militarily, and financially dependent on Turkey, and this dependence sometimes allows the Turkish government to influence policymaking.

President Akıncı showed considerable independence from the Turkish government, creating a rift with Turkish president Recep Tayyip Erdoğan that resulted in overt Turkish intervention in the 2020 presidential election. Under President Tatar and the right-wing coalition that formed after his victory, the government was marked by a greater public deference to Ankara on policy and personnel matters, and by significant instability, including repeated struggles to achieve a parliamentary quorum amid boycotts by opposition lawmakers. Among other signs of Turkish interference during 2021, the government agreed in July to remove the territory's mufti—a civil servant in the TRNC—and replace him with a theologian from Turkey. The government also faced allegations that it was naturalizing citizens in large numbers for political reasons under pressure from Ankara. Meanwhile, the denial of quorum disrupted work on key legislation, including the annual budget bill.

Score Change: The score declined from 3 to 2 because the government demonstrated greater deference to Ankara on domestic policy and struggled to function in the face of opposition boycotts that deprived the parliament of a quorum.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 2 / 4

Corruption, cronyism in the distribution of civil service jobs, and nepotism are serious impediments to good governance, and the media have exposed a number of scandals in recent years. Surveys of businesspeople in Northern Cyprus have shown that large majorities consider corruption and bribery to be significant problems, including in the public sector and government services. In May 2021, the government announced an investigation in response to media reports that raised concerns about bribery in the granting of TRNC citizenship.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 2 / 4

Although there is a law providing for access to information, there has been very little progress in making government records available to the public in practice. Information is not always kept in an accessible form, and officials reportedly withhold data on sensitive topics such as the naturalization of Turkish nationals as TRNC citizens.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 50 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 15 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 4 / 4

Freedom of the press is guaranteed by law, and TRNC authorities generally respect it in practice. The media often carry sharp criticism of both the TRNC and Turkish governments. However, a new information technology law enacted in 2020 enables the authorities to shut down websites that carry illegal content, including material that is deemed to violate existing laws on libel and insult. Consolidation of private media ownership is also a concern. Some journalists have reported threats and harassment in response to their work, including those who examine suspected ties between state authorities and organized crime.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 3 / 4

The TRNC is a secular state and legally guarantees freedom of worship, which is mostly respected in practice. However, authorities continue to impose restrictions on access to churches and otherwise interfere with church services. Christians and non-Sunni Muslims have complained that the government favors Sunni Islam in its policies on religious education and places of worship. The government's Religious Affairs Department staffs Sunni mosques with imams.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

Academic freedom is generally respected. While large numbers of teachers and professors have been fired or jailed for political reasons in Turkey since 2016, no similar purges had occurred in the TRNC as of 2021.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 4 / 4

There are no significant restrictions on freedom of private discussion in Northern Cyprus, and individuals generally do not face repercussions for expressing their political views on social media. While the 2020 information technology law included provisions that could restrict online speech, no major enforcement actions have been reported.

However, in a development that could affect personal expression in the territory, at least three TRNC citizens who intended to enter Turkey were detained at Turkish airports during 2021 and deported because of their political opinions on issues like Cypriot reunification. Among these were the head of the local Press Workers' Union and the press officer for former president Akıncı. Despite repeated inquiries, neither Ankara nor the TRNC government would release a list of people who may be subject to such entry restrictions.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 11 / 12E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

Freedom of assembly is guaranteed by the constitution and generally upheld in practice. The health threat posed by COVID-19 has resulted in some limitations on public gatherings since 2020, though the restrictions were not considered to be abusive or disproportionate.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 4 / 4

Numerous nongovernmental organizations are registered in the TRNC, and they typically operate without restrictions. Many such groups have worked with Greek Cypriot partners to advance reunification efforts.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 3 / 4

Workers may form independent unions, bargain collectively, and strike. Collective bargaining is reportedly common in the public sector. However, the government can limit strikes in ill-defined essential services, and employers are reportedly able to obstruct unionization in the private sector without legal repercussions.

F. RULE OF LAW: 13 / 16F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 4 / 4

The judiciary is independent, and courts have often ruled against the government in recent years. The system is overseen by the Supreme Council of Judicature, which is headed by the president of the Supreme Court and includes that court's seven judges as well as one member each appointed by the president, the legislature, the attorney general, and the bar association. The council is responsible for judicial appointments, promotions, assignments, and disciplinary measures.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 3 / 4

Although due process rights are typically respected, police have been accused of violating protections against arbitrary detention and coerced confessions in some cases, for example by improperly denying suspects access to a lawyer.

There had been no large-scale purges of TRNC security forces or other public employees in connection with the 2016 coup attempt in Turkey as of 2021, but due process has been a concern in the clusters of cases that have emerged. Investigations and dismissals of police officers have been reported, for example, with those fired accused of ties to the movement of US-based Islamic preacher Fethullah Gülen, which is blamed for the coup attempt and considered a terrorist organization in Turkey. Some Turkish military personnel stationed in Northern Cyprus have been arrested on similar allegations.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 3 / 4

The population is generally free from threats to physical security, but police have been accused of abusing detainees, and prisons feature overcrowding and other harsh conditions.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 3 / 4

Women enjoy legal equality, but in practice they encounter some discrimination in employment, education, and other areas.

The tiny Greek and Maronite minority communities live in enclaves and suffer from social and economic disadvantages. The small Kurdish population is reportedly subject to discrimination in employment. Both groups have complained of surveillance by TRNC authorities.

LGBT+ people reportedly face social stigmatization, though same-sex sexual activity was decriminalized in 2014, and discrimination based on sexual orientation or gender identity is prohibited by law.

The TRNC lacks legal protections for asylum seekers, raising concerns about possible refoulement. Some Turkish nationals suspected of belonging to the Gülen movement have been deported to Turkey, where they face persecution.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 11 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 3 / 4

Movement within the TRNC territory is generally unrestricted. However, travel abroad is complicated by the TRNC's lack of international recognition. The only direct flights from the TRNC are to Turkey. Most governments do not accept TRNC travel documents, so many Turkish Cypriots carry Republic of Cyprus passports, for which they are eligible. Movement across the UN buffer zone dividing the island has improved since 2004 due to the opening of new border crossings. Checkpoints at the crossings were reopened in June 2021 after several months of closures due to the COVID-19 pandemic.

A number of former civilian municipalities have been under Turkish military control since 1974, with bans on settlement or resettlement. In 2020, with Ankara's support, the government partially opened the closed town of Varosha (Maraş), which had once been a popular tourist destination. The move drew objections from Varosha's former Greek Cypriot residents and the UN Security Council, which had long warned against any unilateral change in the town's status or settlement by people other than its previous inhabitants. After President Tatar announced plans to move forward with a second phase of the reopening in July 2021, the Republic of Cyprus government said it would revoke the passports of TRNC officials involved in the process.

During 2020, the government installed hundreds of surveillance cameras in an integrated system across the territory. Similar systems have been deployed in Turkey to monitor the population, particularly in cities. In Northern Cyprus, the cameras were installed even in small villages, and it was not clear how the information collected would be used. They were expected to be operated by police, but the chain of command for the Turkish Cypriot police is tied to the Turkish military.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 3 / 4

The authorities recognize the rights to own property and establish businesses. In practice these rights are somewhat limited, as authorities have in various ways attempted to prevent the sale of historically Turkish Cypriot properties to foreigners. The TRNC formed the Immovable Property Commission (IPC) in 2006 to resolve claims by Greek Cypriots who owned property in the north before the island's 1974 division. In 2010, the European Court of Human Rights recognized the commission as an "accessible and effective" mechanism. However, its work has been seriously impaired in recent years by a lack of funding from the government and Ankara.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 3 / 4

Personal social freedoms are generally respected, though women's organizations have criticized the government for failing to adequately address the problems of rape and domestic violence. According to multiple surveys in recent years, about one in three women have experienced such violence. However, figures released in late 2019 suggested that reporting of abuse was increasing significantly, with police in 2018 receiving 1,047 reports—four times the average from previous years.

While TRNC citizens generally have access to economic opportunity and protections from abusive working conditions, noncitizens often experience exploitation and lack mechanisms for appeal. During the early phases of the COVID-19 pandemic in 2020, many temporary workers from Turkey were returned to that country without pay. The pandemic has led to hardships for many local workers as well, though civil servants received their pay without interruption even during lockdowns.

Human trafficking and forced prostitution are serious problems, despite a nominal legal ban on prostitution. Foreign women employed in the territory's nightclub sector are particularly exposed to exploitative conditions. The TRNC formally criminalized trafficking for the first time in 2020, but it does not fund enforcement efforts or provide protection or services to victims. Observers also report that some authorities are complicit in trafficking.

Pakistani Kashmir

Freedom Status: Not Free

Note: Freedom in the World reports assess the level of political rights and civil liberties in a given geographical area, regardless of whether they are affected by the state, nonstate actors, or foreign powers. Disputed territories are sometimes assessed separately if they meet certain criteria, including boundaries that are sufficiently stable to allow year-on-year comparisons. For more information, see the report methodology and FAQ.

Overview: Pakistani Kashmir is administered as two territories: Azad Jammu and Kashmir (AJK) and Gilgit-Baltistan (GB). Each has an elected assembly and government with limited autonomy, but they lack the parliamentary representation and other rights of Pakistani provinces, and Pakistani federal institutions have predominant influence over security, the courts, and most important policy matters. Politics within the two territories are carefully managed to promote the idea of Kashmir's eventual accession to Pakistan. Freedoms of expression and association, and any political activity deemed contrary to Pakistan's policy on Kashmir, are restricted.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- In February, the Pakistani and Indian armies agreed to restore the 2003 cease-fire across the Line of Control (LoC). This agreement came after five years of sporadic fighting that caused civilian casualties and local displacement in AJK; the renewal of the cease-fire allowed for significant normalization of civilian life in the areas adjoining the LoC.
- Legislative elections were held in AJK in July. Pakistan's ruling party, the Pakistan Tehreek-e-Insaf (PTI) took 32 of 53 seats; the new legislature elected PTI representatives Abdul Qayyum Niazi and Barrister Sultan Mahmood as prime minister and president, respectively.
- GB's constitutional status remained unchanged but maneuvering to give it provisional status as a Pakistani province continued. The Pakistan Law Ministry drafted a constitutional amendment to prepare for potential future change to GB's status.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 9 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 4 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 1 / 4

Both AJK and GB have locally elected executive leaders. However, the Pakistani government also controls—directly and indirectly—key executive functions, and it is not accountable to voters in the two territories.

Under AJK's 1974 interim constitution, a president elected by the Legislative Assembly serves as head of state, while the elected prime minister is the chief executive. After the July 2021 election, which saw the PTI win a majority in the assembly, PTI representative Abdul Qayyum Niazi was elected as prime minister; he had been nominated to the position by the Pakistani Prime Minister and overall PTI head Imran Khan. Barrister Sultan Mahmood, a veteran politician and AJK head of the PTI, was elected to the presidency.

An AJK Council based in Pakistan's capital, Islamabad, comprises both Kashmiri and Pakistani officials and is chaired by the Pakistani prime minister. The council holds a number of executive, legislative, and judicial powers, such as control over the appointment of superior judges and the chief election commissioner.

Under the Government of Gilgit-Baltistan Order 2018—adopted by the Pakistani government to replace GB's previous basic law, the 2009 Gilgit-Baltistan Empowerment and Self-Governance Order (GBESGO)—executive functions are shared between a Pakistani-appointed governor and a chief minister chosen by the GB Assembly (GBA). The governor signs legislation and has significant power over judicial appointments; the governor's decisions cannot be overruled by the GBA. The order also grants extensive authority to the Pakistani prime minister, including exclusive executive and legislative powers on a long list of topics.

Khalid Khurshid Khan of the PTI was elected as GB chief minister in December 2020 after assembly elections returned a PTI majority. In 2018, the Pakistani Prime Minister appointed Raja Jalal Hussein Maqpoon, then PTI party chief in GB, as governor of the territory.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 2 / 4

The AJK Legislative Assembly has 53 seats, including 45 directly elected general seats, 5 seats reserved for women, and 3 seats reserved for clerics, technocrats, and overseas Kashmiris; 12 of the general seats are elected by Kashmiri migrants resident in mainland Pakistan. Assembly elections were held in AJK in July 2021, with a 62 percent turnout. Most seats were filled by representatives of Pakistan's main national political parties, though the AJK-based Muslim Conference and Jammu Kashmir People's Party (JKPP) each took one seat. Pakistani Prime Minister Imran Khan's PTI won a majority in the Assembly, with 26 elected seats, while the Pakistan People's Party (PPP) won 11 seats and the Pakistan Muslim League–Nawaz (PML-N) filled 6. After the allocation of reserved seats, PTI obtained 32 out of 53 seats in the Assembly. This followed the well-established pattern for AJK and GB, whereby the party in power at the federal level in Pakistan tends to win elections in Pakistani Kashmir.

Isolated incidents of voting interference were reported following the 2021 elections, and three campaign workers were killed in election violence. The PML-N made allegations of poll rigging, but did not mount a sustained challenge to the election result.

The 33-member GBA is composed of 24 directly elected members, six seats reserved for women, and three seats reserved for technocrats. The GBA's legislative authority is limited to certain subjects, and even discussion of some topics—foreign affairs, defense, internal security, and judicial conduct—is prohibited by the Government of Gilgit-Baltistan Order 2018. However, the order does allow the GBA to exercise legislative powers that were previously allocated to the Gilgit-Baltistan Council (GBC). The council, which now has an advisory role, is headed by the Pakistani prime minister and vice-chaired by the GB governor and includes six members chosen by the GBA and six Pakistani ministers or Parliament members chosen by the Pakistani prime minister. The GB chief minister also has a seat.

Elections to the GB Assembly were held in November 2020. The PTI emerged as the largest party, with 10 of the 24 directly elected seats. Several independents then opted to join the PTI, and after the reserved seats were filled through proportional representation, the party controlled 22 out of 33 seats. All the main Pakistani parties campaigned extensively in GB. The PPP and PML-N—which took five and three seats, respectively—both initially complained of election rigging and refused to accept the results, but they eventually took up their seats in the new assembly. Smaller parties secured the remaining three seats.

Neither AJK nor GB is represented in the Pakistani Parliament.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 1 / 4

The electoral framework in both territories facilitates indirect control by the Pakistani authorities. For example, the AJK Council appoints the chief election commissioner, and the electoral system for the AJK Legislative Assembly disproportionately favors nonresident refugees over AJK residents. The nonresident elections are more vulnerable to manipulation by federal Pakistani authorities, and the party in office at the federal level tends to win these seats. Candidates in the AJK elections must formally endorse “the ideology of Pakistan” and Kashmir's accession to Pakistan.

The election code of conduct for GB requires parties and candidates to refrain from any action or speech that could be deemed prejudicial to the “ideology of Pakistan” or the country's security. Like the similar rule in AJK, this vague provision can be used to exclude candidates associated with nationalist parties or those disapproved of by the Pakistani authorities.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 4 / 16B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 1 / 4

Politics in both AJK and GB are dominated by local branches of the main Pakistani parties and some local parties, such as AJK's Muslim Conference, that are closely allied with the Pakistani establishment. Small nationalist parties that are opposed to union with Pakistan are actively marginalized or barred outright from the political process, and they played no significant role in the 2020 GB elections, though one nationalist retained a seat. Activists accused of opposition to Pakistani rule have been subject to surveillance, harassment, and sometimes imprisonment. The interim constitution of AJK bans political parties that do not endorse the territory's eventual accession to Pakistan, and similar rules prevail in GB.

In December 2021, AJK authorities banned human rights activist Manzoor Pashteen, the leader of the Pashtun Tahafuz Movement (PTM), from entering the territory. The PTM, a social movement supporting Pashtun human rights, has been openly critical of the Pakistani state; AJK's ban reflects the position of Pakistani security agencies, which view PTM as operating with an anti-Pakistan agenda.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 1 / 4

There is ample precedent for transfers of power between the major parties, though these are typically dictated by parallel changes at the federal level in Pakistan.

Prior to the 2021 elections in AJK, the PML-N was the incumbent party in the region, while the PTI was the incumbent party in Pakistan. Both parties sought to leverage incumbency advantages in the 2021 elections, which were ultimately won by the PTI.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 1 / 4

Because voters in GB and AJK cannot participate in Pakistani elections, Pakistani federal officials and entities are not democratically accountable to them. Security agencies operating in both territories are federal institutions. They work to block and suppress any parties or politicians that adopt positions deemed to conflict with Pakistani interests.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 1 / 4

Men and women have the right to vote in both territories. Although there is no bar on women contesting general seats, women rarely exercise this right in practice. Instead, general seats tend to be filled by men. The seats reserved for women are filled proportionally from party lists based on the general vote, meaning the parties themselves determine who will represent women's interests. In the 2020 GB elections, only four women stood for general seats.

Shiite Muslims, Sunni Muslims, and members of the Ismaili offshoot of Shia Islam are represented in the GBA, having won directly elected seats. The heterodox Ahmadi sect, which suffers systematic discrimination in Pakistan, is poorly represented in GB's political system, as is the Christian minority.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 3 / 12C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 1 / 4

The powers of the elected chief executives in AJK and GB are limited by the fact that the Pakistani prime minister, the Pakistani minister for Kashmir Affairs and Gilgit-Baltistan, and through them the federal civil service, exercise effective control over government operations in both territories. As in Pakistan, federal military and intelligence agencies also play a powerful role in governance and policymaking.

The territories lack any meaningful fiscal autonomy, as federal taxes are imposed on both, and they receive a share of the resulting funds from the federal government. The territories' local representatives are excluded from the Pakistani bodies that negotiate inter-provincial resource allocation.

There has been a sustained debate on the idea of enhancing GB's status in the Pakistani constitution by designating it as a provisional province, granting its legislators powers on par with those delegated to Pakistan's four existing provinces, and giving GB representation in the federal Parliament. Despite significant opposition to a change in GB's status in both AJK and the Pakistani establishment, in 2019 the Pakistani Supreme Court instructed the Pakistani government to fully address GB's constitutional status. In August 2021, it was reported that Pakistan's Law Ministry had drafted a constitutional amendment that would allow residents of GB to elect members to Pakistan's National Assembly and extend the remit of Pakistan's Supreme Court and other federal institutions to the territory.

The debate continued in 2021, and in March, the GBA passed a resolution demanding that Pakistan grant GB provisional provincial status. However, decision-making authority regarding a new status remained concentrated in Islamabad rather than GB itself.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 1 / 4

Both territories have formal safeguards against official corruption, and GB is within the jurisdiction of Pakistan's National Accountability Bureau, which has a field office in Gilgit. However, as in Pakistan, corruption is believed to remain endemic, with enforcement actions subject to political influence.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 1 / 4

Transparency and access to government information are limited in practice. The AJK and GB governments have made gestures toward transparency by posting basic information about their operations online, but such disclosures remain infrequent and inadequate.

ADDITIONAL DISCRETIONARY POLITICAL RIGHTS QUESTION

Is the government or occupying power deliberately changing the ethnic composition of a country or territory so as to destroy a culture or tip the political balance in favor of another group? -2 / 0

The Sunni Muslim share of the population in GB—historically a Shiite-majority region—has increased significantly in the decades since a pre-1947 rule was abolished to allow immigration from different parts of Pakistan. State agencies are suspected of deliberately encouraging this migration to engineer a demographic change. Under the 2009 GBESGO, settlers were given formal citizenship rights in GB; critics of a clause in the Government of Gilgit-Baltistan Order 2018 have argued that it appears to extend GB citizenship rights to all Pakistani citizens, further encouraging settlement. The pre-1947 restrictions on acquiring residency and citizenship are still in place in AJK and have assumed greater significance since the Indian authorities eased similar restrictions in Indian-administered Jammu and Kashmir in early 2020.

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 6 / 16D1. Are there free and independent media? 1 / 4

AJK and GB are subject to laws that curb freedom of expression, particularly regarding reporting or commentary on the political status of the territories. Media houses need permission from the AJK Council and the federal Ministry of Kashmir Affairs and Gilgit-Baltistan to operate. A wide range of outlets are present and active. However, coverage of news and politics does not diverge from official Pakistani narratives, including the notions that India's hold over the Kashmir Valley is illegitimate and all Kashmiris seek accession to Pakistan. This compliance is achieved through a mixture of censorship, self-censorship, and harassment. A number of outlets have faced closure by authorities in recent years.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 1 / 4

Both territories have a predominantly Muslim population, and there is no official or social tolerance of nonbelief. Tools used to compel expressions of belief and conformity with official interpretations of religious doctrine include laws criminalizing blasphemy, rules requiring observance of Ramadan, and an obligation to denounce the heterodox Ahmadi sect to obtain a Pakistani passport. Although there is a history of Sunni-Shiite sectarian violence in GB, no major incidents have been reported in recent years.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 2 / 4

Each territory is home to a growing education system, and education is much valued as a path to migration and employment. However, in academia there are acute sensitivities around the issue of constitutional status, and debate or materials questioning Pakistan's claims over Kashmir are not tolerated. Student union activity has long been subject to state monitoring for signs of nationalist political views. Local languages and scripts are not taught in government schools. There is a history of attacks on schools in the Darel Valley by Islamist militants who oppose secular and girls' education.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 2 / 4

Federal intelligence agencies maintain a prominent and intrusive presence in both territories. Discussion of heterodox political or religious views consequently carries significant risks. The authorities have increased their monitoring of social media and sporadically punish expression of anti-Pakistan or separatist opinions.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 4 / 12E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 1 / 4

The authorities' observance of freedom of assembly is highly discretionary. The Pakistani state traditionally uses AJK as a platform to protest against Indian control of Jammu and Kashmir and the treatment of the population on the Indian side of the LoC. Protests that do not directly challenge Pakistani control or the territories' constitutional status are more likely to be tolerated. The authorities rely on harassment, intimidation, and the use of security checkpoints to deter protests in opposition to government policies.

In 2021, police were deployed to disperse both spontaneous and organized protests in AJK and GB, including an AJK teachers' demonstration in Muzaffarabad and a protest demanding justice after a mass shooting in GB.

The main political parties were all able to campaign and hold large public meetings ahead of the 2021 AJK elections.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights– and governance-related work? 1 / 4

Humanitarian nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) are subject to strict registration requirements and thus operate at the pleasure of the authorities. NGOs working on political or human rights issues face more intrusive government scrutiny and, in some cases, harassment.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 1 / 4

AJK is subject to labor laws similar to those in Pakistan. However, unions and professional organizations are frequently barred. Labor laws and union activities are poorly developed in GB.

F. RULE OF LAW: 4 / 16 (+1)

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 1 / 4

Both territories have nominally independent judiciaries, but the Pakistani federal government plays a powerful role in judicial appointments. On politically sensitive issues, the AJK and GB courts are not considered to operate with independence from the executive in Pakistan.

The president of AJK, in consultation with the AJK Council, appoints the chief justice of the territory's Supreme Court. Other judges of the superior courts are appointed by the AJK president on the advice of the council, after consultation with the chief justice. The chief judge and other judges of GB's Supreme Appellate Court are appointed for three-year terms by the prime minister of Pakistan on the recommendation of the governor. In its 2019 ruling on GB's 2018 governance order, the Pakistan Supreme Court essentially extended its jurisdiction to GB residents and courts, adding to the legal ambiguity surrounding the territory's constitutional status.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 1 / 4

The civilian court systems in both territories feature basic due process guarantees, including defense lawyers and a right to appeal, but arbitrary arrests and other violations are not uncommon, particularly in security-related cases. Pakistan's Anti-Terrorism Act (ATA), which is often used to suppress dissent, includes vaguely defined offenses, allows extended detention without trial, and applies to juveniles, among other problematic features.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 2 / 4 (+1)

Torture and deaths in custody at the hands of security forces have been reported, especially for independence supporters and other activists. Separately, armed extremist groups devoted largely to attacks on Indian-administered Jammu and Kashmir operate from AJK and GB and have links with similar factions based in Pakistan and Afghanistan.

A 2003 cease-fire agreement between the Indian and Pakistani armies was intended to protect AJK from attacks across the LoC. However, sporadic skirmishing continued, and during 2020, the two armies engaged in near-constant exchanges of fire after a 2019 suicide attack on the Indian side set off a period of intensified hostilities. Although some of the firing struck military targets, it was often directed at civilians; in 2020, Pakistan reported over 3,000 Indian violations of the cease-fire, which allegedly killed 28 civilians and injured more than 249 others.

The Indian and Pakistani armies renewed the cease-fire in February 2021, following extensive dialogue between the countries' national intelligence agencies. Though some risk of physical violence along the LoC remains, the restored ceasefire held throughout the year, resulting in a significant improvement to civilian life in the area.

Score Change: The score improved from 1 to 2 because the restoration of the 2003 cease-fire across the Line of Control in February led to an end to firing and improved the living conditions of civilians.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 0 / 4

As in Pakistan, women in the territories face economic discrimination, disadvantages under personal status laws, and abusive customary practices, the perpetrators of which often enjoy impunity. LGBT+ people, members of ethnic minorities, and non-Sunni religious groups also suffer from discrimination, and Afghan refugees have encountered increased harassment and pressure to return to Afghanistan since 2015. Pakistani authorities have been reluctant to offer citizenship to migrants displaced from Indian-administered Jammu and Kashmir. These refugees have periodically been subjected to abuse and arbitrary arrest for demanding greater rights.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 6 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 2 / 4

The people of AJK and GB have Pakistani national identity cards and passports. They are internationally recognized as Pakistani nationals. However, there are reports of passports or passport renewals being denied for those suspected of questioning Pakistani control over the region. The territories' heavy military presence and the threat of shelling and other violence along the LoC restricts internal movement for civilians. Residents and travelers also risk accidentally straying across the LoC and being stranded or detained.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 2 / 4

AJK's pre-1947 state subject law, which bars outsiders from seeking permanent residency, allows only legal residents to own property. In GB, residents have raised concerns about possible displacement by CPEC development projects, and at least some forcible evictions have been reported to date. Procedures for establishing private enterprises in the territories are onerous in practice.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 1 / 4

In both territories, the legal framework criminalizes domestic violence and so-called honor killings, but harmful traditional practices related to sex, marriage, and personal behavior often prevail amid weak enforcement of formal protections, especially in more conservative areas. Informal justice mechanisms operating at the village level are the first point of recourse for many incidents involving sexual or domestic violence against women, and their judgments can inflict further harm on victims.

Both territories, but particularly GB, have historically been less economically developed than Pakistan, and their population has depended on labor migration to supplement incomes. The lack of local control over extractive industries prompts periodic complaints that residents are being deprived of the benefits of natural resources.

Child labor is known to occur, though the AJK government banned the practice by passing the Restriction of Employment of Children Act 2016 and amending it in 2017. Under this legislation, businesses in AJK cannot hire residents under the age of 17. Laws against sex and labor trafficking in general are poorly enforced.

Somaliland

Freedom Status: Partly Free

Note: Freedom in the World reports assess the level of political rights and civil liberties in a given geographical area, regardless of whether they are affected by the state, nonstate actors, or foreign powers. Disputed territories are sometimes assessed separately if they meet certain criteria, including boundaries that are sufficiently stable to allow year-on-year comparisons. For more information, see the report methodology and FAQ.

Overview: Somaliland—whose self-declared independence from Somalia is not internationally recognized—has seen a consistent erosion of political rights and civic space. Journalists and public figures face pressure from authorities. Minority clans are subject to political and economic marginalization, and violence against women remains a serious problem.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- Long-delayed parliamentary and local elections were held in May 2021. The two opposition parties, the Somaliland National Party (Waddani) and the Justice and Welfare (UCID) party, won 31 and 21 seats, respectively, enough to form a coalition government. The former ruling party, the Peace, Unity, and Development Party (Kulmiye), won 30 seats. Election observers noted few irregularities in the polls, and voter turnout was 65 percent.
- Police detained almost a dozen opposition Waddani and UCID candidates in the leadup to the May elections. Some candidates were accused of associating with Somali politicians, which is considered treason, but were released following pressure from civil society groups, the Supreme Court, and the NEC.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 22 / 40 (+4)

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 3 / 4

The president is directly elected for a maximum of two five-year terms and appoints the cabinet. In 2017, after two years of delay, Somaliland held its third presidential election. Muse Bihi Abdi of Kulmiye won the contest with 55 percent of the vote, followed by Abdurahman Mohamed Abdullahi of Waddani with 40 percent, and Faisal Ali Warabe of UCID with 4 percent. International observers concluded the process was credible; some instances of bribery and intimidation at polling places did not significantly affect the final result.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 2 / 4 (+2)

Members of the 82-seat lower legislative chamber, the House of Representatives, are directly elected for five-year terms, while members of the 82-seat upper chamber, the Guurti, are clan elders indirectly elected for six-year terms.

Long-delayed parliamentary and local elections were held in May 2021. The two opposition parties, Waddani and UCID, won 31 and 21 seats, respectively, enough to form a coalition government. The ruling party, Kulmiye, won 30 seats. Election observers noted some irregularities in the polls, and voter turnout was 65 percent. Despite the credibility and competitiveness of the elections, fighting between clans in the Togdheer, Sool, and Sanaag regions killed dozens of people in the months leading up to the elections.

Score Change: The score improved from 0 to 2 because competitive parliamentary elections were held, despite some challenges.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 2 / 4

The legal and administrative framework for elections is largely fair, but ambiguities in some laws as well as technical and logistical challenges have led to chronic election delays. The House of Representatives approved a new composition for the National Electoral Commission (NEC) in June 2020 and announced revisions to electoral law to address the logistical challenges in October.

In July 2020, a Technical Election Unit, which was envisioned to be comprised of three members from the international community, was established to advise the NEC. A voter-registration drive for the 2021 polls began in late November 2020.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 10 / 16 (+1)

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 3 / 4

The constitution allows for a maximum of three officially recognized political parties. The three groups that receive the most votes in local council elections are declared eligible to contest national elections and compete freely in practice. The system is meant to encourage alliances across clan divisions, but clan and party affiliation remain closely aligned.

Police detained almost a dozen opposition Waddani and UCID candidates in the leadup to the May 2021 elections. Some candidates were accused of associating with Somali politicians, which is considered treason, but were released following pressure from civil society groups, the Supreme Court, and the NEC.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 3 / 4 (+1)

The political system allows democratic transfers of power between rival parties. In the parliamentary and local elections held in May 2021, the two opposition parties, the UCID and Waddani, overtook the formerly ruling Kulmiye party to form a ruling alliance. Opposition parties similarly won mayoral positions in Hargeisa and four other major towns.

Score Change: The score improved from 2 to 3 due to a strong showing by the opposition party in parliamentary and local elections.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 2 / 4

Clan elders play an influential role in politics, both directly with their kinsmen and through the currently unelected Guurti, which has the authority to extend officials' terms in office and approve election dates.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 2 / 4

Women and various clans formally enjoy equal political rights. However, larger clans tend to dominate political offices and leadership positions. Cultural barriers also limit women's political participation. In a 2019 report, the Hargeisa-based Centre for Policy Analysis noted that only 12 of 173 appointments that had been made by President Bihi were given to women. No parliamentary seat was won by a woman in the May 2021 parliamentary elections.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 5 / 12 (+1)

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 2 / 4 (+1)

The 2021 elections provided a new legislative mandate to elected representatives. Decisions made by national authorities are implemented in most of Somaliland's claimed territory.

Score Change: The score improved from 1 to 2 due to the competitive parliamentary elections that provided the body with a new legislative mandate.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 1 / 4

Somaliland has few institutional safeguards against corruption and nepotism. Prosecutions of officials for malfeasance are rare. Former president Ahmed Mohamed Mohamoud "Silanyo" took some measures to combat corruption, but the anticorruption commission he created in 2010 has been ineffective. A new commission chairman was appointed in February 2020.

In September 2020, Auditor General Ahmed Yusuf Dirir disclosed the arrests of several officials over corruption-related charges. The auditor general also disclosed that several other individuals were accused of forging documents.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 2 / 4

The government operates with relative transparency in many respects but is more opaque regarding contracts for major projects. Journalists and civil society activists who attempt to scrutinize government activities often face harassment.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 27 / 60 (+3)

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 6 / 16 (+2)

D1. Are there free and independent media? 2 / 4 (+1)

A variety of print, television, and online news outlets operate, but many have political affiliations, and the state-run broadcaster has a monopoly in the radio sector. The penal code criminalizes defamation and other vaguely defined press offenses, such as circulation of “false, exaggerated, or tendentious news.” The government has restricted the registration of new newspapers. A 2020 ministerial decree requires independent media houses to register with the Ministry of Information and for social media– and YouTube-based media to pay between 30 and 40 percent income tax.

The Somaliland Journalists Association (SJA) documented fewer arrests and harassment of journalists and media houses in 2020, the most recent statistics available. The SJA also noted that the media environment to report on and monitor the May 2021 parliamentary elections was more open to reporters and other media workers.

Score Change: The score improved from 1 to 2 because harassment of journalists has decreased.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 2 / 4

Islam is the state religion. The constitution allows for freedom of belief but prohibits conversion from Islam and proselytizing by members of other faiths. Places of worship must obtain government permission to operate, though there is no mechanism to register religious organizations.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 2 / 4

Teachers and professors are often able to pursue academic activities of a political and quasi-political nature without fear of intimidation. While funds allocated for public schools are uneven across the regions, they are generally free from overt political manipulation.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 2 / 4 (+1)

While individuals can express themselves with relative freedom on political matters, remarks on sensitive social and cultural issues are subject to censure and retribution. Arrests and convictions for controversial social media posts has contributed to greater self-censorship online among residents.

Though in June 2021 the government arrested 42 people for displaying the Somali flag, arrests for public speech in have declined in recent years. The majority of those arrested in June were released in July.

Score Change: The score improved from 1 to 2 because fewer people were arrested for online speech.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 6 / 12 (+1)

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 2 / 4 (+1)

The constitution allows for freedom of assembly, but organized public demonstrations are infrequent, and authorities have sometimes employed violence to disperse protests. Despite initially experiencing harassment from security forces, opposition parties were able to hold public events and rallies in the lead up to the May 2021 parliamentary elections.

Score Change: The score improved from 1 to 2 because election rallies were permitted to proceed.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights– and governance-related work? 2 / 4

Local and international nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) often operate without serious interference, but such groups can face harassment for their work. NGOs documenting human rights note that their work and events are not covered by government media outlets.

In October 2020, the Somaliland government suspended cooperating with UN agencies, after the United Nations finalized a sustainable development cooperation framework with the Somali government. In early November, Somaliland officials began holding talks with the United Nations on a new relational framework, which were not concluded by year's end.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 2 / 4

The constitution does not explicitly protect the right to strike, though it does permit collective bargaining. The right to belong to a union is generally respected.

F. RULE OF LAW: 7 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 2 / 4

Although some progress has been made in reforming the judicial system in recent years, the judiciary lacks independence, sufficient funding, and proper training. Judges are often selected based on clan or political affiliation and are subject to interference from the government.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 2 / 4

Due process is observed unevenly. Poverty and political factors play a role in how cases are charged and investigated, and whether there is adequate and timely representation for the defendant. Both customary law and Sharia (Islamic law) are used alongside civil law, which complicates adherence to statutory procedure. In practice, police arrest individuals arbitrarily and hold detainees without charge for extended periods. Lawyers are frequently denied access to detained clients. Long delays in court cases are common.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 1 / 4

Somaliland's police and security forces have been accused of using excessive force, and conditions in detention centers are harsh and overcrowded. Fighting between clans in the Togdheer, Sool, and Sanaag regions killed dozens in the runup to the May 2021 elections.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 2 / 4

Members of smaller clans face discrimination, limited access to public services, and prejudice in the justice system. Clan connections play a critical role in securing employment. Women also suffer from inequality, including in the Sharia and customary legal systems. Same-sex sexual relations is a criminal offense, and LGBT+ people are generally not publicly open about their sexual orientation or gender identity.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 6 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 2 / 4

Freedom of movement is respected to some extent, but traffic between Somaliland and Puntland is restricted, and the Somaliland government limits travel to and from Somalia's federal capital, Mogadishu. Clan divisions hinder individuals' ability to relocate within the territory.

In October 2021, Somaliland authorities began expelling Somali nationals from the disputed Sool region, claiming they were a security threat.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 2 / 4

Individuals can own property and operate private businesses without undue interference from the government. However, land disputes are common, as tenure is often complicated by lack of documentation and inconsistencies among different legal systems and state authorities. In 2019, police and military officials forcefully evicted several families to build a new presidential palace. No compensation was paid to the affected families.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 1 / 4

Personal social freedoms are constrained by several factors. Marriages between members of major and minor clans are stigmatized. Female genital mutilation (FGM) is common. In 2018, the Ministry of Religious Affairs released a religious edict banning one common type of FGM, but human rights groups criticized the edict for not fully prohibiting the practice.

Domestic violence remains a serious problem, and rape is rarely reported to authorities due to social pressures against such complaints. The Sexual Offenses Bill, which criminalized many forms of gender-based violence (GBV), was signed in 2018 by President Bihi, but was subsequently suspended by the Ministry of Religious Affairs after an outcry from religious leaders. In August 2020, the House of Representatives approved the Rape, Fornication and Other Related Offences Bill, which would allow for child marriages, criminalize reports of rape deemed “false,” and would narrow the definition of rape. Whether the bill became law after approval by the Guurti is unclear.

The informal sector, including traditional pastoral activities, accounts for much of the economy, and many households rely on remittances from relatives working in other countries. Trafficking in persons for forced labor or sexual exploitation abroad is a serious problem. Refugees from neighboring countries, including Yemen and Ethiopia, and internally displaced people are also vulnerable to exploitation.

South Ossetia*

Freedom Status: Not Free

Note: Freedom in the World reports assess the level of political rights and civil liberties in a given geographical area, regardless of whether they are affected by the state, nonstate actors, or foreign powers. Disputed territories are sometimes assessed separately if they meet certain criteria, including boundaries that are sufficiently stable to allow year-on-year comparisons. For more information, see the report methodology and FAQ.

Overview: Large parts of South Ossetia, a breakaway territory of Georgia, enjoyed de facto independence after a civil conflict ended in 1992. A 2008 war that drew in Russian forces resulted in the expulsion of the remaining Georgian government presence and most ethnic Georgian civilians. Only Russia and a handful of other states have since recognized South Ossetia's independence. The territory remains almost entirely dependent on Moscow, which exerts a decisive influence over its politics and governance. Local media and civil society are largely controlled or monitored by the authorities, and the judiciary is subject to political influence and manipulation.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- In April, lawmakers rejected the government's first candidate to succeed Prosecutor General Uruzmag Jagaev, whose term ended that month. Another candidate, Magomed Bagayev, was accepted in May.
- Border crossings with Georgia proper remained closed during the year, while crossings with Russia were largely open. However, residents seeking medical care had less difficulty crossing the de facto border.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 2 / 40A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 2 / 12*A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

Although South Ossetia's elections occur regularly, they are severely restricted at all stages of the process and are not monitored by independent observers or recognized by the international community. In the April 2017 presidential contest, former military leader Anatoly Bibilov was elected to a five-year term, defeating incumbent Leonid Tibilov. Political analysts said that the conduct of the 2017 election was an improvement on the 2011 poll, the results of which had been disputed. Nevertheless, political debate and competition only occurred within a narrow field of candidates allowed by Moscow and pro-Russian authorities.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 1 / 4

In June 2019, residents of South Ossetia elected lawmakers through a new voting system: Half of the 34 seats went to political parties via proportional representation while the other half was designated to single-member constituencies. Legislative elections are not internationally recognized, and Russian influence precludes truly competitive contests.

The 2019 elections yielded some positive developments. In contrast to previous years, political parties reported few problems with registration, campaigned in the region, and took part in televised debates. However, more than half of the candidates for the single-member constituencies, mainly private individuals, were unable to register. The United Ossetia party of President Bibilov won 14 seats, followed by Unity of the People (UP) with 5 and the Nykhas movement with 4. Smaller parties captured the remainder.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 1 / 4

According to electoral laws, candidates must have permanently resided in South Ossetia for 10 years. Russian influence undermines the independence of the Central Election Commission (CEC). New commissioners were selected in August 2021; according to a preliminary agreement on the CEC's makeup, two belonged to United Ossetia. The Communist, For Justice, Nykhas, People's Party, and UP factions each received one commissioner.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 2 / 16B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 1 / 4

Moscow exerts a decisive influence over politics and governance, effectively placing significant restrictions on the ability of political parties outside of a narrow political spectrum to operate freely. However, a number of new parties have registered over the past decade, including United Ossetia, which has governed the territory since winning the most seats in the 2014 elections. United Ossetia controls the local Ministry of Justice and thus oversees the party registration processes. The body has inspected party-member lists, but upon identifying mistakes has allowed parties to resolve them without negative consequences for elections.

However, individual candidates have faced difficulties registering with the CEC. Only 39 of the 99 candidates seeking single-member seats ahead of the 2019 polls were approved by the commission.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 1 / 4

While Bibilov, the opposition candidate, successfully challenged the incumbent in the 2017 presidential election, the success or failure of opposition politicians is largely determined by Moscow.

Opposition lawmakers have gained some influence following the 2020 death of local resident Inal Dzhabiev and subsequent rallies that called for Bibilov's resignation. Between September 2020 and March 2021, they largely boycotted parliamentary sessions. Opposition lawmakers also called for the resignation of Prosecutor General Uruzmag Jagaev, whose term ended in April. Lawmakers rejected Bibilov's first choice to succeed Jagaev, though candidate Magomed Bagayev was accepted in May.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 0 / 4

South Ossetia's institutions are almost entirely dependent on economic and political support from Moscow. People whose political interests fall outside the narrow spectrum defined by Moscow, territorial authorities, and their private business interests cannot meaningfully participate in the political process.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 0 / 4

While the territorial government includes several women ministers, the interests of women and minority groups are not represented politically. Most ethnic Georgian residents have either declined or have been denied the ability to participate in elections.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 0 / 12C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 0 / 4

- The ability of elected officials to determine and implement policy is heavily influenced by Moscow. A sweeping 2015 treaty between Russia and South Ossetia closely integrates the territory's defense, security, and customs mechanisms with those of Russia, charging Moscow with protection of South Ossetia's borders. Russian aid comprises almost the entirety of South Ossetia's budget. Bibilov has spoken repeatedly of formally uniting the territory with Russia's North Ossetia–Alania or joining the Russian Federation as a separate region.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 0 / 4

Official corruption is widespread in South Ossetia. There is little systematic effort to fight such behavior, though opposition lawmakers have sought to debate the issue in the parliament. In July 2020, the parliament adopted and the president signed a law that introduced annual declarations for all civil servants and restrictions on conflicts of interest. The law's adoption was delayed for five years, however.

In April 2021, two lawmakers reported that South Ossetian officials may have participated in a smuggling operation along with Russian customs officers. In May, parliament speaker Alan Tadtayev denied the accusation.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 0 / 4

South Ossetia's government is not transparent. In September 2021, opposition lawmakers sought a no-confidence vote after the territorial government declined to disclose the results of an audit; the vote narrowly failed.

ADDITIONAL DISCRETIONARY POLITICAL RIGHTS QUESTION

Is the government or occupying power deliberately changing the ethnic composition of a country or territory so as to destroy a culture or tip the political balance in favor of another group? -2 / 0

During the 2008 war, South Ossetian forces seized or razed property in previously Georgian-controlled villages, and large numbers of ethnic Georgians fled the fighting. Territorial authorities have since barred ethnic Georgians from returning unless they renounce their Georgian citizenship and accept Russian passports. Of approximately 20,000 ethnic Georgians displaced from their homes in South Ossetia, most have not been able to return.

Conditions for remaining local residents have largely stabilized since the war, particularly due to the absence of open conflict across the administrative line separating South Ossetia from Georgia. The weeks-long restrictions of movement between the territory and Georgia proper in during much of 2019 prompted dozens of ethnic Georgians to flee, fearing the permanent closure of crossing points. A similar outflow of local Georgians took place in January 2020, when region's leadership agreed to open crossings with Georgia proper for 10 days: people left for Georgia, many due to hardships and shortages caused by border closures. Ethnic Georgians who sought to return to their homes in South Ossetia in 2021 were largely unsuccessful.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 9 / 60 (+1)

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 3 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 0 / 4

Local media, including television channel Ir, newspapers Yuzhnaya Osetiya and Respublika, and online portal Res, are almost entirely controlled by the authorities. Self-censorship is pervasive, and defamation charges are often employed against critical media. An increasing number of residents rely on online outlets for news and other information. Foreign media, including broadcasts from Russia and Georgia, remain accessible. The local version of Russian news portal Sputnik, accessible in both Russian and Ossetian, is increasingly popular.

Social media platforms are popular among South Ossetia's residents, who maintain public and private groups to discuss politics and everyday problems. Some discussions attract lawmakers and officials. Territorial residents mainly use slow and expensive mobile services to access the internet.

In January 2021, Sergei Kabisov, a territorial defense official, physically attacked a blogger based in North Ossetia–Alania for criticizing Bibilov. North Ossetia–Alania officials charged Kabisov with forcibly obstruction of the blogger’s activities in April. In September, Vitaly Denisov, the editor of Sputnik’s South Ossetia edition, claimed that a gas line in his home was intentionally damaged. Several days later, Margarita Simonyan, the editor in chief of Russian state-run television network RT, claimed that someone attempted to poison Denisov. Territorial prosecutors opened an investigation into the damaged gas line soon after.

In 2021, authorities continued to pursue a legal case against Tamara Mearakishvili, a blogger and activist who works with Georgian and international media outlets including Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty (RFE/RL); Mearakishvili had originally faced charges including libel in 2017. In 2020, the Supreme Court sent Mearakishvili’s case to the first instance court for retrial, though the Supreme Court had cleared her of libel. In April 2021, a Tskhinvali court returned the case to prosecutors because it still included the libel charge. In May, prosecutors offered to end the case due to a statute of limitations; Mearakishvili declined, stating her desire to clear her name.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 1 / 4

Most residents are Orthodox Christian, though a sizeable Muslim community exists. Followers of Russian Orthodoxy and Ossetian neopaganism also inhabit the territory. Some property of the Georgian Orthodox Church is controlled by the South Ossetian Orthodox Church (called the Eparchy). Jehovah’s Witnesses have been banned as an “extremist” organization since 2017.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 1 / 4

The government exerts strong influence over the education system. The Education Ministry has been working to phase out Georgian-language education since 2017.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 1 / 4

Private discussion is constrained by the sensitivity of certain topics, particularly the territory’s geopolitical standing. Speaking of the property rights and expulsion of the Georgian population is assumed to attract unwanted attention.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 2 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 2 / 4

Freedom of assembly is restricted. While residents occasionally demonstrate against environmental degradation, the sluggish pace of postwar reconstruction, animal rights, and, more rarely, overtly political grievances, participants in unsanctioned gatherings risk criminal charges. Authorities have responded to demonstrations by closing roads and deploying security forces.

Protests held in 2020 over the death of Inal Dzhabiev, who was accused of participating in a gun attack on the interior minister’s car, were tolerated by authorities. However, the territorial government dismissed Deputy Health Minister Agunda Plieva from her post after she spoke at a rally that year. In March 2021, the Supreme Court ruled that her dismissal was legal, though Plieva vowed to appeal.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights– and governance-related work? 0 / 4

Nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) that operate in the territory are subject to government influence. Legislative amendments in 2014 increased authorities' oversight capacity over NGOs, subjecting organizations that receive foreign funding to broader and more frequent reporting requirements and branding them "foreign partners." In recent years, a handful of organizations have officially received funding from Russia. NGOs engaged in conflict resolution and reconciliation are smeared by the authorities and progovernment media as agents of Tbilisi or Western intelligence services.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 0 / 4

Trade unions in South Ossetia largely defer to the policies of the separatist government. Conflict with Georgia has left trade unions weak and geographically divided.

F. RULE OF LAW: 1 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 0 / 4

South Ossetia's judiciary is not independent. The justice system is manipulated to punish perceived opponents of the separatist leadership. In 2019, a court handed former official Georgy Kabisov an eight-year prison term on embezzlement-related accusations. The case is seen as highly political due to personal problems between Kabisov and President Bibilov. In February 2021, a court denied Kabisov's parole application after prison authorities accused him of keeping an internet router in his cell.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 0 / 4

South Ossetia uses a modified version of the Russian criminal code. Government allies reportedly violate the law with relative impunity.

Criminal prosecutions are used to punish activists and individuals that question or inconvenience the authorities. By June 2021, prosecutors accused forensic expert Zarina Dzagoeva, who examined the body of Inal Dzhabiev in 2020, of knowingly providing false information.

The territory's judiciary does not oversee transparent and fair investigations into cases related to border crossings between South Ossetia and Georgia proper. Territorial residents and ethnic Georgians from Georgia proper risk arrest for crossing; while most individuals are fined, some face arbitrary detention.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 0 / 4

Physical abuse and poor conditions are reportedly common in prisons and detention centers. At court sessions, prisoners often speak about floods and freezing conditions at an old building that was originally intended to serve as a temporary detention center.

In 2020, after Inal Dzhabiev died while in police custody, photographs of his corpse that circulated on social media depicted extensive bruises. Two detainees who were implicated alongside Dzhabiev in a gun attack on the interior minister's vehicle were released after promising not to leave South Ossetia; one spent weeks undergoing medical care after their release. At least eight police officers were detained on charges related to Dzhabiev's death, though four were released from custody in June 2021.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 1 / 4

Ethnic Georgians face continued discrimination. There are no initiatives to support the rights of LGBT+ people.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 3 / 16 (+1)G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 1 / 4 (+1)

Restrictions on freedom of movement between South Ossetia and Georgia proper, which the territorial government and Moscow consider a “state border,” remain in place. Russian border guards have installed barbed wire and other obstructions to limit travel. The crossings were closed for most of 2021, in part due to COVID-19. Crossings into Russia remained open throughout the year.

Although the territory’s security services grant few requests to cross into Georgia proper, they allowed people with emergency health problems to do so in 2021. In 2020, the Georgian government reported that at least 16 people had died because they could not cross to seek medical assistance in a timely fashion.

Score Change: The score improved from 0 to 1 because in contrast with the previous year, South Ossetians were able to use border crossings into Russia and encountered fewer impediments when traveling for medical care.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 0 / 4

The territory’s political and military situation has negatively affected protections of property rights, particularly for residents close to the administrative line with Georgia proper. Small businesses risk being seized or subjected to predatory behavior by larger, more powerful corporations.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 2 / 4

While no laws officially regulate individuals’ public appearance, statements by public officials reflect intolerance for behavior that deviates from the territory’s conservative norms. No laws or government programs specifically protect victims of domestic violence.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 0 / 4

Economic opportunity has been limited by the territory’s unrecognized status, among other reasons. Populations living along the administrative border with Georgia proper face economic uncertainty due to divisions created by shifting and uncertain borders.

Tibet

Population: 3,700,000 [Note: This figure covers only the Tibet Autonomous Region.]

Freedom Status: Not Free

Note: Freedom in the World reports assess the level of political rights and civil liberties in a given geographical area, regardless of whether they are affected by the state, nonstate actors, or foreign powers. Disputed territories are sometimes assessed separately if they meet certain criteria, including boundaries that are sufficiently stable to allow year-on-year comparisons. For more information, see the report methodology and FAQ.

Overview: Tibet is ruled by the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) government based in Beijing, with local decision-making power concentrated in the hands of Chinese party officials. Residents of both Han Chinese and Tibetan ethnicity are denied fundamental rights, but the authorities are especially rigorous in suppressing any signs of dissent among Tibetans, including manifestations of Tibetan religious beliefs and cultural identity. State policies, such as incentives for non-Tibetan people to migrate from other parts of China and the compulsory relocation of ethnic Tibetans, have reduced the ethnic Tibetan share of the population over time.

- In March, the authorities announced that nearly 2,000 “inspectors” were being deployed to police Tibetan rural communities and enforce tighter travel restrictions, particularly near international borders in the south.
- Chinese government officials continued to leverage the COVID-19 pandemic, among other justifications, to restrict religious practice, including by closing or limiting access to Buddhist temples and monasteries. Officials also imposed increasingly oppressive ideological controls and political indoctrination within temples and monasteries, and supplemented internal video surveillance at such sites with human supervisors and informants.
- As part of a broader program of military training and indoctrination for ethnic Tibetan students, new rules introduced during the year required students who receive government aid for their schooling to enroll in two years of military training.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: -2 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 0 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

The Chinese government rules Tibet through administration of the Tibet Autonomous Region (TAR) and 12 Tibetan autonomous prefectures or counties in the nearby provinces of Sichuan, Qinghai, Gansu, and Yunnan. Under the Chinese constitution, autonomous areas have the right to formulate their own regulations and implement national legislation in accordance with local conditions. In practice, however, decision-making authority is concentrated in the hands of unelected ethnic (Han) Chinese officials of the CCP, which has a monopoly on political power. Wang Junzheng, former deputy party secretary and chief security officer in the Xinjiang Uyghur Autonomous Region (XUAR), was appointed to replace Wu Yingjie as TAR party secretary in October 2021, raising grave concerns that the leadership was planning to expand the draconian policies it had adopted in the XUAR to the TAR.

The few ethnic Tibetans who occupy senior executive positions serve mostly as figureheads or echo official doctrine. In October 2021, Yan Jinhai, an ethnic Tibetan official who had most recently served as the Lhasa party secretary, was chosen as chairman (governor) of the TAR. He replaced Che Dalha, another ethnic Tibetan who had held the post since 2017. The TAR chairman is formally elected by the regional people’s congress, but in practice such decisions are predetermined by the CCP leadership.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

The regional people's congress of the TAR, which is formally elected by lower-level people's congresses, chooses delegates to China's 3,000-member National People's Congress (NPC) every five years. In practice, all candidates are vetted by the CCP. The current TAR people's congress held its first session in January 2018, and the current NPC was seated that March.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 0 / 4

As in the rest of China, direct elections are only permitted at the lowest administrative levels. Tight political controls and aggressive state interference ensure that competitive races with independent candidates are even rarer in Tibet than in other parts of the country. Regulations published in 2014 placed significant restrictions on candidates for village elections, excluding those who have attended religious teachings abroad, have communicated with overseas Tibetans, or have relatives studying at monasteries outside China.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 0 / 16B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 0 / 4

All organized political activity outside the CCP is illegal and harshly punished, as is any evidence of loyalty to or communication with the Central Tibetan Administration (CTA)—a representative body based in Dharamsala, India, that is often referred to as a government-in-exile.

The CTA includes an elected parliament serving five-year terms, a Supreme Justice Commission that adjudicates civil disputes, and a directly elected prime minister, also serving five-year terms. Votes are collected from the Tibetan diaspora around the world. The unelected Dalai Lama, the Tibetan spiritual leader who also traditionally served as head of state, renounced his political role in 2011. In May 2021, Penpa Tsering was elected as prime minister of the CTA, replacing Lobsang Sangay, who stepped down after serving two terms.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 0 / 4

As in China as a whole, the one-party system structurally precludes and rigorously suppresses the development of any organized political opposition. Tibet has never experienced a peaceful and democratic transfer of power between rival groups.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 0 / 4

The authoritarian CCP is not accountable to voters and denies the public any meaningful influence or independent participation in political affairs.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 0 / 4

Political opportunities for ethnic Tibetans within Tibet remain limited. Ethnic Chinese officials dominate top-level and strategic positions in the CCP and government, while ethnic Tibetans are restricted to lower-level and rubber-stamp positions. The authorities vigorously suppress and harshly punish any independent political or civic engagement by ethnic Tibetans, even on local community issues that were considered less politically sensitive in previous decades.

Women are well represented in many public-sector jobs and CCP posts within the TAR, though most high-level officials are men, and women are unable to organize independently to advance their political interests.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 1 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 0 / 4

As elsewhere in China, unelected CCP officials determine and implement government policies in Tibet. Constitutionally, the TAR, like other ethnic minority regions, should enjoy greater autonomy than other provinces, but in practice it is controlled even more tightly by the central government.

In March 2018, the CCP Central Committee announced significant structural reforms that reduced the already limited separation between the party and state governance, placing CCP entities—like the United Front Work Department—more explicitly in charge of policy areas including religious affairs and ethnic minorities, which are especially relevant for Tibet.

Corruption is believed to be extensive, as it is in China more generally, though little information is available on the scale of the problem.

There have been moves in recent years to curb graft among the region's officials as part of Chinese president Xi Jinping's nationwide anticorruption campaign. However, many prosecutions are believed to be politically selective or amount to reprisals for perceived political and religious disloyalty. Efforts to control corruption are monopolized by the CCP leadership; as elsewhere in China, citizens who seek to expose official misdeeds in Tibet have faced detention and prosecution.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 0 / 4

Governance is opaque in all of China but even more so in Tibet. A study by the Chinese Academy of Social Sciences, published in 2017, ranked cities and counties nationwide by their level of government transparency; Lhasa, the capital of the TAR, scored lowest among the cities, and the TAR's Nang County was the lowest among the counties under examination.

ADDITIONAL DISCRETIONARY POLITICAL RIGHTS QUESTION

Is the government or occupying power deliberately changing the ethnic composition of a country or territory so as to destroy a culture or tip the political balance in favor of another group? -3 / 0

In recent years, the Chinese government has accelerated policies that decrease the proportion of Tibetans in the TAR and undermine their cultural and religious identity—part of a renewed, nationwide campaign to “Sinicize” religious and ethnic minority populations. The implementation of the government's 2019–20 Farmer and Pastoralist Training and Labor Transfer Action Plan forced tens of thousands of additional Tibetan farmers and nomads to surrender their land-use rights to state-run collectives, become wage laborers, and move to urban areas where they are crowded into large apartment blocks. While the plan's stated goal is to alleviate rural poverty, in practice it has prevented tens of thousands of Tibetans from pursuing their traditional way of life, depriving them of their economic livelihood and connection to the land. Moreover, transferring Tibetans to urban areas facilitates their exposure to more intense state surveillance and CCP propaganda. Authorities have also invoked the goal of environmental conservation to justify the forcible relocation of Tibetans from their ancestral land. Parallel government policies continue to encourage ethnic Chinese migration to the TAR, for example by recruiting workers for infrastructure projects in the region; such migrants typically do not change their household registration, meaning their numbers are not reflected in official statistics. “Ethnic unity” regulations promote intermarriage between Han Chinese and Tibetans through financial incentives, further eroding Tibetans’ distinct cultural and religious identity.

More than 500,000 Tibetans have been sent to military-led “vocational training” facilities since the beginning of 2020. The programs separate individuals from their communities, subject them to political indoctrination, and pressure them to abandon their religious beliefs and “backward thinking.” Local officials are said to be given specific quotas for the number of Tibetans they are required to enroll in such programs. Trainees are forced into wage labor, making them dependent on the state and allied private employers for their jobs and income. All those who receive state benefits, as well as state employees, are required to denounce the Dalai Lama, abandon their religious beliefs, and profess political loyalty to the CCP.

The authorities have set up military-style summer “education camps” for Tibetan children between the ages of 8 and 16 in areas near the militarized border with India. The official purpose of the camps is to train young people in military discipline, increase their patriotism, and prepare them to take part in national defense. The compulsory program separates children from their families, further weakening their connection to Tibetan culture, and prevents them from attending Tibetan language classes during school breaks; Tibetan has been phased out as a language of instruction in schools over the past decade. New rules introduced during 2021 required Tibetan secondary-school and college students who receive government aid for their education to enroll in two years of military training.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 3 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 0 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 0 / 4

CCP authorities control traditional and social media in Tibet even more strictly than in Han Chinese areas of the country. Individuals who use the internet, social media, or other means to share politically sensitive news content or commentary face arrest and heavy criminal penalties. Tibetan cultural expression, which the authorities associate with separatism, is subject to especially harsh restrictions; scores of Tibetan writers, intellectuals, and musicians have been incarcerated in recent years.

Deliberate internet blackouts occur periodically in Tibet, including in areas where public demonstrations have occurred. International broadcasts are jammed, and personal communication devices are confiscated and searched. The online censorship and monitoring systems in place across China are applied more stringently in the TAR, while censorship of Tibet-related keywords on the popular messaging application WeChat has become more sophisticated.

The TAR is the only provincial-level region of China that requires foreigners to obtain a special permit to enter, and foreign journalists are regularly prevented from visiting. Journalists also face barriers in access to Tibetan areas of Sichuan and other provinces, though no permission is officially required to travel to those places. Tibetans who communicate with foreign media or other foreign contacts without permission face criminal prosecution and long prison sentences. Four Tibetan monks were tried in September 2020 and sentenced to prison terms ranging from five to 20 years for sending messages to colleagues outside Tibet regarding charitable aid to a monastery in Nepal that was damaged by an earthquake. Sharing local information online can also lead to punishment. In August 2021, a group of 110 Tibetans were detained for posting photos of the police presence ahead of a traditional annual horse-racing festival.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 0 / 4

Religious practice is carefully managed and increasingly restricted in Tibet. The government's efforts to "Sinicize" Tibetan Buddhism have accelerated in recent years, with officials requiring Tibetan Buddhist clergy and lay believers to pledge their loyalty to the CCP and socialism above their religious beliefs, to denounce the Dalai Lama, and to attend increasingly long political education sessions. The Chinese authorities view Tibetan reverence for the Dalai Lama and adherence to the region's unique form of Buddhism as a threat to CCP rule. Possession of Dalai Lama–related materials—especially in the TAR—continues to result in detention and possible criminal prosecution.

Political and ideological indoctrination within monasteries and nunneries intensified during 2021, with monks and nuns subjected to invasive and onerous supervision. "Management committees" made up of CCP cadres and police were given increased authority to directly control the daily operations of religious communities. "Intelligent temple management" systems operate in nearly all religious institutions, including pervasive video surveillance in all temples and monasteries. In 2021, authorities continued to use the coronavirus pandemic as a pretext to shut down monasteries and nunneries and to restrict hours for worship in many temples. The authorities employ a range of strategies to reduce the number of individuals pursuing religious education or engaged in religious activities. Those who wish to become monks or nuns must be at least 18 years old, and religious education for children is prohibited.

The Chinese government has asserted its intention to select the successor of the current Dalai Lama, who turned 86 in July 2021, and has promoted its own appointee to serve as the Panchen Lama, a religious figure who plays an important role in identifying the reincarnation of a Dalai Lama, according to Tibetan Buddhist rituals. The location of the Panchen Lama who was originally recognized by the current Dalai Lama remains unknown; he was abducted by Chinese officials in 1995, when he was six years old.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 0 / 4

University professors cannot lecture on certain topics, and many must attend political indoctrination sessions. The government restricts course materials to prevent circulation of unofficial versions of Tibetan history and has phased out the use of Tibetan as the language of instruction in schools over the past decade. Private and monastery schools have been largely shut down in recent years in an effort to force students into government-run schools—many of them boarding schools—where Mandarin is the only language of instruction.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 0 / 4

Freedom of expression, including in private, is severely limited by factors including authorities' monitoring of electronic communications, a heavy security presence, recruitment of informants, and regular ideological campaigns in Tibetan areas. The authorities in Tibet make use of an invasive security and censorship system that features nearly ubiquitous video cameras, use of facial-recognition technology, "smart" identity cards, and integrated surveillance systems that allow tracking of residents and tourists in real time. Hundreds of "security centers" operate across the region, with more than 130 in Lhasa alone.

Ordinary Tibetans are regularly detained or sentenced to prison for verbally expressing support for the Dalai Lama and independence for Tibet, sharing images of the Dalai Lama or the Tibetan flag on social media, or sending information abroad about self-immolation protests. Scores of Tibetans have been detained for expressing support for Tibetan language rights on social media.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 0 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 0 / 4

Chinese authorities severely restrict freedom of assembly as part of the government's intensified "stability maintenance" policies in Tibet. Control and surveillance of public gatherings extend beyond major towns to villages and rural areas. Even nonviolent protesters are rapidly and often violently dispersed and harshly punished.

The number of self-immolations, typically intended to protest CCP rule, has declined sharply in the last few years due to information blackouts, heightened security and surveillance, and harsh punishments of those associated with self-immolators. Engaging in self-immolation and organizing, assisting, or gathering crowds related to such acts are considered criminal offenses, drawing charges of intentional homicide in some cases.

Despite the restrictions, Tibetans continue to seek ways to express their views on government policies through sporadic solitary or small-scale protests in public places, with participants briefly calling for the return of the Dalai Lama, the release of the Panchen Lama, or independence for Tibet, before being seized by police.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 0 / 4

It is virtually impossible for Tibetans to establish and operate nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) without facing punishment by the authorities. Even seemingly apolitical social and community engagement is no longer tolerated. At least 121 Tibetans, many of them members of the Association for the Preservation of the Tibetan Language, were detained in an August 2021 sweep in Kardze Prefecture, Sichuan Province, for supporting Tibetan language rights and possessing pictures of the Dalai Lama. Foreign NGOs are generally not allowed to operate in Tibet.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 0 / 4

Independent trade unions are illegal in Tibet, as they are in China as a whole. The only legal union organization is the government-controlled All-China Federation of Trade Unions, which has long been criticized for failing to properly defend workers' rights. Labor activism in Tibet is riskier and therefore much rarer than in other parts of China. According to the NGO China Labour Bulletin, no strikes were documented in the TAR during 2021, and only one protest over wage arrears was recorded in Lhasa for the whole year, compared with more than a thousand labor actions in the rest of the country.

F. RULE OF LAW: 0 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 0 / 4

The CCP controls the judicial system, and courts consequently lack independence. Courts at all levels are supervised by party political-legal committees that influence the appointment of judges, court operations, and verdicts and sentences. Given the political sensitivity of Tibetan issues, the scope for autonomous judicial decision-making in Tibetan areas is even more limited than elsewhere in China.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 0 / 4

Tibetans are systematically denied due process in criminal matters. Among other abuses, they are subjected to arbitrary arrest, denial of family visits, long periods of enforced disappearance, solitary confinement, and illegal pretrial detention. Authorities often fail to inform families of the detention, whereabouts, and well-being of loved ones. Following the detention of writer and Buddhism teacher Lobsang Lhundup in June 2019, nothing about his whereabouts or status was publicly known until it was reported in October 2021 that he had been sentenced to four years in prison, after a secret trial, for writing a book in which he criticized the Chinese government's policies in the TAR. Tibetans have even less access to legal representation of their choice than Han Chinese; lawyers seeking to defend them are routinely harassed, denied access to their clients, blocked from attending relevant hearings, and in some cases disbarred in retaliation. Trials are closed if state security interests are invoked, which sometimes occurs even when no political crime is listed.

Estimates for the number of Tibetan political prisoners in detention range from 1,000 as of the end of 2020 to more than 1,800 as of 2021, according to the NGO Dui Hua and the Tibetan Centre for Human Rights and Democracy, respectively.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 0 / 4

Detained suspects and prisoners are subject to torture and other forms of ill-treatment. Many Tibetan prisoners of conscience die in custody under circumstances indicating torture, and others are released with severe injuries and in extremely poor health, apparently to avoid deaths in custody. Many of the latter subsequently succumb to their injuries. The 121 or more Tibetans who were detained in Kardze Prefecture in August 2021 were reported to have been denied food, clothing, and medical care.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 0 / 4

Ethnic Tibetans face a range of socioeconomic disadvantages and discriminatory treatment by employers, law enforcement agencies, and other official bodies. The dominant role of the Chinese language in education and employment limits opportunities for many Tibetans. While Tibetans are supposed to receive preferential treatment in university admission examinations, this is often not enough to secure entrance. Changes in the scoring system in 2021 made it more difficult for Tibetan students to gain admission to top-tier national-level secondary schools that offer study of the Tibetan language. Tibetans who apply for public-sector jobs—including cleaners and other low-level staff—are required to denounce the Dalai Lama, renounce their religious beliefs, and demonstrate their political loyalty in other ways that fundamentally negate their ethnic and cultural identity.

As in the rest of China, gender bias against women remains widespread, despite laws barring workplace discrimination. LGBT+ people suffer from discrimination, though same-sex sexual activity is not criminalized. Social pressures discourage discussion of LGBT+ issues.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 3 / 16G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 0 / 4

The TAR features extreme restrictions on freedom of movement that disproportionately affect ethnic Tibetans. Obstacles including troop deployments, checkpoints, roadblocks, required bureaucratic approvals, and passport restrictions impede freedom of movement both within Tibetan areas—especially the TAR—and between those areas and the outside world. In March 2021, the authorities announced that nearly 2,000 “inspectors” were being deployed to police Tibetan rural communities and staff about 700 “discipline committees” across the region. The increased state scrutiny included tighter travel restrictions and the need for permits to enter certain areas, particularly near international borders in the south.

While Han Chinese tourists have been encouraged to visit the TAR, the movements of foreign tourists, journalists, diplomats, and others are tightly controlled, and they are often denied entry. Foreign tourists must travel in groups with state-approved tour guides and obtain official permission to visit the TAR. Even then, last-minute travel bans are periodically imposed. Tibetans face nearly insurmountable hurdles in obtaining a passport for foreign travel, and foreign nationals of Tibetan origin face enormous challenges when seeking a visa to visit Tibet, in some cases waiting for years only for their request to be denied.

Increased security efforts and Nepalese government cooperation have made it difficult for Tibetans to cross the border into Nepal. In recent years some Tibetan pilgrims who have traveled abroad have faced detention upon return to China.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 1 / 4

The economy is dominated by state-owned enterprises and private businesses with informal ties to officials. Tibetans reportedly find it more difficult than ethnic Chinese residents to obtain permits and loans to open businesses.

The multiyear policy of forcing Tibetans off their rural land and into the urban wage economy has given the state additional leverage over a growing proportion of the population, as those affected lose their self-reliance and increasingly depend on market wages and government subsidies for their income.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 1 / 4

The central government further loosened family planning regulations nationwide in 2021, allowing all families to have up to three children—after having ended the long-standing one-child policy in 2016 by allowing couples to have up to two children. While the change means a likely decrease in the number of people who experience punitive aspects of the system, such as high fines, job dismissal, reduced government benefits, and detention, the authorities continue to regulate reproduction, and related abuses and punishments are occasionally reported.

In the past, China’s family-planning policies were formally more lenient for Tibetans and members of other ethnic minority groups. Officials limited urban Tibetans to two children and encouraged rural Tibetans to stop at three, at a time when Han Chinese couples were limited to one child. As a result, the TAR is one of the few areas of China without a skewed sex ratio.

State policies that actively encourage interethnic marriages with financial and other incentives, and that require couples to designate a single ethnicity for their children, are among the ongoing policies that have reduced the ethnic Tibetan share of the TAR’s population. Tibetan women are vulnerable to human trafficking schemes that result in forced marriage.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 1 / 4

Exploitative employment practices are pervasive in many industries, as is the case across China, though ethnic Tibetans report additional disadvantages in hiring and compensation. Human trafficking that targets Tibetan women can lead to forced prostitution or exploitative employment in domestic service and other economic sectors elsewhere in China. The herders, farmers, and other Tibetans who are forced off their rural land and resettled in towns and cities are extremely vulnerable to exploitation by public and private employers alike.

Transnistria*

Freedom Status: Not Free

Note: Freedom in the World reports assess the level of political rights and civil liberties in a given geographical area, regardless of whether they are affected by the state, nonstate actors, or foreign powers. Disputed territories are sometimes assessed separately if they meet certain criteria, including boundaries that are sufficiently stable to allow year-on-year comparisons. For more information, see the report methodology and FAQ.

Overview: Transnistria is a breakaway region of Moldova. The territory has operated with de facto independence since a brief military conflict in 1992, though it is internationally recognized as a part of Moldova. Its government and economy are heavily dependent on subsidies from Russia, which maintains a military presence and peacekeeping mission in the territory. Political competition is restricted, and the ruling political group is aligned with powerful local business interests. Impartiality and pluralism of opinion in the media is very limited, and authorities closely control civil society activity.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- In December, incumbent president Vadim Krasnoselsky won reelection in a contest marred by a lack of competition and low turnout. Krasnoselsky's only competitor was a local clerk, while notable opposition figures were not allowed to register.
- In November, Communist Party leader Oleg Horzhan, who was arrested in 2018 and is serving a four-and-one-half-year prison sentence, began a hunger strike along with Serghei Mirovici, a pensioner who was imprisoned for "extremism" and "insulting the president" via social media in 2019.
- In August, the territory's Supreme Court conditionally released opposition activist Gennady Chorba, who had been detained for allegedly organizing a protest in 2020 and later faced extremism charges.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 6 / 40 (-2)

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 1 / 12 (-1)

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4 (-1)

The president is elected for up to two consecutive five-year terms. Incumbent Vadim Krasnoselsky, who was backed by the Renewal (Obnovleniye) Party, was reelected with 79 percent of the vote in the December 2021 presidential election. Krasnoselsky's only competitor was a local clerk, Sergey Pinzar, who won 11.8 percent. Another 8.8 percent of ballots were ruled invalid. Turnout stood at 35.2 percent, a record low for a presidential contest.

The elections were considered especially uncompetitive. Notable opposition figures Anatoly Dirun and Nikolai Malyshev were not allowed to register as candidates by the Central Election Commission due to alleged irregularities in the signatures collected for their nominations. Another candidate, Sergei Dechev, withdrew his candidacy without explanation. An electoral-code amendment instituted in June removed the “against all” option from the presidential ballot.

Score Change: The score declined from 1 to 0 because key political figures were barred from participating in the presidential election, which failed to offer voters a genuine democratic choice.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

Elections for the Supreme Council were last held in November 2020. A total of 51 candidates applied to run for seats, and only 45 were registered, with 4 denied registration and 2 withdrawing their applications. In 23 of the 33 electoral districts, candidates ran unopposed; by comparison, only two candidates had run unopposed in each of the previous two legislative elections. Voter turnout was just 28 percent of the eligible electorate. Renewal won 29 seats, and the remainder went to candidates who had links to Sheriff Enterprises, the powerful business conglomerate that dominates the Transnistrian economy and backs the party.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 1 / 4

The Central Election Commission has long been criticized by various political figures for lack of impartiality and independence. In June 2021, the Renewal-dominated Supreme Council amended the electoral code to remove the “against all” option from ballots for the December presidential poll. Dirun and Malyshev, who were prevented from contesting the election, alleged that their disqualifications were politically motivated.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 4 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 1 / 4

Transnistria’s entire political establishment, including opposition parties, supports the separatist agenda and Russia’s role as the territory’s foreign patron. Figures who oppose the local elite, who are anchored around Sherriiff Enterprises, have been consistently intimidated and silenced in recent years.

The opposition Communist Party faces political repression. In 2018, party leader Oleg Horzhan was arrested, stripped of his parliamentary immunity, and jailed for organizing illegal demonstrations, criticizing officials, and interfering with law enforcement agents. He received a four-and-a-half-year prison sentence. In February 2021, security officers searched the home of acting Communist Party chairwoman Nadezhda Bondarenko for a manuscript authored by Horzhan. In November, Horzhan began a hunger strike while in prison.

In August 2021, the territory’s Supreme Court conditionally released opposition activist Gennady Chorba, who had been detained for allegedly organizing a protest in 2020 and later faced extremism charges.

In December 2021, the authorities reportedly searched the home of aspiring presidential candidate Anatoly Dirun, seizing a computer and other items. Dirun was reportedly facing a forgery charge.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 1 / 4

The Renewal Party has long controlled the legislature, and the 2016 victory of Vadim Krasnoselsky cemented its control over the executive branch. The territory's persecuted opposition parties did not play a significant role in the 2020 legislative elections, which left the Supreme Council with no genuine opposition. Opposition candidates were prevented from contesting the December 2021 presidential election, which Krasnoselsky won by a wide margin amid low turnout.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 1 / 4

The ruling Renewal Party and the political establishment more broadly are dominated by Sheriff Enterprises. In addition, the political influence of the Russian government is undergirded by the presence of Russian troops, who are ostensibly stationed in Transnistria to guard a Soviet-era ammunition depot and, as peacekeepers, to uphold a 1992 cease-fire between Transnistrian and Moldovan forces. Moscow has also financially supported the territory's pension system and provided subsidized energy.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 1 / 4

Both men and women have the legal right to vote, participate in campaigns, and run for office. However, the system in practice allows little opportunity for independent political activity by any segment of the population, and few women are included in the political leadership; only two women hold seats in the Supreme Council.

While Transnistria has three official languages—Russian, Ukrainian, and Moldovan—Russian dominates in governmental affairs and public communications. Authorities do not allow voting in Moldovan elections to take place in Transnistrian-controlled territory, though residents who sought to vote in Moldova's July 2021 elections were observed traveling into Moldova proper to participate. Residents with Russian citizenship were able to participate in the September State Duma elections through polling stations deployed in Transnistria.

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 0 / 4 (–1)

Transnistria's flawed elections undercut the democratic legitimacy of both executive leaders and legislative representatives. The 2020 legislative and 2021 presidential elections were both marred by low rates of participation and a lack of competition. Sheriff Enterprises exerts a strong influence on elected officials' policy decisions, which are also closely monitored by Moscow.

Score Change: The score declined from 1 to 0 because the head of government and legislative representatives were not freely elected.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 0 / 4

Transnistrian politics have long been built on personal business interests, nepotism, and favoritism. There are few visible safeguards against official corruption.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 1 / 4

Although officials publish some government information on websites and are occasionally interviewed by media outlets about their policies, the public is generally excluded from decision-making processes, and governmental openness and transparency are limited in practice.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 12 / 60D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 4 / 16*D1. Are there free and independent media? 0 / 4

Authorities closely monitor and control the public media, and Sheriff Enterprises dominates private broadcasting, leading to widespread self-censorship. The territory's few independent print outlets have limited circulation. Critical reporting can result in reprisals including criminal charges. The government also uses bureaucratic obstruction and withholding of information to inhibit independent journalism.

Legislation adopted in 2016 gave authorities even greater control over state media outlets, including the power to appoint editorial staff, and enabled officials to limit media access to their activities and bar the use of recording devices.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 2 / 4

Most of the population is Orthodox Christian, and authorities have denied registration to several smaller religious groups, which at times face harassment by police and Orthodox opponents. The law imposes restrictions and penalties related to unauthorized distribution of religious literature, preaching in public spaces, and organized religious activities in residential buildings. Foreign religious groups are not permitted to register, and foreign individuals may not found or join registered groups.

Jehovah's Witnesses have been unable to obtain registration in Transnistria. Members of the Muslim community report a reluctance to openly practice their faith due to past intimidation by authorities, and they have struggled to advance plans to establish a mosque in Tiraspol.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 1 / 4

Academics and students may take part in international forums, but potential reprisals by Transnistrian authorities are a deterrent to participation in programs sponsored by Moldova. Academic analysis of topics such as the 1992 conflict, the role of the Russian Federation and peacekeeping forces, and Transnistrian statehood are subject to censorship.

The few Latin-script schools in Transnistria that are overseen by the Moldovan state face pressure from Transnistrian authorities.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 1 / 4

Legal restrictions on certain kinds of speech discourage free discussion. Among other provisions related to defamation or insult of the authorities, the criminal code penalizes public expression of disrespect for the Russian peacekeeping mission.

The de facto authorities prosecute dissidents, civic activists, and ordinary social media users, inhibiting expression by other residents. In June 2021, the Apriori Center, a nongovernmental organization (NGO) that provides legal advice and education, reported on several cases where territorial authorities lodged criminal cases against journalists, authors, and ordinary residents during its 2017–21 reporting period; in one of these cases, resident Pavel Dogar faced charges for commenting on the presence of Russian peacekeepers via social media.

Pensioner Serghei Mirovici, who received a three-year prison sentence for "extremism" and "insulting the president" via social media in 2019, remained imprisoned in 2021. Mirovici began a hunger strike in November.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 1 / 12E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 0 / 4

Freedom of assembly is tightly restricted. Authorities consistently reject applications for permits to hold meetings and protests, and participants in unauthorized actions face administrative penalties or criminal prosecution.

Territorial authorities reportedly pressured the organizers of a film festival to cancel their July and August 2021 activities in Transnistria. Events scheduled within the territory were cancelled and organizers moved their activities to Chişinău.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 1 / 4

NGOs and civic activists operate in a repressive environment. Groups that work on human rights issues or other topics deemed politically sensitive are subject to surveillance and harassment.

A 2018 law requires more burdensome reporting by NGOs, including on foreign funding, and prohibits foreign-backed NGOs from engaging in broadly defined “political activities.” In May 2021, the Apriori Center announced that the European Court of Human Rights (ECHR) would hear its complaint against the NGO law; territorial prosecutors had found that Apriori was engaging in proscribed “political activities.”

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 0 / 4

The trade union system in Transnistria has not been reformed since the Soviet era, and unions are manipulated by the political leadership in practice. Independent labor activism is not tolerated.

F. RULE OF LAW: 2 / 16F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 0 / 4

The judiciary serves the interests of the political authorities and Sheriff Enterprises. The ECHR has asserted that Moscow is responsible for the decisions of Transnistrian courts, which do not meet minimum standards of fairness.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 0 / 4

Security and law enforcement agencies in Transnistria regularly engage in arbitrary arrests and detentions and deny detainees access to attorneys. Trials and other criminal proceedings lack safeguards for due process and are frequently held without public scrutiny, with the outcomes announced after the fact.

Adrian Glijin was abducted by territorial security forces in 2020 and was accused of treason. Glijin’s family were not informed of Adrian’s condition, while his mother was only allowed to meet him in December 2021.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 1 / 4

Police mistreatment of suspects is common, and physical abuse is employed to obtain confessions. Prison conditions remain poor; denial of proper medical care has been reported. The authorities have been accused of engaging in forced disappearances and abductions in recent years.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 1 / 4

While the Transnistrian constitution guarantees people's rights and freedoms "without distinction as to sex, race, nationality, language, religion," and other such categories, these protections are frequently violated with impunity. Members of certain minorities, including Moldovan speakers and most notably Roma, face discrimination and harassment. Women are also subject to discrimination in practice; among other problems, they are formally excluded from numerous occupations that are considered hazardous or physically difficult. Same-sex sexual activity is illegal in Transnistria, and members of the LGBT+ community generally do not identify themselves publicly due to widespread government and societal discrimination.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 5 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 2 / 4

Approximately 300,000 people in Transnistria hold Moldovan citizenship and can travel freely to European Union countries. Since 2018, Transnistria residents have been able to obtain neutral license plates for use on international roads. Moldovan authorities began recognizing Transnistrian educational documents that year.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 1 / 4

Full private property rights are only recognized for housing; other property rights, including land ownership, remain restricted. Procedures for establishing a private business are hampered by bureaucratic impediments.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 1 / 4

Same-sex marriage is not permitted. Domestic violence is a persistent concern, and it is not considered a criminal offense in the absence of serious physical injury. However, the problem has become more public in recent years, including through television reports. Dedicated services, including psychological aid, a hotline for victims, and shelters, are operated by NGOs supported by international donors.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 1 / 4

Economic opportunity remains very limited. Sheriff Enterprises dominates the economy. Despite increased international aid meant to ensure better opportunities for women, many still fall victim to traffickers who subject them to forced labor or sex work.

West Bank

Population: 2,949,000

Freedom Status: Not Free

Note: Prior to its 2011 edition, Freedom in the World featured one report for Israeli-occupied portions of the West Bank and Gaza Strip and another for Palestinian-administered portions. Freedom in the World reports assess the level of political rights and civil liberties in a given geographical area, regardless of whether they are affected by the state, nonstate actors, or foreign powers. Disputed territories are sometimes assessed separately if they meet certain criteria, including boundaries that are sufficiently stable to allow year-on-year comparisons. For more information, see the report methodology and FAQ.

Overview: Israel's military occupation of the West Bank entails onerous physical barriers and constraints on movement, demolition of homes and other physical infrastructure, restrictions on political rights and civil liberties, and expanding Jewish settlements that are widely considered to constitute a violation of international law. Jewish settlers in the West Bank are Israeli citizens and enjoy the same rights and liberties as other Israelis. The West Bank's Palestinian residents, excluding those living in East Jerusalem, fall under the partial jurisdiction of the Palestinian Authority (PA), which is operating with an expired presidential mandate and has no functioning legislature. The PA governs in an authoritarian manner, engaging in acts of repression against journalists and activists who present critical views on its rule. East Jerusalem Palestinians are governed directly by Israel; while a small minority of them have Israeli citizenship, most have a special residency status that denotes a restricted set of rights compared with those of Israeli citizens.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- In January, PA president Mahmoud Abbas announced that long-overdue parliamentary and presidential elections would be held in May and July, respectively. He then suspended the process in April, citing the Israeli government's refusal to allow PA election activity in East Jerusalem. Separately, a first round of PA municipal elections proceeded in December, but they were uncompetitive, with a majority of localities featuring single lists of candidates that ran unopposed.
- Regionally sponsored talks aimed at bridging the divide between Fatah, the ruling Palestinian party in the West Bank, and the Islamic Resistant Movement (Hamas), which controls the Gaza Strip, broke down after Abbas's April announcement that elections would be indefinitely postponed. Hamas boycotted the subsequent municipal-level voting in December and did not allow it to proceed in Gaza.
- The threatened eviction of Palestinian families in East Jerusalem triggered local protests in April that greatly expanded across the West Bank in May, and Israeli forces responded with excessive force, resulting in a number of deaths and injuries.
- In June, PA security forces in Hebron violently detained and physically abused civic activist Nizar Banat, who then died in custody. The killing set off widespread protests that were forcibly dispersed by Palestinian authorities.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 4 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 1 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

The PA has not held a presidential election since 2005. The four-year term of Mahmoud Abbas, who won that year with 62 percent of the vote, expired in 2009, but he has continued to rule with the support of the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO)—of which he is the chairman, and which is led by his party, Fatah. The rift between the West Bank-based PA government, under the control of Fatah, and the de facto Hamas government in the Gaza Strip has impeded the resumption of regular elections. Hamas seized control of Gaza in 2007, following its victory in the 2006 legislative elections and a period of armed clashes with Fatah that left each faction in possession of a separate territory. Successive rounds of reconciliation talks, efforts to form unity governments, and plans to hold fresh elections have failed to gain traction.

Following further negotiations with Hamas, Abbas announced in January 2021 that a presidential election would be held in July, following legislative balloting set for May. However, at the end of April he indefinitely postponed the entire election process, citing Israel's refusal to allow PA election activity in East Jerusalem. Many analysts argued that the elections were actually halted because political fragmentation within Fatah raised the risk that Hamas or Fatah splinter groups would win.

Under PA laws, the prime minister is nominated by the president and requires the support of the Palestinian Legislative Council (PLC). However, the PLC elected in 2006 was unable to function due to the Fatah-Hamas division and Israel's detention of many lawmakers. Abbas has since appointed prime ministers and cabinets without legislative approval. Over Hamas's objections, Mohammad Shtayyeh was appointed and sworn in as prime minister along with a new Fatah-led cabinet in April 2019. He remained in office as of 2021.

Israeli citizens living in West Bank settlements are able to participate in generally free and fair elections for the Israeli Knesset (parliament), which selects the Israeli government.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

Palestinians in the West Bank do not have a functioning legislative body. Elections for the 132-seat PLC have not been held since 2006, when Hamas won 74 seats and Fatah took 45. Israel's suppression of Hamas and subsequent fighting between Fatah and Hamas left the PLC unable to operate. Israeli forces have repeatedly detained elected PLC members since 2006, and the legislature's electoral mandate expired in 2010. In December 2018, President Abbas ordered the formal dissolution of the PLC, backed by a Supreme Constitutional Court ruling that also called for legislative elections within six months. Hamas rejected the decision. Abbas's April 2021 postponement of the PLC elections he had scheduled for May meant that Palestinians in the territory would continue to lack a legislature.

Israeli citizens living in West Bank settlements are able to participate in elections for the Knesset, the most recent of which took place in March 2021 and was considered generally free and fair. The majority of Palestinian residents in East Jerusalem, which Israel considers to be part of its Jerusalem municipality, do not hold Israeli citizenship and thus do not have the right to vote in Knesset elections; while noncitizen Palestinian residents of East Jerusalem are permitted to vote in Israel's Jerusalem municipal council elections, historically most have boycotted.

In December 2021, the PA held its first municipal council elections in the West Bank since 2017, but a majority of the races were uncontested, with only one candidate list—usually affiliated with Fatah—registered in a given jurisdiction. Independent lists, typically associated with powerful local families or tribes, won about 70 percent of the seats in the localities that were contested. Another round of municipal elections was set to take place in March 2022. Hamas boycotted the process.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 1 / 4

PA laws provide a credible framework for presidential and legislative elections, but neither have been held since 2005 and 2006, respectively. The Palestinian Central Elections Commission oversees elections in the West Bank and Gaza Strip. The body's nine commissioners are appointed by the president, although the law requires them to be experienced and politically impartial judges, academics, or lawyers.

Israel's Central Elections Committee oversees Knesset elections, and its Interior Ministry manages Israeli municipal elections, including in Jerusalem. These elections are generally free and fair, but unlike Israeli Jewish settlers, Palestinians in the West Bank generally lack Israeli citizenship and are excluded from participating.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 4 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 1 / 4

In addition to Fatah, a number of small Palestinian parties operate relatively freely in the West Bank. However, the PA deals harshly with supporters of Hamas and rivals of President Abbas within Fatah. The Israeli military bans parties, disrupts political gatherings, and detains and arrests political activists if they are deemed to be threats to Israeli security.

Since 2007, the PA and Israeli forces in the West Bank have collaborated in surveillance and repression of Hamas, Islamic Jihad, the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine (PFLP), and other political factions with armed wings, periodically engaging in mass arrests and closures of affiliated institutions.

East Jerusalem Palestinians can form party lists to run in the city's Israeli municipal elections, but doing so may lead to increased scrutiny by Israeli authorities, as well as harassment from Palestinians who oppose participation on the grounds that it signals acceptance of Israel's annexation of East Jerusalem, which is not internationally recognized and is widely considered a violation of international law.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 0 / 4

The repeated and indefinite postponements of presidential and legislative elections have prevented any rotation of power in the West Bank. The PA leadership has been accused of avoiding contests that could lead to victory for Hamas or Fatah factions that are not loyal to Abbas. Hamas's boycott of the December 2021 local elections again left it unrepresented in West Bank municipal councils.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 1 / 4

Israeli military authorities regularly surveil, detain, and harass individuals with explicit or suspected links to the PFLP, Hamas, Islamic Jihad, and other factions that Israel has designated as terrorist groups, in addition to members of Fatah who are suspected of militant activity. Such individuals are sometimes targeted arbitrarily or based on secret or circumstantial evidence. In addition, the Israeli military's restrictions on freedom of movement—including checkpoints, roadblocks, and permit restrictions, as well as the continuous barrier it has constructed along the West Bank side of the pre-1967 border—can impede Palestinian political organizing and activity. Foreign government donors regularly exert influence over the PA, which is heavily dependent on international aid, to promote or marginalize certain politicians or political factions.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 2 / 4

Women and members of religious and ethnic minority groups are granted equal political rights under PA laws, and both women and Christians have held PLC seats and cabinet positions, though PA politics remain dominated by Arab and Muslim men. There are legislated gender quotas for candidate lists in legislative and local elections, which tend to result in approximately 20 percent of candidates and elected officeholders being women; this pattern persisted in the December 2021 municipal elections. In some districts of the West Bank (Ramallah and Bethlehem), seats are set aside for Christian candidates.

The roughly 350,000 Palestinian residents of East Jerusalem formally have the option to apply for Israeli citizenship, though most decline for political reasons, and about half or more of those who apply each year are unsuccessful. In November 2020, an Israeli court ordered the Interior Ministry to implement a 1968 legislative clause that would facilitate the process by which young Palestinians obtain Israeli citizenship. While noncitizen residents can vote in Israeli municipal elections in Jerusalem, historically most have boycotted; non-citizens cannot vote in Knesset elections. A Palestinian Jerusalem resident who is not an Israeli citizen cannot become mayor under current Israeli law. East Jerusalem Palestinians are only able to participate in PA elections with Israel authorities' approval.

As of 2021, there were about 700,000 Jewish settlers in the West Bank, including East Jerusalem, all of whom are Israeli citizens with full political rights in Israel.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 2 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 0 / 4

The PA lacks an executive or legislature with an electoral mandate. Because the legislature has not functioned since 2007, new laws are introduced via presidential decree. The ability of the PA president and ministries to implement policy decisions is limited in practice by direct Israeli military control over much of the West Bank. The PA has virtually no ability to provide services, access farming communities, or develop water, waste management, or land resources in Area C—a largely rural area that makes up more than 60 percent of West Bank territory and is under exclusive Israeli control. The Israeli government periodically withholds the transfer of tax revenues to the PA, which affects salary payments and policy implementation.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 1 / 4

Official corruption remains a major problem that is widely recognized by the public, according to opinion surveys. The PA's Anti-Corruption Commission is responsible for implementing an anticorruption strategy, but an October 2021 report by the PA's State Audit and Administrative Control Bureau (SAACB) identified long-standing irregularities in the commission's management of its own funding. In its 2021 annual report covering developments in 2020, the Coalition for Accountability and Integrity (AMAN), a civil society group, again noted some improvements in PA legislation and policies to curb bribery and refine procurement procedures. However, ensuring basic transparency, combating favoritism in appointments and promotions, and properly implementing existing anticorruption laws and policies remained prominent challenges. In June 2021, media reports revealed the appointment of 71 close relatives of senior PA officials to various government positions over the previous decade.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 1 / 4

Government transparency is generally lacking in the PA, and in the absence of basic accountability mechanisms including regular elections and legislative oversight, the administration has little incentive to make substantive improvements. Journalists, activists, and others who attempt to scrutinize PA policies or internal operations are subject to intimidation and harassment.

The operations of Israeli military authorities in the West Bank are opaque, and the Israeli military and civil administrations are not accountable to Palestinians.

ADDITIONAL DISCRETIONARY POLITICAL RIGHTS QUESTION

Is the government or occupying power deliberately changing the ethnic composition of a country or territory so as to destroy a culture or tip the political balance in favor of another group? -3 / 0

The Israeli state and associated institutions continued to preside over and promote the growth of Israeli Jewish settlements, seizures of Palestinian land, and the demolition of Palestinian homes in the West Bank in 2021. Under the pretext of unlawful construction, Israeli authorities demolished more than 900 Palestinian structures and housing units in the West Bank, including East Jerusalem, during the year; this left more than 1,200 people homeless, according to statistics compiled by the UN Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs (UN OCHA). About 80 percent of the demolitions took place in Area C, and some 20 percent occurred in East Jerusalem. The pace of demolitions has increased dramatically over the past several years, rising from fewer than 500 per year in 2017 and 2018. The Israeli Civil Administration (ICA) in the West Bank, which is overseen by the military, employs occupation policies that deny Palestinians opportunities to challenge demolition orders and allow the confiscation of portable buildings without due process. In 2018, the Knesset passed a law limiting Palestinians' direct access to the Israeli Supreme Court for petitions against the construction of Israeli Jewish settlements.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 19 / 60 (-2)D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 6 / 16 (-1)*D1. Are there free and independent media? 1 / 4

The news media are generally not free in the West Bank; journalists are surveilled and repressed by both Palestinian and Israeli authorities, and social media companies have sometimes blocked Palestinian journalists' accounts. Under PA law, journalists can be fined and jailed and newspapers closed for publishing information that might harm national unity, contradict national responsibility, or incite violence.

Common violations of media freedom by Palestinian and Israeli authorities in the West Bank include the summons, interrogation, and arrest of journalists, confiscation of equipment, and restrictions on reporting. The Palestinian Center for Development and Media Freedoms (MADA) reported a total of 314 media freedom violations committed by Israeli authorities in the West Bank and 111 committed by Palestinians in the territory, ranging from physical assaults, detentions, and torture to threats and obstruction of coverage. The organization also documented 69 violations committed by social media companies in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, noting cases in which journalists' accounts were suspended or closed or their content was restricted for allegedly violating platform rules. Facebook, for example, has shut down the pages and accounts of Palestinian journalists due to alleged incitement to violence and terrorism.

In 2017, President Abbas issued the Electronic Crimes Law (ECL), prescribing heavy fines and lengthy prison terms for a range of vaguely defined offenses, including the publication or dissemination of material that is critical of the state, disturbs public order or national unity, or harms family and religious values. The ECL has been invoked in practice by PA security forces and courts, including to order the blocking of news websites.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 2 / 4

The PA Basic Law declares Islam to be the official religion of Palestine and states that "respect and sanctity of all other heavenly religions (Judaism and Christianity) shall be maintained." Blasphemy is a criminal offense. The ECL criminalizes expression aimed at harming moral and religious values without defining those values, allowing for arbitrary enforcement.

Security-related restrictions on movement, and vandalism or physical assaults against worshippers or places of worship, affect the religious freedom of Jewish, Muslim, and Christian residents of the West Bank to varying degrees. The Israeli authorities regularly prevent Palestinian Muslims in the West Bank from reaching Jerusalem to pray, and generally restrict access for young adult males to the Temple Mount/Haram al-Sharif compound on Fridays. The compound became a site of protests and the use of excessive force by Israeli security personnel in May 2021, as tensions rose over the threatened eviction of local Palestinian families.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 2 / 4

The PA has administrative authority over Palestinian education. Political activism is common on university campuses, and student council elections generally proceed freely—an Islamist bloc sympathetic to Hamas has performed strongly in several of the past Birzeit University student council elections, for example. However, students affiliated with the bloc have been detained by Israeli and Palestinian authorities. Israeli forces periodically enter university campuses to conduct raids and arrests. Schools in the West Bank are also sometimes subjected to Israeli raids.

According to the Association for Civil Rights in Israel, East Jerusalem's schools are underfunded compared with schools in West Jerusalem, and East Jerusalem suffers from a severe shortage of classrooms.

Israeli authorities have more actively restricted visas for foreign academics attempting to visit Palestinian universities in the West Bank since 2016, according to the Right to Enter Campaign.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 1 / 4 (-1)

Residents have some freedom to engage in open private discussion, though Israeli and PA security forces are known to monitor online activity and arrest individuals for alleged incitement of violence or criticism of Palestinian authorities, respectively. In 2018, evidence emerged that the PA has engaged in extensive electronic surveillance of lawyers, activists, political figures, and others, which could have a deterrent effect on expression more broadly.

Human rights organizations have accused the PA of monitoring social media posts and detaining individuals for harsh questioning related to their comments. In recent years, individuals have been detained over posts that discussed plans for protests, denounced the government's response to the COVID-19 pandemic, allegedly defamed the authorities, or criticized the PA's relations with Israel.

In June 2021, PA security forces violently detained and physically abused Nizar Banat, a civic activist known for criticizing the PA and alleging corruption within Fatah on social media, resulting in his death in custody. Security forces then used violence and arbitrary arrests to disperse protests that were organized in response to Banat's killing.

Score Change: The score declined from 2 to 1 due to the death of an outspoken activist at the hands of PA security officers, and because the authorities' violent response to related protests served as a further deterrent to free expression.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 4 / 12 (-1)

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 1 / 4

The PA requires permits for demonstrations, and those organized to protest against the PA or its policies are generally prohibited and often violently dispersed by security forces. Following the June 2021 killing of activist and PA critic Nizar Banat, PA security personnel attacked related protests in Ramallah, detained and tortured some participants, and harassed many others, especially women.

Israel's Military Order 101 (1967) requires a permit for all political demonstrations of more than 10 people, and these permits are rarely granted in practice. Israeli Military Order 1651 (2009) is used to prosecute and sentence those accused of harming public order or engaging in alleged incitement. Israeli authorities frequently restrict and disperse demonstrations, some of which become violent, and certain protest areas are designated as closed military zones. Protesters are at risk of injury by tear-gas canisters, rubber-coated bullets, or live ammunition, and clashes between demonstrators and Israeli troops periodically result in fatalities. Israeli security agencies again used excessive force in response to protests that began in April 2021 over the threatened eviction of Palestinian families in the Sheikh Jarrah neighborhood of East Jerusalem and then greatly expanded in May.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 1 / 4 (-1)

A broad range of nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) operate in the West Bank. However, Israeli restrictions on movement can impede civil society activity, Islamist groups have been periodically shut down by Israeli or PA officials, and activists who criticize the PA leadership can face harassment and abuse by security services.

A 2017 Israeli law bars entry for any foreign individual who publicly supports a boycott of Israel or its West Bank settlements. Among other applications, the law was used in 2019 to expel Omar Shakir, the Israel and Palestine representative for Human Rights Watch (HRW), for his advocacy against Israeli settlements in the West Bank.

In June and July 2021, Israeli authorities raided the offices, ordered the closure, and arrested staff members of two Palestinian NGOs, the Union of Health Work Committees and the Union of Agricultural Work Committees. In October, the Israeli government designated six Palestinian NGOs and human rights organizations, including the Union of Agricultural Work Committees, as "terrorist organizations." It provided little evidence that the groups, some of which received funding from European governments, had links to militant activity, and the move was criticized by international human rights organizations and UN experts as an attack on the broader Palestinian human rights movement.

In March 2021, the PA issued amendments to the law governing the work of the NGOs and charitable organizations, imposing onerous reporting requirements and intrusive financial controls on such groups. NGO representatives harshly criticized the amendments, arguing that they could effectively subordinate the civil society sector to PA government ministries.

Score Change: The score declined from 2 to 1 because the PA asserted greater regulatory control over NGOs through a decree issued in March, and because the Israeli government designated six Palestinian civil society groups as terrorist organizations in October.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 2 / 4

Workers may establish unions without PA government authorization, but labor protections in general are poorly enforced. Palestinian workers seeking to strike must submit to arbitration by the PA Labor Ministry, and various other rules make it difficult to mount a legal strike. Palestinian workers in Jerusalem are subject to Israeli labor law.

The PA exerts pressure on unions with the aim of co-opting them or ensuring Fatah's dominance in their leadership and composition. Nevertheless, a critic of the PA, Nadia Habash, was elected as head of the Engineers' Association in August 2021. Separately in March, the Doctors' Association began a strike over the PA's dismissal of their labor agreement; the head of the association and two other members were arrested by PA security forces in May. The Bar Association held multiple strikes and protests during the year, protesting interference by PA security forces, human rights violations, and lack of judicial independence.

F. RULE OF LAW: 4 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 2 / 4

Palestinians in the West Bank are subject to the jurisdiction of both the Palestinian judiciary and the Israeli military court system, neither of which is fully independent. In 2019, President Abbas issued two decrees, the first dissolving the existing High Judicial Council and replacing it with a transitional body, and the second lowering the retirement age of judges. Although the transitional council included former members of the High Judicial Council, it was given an expanded mandate to restructure the judicial system. In December 2020, Abbas issued additional decrees that further consolidated his control over key judicial bodies and the appointment, retirement, and dismissal of judges.

Enforcement of judicial decisions is impeded by PA noncompliance as well as lack of Palestinian jurisdiction in Area C, where the Israeli military exerts exclusive control.

The Israeli civilian courts, which have jurisdiction over Israeli Jewish settlers in the West Bank, are independent.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 1 / 4

The opaque distinction between criminal and security-related offenses, the regular use of detention without trial by both Palestinian and Israeli security forces, and the Israeli state's use of martial law and a military court system that applies exclusively to Palestinians in the West Bank all violate the due process rights of Palestinians. Israeli Jewish settlers are tried in Israeli civilian courts, which generally provide due process protections.

Human rights groups regularly document allegations of arbitrary detention by PA security forces. Palestinians are also detained without charges for extended periods by Israeli authorities. The Israeli military frequently conducts home raids without a warrant. According to Addameer Prisoner Support and Human Rights Association, there were approximately 4,550 Palestinian security detainees and prisoners from the West Bank being held in Israeli prisons as of December 2021, including 170 Palestinian minors from the occupied territories. Detained minors are usually interrogated without a lawyer or parental guardian present and are tried by a special military court that has been criticized for a lack of due process protections. East Jerusalem Palestinian minors are tried in Israeli civilian juvenile courts.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 0 / 4

Penal codes applicable in the West Bank permit capital punishment, but no executions have been carried out since 2005. In 2018, the State of Palestine became a signatory to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, which tightly restricts the use of capital punishment.

Physical abuse of detainees by PA authorities in the West Bank has been documented by human rights organizations. There is also substantial evidence of the use of physical and psychological abuse by the Israeli military.

Israeli soldiers accused of excessive force or abuse of Palestinian civilians are subject to Israeli military law, though convictions, which are very rare, typically result in light sentences. The Israeli human rights group B'Tselem has estimated that the chance of a complaint leading to an indictment is just 3 percent. UN OCHA reported that a total of 78

Palestinians were killed by Israeli security forces in the West Bank, including East Jerusalem, during 2021.

Israeli Jewish settlers who attack Palestinian individuals, property, and agricultural resources generally enjoy impunity and de facto protection from the Israeli army. B'Tselem documented 451 settler attacks on Palestinians and their property, including more than 200 that involved physical assault or live ammunition, from 2020 through September 2021. When Israeli security forces were present, they typically stood by or participated in the attacks.

Israeli security personnel and settlers also continue to face attacks by Palestinians, though on a smaller scale. According to UN OCHA, three Israelis were killed by Palestinians in the West Bank during 2021.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 1 / 4

The legal arrangements operative in the West Bank are fundamentally discriminatory: Israelis and Palestinians who reside or commit crimes in the same location are subject to different courts and laws. In January 2021, B'Tselem published a position paper concluding that the Israeli-imposed occupation regime in the West Bank, combined and contrasted with conditions inside Israel, met the definition of “apartheid” under international law, meaning it used systematic oppression to maintain the domination of one racial or ethnic group over another. Similarly, in April 2021, HRW published a report supported by wealth of evidence to make the case that the Israeli state is guilty of apartheid and persecution—crimes against humanity under international law.

While some PA laws and policies are designed to uphold equality for women and improve their status, these limited protections are often subordinated in practice to discriminatory societal norms, and enforcement is lacking. Palestinian women are underrepresented in most professions and encounter discrimination in employment, though they have equal access to universities. Women are legally excluded from what are deemed dangerous occupations. Gender-based harassment and violence remain major problems. Among Israelis, women are treated equally in Israeli criminal and civil courts and have achieved substantial parity within Israeli society, though economic and other forms of discrimination persist.

Although LGBT+ people in the West Bank do not face prosecution for same-sex sexual activity, they have been subject to harassment and abuse by PA authorities and members of society, and there are no PA laws that specifically prohibit discrimination based on sexual orientation or gender identity. Discrimination based on sexual orientation is illegal under the laws that apply to Israelis, though LGBT+ people continue to face bias in some Israeli communities. Gay and transgender Israelis are permitted to serve openly in the military.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 5 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 1 / 4

Israeli checkpoints, travel permits, and other restrictions continue to seriously constrain freedom of movement, stunt trade, and limit Palestinian access to jobs, hospitals, and schools.

The Israeli separation barrier, 85 percent of which lies in West Bank territory and which was declared illegal in 2004 by the International Court of Justice, divides Palestinian communities and causes general hardship and disruption of services.

East Jerusalem Palestinians are vulnerable to revocation of their residency status if they leave the city for extended periods of time, affecting their freedom to travel, or if they are deemed to be a threat to public safety, security, or the state of Israel.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 1 / 4

While Palestinians are able to own property and engage in business activity, their rights are seriously undermined by Israeli movement and access restrictions and the expansion of Israeli Jewish settlements, which is encouraged by the Israeli government and private groups. Israeli authorities employ a variety of methods to prevent Palestinians from developing their privately owned land, particularly in Area C, for example by declaring nature reserves, denying permit requests, and demolishing structures. Palestinian property is also illegally damaged by Israeli settlers.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 2 / 4

Palestinian laws and societal norms, derived in part from Islamic law, put women at a disadvantage in matters such as marriage and divorce. For Palestinian Christians and Israeli Jewish settlers, personal status issues are governed by their respective religious courts, which can also impose some disadvantages on women. Rape and domestic abuse remain underreported and frequently go unpunished, as authorities are allegedly reluctant to pursue such cases.

The problem of so-called honor killings and other gender-based violence persists in the West Bank. A 2018 PA law amended a provision in the penal code that had been used to grant leniency to the perpetrators of honor killings, prohibiting its application in cases of serious crimes against women and children. However, activists argue that the practical effects of these changes have been minimal.

Unemployment rates in the Palestinian territories are high compared with the rest of the Middle East and global averages. The excess supply of workers creates conditions in which labor exploitation is more likely. PA laws restricting child labor are not effectively enforced.

Many West Bank Palestinians, most of them male, work in Israel and the settlements, where the PA has no jurisdiction. While these workers are covered by Israeli labor laws, the International Labour Organization (ILO) reported in 2018 that inconsistent application of these laws remains a concern. The Palestinians' work permits usually tie them to a single employer, creating a relationship of dependency, according to the ILO. Nonetheless, some laborers have achieved collective bargaining agreements with their Israeli employers. Tens of thousands of Palestinians work without permits, making them vulnerable to greater exploitation. Many Palestinians lose considerable income to brokers who connect Palestinian workers to Israeli employers.

Western Sahara*

Freedom Status: Not Free

Note: Freedom in the World reports assess the level of political rights and civil liberties in a given geographical area, regardless of whether they are affected by the state, nonstate actors, or foreign powers. Disputed territories are sometimes assessed separately if they meet certain criteria, including boundaries that are sufficiently stable to allow year-on-year comparisons. For more information, see the report methodology and FAQ.

Overview: Morocco has claimed authority over Western Sahara since 1975, but the United Nations considers it a “non-self-governing territory.” Morocco controls the most populous area along the Atlantic coastline, more than three-quarters of the territory; this area, which Rabat calls the “Southern Provinces,” is represented in that country’s parliament. The Polisario Front controls land in Western Sahara’s eastern and southern reaches. Rabat regularly offers autonomy, but the Polisario demands an independence referendum. A long-promised referendum on Western Sahara’s status has never been held. A 1991 UN-brokered cease-fire deteriorated in 2020. Civil liberties are severely restricted in Moroccan-controlled territory, especially relating to independence activism; civil liberties are similarly curtailed in Polisario-controlled territory.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- In April, a Moroccan drone killed Polisario Front commander Addah al-Bendir as he reportedly led an attack along the sand berm separating Moroccan- and Polisario-controlled territory.
- Also in April, Polisario Front leader Ibrahim Ghali sought COVID-19 treatment in Spain. Moroccan authorities reportedly retaliated by allowing thousands of migrants to enter the Spanish enclave of Ceuta in May. Ghali left for Algeria in June.
- In October, UN Secretary-General António Guterres appointed Staffan de Mistura as his envoy to Western Sahara; de Mistura succeeded former German president Horst Köhler, who left the post in 2019.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: -3 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 0 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

Morocco controls more than three-quarters of Western Sahara, and Moroccan authorities allow no proindependence candidates to run for office.

The Polisario Front is based in Tindouf, Algeria. It leads a nationalist movement comprised of members of the Sahrawi ethnic group and controls the less-populated interior of the territory. The constitution of the government-in-exile states that the leader of the Polisario Front—currently Ibrahim Ghali—is the territory’s president, but it does not hold regular elections within the territory.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

In the Moroccan-controlled portion of the territory, voters elect 13 representatives to the parliament in Rabat. Turnout in municipal and parliamentary elections in Western Sahara is difficult to ascertain, but reports are that it is chronically low.

The Sahrawi Arab Democratic Republic (SADR), the breakaway government, maintains a 51-member Sahrawi National Council, which is indirectly elected by the General Popular Congress of the Polisario Front. Most voting occurs in refugee camps in Algeria. The Polisario Front organizes the elections and does not allow any political parties to compete.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 0 / 4

The electoral framework is not fair, given the constraints on representation in Moroccan-controlled territory, the prohibition of any candidate who challenges Moroccan control of the territory to run for Parliament, and Moroccan control of the media.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 0 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 0 / 4

The Polisario Front, which controls the government-in-exile and the eastern and southern portions of the territory, does not allow other political parties to compete. In recent years, it has cracked down on political dissent, imprisoning a number of opponents.

In Moroccan-controlled areas, the Polisario Front is banned, and proindependence parties are not allowed to form.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 0 / 4

Since political parties that advocate for Sahrawi independence or autonomy cannot function in Moroccan-controlled areas, the most salient opposition elements cannot gain power through elections. No credible opposition exists in territory controlled by the Polisario Front due to the ban on other political parties.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 0 / 4

People's political choices in Moroccan-controlled areas are dominated by Rabat. The government-in-exile in Tindouf is ostensibly autonomous but works closely with Algerian authorities. As a "non-self-governing territory," the people in the region are unable to elect an independent government.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 0 / 4

Due to the territory's status and lack of sovereignty, no segment of the population has full political rights or electoral opportunities. However, women play a significant role in political activism. Many women are leaders in the independence movement and organize the refugee camps in Algeria.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 0 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 0 / 4

Western Sahara has no freely elected leaders. Representatives from Moroccan-controlled territory serve in the lower house of the Moroccan parliament, which is dominated by the monarchy. The monarch and his circle of advisers and associates—collectively known as the Makhzen ("central storehouse")—effectively determine government policy regarding the territory. The Polisario Front governs portions of the territory in its control.

The Polisario has long accused Rabat of exploiting Western Sahara's natural resources. Morocco–European Union (EU) trade agreements have included Polisario-claimed territory even as legal disputes were being considered. The European Parliament approved agricultural and fisheries agreements with Morocco in 2019, the latter of which was approved by the European Council that year. While a European Court of Justice (ECJ) ruling required the EU to seek local consent on agreements covering the disputed territory, the Polisario Front did not participate in consultations on the agreements and sought redress at the ECJ. In September 2021, the General Court of the EU annulled the agreements for lack of local consent but left them in effect pending possible appeal.

Corruption among Moroccan state officials is widespread and investigations are rare. Corruption occurs primarily to facilitate the exploitation of natural resources—phosphates, hydrocarbons, and fisheries—by Moroccan and international interests. In Tindouf, official corruption among members of the Polisario is similarly widespread.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 0 / 4

Morocco's restrictive access to information laws apply to Western Sahara. Information about Western Sahara is nearly nonexistent, which severely limits transparency. The Moroccan government publishes budget and financial information online, and public officials—including parliament members, judges, and civil servants—are required to declare their assets. However, nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) assert that many officials do not provide this information, and the law provides no penalties for noncompliance.

ADDITIONAL DISCRETIONARY POLITICAL RIGHTS QUESTION

Is the government or occupying power deliberately changing the ethnic composition of a country or territory so as to destroy a culture or tip the political balance in favor of another group? -3 / 0

Before and since the establishment of the UN Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara (MINURSO) in 1991, Rabat endeavored to change the population's balance in its favor. By some accounts, Moroccans now outnumber Sahrawis in Western Sahara. Despite this apparent trend, Morocco continues to work to prevent a referendum over the territory's final status. Morocco constructed a sand berm to divide territory under its control from Sahrawi-controlled territory in the east.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 7 / 60D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 3 / 16*D1. Are there free and independent media? 0 / 4

Some pro-Sahrawi media outlets do operate, such as the all-volunteer Equipe Media group, but they face regular harassment by Moroccan authorities, who ensure that reporting does not dispute Morocco's sovereignty over Western Sahara. The Moroccan 2016 Press Code prohibits challenges to "territorial integrity," which potentially criminalizes independent journalism that focuses on Western Sahara. Print outlets found to violate this provision risk suspension, while news sites face potential blocking. Journalists accused of challenging Morocco's territorial integrity could face prison sentences of between six months and two years.

International media are carefully vetted and scrutinized during their visits to Moroccan-controlled territory. Reporters visiting Tindouf are said to enjoy greater freedom of movement and inquiry, but such claims are difficult to substantiate. In Polisario-controlled territory, press freedoms are also limited, with television and radio coverage reflecting the ideology and viewpoints of the Polisario. Some exiled groups provide coverage from outside Western Sahara. Internet access is limited throughout the territory.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 2 / 4

Moroccan authorities generally do not interfere with religious practices, although as in Morocco proper, mosques are closely monitored by authorities. Moroccan law prohibits any efforts to convert a Muslim to another faith. It is illegal to publicly criticize Islam.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 0 / 4

Educators practice self-censorship around the status of Western Sahara, as Moroccan law criminalizes debate that calls this into question. Other sensitive topics include the monarchy and Islam. The University of Tifariti was established in 2013 as the first university in Polisario-controlled territory.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 1 / 4

As in Morocco proper, there is concern about state surveillance of online activity and personal communications, and people do not feel free to speak privately about the status of Western Sahara and other sensitive topics. Freedom of expression is profoundly curtailed in Polisario-controlled areas as well.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 0 / 12E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 0 / 4

Demonstrations and protests are broken up regularly, particularly on sensitive issues such as self-determination and Sahrawi prisoners held by Moroccan authorities. Protesters are frequently arrested and beaten.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 0 / 4

NGOs that advocate for independence or question Islam as the state religion are denied official registration by the Moroccan government. Organizations that meet the government's criteria are frequently denied registration as well. Foreign NGO representatives observing the human rights situation of Moroccan-controlled areas have been expelled.

In March 2021, Amnesty International and Human Rights Watch (HRW) reported that Moroccan security forces maintained an active presence near the home of proindependence activist Sultana Khaya, who resides in the territory.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 0 / 4

Moroccan unions are present but are largely inactive in Western Sahara. Government restrictions limit the right to strike. Most union members work for the Moroccan government.

The Polisario Front has a trade union called the Sahrawi Trade Union (UGTSARIO), which is also inactive; there is little economic activity in the refugee camps in Tindouf, and there is no functioning labor market in Polisario-controlled territory.

F. RULE OF LAW: 0 / 16F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 0 / 4

Courts in Western Sahara are controlled by Morocco and their rulings reflect Rabat's interests. Executive interference and corruption significantly impede judicial independence.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 0 / 4

Due process rights are not respected. A group of Sahrawis imprisoned in 2017 over the 2010 deaths of Moroccan security personnel were allegedly tortured before confessing.

Proindependence advocates and other civil society leaders are often arbitrarily arrested, particularly in the aftermath of demonstrations. International human rights groups view many Sahrawis in Moroccan prisons as political prisoners.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 0 / 4

The Moroccan military and the Polisario Front have engaged in regular fighting since the late-2020 collapse of a cease-fire; the Polisario Front uses guerrilla tactics against Moroccan forces, regularly targeting personnel deployed along the sand berm. In April 2021, a Moroccan drone killed Polisario commander Addah al-Bendir as he reportedly led an attack along the berm. In November, the Algerian government claimed that Moroccan forces killed three Algerians traveling on a road that passes through the territory.

In October 2021, UN Secretary-General Guterres appointed Staffan de Mistura as his envoy to Western Sahara; de Mistura succeeded former German president Horst Köhler, who left the post in 2019. Also in October 2021, the UN Security Council renewed MINURSO's mandate for one year.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 0 / 4

Sahrawis experience discrimination in access to education and employment. According to Sahrawi activists, Moroccan settlers are favored by employers in the phosphate mining industry, which is a predominant source of employment.

Women play leadership roles at the Sahrawi camps in Algeria, and some Sahrawi have described life in these camps as matriarchal. However, cultural norms also dictate that women stay at home and manage the household.

Moroccan law prohibits same-sex sexual acts.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 4 / 16G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 1 / 4

Morocco and the Polisario Front both restrict free movement in Western Sahara. The sand berm, constructed by Morocco in the 1980s, is 1,700 miles long. The wall, which is surrounded on both sides by land mines, constitutes what may be the longest continuous minefield in the world.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 1 / 4

The territory's occupied status leaves property rights insecure. No credible free market exists within the territory. The SADR government routinely signs contracts with firms for the exploration of oil and gas, although these cannot be implemented given the territory's status.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 2 / 4

In Polisario-controlled territory and in Tindouf, women have a relatively higher social status than in Morocco. However, social freedoms are curtailed. Moroccan law criminalizes both adultery and premarital sex. Spousal rape is not considered a crime.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 0 / 4

Economic opportunity is inhibited by the territory's undetermined status. The economic activity generated by companies that exploit the country's natural resources generally does not benefit the Sahrawi population. Sex trafficking, often affecting young girls, takes place in coastal fishing villages.

Freedom in the World 2022

Methodology Questions

POLITICAL RIGHTS

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? (Note: Heads of government chosen through various electoral frameworks, including direct elections for president, indirect elections for prime minister by parliament, and the electoral college system for electing presidents, are covered under this question. In cases of indirect elections for the head of government, the elections for the legislature or other body that chose the head of government, as well as the selection process for the head of government itself, should be taken into consideration. In systems where executive authority is formally divided between a head of state and a head of government, greater weight should be given to elections for the official with the most executive authority.)

- Did independent, established, and reputable national and/or international election monitoring organizations judge the most recent election for head of government to have met democratic standards?
- Was the most recent election for head of government called in a timely manner, without undue, politically motivated delays or an accelerated schedule that unfairly limited campaign opportunities for some candidates?
- Was the registration of voters and candidates conducted in an accurate, timely, transparent, and nondiscriminatory manner?
- Were women allowed to register and run as candidates?
- Could all candidates make speeches, hold public meetings, and enjoy fair or proportionate media access throughout the campaign, free of intimidation?
- Did voting take place by secret ballot?
- Were voters able to vote for the candidate or party of their choice without undue pressure or intimidation?
- Was the vote count transparent and timely, and were the official results reported honestly to the public?
- Could election monitors from independent groups and representing parties/candidates watch the counting of votes to ensure its honesty?
- Did voters have equal access to polling places and opportunities to cast ballots?
- Has the most recently elected head of government been removed from office through violent, irregular, unconstitutional, or otherwise undemocratic means? (Note: Although a bloodless coup may ultimately lead to a positive outcome—particularly if it removes a head of government who was not freely and fairly elected—the new leader has not been freely and fairly elected and cannot be treated as such.)
- Has the head of government's electorally mandated term expired or been extended without new elections?

- In cases where elections for regional, provincial, or state governors and/or other subnational executive officials differ significantly in conduct from national elections, does the conduct of the subnational elections reflect an opening toward improved political rights in the country, or, alternatively, a worsening of political rights?

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections?

- Did independent, established, and reputable domestic and/or international election monitoring organizations judge the most recent national legislative elections to have met democratic standards?
- Were the most recent legislative elections called in a timely manner, without undue, politically motivated delays or an accelerated schedule that unfairly limited campaign opportunities for some parties or candidates?
- Was the registration of voters and candidates conducted in an accurate, timely, transparent, and nondiscriminatory manner?
- Were women allowed to register and run as candidates?
- Could all candidates make speeches, hold public meetings, and enjoy fair or proportionate media access throughout the campaign, free of intimidation?
- Did voting take place by secret ballot?
- Were voters able to vote for the candidate or party of their choice without undue pressure or intimidation?
- Was the vote count transparent and timely, and were the official results reported honestly to the public?
- Could election monitors from independent groups and representing parties/candidates watch the counting of votes to ensure its honesty?
- Have members of the most recently elected national legislature been removed from office through violent, irregular, unconstitutional, or otherwise undemocratic means? (Note: Although a bloodless coup may ultimately lead to a positive outcome—particularly if it removes a legislature that was not freely and fairly elected—an appointed postcoup legislative body has not been freely and fairly elected and cannot be treated as such.)
- Has the legislature's electorally mandated term expired or been extended without new elections?
- In cases where elections for subnational councils/parliaments differ significantly in conduct from national elections, does the conduct of the subnational elections reflect an opening toward improved political rights in the country, or, alternatively, a worsening of political rights?

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies?

- Is there a clear, detailed, and fair legislative framework for conducting elections? (Note: Changes to electoral laws should not be made immediately preceding an election if these changes infringe on the ability of voters, candidates, or parties to fulfill their roles in the election.)
- Does the composition of election commissions ensure their independence?
- Are election commissions or other election authorities free from government or other pressure and interference?
- Do adult citizens enjoy universal and equal suffrage?

- Is the drawing of election districts conducted in a fair and nonpartisan manner, as opposed to malapportionment or gerrymandering for personal or partisan advantage?
- Has the selection of a system for choosing legislative representatives (such as proportional versus majoritarian) been improperly manipulated to advance certain political interests or to influence the electoral results?
- Are procedures for changing the electoral framework at the constitutional level, including referendums, carried out fairly and transparently, with adequate opportunity for public debate and discussion?

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings?

- Do political parties encounter undue legal or practical obstacles in their efforts to form and operate, including onerous registration requirements, excessively large membership requirements, etc.?
- Do parties face discriminatory or onerous restrictions in holding meetings or rallies, accessing the media, or engaging in other peaceful activities?
- Are laws and regulations governing party financing fair and equitably enforced? Do they impose excessive obstacles to political and campaign activity, or give an effective advantage to certain parties?
- Are party members or leaders intimidated, harassed, arrested, imprisoned, or subjected to violent attacks as a result of their peaceful political activities?
- In systems dominated by political parties, can independent candidates register and operate freely?

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections?

- Are various legal/administrative restrictions selectively applied to opposition parties to prevent them from increasing their support base or successfully competing in elections?
- Are there genuine opposition forces in positions of authority, such as in the national legislature or in subnational governments?
- Does intimidation, harassment, arrest, imprisonment, or violent attack as a result of peaceful political activities affect the ability of opposition party members or leaders to increase their support or gain power through elections?
- Is there a significant opposition vote?
- Did major opposition parties choose to boycott the most recent elections rather than participate in a flawed process?

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means?

- Do entities that are external to the political system (the military, foreign powers, economic oligarchies, criminal organizations, armed militants, or any other powerful group) intimidate, harass, or attack voters or political figures in order to influence their political choices?
 - Do such groups offer bribes or other incentives to voters or political figures in order to influence their political choices?
 - Do entities within the political system, such as major parties and incumbent leaders, use extrapolitical means (corrupt patronage networks, control over land or employment, control over security forces, control over party militias, manipulation of state institutions or resources) to exert improper influence over the political choices of voters or political figures?

- Do traditional or religious leaders use extrapolitical means (control over communal land or resources, bribes or economic incentives, violence or intimidation) to exert improper influence over the political choices of voters or political figures?
- Do major private or public-sector employers directly or indirectly control the political choices of their workers?
- Do major private donors to political parties or causes use opaque or illegal methods to exert improper influence over voters or political figures?
- Does the formal structure of the political system give overriding authority to entities that are not accountable to voters (hereditary monarchs, religious hierarchies, unelected military or party officials, the sole legal party in one-party states), thus excluding the public from meaningful political participation?

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities?

- Do national political parties of various ideological persuasions address issues of specific concern to these groups?
- When other parties fail to address the interests of certain groups, are political parties that are focused on those groups—provided they espouse peaceful, democratic values—legally permitted and de facto allowed to operate?
- Does the government inhibit the participation of certain groups in national or subnational political life through laws and/or practical obstacles—for example, by limiting access to voter registration or failing to publish public documents in certain languages?
- Are the interests of women represented in political parties—for example, through party manifestos that address gender issues, gender equality policies within parties, and mechanisms to ensure women's full and equal participation in internal party elections and decision-making?
- Are there unusually excessive or discriminatory barriers to acquiring citizenship that effectively deny political rights to a majority or large portion of the native-born or legal permanent population, or is citizenship revoked to produce a similar result?

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? (Note: Because the score for question C1 is partly dependent on the presence of a freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives, under most circumstances it will not exceed the average of the scores for questions A1 and A2.)

- Are the candidates who were elected freely and fairly duly installed in office, and were they able to form a functioning government within a reasonable period of time?
- Do other appointed or non-freely elected state actors interfere with or prevent freely elected representatives from adopting and implementing legislation and making meaningful policy decisions?
- Do nonstate actors, including criminal gangs and insurgent groups, interfere with or prevent elected representatives from adopting and implementing legislation and making meaningful policy decisions?

- Do the armed forces or other security services control or enjoy a preponderant influence over government policy and activities, including in countries that are nominally under civilian control?
- Do foreign governments control or enjoy a preponderant influence over government policy and activities by means including the presence of foreign military troops and the use of significant economic threats or sanctions? (Note: If a treaty was signed and ratified by a freely elected government, adherence to that treaty is typically not considered an improper external influence on policymaking, even if it limits a government's options in practice.)
- Is the freely elected government able to implement its decisions across the entire territory without interference from nonstate actors?
- Does the executive exhibit excessive dominance over the legislature?
- Has partisan polarization or obstructionism seriously impaired basic executive or legislative functions, such as approving a budget or filling important vacancies?

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective?

- Has the government implemented effective anticorruption laws or programs to prevent, detect, and punish corruption among public officials, including conflicts of interest?
- Is the government free from excessive bureaucratic regulations, registration requirements, or other controls that increase opportunities for corruption?
- Are there independent and effective auditing and investigative bodies that function without impediment or political pressure or influence?
- Are allegations of corruption involving government officials thoroughly investigated and prosecuted without prejudice or political bias?
- Are allegations of corruption given extensive and substantive airing in the media?
- Do whistleblowers, anticorruption activists, investigators, and journalists enjoy legal protections that allow them to freely and safely report abuses?

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency?

- Do citizens have the legal right and practical ability to obtain information about state operations and the means to petition government agencies for it?
 - Does the government publish information online, in machine-readable formats, for free, and is this information accessible by default?
 - Are civil society groups, interest groups, journalists, and other citizens given a fair and meaningful opportunity to comment on and influence pending policies or legislation?
 - Are elected representatives accessible to their constituents?
 - Is the budget-making process subject to meaningful legislative review and public scrutiny?
 - Does the state ensure transparency and effective competition in the awarding of government contracts?
 - Are the asset declarations of government officials open to public and media scrutiny and verification?

ADDITIONAL DISCRETIONARY POLITICAL RIGHTS QUESTION (SEE EXPLANATION IN ANALYST GUIDELINES):

Q: Is the government or occupying power deliberately changing the ethnic composition of a country or territory so as to destroy a culture or tip the political balance in favor of another group?

- Is the government providing economic or other incentives to certain people in order to change the ethnic composition of a region or regions?
- Is the government forcibly moving people in or out of certain areas in order to change the ethnic composition of those regions?
- Is the government arresting, imprisoning, or killing members of certain ethnic groups in order change the ethnic composition of a region or regions?

CIVIL LIBERTIES

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF

D1. Are there free and independent media? (Note: “Media” refers to all relevant sources of news and commentary—including formal print, broadcast, and online news outlets, as well as social media and communication applications when they are used to gather or disseminate news and commentary for the general public. The question also applies to artistic works in any medium.)

- Are the media directly or indirectly censored?
 - Is self-censorship common among journalists (the term includes professional journalists, bloggers, and citizen journalists), especially when reporting on sensitive issues, including politics, social controversies, corruption, or the activities of powerful individuals?
 - Are journalists subject to pressure or surveillance aimed at identifying their sources?
 - Are libel, blasphemy, security, or other restrictive laws used to punish journalists who scrutinize government officials and policies or other powerful entities through either onerous fines or imprisonment?
 - Is it a crime to insult the honor and dignity of the president and/or other government officials? How broad is the range of such prohibitions, and how vigorously are they enforced?
 - If media outlets are dependent on the government for their financial survival, does the government condition funding on the outlets’ cooperation in promoting official points of view and/or denying access to opposition parties and civic critics? Do powerful private actors engage in similar practices?
 - Do the owners of private media exert improper editorial control over journalists or publishers, skewing news coverage to suit their personal business or political interests?
 - Is media coverage excessively partisan, with the majority of outlets consistently favoring either side of the political spectrum?
 - Does the government attempt to influence media content and access through means including politically motivated awarding or suspension of broadcast frequencies and newspaper registrations, unfair control and influence over printing facilities and distribution networks, blackouts of internet or mobile service, selective distribution of advertising, onerous operating requirements, prohibitive tariffs, and bribery?

- Are journalists threatened, harassed online, arrested, imprisoned, beaten, or killed by government or nonstate actors for their legitimate journalistic activities, and if such cases occur, are they investigated and prosecuted fairly and expeditiously?
- Do women journalists encounter gender-specific obstacles to carrying out their work, including threats of sexual violence or strict gender segregation?
- Are works of literature, art, music, or other forms of cultural expression censored or banned for political purposes?

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private?

- Are registration requirements employed to impede the free functioning of religious institutions?
- Are members of religious groups, including minority faiths and movements, harassed, fined, arrested, or beaten by the authorities for engaging in their religious practices?
- Is state monitoring of peaceful religious activity so indiscriminate, pervasive, or intrusive that it amounts to harassment or intimidation?
- Are religious practice and expression impeded by violence or harassment by nonstate actors?
- Does the government appoint or otherwise influence the appointment of religious leaders?
- Does the government control or restrict the production and distribution of religious writings or materials?
- Is the construction of religious buildings banned or restricted?
- Does the government place undue restrictions on religious education? Does the government require religious education?
- Are individuals free to eschew religious beliefs and practices in general?

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination?

- Are teachers and professors at both public and private institutions free to pursue academic activities of a political and quasi-political nature without fear of physical violence or intimidation by state or nonstate actors?
- Does the government pressure, strongly influence, or control the content of school curriculums for political purposes?
- Is the allocation of funding for public educational institutions free from political manipulation?
- Are student associations that address issues of a political nature allowed to function freely?
- Does the government, including through school administration or other officials, pressure students and/or teachers to support certain political figures or agendas, including by requiring them to attend political rallies or vote for certain candidates? Conversely, does the government, including through school administration or other officials, discourage or forbid students and/or teachers from supporting certain candidates and parties?

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution?

- Are people able to engage in private discussions, particularly of a political nature, in public, semipublic, or private places—including restaurants, public transportation, and their homes, in person or on the telephone—without fear of harassment or detention by the authorities or nonstate actors?

- Do users of personal online communications—including direct messages, voice or video applications, or social media accounts with a limited audience—face legal penalties, harassment, or violence from the government or powerful nonstate actors in retaliation for critical remarks?
- Does the government employ people or groups to engage in public surveillance and to report alleged antigovernment conversations to the authorities?

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS

E1. Is there freedom of assembly?

- Are peaceful protests, particularly those of a political nature, banned or severely restricted?
- Are the legal requirements to obtain permission to hold peaceful demonstrations particularly cumbersome or time-consuming?
- Are participants in peaceful demonstrations intimidated, arrested, or assaulted?
- Are peaceful protesters detained by police in order to prevent them from engaging in such actions?
- Are organizers blocked from using online media to plan or carry out a protest, for example through DDoS attacks or wholesale blackouts of internet or mobile services?
- Are similar restrictions and obstacles used to impede other public events, such as conferences, panel discussions, and town hall–style meetings?
- Are public petitions, in which citizens gather signatures to support a particular policy or initiative, banned or severely restricted?

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights– and governance-related work? (Note: This includes civic organizations, interest groups, foundations, think tanks, gender rights groups, etc.)

- Are registration and other legal requirements for nongovernmental organizations particularly onerous or intended to prevent them from functioning freely?
- Are laws related to the financing of nongovernmental organizations unduly complicated and cumbersome, or are there obstacles to citizens raising money for charitable causes or civic activism?
- Are donors and funders of nongovernmental organizations free from government pressure?
- Are members of nongovernmental organizations intimidated, arrested, imprisoned, or assaulted because of their work?

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations?

- Are trade unions allowed to be established and to operate without government interference?
 - Are workers pressured by the government or employers to join or not to join certain trade unions, and do they face harassment, violence, or dismissal from their jobs if they fail to comply?
 - Are workers permitted to engage in strikes, and do participants in peaceful strikes face reprisals? (Note: This question may not apply to workers in narrowly defined essential government services or public safety jobs.)
 - Are unions able to bargain collectively with employers and negotiate agreements that are honored in practice?
 - For states with primarily agricultural economies that do not necessarily support the formation of trade unions, does the government allow for the establishment of agricultural workers' organizations or their equivalents? Is there legislation expressly forbidding the formation of trade unions?

- Are professional organizations, including business associations, allowed to operate freely and without government interference?

F. RULE OF LAW

F1. Is there an independent judiciary?

- Is the judiciary subject to interference from the executive branch of government or from other political, economic, or religious influences?
- Are judges appointed and dismissed in a fair and unbiased manner?
- Do judges rule fairly and impartially, or do they commonly render verdicts that favor the government or particular interests, whether in return for bribes or for other reasons?
- Do executive, legislative, and other governmental authorities comply with judicial decisions, and are these decisions effectively enforced?
- Do powerful private entities comply with judicial decisions, and are decisions that run counter to the interests of powerful actors effectively enforced?

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters?

- Are defendants' rights, including the presumption of innocence until proven guilty, protected?
- Do detainees have access to independent, competent legal counsel regardless of their financial means?
- Are defendants given a fair, public, and timely hearing by a competent, independent, and impartial tribunal?
- Is access to the court system in general dependent on an individual's financial means?
- Are prosecutors independent of political control and influence?
- Are prosecutors independent of powerful private interests, whether legal or illegal?
- Do law enforcement and other security officials operate professionally, independently, and accountably?
- Do law enforcement officials make arbitrary arrests and detentions without warrants, or fabricate or plant evidence on suspects?
- Do law enforcement and other security officials fail to uphold due process because of influence by nonstate actors, including organized crime, powerful commercial interests, or other groups?

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies?

- Do law enforcement officials beat detainees during arrest or use excessive force or torture to extract confessions?
 - Are conditions in pretrial detention facilities and prisons humane and respectful of the human dignity of inmates?
 - Do citizens have the means of effective petition and redress when they suffer physical abuse by state authorities?
 - Does the law allow corporal punishment, and are such penalties employed in practice?
 - In countries that allow the death penalty, is it applied for crimes other than murder or in a manner that violates basic standards of justice?
 - Is violent crime common, either in particular areas or among the general population?

- Is the population subjected to physical harm, forced removal, or other acts of violence or terror due to civil conflict or war?

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population?

- Are members of various distinct groups—including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups—able to effectively exercise their human rights with full equality before the law?
- Is violence against such groups considered a crime, is it widespread, and are perpetrators brought to justice?
- Do members of such groups face legal and/or de facto discrimination in areas including employment, education, and housing because of their identification with a particular group?
- Do noncitizens—including migrant workers and noncitizen immigrants—enjoy basic internationally recognized human rights, including the right not to be subjected to torture or other forms of ill-treatment, the right to due process of law, and the freedoms of association, expression, and religion?
- Do the country's laws provide for the granting of asylum or refugee status in accordance with the 1951 UN Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees, its 1967 Protocol, and other regional treaties regarding refugees? Has the government established a system for providing protection to refugees, including against refoulement (the return of persons to a country where there is reason to believe they would face persecution)?

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education?

- Are there restrictions on foreign travel, including an exit visa system, which may be enforced selectively?
- Is permission required from the authorities or nonstate actors to move within the country?
- Do state or nonstate actors control or constrain a person's ability to change their type and place of employment?
- Are bribes or other inducements needed to obtain the necessary documents to travel, change one's place of residence or employment, enter institutions of higher education, or advance in school?
- Is freedom of movement impaired by general threats to physical safety, such as armed conflict? Do such threats lead to forced displacement?
- Do women enjoy the same freedom of movement as men?

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors?

- Are people legally allowed to purchase and sell land and other property, and can they do so in practice without undue interference from the government or nonstate actors?
- Do women face discrimination in property and inheritance rights?
- Is fair business competition heavily skewed by political favoritism, cronyism, or other improper interference?
- Are individuals protected from arbitrary expropriation, and do they receive adequate and timely compensation when property is seized?
- Are people legally allowed to establish and operate private businesses with a reasonable minimum of registration, licensing, and other requirements?

- Are bribes or other inducements needed to obtain the necessary legal documents to operate private businesses?
- Do private/nonstate actors, including criminal groups, seriously impede private business activities through such measures as extortion?

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance?

- Are personalized forms of violence—including domestic violence, female genital mutilation/cutting, sexual abuse, and rape—widespread, and are perpetrators brought to justice?
- Does the government directly or indirectly control choice of marriage partner or other personal relationships through means such as bans on interfaith marriages, failure to enforce laws against child marriage or dowry payments, restrictions on same-sex relationships, or criminalization of extramarital sex?
- Do individuals enjoy equal rights in divorce proceedings and child custody matters?
- Do citizenship or residency rules undermine family integrity through excessively high or discriminatory barriers for foreign spouses or transmission of citizenship to children?
- Does the government determine the number of children that a couple may have, including by denying access to or imposing birth control, or by criminalizing or imposing abortion?
- Does the government restrict individuals' choice of dress, appearance, or gender expression?
- Do private institutions or individuals, including religious groups or family members, unduly infringe on the personal social freedoms of individuals, including choice of marriage partner, family size, dress, gender expression, etc.?

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation?

- Do state or private employers exploit their workers through practices including unfairly withholding wages, permitting or forcing employees to work under unacceptably dangerous conditions, or adult slave labor and child labor?
 - Does tight government control over the economy, including through state ownership or the setting of prices and production quotas, inhibit individuals' economic opportunity?
 - Do the revenues from large state industries, including the energy sector, benefit the general population or only a privileged few?
 - Do private interests exert undue influence on the economy—through monopolistic practices, concentration of ownership, cartels, or illegal blacklists—that impedes economic opportunity for the general population?
 - Do laws, policies, or persistent socioeconomic conditions effectively impose rigid barriers to social mobility, generally preventing individuals from rising to higher income levels over the course of their lives?
 - Is the trafficking of persons for labor, sexual exploitation, forced begging, etc., widespread, and is the government taking adequate steps to address the problem?

Combined Average of the PR and CL Ratings (Freedom Rating)	Freedom Status
1.0 to 2.5	Free
3.0 to 5.0	Partly Free
5.5 to 7.0	Not Free

* It is possible for a country's total political rights score to be less than 0 (between –1 and –4) if it receives mostly or all 0s for each of the 10 PR questions and it receives a sufficiently negative score for the additional discretionary PR question. In such a case, a country would still receive a final PR rating of 7.

Sources for Freedom in the World 2022

Freedom in the World relies on analysts to assess political rights and civil liberties in each of the countries and territories covered by the report, using a combination of on-the-ground research, consultations with local contacts, and information from news articles, nongovernmental organizations, governments, and a variety of other sources. Expert advisers and regional specialists then vet the analysts' conclusions. Research is bolstered by a vigorous fact-checking process. The end product represents the consensus of the analysts, outside advisers, and Freedom House staff, who are responsible for any final decisions.

Michael J. Abramowitz, President

Freedom House supports global freedom through comprehensive analysis, dedicated advocacy, and concrete assistance for democratic activists around the world.

Founded in 1941, Freedom House has long been a vigorous proponent of the right of all individuals to be free. Eleanor Roosevelt and Wendell Willkie served as Freedom House's first honorary co-chairpersons.
