F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 4 / 4

People in Japan are generally protected from the illegitimate use of physical force and the threat of war and insurgencies. Violent crime rates are low. However, organized crime is fairly prominent, particularly in the construction and nightlife sectors; crime groups also run drug-trafficking and loan-sharking operations.

Three people were executed in 2021, having been convicted of multiple murders. Prisoners who face death sentences or are accused of crimes that could carry the death penalty are held in solitary confinement, sometimes for years at a time. There are frequent reports of substandard medical care in prisons.

Societal discrimination against foreigners and various minority groups has generally declined over time, but it can affect access to housing and employment.

A law adopted in 2016 was intended to eliminate discrimination against Japan's estimated three million burakumin—descendants of feudal-era outcasts. The law obliges national and local governments to provide advice, support, and education on the issue, but it does not assign penalties for acts of discrimination.

A 2019 law officially recognized the Ainu as an Indigenous people of Japan, though critics noted that it failed to offer an apology for past mistreatment.

Japan-born descendants of colonial subjects (particularly ethnic Koreans and Chinese) also experience discrimination. A 2016 hate speech law calls on the government to take steps to eliminate discriminatory speech against ethnic minorities, but it does not carry any penalties for perpetrators.

LGBT+ people face social stigma and in some cases harassment. There is no national law barring discrimination based on sexual orientation or gender identity. In 2016, sexual harassment regulations for national public officials were modified to prohibit harassment on the basis of sexual orientation or gender identity. Employment discrimination and sexual harassment against women are common. The head of the Tokyo Olympics organizing committee resigned in February 2021 after receiving widespread criticism for his sexist remarks.

Asylum is granted to less than 1 percent of those who apply each year under Japan's strict screening process, and very few refugees are accepted for third-country resettlement in Japan. In March 2021, a Sri Lankan woman died in a detention facility, having been confined since August 2020 for overstaying her visa. Japan's immigration agency admitted to mistreating the woman after a probe found that the detention facility had failed to provide appropriate medical care despite her deteriorating health.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 14 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

There are few significant restrictions on internal or international travel, or on individuals' ability to change their place of residence, employment, and education.

The government was criticized for its restrictions on entry for foreign travelers early in the COVID-19 pandemic, as the limits applied even to permanent residents seeking reentry; the rules were eased for residents in September 2020. Internal travel was discouraged, but the government had no legal authority to impose lockdowns.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 4 / 4

Property rights are generally respected. People are free to establish private businesses, although Japan's economy is heavily regulated.

While personal social freedoms are mostly protected, there are some limitations. The country's system of family registration, koseki, recognizes people as members of a family unit and requires married couples to share a surname, which usually defaults to the husband's surname. This can create legal complications for women as well as children born out of wedlock or to divorced parents, among others. The Supreme Court ruled in June 2021 that the legal provisions forcing married couples to use the same surname did not violate the constitution.

There is no legal recognition of same-sex marriage in Japan, though some municipal and prefectural governments have passed local legislation allowing the registration of same-sex partnerships.

Domestic violence is punishable by law, and protective orders and other services are available for victims, but such abuse often goes unreported.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 3 / 4

Individuals generally enjoy equality of opportunity, and the legal framework provides safeguards against exploitative working conditions. However, long workdays are common in practice and have been criticized as harmful to workers' health.

Many workers are temporary or contract employees with substantially lower wages, fewer benefits, and less job security than regular employees.

Commercial sexual exploitation remains a problem. Traffickers frequently bring foreign women into the country for forced sex work by arranging fraudulent marriages with Japanese men.

Jordan

Population: 10,900,000

Capital: Amman

Freedom Status: Not Free

Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: Jordan is a monarchy in which the king plays a dominant role in politics and governance. The parliament's lower house is elected, but the electoral system puts the opposition at a disadvantage, and the chamber wields little power in practice. The media and civil society groups are hampered by restrictive laws and government pressure. The judicial system lacks independence and often fails to ensure due process.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- In April, King Abdullah II ordered the arrest of a group of former officials and members of the royal family, including the king's half-brother Prince Hamzah bin al-Hussein, who the king claimed had plotted a coup. Their trials were swift, key witnesses were denied testimony, the evidence presented was weak, and the charges against them were vague.
- In March, the social media application Clubhouse was shut down in what is widely seen as an attempt to subdue free expression. Citizens criticized this restriction on other social media platforms like Facebook and Twitter, where they also threatened to defy the move by downloading Clubhouse onto their smartphones through virtual private networks (VPNs).

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 11 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 2 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

Jordan's hereditary monarch, King Abdullah II, holds broad executive powers. He appoints and dismisses the prime minister and cabinet and may dissolve the bicameral National Assembly at his discretion. Constitutional amendments adopted in 2016 empowered the king to make a number of other appointments, including the crown prince and a regent, without a royal decree countersigned by the prime minister or other cabinet ministers.

Abdullah II dissolved the parliament in September 2020, and the prime minister Omar al-Razzaz, a former World Bank economist and education minister, resigned in early October. Al-Razzaz was succeeded days later by Bisher al-Khasawneh, a veteran diplomat and royal adviser.

The king appoints the 65 members of the upper house of the parliament, the Senate. The lower house, the 115-seat House of Representatives, is elected for four-year terms or until the parliament is dissolved. Its members win office through races in 23 multimember districts, with 15 seats reserved for the leading women candidates who failed to capture district seats. Twelve district seats are reserved for religious and ethnic minorities.

The royal court announced its intention to trigger an election in a July 2020 statement, and Abdullah II dissolved the parliament in late September. However, uncertainty over the early-November polling date amid the ongoing COVID-19 pandemic prompted some candidates to delay campaign efforts. International observers, who regularly monitor parliamentary elections, were largely absent.

Independents, many of whom were tribal figures and businesspeople considered loyal to the monarchy, won 133 seats. The Islamic Action Front (IAF), the Islah Alliance, and the Muslim Center Party each won 5 seats. Voter turnout stood at 29.9 percent, down from 36 percent in 2016. Vote buying, which was observed in 2016, became more common during the November 2020 contest, partially due to the dire economic situation caused by the pandemic.

Elections for mayors, local and municipal councils, and 12 new governorate councils created under a 2015 decentralization law were last held in 2017. However, 15 percent of the governorate council seats are appointed, and the councils have no legislative authority. A quarter of the seats in the Amman municipal council are also appointed by the government.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 1 / 4

Elections are administered by the Independent Election Commission (IEC), which generally receives positive reviews from international monitors in terms of technical management, though irregularities continue to be reported. IEC members are appointed by royal decree.

The 2016 electoral-law reform introduced multiple-vote proportional representation for parliamentary elections, replacing a single nontransferable vote system that favored progovernment businesspeople and tribal elites over opposition-oriented political parties. The new law also redrew district lines so as to mitigate acute malapportionment that has long placed urban voters at a severe disadvantage. However even after these changes, rural and tribal voters, who make up the regime's support base, remain heavily overrepresented.

The legal framework for elections is unstable. Major changes are often introduced weeks before polling day, hindering campaign efforts. Candidate registration is reportedly easier in some progovernment areas.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 6 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 2 / 4

Political parties based on ethnicity, race, gender, or religion are banned in Jordan. Parties must receive approval from the Ministry of Political and Parliamentary Affairs.

Authorities have reportedly intimidated individuals attempting to form political parties and there is a long-standing fear of creating or joining political parties due to the regime's historically harsh repression of them.

While the IAF has been tolerated, it suffers from the electoral system's malapportionment, which affects its urban support base. Its parent organization, the Muslim Brotherhood, was deregistered in 2015 when the government licensed its offshoot group, the Muslim Brotherhood Society (MBS). The Muslim Brotherhood's offices were forcibly shuttered in 2016, after the regime prevented it from holding internal elections, exacerbating preexisting divisions and weakening it politically. In July 2020, the organization lost an appeal against the transfer of its offices to the MBS, with the Court of Cassation ordering its dissolution. The Muslim Brotherhood vowed to appeal, and the IAF participated in the November 2020 poll despite the ruling.

The electoral system favors tribally affiliated independents over political parties with specific ideologies and platforms, as does the patronage-based political culture. In October 2020, the al-Hayat Center for Civil Society Development, a local nongovernmental organization (NGO), reported that only 12 percent of candidates relied on party lists to earn votes.

The political system—including the overrepresentation of rural voters—limits the ability of any party-based opposition to make significant gains. The IAF and its ally the Islah Alliance, won a combined 8.7 percent of lower-house seats in the November 2020 election. Moreover, the constitutional authority of the monarchy means that no opposition force can win control of the executive branch by democratic means alone.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 1 / 4

While voters and candidates are generally free from overt threats or violence, they remain heavily influenced by tribal affiliations and the state-sponsored patronage networks that accompany them. The Jordanian intelligence service is widely believed to influence the electoral process. Citizens' political participation is also constrained by the fact that many important positions are appointed rather than elected.

Women have equal political rights, and female candidates previously won seats beyond the legal quotas set for the parliament and subnational councils, but cultural prejudices remain an obstacle to women's full participation in practice. Four women won off-quota seats on governorate councils in 2017. Women performed well at the municipal and local levels that year, but none won mayoral posts. No women won parliamentary seats beyond the 15-seat quota in the November 2020 poll.

Nine lower-house seats are reserved for Christians, and three are reserved for ethnic Circassians and Chechens together. Christians are not permitted to contest unreserved seats. Citizens of Palestinian origin, who tend to live in urban areas, make up a majority of the overall population but remain politically underrepresented.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 3 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 0 / 4

The king dominates policymaking and the legislative process. Though the appointed government or groups of 10 or more lawmakers can propose legislation to the House of Representatives—which may approve, reject, or amend bills—every law requires approval from the appointed Senate and the king to become law. Among other royal prerogatives, the king unilaterally appoints the heads of the armed forces, the intelligence service, and the gendarmerie.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 2 / 4

The government has undertaken some efforts to combat widespread corruption, and the Integrity and Anti-Corruption Commission (IACC) is tasked with investigating allegations. However, successful prosecutions—particularly of high-ranking officials—are historically rare. Anticorruption efforts are undermined by a lack of genuinely independent enforcement institutions and restrictions on investigative journalism and civil society activism.

In June 2020, the government launched a crackdown targeting businesspeople and politicians suspected of tax evasion, money laundering, and customs evasion, after expanding the IACC's powers. By July, authorities raided 650 firms and were reportedly examining the tax records of 70 individuals. While Jordanians cautiously welcomed the crackdown, observers warned that political opponents were also targeted by the government.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 1 / 4

Access-to-information laws are vague, lack procedural detail, and contain sweeping exceptions. Officials are not required to make public declarations of their income and assets. The National Assembly does not exercise effective or independent oversight of the government's budget proposals. Activists and journalists who attempt to investigate state or royal finances are subject to arrest on defamation and other charges.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 22 / 60 (-1)

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 7 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 1 / 4

Jordanian media laws are restrictive, vague, and arbitrarily enforced. Various statutes penalize defamation, criticism of the king or state institutions, harming Jordan's relations with foreign states, blasphemy, and any content considered to lack objectivity. Government gag orders and informal instructions to media outlets regarding news coverage are common, and journalists are routinely arrested for violating such orders. News sites face onerous registration requirements that, if not met, can serve as a justification for blocking. Journalists rarely face serious violence or significant jail time for their work, but they often practice self-censorship.

Journalists faced severe restrictions under COVID-19-related measures. In March 2020, the cabinet halted the publication of all newspapers for two weeks. In April, the government issued a vaguely worded decree prohibiting the dissemination of pandemic-related information that would "cause panic."

The government has restricted media coverage of important political issues in recent years. Immediately after the July 2020 closure of the country's Teachers' Syndicate, the attorney general issued a wide-ranging gag order prohibiting discussion of the subject. In April 2021, a gag order was placed on news about Prince Hamzah and the alleged coup plot against the regime.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 2 / 4

Islam is the state religion. The government monitors sermons at mosques for political, sectarian, or extremist content and issues prescribed texts and themes. Muslim clerics require government authorization to preach or dispense religious guidance. Many Christian groups are recognized as religious denominations or associations and can worship freely, though they cannot proselytize among Muslims. While converts from Islam are not prosecuted for apostasy, they face bureaucratic obstacles and harassment in practice. Unrecognized religious groups are allowed to practice their faiths but face disadvantages stemming from their lack of legal status. Atheists and agnostics are required to list a religious affiliation on government documents.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 2 / 4

Intelligence services reportedly monitor academic events and campus life, and administrators work with state officials to scrutinize scholarly material for politically sensitive content.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 2 / 4

Open discussion of topics such as politics, the monarchy, religious affairs, and security issues is inhibited by the threat of punishment under various laws governing expression. The telecommunications law requires companies to enable the tracking of private communications upon the issuance of a court order, and authorities are allowed to order surveillance of people suspected of terrorism. Many Jordanians believe that government agents routinely listen to their phone calls and monitor their online activities.

Under cybercrime legislation, internet users can face fines or prison terms of up to three months if they are convicted of defamation for online comments. Several activists and protesters arrested in 2020 and 2021 were charged with offenses related to social media posts in which they criticized the government.

Prince Hamzah was placed under house arrest in April 2021 under charges of sedition and was not seen publicly until a week later, in the company of Abdullah II. Some believe Hamzah's arrest stemmed from his publicly expressed sympathy for the Jordanian public's hardships, though others claim that evidence exists that he was plotting a coup.

The social media application Clubhouse was shut down in March 2021 in what is widely seen as an attempt to curb free expression. Citizens criticized this restriction on other social media platforms like Facebook and Twitter, where they also threatened to defy the move by downloading Clubhouse onto their smartphones through virtual private networks (VPNs). Restrictions on other social media apps, some permanent, are common.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 1 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 0 / 4

Jordanian law limits free assembly. Authorities require prior notification for any demonstration or event and have broad discretion to disperse public gatherings. The Ministry of the Interior has canceled planned public events without advance notice or explanation. Violations of the law on assembly can draw fines and jail time. Security forces are known to engage in violent confrontations with protesters.

The government further restricted the right to assemble in response to the ongoing COVID-19 pandemic, even after other measures were rolled back in June 2020. Several dozen protesters were arrested in an Amman demonstration held several days after the Teachers' Syndicate was closed in late July. Some protesters were physically attacked by police and others were later pressured to sign pledges promising to refrain from further activity, under penalty of hefty fines.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 1 / 4

While many local and international NGOs can operate in the country, there are significant restrictions on civil society. The Ministry of Social Development has broad supervisory powers over NGO operations, has the authority to deny registration and requests for foreign funding, and can disband organizations it finds objectionable. Board members of NGOs must be vetted by state security officials. In practice, these regulations are applied in an opaque and arbitrary manner.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 0 / 4

Workers have the right to form unions, but only in 17 designated industries; no new union has formed since 1976. Groups must obtain government approval and join the country's semiofficial union federation, the General Federation of Jordanian Trade Unions (GFJTU). The right to strike is limited by requirements for advance notice and mediation, and participants in an illegal strike are subject to dismissal.

In 2013, a dozen unofficial trade unions formed the Jordanian Federation of Independent Trade Unions (FITU). Lacking official status, they are not allowed to establish headquarters, collect fees from their members, or engage in collective bargaining. They also face heavy pressure from the GFJTU and governmental bodies to cease their activities and shut down.

The Teachers' Syndicate began the longest public-sector strike in Jordanian history in September 2019, which ended after a deal was struck that October. The union accused the government in July 2020 of reneging on the deal, after which the government ordered a two-year closure of the syndicate, shuttering offices and arresting its 13-member board. Over 250 people were subsequently detained as protests continued. In late December 2020, a court handed one-year prison sentences to five syndicate leaders and ordered the organization's permanent dissolution. In August 2021, the deputy head of the syndicate, some members of the Teachers' Syndicate's council, and about 30 teachers were arrested for continuing protest activities against the government. In November, the country's court of appeals dismissed one of the cases brought against the syndicate, which is awaiting a positive ruling on a second case in order to resume operations.

F. RULE OF LAW: 7 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 2 / 4

The judiciary's independence is limited. Under 2016 constitutional amendments, the king unilaterally appoints the entire Constitutional Court and the chair of the Judicial Council, which nominates civil court judges and is mostly comprised of senior judiciary members. Judges of both the civil and the Sharia (Islamic law) courts—which handle personal status matters for Muslims—are formally appointed by royal decree. The Ministry of Justice has the power to monitor judges, promote them, and determine their salaries, further weakening the branch's autonomy.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 1 / 4

Police can hold suspects for up to six months without filing formal charges, and governors are empowered to impose administrative detention for up to one year. In practice, authorities often ignore procedural safeguards against arbitrary arrest and detention, holding individuals incommunicado or beyond legal time limits. Criminal defendants generally lack access to counsel before trial, impairing their ability to mount a defense. Despite a constitutional prohibition, courts allegedly accept confessions extracted under torture.

In April 2021, King Abdullah II ordered the arrest of a group of former officials and members of the royal family, including the king's half-brother Prince Hamzah, who the king claimed had plotted a coup. Their trials were swift, key witnesses were denied testimony, the evidence presented was weak, and the charges against the men were vague. Many in the group were sentenced to 15 years' imprisonment. Sixteen other high-ranking officials were also arrested but subsequently released.

Torture and other mistreatment in custody are common and rarely draw serious penalties. Prison conditions are generally poor, and inmates reportedly suffer from beatings and other abuse by guards. Terrorist attacks remain a threat to physical security. In November 2019, Jordanian authorities said they had disrupted a plot to attack US and Israeli targets in the country earlier in the year; two suspects who were allegedly inspired by the Islamic State (IS) militant group went on trial that month.

Women face discrimination in law and in practice. For example, women's testimony is not equal to men's in Sharia courts, and certain social benefits favor men over women. Discrimination against LGBT+ people is prevalent and includes the threat of violence. Authorities have denied registration to NGOs that support equal rights for LGBT+ people.

Refugees and asylum seekers have not historically received permanent settlement in Jordan, though individuals residing in the country are usually allowed to remain while UN agencies seek their placement in third countries. Refugees often lack access to work permits and work informally. Syrian refugees have at times been forcibly transferred to areas where they are at risk of refoulement, such as the Rubkan camp near the Syrian border; refoulement would place them at further risk of torture, rape, and further physical violence.

The Office of the UN High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) counted 759,745 refugees in Jordan as of mid-December 2021, with 672,599 hailing from Syria. The government, which claims to host nearly double that number, agreed to issue 200,000 work permits in return for a loan-and-investment package in a 2016 compact, and reached the 190,000-permit mark in July 2020. In 2018, it legalized the status of several thousand Syrian refugees living outside of camps, but also prohibited refugees from accessing subsidized health care.

Jordanians of Palestinian origin who are citizens risk the arbitrary revocation of citizenship or documentation and are often excluded from jobs in the public sector and security forces, which are dominated by East Bank tribes.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 7 / 16 (-1)

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 2 / 4

Jordanians generally enjoy freedom of domestic movement and international travel, though some international flights are restricted due to public health measures intended to prevent the spread of COVID-19. Refugees and migrant workers face impediments to travel and are often unable to change employers. Employers reportedly confiscate migrant workers' passports. Children of Jordanian mothers and non-Jordanian fathers, who lack citizenship themselves, have difficulty accessing jobs, education, and health care without a special identity card that is difficult to obtain.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 2 / 4

The legal framework generally supports property rights for citizens, but women do not have equal access to property under Sharia-based inheritance rules. Private business activity is hampered by obstacles such as corruption and the abuse of political or other connections.

Personal social freedoms are limited by the country's conservative culture and specific laws. The government does not recognize marriages between Muslim women and non-Muslim men. Matters such as marriage and divorce are handled by religious courts, which place women and converts from Islam at a disadvantage and restrict some interfaith marriages. Women are not allowed to pass citizenship onto their children.

In recent years, the parliament has adopted laws that better regulate the processing of domestic violence complaints and that abolish a penal code provision allowing rapists to avoid punishment by marrying their victims. However, reduced sentences are still possible for those who murder a spouse caught committing adultery, and spousal rape is not a crime.

Migrant workers, who are the majority of the Jordanian garment industry's workforce, are especially vulnerable to exploitative labor practices. Labor rights organizations have raised concerns about poor working conditions, forced labor, and sexual abuse in Qualifying Industrial Zones, where mostly women and foreign factory workers process goods for export. Rules governing minimum wage, working hours, and safety standards are not well enforced, particularly in certain sectors like agriculture and construction, and among migrant workers. Syrian refugees are particularly vulnerable to exploitation and, as many are without work permits, often work in the informal sector for low wages.

Economic hardships brought on by the COVID-19 pandemic has likely increased the prevalence of child labor dramatically, according to local NGOs. Refugee children are particularly vulnerable and the government and civil society groups, such as UN Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees (UNRWA), have failed or are unable to provide adequate aid.

The number of Jordanians imprisoned for debt, in violation of international human rights law, rose 11-fold between 2015 and 2019, and has remained a challenge since. The weak evidentiary basis required for decisions favor debt collectors, according to a Human Rights Watch report.

Score Change: The score declined from 2 to 1 due to a multiyear rise in problems including debt-related imprisonment, child labor, and the exploitation of Syrian refugees.

Kazakhstan

Population: 19,000,000

Capital: Nur-Sultan

Freedom Status: Not Free

Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: President Nursultan Nazarbayev ruled Kazakhstan from 1990 to 2019, when he stepped down, and still maintains significant influence over governance of the country. Parliamentary and presidential elections are neither free nor fair, and major parties exhibit continued political loyalty to the government. The authorities have consistently marginalized or imprisoned genuine opposition figures. The dominant media outlets are either in state hands or owned by government-friendly businessmen. Freedoms of speech and assembly remain restricted, and corruption is endemic.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- Legislative elections held in January saw the ruling Nur Otan party take 76 of the 98 elected seats. The elections were not considered free and fair by international election monitors.
- Changes were made to the Law on Elections in May, reducing the threshold for parties to enter parliament from 7 to 5 percent and introducing direct elections for district mayors.
- New legislation, signed by the president in June, increased state control over Kazakhstani legal professionals. Local and international legal associations have criticized the law, saying it jeopardizes lawyers' independence.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 5 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 1 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

According to the constitution, the president, who holds most executive power, is directly elected for up to two five-year terms. However, former president Nursultan Nazarbayev's special status as Kazakhstan's "first president" exempted him from term limits. In July 2018, Nazarbayev signed a decree making himself chairman of the Security Council for life. The decree gave the Security Council significant constitutional powers, which could allow Nazarbayev to maintain power despite his resignation from the presidency in March 2019, after nearly 30 years in office. Senate chairman Kasym-Zhomart Tokayev was appointed acting president, and then won a five-year term in the June 2019 election with 71 percent of the vote. Amirzhan Kosanov of the Ult Tagdyry party won 16.2 percent and Daniya Yespaeva of Ak Zhol won 5.1 percent. Other candidates earned 7.7 percent of the vote.

The 2019 presidential election was not credible. President Tokayev benefited from the support of the ruling Nur Otan party, state media, and his predecessor, while none of his opponents were considered genuine competitors. Observers from the Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE) noted incidents of ballot box stuffing, the falsification of ballots, and the use of identical voter signatures on election day.

Since his resignation in 2019, Nazarbayev has gradually transitioned power to Tokayev. Nazarbayev stepped down as chairman of the Assembly of the People of Kazakhstan in April 2021, handing the role to Tokayev, and in November, announced that he would resign his position as leader of Nur Otan. However, the former president still wields significant power in Kazakhstan: at year's end, Nazarbayev remained the head of the Security Council, and continued to be responsible for the appointment of ministers and key officials, with the exception of the foreign, interior, and defense portfolios.

The upper house of the bicameral Parliament is the 49-member Senate, with 34 members chosen by directly elected regional councils and 15 appointed by the president. The senators, who are officially nonpartisan, serve six-year terms, with half of the elected members up for reelection every three years. The lower house, the Mazhilis, has 107 deputies, with 98 elected by proportional representation on party slates and 9 appointed by the Assembly of the People of Kazakhstan, which ostensibly represents the country's various ethnic groups. Members serve five-year terms.

Legislative elections do not meet democratic standards. Irregularities including ballot box stuffing, group and proxy voting, and manipulation of voter lists have been reported, and the ruling party benefits from a blurred distinction between the party and the state. Parliamentary elections were held in January 2021; the results largely replicated those of the previous election in 2016, with Nur Otan taking 76 of the 98 elected seats. Though official data shows Nur Otan winning 71.09 percent of the popular vote, a local nongovernmental organization (NGO) reported that its data showed that the party had actually only won 48.30 percent of the vote. Ak Zhol and the Communist People's Party, which are both considered loyal to the government, secured 12 and 10 seats, respectively. The only genuine opposition party, the National Social Democratic Party (OSDP), boycotted the elections. The OSCE Office for Democratic Institutions and Human Rights (ODIHR) election observers reported that the election "lacked genuine competition" and "highlighted the need" for political reform.

Kazakhstan's legal framework is not sufficient to ensure free and fair elections, and safeguards that do exist are not properly enforced. Electoral laws make it difficult for opposition parties to obtain parliamentary representation. Parties must clear a vote threshold to enter the Mazhilis, and are barred from forming electoral blocs, preventing them from pooling votes and campaign resources. Presidential candidates must also pass a Kazakh language test with unclear evaluation criteria. Moreover, the Assembly of the People of Kazakhstan is appointed by the president at his discretion, giving the executive branch influence over the nine Mazhilis members chosen by the assembly.

Election laws introduced in 2017 imposed further restrictions on who can become a presidential candidate, requiring at least five years of experience in public service or elected positions and the submission of medical records. The latter rule raised the possibility that candidates could be arbitrarily disqualified for health reasons. These legal changes also banned self-nomination of presidential candidates, effectively excluding independents and requiring a nomination from a registered party or public association.

Amendments to the Law on Elections, passed by the legislature and approved by Tokayev in May 2021, sought to introduce political reform. The amendments include provisions lowering the vote threshold for parties to enter the Mazhilis from 7 to 5 percent, adding an "against all" option to election ballots, and introducing direct elections for local akims (mayors) at the district level.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 3 / 16B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 1 / 4

The 2002 Law on Political Parties was revised in 2020, reducing the number of members required to register a party with the Ministry of Justice from 40,000 to 20,000. Critics argue that the measure does not ease the onerous registration process, and officials have broad discretion to delay or deny party registration in practice. The law still prohibits parties based on ethnic origin, religion, or gender.

Opposition parties have been banned or marginalized through laws against extremism; their leaders have faced criminal charges, and their followers in Kazakhstan have had their activities restricted.

Kazakhstan experienced its first peaceful transfer of power through an election in 2019, though it was neither free nor fair. Nazarbayev stood down as president that March, and acting president Tokayev won the election to replace him in June. Only one opposition candidate, Amirzhan Kosanov, earned over 10 percent of the vote.

Opposition parties are similarly locked out of gaining power or influence through legislative elections. The ruling Nur Otan party holds a preponderance of seats in the Mazhilis, and the second- and third-largest parties in the body are considered loyal to Nur Otan.

The opposition party Democratic Choice of Kazakhstan (DVK) remains banned and is considered a terrorist organization by the authorities. Activists associated with the party often receive prison sentences on politically motivated charges. This trend intensified in 2021: throughout the year, many activists were arrested, prosecuted, and sentenced for their ties with the DVK.

While voters and candidates are not subject to undue influence by the military or foreign powers, the political system is dominated by a small group of elites surrounding Nazarbayev and his family. The country's politics are shaped largely by competition among these elites for resources and positions.

The legal ban on parties with an ethnic, religious, or gender focus—combined with the dominance of Nur Otan—limits the ability of women and minority groups to organize independently and advocate for their interests through the political system. Women currently hold 27 percent of the seats in the Mazhilis and less than 19 percent of the seats in the Senate. The Kazakh language test for presidential candidates also presents an obstacle for non-Kazakh ethnic minorities, as well as many Kazakhs.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 1 / 12C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 0 / 4

Government policies are determined by the executive branch, which is not freely elected, irrespective of the constitutionally defined roles of the executive, judiciary, and legislature. Parliament does not serve as an effective check on the executive, and instead largely provides formal approval for the government's legislative initiatives.

However, changes to the constitution adopted by Parliament and the president in 2017 shifted some powers from the president to the Mazhilis. The amendments gave Parliament greater influence over the choice of prime minister and cabinet members and the authority to dismiss them. They also limited the president's ability to rule by decree.

President Tokayev has also been forced to share power with former president Nazarbayev, who retained significant influence in the ruling Nur Otan party and continued to hold powerful official positions throughout 2021.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 1 / 4

Corruption is widespread at all levels of government. Corruption cases are often prosecuted at the local and regional levels, but charges against high-ranking political and business elites are rare, typically emerging only after an individual has fallen out of favor with the leadership. Journalists, activists, and opposition figures are often prosecuted for supposed financial crimes. In August 2021, Kazakhstan's Anti-Corruption Agency reported 921 judicial investigations for corruption had been launched since the beginning of the year, of which 725 were sent to court.

President Tokayev, like his predecessor, has highlighted the importance of tackling corruption. Since the introduction of a new anticorruption law in 2020, civil servants and their families have been banned from receiving gifts, material rewards, or services for their work.

The government and legislature offer little transparency on their decision-making processes, budgetary matters, and other operations. The media and civil society do not have a meaningful opportunity to provide independent commentary and input on pending laws and policies. A law on public access to government information was adopted in 2015, but it is poorly implemented in practice. Officials' asset and income declarations are not publicly available.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 18 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 4 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 0 / 4

Media independence is severely limited in Kazakhstan. While the constitution provides for freedom of the press, most of the media sector is controlled by the state or government-friendly owners, and the government has repeatedly harassed or shut down independent outlets. Self-censorship is common. The authorities also use internet blackouts to restrict access to media outlets.

Journalists are required to confirm the accuracy of information prior to publication by consulting with relevant government bodies or officials, obtain consent for the publication of personal or otherwise confidential information, and acquire accreditation as foreign journalists if they work for foreign outlets. In March 2021, amendments made to the Rules of Accreditation of Journalists introduced a requirement for journalists to work with a "host" when reporting on government events, which critics argue serves to promote censorship in the country.

Defamation was decriminalized in June 2020, but libel remains a criminal offense, and the criminal code prohibits insulting the president and other officials. Journalists critical of the regime often face harassment. Journalists experienced targeted intimidation, including physical attacks, throughout 2021, especially during the runup to the January parliamentary elections. Several journalists also found themselves subject to criminal prosecution for their work. International media freedom NGOs have condemned the Kazakhstani authorities for pursuing such charges, which activists say is intended to curb dissent.

The constitution guarantees freedom of worship, and some religious communities practice without state interference. However, activities by unregistered religious groups are banned, and registered groups are subject to close government supervision. The government has broad authority to outlaw organizations it designates as “extremist.”

The 2011 Law on Religious Activities and Religious Associations prohibited the distribution of religious literature outside places of worship, required the state approval of all religious literature, and prohibited unregistered missionary activity, among other provisions. In December 2021, President Tokayev approved amendments to the religion law, placing further bureaucratic restrictions on holding religious meetings in nonstate registered places of worship.

Local officials continue to harass groups defined as “nontraditional,” including Protestant Christians, Jehovah’s Witnesses, and Muslims who do not adhere to the government-approved version of Islam. According to Forum 18, an NGO that tracks religious freedom in Eurasia, authorities launched 134 prosecutions against individuals and groups for unsanctioned religious activity in 2020, down from 168 in 2019.

Academic freedom remains constrained by political sensitivities surrounding certain topics, including the former president, his inner circle, and relations with Russia. Self-censorship on such topics is reportedly common among scholars and educators. In 2018, a new law was passed giving universities greater freedom to choose the content of their academic programs.

In May 2021, independent media outlet Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty (RFE/RL) published an investigation alleging that many of Kazakhstan’s approximately 130 higher education institutions are owned by high-level elites or their family members.

Authorities are known to monitor social media, and users are regularly prosecuted on charges such as inciting social and ethnic hatred, insulting government officials, and promoting separatism or terrorism. The media law that came into force in 2018 also made it impossible for internet users to leave anonymous comments online, further limiting free expression. In May 2021, parody news blogger Temirlan Ensebek was charged with spreading false information for making satirical posts on social media; Ensebek could face up to three years in prison if convicted.

Since 2019, the authorities have stepped up their efforts to surveil and block access to material it deemed inappropriate. Mobile service providers have instructed their customers to install encryption software on mobile phones that would allow security services to intercept data traffic and circumvent email and messaging applications’ encryption. The government claimed the encryption software was required in order to protect citizens from online fraud and hacker attacks. Those who did not install the software faced difficulties in accessing the Internet, particularly social networking sites. In July 2021, journalists working on the Pegasus Project, an investigation by Amnesty International and several international media rights organizations, reported that spyware had been used to monitor the activity of numerous journalists and activists in Kazakhstan.

In September, the Mazhilis approved a bill that, if passed, would require all foreign social media networks and messaging services to open a local office in Kazakhstan before operating in the country. Critics argue that the law would effectively ban any foreign media company unable to set up an office in Kazakhstan; the bill remained in parliament at year's end.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 2 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 1 / 4

Despite constitutional guarantees, the government imposes tight restrictions on freedom of assembly. President Tokayev revised the public assembly law in May 2020 to no longer require groups to obtain permission from state authorities to gather in public. Instead, groups are required to give notification three to seven days in advance and then wait for approval by the local administration. Critics say that the state continues to restrict who can protest and where, as only officially registered groups are allowed to give notification, and gatherings are only allowed in state-approved sites, which are often located far from the center of cities.

Organizers and participants who fall outside of the new law continue to be subject to fines and jail terms. Throughout 2021, the authorities routinely dispersed public meetings and demonstrations organized by members of opposition parties and their supporters, arresting dozens of protesters. In January, opposition protesters in Almaty were surrounded by police and held for nine hours in subzero temperatures. Police refused to allow food and warm clothing to be given to those being detained; several demonstrators were hospitalized with severe frostbite following the incident.

NGOs continue to operate but face government harassment when they attempt to address politically sensitive issues. There are extensive legal restrictions on the formation and operation of NGOs, including onerous financial rules and harsh penalties for noncompliance. Organizations can incur fines and other punishments for vaguely defined offenses like interfering with government activities or engaging in work outside the scope of their charters.

Civil and human rights activists accused the government of using the COVID-19 state-of-emergency measures as an excuse to crack down on activists and critics, charging them with violating coronavirus restrictions and spreading false information about the pandemic.

In October and November 2020, at least 13 NGOs were charged with breaking the law on the reporting of foreign financial donations. The NGOs claimed the investigations sought to halt their activities in the run-up to the January 2021 parliamentary elections. The charges against the NGOs were dropped in February 2021.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 0 / 4

Workers have limited rights to form and join trade unions or participate in collective bargaining. The government is closely affiliated with the largest union federation and major employers, while genuinely independent unions face repressive actions by the authorities. The country's major independent trade union body, the Confederation of Independent Trade Unions (KNPRK), was dissolved in 2017, and key leaders were later sentenced to prison for protesting the group's termination. Subsequent efforts to register the group have been denied. Kazakhstan's restrictions on union activity gained the attention of the International Labor Organization (ILO), which has repeatedly criticized the country's stance in recent years.

May 2020 revisions to the Law on Trade allowed smaller local trade unions the opportunity to join with larger oblast level organizations, as well as international trade union federations. Though authorities claimed this enhanced the freedom of trade unions, critics claimed the changes were minimal, as independent unions critical of government policy had already been banned. In February 2021, a court in Shymkent suspended the Industrial Trade Union of Fuel and Energy Workers for six months for being in breach of the new regulations. However, despite existing restrictions, a new independent union for construction workers in Nur-Sultan was officially registered by the Ministry of Justice in May.

The number of recorded labor strikes in Kazakhstan rose in 2021; an estimated 50 strikes took place in the first half of the year, involving 1,700 workers. Most of the strikes were held in the oil producing region of Mangystau.

F. RULE OF LAW: 4 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 1 / 4

The judiciary is effectively subservient to the executive branch, with the president nominating or directly appointing judges based on the recommendation of the Supreme Judicial Council, which is itself appointed by the president. Judges are subject to political influence, and corruption is a problem throughout the judicial system.

In June 2021, Tokayev approved legislation imposing new regulations on lawyers, requiring attorneys to become members of a state chamber and to register with a government-controlled digital information system. Local and international lawyers' associations have criticized the law, saying it imposes undue state control over legal professionals and threatens their independence.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 1 / 4

Police reportedly engage in arbitrary arrests and detentions and violate detained suspects' right to assistance from a defense lawyer. Prosecutors, as opposed to judges, are empowered to authorize searches and seizures. Defendants are often held in pretrial detention for long periods. Politically motivated prosecutions and prison sentences against activists, journalists, and opposition figures are common. Throughout 2021, dozens of people from across the country held demonstrations in front of government buildings to protest court decisions that they considered to be unjust; however, protest organizers said that the demonstrations "failed to bring any results."

Conditions in pretrial detention facilities and prisons are harsh. According to reports by RFE/RL, the number of suicides among prisoners has increased in recent years; at least one inmate died by suicide in 2021, and several others deliberately injured themselves in protest of prison conditions.

Police regularly use excessive force during arrests, and torture is widely employed to obtain confessions, with numerous allegations of physical abuse and other mistreatment documented each year. In August, the General Prosecutor's Office allegedly reopened the case of Anatoly Reibant, who died in 2017 after being released from police custody; a police representative later announced that no link could be found between Reibant's death, which was ruled a suicide, and the injuries he sustained while in custody.

Terrorist violence within the country is rare, though some Kazakhstanis have traveled abroad to support the Islamic State (IS) militant group.

While the constitution guarantees equality before the law and prohibits discrimination based on gender, race, and other categories, it does not explicitly prohibit discrimination based on sexual orientation or gender identity. Major segments of society face discrimination in practice. Traditional cultural biases limit economic and professional opportunities for women, and the law offers no protection against sexual harassment in the workplace. Members of the sizable Russian-speaking minority have complained of discrimination in employment and education.

LGBT+ people continue to face societal discrimination, harassment, and violence, despite the decriminalization of same-sex relations in 1998. Throughout 2021, several events planned by the LGBT+ activist group Feminita were disrupted by “angry mobs” that issued threats against participants. During one such incident in May, Feminita’s cofounders were physically assaulted by a group of men at a private event in Shymkent; when police arrived, they detained the activists for eight hours before forcibly transporting them back to Almaty, where the group is based.

Under pressure from Beijing, the Kazakhstan government at times detains ethnic Kazakhs fleeing neighboring China and threatens them with the prospect of deportation, even though they are subject to discrimination and torture upon return.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 8 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 2 / 4

Kazakhstani citizens can travel freely but must register their permanent residence with local authorities. New rules that went into effect in 2017 under the pretext of fighting terrorism require citizens to register even temporary residences lasting more than a month with local authorities or face fines. The change increases the ability of the authorities to monitor internal movement and migration, but critics also suggested that it would lead to corruption and create a black market for false registration documents. The government locked down and restricted movement in many of Kazakhstan’s cities, towns, and villages in response to the coronavirus pandemic.

While the rights of entrepreneurship and private property are formally protected, they are limited in practice by bureaucratic hurdles and the undue influence of politically connected elites, who control large segments of the economy.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 2 / 4

NGOs continue to report instances of early and forced marriage, particularly in rural areas. Women are also encouraged to support large families; those who raise at least six children receive a medal from the government, along with tax breaks and modest monthly benefits.

Domestic violence is a serious problem that often goes unpunished, as police are reluctant to intervene in what are regarded as internal family matters. The Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW), a UN body, warned in a 2019 report that domestic violence had been effectively decriminalized. Incidents of domestic violence reportedly increased and intensified during the COVID-19 pandemic.

Kazakhstan consistently reports one of the highest suicide rates in the world. Though suicide rates had declined prior to the COVID-19 pandemic, the number of suicides and attempted suicides in the country rose in 2021: police reported 248 suicide attempts among young people in the first quarter of the year, compared to about 300 attempts recorded in all of 2020.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 2 / 4

Migrant workers from neighboring countries often face poor working conditions and a lack of effective legal safeguards against exploitation. Both migrants and Kazakhstani workers from rural areas are vulnerable to trafficking for the purposes of forced labor and prostitution in large cities. According to official government data, more than twice as many trafficking-related offenses were recorded in the first half of 2021 than in the same period in 2020. Some experts claim that official statistics do not fully depict the extent of trafficking in Kazakhstan, which serves as a source, destination, and transit country for human trafficking. The authorities reportedly make little effort to assist foreign victims of trafficking.

Kenya

Population: 54,700,000

Capital: Nairobi

Freedom Status: Partly Free

Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: Kenya holds regular multiparty elections. However, pervasive corruption and brutality by security forces remain serious problems. The country's media and civil society sectors are vibrant, even as journalists and human rights defenders remain vulnerable to restrictive laws and intimidation.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- In October, President Uhuru Kenyatta lifted a nationwide curfew which had been in place since the beginning of the COVID-19 pandemic. Kenyatta did not lift a ban on public assemblies, however.
 - In May, Parliament approved a bill that would alter some government structures in line with the recommendations of the Building Bridges Initiative (BBI), which was formed by Kenyatta and opposition leader Raila Odinga. Later that month, the High Court ruled against the bill, saying the selected process of introducing constitutional amendments was irregular. In August, the Court of Appeal upheld the ruling.
 - In October 2021, the Pandora Papers, a cache of documents revealing the offshore activities of political leaders and other prominent individuals worldwide, implicated Kenyatta and several relatives in the utilization of offshore entities to shield over $30 million in assets.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 19 / 40A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 6 / 12*A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 1 / 4

The president and deputy president, who can serve up to two five-year terms, are directly elected by majority vote, and are required to win 25 percent of the votes in at least half of Kenya's 47 counties.

President Uhuru Kenyatta was reelected in 2017 in a disputed election, the rerun of which was boycotted by opposition candidate Raila Odinga. Kenyatta won a solid victory in the first election that August, which analysts largely predicted. It was annulled that September by the Supreme Court, which ruled that Independent Electoral and Boundaries Commission's (IEBC) vote-counting procedures had been severely flawed, and that a rerun should be held. The main opposition coalition, the National Super Alliance (NASA), threatened to boycott the rerun unless a number of reforms were implemented at the IEBC. When some of these reforms were not enacted, Odinga boycotted the rerun.

Kenyatta won the rerun with 98.3 percent of the vote. Turnout for the rerun was only 38.8 percent—much lower than the nearly 80 percent turnout that August. Odinga continued to harshly criticize the election process after the second vote, and Kenyatta began his final term facing a legitimacy crisis.

Violence and intimidation marred the elections. IEBC member Chris Msando was murdered days ahead of the August vote, with his body showing signs of torture. In the weeks between the annulled election and the rerun, one IEBC commissioner fled for the United States, prompting the IEBC chairman to assert that the body could not guarantee a free election given the atmosphere of intimidation. Police in Nairobi and Kisumu used excessive force in an attempt to quell sometimes-violent opposition protests. Several dozen people were reportedly killed by police in the capital alone, according to Human Rights Watch (HRW).

The bicameral Parliament consists of the 349-seat National Assembly and the 67-seat Senate. In the National Assembly, 290 members are directly elected from single-member constituencies. A further 47 special women representatives are elected from the counties, and political parties nominate 12 additional members according to their share of seats won. The Senate has 47 elected members representing the counties, 16 special women representatives nominated by political parties based on the share of seats won, and four nominated members representing youth and people with disabilities. Both houses have speakers who are ex-officio members.

In 2017, Kenyatta's Jubilee Coalition secured majorities in both houses, and stakeholders broadly accepted the results. Irregularities and violations were reported, but they were not systematic and did not harm or benefit any specific party.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 2 / 4

The IEBC is mandated with conducting free and fair elections and operates under a robust electoral framework. However, the IEBC faces frequent allegations of favoritism toward the incumbent Jubilee Coalition, and in 2017 its members experienced violence and intimidation severe enough to prompt its chairman to declare that he could not guarantee the integrity of the presidential rerun. After the annulment of the first presidential election in 2017, the National Assembly approved controversial measures mandating that if a candidate withdraws from a rerun election, then the other candidate automatically wins the poll. The amendments additionally limited the Supreme Court's power to annul election results. The measures took effect a few days after the rerun was held.

In 2018, after a public reconciliation, Kenyatta and Odinga formed the Building Bridges Initiative (BBI), which convened a task force that developed recommendations geared toward altering government structures ahead of the 2022 elections, including introducing a prime minister and reducing the size of the cabinet. Some criticized the proposal as a way to allow Kenyatta, who is barred from seeking a third presidential term, to remain in power as prime minister. Parliament approved the BBI bill in May 2021, but the High Court ruled against it later that month, saying the government's method of introducing the constitutional-amendment bill was irregular. In August, the Court of Appeal upheld the ruling, saying that only Parliament or a popular initiative could initiate such changes.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 8 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 2 / 4

Citizens are free to organize into political parties. Kenyan parties represent a range of ideological, regional, and ethnic interests, but are notoriously weak, and are often amalgamated into coalitions designed only to contest elections. Under the Political Parties Act (PPA), parties that receive at least 5 percent of the votes cast in a national election are eligible for public funds. As of June 2021, there were 73 fully registered parties. The number of registered party members increased from 7.6 million in 2013 to 16.3 million as of June 2021.

Parliament considered amendments to the PPA that would allow political coalitions to register candidates during 2021. Supporters of Deputy President William Ruto criticized the proposal, warning that the amended legislation would effectively force smaller parties to merge with larger ones. The amendments remained under consideration at year's end.

A 2018 rapprochement between Kenyatta and Odinga helped deescalate political tensions somewhat, though little has been done to bring to justice the perpetrators of political violence that took place in the previous years.

Opposition parties and candidates are competitive in Kenyan elections, and the 2017 polls saw a high number of incumbents voted out of office. However, Odinga's decision to boycott the rerun election in protest of a lack of IEBC reforms left Kenyatta opponents without a viable candidate to support, effectively guaranteeing Kenyatta's reelection.

Politics have been unstable since 2018, when Kenyatta and Odinga publicly reached a truce in an event popularly known as "the handshake," which some analysts said weakened the foundations of the Jubilee Coalition and the NASA. The Jubilee Coalition has also faced internal rifts in recent years. In March 2021, Deputy President Ruto was dismissed as the Jubilee Coalition's deputy leader by its national management committee, though Kenyatta reportedly intervened to reverse the move. Ruto has been closely affiliated with a new party, the United Democratic Alliance, after it registered in January, though he reportedly remained a Jubilee Coalition member as of year's end. In December, Odinga formally announced his run for president at an event attended by senior Jubilee Coalition members, indicating Kenyatta's support of his candidacy.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 2 / 4

While people's political choices are somewhat free from undue influence by powerful, democratically unaccountable actors, groups such as Mungiki, a Kikuyu-affiliated gang, exert control over daily services such as matatu (minibus) routes in some regions, and may use violence, intimidation, and other extrapolitical means to influence local and national electoral outcomes.

Ethnicity remains the most salient organizing principle in Kenyan politics, and two ethnic groups—the Kikuyu and Kalenjin—have dominated the presidency since independence. The 2010 constitution intended to reduce the role of ethnicity in elections, and fiscal and political devolution, implemented in 2013, has served to generate more intraethnic competition at the county level. Nevertheless, the politicization of ethnicity at the national level still hinders effective representation of different segments of Kenya's diverse population, limits voter choice, and impedes meaningful policy debates.

The stipulation that all voters possess a National Identity Card hinders historically marginalized groups from obtaining greater access to the political process, particularly the nearly seven million pastoralists from the upper Rift Valley and North Eastern Province. There are significant implicit barriers to the participation of non-Christian and LGBT+ people in national politics. Somali Kenyans, especially in Nairobi's Eastleigh community and in the coastal and northeastern parts of the country, have been the target of government crackdowns ostensibly combating the Shabaab militant group, and are underrepresented politically.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 5 / 12C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 2 / 4

The ability of elected officials to set and implement policy is undermined by corruption and dysfunction. Although the 2010 constitution reduced the powers of the executive branch and improved the oversight role of Parliament, corruption limits the independence of the legislative branch, and in practice, Parliament is generally subordinate to the president. Prior to its defeat in the courts, Kenyatta, Odinga, and Jubilee Coalition leaders used threats and intimidation to secure support for the BBI among party members, local officials, and judges.

Corruption continues to plague national and county governments in Kenya, and state institutions tasked with combating corruption have been ineffective. The Ethics and Anti-Corruption Commission (EACC) lacks prosecutorial power and has been largely unsuccessful in pursuing corruption cases. The EACC's weakness is compounded by shortcomings at the Office of the Director of Public Prosecutions (ODPP) and within the judiciary.

However, following the 2018 appointment of Noordin Haji as Director of Public Prosecutions, the ODPP stepped up anticorruption investigations, arresting and charging a number of high-profile officials. In September 2021, a judge found former sports minister Hassan Wario guilty of corruption over his conduct surrounding the 2016 Olympics, issuing a $33,000 fine as an alternative to a six-year prison sentence.

In October 2021, the Pandora Papers implicated Kenyatta and several relatives in the utilization of offshore entities to shield over $30 million in assets.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 2 / 4

Elaborate rules govern public finance in Kenya, but enforcement is often lacking. Parliament's Budget and Appropriations Committee effectively delegates the budget process to the Treasury, and the legislature has demonstrated limited willingness to ensure that the Treasury respects budget-making procedures. When budget information is made available, it is generally released long after the planning stages during which stakeholders could offer input.

Many of the central government's expenditures are not disclosed. At the county level, the availability of financial information generally is insufficient to ensure adequate public participation in local-government budgetary processes.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 29 / 60D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 10 / 16*D1. Are there free and independent media? 2 / 4

Kenya has one of the more vibrant media landscapes on the African continent, with journalists actively working to expose government corruption and other wrongdoing. However, several laws restrict press freedom, the government and security forces harass journalists, and incidents are rarely investigated by police. The combination of restrictive laws on press freedom and the potential for harassment and violence leads to self-censorship in some cases.

In 2020, officials threatened those who publish COVID-19-related misinformation with two years' imprisonment and a $50,000 fine. That September, nongovernmental organization (NGO) Article 19 reported that journalists and bloggers faced arbitrary arrest, harassment, and assault after the pandemic began. In May 2021, police injured a Deutsche Welle journalist while she covered a Nairobi protest against police brutality and COVID-19 measures.

The government generally respects the constitutional guarantee of freedom of religion. However, counterterrorism operations against the Somalia-based Shabaab militant group have left Muslims exposed to state violence and intimidation. Shabaab militants have at times specifically targeted Christians in Kenya.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 3 / 4

Academic freedom in Kenya is traditionally robust. However, student union elections have led to allegations of fraud and violent protests. Police have also used tear-gas on protesting students, including at Maasai Mara University in May 2021 and at the University of Nairobi in July. In addition, there is evidence that ethnic considerations have influenced university hiring, leaving the staff of some institutions with significant ethnic imbalances.

The relatively unfettered freedom of private discussion in Kenya has suffered somewhat from state counterterrorism operations, intimidation by security forces, and ethnically affiliated gangs. The government has used its broadly defined surveillance powers to monitor mobile phone and internet communications, including by deploying new digital surveillance tools during the pandemic. Still, over 80 percent of Kenyans access social media, and “Kenyans on Twitter” have their own hashtag, #KOT, demonstrating their influence. Political candidates have increased their use of social media to reach younger voters.

Kenyan internet users are sometimes exposed to disinformation. In September 2021, the Mozilla Foundation reported that an unidentified agency had hired high-profile Twitter users to target activists, journalists, and judges and to promote the BBI.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 7 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 2 / 4

The constitution guarantees the freedom of assembly. However, the law requires organizers of public meetings to notify local police in advance. In practice, police have regularly prohibited gatherings on security or other grounds, and violently dispersed assemblies that they had not explicitly banned.

Public assemblies were also affected by COVID-19 measures. A pandemic-related curfew introduced in March 2020 was in effect for much of 2021, while a ban on public assemblies was introduced in late July due to a rise in cases. President Kenyatta lifted the nationwide curfew in October, but not the ban on assemblies.

In May 2021, police deployed tear-gas against Nairobi protesters opposing Israeli military activity in Gaza. In July, police in Nairobi used tear-gas and fired live ammunition into the air while trying to disperse protesters rallying against police brutality and pandemic-related restrictions. Several protesters were arrested.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 2 / 4

Kenya has an active NGO sector, but civil society groups have faced growing obstacles in recent years, including repeated government attempts to deregister hundreds of NGOs for alleged financial violations. The government has still not implemented the Public Benefits Organizations Act, which was passed in 2013 to improve the regulatory framework for NGOs and offer greater freedom for them to operate.

Several environmental activists have been killed in Kenya in recent years. In July 2021, environmental activist Joannah Stutchbury was killed by armed assailants at her home in the outskirts of Nairobi.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 3 / 4

The 2010 constitution affirmed the rights of trade unions to establish their own agendas, bargain collectively, and strike. Unions are active in Kenya, with approximately 57 unions representing 2.6 million workers as of 2018. However, labor leaders sometimes experience intimidation, notably in the wake of strike actions.

A number of strikes have taken place in the past several years, including those organized by medical workers and university staff, who faced additional pressures and resource constraints as they dealt with the coronavirus pandemic. Doctors held a strike over pay concerns and a lack of personal protective equipment in December 2020, though most doctors returned to work after several days. In January 2021, 86 doctors who continued to strike were dismissed.

F. RULE OF LAW: 5 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 2 / 4

While judicial procedures are inefficient, the Kenyan judiciary is generally considered to be independent. The August 2021 Court of Appeal ruling on the BBI bill’s constitutionality was widely considered a victory for judicial independence. In December, the High Court suspended a government directive that would have limited access to public services for individuals unvaccinated against COVID-19.

The government has occasionally refused to comply with court orders and has ignored the recommendations of the Judicial Service Commission (JSC). President Kenyatta refused to appoint 41 judges recommended by the JSC in 2019, citing integrity concerns for some of them. While Kenyatta appointed 34 of them in June 2021, he maintained his opposition against another 6 (1 died after being recommended). While Supreme Court chief justice Martha Koome initially criticized Kenyatta's continued opposition, Koome and the JSC accepted the president's stance in July.

Chief Justice Koome has openly criticized the state of the judiciary during 2021. In June, Koome criticized funding for the judiciary. In September, Koome commented on the effects of judicial corruption, warning that trust in the judicial branch was waning.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 1 / 4

Constitutional guarantees of due process are poorly upheld. There remains a significant backlog of court cases. Over 365,000 cases pending for at least five years remained unresolved as of 2017, with few of them being adjudicated in subsequent years.

The police service is thoroughly undermined by corruption, misconduct, and reports of extrajudicial killings. Although Parliament established the Independent Policing Oversight Authority in 2011, the agency's work has secured the conviction of only eight officers through mid-2020. Another six convictions were recorded in 2021, however.

Following their 2019 terrorist attack on the DusitD2 complex in Nairobi, which killed over 20 people, the Shabaab continued to pose a security threat in 2021, with militants threatening to continue their attacks until Kenyan troops withdraw from Somalia. In December 2021, two people in a western Kenyan village were killed by an assailant using an explosive device; authorities suspected the assailant was a Shabaab member.

Severe drought has exacerbated violent conflict in the north and east, with local NGOs calling for a stronger government response to alleviate hunger and reduce the pressures that drive conflict. In September 2021, President Kenyatta deployed security forces to Laikipia County after violent incidents were reported there over a period of several weeks. Some seven people were killed in clashes between armed herders in the weeks before the deployment.

Violence against suspects and detainees by security forces remains a serious concern, and abuses are rarely punished. Extrajudicial killings are more prevalent in low-income areas in Nairobi.

These trends accelerated during the coronavirus pandemic as Kenyan police utilized excessive and sometimes lethal force to impose curfew measures. According to the Nation Newsplex's Deadly Force database, police killed 97 people in 2021, a fall from the 2020 figure of 137 deaths. In August 2021, two brothers in Embu County who were detained for violating curfew died in police custody, sparking protests in which police killed another person and renewing calls for police accountability.

On Christmas Day, soldiers attempting to resolve a land dispute in Uasin Gishu County killed at least two civilians after local residents clashed with them.

Consensual same-sex sexual activity is criminalized, with a maximum penalty of 14 years in prison. LGBT+ people face discrimination, abuse, and violent attacks. In September 2021, the Kenya Film Classification Board banned a documentary for allegedly encouraging same-sex marriage.

Reports of police abuses against refugees and asylum seekers continue. Somali Kenyans are often stereotyped as refugees and terrorists—a misconception exacerbated by Shabaab attacks in Kenya since the 2010s—and have been targeted by government crackdowns as a result. Coastal communities have long experienced government underinvestment and political marginalization, resulting in worse educational, health, and economic outcomes in the region.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 7 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 2 / 4

While the constitution provides protections for freedom of movement and related rights, they are impeded in practice by security concerns and ethnic tensions that lead many residents to avoid certain parts of the country. The enforcement of COVID-19 lockdown measures was disproportionate and often excessively implemented. In 2021, police erected roadblocks on major roadways to enforce curfews, resulting in traffic delays that impacted essential workers and medical patients. In May 2021, a baby died in route to a Keroka hospital after police refused to let her and her grandfather through a roadblock.

Organized crime continues to threaten legitimate business activity in Kenya. Political corruption and ethnic favoritism also affect the business sector and exacerbate existing imbalances in wealth and access to economic opportunities, including public sector jobs.

Forced evictions without compensation are prevalent in low-income areas, particularly in Nairobi. In October 2021, Nairobi authorities evicted over 40,000 people living in an informal settlement to make way for a highway.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 2 / 4

The constitution recognizes marriage as a union between two people of the opposite sex, but otherwise does not place explicit restrictions on social freedoms. Polygamy is legal, and approximately 10 percent of the married population are in polygamous marriages. Rape and domestic violence remain common and are rarely prosecuted. Cases of domestic violence increased during the COVID-19 pandemic; in April 2020, the Public Service Ministry reported that cases of violence against women and girls rose by 36 percent over the previous year. In a September 2021 report, HRW warned that survivors of gender-based violence received insufficient government support.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 2 / 4

Kenya remains an unequal society, with wealth generally concentrated in towns and cities. The arid and semiarid north and northeastern parts of the country have particularly high poverty rates.

Refugees and asylum seekers from neighboring countries, particularly children, have been vulnerable to sex trafficking and forced labor in Kenya, though Kenyan children are also subject to such abuses. Kenyan workers are recruited for employment abroad in sometimes exploitative conditions, particularly in the Middle East.

Kiribati

Population: 100,000

Capital: Tarawa

Freedom Status: Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Kiribati is a multiparty democracy that holds regular elections and has experienced peaceful transfers of power between competing groups. Civil liberties are generally upheld, though outstanding problems include a ban on same-sex sexual activity and some forms of gender discrimination.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- Authorities imposed COVID-19-related curfews in South Tarawa and Betio in May, after two crewmembers of a fishing vessel tested positive. No coronavirus cases or deaths were reported within Kiribati during the year.
- In November, High Court chief justice William Hastings ruled that the government's treatment of High Court judge David Lambourne was unconstitutional. Lambourne suffered wage losses and delays in repatriation and was forced to sign a contract effectively shortening the length of his term after he was stranded abroad due to COVID-19 restrictions in 2020.
- In February, Tarawa announced that Kiribati would leave the Pacific Islands Forum. Kiribati and four other member states announced their departure due to a disagreement over who the body's next secretary-general should be. The decision to leave will take effect in 2022.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 37 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 12 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The president is elected through a nationwide popular vote and may serve up to three four-year terms. Three to four presidential candidates are nominated by the legislature from among its members, and cabinet members must also be members of the legislature. The president can be removed through a no-confidence vote, but this also triggers general elections.

Taneti Maamau of the Tobwaan Kiribati Party (TKP) was reelected president in June 2020, winning decisively over Banuera Berina of the Kiribati Moa Party (KMP) in a free and fair vote. The issue of recognition of the Beijing-based Chinese government versus the government of Taiwan dominated the race, with pro-Beijing Maamau prevailing over pro-Taiwan challenger Berina, who had opposed the government's 2019 move to end diplomatic relations with Taiwan and switch recognition to China.

The unicameral House of Assembly (Maneaba ni Maungatabu) has 46 members, 44 of whom are elected through a two-round runoff system from 26 constituencies. An appointed member is selected by representatives of people originally from the island of Banaba (Ocean Island) who now live on Fiji's Rabi Island, having been displaced by phosphate mining during the 20th century. The attorney general holds a seat ex officio.

A free and fair legislative election was held in April 2020. The TKP took the most seats, winning 13. Following the elections, Boutokaan te Koaua (BTK) and the KMP joined to create the new Boutokaan Kiribati Moa (BKM). When the new parliament opened, TKP and BTK—counting their members and respective allies—each held 22 seats. A record four women won parliamentary seats and Tangarik Reete became the first woman parliament speaker.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 4 / 4

The constitution and legal framework provide for democratic elections, and balloting is well administered in practice. Losing candidates and parties typically accept the final outcome of elections, and rarely raise accusations of malfeasance.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 15 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 4 / 4

There are no constraints on the formation of or competition between political parties. The country's parties are relatively loose alliances that lack formal platforms and are subject to periodic mergers and reconfigurations. Geographic and ancestral ties continue to play an important role in political affiliation.

Kiribati has a history of smooth and democratic transfers of power between government and opposition parties.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 4 / 4

There are no significant constraints on the choices of voters and candidates imposed by forces not democratically accountable. However, a large number of I-Kiribati respondents to a Transparency International (TI) survey released in November 2021 reported receiving bribery offers for their votes.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 3 / 4

All citizens enjoy full political rights. However, women's political participation is somewhat inhibited in practice by traditional social norms. The number of women elected to the legislature increased from three to four in 2020. A woman, Tangariki Reete, was also elected speaker for the first time.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 10 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 4 / 4

The president and cabinet are able to both form and implement their policy agenda without undue interference, while the legislature provides oversight and a check on executive authority. The government's ability to enact policy depends on its ability to win legislative approval.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 3 / 4

While there is virtually no large-scale corruption in Kiribati, petty graft and nepotism in public appointments remain problems; 64 percent of I-Kiribati respondents to the 2021 TI survey said they paid a bribe within the last year.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 3 / 4

Kiribati lacks comprehensive regulations on public asset disclosure for officials, access to government information, and other transparency matters. In 2017, a former president told lawmakers that he was denied access to basic data on the production of copra, a coconut product, despite multiple requests. Later that year, the president signed a new law, the Kiribati Audit Act, which strengthened the autonomy of the Audit Office and established an independent board to oversee its work. (The office previously reported to the Finance Ministry.) The law also laid out enforcement mechanisms and broadened the Audit Office's mandate, allowing more thorough assessments of budgets, expenditures, and government performance.

The government responded to the fatal 2018 Butiraoi ferry disaster with opacity. After receiving public criticism over its failure to release a report on the incident, the government vowed to make the report public after the completion of a police investigation. The report was issued in 2019, but authorities only allowed individuals to read it under strict supervision; the report attributed the disaster to the vessel's poor condition and noted that the crew was regularly inebriated.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 56 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 16 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 4 / 4

While the market does not support a large and diverse media sector, there are no significant restrictions on the flow of news and information, which is often disseminated informally. A small number of private news and media outlets operate freely. Wave TV, which launched in 2019, was reportedly the first to produce content locally. Foreign radio services are available.

Foreign journalists can perform their roles in Kiribati only after receiving a permit. In 2019, a group of Australian journalists was restricted to a Tarawa hotel after they allegedly arrived without the requisite permit. The journalists had visited Kiribati to report on the government's decision to end its recognition of Taiwan.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 4 / 4

The constitution guarantees freedom of religion. Religious organizations of a certain size are required to register with the government, but there are no penalties for failing to do so. Two islands in the southern part of the archipelago have overwhelmingly Protestant populations and maintain a "one religion" tradition. However, foreign missionaries may operate freely there upon requesting permission from local authorities.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

The school system is free of political indoctrination, and religious education by various denominations is available in public schools but not mandatory. There are no restrictions on academic freedom in the country, which hosts a campus of the Fiji-based University of the South Pacific as well as a teachers' college and technical training centers.

The government does not impose constraints on freedom of speech or the expression of personal views.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 12 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

Freedom of assembly is constitutionally protected and generally upheld in practice.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights– and governance-related work? 4 / 4

There are no undue constraints on nongovernmental organizations (NGOs). The Kiribati Association of Non-Governmental Organisations (KANGO) serves as an umbrella group for a number of local NGOs, including church-based groups and health associations.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 4 / 4

Workers have the right to organize unions, strike, and bargain collectively. The Kiribati Trade Union Congress, an affiliate of the International Trade Union Confederation, includes unions and associations representing nurses, teachers, fishermen, and seafarers.

F. RULE OF LAW: 15 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 4 / 4

The judicial system is modeled on English common law, and the courts are independent in practice. The chief justice is appointed by the president on the advice of the cabinet and the Public Service Commission (PSC); other High Court judges are appointed by the president on the advice of the chief justice and the PSC. Judges cannot be removed unless a special tribunal and the legislature find evidence of misbehavior, or an inability to perform their functions.

Beginning in 2020, the government sought to prevent High Court judge David Lambourne—an Australian who was stranded there due to COVID-19-related travel restrictions—from returning to his post by refusing to issue a work permit, preventing his repatriation to Kiribati, and by declining to pay his wages. Lambourne signed a contract that effectively shortened his appointment but sued the attorney general in August 2021 after Tarawa again halted wage payments. In November, High Court chief justice William Hastings ruled that the government's actions were unconstitutional, instructing the authorities to facilitate Lambourne's return and declaring that he held a life appointment to the court. The attorney general vowed to appeal.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 4 / 4

Due process guarantees are typically respected during arrests, initial detentions, and trials. Detainees have access to lawyers, and defendants are usually granted bail while awaiting trial.

Police brutality is uncommon, and procedures for punishing such abuse are effective. Prison conditions are not considered harsh or inhumane. Kiribati has no army, relying on Australia and New Zealand to provide defense assistance under bilateral agreements. The use of traditional communal justice systems, which can include corporal punishment, is increasingly rare.

Women face legal discrimination on some issues as well as societal bias that limits their access to employment in practice. Citizenship laws favor men over women, for example by allowing fathers but not mothers to confer citizenship on children.

Same-sex sexual activity is a criminal offense, though the ban is rarely enforced; discrimination in employment based on sexual orientation is prohibited.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 13 / 16G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

While there are no significant constraints on internal freedom of movement, the government did impose overnight curfews in South Tarawa and Betio in May 2021, after two crewmembers of a fishing vessel tested positive for COVID-19.

I-Kiribati who were stranded when the coronavirus pandemic spread in 2020 gained access to repatriation flights later that year. Borders otherwise remained largely closed in 2021.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 3 / 4

The government operates a system of land registration and generally upholds property rights. Land is owned on either an individual or a kinship basis, and inheritance laws pertaining to land favor sons over daughters. The World Bank has reported some bureaucratic obstacles to private business activity.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 3 / 4

Same-sex marriage is not permitted. Domestic violence is criminalized but remains a serious and widespread problem. A 2019 survey of domestic violence in South Tarawa found that 38 percent of women had experienced physical or sexual violence by a male partner. Cultural norms deter formal complaints and police interventions.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 3 / 4

There are few economic opportunities in Kiribati, with most citizens engaged in subsistence agriculture. Although forced labor and other exploitative working conditions are uncommon, local women and girls are vulnerable to commercial sexual exploitation, often involving the crews of visiting ships.

Under the Occupational Safety and Health Act of 2015, children and adolescents are restricted from professions considered dangerous. The Employment and Industrial Relations Act of 2015 sets the minimum employment age for most work at 14 years and the minimum age for “hazardous” work at 18.

Kiribati is considered among the world's most environmentally vulnerable countries as a result of climate change and associated rising sea levels, which will affect coastal regions. The effects will likely have a detrimental impact on farming, fishing, and people's access to fresh water.

Access to water remains a serious concern for the approximately 300 residents who remain on Banaba. Water was scarce during part of 2021 due to a drought. Residents were again without clean water by November, as desalinization plants installed earlier in the year reportedly did not function correctly.

Kosovo

Population: 1,800,000

Capital: Priština

Freedom Status: Partly Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Kosovo holds credible and relatively well-administered elections, but its institutions remain weak, and rampant corruption has given rise to deep public distrust in the government. Journalists face serious pressure, and risk being attacked in connection with their reporting. The rule of law is inhibited by executive interference in the judiciary.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- After winning nearly 50 percent of the vote in February's snap parliamentary elections, the nationalist party Vetëvendosje (Self-Determination) filled 58 of the 120 seats in parliament, and was able to form a government without relying on the support of the country's largest political parties. Parliamentarians voted to elect Albin Kurti as prime minister and Vjosa Osmani as president the following month.
- In June, Kurti met with Serbian president Aleksandar Vučić, beginning a new round of the EU-facilitated Kosovo-Serbia Dialogue—a series of diplomatic meetings intended to normalize relations between the two countries following Kosovo's 2008 declaration of independence. The process stalled again in July, and talks had not resumed by year's end.
- Municipal elections held in October were deemed generally free and fair by local and international election observers despite some flaws, including voter roll irregularities. Most elected positions were won by representatives of the Democratic Party of Kosovo (PDK) and the Democratic League of Kosovo (LDK), both traditionally dominant parties that moved to the opposition after the February snap elections.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 25 / 40 (+2)

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 9 / 12 (+1)

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 3 / 4

Kosovo is a parliamentary republic, with the prime minister indirectly elected for a four-year term by a simple majority (61 votes) of the 120-member Assembly).

Snap elections were held in February 2021 after a December 2020 ruling by the Constitutional Court found that the incumbent administration, led by LDK's Avdullah Hoti, had been illegitimately elected. The 2021 parliamentary elections resulted in landslide win for the nationalist party Vetëvendosje, which received nearly 50 percent of the vote—the largest electoral share in Kosovo’s history.

In March, the Assembly elected Vetëvendosje’s Albin Kurti as prime minister with 67 votes. Kurti, who first served as prime minister between February and June 2020, was elected to the role, despite a January 2021 Supreme Court ruling that declared him ineligible to run for parliament because he had been convicted of a crime less than three years previously.

The president is elected by the Assembly for a five-year term by a two-thirds majority or simple majority if after two rounds, no candidate has received a two-thirds majority. In April 2021, the Assembly elected Vjosa Osmani with a majority of 71 votes in the third round. Osmani is Kosovo’s second woman president.

Score Change: The score improved from 2 to 3 because the newly elected prime minister and president were appointed according to normal procedures following parliamentary elections generally deemed to be competitive and free.

The unicameral Assembly contains 120 seats and members are elected to four-year terms; 100 are directly elected by proportional representation, while 10 seats are reserved for ethnic Serbs and another 10 are reserved for other ethnic communities.

In the 2021 snap parliamentary elections, Vetëvendosje won 58 seats, the LDK won 15 seats, PDK won 25 seats, and the Alliance for the Future of Kosovo (AAK) took 8 seats. The Serb List won 10 seats; other minority parties filled the remaining 10 seats. The election was considered “transparent and competitive” by local and international observers, and did not feature any significant irregularities. In 2021, voter turnout increased to 48.78 percent from 44.6 percent in the 2019 elections.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 3 / 4

The Central Election Commission (CEC), which administers elections, is generally transparent and fair. The 2021 local and national elections were well-organized by the CEC, and the results were widely accepted. However, international election observers found that the government has failed to implement effective electoral reforms, as recommended by the European Commission, and the “inconsistent and selective implementation of electoral rules” by the CEC and the courts remains a persistent issue. In October, the Assembly adopted the second phase of the European Reform Agenda (ERA 2) and its Action Plan, which includes provisions for several electoral reforms; the government confirmed its commitment to the reforms at year’s end.

In June, President Osmani dismissed the chairwoman of the CEC and accused her of failing to ensure the CEC’s impartiality and independence; several civil society groups and members of the opposition criticized Osmani’s decision, claiming it was politically motivated.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 11 / 16 (+1)

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 3 / 4

Many parties compete in Kosovo. However, political parties sometimes face intimidation and harassment that can negatively impact their ability to operate. The Serb List has been accused of harassing rival parties and creating an environment where voters fear supporting alternatives.

Opposition parties have a reasonable chance of gaining power through elections. Vetëvendosje, formerly a political movement, transformed into a political party and won the 2019 parliamentary elections, a significant power shift away from mainstream political parties. However, the political old guard was able to help oust the Vetëvendosje government in 2020.

Despite the collapse of the Vetëvendosje government in 2020, the party won more than 50 percent of parliamentary seats in the 2021 snap elections, and was able to form a government without relying on the support of the country's largest political parties.

Candidates competing in Serb areas from parties other than the Serb List frequently encounter intimidation during election campaigns. All 10 parliamentary seats reserved for ethnic Serbs are filled by Serbian List representatives.

Score Change: The score improved from 3 to 4 because the advantages previously enjoyed by established parties proved insufficient to prevent a decisive opposition victory in parliamentary elections.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 2 / 4

Corruption and clientelism often pressure voters' choices during elections. Powerful businesspeople in Kosovo may influence their employees' political choices.

Serbia continues to exert influence on the platform of the Serb List, as well as the political choices of ethnic Serbs generally.

Major political figures in Kosovo, including former president Thaçi and former prime minister Haradinaj, have links to organized crime and high-level corruption, which play powerful roles in politics and have influenced the installation of key leaders.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 2 / 4

While several parliamentary seats are reserved for ethnic Serbs, the population is not fully integrated into the electoral process or Kosovo's institutions. Seven minority groups are officially recognized and politically represented through parliamentary quotas.

Gender quotas are enshrined in the constitution and more than 40 women were elected to the Assembly in the 2021 parliamentary elections, many of whom were elected without the quota. However, women have historically been underrepresented in politics. Though parties are legally required to achieve gender parity in their candidate lists, they often fail to do so.

LGBT+ people are politically marginalized, and their interests are not represented in Kosovar politics.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 5 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 2 / 4

Kosovo's political system has historically been characterized by its dysfunction and instability. The Kurti government, elected in February 2021, at times struggled to effectively implement its reform-oriented platform throughout the year.

Serbia still maintains influence in northern Kosovo, where Kosovar institutions do not have a strong presence. The Russian, Chinese, and Turkish governments have also exerted influence over government processes in Kosovo in recent years.

Though a new round of the EU-facilitated Kosovo-Serbia Dialogue began in June when Kurti met with Serbian president Aleksandar Vučić, no substantial progress in normalizing Kosovar-Serbian relations was made before the process stalled again in July. Opposition members criticized Kurti's participation in the talks, claiming that he had not adequately involved the Assembly in the process.

State capture is a prominent issue and is often a result of clientelism—the illegal giving of favors to officials from wealthy individuals or groups, should officials pursue the interest of those who reward them.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 1 / 4

Corruption and state capture are widespread, and the institutional framework to combat them is weak. The mandates of Kosovo's four main anticorruption bodies overlap, and they have difficulty coordinating their efforts. Authorities have shown little commitment to prosecuting high-level corruption, and when top officials are prosecuted, convictions are rare.

Throughout 2021, the newly elected Kurti government pursued several reforms aimed at combatting corruption and organized crime; the administration committed to establishing new judicial vetting mechanisms and proposed drafting legislation that would enable the government to confiscate “unjustifiably acquired assets.”

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 2 / 4

The Kurti government made a number of key decisions throughout the year—including some related to the Kosovo-Serbia dialogue process—with limited transparency and without consulting the Assembly, prompting criticism from the opposition and civil society groups.

Despite the adoption of the Law on Access to Public Documents in 2010, which was intended to make government documents available upon request, government institutions frequently deny those requests with little or no justification. Courts have been very slow to respond to complaints from those denied government information due to persistent backlogs in the judicial system.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 31 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 9 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 2 / 4

The constitution guarantees press freedom and a variety of media outlets operate in Kosovo, including the publicly operated Radio Television Kosovo (RTK). However, the government and business interests have exerted undue influence on editorial lines, including at RTK. Journalists report frequent harassment and intimidation; several journalists were attacked in 2021 while reporting in northern Kosovo.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 2 / 4

The constitution guarantees religious freedom. However, the Law on Freedom of Religion prevents some religious communities from registering as legal entities, a designation that would allow them to more easily buy and rent property, access burial sites, establish bank accounts, and carry out other administrative activities. Tensions between Muslims and Orthodox Christians occasionally flare up, though interreligious relations are generally peaceful.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 2 / 4

Kosovo's higher education system is subject to political influence. In July 2019, three universities that were established between 2009 and 2015 lost their accreditation due to the poor quality of their curriculums and administrative failures. PDK officials were involved in establishing these schools, and some held leadership positions at the universities.

In September 2021, the Kurti government abolished tuition fees for students pursuing bachelor's and master's degrees at Kosovo's public universities.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 3 / 4

Individuals are largely free to express their political views without fear of retribution. In recent years, limited space has opened up for discussion on sensitive topics such as ethnic relations and LGBT+ matters.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 8 / 12E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 3 / 4

Freedom of assembly is generally respected, though demonstrations are occasionally restricted for security reasons.

After a Draft Law on Public Gatherings was posted online for public consultation in October 2021, civil society groups voiced concerns that provisions included in the law would restrict the ability of individuals and groups to exercise their assembly rights. The draft law remained in the Assembly at year's end.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 3 / 4

Nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) function freely, though the courts can ban groups that infringe on the constitutional order or encourage ethnic hatred. NGOs occasionally experience pressure to curtail criticism of the government, though many continue to criticize the authorities and have largely been able to engage in advocacy work without interference.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 2 / 4

The constitution protects the right to establish and join trade unions, but employers frequently fail to respect collective bargaining rights. It is difficult to form a private sector union because employers often intimidate workers to prevent them from organizing. As a result, few private sector unions exist in Kosovo. Several public sector unions engaged in strikes throughout 2021, demanding that the government approve and implement a new draft law on public sector pay. A previous law on salaries, which would have increased public sector wages, was struck down by a June 2020 Constitutional Court ruling.

F. RULE OF LAW: 6 / 16F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 1 / 4

Political interference in the judiciary remains a problem, and widespread judicial corruption negatively impacts the branch's independence. Resource constraints and a lack of qualified judges hinder the performance of the judiciary. In 2021, the Kurti government established a working group to create a judicial vetting mechanism; discussions remained ongoing at year's end.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 1 / 4

Prosecutors and courts remain susceptible to political interference and corruption by powerful political and business elites, undermining due process.

Although the law states that defendants should not be detained before trial unless they are likely to flee or tamper with evidence, judges often order suspects to be detained without cause. Lengthy pretrial detentions are common due to judicial inefficiency and resource constraints.

Although the EU brokered an agreement in 2015 between Kosovo and Serbia to disband the Serb Civilna Zastita (Civil Protection) security force in northern Kosovo, there have been reports that the force is still operating illegally. Prison conditions have improved in recent years, but violence and poor medical care remain problems. The police sometimes abuse detainees in custody.

In November 2020, a number of former Kosovo Liberation Army (KLA) members—including former president Thaçi—were charged with war crimes by the Kosovo Specialist Chambers (KSC), a tribunal in The Hague investigating war crimes committed during Kosovo's 1998–99 war for independence. The first trials of KLA fighters began in December 2021; those charged remained in detention at year's end. The KSC is unpopular among Kosovar Albanians, and the government previously attempted to stop its work through efforts to repeal or renegotiate the 2015 law establishing its existence.

Kosovo's Roma, Ashkali, and Gorani populations continue to face discrimination in education, employment, and access to social services.

LGBT+ people face social pressure to hide their sexual orientation or gender identity and face obstacles in making legal changes on the latter. The Civil Code of Kosovo excludes same-sex partnerships from legal recognition.

Women experience discrimination in employment, particularly in regard to hiring for high-level positions in government and the private sector. The Law on Gender Equality seeks to ensure that the governing boards of private companies have gender parity, but this has not been widely implemented.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 8 / 16G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 3 / 4

Freedom of movement and residence is somewhat impaired in Kosovo, especially for those living in Serb areas. The government refuses to accept travel documents issued by the Serbian government that show towns in Kosovo as the place of residence, hindering travel for many Serbs. Meanwhile, Serbs living in Kosovo do not benefit from Serbia's visa waiver agreement with the EU, making travel with a Serbian passport relatively difficult for those living in the enclaves. Kosovars have also been hindered from traveling to Bosnia and Herzegovina by the need for visas in recent years.

The government continued to restrict movement and enforce curfews at different times throughout 2021 to prevent the spread of COVID-19.

The legal framework on property rights is poorly outlined, and those rights are inadequately enforced in practice. While the law states that inheritance must be split equally between male and female heirs, strong patriarchal attitudes lead to pressure on women to relinquish their rights to male family members. A number of policies incentivize co-ownership, where couples who wish to register their properties jointly have their municipal taxes and fees waived. However, this has not significantly increased the percentage of properties owned by women. Property reclamation by displaced persons is hindered by threats of violence and resistance to accepting returnees from local communities.

Domestic violence remains a problem, despite the government's five-year strategy that was launched in 2017 to address the issue, and is considered a civil matter unless the victim is physically harmed. When criminal cases are referred, prosecutions and convictions are rare. Rape is illegal, but spousal rape is not addressed by the law. Courts often give convicted rapists sentences that are lighter than the prescribed minimum. A 2020 report by the Kosovo Women's Network (KWN) found that "at least 74 women were killed by their male partners or relatives" between 2017 and 2020.

Same sex marriage is not legally recognized in Kosovo, though LGBT+ activists say that provisions in the constitution implicitly permit same sex marriages. A draft law that would recognize same sex civil unions remained stalled in parliament at the end of 2021.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 2 / 4

Equal opportunity is inhibited by persistently high levels of unemployment. Kosovo is a source, transit point, and destination for human trafficking, and corruption within the government enables perpetrators. Children are at particular risk of exploitation by traffickers, who can force them to beg or engage in sex work.

Labor laws intended to protect employees' rights exist, but are frequently violated in practice. Exploitative working conditions are particularly common in the private sector.

Kuwait

Population: 4,500,000

Capital: Kuwait City

Freedom Status: Partly Free

Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: Kuwait is a constitutional emirate ruled by the Sabah family. While the monarchy holds executive power and dominates most state institutions, the elected parliament plays an influential role, often challenging the government. State authorities impose some constraints on civil liberties, including speech and assembly, and the country's large population of non-citizen workers faces particular disadvantages.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- The cabinet resigned in January and again in November as the government engaged in a standoff with opposition lawmakers who sought to question Prime Minister Sabah al-Khalid al-Sabah over COVID-19 policy and corruption concerns and also sought to secure amnesty for imprisoned and exiled dissidents. Al-Khalid al-Sabah remained prime minister at year's end.
- In November, Sheikh Nawaf al-Ahmad al-Jaber al-Sabah, the emir, pardoned 24 dissidents and shortened the sentences of another 11 who had been accused of storming the parliament in 2011. The list of beneficiaries included prominent opposition leader Musallam al-Barrak, who had been living in exile in Turkey.
- In April, a court ordered the detention of former prime minister Sheikh Jaber al-Mubarak al-Sabah and former cabinet minister Sheikh Khalid al-Jarrah al-Sabah over accusations of financial mismanagement while in office. Al-Mubarak al-Sabah was the first former premier to be detained by the authorities.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 14 / 40A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 3 / 12*A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

The hereditary emir holds extensive executive powers. Sheikh Nawaf al-Ahmad al-Jaber al-Sabah became the new ruler in September 2020, after the death of his 91-year-old half-brother and predecessor, Sheikh Sabah al-Ahmad al-Jaber al-Sabah. He appointed another half-brother, Sheikh Meshaal al-Ahmad al-Jaber al-Sabah, as crown prince. The parliament, which must approve the choice of heir by majority vote, did so unanimously. Sheikh Meshaal briefly served in the emir's stead in November 2021, when the emir temporarily transferred his duties to the crown prince.

The emir chooses the prime minister and appoints cabinet ministers on the prime minister's recommendation. At least one minister must be an elected member of parliament. All prime ministers and most senior ministers have been members of the ruling family. Prime Minister Sabah al-Khalid al-Sabah was appointed in 2019 and was most recently reappointed by the crown prince in November 2021. The cabinet appointed in December included four elected parliamentarians.

The 50-member National Assembly is popularly elected on a formally nonpartisan basis. The 15 royally appointed cabinet ministers sit as additional ex officio members but cannot take part in confidence votes.

The parliament serves terms of up to four years. The emir and the Constitutional Court, which lacks full independence, have the power to dissolve the legislature, and the executive can thereby determine the timing of elections to suit its political priorities. This has occurred several times since 2011, usually when lawmakers clashed with senior ministers from the ruling family. However, the parliament elected in 2016 served its full four-year term.

Elections were held in December 2020, with a reported voter turnout of about 70 percent. As in the 2016 elections, 24 of the successful candidates were broadly aligned with the opposition, including Islamist and liberal blocs. There was also significant turnover; only 19 of the 43 incumbents who ran won seats. Nine candidates who did not win seats launched an appeal claiming that there were irregularities including vote buying, falsified voter addresses, and failure to check the identities of voters. Alleged vote buying has been a long-standing problem.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 1 / 4

Elections are administered by the Interior Ministry rather than an independent institution, and the electoral system lacks transparency, as evidenced by an opaque voter registration process. Elections are nevertheless competitive by regional standards. Corruption in campaigns remain a concern.

The emir has implemented changes to electoral laws in close proximity to elections. In 2012, two months ahead of elections, Sheikh Sabah issued a decree that reduced the number of candidates elected in each district from four to one.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 7 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 2 / 4

Formal political parties are banned, which significantly constrains political organization, although loose parliamentary blocs exist in practice.

Politicians have some space to criticize the government, but those who have seriously challenged the emir's authority have faced criminal charges. Several opposition figures were imprisoned for their role in the storming of the parliament in 2011 protests against the prime minister. One of them, prominent opposition leader Musallam al-Barrak, was previously imprisoned "insulting the emir" in a speech opposing the 2012 electoral law. Al-Barrak, who was living in exile in Turkey, was pardoned in November; other dissidents received either pardons or commutations of their sentences.

The constitutional system does not allow democratic transfers of power at the executive level. Candidates aligned with the opposition won 24 parliamentary seats in 2020, including 3 members of the local affiliate of the Muslim Brotherhood, an Islamist group that is banned in most other Persian Gulf monarchies.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 2 / 4

The hereditary emir and the ruling family frequently interfere in political processes, including through the harassment of political and media figures, and the government impedes the activities of opposition parliamentary blocs. Senior members of the ruling family allegedly provide economic resources to favored politicians and journalists to exert political influence.

In the absence of political parties, major tribes hold their own informal and technically illegal primary elections to unite their members behind certain parliamentary candidates, who then typically use their public office to generate economic benefits for members of their tribe.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 1 / 4

The electorate consists of men and women over 21 years of age who have been citizens for at least 20 years and who have a Kuwaiti father. Most members of state security agencies are barred from voting.

Access to citizenship is tightly restricted. About 70 percent of the country's residents are noncitizens, primarily from South Asian and other Arab countries, who have no right to vote even if they are lifelong residents. Naturalization is extremely rare for people born abroad or without a Kuwaiti father, and it is not permitted for non-Muslims. Individuals have had their Kuwaiti citizenship revoked for political reasons.

More than 100,000 residents, known as bidoon, are stateless; many bidoon claim Kuwaiti nationality and descent, but official processes to verify their eligibility for citizenship are slow, opaque, and largely ineffective. In May 2021, five parliamentarians submitted a proposal to expand socioeconomic rights for bidoon.

The Shiite Muslim community makes up about a third of the citizen population but is not well represented in the political system. Shiite candidates won only six seats in both the 2016 and 2020 parliamentary elections.

Women have had the right to vote and run for office since 2005, and some have been elected to the parliament in previous elections. There is only one female member of the parliament elected in 2020. Entrenched societal attitudes hamper more active participation by women in the political process, and their interests are poorly represented in practice. Neither the political groupings nor the tribes generally promote women's participation as candidates.

Societal and legal discrimination against LGBT+ people prevents them from playing any open role in political affairs.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 4 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 1 / 4

While some laws initiated by elected members of parliament are adopted and implemented, policymaking authority is concentrated in the hands of the hereditary emir and his appointed government. The emir has repeatedly used his power to dissolve the National Assembly when it imposes checks on the executive. He can also veto legislation and issue executive decrees when the assembly is not in session.

Opposition parliamentarians sought to question Prime Minister al-Khalid al-Sabah over corruption, COVID-19 policy, and other concerns during 2021, which the government resisted. The cabinet resigned in January, citing the relationship between the government and the legislature, and resigned again in November; legislative work has been hindered by the ongoing impasse.

Interactions between the executive and legislature are affected by succession-related rivalries within the ruling family. Powerful members of the family are able to put pressure on rivals in ministerial roles by cultivating parliamentary allies who can question them and scrutinize their performance.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 1 / 4

Corruption is pervasive. While an Anti-Corruption Authority has operated since 2015, its activities appear insufficient. Allegations of malfeasance lodged by lawmakers against ministers have been at the heart of the country's recurring political crises.

In April 2021, a court ordered that former prime minister Sheikh Jaber al-Mubarak al-Sabah and former minister Sheikh Khalid al-Jarrah al-Sabah be detained over alleged financial mismanagement while in office. Al-Mubarak al-Sabah's detention marked the first time that a former premier was detained by authorities.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 2 / 4

Transparency on government spending is inadequate, and there are few mechanisms that encourage officials to disclose information about government operations. Kuwait does not have any legislation guaranteeing the right to access public information. The State Audit Bureau provides some oversight on revenue and expenditures, reporting to both the government and the National Assembly, though not necessarily to the public. Defense spending is particularly opaque, with no detailed breakdown available to the parliament.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 23 / 60D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 6 / 16*D1. Are there free and independent media? 1 / 4

Kuwaiti law assigns penalties for the publication of material that insults Islam, criticizes the emir, discloses information considered secret or private, or calls for the regime's overthrow. Journalists also risk imprisonment under the restrictive 2016 Cyber Crimes Law, which criminalizes the dissemination of similar content online.

Thousands of books have been banned in the country for political or moral reasons. In 2020, however, the National Assembly amended the Press and Publication Law of 2006 to abolish an Information Ministry censorship committee; as a result, a judicial order is required to enforce such a ban.

The media regulator, the Commission for Mass Communications and Information Technology, has sweeping powers to monitor, block, and censor online material. The government can seek the revocation of a media outlet's license via the judiciary. Foreign media outlets operate relatively freely in Kuwait.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 2 / 4

Islam is the state religion, and blasphemy is a punishable offense. Defamation of Islam, Christianity, and Judaism is prohibited. The government appoints Sunni imams and oversees their sermons. Shiite Muslims have their own religious institutions, including Sharia (Islamic law) courts, though the government does not permit training of Shiite clerics in the country. Several Christian churches are officially registered, though no synagogues are. Members of other non-Muslim minority groups are generally permitted to practice their faiths in private but are forbidden from proselytizing.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 2 / 4

Academic freedom is impeded by self-censorship on politically sensitive topics, as well as by broader legal restrictions on freedom of expression, including the prohibitions on insulting the emir and defaming religion. The National Union of Kuwaiti Students is not officially registered as a nongovernmental organization (NGO) but is nevertheless considered influential.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 1 / 4

Freedom of expression is curtailed by state surveillance and the criminalization of some forms of critical speech, especially if it touches on the emir or the rulers of other Arab countries. The Cyber Crimes Law imposes prison sentences of up to 10 years as well as fines for online speech that criticizes the emir, judicial officials, religious figures, or foreign leaders.

Individuals who criticize the government on social media tend to be harassed by online trolls and bot accounts, some of which may be state sponsored.

Activists and other individuals are sometimes summoned for questioning over their online comments, and some have been prosecuted. Human Rights Watch (HRW) reported that at least five activists were arrested or interrogated by the Interior Ministry in 2020 for their activity on social media. Kuwait has sought the extradition of activist Mesaed al-Mesaileem, who lives in Bosnia and Herzegovina (BiH), over his online activity. BiH's State Court denied al-Mesaileem's request for asylum in September 2021, though he remained there at year's end.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 4 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 1 / 4

Freedom of assembly is constrained by law and in practice. Organizers must notify officials of a public meeting or protest, and those who participate in unauthorized protests can be subject to imprisonment or, for noncitizens, deportation. Peaceful protests are sometimes allowed without a permit. In May 2021, the Interior Ministry warned that protests prompted by fighting between militants in the Gaza Strip and Israeli forces required permits. In September, several dozen teachers protested in front of the Education Ministry over COVID-19 vaccination and testing requirements.

Large gatherings were banned in March 2020 in response to the coronavirus pandemic. In October 2021, the government ended gathering restrictions for vaccinated individuals.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 2 / 4

The government restricts the registration and licensing of NGOs, forcing many groups to operate without legal standing. Representatives of licensed NGOs must obtain government permission to attend foreign conferences, and critical groups may be subject to harassment. Kuwaiti NGOs were largely absent from the 2020 Universal Periodic Review process at the UN Human Rights Council.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 1 / 4

Private-sector workers who are Kuwaiti citizens have the right to join labor unions and bargain collectively and have a limited right to strike. However, labor laws allow for only one national union federation. Noncitizen migrant workers do not enjoy these rights and can face dismissal and deportation for engaging in union or strike activity. In 2019, the Kuwait Trade Union Federation opened an office to provide migrant workers with advice on legal disputes. Civil servants and household workers are also denied union rights; most citizen workers are public employees and do not have the right to strike.

Migrant workers sometimes participate in risky illegal labor actions such as sit-ins and walkouts to protest nonpayment of wages and other abuses.

F. RULE OF LAW: 7 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 1 / 4

Kuwait lacks an independent judiciary. The emir has the final say on judicial appointments, which are proposed by a Supreme Judicial Council that includes senior judges, the attorney general, and the deputy justice minister. The executive branch approves judicial promotions. Judges who are Kuwaiti citizens are appointed for life, while noncitizens receive contracts for up to three years, reflecting a wider tendency to keep noncitizens employed on precarious short-term contracts. The courts frequently rule in favor of the government in cases related to politics.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 2 / 4

Arbitrary arrests and detentions sometimes occur despite legal safeguards. Authorities may detain suspects for four days without charge. However, a group of individuals accused of providing financial support for the Lebanese Shiite militant group Hezbollah were held for weeks without charge after security forces detained them in November 2021. Noncitizens arrested for minor offenses are subject to detention and deportation without due process or access to the courts. The emir retains the right to issue pardons, as he did in November for 24 dissidents.

Kuwait is generally free from armed conflict, no major terrorist attacks have been reported since 2015, and there are relatively low levels of criminal violence. Constitutional protections against torture and other forms of cruel and unusual punishment are not always upheld. Detainees, especially bidoon, continue to experience torture and beatings in custody. Overcrowding and unsanitary conditions are significant problems at prisons and deportation centers.

HRW has reported violations of due process in capital cases. No executions were reported in 2021, though death sentences were issued during the year. In July, a man was sentenced to death for murdering a woman who had refused his marriage proposal.

Despite some legal protections from bias and abuse, women remain underrepresented in the workforce and face unequal treatment in several areas of law and society. Women face public harassment; this is especially true for foreign women in Kuwait. Women account for a majority of university students, but the government enforces gender segregation in educational institutions.

LGBT+ people face societal discrimination, and the penal code prescribes prison sentences for sex between men and “imitating the opposite sex.” In October 2021, Maha al-Mutairi, a transgender woman, received a two-year prison sentence and a 1,000-Kuwaiti-dinar ($3,300) fine for “imitating the opposite sex” online and violating the telecommunications law.

Officials consider bidoon to be illegal residents, and they lack the protections and benefits associated with citizenship. They often live in poor conditions and have difficulty accessing public services and obtaining formal employment.

Noncitizen migrant workers are excluded from legal protections granted to citizens. During the 2020 COVID-19 lockdown, many migrant workers were left without wages, while most Kuwaiti citizens, who tend to work in the public sector, continued to receive income. Noncitizens were also vaccinated against COVID-19 at a lower rate than citizens. A National Bank of Kuwait report released in September 2021 found that more than 56,000 expatriates left Kuwait in the first half of the year.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 6 / 16G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 2 / 4

Kuwait generally does not constrain citizens' movement, although it did impose COVID-19 travel restrictions and quarantine policies. Migrant workers often face de facto restrictions on travel from their employers. The labor sponsorship system limits migrant workers' freedom to change jobs without permission from their existing employer. Migrant workers have additionally faced stricter COVID-19-related movement restrictions.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 1 / 4

Kuwaiti law allows citizens and foreign nationals, but not bidoon, to own private property. Although the law permits the establishment of businesses, bureaucratic obstacles sometimes slow the process. Access to opportunity is also affected by nepotism.

Companies are legally prohibited from conducting business with citizens of Israel.

Sharia-based inheritance rules, particularly those pertaining to Sunni families, put women at a disadvantage.

Personal status laws favor men over women in matters of marriage, divorce, and child custody. For example, Sunni women must have the approval of a male guardian in order to marry, and they are only permitted to seek a divorce when deserted or subjected to domestic violence. Domestic abuse and spousal rape are not specifically prohibited by law, and rapists can avoid punishment if they marry their victims.

Article 153 of the penal code classifies crimes in which a man kills a close female relative whom he has caught in "an unsavory sexual act" as misdemeanors, punishable by at most three years in prison. Such incidents are rare but not entirely unknown; a local civil society campaign seeks to eliminate the penal code provision.

In 2020, the parliament passed Kuwait's first law to combat domestic violence, following years of campaigning by women's rights activists. It provides for shelters, restraining orders, and legal assistance for victims, among other components. However, it does not criminalize domestic violence or cover gender-based violence outside the immediate household.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 1 / 4

Foreign household workers and other migrant workers are highly vulnerable to abuse and exploitation, often forced to live and work in poor or dangerous conditions for low pay. Despite some legal protections designed to prevent mistreatment, many employers reportedly confiscate their household workers' passports, subject them to excessive working hours, and restrict their movements outside the home. Recruiting agents are known to hold female migrant workers for ransom, demanding money from their families before they could return home. Other migrant workers have been repatriated by the state labor bureau after being refused payment or otherwise harassed or abused by their employers.

Kyrgyzstan

Population: 6,700,000

Capital: Bishkek

Freedom Status: Not Free

Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: After two revolutions that ousted authoritarian presidents in 2005 and 2010, Kyrgyzstan adopted a parliamentary form of government. Governing coalitions proved unstable, however, and corruption remains pervasive. Unrest surrounding the annulled 2020 parliamentary elections led to significant political upheaval and the violent repression of opponents of nationalist politician Sadyr Japarov. Major constitutional changes adopted in 2021 significantly increased presidential authority, concentrating political power in the presidency and reducing the size and role of parliament. Both the judiciary and vigilante violence are increasingly used to suppress political opponents and civil society critics.

- Japarov was elected president with 79.2 percent of the vote in January's presidential elections, which were marred by significant irregularities, including the misuse of state resources, and were not considered competitive; a referendum held the same day voted to return Kyrgyzstan to a superpresidential system. Both elections were characterized by historically low voter turnout.
- A new constitution, adopted after an April referendum and ratified in May, significantly curtailed the power of the legislature, removing the office of the prime minister and reducing the number of seats in the parliament from 120 to 90. Parliamentary elections held under the new system in November were marred by a number of procedural irregularities, which resulted in several opposition parties being excluded from the parliament.
- Throughout the year, security services—now dominated by Japarov allies—arrested opposition members and engaged in violent vigilante actions against potential opponents, ranging from politicians to protesters. The newly elected president also enacted a number of laws monitoring both civil society organizations and the media.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 4 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 2 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

The constitution, ratified in May 2021, returned Kyrgyzstan to a superpresidential system, in which the president is the chief national authority. The president is directly elected, and can serve up to two five-year terms. The head of government, the chairman of the cabinet of ministers, is appointed by the president, and effectively serves as the president's chief of staff.

Major protests over the administration of the October 2020 parliamentary elections took place in Bishkek the day after the polls were held and turned violent; demonstrators had clashed with police, forcibly freed prisoners held by the State Committee for National Security (GKNB), and set fire to the building housing the parliament and the president's office.

Within two weeks, then president Sooronbay Jeenbekov accepted the parliament's nomination of Sadyr Japarov of the Mekenchil (Patriotic) party—who days before had been freed from GKNB custody while serving a prison sentence for kidnapping—as prime minister. Jeenbekov resigned the following day as Japarov supporters, who had in previous days attacked attendees at other political rallies, threatened to march on his residence.

Parliament speaker Kanat Isayev was next in the line of succession but declined to assume the presidency, after Japarov supporters called for Isayev's resignation and arrest. The parliament formally made Japarov acting president the day after he had publicly declared himself acting in both executive positions. He served until November 2020, when he resigned to qualify for an early presidential election scheduled for January 2021.

Snap presidential elections were held as planned in January 2021; Japarov was elected to the presidency with 79.2 percent of the vote. The election was marked by historically low voter turnout at 39.2 percent and the massive misuse of administrative resources. The Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE) limited observation mission reported that the elections were not competitive, but had been dominated by Japarov, who had benefited from significant advantages, including “disproportionate financial means” and the use of state resources.

The unicameral parliament consisted of 120 deputies elected by party list in a single national constituency to serve five-year terms before the ratification of the new constitution in May 2021. Constitutional changes and an electoral law signed in August 2021 cut the number of seats to 90, with 54 elected by party list and 36 representing single-member districts.

The Central Commission for Elections and Referenda (CEC) originally reported that four parties exceeded the threshold to secure seats in the October 2020 parliamentary elections, three of them affiliated with former president Jeenbekov. Opposition parties refused to accept the results, accusing the victors of vote buying and intimidation; vote-buying evidence was disseminated on social media. Journalists and civil society also accused the victors of misusing administrative resources.

The CEC annulled the results two days after the vote was held, selecting a December date for a rerun; in late October, parliamentarians decided to delay the poll indefinitely. Although the sixth session of the parliament was elected in 2015 and their mandate expired in 2020, parliamentarians voted to extend their own mandates after the October election results were annulled, and the deputies continued to serve through December 2021 with no electoral mandate.

In November 2021, over a year after the 2020 parliamentary election results had been annulled, new polls were held; voter turnout was recorded at 34 percent. Initial results published by the CEC showed several parties clearing the 5 percent threshold required to enter parliament; these results were later withdrawn, and nearly 10 percent of the ballots cast were discarded as spoiled. CEC officials cited technical errors to explain the changes in the vote count, which resulted in the exclusion of four opposition parties from parliament. The parties entering the new parliament are Ata-Jurt Kyrgyzstan with 15 seats, followed by Ishenim with 12; Yntymak, 9; Alyans, 7; Butun Kyrgyzstan, 6; and Yiman Nuru with 5. New elections were scheduled for early 2022 in two single-mandate districts that failed to elect a qualified winner.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 1 / 4

Though international observers have deemed Kyrgyzstani electoral laws to be “generally adequate,” such laws are often selectively enforced. The November 2021 elections featured a number of administrative irregularities, including discrepancies in vote tallies; the exclusion of independent journalists from monitoring the polls; and the admission of Talant Mamytov, a close ally of Japarov, to the Yntymak party list despite his failure to comply with electoral rules.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 3 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 1 / 4

Citizens have the freedom to organize political parties and groupings, especially at the local level. Political parties are primarily vehicles for a handful of strong personalities, rather than mass organizations with clear ideologies and policy platforms.

Parties must pass a threshold to earn parliamentary seats, along with at least 0.5 percent of the vote in each of Kyrgyzstan's nine regional divisions. New legislation approved during the constitutional referendum in 2021 raised the national threshold to 5 percent; electoral amendments passed in 2020 had previously lowered the threshold from 7 percent to 3 percent.

Political parties were impeded by violence in the aftermath of the October 2020 parliamentary elections. Opposition parties excluded from the parliament attempted to collaborate in the formation of a transitional government but supporters of Japarov, acting with groups believed to maintain criminal connections, engaged in a campaign of street violence to intimidate supporters, with security forces failing to intervene.

Throughout 2021, opposition candidates and activists were subjected to a mass targeted wiretapping campaign, which the Interior Ministry defended as a legitimate security measure. In September, a member of Butun Kyrgyzstan was arrested for her "excessive and unfair criticism" of the government, which the Interior Ministry claimed was designed to inflame protest that in turn could lead to a "violent seizure of power."

A new constitution ratified in May 2021 reintroduced a superpresidential system while shrinking the size and role of parliament, undoing previous reforms that had been intended to promote political pluralism. The 2021 constitution also introduced the People's Kurultai, an unelected assembly, and granted it broad powers, including the ability to propose policies and legislation. Although opposition parties or individuals may gain power through elections, the new constitution weakens the role of political parties and of the parliament overall, transferring complete executive power—along with some legislative and judicial powers—back to the presidency.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 0 / 4

While largely free from military domination, Kyrgyzstani politics are subject to the influence of organized crime and economic oligarchies. Political affairs are generally controlled by a small group of elites who head competing patronage networks.

Criminal violence and intimidation marred the aftermath of the October 2020 parliamentary elections. Japarov supporters attacked an October 9 rally meant to bolster a potential transitional government, injuring its proposed prime minister and forcing several other politicians to flee. Speaker Isayev was also threatened by Japarov supporters before declining to serve as interim president later that month.

Similar extrapolitical tactics were employed during the November 2021 parliamentary elections. In December, a large group of men attacked elderly opposition leader Omurbek Tekebayev, reportedly telling him that he had been targeted because of his plans to protest the election results.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 1 / 4

Ethnic minority groups face political marginalization. Politicians from the Kyrgyz majority have used ethnic Uzbeks as scapegoats on various issues in recent years, and minority populations remain underrepresented in elected offices, even in areas where they form a demographic majority.

Women enjoy equal political rights and have attained some notable leadership positions, but they are also underrepresented, having won only 18 of the 90 seats in the 2021 parliamentary election despite a 30 percent gender quota for party candidate lists. Legislation enacted in 2019 extended the 30 percent gender quota to local municipal councils.

LGBT+ people are not legally excluded from pursuing political opportunities. However, discrimination and violence against pro-LGBT+ civic action groups are common, and typically go unaddressed by law enforcement.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 0 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 0 / 4

A new constitution, ratified in May 2021, significantly altered the structure of the government and resolved existing constitutional ambiguities regarding the division of power among the president, the prime minister, and the parliament, which had contributed to the instability of governments in recent years. The 2021 constitution eliminated the office of the prime minister and reduced the powers of the legislature, reintroducing a superpresidential system of government.

After former President Jeenbekov resigned amid protests in October 2020, neither his presidential successors nor their concurrently serving prime ministers were freely selected. A snap presidential election held in January 2021 elected Japarov to the presidency; however, the election was neither free nor fair, featuring significant procedural irregularities and a record low voter turnout. Though the results of the October 2020 parliamentary elections were annulled later that same month, the parliament continued to operate until new elections were held in November 2021—well beyond the expiration of its democratic mandate.

Corruption is pervasive in politics and government. Political elites use government resources to reward clients—including organized crime figures—and punish opponents. An anticorruption office within the GKNB was formed in 2012, but has primarily been used by incumbent presidents to target their political enemies in the parliament and municipal governments.

Throughout 2021, a wide range of former officials, business leaders, and organized crime leaders were detained repeatedly on corruption charges. Critics have described this “catch-and-release” pattern of arrests as both a political tool and a way for the government to generate revenue.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 0 / 4

Kyrgyzstani access-to-information laws are considered relatively strong, but implementation is poor in practice. Similarly, although public officials are obliged to disclose information on their personal finances, powerful figures are rarely held accountable for noncompliance or investigated for unexplained wealth. Oversight of public contracts is inadequate; corruption scandals in recent years have often centered on procurement deals or sales of state assets.

Kyrgyzstani officials were not transparent in disclosing COVID-19 infections or deaths; in January 2021, a government inquiry found that official data had been manipulated and pandemic-related deaths had been significantly underreported.

Government decisions were made, and key posts were claimed, in an opaque fashion in the aftermath of the annulled October 2020 elections. Japarov notably claimed the powers of the presidency immediately after Jeenbekov's resignation but before the parliament appointed him to the role. Meanwhile, the parliament eschewed a mandatory public comment period when deciding to amend the electoral code that month.

ADDITIONAL DISCRETIONARY POLITICAL RIGHTS QUESTION

Is the government or occupying power deliberately changing the ethnic composition of a country or territory so as to destroy a culture or tip the political balance in favor of another group? -1 / 0

Southern Kyrgyzstan has yet to fully recover from the ethnic upheaval of 2010, which included numerous documented instances of government involvement or connivance in violence against ethnic Uzbeks in the region, with the aim of tipping the political and economic balance in favor of the Kyrgyz elite. Many Uzbek homes and businesses were destroyed or seized. While intimidation has continued and little has been done to reverse the outcomes of the violence, some steps have been taken to restore Uzbek-language media in the region, and fears of further unrest have eased over time.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 23 / 60 (-1)

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 10 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 2 / 4

The media landscape is relatively diverse but divided along ethnic lines, and prosecutions for inciting ethnic hatred have tended to focus on minority writers despite the prevalence of openly racist and antisemitic articles in Kyrgyz-language media. A 2014 law criminalized the publication of "false information relating to a crime or offense" in the media, which international monitors saw as a contradiction of the country's 2011 decriminalization of defamation. The law assigns penalties of up to three years in prison, or five years if the claim serves the interests of organized crime or is linked to the fabrication of evidence.

Journalists and bloggers covering major events, including ongoing corruption cases, the COVID-19 response, and elections have regularly faced intimidation, detention, physical attack, and interference as they conducted their work. In April 2021, at least four journalists were detained by police, including two who had been attacked while monitoring polling stations.

The parliament passed new legislation on "false information" in July, under the direct guidance of Japarov and in violation of parliamentary procedure. The controversial law grants an unspecified government body the power to order service providers to block information deemed "false" by authorities and to create a database of those associated with online activity—including alleged defamation—that officials have flagged. Human rights activists claim that the legislation provides for legal censorship outside the courts.

All religious organizations must register with the authorities, a process that is often cumbersome and arbitrary. Groups outside the traditional Muslim and Orthodox Christian mainstream reportedly have difficulty obtaining registration, and the 2009 Law on Religion deems all unregistered groups illegal. Organizations such as the Jehovah's Witnesses often face police harassment. The government also monitors and restricts some Islamic groups, including the nonviolent Islamist movement Hizb ut-Tahrir and Yakyn Inkarn, which practices strict asceticism.

Some unregistered religious communities have nevertheless been able to practice their faiths without state intervention, and authorities have investigated and punished relatively rare acts of violence against religious figures or minorities.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 3 / 4

The government does not formally restrict academic freedom, though teachers and students have reportedly faced pressure to participate in political campaigns and voting.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 3 / 4

Private discussion is generally free in the country, and prosecutions of individuals for the expression of personal views on social media are rare. However, state and local authorities regularly raid homes where they believe members of banned groups like Hizb ut-Tahrir or certain religious minorities, such as Jehovah's Witnesses, meet to discuss their beliefs.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 4 / 12 (-1)

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 1 / 4

A 2012 law allows peaceful assembly, and small protests and civil disobedience actions, such as blocking roads, take place regularly. Nevertheless, domestic and international watchdogs have voiced concerns over violations of assembly rights, including arrests and other forms of interference. Far-right groups and criminal organizations are also known to intimidate and attack demonstrators.

Protests held after the October 2020 elections were marred by violence. Over 600 people were injured in clashes within two days of the poll, and one person was reportedly killed. The building housing the parliament and president's office was damaged.

Japarov supporters attacked and intimidated protesters and opposition groups after the annulled elections, notably disrupting a rally held to support a potential anti-Japarov transitional government. Ata-Meken parliamentary candidate Tilek Toktogazyev was seriously injured during the rally, while a car carrying former president Atambayev, who was freed from GKNB custody earlier that month and attended the rally, was shot at.

Throughout 2021, protesters were frequently subjected to violent assaults and arbitrary detention. In April, a group of "national-patriots" violently attacked a demonstration against gender-based violence as police looked on; the group accused the protesters of offending traditional Kyrgyzstani values. A five-year "moral development plan" to promote traditional values was passed by the Japarov government in July; the plan was criticized by human rights activists who fear it will be used to justify violence and discrimination against minority groups.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 1 / 4

NGOs are active in civic and political life. However, human rights workers, including those who support ethnic Uzbek victims, LGBT+ people, and women's groups, face threats, harassment, and physical attacks. Ultranationalists have harassed US and European NGOs as well as domestic counterparts that are perceived to be favored by foreign governments and donors.

In June 2021, amid growing anti-Western sentiment within the country, Japarov signed a law imposing onerous financial reporting requirements on any civil society organizations that accept funding from abroad. Proponents of the legislation claim it protects against foreign interference, including the imposition of “Western ideology” and “LGBT+ propaganda.” Human rights groups fear the law will be used to prevent independent NGOs from operating freely.

Score Change: The score declined from 2 to 1 because the government enacted a new law requiring NGOs to abide by burdensome financial reporting requirements or risk closure.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 2 / 4

Kyrgyzstani law provides for the formation of trade unions, which are generally able to operate without obstruction. However, parliamentarians have considered legislative amendments that would limit their ability to organize and would force them to affiliate with the Federation of Trade Unions of Kyrgyzstan (FTUK), which would serve as the country’s only national union. Japarov vetoed the amendments three times in 2021, returning the legislation to parliament for further review; the draft amendments remained under consideration at year’s end.

Strikes are prohibited in many sectors. Legal enforcement of union rights is weak, and employers do not always respect collective-bargaining agreements.

F. RULE OF LAW: 2 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 0 / 4

The judiciary is dominated by the executive branch. Corruption among judges is widespread. In 2019, the GKNB announced corruption charges against seven judges, including three sitting Supreme Court justices; the judges were accused of issuing rulings that favored organized criminal groups.

The judiciary provided little resistance to the opaque and procedurally questionable installation of Japarov as prime minister and president. The Supreme Court refused to consider a CEC appeal over the parliament’s decision to delay a rerun election and the Constitutional Chamber ruled the parliament’s decision to extend its own term constitutional.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 0 / 4

Defendants’ rights, including the presumption of innocence, are not always respected, and evidence allegedly obtained through torture is regularly accepted in courts.

Due process was not consistently upheld for high-profile prisoners released from GKNB custody in 2020. While Japarov’s convictions were overturned after his release, former president Atambayev, who received a corruption-related prison sentence in June and was released along with Japarov, was rearrested on charges of inciting unrest in October. Other politicians who escaped the GKNB during the protests were also sent back into custody.

In May 2021, the Japarov government seized the Kumtor gold mine from the Canada-based firm Centerra Gold. The mine accounts for around 12.5 percent of Kyrgyzstan’s GDP. Though Kyrgyzstan and Centerra Gold reportedly entered arbitration proceedings in September, no agreement had been announced by year’s end.

There are credible reports of torture during arrest and interrogation, in addition to physical abuse in prisons. Most such reports do not lead to investigations and convictions.

Uzbek human rights activist Azimjan Askarov, who was accused of organizing riots after acts of violence were perpetrated against ethnic Uzbeks in southern Kyrgyzstan in 2010, died of pneumonia while in custody in 2020. Askarov, who was tortured in detention, remained imprisoned despite his deteriorating health and repeated calls for his release. Meanwhile, few perpetrators of the 2010 violence have been brought to justice.

In April 2021, at least 34 people were killed during a border skirmish near the Vorukh exclave of Tajikistan grew into the most serious fighting between Kyrgyzstani and Tajikistani troops and border forces in recent years. Destruction of homes and property in both Kyrgyz and Tajik majority villages led to popular mobilization of ad-hoc citizen self-defense groups and intense ethnic tensions. The dispute between Tajikistan and Kyrgyzstan had not been resolved by the end of the year.

Legal bans on gender discrimination in the workplace are not effectively enforced. Traditional biases also put women at a disadvantage regarding education and access to services. Ethnic minorities—particularly Uzbeks, who make up nearly half of the population of the city of Osh—continue to face discrimination on economic, security, and other matters. Uzbeks are often targeted for harassment, arrest, and mistreatment by law enforcement agencies based on dubious terrorism or extremism charges. Same-sex sexual activity is not illegal, but discrimination against and abuse of LGBT+ people at the hands of police are pervasive. Ultranationalist groups have also engaged in intimidation of LGBT+ and feminist activists.

In June 2019, the government announced its intention to repatriate Kyrgyzstanis in Iraqi and Syrian territory previously controlled by the Islamic State militant group. In March 2021, the government returned 79 children born to Kyrgyzstanis in Iraq to their relatives in Kyrgyzstan; several hundred Kyrgyzstani women and children remain in detention camps in Syria.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 7 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 2 / 4

The government generally respects the right of unrestricted travel to and from Kyrgyzstan, though journalists and human rights activists sometimes face bans and other obstacles. Barriers to internal migration include a requirement that citizens obtain permits to work and settle in particular areas of the country.

The misuse of personal connections, corruption, and organized crime impair private business activity. The ethnic violence of 2010 has affected property rights in the south, as many businesses, mainly owned by ethnic Uzbeks, were destroyed or seized.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 2 / 4

Cultural constraints and inaction by law enforcement officials discourage victims of domestic violence and rape from contacting the authorities. Legislation enacted in 2017 aimed to broaden the definition of domestic abuse and improve both victim assistance and responses from law enforcement bodies, but the law is weakly enforced.

The practice of bride abduction persists despite the strengthening of legal penalties in 2013, and few perpetrators are prosecuted.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 1 / 4

The government does not actively enforce workplace health and safety standards. Child labor is restricted by law but reportedly occurs, particularly in the agricultural sector. The trafficking of women and girls into forced prostitution abroad is a serious problem. Police have been accused of complicity in the trafficking and exploitation of sex trafficking victims, and reportedly accept bribes from traffickers. Kyrgyzstani men are especially vulnerable to trafficking for forced labor abroad.

Laos

Population: 7,500,000

Capital: Vientiane

Freedom Status: Not Free

Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: Laos is a one-party state in which the ruling Lao People's Revolutionary Party (LPRP) dominates all aspects of politics and harshly restricts civil liberties. There is no organized opposition or independent civil society. News coverage of the country is limited by the remoteness of some areas, repression of domestic media, and the regime's opaque nature. Economic development has led to a rising tide of disputes over land and environmental issues and growing debt to China. In recent years, a wide-ranging anticorruption campaign has had some positive impact, though official corruption persists.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- In January, an LPRP party congress named former prime minister Thongloun Sisoulth secretary-general. In March, Thongloun was named state president by the National Assembly—whose members are neither freely nor fairly elected—while former vice president Phankham Viphavanh was named prime minister.
- The LPRP won 158 of the National Assembly's 164 seats in elections held in February. The remaining seats were won by independent candidates vetted by the LPRP.
- The first COVID-19-related death in the country was reported in May, and cases rose beginning in July. Some 110,000 cases and 360 deaths were reported to the World Health Organization (WHO) by year's end.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 2 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 0 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

Laos is a one-party communist state and the LPRP's 61-member Central Committee, under the leadership of the 11-member Politburo, makes all major decisions. The LPRP vets all candidates for election to the National Assembly, whose members elect the president and prime minister.

In an opaque January 2021 party congress, former prime minister Thongloun Sisoulth was named LPRP secretary-general. In March, Thongloun was named state president by the National Assembly, while former vice president Phankham Viphavanh was named prime minister.

National Assembly elections are held every five years, but are not free or fair, and international observers are not permitted to monitor them. The LPRP won 158 of the body's 164 seats in the February 2021 elections, with the remainder going to carefully vetted independents.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 0 / 4

The electoral laws and framework are designed to ensure that the LPRP, the only legal party, dominates every election and controls the political system.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 0 / 16B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 0 / 4

The constitution makes the LPRP the sole legal political party and grants it a leading role at all levels of government.

Although the LPRP is the only legal party, National Assembly candidates are not required to be members. However, all candidates must be approved by National Assembly-appointed committees, effectively barring genuine independents from contesting elections.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 0 / 4

Laos's authoritarian one-party system excludes the public from any genuine and autonomous political participation.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 0 / 4

The right to vote and run for office are constitutionally guaranteed, but due to the one-party system, no portion of the population may exercise full political rights and electoral opportunities. Nominal representatives of ethnic minorities hold positions in the Politburo, Central Committee, and National Assembly, but they are limited in their ability to advocate for policies that benefit their communities.

Women's interests are not addressed in the political system and women are poorly represented in the legislature; female candidates won 22 percent of the National Assembly's seats in the February 2021 elections, a decrease from the 27.5 percent figure attained in the 2016 polls.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 2 / 12C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 0 / 4

None of the country's nominally elected officials are chosen through free and fair contests, and major policy decisions are reserved for the LPRP and particularly a small cadre of top officials. The Central Committee and Politburo are the country's effective legislators as opposed to the National Assembly. In recent years, the government has more frequently passed laws, rather than decrees, to govern, though the representatives approving these bills do not represent the electorate.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 1 / 4

Corruption by government officials is widespread. Laws aimed at curbing graft are poorly enforced, and government regulation of virtually every facet of life provides many opportunities for bribery and fraud.

Thongloun initiated an anticorruption drive while serving as prime minister. The State Audit Organization, which gained the power to conduct financial and budget investigations during his premiership, uncovered instances of misappropriated state funds and unreported expenditures. Thongloun also took steps to address illegal or environmentally harmful extraction industries that have been conduits for corrupt activity, though his actions were largely unsuccessful.

Phankham, Thongloun's successor as prime minister, vowed to combat official corruption after taking office. National Assembly members have also criticized corruption and bribery in various sessions, though official corruption apparently remains common. Punishments, which can include "reeducation," are reportedly not issued through the judicial system but within the ruling party. In December 2021, Radio Free Asia (RFA) reported that eight state employees were disciplined and two were expelled from the LPRP after state inspectors discovered that investment projects in Bokeo Province were affected by embezzlement.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 1 / 4

There is no access to information law in Laos. However, the 2012 Law on Making Legislation increased legislative transparency by requiring bills proposed at the central and provincial levels to be published for comment for 60 days and, once passed, to be posted for 15 days before coming into force.

Authorities have withheld information about a 2018 dam collapse which resulted in 43 deaths. A 2019 report that blamed the collapse on substandard construction was never fully made public. Laos continues to plan new dams on the Mekong River, despite the 2018 collapse.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 11 / 60D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 3 / 16*D1. Are there free and independent media? 0 / 4

Authorities use legal restrictions and intimidation tactics against state critics, and as a result, self-censorship is widespread. The state owns nearly all media, though some independent outlets, primarily entertainment magazines that steer clear of political commentary, have emerged in recent years.

In 2019, the government required news outlets that disseminate material through social media to register themselves, threatening fines and prison sentences for noncompliance; the Information Ministry claimed the move was meant to arrest the spread of "fake news."

In July 2021, police in Savannakhet Province held and questioned musician Syphone Vongchinda, who performs as Ther Una and has recorded material criticizing official corruption. Ther Una was released later that month.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 1 / 4

Religious freedom is constitutionally guaranteed but is constrained in practice, in part through the LPRP's control of clergy training and supervision of Buddhist temples. There have been multiple cases in recent years of Christians being briefly detained or sentenced to jail for unauthorized religious activities, including planning funerals, or being pressured by authorities to renounce their faith. In April 2021, the government released a Christian pastor who had been detained for a year for "disrupting unity."

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 1 / 4

University professors cannot teach or write about politically sensitive topics, though Laos has invited select foreign academics to teach courses in the country.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 1 / 4

Security agencies and LPRP-backed mass organizations monitor for public dissent, which is punishable under a variety of laws. As a result, there is little space for open and free private discussion of sensitive issues. The government attempts to monitor social media usage for content and images that portray Laos negatively. In April 2021, President Thongloun made a speech calling for stricter social media controls. In May, the government formed a task force to monitor social networks.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 0 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 0 / 4

Although protected in the constitution, the government severely restricts freedom of assembly. Protests are rare, and those deemed to be participating in unsanctioned gatherings can receive lengthy prison sentences. The government occasionally allows demonstrations that pose little threat to the LPRP.

Alongside LPRP-affiliated mass organizations, there are some domestic nongovernmental welfare and professional groups, but they are prohibited from pursuing political agendas. Registration and regulatory mechanisms for nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) are onerous and allow for arbitrary state interference. A harsh decree on associations, which came into force in 2017, mandates that NGOs secure government approval for their initiatives and funding.

Human rights and prodemocracy activists are also at risk of unexplained disappearances. In 2019, Laotian prodemocracy activist Od Sayavong disappeared in Bangkok, where he resided. His whereabouts were unknown at the end of 2021. That same year, Phetphouthon Philachane, a Laotian citizen who demonstrated in front of the Laotian embassy in Bangkok, disappeared after returning to Laos.

Multiple Thai dissidents have disappeared, or turned up dead, in Laos and neighboring states in recent years.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 0 / 4

Most unions belong to the official Lao Federation of Trade Unions. Strikes are not expressly prohibited, but workers rarely stage walkouts. Collective bargaining is legally permitted, but rarely exercised by workers, as workers who try to engage in collective bargaining are usually punished.

F. RULE OF LAW: 2 / 16F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 0 / 4

Laotian courts are wracked by corruption and subject to LPRP influence. Major decisions are often made secretly.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 0 / 4

Due process rights are outlined but are routinely denied. Defendants are often presumed guilty, and long procedural delays in the judicial system are common. Appeals processes are often nonexistent or delayed, sometimes indefinitely. Warrantless searches and arbitrary arrests also occur. Villages are encouraged to settle noncriminal disputes, such as land disputes, in local mediation units, which are outside the formal judicial system and often result in unfair decisions against villagers.

Security forces often illegally detain suspects. Prison conditions are substandard, with reports of inadequate food and medical facilities.

Antigovernment groups have reportedly attacked border checkpoints and transportation hubs over the last two decades. In March 2021, antigovernment fighters reportedly fought troops in Xaysomboun Province; one fighter was reportedly killed.

Members of the Hmong ethnic group face violence at the hands of the military and other government authorities. In March 2021, a Hmong man was reportedly killed by soldiers while searching for food.

Prisoners are also subject to torture: A group of villagers from Xékong Province, who were detained after their 2017 protest, were reportedly tortured while in detention. In April 2021, the UN's special rapporteur on human rights defenders called for their release, stating that they had been denied a fair trial.

Equal rights are constitutionally guaranteed but are not upheld in practice. Discrimination against members of ethnic minority tribes is common. The Hmong, who fielded a guerrilla army allied with US forces during the Vietnam War, are particularly distrusted by the government and face harsh treatment.

While same-sex relations are legal and violence against LGBT+ people is rare, no legislation provides explicit protection against discrimination based on sexual preference or gender identity. Laotians have participated in modest events celebrating the LGBT+ community.

Gender-based discrimination and violence are widespread. Discriminatory norms and religious practices have contributed to women's limited access to education, employment opportunities, and worker benefits.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 6 / 16G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 2 / 4

The dominance of the LPRP over most aspects of society can effectively restrict individuals' ability to choose their place of residence, employment, or education. Freedom of movement is sometimes restricted for ethnic Hmong. Security checkpoints in central Laos can hamper travel, though the military has in recent years reduced controls there.

All land is owned by the state, though citizens have rights to use it. However, land rights have become a source of public discontent in recent years. Construction began on a high-speed rail line from China through Laos in 2016, resulting in large-scale displacement. The rail line was inaugurated in December 2021.

Villagers who live on or near the sites of planned dams are often forced to leave their homes and fields. In January 2021, residents of Luang Namtha Province who were displaced for a dam construction project reported that they received new homes but not land for agricultural purposes. In June, hundreds of people were forced to move for a coal-plant expansion project in northwestern Laos. In July, RFA reported that growing numbers of Laotian farmers were transitioning from agriculture to work in urban areas due to displacement.

Social freedoms can be restricted, especially for women and children. A 2016 survey supported by the UN and the WHO revealed that nearly a third of women in Laos had experienced domestic violence. Abortion is illegal and only permitted when the mother's life is at risk. Underage marriage is permitted with parental permission.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 1 / 4

Trafficking in persons, especially to Thailand, is common, and enforcement of anti-trafficking measures is hindered by a lack of transparency and weak rule of law. The US State Department's Trafficking in Persons Report 2021 notes that the Laotian government was working to combat human trafficking, though survivors were sometimes accused of prostitution by the authorities. The report calls the government's efforts to identify Laotian and foreign survivors insufficient. The lack of jobs in Laos due to COVID-19 has prompted greater trafficking of women to China.

Children as young as 12 years old may be legally employed in Laos. Workplace inspections, including those for industries considered hazardous, are legally required but do not take place regularly.

Latvia

Population: 1,900,000

Capital: Riga

Freedom Status: Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Latvia is a multiparty democracy whose elections are regarded as free and fair. Civil liberties are generally respected in law and in practice. However, corruption remains a major problem affecting politics, the judiciary, and the wider criminal justice system. The country's ethnic Russian population faces disadvantages in matters such as education and employment.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- In August, authorities declared a state of emergency after a growing number of migrants and asylum seekers from Iraq, Afghanistan, and elsewhere attempted to cross the Belarusian border into Latvia. The government subsequently authorized the use of militarized “push-back” measures, preventing legitimate refugees and asylum seekers with incomplete paperwork from entering the country. Around 450 people, mostly from Iraq, were detained that month, and over 3,800 people were prevented from crossing by the end of the year.
- In February, authorities banned retransmission of Russian Rossiya RTR television channel for a year for incitement of hatred, violence, and provocation of military conflict. A day later, 16 other Russian television channels were sanctioned, as they had not been granted permission for retransmission in Latvia.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 37 / 40A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 12 / 12*A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The Saeima (parliament) elects the president, who may serve up to two four-year terms. The prime minister, who holds most executive authority, is nominated by the president and approved by the parliament. Both Prime Minister Krišjānis Kariņš and President Egils Levits came to power in 2019 in an orderly and fair manner.

The constitution provides for a unicameral, 100-seat Saeima, whose members are elected to four-year terms under a proportional system from five multi-member districts. Electoral lists need to receive at least 5 percent of all votes cast to enter the Saeima.

The 2018 parliamentary elections were viewed as competitive and credible, and stakeholders accepted the results. All three previously governing parties recorded significant losses, producing a highly fragmented parliament. Seven electoral alliances won representation, and newly founded movements took 45 seats. After lengthy negotiations, a broad coalition of five conservative, liberal, and populist parties and alliances was formed in 2019 under the leadership of Kariņš of center-right New Unity.

In general, the electoral framework is implemented fairly. Local elections held in June 2021 were conducted competently, and were the first elections held after the reorganization of the administrative-territorial system in 2020, which reduced the number of municipalities from 119 to 42. Voting in two municipalities was postponed until September, and voting in Riga did not occur because an emergency election had been held in 2020.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 15 / 16B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 4 / 4

Latvia's political parties organize and compete freely, and elections often result in representation for newly founded parties or coalitions. However, candidates cannot run as independents (including in municipalities), and those who belonged to communist or pro-Soviet organizations after 1991 may not hold public office.

The country has experienced numerous peaceful transfers of power between rival parties, and opposition parties typically have a strong presence in the Saeima and in local governments. However, center-left Harmony and predecessor parties that were mostly supported by Latvia's Russian-speaking population have never been invited to participate in forming a government.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 4 / 4

Politically connected businesspeople historically exercised undue influence in the country, using patronage networks, corruption, and other opaque means to infringe on the autonomy of voters and candidates. However, the 2018 election defeat of the Union of Greens and Farmers (ZZS)—whose most prominent politician has long faced corruption allegations—and subsequent efforts by the new government to combat graft and money laundering have apparently reduced the improper influence of such figures.

Authorities and other observers continue to express concern about the presence of Russian government disinformation and propaganda in Latvian media, among other attempts by Moscow to influence domestic politics.

More than 200,000 of Latvia's registered residents are stateless—most of them are ethnic Russians—without the right to vote, hold public office, work in government offices, or establish political parties.

Though women have made gains in political participation, they only hold 31 percent of seats in the Saeima. LGBT+ people are poorly represented in Latvian politics, and parties have been reluctant to address their interests. In 2018, two openly LGBT+ people were elected to Parliament: Foreign Minister Edgars Rinkēvičs and lawmaker Marija Golubeva, who became the interior minister after a cabinet reshuffle in June 2021.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 10 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 4 / 4

The country's elected leadership can set and implement government policies without improper interference from foreign or unelected entities, and the politically diverse legislature provides a meaningful check on executive authority.

Latvian anticorruption and auditing bodies have historically been subject to politicization attempts, funding shortfalls, and a dearth of qualified personnel. However, the Corruption Prevention and Combating Bureau (KNAB) has recently expanded its activities, and saw a change of leadership via an open competition organized for the first time in 2020. The new general prosecutor—appointed by Parliament on the recommendations of a Justice Council—stepped up efforts to deal with cases of corruption and abuse of public duties.

Several high-profile figures were convicted of corruption in 2021. In February, prominent ZZS politician Aivars Lembergs—the former mayor of Ventspils and one of the richest people in the country—was sentenced to five years in prison. Former prime minister Andris Šķēle and former transport minister Ainars Šlesers were also indicted.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 3 / 4

The legislative framework features extensive provisions intended to ensure government transparency. However, there is a notable lack of transparency in the functioning of state-owned companies and in public procurement processes.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 51 / 60 (-1)

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 14 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 3 / 4

While Latvian media outlets publicize a wide range of political views in both Latvian and Russian, the ownership of both traditional and digital media outlets are highly concentrated. Editorial autonomy of private media is vulnerable to business interests, as well as to political meddling in certain cases. Public media are largely financed by annual allocations of the state budget, which can lead to improper influence. The National Electronic Mass Media Council (NEPLP), the country's media regulator, is formed by the parliament and perceived to be occasionally influenced by politicians. Libel remains a criminal offense.

Authorities have occasionally restricted access to Russian radio and news websites, citing concerns about propaganda. Lagging media literacy, the spread of hate speech, and an increase in online attacks against journalists are growing concerns.

In February 2021, the NEPLP banned retransmission of Russian Rossiya RTR television channel for a year for incitement of hatred, violence, and provocation of military conflict. A day later, it also sanctioned 16 other Russian television channels because it was unclear whether permission had been granted for their retransmission in Latvia.

Freedom of religion is generally respected. However, Latvia's small Muslim population has faced some social pressure since a 2015 refugee crisis.

While academic freedom is largely upheld, lawmakers have begun to place some limitations on instruction in recent years.

Authorities in 2018 endeavored to discourage or eliminate the use of minority languages in schools and universities, and the measures were generally viewed as targeting Russian-language instruction. After a Constitutional Court ruling, the Saeima amended the legislation in April 2021 to allow university-level instruction in other official European Union (EU) languages.

There are few restrictions on personal expression or private discussion. However, legal constraints include a ban on the public display of Soviet or Nazi symbols as well as prohibitions on incitement to ethnic hatred and denial of historical crimes.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 12 / 12E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

Freedom of assembly is protected by law and generally respected in practice. The government restricted public gatherings as a public health measure to mitigate the spread of COVID-19 in 2020 and 2021.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 4 / 4

The government does not restrict the activities of nongovernmental organizations (NGOs). However, advocacy by NGOs is often viewed as partisan activity.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 4 / 4

Workers may establish trade unions, strike, and engage in collective bargaining, and antiunion discrimination is prohibited. In practice, the share of workers covered by collective-bargaining agreements has declined over time and covered around 27 percent of the workforce in 2018, according to the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD). A 2019 law imposed fines on employers that refuse to negotiate a collective agreement, among other potential violations.

F. RULE OF LAW: 11 / 16 (-1)F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 3 / 4

While judicial independence is generally respected, inefficiency, politicization, and corruption within the judicial system persist.

Legislation that took effect in 2020 increased transparency and the judiciary's role in the selection of both new judges and the country's prosecutor general, with candidates applying through an open competition. However, institutions within the judiciary continue to function with limited resources.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 3 / 4

The legal framework provides safeguards against arbitrary arrest and guarantees for fair trial procedures. In general, the efficiency of the court system has been improving and the duration of civil, commercial, and administrative cases in court corresponds to or is shorter than the EU average. However, the court system has been hampered by corruption and inefficiency, and defendants with adequate resources have exploited these weaknesses to delay or obstruct prosecutions.

Criminal suspects are sometimes interrogated without the presence of a lawyer, and lengthy or unnecessary pretrial detention remains a concern.

Latvians are generally free from major threats to physical security, though the country has comparatively high levels of violent crime by EU standards. Latvia also has one of the EU's higher prison population rates. Some prison facilities reportedly suffer from poor physical conditions and episodes of violence.

The constitution guarantees equality before the law and the protection of human rights without discrimination, and several safeguards are specified in law. However, state language policies discriminate against ethnic minority groups in education, employment, and access to services.

The COVID-19 pandemic has further marginalized the Russian-speaking population, which has lower vaccination rates than the overall population. The government chose not to create vaccination campaigns in any foreign language, including Russian, and simultaneously restricted unvaccinated people from entering public spaces.

Women continue to suffer from a gender-based pay gap in practice, and Roma in Latvia face discrimination in schools and workplaces. Discrimination in employment based on sexual orientation is prohibited, but the law does not provide broader protection against discrimination for LGBT+ people.

In August 2021, authorities declared a state of emergency after a growing number of migrants and asylum seekers from Iraq, Afghanistan, and elsewhere attempted to enter Latvia from Belarus. The government subsequently authorized the use of militarized “push-back” measures, preventing many legitimate refugees and asylum seekers with incomplete paperwork from entering the country. Around 450 people who crossed the border, many of whom were from Iraq, were detained that month, and over 3,800 people were prevented from crossing into Latvia through the end of 2021.

Score Change: The score declined from 3 to 2 due to authorities’ militarized pushback against and lack of asylum procedures for migrants attempting to enter the country from Belarus.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 14 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

Citizens and noncitizens may travel freely within the country and internationally. Movement restrictions imposed during the COVID-19 pandemic were generally seen as legitimate public health measures.

The legal and regulatory framework supports an environment in which property rights are respected and people may freely operate businesses, though corruption can impede business activities.

Individual freedom regarding personal status matters such as marriage and divorce is generally upheld, but a constitutional ban on same-sex marriage was adopted in 2005. While lawmakers have repeatedly declined to recognize same-sex partnerships, the Constitutional Court ruled in favor of parental leave for same-sex couples. In April 2021, it also ruled inheritance taxation laws should treat same-sex and opposite-sex partners in families equally.

Laws on domestic violence encompass various forms of abuse and provide for protection orders and criminal charges. However, police do not always take meaningful action when cases are reported. Latvia had not ratified the Council of Europe’s Istanbul Convention on violence against women as of 2021.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 3 / 4

Legal protections against exploitative working conditions are generally upheld, though enforcement is uneven in the large informal sector of the economy. Informal workers are more vulnerable to labor abuses and recruitment into criminal enterprises. According to Eurostat, 26 percent of Latvia's population was at risk of social exclusion or poverty as of 2020.

The US State Department's 2021 Trafficking in Persons report found that Latvians are subject to trafficking for sexual exploitation, domestic servitude, and forced labor abroad, while a growing number of foreign migrant workers in Latvia are exposed to labor exploitation.

Lebanon

Population: 6,800,000

Capital: Beirut

Freedom Status: Partly Free

Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: Lebanon's political system ensures representation for its officially recognized religious communities, but limits competition and impedes the rise of cross-communal or civic parties. While residents enjoy some civil liberties and media pluralism, they also suffer from pervasive corruption and major weaknesses in the rule of law. The country's large population of noncitizens, including refugees and migrant workers, remain subject to legal constraints and societal attitudes that severely restrict their access to employment, freedom of movement, and other fundamental rights.

- In January, security forces clashed with demonstrators in Tripoli as they protested the extension of COVID-19-related restrictions on movement, which had exacerbated the country's ongoing economic collapse. Further protests related to the economic situation occurred later in the year.
- Prime minister-designate Saad Hariri resigned in July after failing to organize a government despite nine months of negotiations and citing differences with President Michel Aoun. A new government headed by Najib Mikati was installed in September, ending a 13-month stalemate since the last government collapsed in 2020, though ongoing disagreements prevented cabinet meetings from mid-October through the end of the year.
- In October, an armed confrontation in Beirut between supporters of the Shiite factions Hezbollah and the Amal Movement on the one hand and the Christian faction Lebanese Forces on the other left seven people dead and at least 32 others injured. The Shiite groups had been protesting a judicial investigation into the devastating August 2020 chemical explosion at the port of Beirut, for which several former officials faced charges.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 13 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 5 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 1 / 4

The president, who is elected to a six-year term by the parliament, appoints the prime minister after consulting with the parliament. The president and prime minister choose the cabinet, which holds most formal executive power. According to long-standing agreements on sectarian power-sharing, the president must be a Maronite Christian, the prime minister must be a Sunni Muslim, and the speaker of parliament must be a Shiite Muslim.

In 2016, after a two-year vacancy, lawmakers elected former military commander Michel Aoun as president. While the move eased the country's broader political deadlock, the parliament at the time had been operating with an expired electoral mandate for three years, undermining the democratic legitimacy of the presidential election.

For much of 2021, Lebanon's political leaders struggled to form a government in the wake of Prime Minister Hassan Diab's resignation in August 2020, in the wake of the chemical explosion at the port of Beirut. Prime minister-designate Saad Hariri withdrew in July after nine months of inconclusive negotiations, citing differences with the president. Aoun then asked Najib Mikati—who had served as prime minister twice before, most recently in 2011–14—to form a new government, which took office in September.

Members of the 128-seat National Assembly are elected for four-year terms. The most recent elections were held in 2018, after a five-year delay; the parliament elected in 2009 had repeatedly extended its own term, citing the need for electoral reforms as well as security concerns related to the civil war in Syria.

In the 2018 elections, the Shiite militant group Hezbollah and its allies, including Christian factions linked to President Aoun, made gains overall, leaving them with a clear majority of seats. The Hezbollah-led bloc's chief rival, Hariri's Sunni-led Future Movement, lost more than a third of its seats, though its main Christian partners performed well, nearly doubling their representation. While the elections were conducted peacefully and were free and fair in many respects, vote buying was rampant, and the electoral framework retained a number of fundamental structural flaws associated with the sectarian political system. Turnout was less than 50 percent nationally and even lower in several contested districts.

In December 2021, the interior minister and the president signed a decree scheduling the next parliamentary elections for May 2022.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 2 / 4

Lebanon does not have an independent electoral commission; instead, the Interior Ministry oversees elections. Parliamentary seats are divided among major sects under a constitutional formula that does not reflect their current demographic weight. While seat allocations have been adjusted through political agreements to resolve major impasses over the years, there has been no official census in Lebanon since the 1930s, prior to independence. The electoral framework is inclusive and supports pluralism, but it is the product of bargaining among established leaders and tends to entrench the existing sectarian and communalist political system.

The 2017 electoral law introduced proportional representation and preferential voting, and improved opportunities for diaspora voting. However, the rules for redistricting and seat allocation still favored incumbent parties. The law sharply raised registration fees for candidates as well as spending caps for campaigns, while allowing private organizations and foundations to promote coalitions and candidates, effectively increasing the advantages of wealthier groups and individuals. As under past electoral laws, members of the military and citizens who had been naturalized for less than 10 years could not participate.

The final months of 2021 featured disagreements over the timing of the next parliamentary elections and the role of diaspora voters. A parliamentary majority sought to hold the balloting in March 2022 rather than May, so as to avoid campaigning during Ramadan, but the president ultimately rejected the change. The Lebanese diaspora, which registered in large numbers, would be able to vote for all 128 seats; a leading Christian party had appealed to the Constitutional Council to limit diaspora voting to six dedicated seats, but the council did not reach consensus on the appeal, leaving the existing rule in place.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 7 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 3 / 4

Citizens are formally free to organize in different political groupings, and scores of parties compete in practice. While parties do rise and fall based on their performance and voters' preferences, most of Lebanon's political parties are vehicles for an established set of communal leaders who benefit from patronage networks, greater access to financing, and other advantages of incumbency.

The elites who dominate Lebanese politics include traditional leaders, military veterans, former militia leaders, and wealthy businessmen. Under the country's power-sharing system, none of the parties they control consistently behave as opposition groups. Consolidation of power among political elites also hampers intraparty competition.

Despite the new electoral system introduced in 2017, the political parties and alliances that prevailed before the reform have maintained their positions. They not only benefited from advantages under laws they shaped, but also used intimidation, social pressure, and propaganda to marginalize new political forces.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 1 / 4

A variety of forces that are not democratically accountable—including entrenched patronage networks, religious institutions, armed nonstate actors such as Hezbollah, and competing foreign powers—use a combination of financial incentives and intimidation to exert influence on Lebanese voters and political figures. The 2018 elections featured credible allegations of corruption, widespread vote buying, and analyses pointing to the role of establishment parties' patronage networks in mobilizing or incentivizing voters.

Lebanon officially recognizes 18 religious communities, and the political system ensures that nearly all of these groups are represented, though not according to their actual shares of the population. Individuals who are not, or do not wish to be, affiliated with the recognized groups are effectively excluded. Moreover, the country's large refugee population, including residents of Palestinian refugee camps and Syrians who fled their country's civil war, are not eligible to acquire citizenship and have no political rights.

Women formally have the same political rights as men. In practice, women remain marginalized due to religious restrictions, institutionalized inequality, hidden legal obstacles, political culture, and societal discrimination. Neither the 2017 electoral law nor informal understandings regarding power-sharing include rules to guarantee women's participation in politics. Few women serve in the parliament as a result, though more female candidates participated in the 2018 elections than in previous contests: 111 women registered, with 86 ultimately running as candidates. Only six women were elected.

LGBT+ people have little political representation. However, more politicians have expressed support for their rights in recent years; nearly 100 parliamentary candidates in 2018 publicly called for the decriminalization of same-sex sexual relations.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 1 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 1 / 4

When the government is able to develop policies, they tend to be the result of negotiation among the country's dominant political figures, regardless of formal titles and positions; meanwhile, the legislature generally facilitates these policies rather than serving as an independent institutional check on the government. The authority of the government is also limited in practice by the power of autonomous militant groups like Hezbollah and foreign states with interests in Lebanon.

The overdue elections of a president, parliament, parliament speaker, and prime minister between 2016 and 2019 eased the country's years-long political deadlock. However, since Saad Hariri resigned as prime minister in late 2019, the system has been unstable. After Prime Minister Diab resigned in August 2020, he and his cabinet served only as caretakers, lacking the power in law and in practice to govern effectively. In July 2021, nine months after he was assigned to form a new government, Hariri stepped down as prime minister-designate, having failed to accomplish his task. The new prime minister-designate, Najib Mikati, successfully formed a government in September, but continued disagreement among the political factions prevented the cabinet from meeting after mid-October, and the impasse remained unresolved at year's end.

Corruption is endemic. Political and bureaucratic corruption is widespread, businesses routinely pay bribes and cultivate ties with politicians to win contracts or avoid unfavorable state actions, anticorruption laws are loosely enforced, and patronage networks generally operate unchecked. State expenditures remain irregular, with few mechanisms for effective oversight. Institutions such as the Central Inspection Bureau and Supreme Disciplinary Board are woefully underfunded and understaffed. When anticorruption institutions do take action, it tends to be selective or politicized. Chronic corruption has affected state-owned companies and utilities, contributing to poor service delivery and routine electricity blackouts. In 2021 these were exacerbated by fuel shortages linked to the broader economic crisis, and the lack of power affected vital services like the supply and treatment of drinking water.

Political leaders and government officials often operate behind closed doors, outside of state institutions, and with little regard for formal procedures. Although civil society groups have some ability to influence pending policies or legislation, and may along with the media discuss proposals that have been made public, their influence is often contingent on participation in opaque processes. The National Assembly approved an access to information law in 2017, but it is not fully implemented, and government documents remain difficult to obtain in practice.

In the aftermath of the Beirut port explosion in August 2020, the state responded in opaque and arbitrary ways, withholding information and employing special emergency powers intermittently or selectively. The justice minister, through a nontransparent process, appointed a judge to lead an investigation of the explosion, which was caused by dangerous chemicals that had been left for years in a port warehouse. In December 2020 the judge charged Diab and three former cabinet ministers with criminal negligence; leading political figures denounced the decision, and some officials refused to cooperate with the probe. Attempts to obstruct the investigation continued during 2021. The judge was replaced in February, and political disagreement over the matter contributed to the Mikati's government's dysfunction late in the year, but the probe continued at year's end.

Since 2019, the country has been suffering through one of the worst economic crises in world history, with a precipitous currency collapse underscoring concerns about transparency at the central bank and accountability for years of mismanagement that led to the crisis.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 29 / 60 (-1)

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 10 / 16 (-1)

D1. Are there free and independent media? 2 / 4

Press freedom is constitutionally guaranteed but inconsistently upheld. While the country's media are among the most open and diverse in the region, nearly all outlets depend on the patronage of political parties, wealthy individuals, or foreign powers, and consequently practice some degree of self-censorship. Books, movies, plays, and other artistic works are subject to censorship, especially when the content involves politics, religion, sex, or Israel, and the artists responsible for work deemed controversial by the government or major religious groups face official interference. It is a criminal offense to criticize or defame the president or security services. Authorities sometimes use such laws to harass and detain journalists, and those detained are often forced to sign pledges to refrain from writing content viewed as defamatory by the government.

Authorities have failed to protect the media from violence or intimidation by members of political, religious, and other influential groups. Both security forces and supporters of political parties have attacked reporters covering protests, and several journalists have experienced harassment and threats of violence online.

Despite the legal and practical obstacles they face, many journalists have been able to report and comment on sensitive topics such as state corruption, elite malfeasance, and the behavior of armed factions like Hezbollah. However, the financial viability of their work has been threatened by the economic collapse. Prominent media outlets have shut down as a result of the deteriorating situation, including the Daily Star, Lebanon's oldest English-language daily newspaper, which closed at the end of October 2021.

The constitution protects freedom of conscience, and the state does not typically interfere with the practice or expression of religious faith or nonbelief. While blasphemy is a criminal offense, enforcement varies and is generally lax. Individuals may face societal pressure to express faith or allegiance to a confessional community. Leaders and members of different communities discourage proselytizing by other groups.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 3 / 4

Academic freedom is generally unimpaired. Individuals are mostly free to select subjects for research and disseminate their findings. However, various laws and customary standards—including restrictions on defamation, blasphemy, and work or opinions related to Israel—limit debate on certain issues. The state does not engage in extensive political indoctrination through education, though religious and other nonstate entities do seek to reinforce communal identities and perspectives.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 2 / 4 (-1)

Private discussion and public expression of personal views on political and other controversial topics have been increasingly inhibited in recent years. Repressive laws that criminalize defamation or otherwise restrict speech remain on the books, and individuals sometimes face police questioning, arrests, short detentions, or fines if they criticize the government, the military, foreign heads of state, or other powerful entities. Noncitizens, including refugees and migrant workers, have fewer legal protections and may be especially reluctant to engage in speech that could draw the attention of the security services.

Lebanese authorities often use cameras to record people in public places, and regularly monitor social media and electronic communications—including those of prominent individuals such as politicians, dissidents, and journalists. Security personnel have reportedly infiltrated the social media groups of activists and protesters in recent years.

Authorities also fail to protect people from nonstate actors, such as political parties or militant groups and their supporters, that may monitor and punish them for expressing critical opinions. Since the outbreak of mass protests against corruption and governance failures in 2019, journalists, activists, and outspoken social media users have increasingly faced physical attacks and online threats or harassment by such powerful groups. Mariam Seifeddine, a journalist who has been critical of Hezbollah and other elements of the political elite, has reported multiple threats and physical assaults directed at her and her family members, including during 2021. In the year's most high-profile attack, columnist and commentator Lokman Slim, also a well-known critic of Hezbollah who had reported death threats, was murdered in February. Such apparent reprisals help to deter free expression by less prominent individuals in Lebanese society.

Score Change: The score declined from 3 to 2 due to a multiyear escalation in threats and violence against critics of powerful political and militant groups.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 8 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 3 / 4

The authorities generally respect the right to assemble, which is protected under the constitution, and people routinely gather without permits or coordination with security services in practice. Demonstrators have been able to mount protests against government dysfunction and lack of services in recent years, but the events have often featured violence by authorities, political parties, militia groups, and civilian participants.

For example, in January 2021, security forces clashed with demonstrators in Tripoli as they protested the extension of COVID-19-related restrictions on movement, resulting in a number of injuries and the death of at least one demonstrator. Arrested participants allegedly faced abuse in custody and charges in military courts. In August, police again fought with demonstrators as they demanded accountability for the Beirut port explosion a year earlier. Supporters of various political parties also beat protesters or attacked their encampments during the year. In October, a Hezbollah-led protest demanding the removal of the judge leading the investigation of the port explosion degenerated into an armed clash between Hezbollah and the Amal Movement on the one hand and the Lebanese Forces faction on the other. The confrontation left seven people dead and at least 32 others injured. In November, protesters blocked highways and intersections in major cities to protest the government's mismanagement of the worsening economic crisis.

Nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) tend to operate freely in Lebanon, though they must comply with the Law on Associations—which has been modified but not comprehensively overhauled since its enactment in 1909—and other applicable laws relating to labor, finance, and immigration. NGOs must also register with the Interior Ministry, which may oblige them to undergo an approval process and can investigate a group's founders, officers, and staff. NGOs sometimes face bureaucratic obstruction or intimidation by security services, depending on their line of work or particular initiatives. Groups that focus on Syria-related matters or are led and staffed by Syrian refugees are especially prone to scrutiny and interference.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 2 / 4

Individuals may establish, join, and leave trade unions and other professional organizations. However, the Labor Ministry has broad authority over the formation of unions, union elections, and the administrative dissolution of unions. The state regulates collective bargaining and strikes. Public employees, agricultural workers, and household workers are not protected by the labor code and have no legal right to organize, though they have formed unrecognized representative organizations. While noncitizen legal residents may join unions under the law, migrant workers have fewer union rights, and large numbers of refugees lack legal status or the right to work.

Many unions are linked to established political parties and serve as tools of influence for political leaders. However, activists affiliated with the 2019 protest movement have successfully challenged incumbent forces in recent elections within some unions and professional associations.

F. RULE OF LAW: 5 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 1 / 4

Lebanon's judiciary is not independent. Political leaders exercise significant influence over judicial appointments, jurisdiction, processes, and decisions, which are also affected by corruption and the undue influence of other prominent people.

Hezbollah and its political allies have repeatedly sought to replace the judge leading the investigation into the 2020 Beirut port explosion. Former officials implicated in the case secured a February 2021 court ruling that removed the first judge, Fadi Sawan, for potential bias. The same political forces accused his replacement, Tarek Bitar, of bias, boycotted government meetings over the issue, and persuaded supporters to protest against him. Defendants and suspects filed multiple legal challenges seeking Bitar's recusal that delayed the investigation during the year, but he continued to lead it at year's end.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 1 / 4

Due process is subject to a number of impediments, including violations of defendants' right to counsel and extensive use of lengthy pretrial detention. Due process guarantees are particularly inadequate in the country's exceptional courts, including the military courts, whose judges do not require a background in law and are authorized to try civilians and juveniles in security-related cases. In practice, military courts have asserted jurisdiction over cases involving human rights activists and protesters in addition to those focused on alleged spies and militants.

Residents of southern Lebanon have lived with the risk of land-mine detonation since the 1975–90 civil war, and armed militias, terrorist groups, and criminal organizations continue to undermine security in the country. In addition to the armed clashes in October 2021 between Hezbollah and the Amal Movement on the one hand and the Lebanese Forces faction on the other, smaller-scale violence involving organized crime and powerful local clans took a number of lives. At least 25 people reportedly died in clan-related violence between January 2020 and April 2021.

In May 2021, during an escalation of violence between Israeli forces and Palestinian militants in the Gaza Strip, the Israeli army announced that multiple rockets were launched from Lebanon toward Israel but caused no damage or casualties. Israeli forces responded by firing artillery at the sources of the rocket attacks. Also that month, a Lebanese man died after the Israeli military fired on him and a group of other young men as they tried to breach the border fence.

Prisons and detention centers are badly overcrowded and poorly equipped, and the use of torture by law enforcement, military, and state security personnel continues despite the passage of antitorture legislation and the creation of institutional mechanisms to halt the practice.

The country's legal system is meant to protect members of recognized confessional communities against mistreatment by the state, but groups have engaged in discriminatory behavior toward one another in practice, and people who do not belong to a recognized community have difficulty obtaining official documents, government jobs, and other services.

Women face discrimination in wages, benefits, and societal standards and practices, and are barred from certain types of employment.

LGBT+ people face both official and societal discrimination and harassment. A criminal code provision barring same-sex sexual relations remains in force, and people who violate this law risk a one-year prison sentence.

More than 1.5 million Syrians resided in Lebanon as of 2021. Of that number, some 841,000 were officially registered as refugees by the Office of the UN High Commissioner for Refugees; the government has barred the agency from registering new Syrian refugees since 2015. Syrian refugees have faced arbitrary arrests and other forms of harassment, and most live in poverty due in part to limitations on their employment options. The government has also enforced housing regulations to compel Syrian refugees to destroy their informal camps, threatening to use the military against those who did not comply. Syrians have sometimes been deported despite the risk of mistreatment by Syrian authorities.

About 479,000 Palestinian refugees are registered in Lebanon, though fewer than 200,000 actually live there. Many reside in 12 designated refugee camps and are restricted from 39 professions, contributing to widespread poverty, unemployment, and underemployment. In 2019, Lebanese authorities issued new regulations requiring foreigners to possess work permits, further restricting Palestinians' access to the labor market.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 6 / 16G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 1 / 4

Citizens enjoy constitutional and legal rights to freedom of movement. With few formal restrictions, they are able to travel within Lebanon. Nevertheless, citizens find it extremely difficult to transfer official places of residence for voting purposes. They also face de facto sectarian boundaries and militia checkpoints in some areas.

Noncitizens are subject to much harsher restrictions on movement. Many Palestinians classified as refugees live in designated camps, and access to those areas is controlled and often constrained by Lebanese security services. Many Syrian refugees live in informal camps or smaller settlements, and are subject to curfews and other obstacles to movement.

Migrant workers face severe restrictions on movement under a sponsorship system that revokes their residency rights if they are dismissed by their designated employers. Employers often confiscate migrant workers' passports, further reducing their autonomy.

Lebanese law protects citizens' rights to own property and operate private businesses, but powerful groups and individuals sometimes engage in land-grabbing and other infringements without consequence, and business activity is impaired by bureaucratic obstacles and corruption.

Refugees, including longtime Palestinian residents, have few property rights. Women have weaker property rights than men under the religious codes that govern inheritance and other personal status issues in Lebanon, and they often face family pressure to transfer property to male relatives.

Because the religious codes and courts of each confessional community determine personal status law in Lebanon, people's rights regarding marriage, divorce, and child custody depend on their affiliation, though women are typically at a disadvantage compared with men. Partners seeking to enter an interfaith marriage often travel abroad, as Lebanon recognizes civil marriages performed elsewhere. Women cannot pass Lebanese citizenship to non-Lebanese spouses or children of non-Lebanese fathers.

Article 522 of the penal code, which allowed rapists to evade criminal prosecution if they subsequently married their victims for a period of at least three years, was repealed in 2017. However, the change did not affect a similar article related to sex with a minor, and spousal rape is still not a criminal offense.

Same-sex marriage remains illegal in Lebanon. However, transgender people have some legal precedent allowing them to live publicly based on their gender identity; a 2016 Court of Appeals ruling allowed a transgender man to legally change his gender in the civil registry and supported the plaintiff's desire to seek gender confirmation surgery.

Citizens' communal affiliation can either enhance or restrict their economic opportunities in a given area, company, or public-sector entity, depending on which group is in a dominant position. Individuals must also contend with political patronage and clientelism, layered on top of communally enabled corruption, in the public and private sectors.

All residents of Lebanon have faced hardship amid the economic crisis that emerged in 2019, featuring rampant inflation, currency devaluation, import shortages, and a sharp rise in poverty rates. However, noncitizens, such as refugees and migrant workers, are subject to particular disadvantages and have long been especially vulnerable to exploitative working conditions and sex trafficking. The authorities do not effectively enforce laws against child labor, which is common among Syrian refugees, rural Lebanese, and segments of the urban poor.

Household workers and migrant workers who operate under the sponsorship system routinely suffer from economic exploitation. Employers are favored in legal cases involving migrant workers, discouraging the latter from reporting denial of wages as well as physical, psychological, and sexual abuse. Beginning in 2020, as the economy collapsed, some employers abandoned their non-Lebanese employees near their home countries' embassies, often without fulfilling their contractual obligation to provide for the workers' return flights.

Lesotho

Population: 2,200,000

Capital: Maseru

Freedom Status: Partly Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Lesotho is a constitutional monarchy. In recent years, the army's involvement in the country's already fragile politics has resulted in political instability and a security crisis. Corruption remains a challenge. Customary practice and law restrict women's rights in areas such as property, inheritance, and marriage and divorce.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- The stability of the coalition government was threatened throughout the year by factionalism within the ruling All Basotho Convention (ABC), and in December, the ABC attempted to replace Prime Minister Moeketsi Majoro. Majoro refused to resign without a parliamentary vote of no confidence and remained in office at year's end.
- A governance reform project facilitated by the South African Development Community (SADC) continued throughout the year, leading to several legal reforms, including the December adoption of legislation intended to enhance media freedom in the country. However, the reform process was jeopardized by the withdrawal of the opposition Lesotho Congress for Democracy (LCD) party in December after its leader, Mothetjoa Metsing, was charged with treason and murder.
- In May, over 40,000 garment workers participated in a national strike to demand higher wages and improved working conditions. Security forces responded to the protests with excessive force, injuring a number of striking workers and resulting in the deaths of two others.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 27 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 10 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 3 / 4

Lesotho is a constitutional monarchy. King Letsie III serves as the ceremonial head of state. The prime minister is head of government; the head of the majority party or coalition automatically becomes prime minister following elections, making the prime minister's legitimacy largely dependent on the conduct of the polls. In May 2020, the ABC-led coalition government collapsed when then prime minister Thomas Thabane, who was being investigated for the 2017 murder of his estranged former wife, resigned after months of political uncertainty and increasing pressure from within the ABC and among coalition partners calling for his resignation. The ABC and opposition Democratic Congress (DC) formed a new coalition government with Moeketsi Majoro of the ABC as prime minister later that month.

The prime minister can advise the king to dissolve Parliament and call a new election, but members of the lower house voted to restrict this ability by constitutional amendment in October 2019. In May 2020, the king assented to the law, effectively limiting the powers of the prime minister. Unsuccessful attempts to topple the coalition government in 2021 left Majoro's position in government tenuous; in December, the ABC recalled Majoro, intending to install cabinet minister Nkaku Kabi as prime minister. Majoro refused to resign, arguing that only Parliament can remove him through a vote of no confidence. He remained in office at year's end.

The lower house of Parliament, the National Assembly, has 120 seats; 80 are filled through first-past-the-post constituency votes, and the remaining 40 through proportional representation. The Senate—the upper house of Parliament—consists of 22 principal chiefs who wield considerable authority in rural areas and whose membership is hereditary, along with 11 other members appointed by the king and acting on the advice of the Council of State. Members of both chambers serve five-year terms.

In 2017, the DC-led coalition government lost a no-confidence vote, triggering the third legislative election since 2012. Election observers declared the contest peaceful, generally well administered, and competitive. However, isolated instances of political violence were noted, as was a heavy security presence at many polling places, which electoral officials said intimidated some voters. The ABC won a plurality of seats and formed a coalition government.

In May 2020, the coalition government collapsed after Thabane's resignation, and the ABC formed a new coalition with the DC later in the month. The current coalition government has faced continuous threats to its existence since its creation, largely due to infighting within the ruling ABC and tensions between coalition partners.

Although the Independent Electoral Commission (IEC) faces capacity constraints, and the credibility of the voters' roll has been questioned in the past, the IEC has been commended for its independence and its efforts to uphold electoral laws and oversee credible elections. International observers broadly commended the IEC's administration of the 2017 snap poll but noted deficiencies they linked to a lack of capacity, including late disbursement of campaign funds to political parties. A lack of funds prevented the IEC from carrying out critical operations in 2021, including its work on demarcating constituencies, and resulted in the cancellation of planned by-elections. In December, the IEC reported that the lack of funding was affecting its preparations for the 2022 general elections.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 11 / 16B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 3 / 4

Political parties may form freely and are allocated funding by the IEC, and 27 parties contested the 2017 election. However, politics have been unstable since a failed 2014 coup. In recent years, the country has seen politically motivated assassinations and assassination attempts, and political leaders operate within the country at some risk to their personal safety.

Opposition parties have a realistic chance of gaining power through elections, and power has rotated frequently between DC- and ABC-led coalitions. However, political instability and associated violence and intimidation has at times prompted opposition leaders to flee the country. The SADC facilitated a governance reform process to address these concerns, culminating in the creation of the National Reforms Authority (NRA) in August 2019. The 59 members of the NRA were sworn into office in February 2020 and are expected to complete their work by April 2022. However, the NRA has faced obstacles to its work, including financial challenges and COVID-19-related restrictions. In December 2021, the opposition LCD pulled out of the SADC discussions after its leader, Mothetjoa Metsing, was charged with treason and murder related to his participation in the 2014 coup attempt, jeopardizing the stability of the process.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 2 / 4

Lesotho has a long history of political instability largely related to disputes among factions of the Lesotho Defence Force (LDF) and the politicization of security agencies in general. Although the heavy military presence at voting stations during the 2017 election was questioned, no reports of voter interference surfaced. However, in June 2019, then defense minister Tefo Mapesela claimed that senior police officers threatened him after he criticized an army commander and a senior intelligence official in a phone conversation.

Principal chiefs wield some political influence over their rural subjects.

In 2018, Lesotho-based Chinese businessman Yan Xie claimed that he heavily donated to most of Lesotho's political parties. Critics argued that Yan's financial clout gave him considerable influence over the country's political elites, exemplified by his 2017 appointment as a "head of special projects" and special trade envoy. In June 2020, Yan reportedly fled to Australia after learning that he was being investigated for corruption. In a February 2021 interview, Yan implied that he remained in contact with the prime minister, though Majoro has denied having any such contact with Yan.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 3 / 4

The constitution guarantees political rights for all. However, societal norms discourage women from running for office, and no parliamentary or party-list gender quota exists to ensure their representation. After the 2017 election, only 23 percent of seats in Parliament were held by women, down from 25 percent before the contest. Women's involvement in local government has also declined; women held 49 percent of local positions in 2011, but only 40 percent in 2017. The inaccessibility of some polling stations to persons living with disabilities was raised as a concern during the 2017 election. LGBT+ individuals generally face societal discrimination, and this discourages them from advocating for their rights in the political sphere. In 2021, the NRA held stakeholder engagement meetings to discuss increasing the number of parliamentary seats elected through proportional representation, which proponents say will increase the representation of women and members of other underrepresented groups in Parliament.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 6 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 2 / 4

While elections are held without delays and representatives are duly seated, persistent political instability disrupts normal government operations. The stability of the governing coalition was undermined by disagreements between coalition partners and factionalism within the ruling ABC throughout 2021, including several unsuccessful attempts made within the coalition to oust Prime Minister Majoro. Despite the political turmoil associated with the instability of the governing coalition, Parliament was able to operate without undue interference throughout the year.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 2 / 4

Official corruption and impunity remain significant problems. The main anticorruption agency, the Directorate on Corruption and Economic Offence (DCEO), lacks full prosecutorial powers and faces capacity and funding challenges. The Asset Forfeiture Unit, which was established in 2016 to recover property connected to corruption cases, is largely ineffective. In July 2020, then DCEO Director General Mahlomola Manyokole reported that Acting Chief Justice ‘Maseforo Mahase had approved plans for the establishment of a specialized anticorruption court. That same month, Parliament amended the DCEO Act to grant the agency powers to investigate money-laundering crimes beyond Lesotho’s borders. Anticorruption officials have claimed that individuals and companies have used state capture tactics to obtain immunity for corrupt dealings.

In January 2021, Prime Minister Majoro suspended Manyokole from his position as DCEO head for alleged incompetence. Manyokole was charged with money laundering, corruption, and abuse of power the following month; he has denied all allegations against him, saying that he was suspended for pursuing corruption investigations into high-level officials, including Majoro.

The DCEO has taken few corruption cases to court in recent years. However, in May 2021, the agency successfully brought Motena Tšolo, a former finance ministry official, to court on corruption charges in connection with her role in a 2018 high-profile procurement scandal; the case had not been resolved by year’s end.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 2 / 4

Lesotho has no access-to-information law, and responses to information requests are not guaranteed. Though reports on public debt are publicly available, the management of public finances is generally shrouded in secrecy. Government procurement decisions and tenders typically cannot be accessed online. Although high-level government and elected officials are required to disclose their assets and business interests—which Prime Minister Majoro and his cabinet did in June 2020—these declarations are not made public. Enforcement of the rules is limited by resource constraints.

The appointment process for judges lacks transparency. However, in September 2021, the Judicial Services Commission (JSC) publicly interviewed candidates for High Court appointments, and in December, announced plans to conduct further public interviews of judicial candidates in 2022.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 36 / 60D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 12 / 16*D1. Are there free and independent media? 2 / 4

Freedom of the press is only indirectly protected under constitutional guarantees of freedom of expression. Journalists are subject to threats and intimidation from the authorities and private citizens. State and private media outlets have also been accused of open bias.

Journalists additionally face statutory barriers that interfere in their work, including criminal code provisions that bar sedition and offenses against the “dignity of the royal family.” The Penal Code, adopted in 2010, allows police officers to force journalists to reveal their sources.

In November 2021, journalists from two private radio stations, 357 FM and People’s Choice FM (PCFM), were subjected to arbitrary arrest, harassment, and alleged physical assault by police for reporting on missing police guns; police later stormed the PCFM’s office and questioned the station’s employees about the reports. The same month, the state media regulator, the Lesotho Communications Authority (LCA), suspended 357 FM’s license for allegedly failing to comply with LCA directives.

Parliament passed new legislation establishing a national media policy in December; the policy was developed by the NRA and has been praised by local media rights activists, who say it will enhance media freedom in the country.

The constitution provides legal protections for freedom of religion and prohibits religious discrimination, and religious freedom is generally upheld in practice.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 3 / 4

Academic freedom is generally respected in practice, though the government does interfere in the administration of institutions of higher education. In September 2019, National University of Lesotho (NUL) officials warned that the institution risked closure due to government funding cuts.

The constitution provides legal protections for freedom of expression. However, political violence in recent years has discouraged open political debate. In October 2020, the LCA proposed regulations for online content that would require users with at least 100 followers or a reach of at least 100 to register as internet broadcasters and obtain a certificate from the regulatory body, which has the authority to investigate and order the removal of posts that do not comply with Lesotho Telecommunications Authority (Broadcasting) Rules of 2004.

In March 2021, the government presented Parliament with two bills proposing new cybersecurity and communications regulations, which included provisions allowing the government to monitor private communications between citizens. The bills were widely condemned by local rights groups, including the Media Institute of Southern Africa (MISA) Lesotho, which said that the legislation would violate citizens’ privacy rights and unduly suppress free expression. In September, a parliamentary committee rejected both draft laws, returning the bills to the executive with instructions to “reassess” the legislation.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 7 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 2 / 4

Protests and demonstrations are permitted, but organizers must seek a permit seven days in advance. Demonstrations take place each year and are sometimes violently dispersed by police. Many COVID-19-related restrictions on gatherings remained in place throughout 2021, including a ban on “strikes, protests, and social gatherings.” Political rallies were permitted, though participation was limited by COVID-19-related regulations. Despite the ban on gatherings, numerous protests took place throughout 2021, including demonstrations by young people protesting the “lucrative allowances” granted to members of Parliament. Police responded violently to protests throughout the year, resulting in the deaths of two striking factory workers in May and the arrests of several protesters.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights– and governance-related work? 3 / 4

NGOs generally operate without restrictions. However, some civil society groups act cautiously when working on politically sensitive issues. In addition, government rules on registering NGOs are strict; those who are accused of neglecting to register their organization risk a five-year prison sentence. No NGOs have been held to account for failure to register in recent years.

In August 2021, the Transformation Resource Centre (TRC), a local rights NGO, asked the High Court to deregister all 41 of Lesotho’s political parties, accusing the parties of failing to adhere to the country’s electoral laws. The TRC’s petition, which government officials and the IEC called a “malicious” attempt to provoke a constitutional crisis, had not been ruled on by year’s end.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 2 / 4

While labor and union rights are constitutionally guaranteed, the union movement is weak and highly fragmented, and these challenges have undermined unions’ ability to advance the rights of workers. The government has previously been accused of undermining bodies like the National Advisory Committee on Labour (NACOLA), Wages Advisory Board, and Industrial Relations Council. In July 2021, the labor minister announced plans to review the existing labor code and to establish a bargaining council intended to regulate and oversee employment conditions in the country.

Many employees in the textile sector—Lesotho’s largest formal employer—face obstacles when attempting to join unions. Despite the COVID-19-related ban on industrial action, in May, over 40,000 garment workers participated in a national strike to demand higher wages and improved working conditions. Security forces responded to the protests with excessive force, injuring a number of striking workers and resulting in the deaths of two others. In December, the Independent Democratic Union of Lesotho (IDUL) signed an agreement with Hippo Knitting to help “ensure safe working conditions” in the garment factory, where numerous workers have reported facing serious abuses.

F. RULE OF LAW: 8 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 2 / 4

The constitution protects judicial independence, but the judiciary lacks resources and faces a shortage of judicial officers. The Lesotho Times reported in October 2020 that the judicial system was on the verge of collapse due to a lack of funds and infrastructural disrepair. The judiciary was reportedly allocated M11 million ($687,000) to fund all judicial operations in 2021, less than half of the M25 million ($1.5 million) budget that some judges say is required. Though the JSC interviewed candidates for seven vacant judicial positions on the High Court in September, only two judges were appointed due to financial constraints.

Judges do rule against the government, including on politically sensitive issues. In May 2020, Prime Minister Majoro admitted that factional battles within the ruling ABC had eroded the independence of the judiciary. The SADC and the government decided in 2018 to engage foreign judges on high-profile and politically sensitive cases. Only one of the three foreign judges appointed to the High Court remained by September 2021, following the resignations of the other two judges in May 2020 and August 2021, respectively.

The judicial appointment process lacks transparency, and members of the JSC at times act without proper oversight. However, in September 2021, the JSC publicly interviewed candidates for High Court appointments for the first time.

High Court judges often fail to provide justification for their decisions; in April, Kananelo Mosito, the president of the Court of Appeal, asked the Chief Justice to address the problem, which Mosito says undermines public confidence in the judiciary.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 2 / 4

While the courts generally uphold due process, a large backlog of cases has left individuals subject to trial delays and lengthy pretrial detention. Judicial vacancies often go unfilled due to a lack of funds, reducing the judiciary's capacity to address the backlog and creating further delays. The COVID-19 pandemic exacerbated issues within the judicial system, though the Court of Appeal operated during the lockdown period in 2020, holding remote hearings.

In September 2021, Chief Justice Sakoane ordered the courts to ensure that individuals accused of a crime are tried within two months of their original arrest date, unless the court is able to provide written evidence showing "compelling reasons" to act otherwise.

In the first eight months of 2019, the government appointed three foreign judges to preside over high-profile criminal cases that were affected by the ongoing backlog; two of the three judges had resigned by August 2021, reportedly due in part to "frustration" over persistent trial delays. Numerous high-profile trials, including that of former army commander Tlali Kamoli on charges of attempted murder, have been subjected to repeated delays in recent years. Kamoli's trial was postponed several times in 2021, and had not started by year's end.

Lesotho faced years of violence related to factional disputes within the army; the SADC appointed a facilitation team to create a reform process that would partially focus on the security sector. The SADC's work culminated in the creation of the NRA, which began operating in February 2020.

The constitution provides legal protections against torture, but allegations of torture have been levied against police forces, the LDF, and prison authorities. In September 2021, the family of Tšelislo Sekonyela, who died earlier that month while in police custody, reported that he appeared to have been severely tortured. Three police officers were suspended in relation to Sekonyela's death, which remained under investigation at year's end.

Lesotho does not have an independent administrative body to investigate human rights abuses.

Rights are restricted for some groups. Same-sex sexual activity is legal, though same-sex marriage remains prohibited. LGBT+ individuals face societal discrimination and challenges accessing services, like health care. Discrimination based on sexual orientation or gender identity is not prohibited by law. Customary laws and other social norms discriminate against women. For example, women are considered minors under the guardianship of their fathers before marriage and their husbands after marriage. Schools often lack facilities for students with disabilities. In March 2021, Parliament passed the Persons with Disability Equity Act into law, bringing the country's laws into accord with the United Nations Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities, to which it is a signatory. Under the new law, the government introduced a disability grant program in July for those living with disabilities in Lesotho.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 9 / 16G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 3 / 4

The constitution protects freedom of movement, which is generally upheld. In recent years, a high incidence of rape on a path near the Ha Lebona and Ha Koeshe villages has prompted some women to reduce travel in the area.

COVID-19 regulations in 2020 restricted free movement in order to curtail the spread of the virus. Some restrictions were lifted in October 2021, including on international travel.

The constitution protects property rights, though related laws are inconsistently upheld. Women's rights are restricted in areas such as property and inheritance, including chieftainships, which can only be inherited by men. Expropriation is provided for in the constitution but is uncommon and subject to fair compensation. Government instability and the country's volatile politics hamper normal business activity. In November 2020, Parliament adopted new regulations that will reserve a list of 47 business activities for the Basotho ethnic group. Foreigners can only participate in these activities as minority shareholders. In September 2021, the government suspended the regulations in order to revise the law.

Prominent social norms and harmful patriarchal attitudes negatively affect women. Women's rights are restricted in marriage and divorce, and violence against women is high. In April 2021, the government introduced legislation intended to establish mechanisms to combat domestic violence; the bill remained under consideration in Parliament at year's end. Forced and child marriages remain an ongoing problem. In September 2020, the Commonwealth Secretariat reported that one in three women in Lesotho had experienced physical or sexual violence, often at the hands of their partners. Accountability for the perpetrators of gender-based violence is not consistent.

Human trafficking remains an ongoing challenge for Lesotho. Although the US State Department's 2021 Trafficking in Persons Report acknowledges that the government has made significant efforts in fighting the problem, it found that Lesotho authorities did not fully meet minimum standards to eliminate trafficking. In September 2021, the government introduced new visa requirements intended to further combat human trafficking in the country.

Child labor and forced labor for both men and women remains a problem. In August, the government announced that it had requested an independent assessment of the child labor situation in Lesotho.

In December 2020, the DC party leader and deputy prime minister Mathibeli Mokhothu was reportedly linked in a court case to Rana Qamar, a Pakistani national well-known for human trafficking. Qamar has been accused of using two cabinet ministers, including Mokhothu, to pressure an immigration official into letting two Pakistanis into Lesotho without visas.

Liberia

Population: 5,200,000

Capital: Monrovia

Freedom Status: Partly Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Liberia has enjoyed nearly two decades of peace and stability since the second civil war ended in 2003. During this time, the country has made considerable progress rebuilding government capacity, reestablishing the rule of law, and ensuring the political rights and civil liberties of citizens, and 2017 saw the first peaceful transfer of power between leaders since 1944. However, Liberia still faces serious issues with corruption, impunity, and violence against women.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- In April, the National Elections Commission (NEC) confirmed that none of the amendments on the December 2020 referendum passed. Provisions included changes to term-length of representatives, the vice president, and the president, as well as an end to the ban on dual citizenship. Critics noted flaws in the process that brought the referendum to the ballot, including a lack of openness by political leadership to include proposals that were important to the public and a lack of voter awareness about the issues.
- In February, the head of the Liberia Anti-Corruption Commission (LACC), Ndubusi Nwabudike, resigned amid allegations that he obtained his citizenship illegally. His replacement, Edwin Martin, subsequently issued a 120-day ultimatum to former and current public officials to voluntarily return stolen government assets and property or face arrest.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 27 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 8 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 3 / 4

Liberia's president is directly elected and can serve up to two six-year terms. Since the end of the civil wars in 2003, Liberia has had three peaceful presidential elections. The most recent election, held in 2017, was assessed by domestic and international observers as generally peaceful and credible, though difficulties in its administration included long queues at polling places and challenges related to voter identification.

In 2017, a runoff between George Weah of the Coalition for Democratic Change (CDC) and incumbent vice president Joseph Boakai of the Unity Party (UP), was delayed when third-place finisher Charles Brumskine of the Liberty Party (LP) challenged the first-round results on grounds of fraud. The Supreme Court found his claim unsupported by evidence. Weah won the run-off with 61.5 percent of the vote, and his 2018 inauguration marked the first peaceful transfer of power since 1944. Observers noted procedural and administrative improvements in the runoff compared to the first round.

Liberia has a bicameral legislature composed of a 30-member Senate and a 73-member House of Representatives; senators are elected to nine-year terms, and representatives to six-year terms.

Lower-house elections were held concurrently with the first round of the presidential election in 2017. The CDC won 21 seats, while the UP won 20. The People's Unification Party (PUP), which was allied to the ruling CDC, won 5 seats, and the LP won 3. The remaining 24 seats were won by independents and other parties. Despite administrative problems, observers considered the elections generally peaceful and well administered, with only minor incidents of violence during the campaign.

Fifteen Senate seats were contested in December 2020. The opposition alliance Collaborating Political Parties (CPP)—comprised of the former ruling UP, the Alternative National Congress, the All Liberian Party, and the LP—won six seats, double that of the ruling CDC. The remainder were shared between independents and smaller parties. Polling day was largely peaceful, but the campaign period was marred by incidents of fraud and violence. Voter turnout was 34.9 percent.

While the independence of the NEC is mandated by law, its capacity is limited, and it has struggled to enforce regulations. The National Code of Conduct Act is not consistently followed by officials.

The NEC managed a December 2020 constitutional referendum, held concurrently with the Senate elections, which included amendments to shorten the terms of the president, the vice president, and lower-house legislators from six years to five; to shorten senators' terms from nine years to seven; and to end a ban on dual citizenship. In April 2021, four months after ballots were cast, the NEC confirmed that none of the amendments received the required two-thirds of votes to become law. Critics noted flaws in the process that brought the referendum to the ballot, including a lack of openness by political leadership to include proposals that were important to the public and a lack of voter awareness about the issues.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 12 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 3 / 4

Political parties generally do not face undue legal or practical obstacles that prevent them from forming or operating. The People's Liberation Party was certified by the NEC in late December 2020 and opened a party office in Monrovia in February 2021. However, the ruling CDC has been known to use public resources to fund campaigns during election periods—notably by taking advantage of state-owned vehicles and facilities.

Opposition parties can form coalitions; the CPP coalition formed in 2019 was certified in August 2020.

Opposition parties and independent candidates have a realistic chance of gaining office and power through elections. In 2017, President Weah, of the then opposition CDC, defeated the former ruling party's candidate. Opposition candidates found success in the December 2020 Senate elections, with only three CDC candidates winning across 15 races. Independent candidates won two of four by-elections held in November 2021.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 3 / 4

Allegations of undue influence or pressure on voters by powerful groups are somewhat rare. However, a general wariness of election-related violence persists in Liberia.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 3 / 4

Lebanese people and people of Asian descent whose families have lived in Liberia for generations are denied citizenship and cannot participate in political processes. While former president Ellen Johnson Sirleaf (2006–18) was the first woman to be head of state in Africa, and Liberia's current vice president is a woman, women are poorly represented in national politics and hold few leadership positions in political parties. Only 2 of the 30 senators are women, and women hold 9 of 73 seats in the House of Representatives. Social stigma against LGBT+ people discourages them from advocating for their rights.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 7 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 3 / 4

Once elected, government officials are duly installed in office, and elected legislators generally operate without significant interference. However, bribery and corruption can influence policy prioritization even at the executive level.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 2 / 4

Many institutions exist to fight corruption, but they lack the resources, political independence, and capacity to function effectively. Corruption thus remains pervasive.

In February 2021, the head of the Liberia Anti-Corruption Commission (LACC), Ndubusi Nwabudike, resigned amid allegations that he obtained his citizenship illegally. His replacement, Edwin Martin, subsequently issued a 120-day ultimatum to former and current public officials to voluntarily return stolen government assets and property or face arrest. The LACC Enforcement Division opened investigations into the suspended heads of the Liberia Water and Sewer Corporation and the managing director of the Liberia Airport Authority. The body is also actively investigating NEC commissioners for allegedly using $180,000 to purchase thermometers for the November 2021 by-election administration, and in December recommended dismissing the NEC chairperson as well as the NEC head of procurement.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 2 / 4

The Freedom of Information Act is rarely used, and the government responds slowly to information requests, if at all. Transparency guidelines for public procurement processes are not fully enforced.

In 2021, many new public officials, including in the executive branch, failed to declare their assets as required by law. The LACC, which collects asset declarations, is not obligated to disclose those submitted by executive branch members, and efforts by civil society and media to gain access to President Weah's declaration have been unsuccessful.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 33 / 60D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 11 / 16*D1. Are there free and independent media? 2 / 4

Liberia's constitution provides for freedom of speech and the press, but these rights are sometimes restricted in practice. Investigative reporters receive threats, including by members of the government who have vowed to sue in response to journalistic inquiries. President Weah has previously taken an adversarial stance toward media, denouncing "fake news" that purportedly threatened national stability. Liberia also maintains onerous criminal and civil libel laws, though the 2019 Press Freedom Act effectively decriminalized libel, "sedition," and "criminal malevolence." Defamation remains a civil offense, and journalists risk jail time for nonpayment. Investigative reporting can lead to media houses being summoned to court.

Journalists were harassed, threatened, and attacked while reporting on the senate elections in December 2020. In June 2021, journalists Trojan Kiazolu and Hannah Geterminah were physically assaulted by police officers for photographing in a public area.

Religious freedom is protected in the constitution. However, about 86 percent of the population is Christian, and the Muslim minority reports discrimination in government appointments. Proposals to amend the constitution to establish Christianity as the official religion emerge occasionally and contribute to interreligious tensions. Since his election, President Weah has made efforts to reach out to the Muslim population.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 3 / 4

The government does not restrict academic freedom, though education infrastructure remains inadequate.

People are generally free to engage in private discussion while in public spaces, but some topics are taboo, such as discussion of issues affecting LGBT+ people. This extends online too, though the government is not known to illegally monitor online communications. In March 2021, the secretary general of the opposition UP, Mohammed Ali, was arrested for suggesting in a Facebook post that the NEC was involved in a "ploy" to stall the certification of a member of his party who had won election to the senate. He was released later that month.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 7 / 12E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 2 / 4

Freedom of assembly is constitutionally guaranteed, and Liberia has a history of public protests and civic actions. Security forces at times met protests in 2021 with a heavy-handed response. In July, police arrested several protestors in Lofa County denouncing delays in the certification of the region's senator-elect. In August, at least 10 protestors demonstrating against the cancelation of online learning were injured after police fired tear gas and rubber bullets at the University of Liberia.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 3 / 4

Numerous civil society groups, including human rights organizations, operate in the country. However, groups focused on LGBT+ issues tend to keep a low profile due to fears of retribution for their work. A National Aid and NGO policy was introduced in September 2020 to improve the coordination of humanitarian aid in the country.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 2 / 4

Unions are free to form and mobilize and are well organized. The rights of workers to strike, organize, and bargain collectively are recognized. However, the law does not protect workers from employer retaliation for legal strike activity. Labor disputes can turn violent, particularly at the country's various mines and rubber plantations.

F. RULE OF LAW: 6 / 16F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 1 / 4

The constitution provides for an independent judiciary, but it is impeded by corruption, backlogs, and funding shortfalls. The Supreme Court claimed in September 2021 that judges at all levels of the judiciary have experienced a rise in verbal and physical harassment.

In May 2021, the chief justice of the Supreme Court, Francis Korkpor, acknowledged the influence of corrupt actors on the judiciary's independence. Critics have also raised concerns that the outcomes of some trials seem predetermined.

In 2019, the Senate voted to remove Supreme Court associate justice Kabineh Ja'neh from the bench, finding him guilty of official misconduct after he issued a writ in favor of petroleum dealers who opposed a gasoline sale levy. Ja'neh appealed to the Court of Justice of Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS), which ruled in Ja'neh's favor in November 2020, awarding him $200,000 in damages along with back pay and instructing the government to either reinstate him or allow him to retire. The Liberian Senate rejected the ruling and had not reinstated Ja'neh by the end of 2021.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 1 / 4

The right to due process is guaranteed by the constitution but poorly upheld. Many people accused of crimes spend more time in pretrial detention than the length they would serve for a guilty sentence. Citizens with financial means at times bribe judges to rule in their favor. Reports of arbitrary arrest by law enforcement agents continue.

The security environment in Liberia has improved dramatically since warfare ended in 2003. However, citizens still view the police force as corrupt, and security agencies lack the financial means to meaningfully protect citizens from violence. Prison conditions are very poor, and detainees and prisoners continue to report abuse and threats by law enforcement agents and prison guards.

Some minority ethnic groups continue to be stigmatized as outsiders, and the Muslim population experiences some discrimination. LGBT+ people face social stigma and the threat of violence. The penal code makes “voluntary sodomy” a misdemeanor offense that can carry up to a year in prison, and this provision can be invoked against LGBT+ people. President Weah has not supported same-sex marriage.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 9 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 3 / 4

Though some unofficial border checkpoints remain active—and border patrol agents sometimes attempt to extract bribes—people have enjoyed a gradual increase in the right to move about freely in the years since large-scale violence ended. COVID-19-related restrictions on movement expired and were not renewed in 2020.

Conflicts over land remain pervasive, many originating during the civil wars and the subsequent displacement and resettlement of people that the violence caused. Others are the result of opaque concession agreements granting foreign corporations access to lands for mining, logging, and the production of palm oil.

The 2018 Land Rights Act formalized community ownership of ancestral land. However, the Liberia Land Authority lacks the capacity to deal with disputes that have emerged as a result of the law.

Customary law practices that prevail in large parts of the country disadvantage women in matters of land rights and inheritance.

While men and women enjoy equal rights under civil law, gender disparities are common in customary law, which remains dominant in much of Liberia and disadvantage women in matters including inheritance and child custody.

Violence against women and children, particularly rape, is pervasive. In 2017, the Senate voted to make rape a bailable offense, prompting protests by women’s rights activists. Despite the vote, rape remains a nonbailable offense. In 2019, President Weah signed the Domestic Violence Act, originally proposed in 2014, mandating stricter punishment for those convicted of domestic violence, though restrictions on female genital mutilation (FGM) were not included. An interministerial taskforce created in 2020 to address sexual and gender-based violence (GBV) remains largely powerless.

Human trafficking for the purpose of forced labor and prostitution remains a problem, with most victims trafficked from rural areas to cities. Many trafficking victims are children, who can be found working in diamond mines, agricultural operations, or as domestic laborers, or engaged in forced begging or prostitution. In December 2021, a man was sentenced to 22 years in prison for attempting to traffic 22 children.

Libya

Population: 7,000,000

Capital: Tripoli

Freedom Status: Not Free

Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: Libya has been racked by internal divisions and intermittent civil conflict since a popular armed uprising in 2011 deposed longtime dictator Mu'ammar al-Qadhafi. International efforts to bring rival administrations together in a unity government succeeded in early 2021, creating a fragile peace. However, proliferation of weapons and autonomous militias, flourishing criminal networks, the interference of regional powers, and the presence of extremist groups have all contributed to the country's persistent lack of physical security. More than a decade of violence has displaced hundreds of thousands of people, and human rights conditions have steadily deteriorated.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- In March, the House of Representatives (HoR) voted in favor of installing the new interim Government of National Unity (GNU), which had been elected by the Libyan Political Dialogue Forum (LPDF), a UN-backed political process. A peaceful transition of power took place shortly after the HoR's vote of approval.
- The GNU was tasked with overseeing the presidential and parliamentary elections that had been set for December. However, following prolonged debates over the legal and constitutional basis for the elections and disputes over candidate eligibility, the High National Election Commission (HNEC), announced the postponement of the elections.
- Despite improvements following the cease-fire brokered in October 2020, political and military violence remained common; human rights violations were widespread, and included unlawful killings, enforced disappearances, and arbitrary detentions. Conditions were further affected by the presence of various armed groups, thousands of foreign mercenaries, a large migrant population, and mass internal displacement.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 1 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 0 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

Prior to 2021, Libya was divided by two rival administrations: the Government of National Accord (GNA) was based in Tripoli, and controlled much of western Libya; an interim government affiliated with the HoR operated in the east of the country, under the protection of Khalifa Haftar and his Libyan Arab Armed Forces (LAAF).

In October 2020, the United Nations Support Mission in Libya (UNSMIL) facilitated the first round of the Libyan Political Dialogue Forum (LPDF). The LPDF was created to

In February 2021, after two rounds of voting, the LPDF selected a new executive council, creating the interim GNU. The LPDF elected Abdelhamid Dbeibah, a wealthy businessman and former Qadhafi associate, to the role of interim prime minister. Mohamed Menfi was chosen to lead the Presidency Council; the remaining two members of the council are Musa al-Koni, the GNA’s former deputy prime minister, and Abdullah al-Lafi. In March, 132 members of the HoR met to approve of the GNU and its 35-member cabinet. Five days later, the two rival governments peacefully handed over power to the GNU. Despite allegations of vote buying, the legitimacy of the LPDF elections, the GNU, and its mandate have been internationally recognized.

The LPDF created the GNU as an interim government with a specific, limited mandate. The chief role of the GNU was to reunify national institutions, including the army and the central bank, and to oversee the elections that had been set for December 2021, after which its mandate would end. However, two days before the elections were set to take place, the presidential elections were postponed, after the High National Election Commission (HNEC), tasked with the technical registration and implementation of elections, announced its inability to carry out its mandate. Following the postponements of the December elections, the HoR announced that it no longer recognized the legitimacy of the GNU, though the UN continued to recognize the GNU’s mandate.

Under the 2015 Libyan Political Agreement (LPA), the unicameral, 200-seat HoR was to remain in place as the interim legislature. The agreement also created the HCS, a secondary consultative body composed of some members of the rival General National Congress (GNC). However, the HoR never formally approved the LPA’s provisions or recognized the GNA.

Members of the HoR were elected in 2014 in polls that were marked by violence and drew the participation of only about 15 percent of the electorate. Its mandate formally expired in 2015; while it unilaterally extended its tenure, it has rarely achieved a quorum in practice. Following the launch of Haftar’s offensive against Tripoli in 2019, the HoR became further divided, with members opposed to the campaign meeting in Tripoli and other members continuing to meet in Tubruk. There were attempts to reunify the body in the context of the LPDF process in late 2020, but the dispute remained unresolved.

Despite some legal developments since the fall of the Qadhafi regime, Libya lacks a functioning electoral framework in practice.

An August 2011 constitutional declaration, issued by an unelected National Transitional Council, continues to serve as the key governing document for the transitional period. A Constitutional Drafting Assembly (CDA) that was elected in 2014 voted to approve a draft constitution in 2017. In the fall of 2018, the HoR approved a law containing a framework for a constitutional referendum, along with several accompanying amendments to the 2011 constitutional declaration. It then submitted the former, the Referendum Law, to the HNEC, but there was speculation that the new law and amendments would face legal challenges.

According to the LPDF transition roadmap, both the HoR and HCS are required to design and agree on an electoral framework for presidential and parliamentary elections. Despite this stipulation, both the HoR and HCS passed separate electoral laws, each body circumventing and contradicting the other. The electoral law adopted by the HoR, which created an election plan for the December 2021 presidential elections and postponed finalizing a plan for parliamentary elections, was accepted by the UNSMIL.

Two days before the December 2021 presidential election was set to occur, the HNEC announced that the elections had been postponed by one month, citing inadequacies in the electoral law. Disagreements over the establishment of an electoral framework and a flawed process for determining candidates' eligibility persisted through the end of the year.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 1 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 1 / 4

A range of political parties organized to participate in the 2012 GNC elections, but all candidates were required to run as independents in the 2014 HoR elections. Civilian politics have since been overshadowed by the activities of armed groups, which wield significant power and influence on the ground. While various political factions and coalitions exist, the chaotic legal and security environment does not allow for normal political competition; political parties are largely built around personalities rather than coherent platforms, and often do not have substantial constituencies.

Following the October 2020 cease-fire, despite the creation of a singular executive government, Libya remains divided between rival political and military factions, and political influence is heavily dependent on military strength.

Elections planned for December 2021 were postponed two days before they were scheduled to take place. The integrity of the planned elections had been severely compromised by widespread voter intimidation and armed obstruction of the electoral process.

More than 90 Libyans, including two women, registered their candidacy in the run-up to the planned 2021 presidential elections. Several leading presidential candidates, however, proved controversial due to their political or military connections. These candidates included Saif al-Islam Qadhafi, son of Mu'ammar Qadhafi; General Khalifa Haftar, head of the Libyan Arab Armed Forces, who has been implicated in war crimes; current prime minister Abdelhamid Dbeibah, who has been implicated in corruption and whose candidacy contravened LPDF stipulations against GNU figures participating in the 2021 elections; and the Speaker of the HoR, Aguila Saleh.

Ordinary citizens have no role in Libya's political affairs, which are currently dominated by armed factions, foreign governments, oil interests, smuggling syndicates, and other extrapolitical forces. Citizens and civilian political figures are subject to violence and intimidation by the various armed groups.

The political impasse and armed conflict prevented all segments of the population from exercising their basic political rights. Communities that lacked an affiliation with a powerful militia were especially marginalized.

The CDA featured two reserved seats each for three non-Arab ethnic minority groups: Amazigh, Tebu, and Tuareg. The Amazigh, however, largely boycotted the 2014 CDA elections and had no representatives in the body, and the two Tebu members rejected the draft constitution it adopted in 2017. The draft was approved by the CDA despite rules requiring support from at least one member from each of the three minority groups. Amazigh, Tuareg, and Tebu organizations have also denounced the UNSMIL for excluding their communities.

Representation for ethnic minority groups remained lacking in 2021; members of all three groups are often unable to acquire citizenship or other forms of documentation, further contributing to their political disenfranchisement.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 0 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 0 / 4

Despite the election of a unified government in March 2021, full control over the national territory has not been established. The creation of the GNU did not result in the development of a cohesive policy platform; its mandate is temporary, and limited to administering elections and unifying national institutions.

In September 2021, 113 members of the HoR passed a vote of no confidence against the GNU; the HCS condemned the no-confidence measure, and some parliamentary sources claimed a no-confidence vote must be passed by 120 members, and was therefore illegitimate. After the elections were postponed in December, the HoR announced that the GNU's mandate had expired, though the UN continued to recognize the GNU's mandate.

Corruption is pervasive among government officials, and opportunities for graft and criminal activity abound in the absence of functioning fiscal, judicial, and other institutions.

In March 2021, HoR leader Aguila Saleh alleged that Dbeibah had secured his position as interim prime minister through vote buying; a leaked UN report found that Dbeibah had bribed at least two members of the LPDF to vote for him. Dbeibah has faced further allegations of corruption: his close ties to Qadhafi and his involvement with running the Organization for Development of Administrative Centers (ODAC), a state-owned entity that oversees major public sector infrastructure projects, have drawn increased scrutiny. Dbeibah's cousin, Ali Ibrahim Dbeibah, longtime head of ODAC, is suspected of having misappropriated massive amounts of public funds.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 0 / 4

There are no effective laws guaranteeing public access to government information, and none of the competing authorities engage in transparent budget-making and contracting practices.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 8 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 4 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 1 / 4

There is a diverse array of Libyan media outlets based inside and outside the country. However, most are highly partisan, producing content that favors one of the country's political and military factions, and in many cases promoting propaganda, hate speech, or disinformation in coordination with foreign backers. Social media use is widespread, but digital platforms are rife with disinformation campaigns and propaganda, leading to confusion and low levels of trust among consumers.

The civil conflict and related violence by criminal and extremist groups have made objective reporting dangerous, and journalists are subject to intimidation, arbitrary detention, and physical abuse by both sides in the conflict. Despite the risks, some independent journalists and outlets have made efforts to engage in fact-based reporting. In September 2021, freelance journalist Ismail Abuzreiba al-Zway was freed after three years of arbitrary detention for his work with a private Libyan television network, al-Nabaa, which Haftar's LAAF accused of supporting terrorism. Al-Zway had been sentenced to 15 years in prison following a widely-condemned May 2020 secret trial by a military court in Benghazi.

Religious freedom is often violated in practice. Nearly all Libyans are Sunni Muslims, but Christian and other minority communities have been attacked by armed groups, including local affiliates of the Islamic State (IS) militant group. In eastern Libya, hard-line Salafi Muslims aligned with Haftar's forces control Benghazi's mosques and religious programming. Salafi militants, who reject the veneration of saints, have destroyed or vandalized Sufi Muslim shrines with impunity.

There are no effective laws guaranteeing academic freedom. The armed conflict has damaged many university facilities and altered classroom dynamics; for example, professors can be subject to intimidation by students who are aligned with militias. Academic self-censorship is common among professors.

Universities face significant operational challenges, including a lack of infrastructure and limited funding for rebuilding schools, training teachers, and supporting researchers. In 2021, the Ministry of Education introduced new regulations aimed at curtailing the expansion of for-profit private universities and addressing the growing problem of forged university degrees, which are often used to falsely obtain government jobs.

Although the freedom of private discussion and personal expression improved dramatically after 2011, the ongoing hostilities have taken their toll, with many Libyans increasingly withdrawing from public life or avoiding criticism of powerful figures. Numerous examples of kidnappings and killings of activists, politicians, and journalists have added to the general deterrent effect. Conditions for personal expression are considerably worse in the east than in the west, where residents have somewhat more freedom to criticize government authorities though violent reprisals for critical speech have been reported in both areas.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 2 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 1 / 4

A 2012 law on freedom of assembly is generally compatible with international human rights principles, but in practice the armed conflict and related disorder seriously deter peaceful assemblies in many areas.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 1 / 4

The number of active nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) has declined in recent years due to armed conflict and the departure of international donors. Militias with varying political, tribal, and geographic affiliations have attacked civil society activists with impunity. Many NGO workers have fled abroad or ceased their activism in the wake of grave threats to themselves or their families.

NGOs in Libya are largely overseen by the Civil Society Commission (CSC), a regulatory body established by the GNA's Presidential Council in 2018, though administration often differs between the east and west of the country. Many repressive Qadhafi-era laws regulating NGOs remain in force, and the CSC has been granted wide-ranging authority to restrict, suspend, and dissolve NGOs.

In July 2021, the GNU proposed a new freedom of association regulation, which would require existing NGOs to reregister with the government. The regulation also includes provisions that would give the government the authority to reject such registrations and to prevent NGOs from opening bank accounts; NGOs would also be required to obtain prior permission before accepting donations and communicating with international NGOs, including the United Nations (UN). Following the proposal of the freedom of association regulation, in October 2021, 16 Libyan organizations and 4 public figures drafted and presented an alternative law intended to guarantee NGOs' independence and operational freedom.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 0 / 4

Some trade unions, previously outlawed, formed after 2011. However, normal collective-bargaining activity has been impossible in the absence of basic security and a functioning legal system.

F. RULE OF LAW: 0 / 16F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 0 / 4

The role of the judiciary remains unclear without a permanent constitution, and judges, lawyers, and prosecutors face frequent threats and attacks. The national judicial system has essentially collapsed, with courts unable to function in much of the country. Members of armed groups, militias and security forces continue to carry out extrajudicial killings, enforced disappearances, torture, sexual and gender-based violence, and arbitrary arrest and detention throughout Libya. The absence of the rule of law has enabled an environment of impunity, particularly with regards to severe human rights violations and war crimes committed by rival political and military factions in the east and west of the country. Judges and lawyers are frequently subjected to immense pressure from armed groups.

In the run-up to the 2021 elections, the judiciary was tasked with vetting presidential candidates and processing appeals to their candidacy. In December, the HoR passed and immediately enacted a law allowing the body to reshuffle members of the Supreme Judicial Council (SJC); the International Commission of Jurists (ICJ) condemned the HoR's actions as an attack on judiciary independence and the rule of law.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 0 / 4

Since the 2011 revolution, the right of citizens to a fair trial and due process has been challenged by the continued interference of armed groups and an inability to access lawyers and court documents. Militias and semiofficial security forces regularly engage in arbitrary arrests, detentions, and intimidation with impunity. Thousands of individuals remain in custody without any formal trial or sentencing. The LAAF's military courts routinely flout basic standards of due process and are used to suppress dissent.

Many NGOs work to document and raise awareness of human rights violations, and advocate for victims of such violations, using international institutions such as the UN Human Rights Council (OCHCR) and the International Criminal Court (ICC).

Libya's warring militias and their foreign partners operate with little regard for the physical security of civilians. Various armed groups have carried out indiscriminate shelling of civilian areas, torture of detainees, summary executions, rape, and the destruction of property. Militias also engage in criminal activity, including extortion and other forms of predation on the civilian population.

According to the UNCHR, there are over 200,000 internally displaced persons (IDPs) in Libya; this number continues to decrease as a result of the cease-fire in October 2020, though many IDPs remain unable to return home.

Since the cease-fire in October 2020, a fragile peace has been maintained, though violent conflicts among rival armed groups have continued with some frequency.

Libyans from certain tribes and communities—often those perceived as pro-Qadhafi, including natives of the town of Tawergha—have faced discrimination, violence, and displacement. The Tebu and Tuareg minorities in the south also face discrimination.

Foreign migrant workers, asylum seekers, and refugees have been subject to severe mistreatment, including detention in squalid facilities by both state authorities and other armed groups.

Women are not treated equally under the law and face practical restrictions on their ability to participate in the workforce. Widows and displaced women in particular are vulnerable to economic deprivation and other abuses.

Under Libya's penal code, sexual activity between members of the same sex is punishable by up to five years in prison. LGBT+ people face severe discrimination and harassment, and have been targeted by militant groups.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 2 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 0 / 4

The 2011 constitutional declaration guarantees freedom of movement, but militia checkpoints restrict travel within Libya, while combat and poor security conditions more generally affect movement as well as access to education and employment.

While Libyans formally have the right to own property and can start businesses, legal protections are not upheld in practice. Businesses and homes have been damaged amid fighting or confiscated by militias, particularly in Libya's eastern regions. Ongoing insecurity has severely disrupted ordinary commerce, allowing armed groups to dominate smuggling networks and informal markets.

Laws and social customs disadvantage women in personal status matters including marriage and divorce. Libyan women with foreign husbands do not enjoy full citizenship rights and cannot transfer Libyan citizenship to their children. There are no laws that specifically address or criminalize domestic violence, and most such violence goes unreported due to social stigma and the risk of reprisals. The law imposes penalties for extramarital sex and allows rapists to avoid punishment by marrying their victims. Rape and other sexual violence have become increasingly serious problems in the lawless environment created by the civil conflict.

There are few protections against exploitative labor practices. Forced labor, sexual exploitation, abuse in detention facilities, and starvation are widespread among migrants and refugees from sub-Saharan Africa, the Middle East, and South Asia, many of whom are beholden to human traffickers.

The International Organization for Migration (IOM) reported that there were more than 600,000 migrants representing at least 43 nationalities present in Libya at the end of 2021. Throughout 2021, voluntary return, resettlement, and evacuation flights were repeatedly halted by authorities. In October, a fact-finding mission appointed by the OCHCR reported that Libyan authorities are engaged in systematic and widespread human rights violations against the country's migrant population, resulting in the murder, torture, imprisonment, rape, and persecution of migrants.

Libya lacks comprehensive laws criminalizing human trafficking, and the authorities have been either incapable of enforcing existing bans or complicit in trafficking activity. Traffickers have taken advantage of civil unrest to establish enterprises in which refugees and migrants are loaded into overcrowded boats that are then abandoned in the Mediterranean Sea, where passengers hope to be rescued and taken to Europe. The voyages often result in fatalities. Libyan coast guard forces, which receive support from European governments, work to block such departures and have reportedly abused and exploited the passengers they intercept.

Liechtenstein

Population: 40,000

Capital: Vaduz

Freedom Status: Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: The Principality of Liechtenstein combines a powerful monarchy with a parliamentary system of government. The prince has an influential political role, which was enhanced by a constitutional referendum in 2003. Human rights and civil liberties are generally respected in the country.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- Parliamentary elections in February resulted in gains for Liechtenstein's two governing parties, the Patriotic Union (VU) and the Progressive Citizens' Party (FBP).

In the closest election ever held in the country, the center-right VU beat the conservative FBP by only about 40 votes. The right-wing populist Independents (DU) lost all five of their seats, while a new right-wing party, Democrats for Liechtenstein (DpL), entered the parliament with two seats. After the elections, the VU and FBP once again formed a coalition government, with VU leader Daniel Risch replacing the FBP's Adrian Hasler as prime minister.

- In June, the Constitutional Court ruled that the country's ban on the adoption of children by same-sex couples was illegal. The ruling followed controversial remarks by the prince, who in February threatened a veto of any legislation that would allow the practice. The parliament had yet to act on the court's decision at year's end.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 33 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 10 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 2 / 4

Liechtenstein has one of the most politically powerful hereditary monarchies in Europe. In a 2003 constitutional referendum, voters granted significantly more power to the prince. As head of state, the prince appoints the prime minister and cabinet on the recommendation of the parliament and has the authority to dismiss the government and dissolve the parliament.

Prince Hans-Adam II is the current head of state, but he delegated his governmental authority to his son, Hereditary Prince Alois, in 2004. Daniel Risch took office as prime minister in March 2021 after his party, the VU, renewed its governing coalition with the FBP following parliamentary elections. He replaced Adrian Hasler of the FBP.

The Landtag, the unicameral parliament, consists of 25 deputies chosen by proportional representation every four years. International observers considered the 2021 parliamentary elections to be credible. The two ruling parties, the VU and FBP, increased their share of votes and both won 10 seats, while DU lost all of their five seats. The center-left Free List (FL) retained its three seats, and the newly established DpL, a DU splinter group, entered the parliament with two seats.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 4 / 4

The electoral framework provides a sound basis for democratic balloting. There are no formal provisions for election observation, but domestic and international observers are free to monitor the process. While voting is compulsory under the law, the rule is not enforced.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 13 / 16

There are no onerous limits on the establishment or activities of political parties. The 8 percent vote threshold for representation in the parliament is comparatively high, though the 2013 elections marked the first time that four parties had won seats, and subsequent elections have also yielded representation for four parties. In 2019, an administrative court ruled that the new DpL should be recognized by the government as a political party, which entitled it to public financing. The party, which went on to capture two seats in the 2021 elections, was founded by three lawmakers who left DU.

The unelected prince wields significant governmental authority, meaning the extent to which power can change hands through elections is limited. The FBP and VU have traditionally dominated the parliament, competing with each other and usually forming coalition governments. The FL has long served as an opposition party, and since 2013 DU and DpL have also acted as opposition forces in the legislature.

Although citizens' political choices are largely free from undue interference, the prince has the power to veto the outcome of national referendums and popular initiatives. He has occasionally threatened to use this power, thereby influencing the results. In a 2012 constitutional referendum, however, 76 percent of voters rejected a proposal to limit the prince's veto power.

Transparency of political financing remains a concern. In response to calls for reform by the Council of Europe's Group of States against Corruption (GRECO), the parliament in 2019 passed a modification of the law on party financing, stipulating that parties may no longer accept anonymous donations exceeding 300 Swiss francs ($325). However, the law did not require parties to publicly disclose their known donors, and campaign financing remains largely unregulated.

Approximately one-third of the population consists of foreign nationals—mostly from neighboring countries—who do not have political rights in the principality. Under Liechtenstein's restrictive naturalization criteria, one must live in the country for 30 years, or marry a resident Liechtenstein citizen and live in the country for more than 10 years, to qualify for citizenship.

Women and members of ethnic minority groups generally enjoy formal political equality, though some disparities persist in practice. As part of a 2020 referendum, voters rejected a proposed change to the constitution that would have required the promotion of equal representation for women in politics. However, following the 2021 elections, the number of women in the parliament increased from three to seven.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 10 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 2 / 4

Although elected executive and legislative officials set the policy agenda, the prince has significant governmental authority with no electoral mandate. He can dismiss the government and the parliament and veto both legislation and the outcome of public plebiscites.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 4 / 4

Anticorruption laws are effectively implemented, and levels of corruption are reportedly low. However, a 2020 GRECO compliance report observed that Liechtenstein still lacked a code of conduct for members of parliament, who are not currently required to declare assets or conflicts of interest.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 4 / 4

Although there is no constitutional guarantee of access to information, laws are in place to provide for government transparency, and these are largely respected in practice.

The government has made efforts in recent years to increase transparency in the banking sector, which has historically been criticized for enabling foreign clients to hide wealth from their respective governments and potentially aiding corruption or other criminal activity. A 2019 report by the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development's Global Forum on Transparency and Exchange of Information for Tax Purposes concluded that Liechtenstein is largely compliant with international standards regarding beneficiary ownership, accounting, and banking.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 57 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 16 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 4 / 4

The constitution guarantees freedom of the press, which is respected in practice. Liechtenstein has one private television station, one public radio station, and two main newspapers that are owned by the two major political parties. The local media sector lacks pluralism, but residents have access to foreign news outlets, including broadcasts from Germany, Austria, and Switzerland.

Although the constitution establishes Roman Catholicism as the state religion, religious freedom is constitutionally guaranteed and protected in practice. Catholic or Protestant education is mandatory in all primary schools, but exemptions are routinely granted. Islamic religious classes have been offered in some primary schools since 2008. All religious groups have tax-exempt status. Muslim groups have yet to obtain permission to establish a mosque or a dedicated Muslim cemetery; there is one Islamic prayer room, and churches open their facilities for use by other faiths upon request. In August 2021, the Islamic community submitted a petition to the parliament that called for equal rights and additional facilities; the parliament welcomed the document and referred it to the government.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

Academic freedom is largely respected, with no significant restrictions by state or nonstate actors.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 4 / 4

The law guarantees freedom of expression, but prohibits public insults directed against a race or ethnic group. The government is not known to improperly monitor private communications.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 12 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

The constitution guarantees freedom of assembly, and this right is respected in practice.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 4 / 4

Domestic and international nongovernmental organizations are able to function freely.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 4 / 4

The law facilitates the formation of trade unions and collective bargaining, and workers enjoy freedom of association in practice. The principality has at least one trade union. While a 2008 legal change removed a ban on strikes for civil servants, the right to strike in general is not explicitly protected by law. Major labor disputes are rare in the country.

F. RULE OF LAW: 14 / 16F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 3 / 4

The judiciary is generally independent and impartial, but the constitution gives the prince a powerful influence over the appointment of judges, meaning the process lacks a key element of democratic accountability. The selection board for judicial candidates is chaired by the prince or his deputy, whose assent is required for candidate recommendations; the rest of the board consists of the prince's appointees and representatives of the government and parliamentary parties. The recommended candidates are submitted for approval by the parliament and appointment by the prince. The 2020 GRECO report called for the selection board to include judges chosen by their peers, and for the appointment procedure to feature specific integrity criteria that candidates must meet.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 4 / 4

The constitution provides for the right to a fair trial, and the rights of defendants are usually respected. Most trials are public, and defendants are considered innocent until proven guilty. In a 2017 report, the Council of Europe's Committee for the Prevention of Torture expressed concerns about some aspects of police custody procedures, including the fact that police can deny the presence of a lawyer during initial questioning.

People in Liechtenstein are largely free from the illegitimate use of physical force. Violent crime is extremely rare. While the country's small prison facility can hold up to 16 men and four women in short-term detention, those serving longer sentences are incarcerated in neighboring Austria.

The legal framework prohibits discrimination on various grounds, though some shortcomings remain. In 2018, the European Commission against Racism and Intolerance (ECRI) reiterated the need for Liechtenstein to ratify Protocol 12 to the European Convention on Human Rights, which provides a general prohibition against discrimination.

Despite the presence of antidiscrimination laws, women, particularly Muslim women, and LGBT+ people experience employment discrimination. Women continue to earn significantly less on average than their male counterparts. LGBT+ individuals face social stigma, and according to a leading human rights group, they often do not disclose their sexual orientation or gender identity out of fear of bias.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 15 / 16G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

There are no significant restrictions on freedom of movement in Liechtenstein. The social-distancing rules that have been imposed for certain periods since the beginning of the COVID-19 pandemic in 2020 are generally seen as a legitimate response to the public health threat.

The legal framework generally protects property rights and supports private business activity without undue restrictions. Nonresidents are not allowed to establish a business in Liechtenstein, but prospective business owners exploit loopholes to work around the law.

Personal social freedoms are largely protected. Same-sex registered partnerships are legal, and single LGBT+ people can adopt children, but same-sex couples cannot. In February 2021 the prince threatened a veto of any legislative move to allow adoption by same-sex couples, but the Constitutional Court ruled in June that the ban was illegal; at year's end the parliament had yet to act on the court's ruling.

Domestic violence and rape, including spousal rape, are illegal in Liechtenstein, and authorities effectively prosecute offenders and protect victims. Abortion is criminalized unless the pregnant individual is at risk of death or serious harm, or was under age 14 at the time of conception. A 2011 referendum proposal to expand the conditions for legal abortion was defeated by voters.

Liechtenstein is largely free from economic exploitation and human trafficking. Despite the country's overall wealth and low unemployment rates, however, relative poverty persists among some communities. Immigrants in particular often struggle to achieve economic security and social mobility.

Lithuania

Population: 2,800,000

Capital: Vilnius

Freedom Status: Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Lithuania is a democracy in which political rights and civil liberties are generally respected. Chronic problems including corruption and socioeconomic inequality often arouse public dissatisfaction with the government, political parties, and other institutions. Women, LGBT+ people, members of the Romany minority, and some other groups experience varying degrees of discrimination and underrepresentation in politics.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- In July, Lithuanian authorities initiated a policy of asylum denial and pushback against migrants and refugees attempting to cross the border with Belarus; the Belarusian government had facilitated the passage of migrants to the borders of several European Union (EU) member states in response to sanctions against Minsk. By year's end, 8,000 people were prevented from entering Lithuania, while those who did enter the country faced significant restrictions.
- Several large protests over the government's COVID-19 policy were held in August, September, and November. Police and protesters clashed during the August rally in Vilnius, with officers using force to keep protesters away from the parliament building.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 38 / 40A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 12 / 12*A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The president, whose main competencies as head of state pertain to foreign affairs, is directly elected for up to two five-year terms. The prime minister, who as head of government holds most executive authority, is appointed by the president with the approval of the Seimas (parliament). Recent executive elections have met democratic standards.

Centrist nonpartisan candidate Gitanas Nausėda was elected president in 2019 after his predecessor, Dalia Grybauskaitė, completed her second term of office. Nausėda took 66 percent of the vote in a runoff, defeating Ingrida Šimonytė, an independent lawmaker backed by the Homeland Union–Lithuanian Christian Democrats (TS-LKD), who took 33 percent. Šimonytė was appointed prime minister following the October 2020 parliamentary elections, taking office that December.

The unicameral, 141-seat Seimas includes 71 members elected in single-mandate constituencies and 70 chosen by proportional representation, all for four-year terms.

In the October 2020 elections, the center-right TS-LKD won 50 seats, while the then incumbent centrist-populist Farmers and Greens Union (LVŽS) won 32. Two socially liberal and probusiness parties, the Liberal Movement and the Freedom Party, respectively won 13 and 11 seats; they entered a coalition with the TS-LKD that November.

The center-left Lithuanian Social Democratic Party (LSDP) won 13, while the centrist-populist Labor Party won 10. Four other parties and independent candidates won the remaining seats.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 4 / 4

The legislative framework for conducting elections is consistent with democratic standards and generally well implemented. The Central Electoral Commission has typically operated and adjudicated election-related complaints in a fair manner.

In August 2020, the Constitutional Court ruled that the 2018 Law on Referendum was passed in an unconstitutional manner but left the law in place through July 2021. A new referendum bill passed its first reading in June 2021 and remained under parliamentary consideration as of September.

In April 2021, the Constitutional Court ruled that direct mayoral elections, which were introduced in 2015, contradicted the constitution. Its ruling will take effect in May 2023.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 16 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 4 / 4

Political parties generally operate freely. Citizens of other EU member states are eligible to join Lithuanian political parties but cannot found them.

The minimum number of members for political parties, which stands at 2,000, somewhat restricts the creation of new parties and the maintenance of small ones. Public funding rules generally favor the main parliamentary forces, as private financing of political organizations is tightly restricted. State subsidies are calculated according to electoral results and represent the main source of revenue for parties. Public election committees—a way for groups of citizens to run for municipal councils without joining or establishing a political party—have been an option since 2010, though they are not permitted for parliamentary elections.

Regular transfers of power between rival parties after elections have been the norm since the early 1990s, with left- and right-leaning coalitions alternating in government. Parties in opposition retain a significant presence in the Seimas.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 4 / 4

Sporadic cases of vote buying during national elections have been observed, and clientelism can influence politics at the local level. However, voters and candidates are generally free to exercise their political autonomy without undue influence or interference.

There are no formal restrictions on the political participation of women, LGBT+ people, or members of ethnic, religious, and other minority groups. Women and women's interests remain underrepresented in politics, though women hold 28.4 percent of Seimas seats as of December 2021. Moreover, the three leaders of the governing coalition are women, including Prime Minister Šimonytė and Viktorija Čmilytė-Nielsen, who serves as Seimas speaker and Liberal Movement leader. Šimonytė's cabinet approached gender balance, with women holding six of the 14 ministerial posts.

Political parties that are supportive of LGBT+ rights increased their parliamentary representation in 2020. The Freedom Party, founded in 2019, campaigned for marriage equality and had an openly gay candidate among its leaders; it won 9 percent of the national vote.

The Electoral Action of Poles in Lithuania—Christian Families Alliance, which represents members of the ethnic Polish minority, failed to clear the 5 percent vote threshold for proportional-representation seats in 2020 but won three seats in single-mandate districts.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 10 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 4 / 4

The country's elected officials are able to determine and implement government policies without improper interference from unelected or foreign entities. However, corruption scandals have periodically raised concerns about the influence of major businesses on governance.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 3 / 4

Corruption remains an issue in Lithuania, and certain sectors, including health care and construction, are perceived as prone to malfeasance. While anticorruption bodies are active, there are usually considerable delays in the investigation and prosecution of political corruption cases.

The protection of whistleblowers and journalists who report on corruption cases is legally guaranteed, though such safeguards are upheld inconsistently at the local level.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 3 / 4

Lithuanian law grants the public the right to access official information, and the government generally complies with such requests. However, the operations of state-owned enterprises (SOEs)—especially municipal SOEs—are somewhat opaque and prone to financial misconduct.

In a July 2021 report, the European Commission lauded new transparency rules for lobbying activities as well as improvements in the country's public procurement framework.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 51 / 60 (-1)

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 15 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 3 / 4

The government generally respects freedom of the press, and the media market is vibrant. However, the increasing concentration of media ownership in the hands of a small number of companies raises the risk of editorial interference by powerful political and business interests. Journalists often engage in self-censorship when reporting on certain large companies. Journalists face online harassment and abuse. The economic impact of the COVID-19 pandemic left the media more vulnerable to undue influence and affected the job security of journalists.

Because of a vaguely worded law restricting the dissemination of information that "abases family values," media outlets have faced pressure to limit coverage of LGBT+ issues.

Freedom of religion is legally guaranteed and largely upheld in practice. However, nine so-called traditional religious communities, and particularly the Roman Catholic Church, enjoy certain government benefits, including annual subsidies that are not granted to other groups.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

Academic freedom is respected, and the educational system is generally free from political influence.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 4 / 4

The freedoms of personal expression and private discussion are generally robust and unrestricted. However, due to concerns about the Russian government's foreign policy, individuals who criticize government stances on security-related issues—including energy policy, military spending, conscription, and sanctions against authoritarian regimes—can face institutional scrutiny and societal marginalization.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 11 / 12E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

Freedom of assembly is generally respected. Authorities restricted the size of gatherings and banned sports and cultural events for part of 2021 due to COVID-19. Restrictions on gatherings were loosened when a lockdown ended in July.

An LGBT+ pride parade took place in Kaunas in September 2021, though local authorities initially denied a permit in June; the Supreme Administrative Court allowed the parade to proceed in a final ruling in early September.

Several large protests over the government's COVID-19 policy were held in August, September, and November 2021. Police and protesters clashed during the August rally in Vilnius, with officers using force to keep protesters away from the Seimas building.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 4 / 4

Nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) are able to register without facing serious obstacles, and they generally operate without undue restrictions in practice.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 3 / 4

Workers have the right to form and join trade unions and engage in collective bargaining, though there have been reports of employees being punished for attempting to organize. Less than 10 percent of workers are trade union members, and the share of workers covered by collective agreements is similarly low. Changes to the labor code in 2017 required employers with at least 20 workers to initiate the election of a work council to represent employees' interests, if a union was not already established, though only unions can engage in collective bargaining. Strikes are relatively uncommon due to strict regulations, lack of strike funds, and the absence of a culture of industrial action.

F. RULE OF LAW: 11 / 16 (-1)F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 3 / 4

Although public confidence in the courts has been steadily improving in recent years, judicial corruption remains a significant concern. An extensive bribery scandal in 2019 eventually led to criminal charges against 12 senior judges, including a member of the Supreme Court. All 12 had been dismissed by the end of 2021.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 3 / 4

Defendants generally enjoy the presumption of innocence and freedom from arbitrary arrest and detention, but detained suspects are not always granted timely access to an attorney. The law states that pretrial detention should only be employed in exceptional circumstances, and its use has declined in recent years.

The population is largely free from major threats to physical security, and the homicide rate has declined in recent years, though it remains one of the highest in the EU.

Although the government has taken measures to improve the situation, conditions at some prisons are substandard, violence among prisoners remains a problem, and physical abuse of prisoners by correctional officers persists.

The constitution guarantees equality before the law and forbids discrimination based on gender, race, language, and other categories. The laws provide similar protections against discrimination based on sexual orientation, though gender identity is not addressed. In practice, women generally earn less than men per hour worked, and both LGBT+ people and Roma experience societal discrimination. Ethnic Poles and members of other national minority groups have objected to limits on the use of their languages; public signs must be written only in Lithuanian, even in areas predominantly inhabited by people who speak different languages.

Authorities in Belarus allowed an increased number of migrants and refugees to enter their country as 2021 progressed. Minsk then facilitated their passage to the borders of EU member states including Lithuania. The Lithuanian government declared a state of emergency in July, as migrants began appearing at the border. Lithuanian authorities refused entry to many individuals, pushing them back to border control points; between August and December, border guards stopped over 8,000 people from entering the country. Those who were sent to a camp in Rūdninkai faced poor physical conditions; the government closed that camp by September and moved residents to a former correctional facility.

The Seimas also legislated to restrict the rights of migrants and asylum seekers. In July and August 2021, it passed laws restricting the rights of migrants and allowing the government to deny asylum applications at the border in some circumstances; in November, the Migration Department reported only 1 percent of asylum applications had been approved. In late December, the Seimas legislated to restrict the movement of migrants who arrived during a state of emergency.

Score Change: The score declined from 3 to 2 because Lithuanian authorities initiated a pushback policy against people attempting to cross the border with Belarus, denied nearly all requests for asylum, and restricted the movement of migrants within the country.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 14 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

Residents of Lithuania may leave the country and travel internally without significant obstacles.

Pandemic-related movement restrictions are generally considered proportionate. In May 2021, the government introduced an electronic health pass for those who had been vaccinated against COVID-19 or recently tested negative. In September, the government restricted unvaccinated individuals from visiting stores selling nonessential goods and from attending indoor events.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 4 / 4

Successive governments have worked to maintain a well-regulated market economy, and the legal framework generally protects property rights and the freedom to operate private businesses.

Individual freedom regarding personal status matters such as marriage and divorce is generally upheld, but marriage is constitutionally defined as a union between a man and a woman. Same-sex partnerships are not legally recognized; a bill to allow same-sex civil unions did not receive sufficient support in a May 2021 Seimas vote.

Domestic violence remains a problem; it is one of the country's most reported crimes, but the rates of investigation and prosecution remain inadequate. A majority of cases reported to police in 2020 involved violence against women.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 3 / 4

Legal protections against exploitative working conditions exist and are enforced in practice. However, the incidence rate for fatal workplace accidents in Lithuania is nearly twice the EU average according to Eurostat data dating back to 2018. Foreign workers in sectors such as construction and transportation are vulnerable to labor trafficking. Lithuanian women and children have been exploited for sex trafficking.

Luxembourg

Population: 600,000

Capital: Luxembourg

Freedom Status: Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Luxembourg is a constitutional monarchy with a democratically elected government. Political rights and civil liberties are generally respected. Ongoing concerns include insufficient government transparency and inadequate safeguards against conflicts of interest.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- Parliament voted to initiate constitutional reforms that would strengthen judicial independence in October; to pass, the reforms must either be approved by two-thirds of the parliament in a second vote or in a national referendum. Despite criticism from some opposition parties, the ruling coalition and the Christian Social People's Party (CSV) decided not to put the amendment to a national referendum, and the reform process remained ongoing at year's end.
- In December, the parliament introduced new transparency regulations governing lobbyists' interactions with government officials.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 38 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 12 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The prime minister is the head of government and serves five-year terms. The leader of the majority coalition formed after parliamentary elections is appointed prime minister by the hereditary monarch, the grand duke, whose powers are largely ceremonial.

Incumbent prime minister Xavier Bettel of the Democratic Party (DP) was appointed to form a new government in October 2018 following that month's parliamentary election. The new government was based on the existing coalition of the DP, the Luxembourg Socialist Workers' Party (LSAP), and the Greens (DG). The election was considered credible.

The unicameral legislature, the Chamber of Deputies, consists of 60 members elected to five-year terms by proportional representation. In the October 2018 election, the DP led the ruling coalition parties with 12 seats, followed by the LSAP with 10 and the Green Party with 9. The main opposition party, the CSV, won 21 seats. The populist right-wing Alternative Democratic Reform Party (ADR) won 4 seats, while the Pirate Party and the Left each took 2. The contest was generally seen as free and fair.

Luxembourgers participated in the May 2019 European Parliament (EP) election; the DP won 21.4 percent of the vote, while the CSV won 21.1 percent, the Greens won 18.9 percent, and the LSAP won 12.2 percent.

The electoral laws and framework are considered fair, and they are generally implemented impartially. Voting is compulsory. In 2017, the government passed a law allowing postal ballots for all citizens.

A multiparty Constitutional Revision Committee completed its draft of a new constitution in 2018. Amendments to the constitution can take effect only after being approved by two-thirds of parliament in two separate votes, or by two-thirds of parliament in one vote plus a national referendum. The parliament passed the first of several planned reform packages with the required majority in October 2021, but despite criticism from some opposition parties, the ruling coalition and the CSV decided not to put the amendment to a national referendum. The reform process remained ongoing at year's end.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 16 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 4 / 4

The political system is open to the establishment of new parties, which do not face undue obstacles in their formation or activities. Three parties have traditionally dominated politics: the CSV, historically aligned with the Catholic Church; the LSAP, a center-left party; and the DP, which favors free-market economic policies. Four smaller parties—the Greens, the ADR, the Left, and the Pirate Party—have also won representation. While constituting a party is relatively easy, the structure and size of electoral constituencies, as well as the 10 percent electoral threshold, favor larger parties.

The country has a record of peaceful transfers of power between rival parties. Both the DP and the Greens were in the opposition before forming the governing coalition with the LSAP in 2013. The CSV, which had played a leading role in most governments since 1945, was forced into opposition in 2013 for the first time since 1979, and it remained out of government following the 2018 election.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 4 / 4

Citizens are generally able to make political choices without undue interference from any democratically unaccountable groups. However, close links between the country's financial center and its law-making elites is regularly a topic of concern for the opposition and outside observers.

Women engage actively in politics, and the government has taken measures to encourage greater participation. A 2016 law mandates that at least 40 percent of each party's electoral candidates be women; parties risk losing a portion of their public financing if they do not meet the quota. However, only 20 women hold elected seats in the Chamber of Deputies, which accounts for 33.3 percent of Parliament. Citizens who belong to ethnic minorities and LGBT+ people enjoy full political rights and are free to participate in practice. In 2013, Prime Minister Bettel became the nation's first openly gay person to hold his position.

About 49 percent of the population consists of foreign nationals, most of whom are citizens of other European Union (EU) member states, with Portugal accounting for the largest single contingent. The law allows naturalization and dual nationality, and children automatically gain citizenship when a parent is naturalized. Foreign residents are entitled to vote in municipal elections and EU foreigners can participate in EU elections. In September 2021, the government abolished a five-year residency requirement for voting in municipal elections; however, foreign residents are excluded from participating in national elections. Notably, politicians of foreign origin remain rare in Luxembourg, despite the background of nearly half the population.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 10 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 4 / 4

The prime minister, cabinet, and parliament determine and implement the government's policies without improper interference from unelected entities.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 3 / 4

Corruption is not widespread in Luxembourg, and allegations of corruption are generally investigated and prosecuted. However, the Council of Europe's Group of States against Corruption (GRECO) has previously criticized the government for failing to develop a comprehensive strategy to prevent graft. In addition, rules on accepting gifts, lobbying, and mitigating conflicts of interest after government officials leave office are lacking. The European Commission repeated this criticism in July 2021, citing cases of former ministers joining the private sector without any real safeguards.

In 2020, a scandal regarding mismanagement at the royal court triggered a reform process aimed at making the missions of the royal family more transparent.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 3 / 4

While the legislative process and government operations are largely transparent, there is no comprehensive freedom of information law in place, and the media and civil society groups often have difficulty obtaining official information in practice. Cabinet members are obligated to disclose any shares in companies that they own, but there are no penalties for those who do not cooperate.

Historically, regulations governing interactions between lobbyists and high-level government officials have been considered weak. New transparency regulations, requiring those representing interest groups to register their details before contacting members of Parliament, were passed by the parliament in December 2021 after several months of debate.

In February 2021, the EU introduced a new directive on public country-by-country reporting (CBCR), which will require firms throughout the bloc, including in Luxembourg, to disclose revenues and tax payments in an effort to promote tax transparency.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 59 / 60D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 16 / 16*D1. Are there free and independent media? 4 / 4

Freedom of the press is guaranteed by the constitution and generally respected in practice. Luxembourg's media market is regulated by the Independent Luxembourg Broadcasting Authority (ALIA). A single conglomerate, RTL Télé Lëtzebuerg (RTL), dominates broadcast radio and television, though numerous print, online, and foreign news sources are also available and present a broad range of views. Internet access is not restricted.

The written press has historically tended to align with traditional parties. In 2020, the Belgian conglomerate Mediahuis purchased the Saint-Paul group, the owner of the country's largest daily newspaper, the Luxemburger Wort. Mediahuis claimed that the acquisition would result in no job losses, but 70 Luxemburger Wort employees were let go that December, a move criticized by analysts as potentially weakening the country's media environment.

Freedom of religion is largely respected in practice. The state has historically paid the salaries of clergy from a variety of Christian groups, but a 2016 law ended the practice for all clergy hired after that point. Under the law, the government continued to provide some funding to six major recognized religious communities, including the Muslim community, based on their size. Religious instruction in secondary and primary schools was phased out in 2016–17. In 2018, the parliament adopted legislation that banned face coverings in schools, medical facilities, public buildings, public transport, and retirement homes. The law was widely understood to be aimed at Muslims, though the wearing of such garments is extremely rare in the country.

Academic freedom is generally respected in practice.

Freedom of expression is largely respected, and individuals can voice their political views without fear of retribution.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 12 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

Freedom of assembly is guaranteed by the constitution and generally respected in practice.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 4 / 4

Nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) are largely free to operate without any undue restrictions.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 4 / 4

Workers are free to organize in trade unions and bargain collectively. The right to strike is guaranteed once conciliation procedures are formally exhausted. Employers are subject to penalties for antiunion discrimination.

F. RULE OF LAW: 15 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 4 / 4

Judicial independence is generally upheld. Judges are appointed by the grand duke and cannot be removed arbitrarily.

Parliament conducted ongoing discussions in 2021 regarding a constitutional amendment that strengthens the independence of judiciary by establishing a Council of Justice, competent to nominate candidates for all judicial posts prior to their formal appointment by the executive (and formally by the grand duke). Composed of nine members, the council would also develop ethical standards and act as a watchdog for judges. The reform is expected to be adopted in 2022.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 4 / 4

Due process is largely upheld in civil and criminal matters. Defendants have the right to a fair and public trial, and this right is generally respected. Police typically observe safeguards against arbitrary arrest and detention.

There are no major threats to civilians' physical security. Prison conditions and protections against the illegitimate use of force are adequate, and violent crime is rare.

In September 2021, a man was attacked by a dog owned by a private security firm hired by the Luxembourg City government. The incident sparked a heated debate over the legality of the city's contract with the security firm, which had been accused of overreaching its authority earlier in the year; in November, local officials announced that the contract would not be extended past that month. An investigation into the incident was ongoing as of December.

Discrimination on the basis of race, religion, disability, age, sex, gender identity, or sexual orientation is prohibited by law. The rights of LGBT+ people are generally respected.

Women have benefited from reductions in the gender pay gap and an increase in their labor participation rate in recent years, though women still hold significantly fewer senior positions than men.

The Luxembourg government has instituted an onerous language requirement for those seeking public sector jobs and employment. Individuals in the public sector must speak German, French, and Luxembourgish fluently. However, very few official documents are in Luxembourgish, and exceptions to this requirement are made for high-level positions due to a lack of qualified candidates. The requirement funnels citizens into public sector positions, which are lucrative and secure, pushing immigrant workers into the unstable private sector in which there are other barriers to entry. Moreover, discrimination in the education system limits somewhat the economic potential of nonnationals.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 16 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

Individuals generally enjoy freedom of movement, and there are no significant restrictions on their ability to change their place of residence, employment, or institution of higher education.

The rights to own property and operate private businesses are legally protected and respected in practice.

Individual freedoms on issues such as marriage and divorce are generally guaranteed. Same-sex marriage has been legal since 2014, and same-sex couples have full adoption rights. Abortions are legal on request within the first trimester of pregnancy; later abortions require two doctors to determine that the pregnancy threatens the woman's life or health. The authorities generally uphold laws and practices meant to address rape and domestic violence.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 4 / 4

The country's residents largely enjoy equality of opportunity, and the government enforces legal protections against exploitative working conditions. Occasional cases of forced labor in the construction and food-service industries have been reported, especially among migrant workers.

Madagascar

Population: 28,400,000

Capital: Antananarivo

Freedom Status: Partly Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Though politics have been unstable since the return to electoral politics in 2013, the 2018 election of Andry Rajoelina has brought some stability. However, government corruption and a lack of accountability persist. Defamation and other laws restrict press freedom. Authorities deny permits for demonstrations and disperse some that take place. The government has struggled to manage lawlessness and poverty, particularly in the south.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- In July, a few retired and active military officers were arrested for plotting to assassinate the president and overthrow the government. The two primary suspects, both of whom are Malagasy and French citizens and likely led the plot, were sentenced to 10 and 20 years of forced labor in December. Most of their accomplices were acquitted or received lesser sentences.
- In October, former prime minister Jean Ravelonarivo was convicted of corruption, fined 6 billion ariary ($1.5 million), and sentenced to five years in prison. Ravelonarivo did not attend his trial and allegedly fled to Switzerland days before the court ruled on his case. Ravelonarivo's accomplices—including Raoul Arizaka Rabekoto, the director of the state company who likely masterminded their embezzlement scheme—also fled the country.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 27 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 9 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 3 / 4

Madagascar is a semi-presidential republic, with a president elected for a five-year term and a prime minister nominated by the National Assembly and appointed by the president.

Andry Rajoelina defeated Marc Ravalomanana in the 2018 presidential election's second round of voting with 55.7 percent of the vote, which the High Constitutional Court (HCC) confirmed despite allegations of fraud. Most regional and international election observers also recognized the election as generally free and fair.

Prime Minister Christian Ntsay, who was appointed by former president Hery Rajaonarimampianina in 2018, was reappointed by President Rajoelina in 2019.

The bicameral legislature consists of the 151-seat National Assembly and the 18-seat Senate. Members of the National Assembly are directly elected to five-year terms.

In March 2020, the National Assembly passed a measure, approved by President Rajoelina, that reduced the size of the Senate from 63 to 18 seats. Six of these seats are appointed by the president; the remaining 12 are indirectly elected from an electoral college. Senators serve five-year terms. Critics claimed the downsizing of the Senate was politically motivated, as the opposition led by former president Rajaonarimampianina's New Forces for Madagascar (HVM) party had dominated the body. The Senate elections in December 2020 were boycotted by nearly all opposition parties, and Rajoelina's political alliance won 10 out of 12 seats; the vote was deemed free and fair by most election observers, despite the boycott.

A political alliance led by President Rajoelina won 84 National Assembly seats in the 2019 parliamentary elections, while former President Ravalomanana's I Love Madagascar (TIM) party won 16; the remaining 51 were won by other parties and independent candidates. The contest was deemed free and fair by election observers, though some political parties claimed that the results were marred by fraud.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 3 / 4

The Independent National Electoral Commission (CENI) is subject to some influence by the executive, which controls member nomination and budget allocation processes. The CENI's independence and credibility has been seriously undermined by its lack of resources and expertise, particularly in database management and information technology. After CENI vice president Thiery Rakotonarivo revealed in March 2020 that over a million people would likely have the same national identity card numbers as others on the voter roll, he was forced to resign.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 11 / 16B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 3 / 4

Almost 200 political parties are registered in Madagascar. However, the law on political parties is widely viewed as a flawed document that places undue burdens on individual candidates, effectively instituting a high financial barrier for political candidacy. Political leaders frequently use religion, ethnicity, and caste as instruments to mobilize voters.

Opposition parties can increase their support through elections, but most political parties lack the financial resources to engage in vibrant competition. The government has historically denied opposition parties permits to hold demonstrations.

The TIM claimed that a 2019 law passed by the National Assembly requiring elected officials to hold official status as the parliamentary opposition targeted their party leader Ravalomanana, who had not assumed elected office. Though the Senate initially delayed its passage and proposed amendments to the bill, the law passed without amendment in May 2021.

Economic networks compete for power through strategic support of political candidates. In turn, a narrow group of political elites maintain their status by supporting the interests of their private-sector patrons. As a result, lines between public and private expenditures are blurry.

The military has some influence over politics, and it threatened to intervene during a 2018 political crisis. In July 2021, a few retired and active military officers were arrested for plotting to assassinate the president and overthrow the government. The two primary suspects, both of whom are Malagasy and French citizens and likely led the plot, were sentenced to 10 and 20 years of forced labor in December. Most of their accomplices were acquitted or received lesser sentences.

The constitution guarantees political and electoral rights for all citizens, but in practice, discrimination impedes the political representation of some groups. The members of the Merina ethnic group are overrepresented in government institutions compared to the members of the other seventeen prominent ethnic groups. While some LGBT+ people are active politically in the capital, they face social stigma that discourages political participation and open advocacy for LGBT+ rights.

Cultural norms restrict the political participation of women, who hold 18 percent of National Assembly seats. Muslims are disproportionately affected by the nationality code, which can make it difficult for them to secure citizenship documents and thus voting rights. Ethnicity and caste are important political determinants, but generally do not affect political rights.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 7 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 3 / 4

Since his 2018 election, President Rajoelina has brought some stability to government, which had experienced frequent replacements of the prime minister and cabinet members since the 2013 return to electoral politics. However, the current parliament lacks the strength to act as an effective check on executive power. Additionally, economic elites exert significant influence on elected officials.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 2 / 4

Corruption remains a serious problem in Madagascar, though a series of recent reforms and anticorruption strategies aim to address it. Investigations and prosecutions of corruption by the Independent Anticorruption Bureau (BIANCO) are infrequent and rarely target high-profile individuals, though the agency has become more independent in recent years. BIANCO has identified least 79 lawmakers who have accepted bribes; prosecutors had not pursued cases against them by the end of 2021. In 2019, BIANCO submitted a report to the High Court of Justice (HCJ) implicating three former ministers in acts of corruption; the court has not yet reviewed the allegations. In October 2021, former prime minister Jean Ravelonarivo was convicted of corruption, fined 6 billion ariary ($1.5 million), and sentenced to five years in prison. Ravelonarivo did not attend his trial and allegedly fled to Switzerland days before the court ruled on his case. His accomplices—including Raoul Arizaka Rabekoto, the director of the state company who likely masterminded their embezzlement scheme—also fled the country.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 2 / 4

The constitution provides for the right to information, but no law defines a formal procedure for requesting government information. However, ministers and officials often hold press briefings, and laws, decrees, and high court decisions are posted on the internet.

There is little oversight of procurement processes. Asset declarations are required for most government officials, and while many complied with these laws, there are few practical consequences for those who refuse.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 34 / 60 (+1)

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 10 / 16 (+1)

D1. Are there free and independent media? 2 / 4

The constitution provides for freedom of the press. However, this guarantee has been undermined by criminal libel laws and other restrictions, as well as safety risks involved in the investigation of sensitive subjects such as cattle rustling and the illicit extraction and sale of natural resources.

During 2020 and 2021, the government targeted and harassed journalists and media outlets critical of its response to the COVID-19 pandemic. In April 2021, the government ordered television and radio stations to uphold a “letter of commitment” that they would ban all programming that would spread alleged misinformation about the COVID-19 pandemic and “threaten public order and security.”

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 3 / 4

Religious freedom is provided for in the constitution, though this right is upheld inconsistently. Religious leaders have noted that some workers have been unable to practice their religion due to poor enforcement of labor laws. The government has historically restricted the Muslim community’s access to education by threatening to close down Islamic schools. Several church facilities have been attacked by armed individuals in recent years.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 3 / 4

Academic freedom is generally respected. However, a lack of resources and frequent strikes hamper normal operations of public universities.

There were no official reports of the government monitoring online activity. However, a cybercrimes law prohibits online defamation and spreading “false information,” and has been used to prosecute social media users.

In October 2020, former communications minister Harry Laurent Rahajason was sentenced to 44 months in prison after supporting a protest through social media. Though his arrest and others have deterred individuals from speaking freely online, particularly about the government’s handling of the COVID-19 pandemic, the authorities did not pursue legal action against those who criticized them in 2021.

Score Change: The score improved from 2 to 3 because there was no repetition of the previous year’s high-profile prosecutions for critical online speech about the government’s handling of the COVID-19 pandemic.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 8 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 2 / 4

The constitution guarantees freedom of assembly, but authorities have sometimes declined requests for protests and rallies in the name of public security.

In December 2021, former president Ravalomanana’s political party was prevented from holding a rally in the south of the country. That same month, various consumer protection associations were denied the right to organize a march against price inflation in the capital.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 3 / 4

Freedom of association is provided for in the constitution and is generally respected. A wide variety of nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) are active, but many domestic human rights groups lack resources. Although no restrictions are placed on NGOs, the government is not always receptive to their opinions. Groups focused on the environment or human rights face pressure from powerful interests.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 3 / 4

Workers have the right to join unions, engage in collective bargaining, and strike. However, more than 80 percent of workers are engaged in agriculture, fishing, and forestry at a subsistence level, and therefore have no access to unions.

F. RULE OF LAW: 7 / 16F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 2 / 4

The executive influences judicial decisions through the reassignment of judges. Trial outcomes are frequently predetermined, and the Malagasy people generally regard the judiciary as corrupt. Local tribunals are seen as overburdened and corrupt.

In recent years, key HCC rulings have reflected its growing independence from the executive. However, the HCC has at times approved Rajoelina's actions and disregarded legitimate allegations of corruption, despite legitimate protests from the opposition.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 1 / 4

Due process rights are poorly upheld. A lack of training, resources, and personnel hampers the effectiveness of the criminal justice system. Many people held in pretrial detention do not have access to lawyers, and the successful assertion of due process rights is often tied to the ability of family and friends to intercede on behalf of the accused.

The government has increased funding for the judiciary, launched capacity-building efforts, and pardoned individuals detained over minor offenses as part of a new policy supported by the UN Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights (OHCHR). In 2019, the government also instituted the use of "fair ground hearings" to alleviate the pretrial backlog.

The police and military are unable to assert authority over the entire country, and areas in southern Madagascar are subjected to raids and violence by bandits and criminal groups. Security forces operate with little oversight or accountability for extrajudicial killings, particularly against cattle thieves. Nevertheless, since 2020, new military bases were built in these areas that were traditionally called "red zone" or under the control of the dahalo.

Detainees and prisoners suffer from harsh and sometimes life-threatening conditions due to overcrowding in detention facilities (though new facilities have been built to address this issue), as well as substandard hygiene and health care. People convicted of serious crimes can be sentenced to hard labor.

Legal provisions prohibit discrimination based on race, gender, disability, and social status, but these are upheld inconsistently. Conservative cultural and social norms can prevent women from having the same opportunities as men. Some ethnic groups face discrimination outside of their home regions.

There are no legal protections against discrimination based on sexual orientation or gender identity; LGBT+ people face social stigma, particularly in rural areas, and experience employment discrimination and occasional acts of violence. The age of consent for same-sex relations is 21, but 14 for heterosexual relations. In July 2021, the Interior Ministry shut down an LGBT+ party held in a bar in Antananarivo for allegedly "undermining good morals" and "inciting debauchery."

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 8 / 16G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 3 / 4

The government generally does not interfere in freedom of movement; individuals are allowed to move freely in the country and can travel internationally. However, bandit attacks in the south and west have made traveling across the island difficult.

Madagascar's legal structure provides protections for private property rights, though enforcement of these protections is inconsistent, in part because most farmers do not hold official rights to their land. There is a history of competition between the state-recognized property rights system and customary land use practices, as well as attempts by the state to permit mining, commercial agriculture, and other economic pursuits on land where ownership is disputed.

In recent years, Madagascar has made it easier to start a business by reducing the number of registration procedures and simplifying the payment of registration fees.

Women and children have limited social freedoms in Madagascar, especially in rural areas. Forced child marriage and domestic abuse are common. Although sexual harassment is illegal, the law is not enforced, and harassment is common. Abortion is illegal in Madagascar.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 1 / 4

Most people work in subsistence agriculture, making advancement in the local economy extremely challenging.

According to the US State Department's 2021 Trafficking in Persons Report, the Malagasy government does not scrutinize officials implicated in trafficking, though it does provide some services to victims and convicted traffickers in 2020 for the first time in four years.

Malawi

Population: 20,300,000

Capital: Lilongwe

Freedom Status: Partly Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Malawi holds regular elections and has undergone multiple transfers of power between political parties, most recently in June 2020. Political rights and civil liberties are for the most part respected by the state. However, corruption is endemic, police brutality is common, and discrimination and violence toward women, members of minority groups, and people with albinism remain problems.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- Although the government has committed to addressing corruption, several senior officials were implicated in corruption scandals during the year. In August, the minister of energy, the president's chief advisor on strategy, and the president of the Alliance for Democracy (AFORD) party were arrested for allegedly attempting to influence the selection of companies to supply oil to the National Oil Company of Malawi.

- During the first half of the year, the government threatened to withhold union membership fees, which are normally automatically withdrawn from teachers' salaries, after the Teachers Union of Malawi (TUM) organized a series of strikes demanding high-risk pay and COVID-19 protective equipment. In July, Parliament passed the Labour Relations (Amendment) Act, which provides for an employer's right to deduct wages from an employee who goes on strike for more than three days a year.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 29 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 9 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 3 / 4

The president is directly elected for five-year terms and exercises considerable executive authority. President Chakwera of the Malawi Congress Party (MCP) was elected in June 2020 after receiving 59.34 percent of the vote. Voter turnout reached 64.81 percent. Although election observers were not present due COVID-19-related travel restrictions, the elections were generally considered well-administered, competitive, and credible, reflecting the will of Malawian voters. In August 2021, the Democratic Progressive Party (DPP), which took the second highest vote shares in the election, petitioned the Malawi High Court to nullify Chakwera's victory. In November, the High Court dismissed the petition.

The unicameral National Assembly is composed of 193 members elected by popular vote to serve five-year terms. The 2019 legislative elections were marked by numerous irregularities and logistical problems. As many as 29 legislative candidates challenged the results in court, and up to 7 candidates were successful. The DPP won 62 seats, followed by the MCP with 55, and the United Democratic Front (UDF) with 10. Smaller parties and independent candidates won the remaining 65 seats. Fourteen legislative by-elections were held in December 2020 and throughout 2021, seven of which were due to the deaths of sitting legislators who contracted the coronavirus; the MCP won six of the open seats. The term of the current Parliament was extended to align the next legislative elections with the presidential election in 2025.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 3 / 4

Membership of the Malawi Electoral Commission (MEC) was reconstituted in June 2021, following a High Court ruling determining that four previous MEC commissioners had been illegally appointed. During 2021, the MEC initiated a program to redraw constituency boundaries to ensure a more equitable distribution of voters in each legislative district.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 12 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 3 / 4

There are few significant obstacles to the formation of political parties. While several parties compete in practice, they are loosely organized, with politicians frequently moving between parties or forming their own breakaway groups. Many candidates choose to run as independents in elections. The main political parties are the MCP, the DPP, and the UDF. The DPP, the largest party in the National Assembly, expelled four of its top leaders October 2020 who butted heads with former president Peter Mutharika, who continues to hold significant influence. The four members successfully challenged their expulsion in court, which ordered their interim reinstatement in August 2021.

Malawi has experienced peaceful transfers of power between rival groups. Opposition parties hold seats in Parliament and, ahead of the 2020 presidential election, were able to mobilize and pass several laws to facilitate the fairness of the polls, despite resistance from the ruling party. The 2020 elections were the first time an opposition party defeated an incumbent since the transition to democracy in 1994.

The governing party generally has a campaigning advantage. Media coverage on the state-owned broadcaster, the Malawi Broadcasting Corporation (MBC), has historically been partial to the DPP, compelling the opposition to rely on private media to convey their message to the public.

Traditional chiefs, who wield some authority and receive government honoraria, are supposed to be nonpartisan figures under the law but frequently seek to influence voter choices in practice. Some chiefs publicly endorse candidates during elections and even threaten opposition candidates seeking to campaign in their regions.

The Political Parties Act bans politicians from using cash handouts and other incentives to garner votes. Despite this, a 2020 study by Afrobarometer found that around 16 percent of Malawians had reported being offered food, a gift, or money in return for their vote by a candidate or someone from a political party in the 2019 elections and subsequent byelections.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 3 / 4

All ethnic, religious, and gender groups have full political rights under the law. However, women are significantly underrepresented in politics and decision-making positions and remain less likely than men to be politically involved. None of the few women candidates for the 2021 legislative byelections won. Only 41 of the 193 seats in the National Assembly and 12 posts in the 31-member cabinet are held by women. Catherine Gotani Hara serves as the speaker of Parliament, the first woman in the country's history to do so.

Political parties generally do not advocate for the rights of LGBT+ people, who are subject to legal and societal discrimination.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 8 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 3 / 4

Executive and legislative representatives typically determine the policies of government without hindrance. However, patronage and clientelism are common, and wealthy business leaders often influence policymaking.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 2 / 4

Corruption is a significant challenge in Malawi. Although the Chakwera government has committed to addressing the issue, several senior members of his government have been implicated in corruption scandals. In April 2021, an audit of funds to combat the COVID-19 pandemic reported numerous improper payments, abnormal allowances, inaccurate records, and wasteful spending without accurate budgets. Chakwera dismissed the minister of labor later that month in response to the report. In August, the minister of energy, the president's chief advisor on strategy, and the president of AFORD, were arrested for allegedly attempting to influence the selection of companies to supply oil to the National Oil Company of Malawi.

Civil society leaders have accused the Anti-Corruption Bureau (ACB), which is responsible for investigating corruption cases, of being ineffective and politically compromised.

President Chakwera has been criticized for appointing family members to high-ranking government positions. In July 2021, he appointed his daughter as Third Secretary to the Malawian embassy in Brussels, and has also appointed his son-in-law, close friends, and relatives of his friends to positions within his cabinet.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 3 / 4

The government lacks budgetary transparency, and the government does not make year-end budget audit reports public. President Chakwera has provided regular updates on his government in weekly radio addresses and has appeared twice before Parliament to answer questions from legislators, a legal requirement for his position that previously was not honored.

High-level officials are legally required to declare their assets and other financial interests while in public service, which Chakwera did in August 2020.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 37 / 60D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 13 / 16*D1. Are there free and independent media? 2 / 4

Freedom of the press is legally guaranteed and historically respected in practice. However, news outlets have experienced intimidation and undue regulatory interference in recent years. Most private media houses are owned by political families and often take partisan positions. Journalists sometimes face physical violence while reporting on demonstrations or police activity.

A vaguely worded 2016 cybersecurity law criminalizes the posting of "offensive" content online, which could place journalists at risk of prosecution.

The constitution upholds freedom of religion, and this right is generally respected in practice. Squabbles between Christians and Muslims occasionally flare up but are often peacefully resolved.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

Malawi's education system is largely free from political indoctrination. University students and professors engage in research and political activities without interference.

Citizens are typically free to express their personal views without fear of surveillance or retribution. According to a 2020 Afrobarometer survey, 62 percent of Malawians said that they are free to say what they think. However, according to the survey, many Malawians do not feel comfortable criticizing the government and engage in self-censorship. Under the 2016 cybercrime law, individuals can be sued for posting “offensive” content on social and traditional media platforms. A 1967 law against insulting the president of Malawi remains in the penal code, though it is rarely enforced. Civil society leaders have expressed suspicions that the government monitors their electronic communications with technology introduced in 2017.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 8 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 3 / 4

Freedom of assembly is guaranteed in the constitution. Citizen groups can assemble peacefully, although public gatherings require prior police and local government authorization. Major demonstrations during 2021 included protests over allegations that government officials had embezzled funds allocated to combat the COVID-19 pandemic. However, throughout the year, the government maintained restrictions on the size of public gatherings ostensibly to contain the spread of the coronavirus. In August, leaders of the Center for Democracy and Economic Development Initiatives (CDEDI) were arrested for organizing an “illegal assembly” outside Parliament for defying the Lilongwe City Council’s refusal to authorize their demonstration.

Nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) are active in Malawi. Civil society figures deemed to support the opposition have been subject to intimidation and arrests. Bon Kalindo, who led protests over the rising cost of living in December 2021, was arrested and later released on police bail. NGO operations are somewhat constrained by onerous regulations. Under the NGO Act, an organization’s registration can be suspended if it is deemed to have departed from its original purpose, engaged in partisan politics, or violated any provisions of the law, among other grounds.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 3 / 4

The rights to organize labor unions and to strike are legally protected, though these are limited for workers in poorly defined essential services. Unions are active and collective bargaining is practiced, but retaliation against unregistered unions and strikers is not illegal.

During the first half of 2021, the government threatened to withhold union membership fees, which are normally automatically withdrawn from teachers’ salaries, after the TUM organized a series of strikes demanding high-risk pay and COVID-19 protective equipment. In July, Parliament passed the Labour Relations (Amendment) Act, which provides for an employer’s right to deduct wages from an employee who goes on strike for more than three days a year.

F. RULE OF LAW: 9 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 3 / 4

Judicial independence is generally respected, particularly in the higher courts. However, the appointment process for judges lacks transparency, and the judiciary is underfunded, which can also undercut judicial autonomy. President Chakwera appointed 12 new High Court judges in 2020.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 2 / 4

Arbitrary arrests and detentions are common. Defendants are entitled to legal representation, but in practice they are frequently forced to represent themselves in court. Although the law requires that suspects be released or charged with a crime within 48 hours of arrest, these rights are often denied. Case backlogs contribute to lengthy pretrial detention; those awaiting trial make up about 18 percent of the prison population.

Police are poorly trained and often ineffective. There are frequent accusations of favoritism in the recruitment of police trainees. Police brutality and extrajudicial killings are not uncommon. Prison conditions are dire and characterized by overcrowding, and many prisoners and prison guards contracted COVID-19 during 2021. In December 2021, the Malawi Prison Inspectorate reported that Malawi's prisons capacity was at 278 percent.

The constitution explicitly guarantees the rights of all humans. A 2020 Afrobarometer survey found that 76 percent of Malawians said they have never experienced unfair treatment based on their ethnic identity. However, same-sex relations remain a crime punishable by up to 14 years in prison. LGBT+ people are subject to arbitrary arrest and detention and are sometimes physically assaulted while in custody.

Despite constitutional guarantees of equal protection, women experience discrimination in education, politics, employment, business, and other aspects of life. People with albinism experience discrimination and have been attacked, abducted, killed, and mutilated.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 7 / 16G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 2 / 4

The constitution establishes freedom of internal movement and foreign travel, which are generally respected in practice for Malawians. However, the government maintained several restrictions on domestic and international travel throughout 2021 to contain the spread of the COVID-19 pandemic. Police roadblocks are ubiquitous in Malawi and bribes are common at checkpoints. According to the United Nations (UN), the government's policy of confining refugees to designated camps restricts their freedom of movement and impairs their ability to earn a living. Police frequently round up those found outside of the camps and return them.

Property rights are inadequately protected. Most land is held under customary tenure, and the process of creating titles that would allow legal ownership of land has moved slowly. A 2016 survey by the Local Government Performance Index (LGPI) established that only 13 percent of Malawian households have documentation proving land ownership. Women are at a disadvantage regarding property ownership and inheritance. Starting a business can be a cumbersome process that is worsened by corruption in key government agencies.

Domestic violence is common, but victims rarely come forward, and police generally do not intervene in domestic violence cases. Child sexual abuse is prevalent. Approximately 42 percent of women marry before they turn 18, in violation of the law. Customary leaders have spoken out against, and in some cases forced the annulment of underage marriages.

In June 2021, legislators withdrew a bill that sought to allow termination of pregnancy when the pregnant person's mental or physical health is in danger, in cases of incest and rape, and when there are serious fetal abnormalities. The law was withdrawn after religious and local leaders expressed significant opposition.

Authorities have taken some action against perpetrators of sexual abuse in recent years. In July 2021, the government compensated a group of women who had been raped and sexually assaulted by police officers during protests in 2019. However, none of the implicated police officers have faced legal consequences.

Revenues from large, state-run industries tend to benefit the political elite. Income inequality remains a problem and inhibits economic mobility. In 2020, government raised the tax-free income bracket by more than 100 percent.

Enforcement of labor laws is weak, and employees are often paid extremely low wages, despite minimum-wage laws. Child labor is a persistent problem, particularly on tobacco estates.

Malaysia

Population: 32,800,000

Capital: Kuala Lumpur

Freedom Status: Partly Free

Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: The Barisan Nasional (BN) political coalition ruled Malaysia from independence in 1957 until 2018, maintaining power by manipulating electoral districts, appealing to ethnic nationalism, and suppressing criticism through restrictive speech laws and politicized prosecutions of opposition leaders. The BN lost to an opposition alliance in the 2018 general elections. However, a period of political turbulence and realignment in early 2020 culminated in a new governing coalition that included parties central to the pre-2018 regime. That government was resistant to governance reforms. Concerns about narrowing freedoms persist.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- Authorities relied on movement restrictions to curb the spread of COVID-19, with internal travel being restricted for much of the year. The government instituted a total lockdown in June and extended it indefinitely later that month, citing the coronavirus's continuing spread; authorities detained scores of people for violating lockdown restrictions. Malaysia reported 2.6 million COVID-19 cases and 30,991 deaths to the World Health Organization (WHO) by year's end.
 - In January, then prime minister Muhyiddin Yassin, citing rising COVID-19 cases, announced a state of emergency that allowed him to rule by decree. Opposition lawmakers derided the decision, accusing Muhyiddin of using the pandemic to avoid a no-confidence vote and protect the Perikatan Nasional (PN) coalition's slim majority. Parliament was reconvened in late July, while the state of emergency expired on August 1.

- In mid-August, Muhyiddin resigned as prime minister, a month after the United Malays National Organisation (UMNO), the largest party in the coalition, withdrew its support. Ismail Sabri Yaakob of the UMNO succeeded Muhyiddin in late August, commanding a slim parliamentary majority.
- In February, the Federal Court found news site Malaysiakini guilty of violating the Evidence Act, issuing a 500,000-ringgit ($120,000) fine. Malaysiakini visitors had criticized the judiciary in comments posted to an article in 2020.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 20 / 40 (-1)

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 6 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 2 / 4

The prime minister is the head of government and chief executive. Though formally appointed by the monarch, the authority of the prime minister and cabinet is based on the support of a majority in the lower house of Parliament. In August 2021, the monarch appointed Ismail Sabri Yaakob of the UMNO to succeed Muhyiddin Yassin of the Malaysian United Indigenous Party as prime minister. The UMNO, the largest party in the PN, had withdrawn its support of Muhyiddin in July, prompting his mid-August resignation.

The monarch, known as the Yang di-Pertuan Agong, is elected for five-year terms by and from the hereditary rulers of 9 of Malaysia's 13 states. Sultan Abdullah of Pahang was chosen as head of state in 2019, following the abdication of his predecessor.

The upper house of the bicameral Parliament, the Senate or Dewan Negara, consists of 44 members appointed by the monarch on the advice of the prime minister and 26 members elected by the 13 state legislatures, serving three-year terms. The Senate has limited power to amend or block legislation passed by the lower house. The House of Representatives, or Dewan Rakyat, has 222 directly elected seats for single-member constituencies.

The Pakatan Harapan (PH) coalition won the 2018 elections despite lopsided electoral conditions that gave the BN significant advantages, such as gerrymandered and malapportioned voting districts, weak campaign-spending regulation, and legal constraints on media independence. Parliament has since realigned; the PN took power in 2020 with the same lower house that had been won by the PH in 2018, while Prime Minister Ismail Sabri gained the support of 114 lawmakers to assume his post in August 2021.

Elections were held in Melaka State in November 2021, after the UMNO chief minister lost a majority in the state assembly. The UMNO and its allies won 21 seats, while the PH won 5. Voters participated in state assembly elections in Sarawak in December. The Sarawak Parties Alliance, which backs the UMNO-led national government, won 75 of the assembly's 82 seats.

The Election Commission (EC), which administers elections and is responsible for voter rolls and the delineation of electoral boundaries, was seen as subservient to BN, with members appointed by the king on the advice of the prime minister.

In December 2021, constitutional amendments lowering the voting age to 18 and establishing automatic voter registration took effect. The amendments were originally approved by Parliament in 2019.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 9 / 16B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 2 / 4

The Malaysian party system is diverse and competitive, but groups that challenged BN rule prior to 2018 often faced obstacles such as unequal access to the media, restrictions on campaigning and freedom of assembly, and politicized prosecutions. The entrenched culture of political interference has persisted since the BN's defeat.

The Registrar of Societies (ROS), which is overseen by the home minister, manages the registration of political parties and has issued partisan decisions under BN, PH, and PN governments. The Malaysian United Democratic Alliance applied for ROS recognition in 2020, but its registration was rejected in January 2021 and its appeal was denied in August. In December, however, the High Court ordered the home minister to register the party. In May, the Parti Pejuang Tanah Air (Fighters of the Nation Party), which is led by former prime minister Mahathir Mohamad, accused the ROS of ignoring its appeal for registration. The ROS approved its application in July.

Although opposition parties have long governed in a number of Malaysia's states, the 2018 elections that brought the PH to power represented the country's first democratic transfer of power between rival political groups at the federal level since independence.

In 2020, coalitional realignment led to the formation of the PN, while the PH returned to opposition status. In August 2021, the PN's prime minister, Muhyiddin, resigned after losing his parliamentary majority. While the PH came close to returning to power, Ismail Sabri of the UMNO succeeded Muhyiddin with a majority that largely resembled the status quo.

The PH maintains significant influence despite its status, owing to the Ismail Sabri government's slim majority. Under a September 2021 agreement between the two sides, the PH vowed not to oppose a negotiated budget, while the government agreed to enact measures including lowering the voting age.

The military is not active in politics, and foreign powers do not directly meddle in domestic political affairs. However, the BN maintained close ties with China while it was in power.

During its decades in power, the BN built strong connections with Malaysia's business elites and used these relationships to influence electoral outcomes. The PN used government-linked companies, official monopolies for certain goods and services, and state investment vehicles for political purposes.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 2 / 4

Suffrage is universal for adult citizens. However, social and legal restrictions limit political participation among some minority groups. The UMNO and the Islamic Party are defenders of long-standing policies that favor the ethnic Malay and Muslim majority. The Malaysian Chinese Association has attracted support from among the ethnic Chinese community—which represents 21 percent of the country’s population—and has in the past supported the BN. Ethnic Indians represent 6 percent of the population; 16 ethnic Indian lawmakers were elected in 2018. The PN featured minimal representation and participation of Chinese and Indian minorities but did include representatives of ethnic groups from Sabah and Sarawak states, which are located on the island of Borneo. Indigenous representation is poor; the first lawmaker from one of the Indigenous Orang Asli groups, which together include 180,000 people, took office in 2019.

Women remain significantly underrepresented in politics, with women holding only 14 percent of Parliament’s lower-house seats. Women held 5 of the Ismail Sabri cabinet’s 31 ministerial posts and 4 of its 38 deputy ministerial posts when it was formed in August 2021.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 5 / 12 (–1)

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 1 / 4 (–1)

While elected officials determine and implement government policy, an unfair electoral framework has historically weakened their legitimacy. Decision-making power has typically been concentrated in the hands of the prime minister and his close advisers.

Elected lawmakers were unable to fulfill their functions for much of 2021. In January, Muhyiddin announced a COVID-19-related state of emergency that allowed him to rule by decree. Parliament and state legislatures were suspended, as were elections. Opposition lawmakers derided the announcement, accusing Muhyiddin of failing to manage the pandemic while using it to avoid a no-confidence vote. Parliament was reconvened in late July for a special session, while the state of emergency expired on August 1.

Score Change: The score declined from 2 to 1 due the government’s initiation of a state of emergency that had the effect of suspending Parliament for seven months and suppressing scrutiny and criticism from lawmakers.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 2 / 4

The Malaysian Anti-Corruption Commission, which replaced another agency in 2009, is responsible for fighting corruption. Corruption-related convictions against civil servants have been on the rise in recent years; 99 were attained within the first 11 months of 2021, while 55 were attained in 2015. Despite the rising number of convictions and the PH government’s 2019–23 action plan, corruption in government and state-owned enterprises is still considered endemic.

High-level corruption was a critical weakness of the BN, and former prime minister Najib Razak’s efforts to avoid accountability for the 1MDB embezzlement scandal damaged the country’s anticorruption mechanisms. Najib and his successor as UMNO leader, former deputy prime minister Ahmad Zahid Hamidi, were arrested in 2018 and indicted for numerous corruption-related offenses. Najib was convicted on counts including money laundering and abuse of power in 2020, receiving a concurrent 12-year prison sentence. The Court of Appeal upheld Najib’s conviction in December 2021, though he remained free on bail as he continued to appeal.

The Malaysian justice system resolved other high-profile corruption cases during 2021. Former Federal Land Development Authority (FELDA) chairman Mohd Isa Abdul Samad received a six-year prison term and a fine for graft in February. Isa posted bail and filed an appeal, which remained under consideration at year’s end. In May, prosecutors withdrew bribery charges against FELDA board member Noor Ehsanuddin Mohd Harun Narrashi, and a court acquitted Noor Ehsanuddin in September. In July, the Court of Appeal overturned a 2020 corruption conviction against former UMNO secretary-general Tengku Adnan Tengku Mansor.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 2 / 4

A lack of independent oversight regarding state-affiliated companies and investment funds has long created conditions conducive to corruption. Efforts towards enacting a freedom of information act and other reforms stalled after the PN took power. Government operations were not transparently carried out while Parliament was suspended for part of 2021.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 30 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 8 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 2 / 4

Prior to the 2018 elections, most private news publications and television stations were controlled by political parties or businesses allied with the BN, and state news outlets similarly reflected government views. The market liberalized after the PH took power, as independent outlets benefited from a reduction in political pressure and harassment. The PH pledged to reform restrictive media laws, and successfully repealed the 2018 Anti-Fake News Act in 2019, but several problematic laws remained in force when that government fell. The PN placed more pressure on private media after taking power in 2020, with officials excluding independent outlets from events of public interest, including parliamentary sessions and pandemic briefings. The Ismail Sabri government also prohibited some media outlets from attending parliamentary sessions in September 2021.

A 2012 amendment to the 1950 Evidence Act holds owners and editors of websites, providers of web-hosting services, and owners of computers or mobile devices accountable for information published through their services or property. In 2020, news site Malaysiakini was charged with criminal contempt after several users posted comments criticizing the judiciary. In February 2021, the Federal Court found Malaysiakini guilty of violating the amended Evidence Act and issued a 500,000-ringgit ($120,000) fine. Later that month, Malaysiakini editor in chief Steven Gan faced a sedition investigation after he publicly criticized the verdict.

Malaysiakini faced pressure on other matters during 2021. In May, police summoned two of the outlet's journalists after it reported on a man who died after being held in police custody in February. In July, the Federal Court dismissed Malaysiakini's appeal of a 2018 defamation ruling stemming from a report on possible pollution emanating from a mine.

While Malaysia is religiously diverse, legal provisions restrict religious freedom. Ethnic Malays are constitutionally defined as Muslim and are not entitled to renounce their faith. Individuals seeking to convert from Islam have sometimes faced apostasy charges. Those seeking to leave the faith also risk discrimination and threats; Nur Sajat Kamaruz-zaman, a transgender ethnic Malay, received death threats after renouncing Islam on social media in March 2021.

The powerful Malaysian Islamic Development Department has played a central role in shaping and enforcing the practice of Islam in Malaysia, and state-level authorities perform their own enforcement functions. Muslim children and civil servants are required to receive religious education using government-approved curriculums and instructors.

Practicing a version of Islam other than Sunni Islam is prohibited, and Shiites and other sects face discrimination.

Non-Muslims are not able to build houses of worship as easily as Muslims, and the state retains the right to demolish unregistered religious statues and houses of worship.

Strict regulations were established for places of worship during the COVID-19 pandemic, and foreigners were not allowed to attend services.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 2 / 4

There is some degree of academic freedom in Malaysia. However, under the BN government, instructors and students who espoused antigovernment views or engaged in political activity were subject to disciplinary action under the Universities and University Colleges Act (UUCA) of 1971. In 2018, the PH government amended the UUCA to allow students to engage in political activity on campus. The PH ultimately sought to abolish the UUCA, but the PN announced that the law would remain in force after entering government. Post-BN governments have continued to control appointments of top officials at public universities.

While private discussion is robust, individual expression on sensitive political and religious topics is impeded by the penal code and legislation including the Sedition Act and the Communications and Multimedia Act (CMA). In April 2021, for example, graphic artist Fahmi Reza was arrested and investigated under the Sedition Act for creating a music playlist satirizing the queen. In December, a woman was convicted under the CMA and the penal code for making offensive statements about the king and Muhyiddin in 2020.

Discussion was also impeded by COVID-19 emergency measures. In March 2021, the Muhyiddin government used its emergency powers to prohibit the creation or dissemination of purportedly false news. Offenders faced prison sentences of up to six years and fines of up to 500,000 ringgits ($120,000).

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 6 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 2 / 4

Freedom of assembly can be limited on the grounds of maintaining security and public order. In 2019, Parliament amended the 2012 Peaceful Assembly Act (PPA), reducing the mandatory police notification period from 10 days to 7 days before the planned event, among other changes. However, the law still imposed criminal penalties for violations, lacked provisions to allow spontaneous assemblies, banned those under age 21 from organizing an assembly, and prohibited participation by minors and noncitizens. While demonstrations are often held in practice, police continue to enforce such restrictions and investigate participants in allegedly illegal protests.

Gatherings were prohibited during the COVID-19 state of emergency and again in December. However, protesters continued to hold events while the state of emergency was in effect. In April 2021, protesters rallied over the arrest of graphic artist Fahmi Reza but were later investigated for violating the PPA. In May, 27 protesters who held a flash mob under the Kerajaan Gagal (Failed Government) banner in Batu Pahat were arrested. In late July, the just before the state of emergency expired, several hundred people rallied in Kuala Lumpur under the Kerajaan Gagal banner. One of its organizers was arrested for violating the Sedition Act ahead of the event.

A wide array of nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) operates in Malaysia and have a strong record of campaigning for electoral, anticorruption, and other reforms. However, NGOs must be approved and registered by the government, which has refused or revoked registrations for political reasons in the past. Some international human rights organizations have been forbidden from forming local branches. Numerous activists were subjected to police harassment and criminal charges—particularly for speech-related offenses—under both the PH and PN governments.

In July 2021, Heidy Quah Gaik Li, the founder of an NGO supporting refugees, was charged with violating the CMA for criticizing the treatment of refugees in 2020. In August 2021, Quah sued to invalidate Section 233 of the CMA.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 2 / 4

Most Malaysian workers can join trade unions, but the law contravenes international guidelines by restricting unions to representing workers in a single or similar trade. The director general of trade unions can refuse or withdraw registration arbitrarily. Collective bargaining rights are limited, particularly in designated high-priority industries, as is the right to strike. A labor law passed in 2019 shifted some discretionary powers from the minister for human resources to the director general of industrial relations and replaced the penalty of imprisonment for illegal strikes with higher fines, among other changes.

In July 2021, junior doctors staged a walkout from several hospitals over pay and contract grievances. Police officers intimidated some of the participants.

F. RULE OF LAW: 7 / 16F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 2 / 4

Judicial independence has historically been compromised by extensive executive influence, with courts frequently issuing arbitrary or politically motivated verdicts in high-profile cases. However, a series of judicial appointments in 2018 and 2019 improved confidence in the independence of the higher courts and prospects for reform. In 2019, Datuk Tengku Maimun Tuan Mat became the first woman to become the Federal Court's chief justice, and she subsequently initiated anticorruption and efficiency-enhancing reforms.

The 2020 guilty verdict in former prime minister Najib's corruption trial signaled a degree of judicial independence, though high-profile corruption trials notably ended with acquittals during 2021.

Several existing laws undermine due process guarantees. The 2012 Security Offences (Special Measures) Act allows police to detain anyone for up to 28 days without judicial review for broadly defined "security offenses," and suspects may be held for 48 hours before being granted access to a lawyer. It was renewed for another five years in 2017. Also that year, lawmakers amended the Prevention of Crime Act—a law ostensibly aimed at combating organized crime—to revoke detainees' right to address the government-appointed Prevention of Crime Board, which is empowered to order the detention of individuals listed by the Home Ministry for renewable two-year terms without trial or legal representation. The 2015 Prevention of Terrorism Act, together with that year's National Security Council (NSC) Act, gives the NSC—led by the prime minister—wide powers of arrest, search, and seizure without a warrant in areas deemed as security risks and in the context of countering terrorism.

Malaysia's secular legal system is based on English common law. However, Muslims are subject to Sharia (Islamic law), the interpretation of which varies by state, and the constitution's Article 121 stipulates that all matters related to Islam should be heard in Sharia courts. This results in different treatment of Muslims and non-Muslims in "moral" and family law cases.

A number of criminal offenses can be punished with caning, including immigration violations. Torture and abuse in police custody remain problems, and prisons are often overcrowded and unsafe.

In recent years, prisoners and detainees have died in unclear circumstances while in custody. In July 2021, the Human Rights Commission of Malaysia (SUHAKAM) launched an investigation after several such deaths occurred in May and June. In October, SUHAKAM reported that 456 people died in custody in 2020, most of them prisoners.

The death penalty can be applied in Malaysia for numerous offenses; most of the roughly 1,300 people facing execution in Malaysian prisons were convicted under the country's harsh laws on drug trafficking.

Although the constitution provides for equal treatment of all citizens, it grants a "special position" to ethnic Malays and other indigenous people, known collectively as bumiputera. The government maintains programs intended to boost the economic status of bumiputera, who receive preferential treatment in areas including property ownership, higher education, civil service jobs, business affairs, and government contracts.

Women are placed at a disadvantage by a number of laws, particularly Sharia-related provisions. They are legally barred from certain occupations and work schedules, and they suffer from de facto employment discrimination.

LGBT+ Malaysians face widespread discrimination and harassment. Same-sex sexual relations are punishable by up to 20 years in prison under the penal code, though this is generally not enforced. Some states apply their own penalties to Muslims under Sharia statutes. Transgender people can also be punished under state-level Sharia laws. Nur Sajat faced charges in a Selangor State Sharia court in January 2021, having been accused of showing contempt for Islam for donning women's attire at a 2018 event. Nur Sajat fled the country soon after, eventually receiving asylum in Australia in October.

Migrant workers and refugees do not enjoy effective legal protections, and individuals in these communities experienced discrimination during the COVID-19 pandemic. Rohingya asylum seekers and refugees are regularly mistreated. In February 2021, the government deported nearly 1,100 Myanmar nationals to that country, defying a court order, though the government refrained from deporting Rohingya.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 9 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 3 / 4

Citizens are generally free to travel within and outside of Malaysia, as well as to change residence and employment. However, professional opportunities and access to higher education are affected by regulations and practices that favor bumiputera and those with connections to political elites. Although the practice is illegal, employers of migrant workers commonly hold their passports, preventing them from leaving abusive situations. Freedom of movement was also restricted by COVID-19 measures during 2021, with travel between states and districts restricted for much of the year.

Malaysia has a vibrant private sector. Bribery, however, is common in the business world, and the close nexus between political and economic elites distorts normal business activity and fair competition. Some laws pertaining to property and business differentiate between bumiputera and non-bumiputera, and Sharia-based inheritance rules for Muslims often favor men over women.

While some personal social freedoms are protected, Muslims face legal restrictions on marriage partners and other social choices. All non-Muslims who wish to marry Muslim partners must convert to Islam to receive the recognition of a Sharia court. Societal pressures may also regulate dress and appearance, especially among Malay women. Sharia courts often favor men in matters of divorce and child custody. The minimum age for marriage is generally 16 for girls and 18 for boys, but Sharia courts in some states allow younger people to marry, and child marriage is a common occurrence.

In September 2021, the High Court in Kuala Lumpur ruled that children born to Malaysian mothers overseas must receive Malaysian citizenship. The Court of Appeal dismissed the government's attempt to stay the ruling in December and ordered it to produce citizenship documents.

Rural residents and foreign workers, especially those working illegally, are vulnerable to exploitative or abusive working conditions, including forced labor or debt bondage. Foreign workers make up over a fifth of the country's workforce; about two million are documented, and estimates of the undocumented range from two million to more than four million. The authorities' periodic crackdowns on illegal foreign workers can result in punishment rather than protection for victims of human trafficking.

In June 2021, electronics manufacturer ATA Industrial was accused of forcing migrant workers to live in poor housing and work excessively long schedules. That same month, the Industrial Court ruled that US tiremaker Goodyear underpaid migrant workers.

Maldives

Population: 500,000

Capital: Malé

Freedom Status: Partly Free

Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: An opposition victory in the 2018 presidential election resulted in initial efforts to revise antidemocratic laws and establish transitional justice mechanisms. Despite improvements since the election, many basic freedoms remain restricted, and government-led efforts to reform the justice system, which lacks independence, remain nascent.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- High-level corruption among government officials from the administration of former president Abdulla Yameen remained a prominent issue during the year. In November, Yameen himself—who was convicted in 2019 on money laundering charges, fined $5 million, and sentenced to five years in prison—won a controversial appeal to his case at the Supreme Court and was released. Authorities also filed charges that month against Ahmed Mahloof, the minister of youth, sports and community empowerment, for accepting bribes as a part of Yameen’s corrupt activities.
- In May, Mohamed Nasheed, the former president and current speaker of Parliament, survived an assassination attempt in Malé. Authorities arrested 10 suspects and charged 4 with terrorism. One defendant, who pleaded guilty, was convicted in December; trials of the other suspects were to be conducted separately.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 19 / 40A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 7 / 12*A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 2 / 4

The president is directly elected for up to two five-year terms. The 2018 election was marred by the misuse of state resources on behalf of incumbent president Abdulla Yameen of the Progressive Party of Maldives (PPM), police interference with opposition campaign efforts, and various forms of manipulation by electoral officials. The Maldivian Democratic Party (MDP) and other opposition groups endorsed Ibrahim Mohamed Solih, an MDP lawmaker, after former president Mohamed Nasheed was disqualified over a dubious 2015 terrorism conviction. Despite the impediments to his campaign, Solih won the election with over 58 percent of the vote amid high turnout.

The unicameral People’s Majlis is composed of 85 seats, with members elected from individual districts to serve five-year terms. Elections held in April 2019 were largely transparent and competitive, with Commonwealth observers reporting that vote buying—while still a problem—appeared less prevalent than in previous elections. The MDP captured 65 seats, with Nasheed winning a seat representing a district in Malé and becoming the parliament speaker. The PPM suffered a sharp decline, winning only five seats. The Jumhooree Party (JP) also won five seats, the Maldives Development Alliance won two, and independents took an additional seven.

The government postponed local council elections set for April 2020 due to the COVID-19 pandemic, extending the mandates of incumbent officials that May. The elections were held in April 2021: the MDP won 43.4 percent of seats and the PPM winning 38.2 percent, with voter turnout at 68 percent.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 2 / 4

The independence of the Elections Commission, whose members are appointed by the president with approval from the parliament, was seriously compromised under the Yameen administration, with key decisions favoring the PPM. However, the Elections Commission’s administration of the 2019 parliamentary elections earned praise from Commonwealth observers as improved and more impartial.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 8 / 16B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 3 / 4

Political pluralism and participation deteriorated during Yameen's presidency, as authorities subjected opposition leaders and their supporters to judicial harassment. Restrictions on and dispersals of political rallies, raids on opposition offices, and arbitrary detentions and convictions of opposition politicians were common for most of 2018, but virtually no such abuses have been reported since.

Yameen was arrested on money-laundering charges in February 2019, but was released from detention the following month, and the PPM and its allies were able to compete in that April's parliamentary elections. Former authoritarian president Maumoon Abdul Gayoom aligned himself with the opposition under Yameen, and in November 2019, his party the Maldives Reform Movement (MRM) was able to officially register as a party. A new political party, the Maldives National Party, was registered in July 2021.

In May 2021, Mohamed Nasheed, the former president and current speaker of Parliament from the MDP, survived an assassination attempt in Malé. Authorities arrested 10 suspects and charged 4 with terrorism. One defendant, who pleaded guilty, was convicted in December; trials for the other suspects were to be conducted separately.

The country has rarely experienced transfers of power between rival parties through elections. Though the Yameen government and the PPM attempted use the justice system to subvert the 2018 presidential election, the opposition MDP secured the presidency with a reported voter turnout of nearly 90 percent. The MDP also won the 2019 parliamentary elections, fully transitioning from opposition to ruling party.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 2 / 4

The Yameen government exerted improper influence over several state institutions and the Elections Commission to restrict the political choices of voters and politicians, including through politicized arrests and threats to public and private sector employees. While such abuses have waned under President Solih, intimidation by hardline Islamist groups continues to sporadically disrupt the political system and the rule of law. Vote buying remains a problem during elections, and allegations of bribery and corruption have surrounded instances of party switching in recent years.

The constitution and laws require all citizens to be Muslims and all candidates for elected office to be followers of Sunni Islam, explicitly excluding adherents of minority religions. High-level positions in state institutions or independent bodies, including the Human Rights Commission of the Maldives, also require individuals to be a Sunni Muslim Maldivian. Societal discrimination against women has limited their political participation; four women won seats in the parliament in 2019, down from five in 2014. LGBT+ people have effectively no political representation. Foreign workers, who make up between a quarter and a third of the population, have no political rights.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 4 / 12C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 2 / 4

Elected officials generally determine and implement government policies, though former president Yameen disrupted the parliament's functioning in the face of lawmakers' defections to the opposition and in his attempts to retain the presidency in the 2018 election. The parliament was able to operate without similar obstructions after President Solih's 2018 inauguration and the 2019 parliamentary elections.

Corruption remains endemic at all levels of government. The Anti-Corruption Commission (ACC) has been only moderately effective, often launching investigations and taking other actions in response to public complaints, but rarely holding powerful figures to account for abuses. Whistleblowers and journalists reporting on corruption have been jailed or forced into exile in the face of political persecution.

The Solih government has taken steps to combat corruption, launching a whistleblower web portal, creating legal protections for whistleblowers, and pursuing corruption cases against high-level officials from the Yameen administration. Yameen himself was convicted of money laundering in 2019, sentenced to five years in prison, and ordered to pay a $5 million fine. He appealed, and in November 2021 the Supreme Court overturned his conviction. Multiple officials in Yameen's government have either been arrested for or are suspected of having been a part of the former president's corrupt activities. Authorities filed charges against Ahmed Mahloof, the youth, sports and community empowerment minister, in November 2021 for accepting bribes as a part of Yameen's corrupt activities. Mahloof had been suspended in 2019 and was again in 2021 but remained a minister at year-end.

The ACC reported receiving 34 corruption complaints by December 2020 regarding the government's COVID-19 response, including allegations of corruption in the purchase of ventilators by the Health Ministry, which had resulted in the resignation of the health minister that October. Though prosecutors declined to press charges, ACC inquiries continued, and the parliament voted to pursue charges in December. However, in March 2021, the Prosecutor General's office again decided not to prosecute anyone but requested that the ACC investigate further that December.

Large state contracts for infrastructure and other projects have regularly been awarded through opaque processes, in which bribery and kickbacks are widely believed to play a role. The Solih administration did not immediately revise antidemocratic changes made to public finance rules by the previous government.

The president, cabinet ministers, and members of the parliament are required by the constitution to submit annual asset declarations, but it is not required that these be made public, and the relevant agencies have resisted disclosing how many officials comply with the rule. In 2019, Solih and members of his cabinet publicly disclosed their personal finances, but Transparency International warned that many disclosures appeared dubious or contradictory.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 21 / 60D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 3 / 16*D1. Are there free and independent media? 1 / 4

The constitution guarantees freedom of expression so long as it is exercised in a manner that is "not contrary to any tenet of Islam," a vague condition that encourages self-censorship in the media. State-run media and regulatory bodies, especially the Maldives Broadcasting Commission (MBC), have typically displayed bias in favor of the government and have restricted coverage of the opposition.

Journalists continue to face the threat of violence in reprisal for their work, particularly from Islamist militants who often go unpunished. The Presidential Commission on Investigation of Murders and Enforced Disappearances reportedly found evidence that officials under the Yameen administration interfered with the police investigations in which journalists or activists were abducted or killed.

Freedom of religion is severely restricted, and Islam is the state religion Muslims. Imams must use government-approved sermons. Non-Muslim foreigners are allowed to observe their religions only in private. Growing religious extremism, stoked in part by the Yameen administration, has led to an increase in threatening rhetoric and physical attacks against those perceived to be insulting or rejecting Islam. Secularist writers and defenders of freedom of conscience have faced pressure from the authorities as well as death threats from violent groups.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 1 / 4

Islam is a compulsory subject in schools and is incorporated into all other subject areas. School and university curriculums have come under increased influence from hardline religious leaders, resulting in some content that denounces democratic principles and promotes jihadist narratives. Academics and teachers who express views deemed objectionable by state and nonstate actors risk punishment or reprisals. In 2019, a college was vandalized, and its chairman was threatened after he criticized supporters of a death sentence against a woman accused of extramarital sex.

Although the Solih administration was expected to be more tolerant of public criticism than its predecessor, individuals who speak out on behalf of minority groups or basic freedoms are still at significant risk of attack from violent nonstate actors. Local human rights groups have had to relocate several social media users who received death threats for exercising their freedom of expression. In June 2020, a public sector employee was reportedly fired for social media posts that allegedly defamed President Solih and Majlis Speaker Nasheed.

Lawmakers have experienced retribution for supporting free speech. A parliamentarian who introduced amendments to the penal code that would criminalize hate crimes and hate speech in May 2021 experienced a public smear campaign and death threats launched from extremists. The amendments passed into law in November.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 5 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 2 / 4

Respect for freedom of assembly is uneven. A 2016 law requires protest organizers to obtain police permission for their events and restricts demonstrations to certain designated areas. Assemblies were banned during a 2018 state of emergency but allowed in the run-up to the September 2018 presidential election after authorities faced growing international pressure. In 2019, opposition supporters and hardline Islamists were able to hold protests related to Yameen's money-laundering case and demands that the government shut down the Maldivian Democracy Network (MDN), an advocacy organization, for supposedly insulting Islam. However, in 2021 security forces sought to intimidate, and in one case used unnecessary force against, peaceful demonstrators protesting gender-based discrimination.

In July 2020, the Solih government, citing the need to address the COVID-19 pandemic, violated a campaign pledge by applying the 2016 law to limit protests. Dozens of migrant workers protesting inhumane conditions and nonpayment of wages were detained.

Nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) operate in a restrictive environment. They are required to obtain government approval before seeking domestic or foreign funding, and regulators have broad discretion to investigate and dissolve NGOs. The Human Rights Commission of the Maldives is not independent in practice. In recent years, Maldivian human rights groups have increasingly become targets of surveillance, harassment, threats of violence, and blasphemy allegations, including from extremist nonstate actors.

In 2019, Islamist groups denounced the MDN as "anti-Islamic" following a smear campaign against the organization. The government suspended the NGO's activities, and the NGO Registrar under the Ministry of Youth, Sports and Community Empowerment decided to arbitrarily dissolve the MDN. A criminal blasphemy investigation against the authors of a 2015 MDN report on radicalization and violent extremism remained ongoing in 2021, and donor funds in MDN bank accounts were confiscated in January 2020.

In June 2020, Islamist extremist groups began targeting women's rights NGO Uthema with a campaign of social media harassment for producing an allegedly anti-Islamic report on Maldives' compliance with the United Nations Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 2 / 4

The constitution and labor laws allow workers to form trade unions, and several unions are active. However, collective bargaining is not protected, and strikes are prohibited in many sectors, including the crucial tourism industry.

F. RULE OF LAW: 6 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 1 / 4

Judicial independence is seriously compromised. Many judges are unqualified, and the courts are widely considered vulnerable to corruption or political influence. The Supreme Court has repeatedly intervened in political affairs and apparently exceeded its constitutional authority, typically acting according to political interests.

The Yameen administration arrested multiple Supreme Court judges and passed unconstitutional laws in order to prosecute opposition leaders, preventing them from competing in the 2018 presidential election. However, since the beginning of the Solih government, the jailed former justices and other wrongfully arrested officials have been released, though they were not reinstated.

The Solih government has also used its parliamentary majority to reshape the Supreme Court without the previous administration's extraconstitutional tactics. In 2019, the parliament removed one justice for corruption and two others—including the chief justice—for a litany of violations. That year, the government appointed the first two women to the Supreme Court, despite Islamist objections. In September 2020, a woman was appointed to the Criminal Court bench for the first time in the country's history.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 1 / 4

Police have regularly engaged in arbitrary arrests in recent years, often to disrupt opposition activities, protests, or the work of journalists. Due process rights are not well enforced in practice, and under Yameen, opposition figures were subjected to deeply flawed trials on politically motivated charges, according to human rights groups and international monitors. The new government has yet to undertake comprehensive reforms of the criminal justice system.

The constitution and the Anti-Torture Act ban torture, but police brutality and the abuse of detainees and prison inmates remain problems, and impunity remains the norm. Flogging and other forms of corporal punishment are authorized for some crimes, and flogging sentences are issued in practice for offenses such as extramarital sex. Prisons are overcrowded, inmates reportedly lack proper access to medical care, and human rights groups have reported numerous unexplained deaths in custody.

In December 2020, President Solih signed into law a bill establishing a transitional justice mechanism to investigate and redress human rights abuses from 1953–2018. The bill had been revised in response to concerns by the United Nations and local human rights groups that the draft version proposed in 2019 was overly narrow in scope. The Ombudsman's Office for Transitional Justice opened in January 2021.

Gender-based discrimination in employment is prohibited by law, but women continue to face discrimination in practice. Girls and women from underprivileged backgrounds are disproportionately affected by Sharia (Islamic law) penalties for crimes like fornication and adultery.

Migrant workers—who account for approximately one-third of the population—encounter disparate treatment by state authorities and have difficulty accessing justice. In 2020, thousands of migrant workers with unclear immigration status were arbitrarily deported during the COVID-19 pandemic.

Same-sex sexual acts and marriage are prohibited by law and can draw prison sentences, corporal punishment, and even threats of citizenship revocation. As a result, LGBT+ people rarely report societal discrimination or abuse. In June 2020, a man from Makunudhoo island was arrested for allegedly engaging in same-sex sexual activity.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 7 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 2 / 4

Freedom of movement is provided for by law, but there are some restrictions in practice. Authorities have occasionally imposed travel bans on members of opposition parties and other perceived government opponents. Migrant workers are also subject to constraints on their movement, including through retention of their passports by employers.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 2 / 4

Property rights are limited, with most land owned by the government and leased to private entities or commercial developers through what is often an opaque process. Residents sometimes face displacement by development projects without adequate consultation or compensation.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 1 / 4

Personal social freedoms are restricted by Sharia-based laws and growing religious extremism in society. Among other rules on marriage and divorce, citizen women are barred from marrying non-Muslim foreigners, while citizen men can marry non-Muslim foreigners only if they are Christian or Jewish. Extramarital sex is criminalized, and there is a high legal threshold to prove rape allegations. Women face increasing pressure to dress more conservatively, in keeping with hardline interpretations of Islam. Violence against women is rarely investigated and punished, although sexual assault charges were filed in November 2020 against Ali Waheed, who had served as minister of tourism until numerous assault allegations led to his firing in July 2020.

The legal framework provides some protections against worker exploitation, including rules on working hours and bans on forced labor. However, migrant workers are especially vulnerable to abuses such as debt bondage and withholding of wages, a problem that was exacerbated during the economic contraction caused by the COVID-19 pandemic and resulting collapse of tourism. Women and children working in domestic service may also be subject to exploitative conditions.

Mali

Population: 20,900,000

Capital: Bamako

Freedom Status: Not Free

Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: Mali experienced a political transition away from authoritarian rule beginning in the early 1990s and gradually built up its democratic institutions for about 20 years. However, the country displayed characteristics of state fragility that eventually contributed to a 2012 military coup and a rebellion in northern Mali that erupted the same year. Though constitutional rule was restored and a peace agreement signed in the north in 2015, insecurity and political tensions persisted in the years that followed, culminating in two military coups in 2020 and 2021.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- In May, the military staged a coup d'état—the second in nine months—and arrested the acting president, Bah N'Daou, and his prime minister, Moctar Ouane. Colonel Assimi Goïta, who was also the leader of the 2020 coup, became the new transitional president.

- In June, Goïta appointed a civilian prime minister, Choguel Maïga. He was a leading figure in the June 5th Movement–Rally of Patriotic Forces (M5-RFP) coalition, which had been at the forefront of protests against the regime of then president Ibrahim Boubacar Keïta prior to the 2020 coup.
- Despite plans to transition to civilian rule within 18 months of the 2020 coup, the new transitional government announced in November that elections scheduled for February 2022 would be delayed. The following month, transitional authorities proposed extending the transition period and postponing elections for up to five years.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 8 / 40 (–1)

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 1 / 12 (–1)

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

The president, who is the head of state, is normally elected by popular vote and may serve up to two five-year terms. However, in August 2020, in the wake of mass antigovernment protests, a group of military personnel known as the National Committee for the Salvation of the People (CNSP) launched a coup d'état. They abducted President Ibrahim Boubacar Keïta—who had been reelected in 2018 with 67 percent of the vote—and compelled him to resign. In September 2020, the CNSP selected Bah N'Daou, a former military officer and Keïta-era defense minister, as acting president. Colonel Assimi Goïta, the CNSP's leader, was made vice president.

In May 2021, after the government announced a new cabinet that excluded two key military leaders, another coup d'état took place: the military arrested both N'Daou and Prime Minister Moctar Ouane, and Goïta declared himself transitional president. The move was confirmed by the Constitutional Court a few days later. N'Daou and Ouane were released from house arrest in August.

The prime minister, the head of government, is appointed by the president. Boubou Cissé was appointed in April 2019, but was removed by the CNSP in the August 2020 coup. Ouane, his successor, was appointed in September 2020 and removed from office following the May 2021 coup. In June, Goïta appointed a new civilian prime minister—Choguel Maïga, a leading member of the M5-RFP coalition that had spearheaded the anti-Keïta protest movement.

Members of the 147-seat unicameral National Assembly normally serve five-year terms. Thirteen seats were reserved to represent Malians living abroad. Keïta's Rally for Mali (RPM) party won 66 seats in legislative elections held in 2013, and its allies took an additional 49 seats. Soumaïla Cissé's opposition Union for the Republic and Democracy (URD) won 17, and the third-largest party, the Alliance for Democracy (ADEMA), won 16.

Overdue parliamentary elections were held in two rounds in March and April 2020, but the process was marred by violence, low turnout, and disagreement over the results. Soumaïla Cissé was kidnapped days before the first round and not released until October. Voters, especially in the north and center of Mali, were subjected to intimidation, while observers reported vote-buying incidents. COVID-19 restrictions, which were introduced in March, also affected the balloting. A group of civil society observers reported a first-round turnout figure of 7.5 percent.

Keïta dissolved the National Assembly in August 2020 after he was detained by the CNSP, along with then prime minister Boubou Cissé and other officials.

A 121-member National Transitional Council (CNT) was appointed in December 2020, with CNSP member Colonel Malick Diaw named as its president. Security forces directly controlled 22 seats, while political parties and organizations were granted 11. The M5-RFP, an alliance of opposition parties and civil society groups, separately held 8 seats.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 1 / 4 (-1)

Electoral operations are normally divided among three administrative bodies in Mali—the Ministry of Territorial Administration and Decentralization, the Independent National Electoral Commission, and the General Office of Elections. The Constitutional Court also participates in the electoral process by validating election results and resolving disputes.

The Constitutional Court overturned the results for 31 parliamentary seats in late April 2020, increasing the RPM's representation by 10 seats in the interim. Protests over the court's decision were held that same month. Keïta dismissed several Constitutional Court judges in July 2020 and offered to organize a rerun of the invalidated contests. New judges were appointed in early August 2020, though the news that a Keïta ally was involved in their selection was met with criticism.

In September 2021, transitional authorities announced the creation of a single election management body, the Independent Election Management Authority (AIGE). However, two months later, the transitional government postponed elections that had been scheduled for February 2022. In response, the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS), which had been pressing for a return to elected civilian rule, imposed economic and travel sanctions on members of the transitional authority. In December, the Malian leadership nevertheless proposed further extending the transition period and suspending elections for up to five years.

Score Change: The score declined from 2 to 1 because the military-led government indefinitely postponed scheduled elections and pursued electoral-management changes via undemocratic means.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 5 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 2 / 4

The creation and functioning of political parties are governed by a legal framework known as the Political Parties Charter, which is generally fair. The charter prohibits the creation of political parties on an “ethnic, religious, linguistic, regionalist, sexist, or professional basis.”

There are more than 100 registered political parties in Mali, though fewer than 20 are active. Parties are usually built around a particular personality, and policy differences between them are not always clear. Moreover, parties are often poorly funded, which hampers their ability to effectively organize and win voter support.

Electoral competition is normally open to opposition forces. A 2014 law institutionalized specific privileges for opposition parties in the parliament, such as the ability to choose an official leader of the opposition. However, in 2016 the ruling majority adopted, over the objections of opposition parties, amendments to the electoral code that favored establishment and majority parties by requiring presidential candidates to make a significant financial deposit and receive support from a certain number of incumbent elected officials.

Opposition figures faced violent attacks during the March and April 2020 parliamentary elections. URD leader Soumaila Cissé and members of his entourage were kidnapped by militants while traveling through the town of Niafunké, and one bodyguard was killed. Several of the abductees were freed a day later, and Cissé himself was freed in October 2020 after the military government agreed to release 200 individuals suspected of militant activity, though Cissé died of COVID-19 that December.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 0 / 4

Before the August 2020 coup d'état, citizens' political choices were relatively free, though they were occasionally influenced by the promise of patronage appointments or other benefits in exchange for political support. The military junta that first took power in 2020 and consolidated its authority in the May 2021 coup has since appointed key officials and set election timetables without meaningful public consultation.

No law limits political rights for members of minority groups, and no single ethnic group dominates the government or security forces. Tuareg pastoralist groups in the north have historically occupied a marginal position in national political life.

Societal attitudes can discourage women from participating in political processes. In the 2018 presidential election, Djeneba N'Diaye was the sole female candidate. While a 2015 gender quota law mandates that 30 percent of elected and appointed positions are to be filled by women, only 25 percent of the CNT's seats are held by women, and the 25-member cabinet that was established in June 2021—after the second coup d'état—included only six women.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 2 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 0 / 4

President Keïta was elected in a generally credible poll in 2018, and the National Assembly that took office in 2013 was also freely elected. That parliament remained in place beyond the end of its mandate, however, with elections eventually held in March and April 2020. The August 2020 coup d'état replaced an elected national government with a military regime; a second coup in May 2021 reinforced the military's hold on power, causing renewed uncertainty about the reintroduction of civilian rule. A civilian, Choguel Maïga, was appointed as prime minister in June, but several key government positions were filled by military leaders.

The volatile security situation in northern and central Mali has limited the effective territorial reach of government authority.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 1 / 4

Corruption remains a problem in government, notably in public procurement. Bribery and embezzlement of public funds is common, and impunity for corrupt officials is the norm. The Office of the Auditor General is an independent agency responsible for analyzing public spending, but despite its identification of sizable cases of embezzlement, very few prosecutions have taken place. The office's 2018 annual report, submitted to Keïta in July 2019, highlighted significant financial irregularities.

After the August 2020 coup d'état, the CNSP launched a crackdown on apparent abuses by government officials but took little action to fight corruption within the military.

In August 2021, former prime minister Soumeylou Boubèye Maïga and former finance minister Bouaré Fily Sissoko were arrested on fraud charges in connection with the 2014 purchase of a presidential plane and $40 million in military equipment contracts. Several businessmen were arrested on related charges later in the year.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 1 / 4

Government operations remain generally opaque, and Mali does not have a comprehensive legal framework for freedom of information. While numerous laws do provide for public access to some official documents and information, such laws are replete with extensive and vague exceptions, and journalists have faced obstacles when attempting to obtain information, particularly about military expenditures.

In February 2020, the civilian government joined the Global Forum on Transparency and Exchange of Information for Tax Purposes, a working group backed by the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development to fight tax evasion and improve transparency.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 24 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 10 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 2 / 4

The media environment in Bamako and in the rest of the south is relatively open, though there are sporadic reports of censorship, self-censorship, and threats against journalists. Reporting on the situation in the north remains dangerous due to the presence of active militant groups. Defamation is a crime that can draw fines or prison time.

Journalists and media outlets covering antigovernment protests faced detention, transmission disruptions, and acts of vandalism in July 2020. Protesters occupied the headquarters of public broadcaster Office de Radio-Télévision du Mali (ORTM), which briefly went off the air, and stole equipment during the demonstrations. A Liberté TV journalist was arrested by police while filing a report on the protests that month, though she was released a day later. Social media services were disrupted for several days in July.

Press freedom was restricted after the August 2020 coup d'état. Several journalists were arrested between August and December 2020; many were accused of criminal defamation for engaging in government-related reporting. In April 2021, journalist Mohamed Bathily—who had been detained in December 2020 on charges of conspiracy and “insulting the head of state”—was released from prison after authorities dropped all charges against him. Bathily was rearrested less than a month later for allegedly insulting members of the judiciary; he was released on bail in June and later received a fine and a one-year suspended prison sentence.

During 2021, transitional authorities began to seek justice for past instances of violence against members of the media. In July, the transitional government arrested General Moussa Diawara, former head of the General Directorate of State Security (DGSE), and issued an international arrest warrant for Karim Keïta, son of the former president, in connection with the 2016 disappearance of journalist Birama Touré.

Freedom of religion is constitutionally guaranteed in Mali, which is a secular state, and discrimination on the basis of religion is prohibited. The population is predominantly Sunni Muslim, and Sufism plays a role in the beliefs of most residents.

The 2012 Islamist uprising in the north shattered the image of Mali as a religiously tolerant country. Armed extremist groups have since terrorized northern and central Mali, attacking those whom they perceive as failing to follow their strict interpretation of Islam. Such groups have occasionally carried out targeted kidnappings of Christians and subjected them to sometimes violent harassment. In 2017, several Christian churches in central Mali were attacked by alleged Islamist gunmen.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 3 / 4

Academic freedom is upheld in areas with a consolidated government presence but restricted in areas with a heavy militant presence.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 3 / 4

Private discussion is generally open and free in areas under government control, but such expression is more restricted in areas with a militant presence or where intercommunal violence has flared.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 6 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 2 / 4

The constitution guarantees freedom of assembly, but participants in public gatherings risk violence by state security forces, and the government has occasionally restricted social media use to prevent activists from organizing protests.

Protesters rallied against the late April 2020 Constitutional Court decision to overturn the election results for 31 parliamentary seats that month, and regular antigovernment protests were held beginning in early June, days after the M5-RFP's formation was announced. Protests grew violent during a three-day period in July 2020, with some participants engaging in looting. The authorities responded with lethal force, resulting in at least 14 deaths in Bamako over three days. Despite continued violence, protests largely persisted through August 2020, when President Keïta and Prime Minister Cissé were detained by the CNSP.

Several protests took place in 2021 and were largely peaceful. Regular demonstrations against foreign—especially French—military involvement in Mali were held throughout the year without being disrupted. Similar protests also occurred as part of a progovernment march held in Bamako in September.

Many nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) operate in Mali without state interference. However, large, established NGOs with ties to the political elite can overshadow smaller and more innovative groups, particularly in the competition for funding. Ongoing insecurity in some parts of the country hampers NGO efforts to provide aid and services to returning refugees and others affected by instability. A European Commission report counted more than 130 security incidents affecting humanitarian NGOs in the country during 2021.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 2 / 4

The constitution guarantees workers the right to form unions and to strike, with some limitations for workers in essential services and requirements involving compulsory arbitration. The government has broad discretionary power over the registration of unions and recognition of collective bargaining, and the authorities do not effectively enforce laws against antiunion discrimination.

The National Union of Workers of Mali (UNTM), the country's largest trade union, held two strikes in November and December 2020 over pay disagreements. The UNTM and the military government held negotiations on the matter that December, though the union briefly suspended its participation after President N'Daou harshly criticized the strike activity in a speech. In May 2021, the UNTM began a nationwide strike following failed negotiations with the government over wages, bonuses, and allowances. The strike ended after the transitional government was removed by the coup later that month.

F. RULE OF LAW: 4 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 2 / 4

The judiciary is beholden to the executive, despite constitutional guarantees of judicial independence. Judges are appointed by the president, while the minister of justice supervises both law enforcement and judicial functions.

In July 2020, Keïta announced the removal of Constitutional Court judges as part of an effort to resolve the country's postelection political impasse. That August, nine judges were appointed to the court; three were named by Keïta, three by National Assembly president Moussa Timbine, and three by a judicial council. The appointments were met with criticism due to the involvement of a Keïta ally in the judges' installation.

Militant attacks against judicial personnel have prompted some judges to vacate their posts. In 2017, judge Soungalo Koné was kidnapped in central Mali by armed men who asked for the release of detained militants in exchange for his freedom. In February 2019, the magistrates' union announced that he had died the previous month, still in captivity, from an illness.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 1 / 4

Due process rights are inconsistently upheld. Detainees are not always charged within the 48-hour period set by law, and arbitrary arrests are common. After a deadly 2015 terrorist attack in Bamako, a national state of emergency remained in force for several years and was last extended in October 2019. The emergency designation gave security services greater authority to search homes without a warrant, detain suspects, and restrict protests. The military government suspended that state of emergency after taking power in August 2020, though a COVID-19-related state of emergency was declared in late December 2020.

Detainees face extended pretrial detention periods. The trial of Amadou Sanogo, who staged a coup d'état in 2012 and was accused of killing 21 soldiers who sought to oppose him that year, began in 2016 but was quickly adjourned. Sanogo was not freed on bail until late January 2020, though his release was criticized by human rights groups. In March 2021, the court dropped the charges against Sanogo and 15 other soldiers accused in the case, citing a 2019 reconciliation law that grants pardons or amnesty for certain crimes committed during the 2012 political crisis.

Due process rights were not consistently upheld for high-ranking officials detained by the military in the August 2020 coup d'état. Former prime minister Sissé, former National Assembly president Timbine, and eight detained generals were released in October 2020 with the warning that they "remain at the disposition of the courts." In September 2021, Oumar Samaké, a special forces commander imprisoned for his alleged role in the July 2020 death of 14 antigovernment protesters, was freed by armed police who stormed the prison where he was being held. The transitional government condemned Samaké's forcible release, and human rights groups and magistrates' unions criticized the incident as "an attack on democracy and the rule of law." Samaké voluntarily surrendered to authorities and was returned to prison less than a week later. In October, Issa Kaou N'Djim, a vice president of the transitional parliament, was arrested after he criticized the government's decision to expel ECOWAS's special envoy in Mali. In December, N'Djim was given a six-month suspended sentence and fined 500,000 francs ($900).

The Truth, Justice, and Reconciliation Commission created in 2014 is responsible for investigating human rights violations committed since 1960, but its activities are restricted by the rise of terrorist activities and intercommunal tensions within Mali's borders. In 2021, the commission held public hearings in April and September, giving victims of violent conflict and human rights abuses the opportunity to testify about their experiences.

Islamist militant groups that were not party to a 2015 peace agreement continue to carry out acts of violence against civilians in the northern and central regions. Since 2012, militant groups affiliated with the Islamic State in the Greater Sahara (ISGS) have regularly enforced brutal punishments—including stoning and amputation—on civilians they accuse of crimes.

Ongoing instability has contributed to the spread of organized crime and accompanying violence and kidnappings. In 2020, in return for its release of late opposition leader Soumaila Cissé, French aid worker Sophie Pétronin, and two Italian hostages, the Support Group for Islam and Muslims (GSIM), a militant group with reported links to Al-Qaeda, secured the government's release of 200 individuals suspected of militant activity. In April 2021, French journalist Olivier Dubois was abducted by the GSIM; he had not been freed at year's end.

More than 1,000 violent attacks against civilians by suspected Islamist militants took place in 2021; nearly 600 civilians were killed, and more than 500 were abducted. In August, three villages in central Mali were attacked by assailants who killed 51 civilians in apparent retaliation for the arrest of several jihadist leaders in a nearby town.

Malian military personnel have been known to engage in human rights violations. In 2021, the UN Multidimensional Integrated Stabilization Mission in Mali (MINUSMA) reported that Malian forces were responsible for abuses including extrajudicial killings, forced disappearances, and arbitrary arrests, many of them in the regions of Mopti and Ségou. International human rights groups also reported many such violations by the Malian military between the August 2020 coup and December 2021.

In March 2021, MINUSMA investigators reported that a French military air strike carried out in January in central Mali had mainly killed civilians, contrary to claims by French authorities that the air strike had targeted and killed militants.

Prisons are characterized by overcrowding, insufficient medical care, and a lack of proper food and sanitation. The COVID-19 pandemic also affected prisons, with the authorities releasing or pardoning over 1,600 prisoners to reduce the spread of the virus in 2020.

Members of a northern caste known as Black Tamasheqs face societal discrimination, including slavery-like treatment and hereditary servitude. Authorities sometimes deny them official documents or discriminate against them in housing, schooling, and police protection.

Arabs and Tuaregs also face discrimination. In October 2020, Arab and Tuareg merchants in the city of Timbuktu rallied against attacks on their businesses, with participants saying they commonly faced blame for criminal and jihadist activity in the region.

Same-sex sexual acts are legal, but LGBT+ people face discrimination, including cases of violence by family members that is meant as a corrective punishment.

Although the constitution nominally guarantees equal rights and prohibits discrimination based on sex, men and women do not have the same legal status, and women are required by law to obey their husbands. Sexual harassment is not prohibited by law and is a common practice in schools and the workplace.

Conditions in northern Mali have left many refugees unable or unwilling to return, as continuing insecurity in the region complicates resettlement. The Office of the UN High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) counted almost 160,000 Malian refugees living in asylum countries and more than 400,000 internally displaced persons as of November 2021.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 4 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 1 / 4

Freedom of movement and choice of residence remain constrained by insecurity, especially in northern and central Mali. Educational facilities have been targeted in militant attacks, and according to the United Nations, 1,664 schools were closed as of August 2021.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 1 / 4

Citizens have the right to own property and engage in private enterprise, but these rights are not consistently respected, and widespread corruption hampers normal business activities. It is generally necessary to pay bribes in order to operate a business.

Traditional customs sometimes undermine the right of women to own property. The law discriminates against women in matters of inheritance.

The law puts women at a disadvantage on personal status issues including marriage and divorce. Rape and domestic violence against women are widespread, and most such crimes go unreported. There are no specific laws prohibiting spousal rape or domestic violence. Female genital mutilation is legal and commonly practiced in the country. Same-sex couples cannot form civil unions, marry, or adopt children in Mali.

Although trafficking in persons is a criminal offense, prosecutions are infrequent. Many judicial officials remain unaware of the antitrafficking law, and the police lack adequate resources to combat trafficking. Traditional forms of slavery and debt bondage persist, particularly in the north, with thousands of people estimated to be living in such conditions.

The government has taken steps to eliminate child labor, but it is a significant concern, especially in the agricultural and artisanal gold-mining sectors. Armed groups also regularly recruit and use child soldiers.

Malta

Population: 500,000

Capital: Valletta

Freedom Status: Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Malta is a parliamentary democracy with regular, competitive elections and periodic rotations of power. Civil liberties are generally respected. New and smaller political parties encounter difficulties in challenging the dominance of the two main parties, and official corruption is a serious problem.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- In August, the government opened an inquiry into correctional procedures after a prison inmate died by suicide. Prisons director Alex Dalli stepped aside in November after another inmate died by suicide and was formally dismissed in December.
- In April, legislators passed a gender-parity bill that would award as many as 12 compensatory parliamentary seats to “the underrepresented sex,” should its members win fewer than 40 percent of seats.
- In May, the Office of the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights (OHCHR) noted incidents where Maltese authorities ignored seafaring migrants in distress, provided insufficient support, or engaged in dangerous practices while interacting with them.
- In August, businessman Yorgen Fenech, who was accused of orchestrating the 2017 murder of journalist Daphne Caruana Galizia, was formally indicted for his alleged involvement. Fenech’s lawyers filed a complaint over the selection of the trial’s presiding judge in September, though that judge remained in charge as of year’s end.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 35 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 12 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The president is head of state and is elected by the parliament for a five-year term. Under constitutional reforms passed in 2020, future presidents will require the support of two-thirds of the parliament. George Vella of the Labour Party (LP) was selected president in April 2019, running unopposed.

The president nominates the prime minister, who must be a member of parliament (MP) and must command a parliamentary majority. Prime Minister Joseph Muscat won a second term in 2017 but resigned the prime ministership and the LP leadership in 2019, as police investigated his chief of staff, Keith Schembri, over the murder of Daphne Caruana Galizia. Robert Abela succeeded Muscat as LP leader and prime minister in January 2020.

Members of the unicameral parliament are elected for a five-year term through a single-transferable-vote (STV), proportional representation system in multimember districts. National elections are considered free and fair. The ruling LP won the 2017 snap election with 55 percent of the vote and 37 seats, while the Nationalist Party (PN) won 30.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 4 / 4

Members of the Electoral Commission (EC) are appointed by the president, and both major parties are represented on it.

Since 1987, when constitutional amendments were passed, improvements have been made to ensure more proportionality between votes and parliamentary seats won by the parties. However, a party needs to win about 17 percent of the valid votes in at least 1 of Malta's 13 electoral districts to enter the parliament.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 14 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 3 / 4

There are no significant restrictions to political party formation. However, smaller parties have difficulty competing against the two established parties, which have superior access to private donations. In 2020, the Democratic Alternative and Democratic Party, then the country's two smallest parties, merged to form the ADPD.

The 2015 Financing of Political Parties Act aims to improve transparency of party fundraising. Compliance is overseen by the EC. In 2018, the Constitutional Court upheld a PN appeal to halt an EC investigation into the party, ruling that the EC could not simultaneously investigate and judge such issues. In May 2021, the EC cited that ruling when it declined to investigate allegations that the PL received illicit donations through Egrant, an offshore firm.

The LP and PN have regularly alternated power since independence in 1964, establishing a strong pattern of peaceful democratic transfers of power.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 3 / 4

Voters are free from undue interference in their political choices. However, powerful economic interests influence the main political parties. In a September 2021 interview, construction magnate Joseph Portelli stated that he meets with officials to "speed up" development but denied receiving preferential treatment.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 4 / 4

Women and minority groups enjoy full political rights and electoral opportunities, though women's participation in politics remains low. Women hold only 9 of the parliament's 67 seats. Under a bill passed in April 2021, as many as 12 compensatory seats will be assigned to "the underrepresented sex" if its members win less than 40 percent of seats in future elections. The ADPD criticized the bill in January, saying it would benefit female PL and PN candidates in practice.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 9 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 4 / 4

While elected representatives are freely able to make policy, the Council of Europe's (CoE) Venice Commission criticized Malta for the disproportionate power of the executive in 2018. The government proposed and then won parliamentary approval for a constitutional reform package to address those concerns in July 2020. The Venice Commission welcomed the reforms, but criticized the lack of debate on the proposals.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 2 / 4

Maltese anticorruption efforts are considered weak, and government officials and businesspeople have been linked to corruption and influence peddling. The Permanent Commission against Corruption (PCAC), created in 1988, lacked independent prosecutorial powers. The 2020 constitutional reform package empowered it to send its findings to the attorney general for further action. Under the reforms, legislators will select the PCAC chairperson instead of the prime minister.

The Panama Papers—a trove of documents leaked from a Panama-based law firm and made public in 2016—have led to multiple corruption allegations against Maltese officials. Targets included Muscat’s chief of staff, Keith Schembri, and former energy minister Konrad Mizzi; both individuals resigned in 2019 amid turmoil surrounding the 2017 murder of Caruana Galizia, who had accused them of corruption. Schembri, who had been arrested over a passport-distribution kickback scheme in 2020, was arrested on charges including money laundering and fraud in March 2021 and received bail in April. In December, the US State Department designated Mizzi and Schembri for corruption, making them unable to travel to the United States.

Caruana Galizia had accused energy firm Electrogas Malta of corruption before her death. Electrogas Malta stakeholder Yorgen Fenech was accused of orchestrating Caruana Galizia’s murder in 2019 and was formally indicted in August 2021. Fenech unsuccessfully moved to compel the trial’s presiding judge to recuse herself later that month. In September, Fenech’s lawyers accused the attorney general of involvement in the judge’s selection in a Constitutional Court filing. The judge in question continued to preside over the case as of year’s end, however.

Other incidents of official corruption surfaced in 2021. In December, PL legislator Ian Castaldi Paris said he would not contest the next election after he was ordered to pay €300,000 ($340,000) in taxes and penalties over undeclared assets. Later that month, Education Minister Justyne Caruana resigned over revelations that she had inappropriately awarded a contract to a personal friend.

The CoE’s Group of States against Corruption and its Committee of Experts on the Evaluation of Anti-Money Laundering Measures and the Financing of Terrorism (MON- EYVAL) have highlighted significant problems with Malta’s fight against corruption and money laundering. MONEYVAL reported that Malta was making progress in fighting money laundering in May 2021. In June, however, the Financial Action Task Force, an intergovernmental money laundering watchdog, added Malta to its “grey list” of countries that would face closer monitoring.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 3 / 4

Malta has a Freedom of Information Law and asset disclosure rules for public officials. However, information requests are not always answered. In an April 2021 report, nongovernmental organization (NGO) Aditus reported that the government complied with only 54 percent of freedom-of-information requests made between 2015 and 2017. In May 2021, the country’s data protection chief called for the law to be revised, criticizing his office’s limited powers under the current legislation.

Details of government contracts are often withheld from the public. In December 2021, the NAO criticized an opaque government agreement allowing Vitals Global Healthcare to operate three public hospitals in 2015. The NAO noted a lack of documentation, the company’s failure to meet its obligations, and concerns surrounding the company’s condition among other issues.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 54 / 60 (-1)D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 14 / 16*D1. Are there free and independent media? 3 / 4

The media are generally free and diverse. Residents have full access to international services and domestic outlets, though state-owned media favor the government. Maltese journalists face harassment and libel accusations.

Journalists, especially those investigating corruption, face physical dangers. In late September 2021, blogger Manuel Delia said he would leave Malta after receiving several threats. In October, Newsbook received threatening messages over its coverage of Yorgen Fenech and Alex Dalli but vowed to continue its work.

Libel has been decriminalized but remains a civil offense. In 2020, Matthew Caruana Galizia, one of the late journalist's sons, disclosed that his mother faced a total of over 40 libel cases which were still being contested by her family. In April 2021, the European Parliament called on the European Commission to propose anti-SLAPP (strategic lawsuit against public participation) legislation and called on Malta to introduce domestic protections.

The constitution establishes Roman Catholicism as the state religion, but religious minorities worship freely. A 2016 legal reform decriminalized the vilification of religion, and blasphemy, and banned the incitement of religious hatred.

The parliament is considering an equality bill that, among other things, would prohibit workplace discrimination based on several characteristics, including religious identity. Catholic schools, parents' associations, and bishops objected, warning that the bill would limit their ability to hire educators. The bill, which would allow faith to be considered as a hiring factor in some circumstances, remained under consideration as of November 2021.

The education system is free from extensive political indoctrination.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 3 / 4

Individuals are generally free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution. However, many Maltese, particularly public-service employees, fear retribution for criticizing powerful actors. Social media harassment, especially against journalists, is widespread.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 12 / 12E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

The constitution provides for freedom of assembly, and this right is respected.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 4 / 4

NGOs, including human rights defenders, generally operate without state interference.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 4 / 4

The law recognizes the right to form and join trade unions, engage in collective bargaining, and strike. Antiunion discrimination by employers is relatively uncommon.

F. RULE OF LAW: 14 / 16 (-1)F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 4 / 4

The judiciary is generally independent. The Judicial Appointments Committee (JAC) makes recommendations on judicial appointments to the prime minister except for the chief justice, who serves as JAC chair.

Observers have voiced concerns over judicial independence in the past. In 2018, the Venice Commission noted weaknesses in the judicial branch that undermined its independence. In July 2021, the European Commission reported that reforms undertaken in 2020 have positively contributed to judicial independence. The report also noted that the procedures for removing judges and magistrates were improved in 2020.

In 2019, arguing that the prime minister maintained “arbitrary discretion” over judicial matters, the NGO Repubblika initiated proceedings to send the law on the appointment of judges to the Court of Justice of the European Union (CJEU) for review. The CJEU ruled that the prime minister’s use of a shortlist to select judges did not violate European Union (EU) law in April 2021, and Repubblika withdrew its case in May.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 4 / 4

Police and prosecutors typically observe due process guarantees, including access to defense counsel and protection against arbitrary arrest. However, court cases take far longer to resolve than the EU average.

In 2020, a magistrate opened an investigation into former police commissioner Lawrence Cutajar over allegations that he leaked information to Melvin Theuma, the “middle-man” in the Caruana Galizia murder. In May 2021, the Times of Malta reported that former police superintendent Ray Aquilina was also suspected of leaking information to Theuma and regularly communicated with a business associate of Yorgen Fenech.

Maltese authorities generally do not engage in torture or ill-treatment of detainees. Rates of violent crime are low. However, prisoners and detained asylum seekers have been subjected to physical mistreatment, including torture, in recent years.

In January 2021, the European Union Agency for Asylum (EUAA) disclosed that it received reports of detained migrants facing torture, solitary confinement, denial of medical care, and other forms of ill-treatment. That same month, the Times of Malta reported that detainees had attempted suicide to protest their treatment.

A number of inmates have died in Maltese prisons in recent years. In August 2021, the government appointed an inquiry board to examine correctional procedures after an inmate at Corradino Correctional Facility died by suicide. Some 14 prisoners at Corradino died between mid-2018 and November 2021, when prisons director Alex Dalli stepped aside. Two inmates accused prison authorities of engaging in ill-treatment in a police report filed that same month. In December, the inquiry presented its recommendations to the government, including the creation of a prisons ombudsman and of an independent entity to assess care in prisons; Home Affairs Minister Byron Camilleri vowed to adopt its recommendations. Dalli, meanwhile, was formally dismissed that month.

Score Change: The score declined from 4 to 3 due to the alleged ill-treatment of prisoners, including torture, and a concurrent series of deaths in custody in recent years.

Discrimination based on gender, race, sexual orientation, and religion is prohibited by law, which is generally enforced, but a gender pay gap persists. Transgender people may express their gender identity on government documents.

Malta largely complies with international and EU rules on refugees and asylum seekers. However, NGOs working with migrants and refugees sometimes report police harassment and hostility by far-right groups. Many asylum seekers are confined in overcrowded and squalid detention centers.

Maltese authorities also resist the acceptance of migrants rescued at sea. An OHCHR report published in May 2021 noted incidents where the Maltese armed forces ignored seafaring migrants in distress, provided insufficient support, or engaged in “dangerous rescue and interception practices.” In October 2021, the CoE’s human rights commissioner criticized Malta for its treatment of migrants traveling by sea.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 14 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

Residents enjoy full freedom of movement.

There are no significant restrictions on property rights, and the legal framework is supportive of private business activity.

Divorce was legalized in 2011, and subsequent laws have legalized same-sex marriage and adoption by same-sex couples.

Abortion is prohibited, leaving Maltese to acquire medication online or travel abroad to seek abortions. In practice, Maltese are rarely charged for seeking or providing abortions; only three people have been convicted of having an abortion between 2000 and mid-2021. Involuntary abortions resulting from secondary effects when a woman is undergoing medical treatment are not prosecuted.

Reports of domestic violence are increasing. In April 2021, the National Statistics Office reported a 41.2 percent increase in domestic violence between 2016 and 2019. In June 2021, the government renewed its strategy to combat gender-based violence and domestic violence.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 3 / 4

Residents generally enjoy fair access to economic opportunity and protection from labor exploitation, though migrant workers are vulnerable to labor and sex trafficking or conditions that amount to forced labor. The leader of a leading Maltese trade union has claimed that some migrants are being paid less than one euro an hour for their labor.

Marshall Islands

Population: 60,000

Capital: Majuro

Freedom Status: Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: The Republic of the Marshall Islands (RMI) is a stable democracy with regular, competitive elections, an independent judiciary, and a free press. Civil liberties are generally respected. Persistent problems include corruption, gender discrimination, domestic violence, and human trafficking.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- In February, the RMI announced that it would move to end its membership in the Pacific Islands Forum. The RMI and four other member states announced their intention to depart after the RMI's candidate for secretary-general, Gerald Zackios, was not selected for the post. The decision to leave will take effect in 2022.
- In November, 10 US House of Representatives members urged the administration of President Joe Biden to focus on Compact of Free Association (CFA) renewals with the RMI, the Federated States of Micronesia (FSM), and Palau, citing concerns of Chinese influence in the region. The current agreement with Majuro will expire in 2023.
- Preliminary census results showing a significant population decline between 2011 and 2021 were released in November. As many as 25,000 Marshallese may have migrated during that period.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 38 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 12 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The president, who is elected by the unicameral legislature from among its members for four-year terms, nominates fellow lawmakers to serve as cabinet ministers, and they are formally appointed by the parliament speaker.

The parliament elected David Kabua, son of the first president of the Marshall Islands, Amata Kabua, to the post in January 2020. He succeeded Hilda Heine, the first woman to be head of state of a Pacific Island country, who lost her coalition after the November 2019 elections.

The Nitijela (parliament) consists of 33 members, with 19 seats directly elected in single-member districts and five multimember districts with between 2 and 5 seats. Members serve four-year terms. Elections are officially nonpartisan, and lawmakers are free to form alliances and change party affiliations after taking office.

The November 2019 elections were affected by low turnout. The opposition made significant parliamentary gains during that contest.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 4 / 4

The constitutional and legal framework provides for democratic elections and is implemented impartially.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 16 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 4 / 4

Parliamentary elections are technically nonpartisan, but politicians can organize in groupings that compete freely and do not encounter obstacles from state or nonstate actors. These groups tend to function as loose coalitions among lawmakers, and representatives switching between them is common.

The country has an established record of democratic transfers of power between rival groups. Some governments have been replaced as a result of elections, while others have been toppled by no-confidence votes.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 4 / 4

There are no significant undue constraints on the political choices of voters or candidates. Traditional chiefs play an influential but gradually waning role in politics.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 4 / 4

Naturalized citizens were allowed to run as candidates in the 2015 and subsequent elections, after a court ruling found that a 1980 law requiring parliamentary candidates to have at least one Marshallese parent and traditional land rights was unconstitutional.

Women have full political rights, though entrenched gender roles limit their participation to some extent. Hilda Heine was the country's first woman president. Only two women entered the 33-member Nitijela in 2019—Heine and newly elected Kitlang Kabua.

In 2019, the Supreme Court removed a 2016 law that banned absentee voting. However, that law's undoing did not take effect by the November 2019 elections, as the court recognized that there was too little time for the government to implement the changes. An estimated 30,000 Marshallese citizens, around a third of the country's citizenry, live in the United States and had a growing influence in the 2011 and 2015 parliamentary and mayoral elections, before the law was set in place.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 10 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 4 / 4

There are no undue restrictions on the elected government's ability to form and implement laws and policies. A body of chieftains from the Ralik and Ratak Island chains, the Council of Iroij, has an advisory role under the constitution. Its 12 members can offer joint opinions and request reconsideration of any bill affecting customary law, traditional practices, land tenure, and related matters. Concerns of Chinese influence persist, despite the RMI's trade deal with Taiwan and deep ties to the United States.

The RMI has close relations with the United States under the 1986 CFA, which allows the US military to operate in the RMI in exchange for defense guarantees and development assistance. A component of the compact in force through 2023 calls for the United States to provide annual aid, including contributions to a trust fund for the country. In November 2021, 10 US House of Representatives members urged the Biden administration to focus on CFA renewals with the RMI, the FSM, and Palau, citing concerns of Chinese influence.

Corruption has been a chronic problem, though auditing bodies and the independent courts are somewhat effective in detecting abuses and holding officials accountable. High-ranking public officials, however, are rarely prosecuted for corruption. Corruption is most prevalent in the allocation of foreign aid, government procurement, and transfers. In 2020, the United Nations and the government of New Zealand launched a regional anticorruption project, with over $16 million in funds that would operate in 13 Pacific Island countries, including the RMI.

The number of fraud cases prosecuted by the auditor general increased in both 2019 and 2020, a possible sign of added effectiveness due to new funding from the World Bank. In September 2020, Auditor General Junior Patrick reported a total of 13 corruption allegations since that January, including embezzlement, misappropriation of public assets, abuse of office, and tax evasion.

In 2020, a three-year review of the government's passport program found numerous internal control and compliance problems. Over 500 passports had been issued to non-Indigenous Marshallese who did not have evidence of legal citizenship. In several instances, passport applications were approved without the required documentation at the instruction of high-ranking officials.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 3 / 4

There is no strong legal mechanism for obtaining access to government information, but documents can often be obtained through the courts. Auditors have repeatedly found invalid or poorly documented spending practices at government ministries, agencies, and state-owned enterprises.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 55 / 60D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 16 / 16*D1. Are there free and independent media? 4 / 4

The government generally respects the freedoms of speech and the press. A privately owned newspaper, the Marshall Islands Journal, publishes articles in English and Marshallese. Broadcast outlets include both government- and church-owned radio stations, and cable television offers a variety of international news and entertainment programs.

Internet access is expanding, reaching nearly 40 percent of the population in 2018, but it remains limited due to poor infrastructure and high costs. In August 2021, the World Bank agreed to finance an $30 million internet-access project in the RMI.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 4 / 4

Religious freedoms are respected in practice. Religious groups are not required to register with the government, but those that register as nonprofits are eligible for tax exemptions.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

There are no significant restrictions on academic freedom.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 4 / 4

Citizens are generally free to discuss their political opinions, and there are no reports of improper government surveillance.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 11 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

The government upholds constitutional guarantees of freedom of assembly. Protests in recent years have addressed issues including climate change, women's rights, and the legacy of US nuclear weapons tests in the country.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 4 / 4

Civil society groups, many of which are sponsored by or affiliated with church organizations and provide social services, operate freely.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 3 / 4

Constitutional and legal provisions that protect freedom of association also apply to trade unions. However, there are no laws regulating the right to strike, and few employers are large enough to support union activity among their workers.

F. RULE OF LAW: 15 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 4 / 4

The constitution provides for an independent judiciary, and the judiciary generally operates without political interference. Judges are appointed by the cabinet on the recommendation of the Judicial Service Commission, and the legislature confirms the appointments. High Court and Supreme Court judges can only be removed by a two-thirds vote in the Nitijela, for clear failure or inability to perform their duties or for serious crimes or abuses.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 4 / 4

The authorities generally observe legal safeguards against arbitrary arrest and detention. The state provides lawyers for indigent defendants, and due process standards for trials are upheld.

Violent street crime and other such threats to physical security are relatively rare, though conditions in the country's few prison and jail facilities are sometimes overcrowded or otherwise below international standards.

Dangerous radiation levels on various atolls of the RMI—with levels similar to those observed after the 1945 atomic bombing of Hiroshima and the 2011 Fukushima nuclear accident—were caused and hidden by the US military but have been reported on in recent years. From the 1940s through the 1950s, the US military displaced Marshallese living on various atolls, detonated 67 nuclear bombs, destroyed entire islands, and dumped 130 tons of irradiated soil from Nevada into Runit Dome on the atoll Eniwetok. Further, the US government withheld key information about the contents of Runit Dome and falsely claimed it would be safe for the Marshallese to return before the 1986 CFA was signed. An international tribunal created by the RMI and United States in 1988 acknowledged $2.3 billion in claims to be paid by the US government; only $4 million had been paid out by 2010.

In 2019, then president Heine called on the US government to pay to repair Runit Dome, which was found to be leaking, further endangering the nearby population. In 2020, the United States declared that Runit Dome was safe, despite RMI-provided evidence to the contrary. The RMI's Nuclear Commission claimed that the US report contains no new analysis and ignores evidence and information from local communities. In October 2021, members of a US House of Representatives subcommittee criticized the Biden administration, saying that its stance on Runit Dome was affecting CFA renewal negotiations. In November, House of Representatives members Raúl Grijalva and Katie Porter called on the US Energy Department to release more information about the state of Runit Dome.

Women generally enjoy equal treatment under the law, but there is no explicit ban on discrimination in employment, and women face disadvantages in the workplace in practice. While same-sex sexual activity was decriminalized in 2005, discrimination based on sexual orientation and gender identity is not prohibited by law.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 13 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

Freedom of movement is generally respected. Marshallese citizens have the right to live and work in the United States and to travel there without a visa. In recent years, sea level rise due to climate change has become a more prominent impetus for Marshallese citizens to move to the United States, in a trend known as voluntary out-migration. As many as 25,000 people left the RMI due to out-migration between 2011 and 2021 according to preliminary census data released in November 2021.

In 2019, a dengue fever outbreak prompted a state-of-emergency declaration and a domestic travel ban throughout the Marshall Islands. The outbreak was severe, and the state of emergency was extended into 2020. That March, restrictions were further tightened to prevent the spread of COVID-19. All travel into the Marshall Islands, including for Marshallese citizens, was banned for much of 2020, as was, at times, all outbound travel. These restrictions were eased as 2021 progressed in order to facilitate repatriation.

Individuals have the rights to own property and establish private businesses, and these rights are largely observed in practice. Land ownership is, however, subject to complex local ownership rules and norms.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 3 / 4

Personal social freedoms are mostly upheld. However, the minimum age for marriage is 16 for women and 18 for men; about a quarter of women aged 20–24 were married by age 18. While domestic violence remains widespread, reporting of the problem has increased in recent years possibly due to improved processes for obtaining orders of protection. Eight domestic violence complaints were filed in the first five months of 2021, while 10 were recorded in all of 2020.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 3 / 4

The government enforces a minimum wage law, though it does not apply to the informal sector. Some local and East Asian women are subjected to forced prostitution in a trade that depends on visiting freight or fishing vessels. The RMI remains on the Tier 2 watchlist of the US State Department's Trafficking in Persons Report 2021 due to the RMI's limited policing of human trafficking, though the State Department noted the government's efforts to improve.

Mauritania

Population: 4,800,000

Capital: Nouakchott

Freedom Status: Partly Free

Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: Mohamed Ould Abdel Aziz, who first came to power through a military coup and won a second term in a deeply flawed 2014 election, stepped down peacefully after a relatively credible 2019 election. The poll came on the heels of successful legislative elections held in 2018, which were more pluralistic than past elections. A variety of media outlets operate, but journalists risk arrest for reporting on sensitive topics and many self-censor. Black Mauritians, the Haratin population, women, and LGBT+ people face discrimination. The government has taken increased steps to implement laws that address the problem of institutionalized slavery and discrimination but continues to arrest antislavery and anti-discrimination activists.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- In January, police in Nouadhibo arrested journalist Salem Kerboub and two others who helped Kerboub gather information for his reporting on the COVID-19 pandemic. Kerkoub had posted on Facebook denouncing fraud in the government's management of COVID-19 funds.
- In March, former president Ould Abdel Aziz was charged with corruption, money laundering, and misappropriation of public funds. He had been under house arrest since August 2020 and was taken into custody in June 2021 for noncompliance with his house arrest requirements and for disturbing the public order.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 14 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 6 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 2 / 4

The president is chief of state and is directly elected to up to two five-year terms by popular vote. In June 2019, Mauritians elected Mohamed Ould Ghazouani to replace Ould Abdel Aziz, whose second term came to an end. Ould Ghazouani, of the ruling Union for the Republic (UPR), won 52 percent of the vote in the first round. Antislavery activist Biram Dah Abeid came second with 19 percent. Mohamed Ould Boubacar, the Islamist party Tawassoul's candidate, won 18 percent.

The authorities dismissed opposition claims of electoral misconduct and fraud. Local and international observers noted irregularities but praised the poll's peaceful conduct and found it generally satisfactory. For the first time in its history, Mauritania experienced a peaceful transfer of power after the incumbent completed his term, signaling a departure from a history of military coups.

The prime minister is head of government and is appointed by the president. President Ould Ghazouani named Mohamed Ould Bilal, a longtime public official, to succeed Ismail Ould Bedda Ould Cheikh Sidiya in August 2020. Ould Bilal's predecessor resigned after he and several other ministers were implicated in a corruption case.

Constitutional reforms adopted through a 2017 referendum dissolved the Senate, leaving the 157-seat National Assembly as the country's legislative body. Members are directly elected to five-year terms in a mixed system of direct and plurality voting; four members are directly elected by the diaspora.

Ninety-eight political parties participated in the September 2018 National Assembly elections, including members of the opposition National Front for the Defense of Democracy (FNDU), a coalition that boycotted previous elections. The ruling UPR won 89 seats, while Tawassoul, the largest opposition party, won 14.

A coalition of opposition groups called the elections fraudulent, but most Mauritanian politicians as well as African Union (AU) observers deemed them credible. AU observers said "imperfections" in the process did not appear to have affected the polls' credibility.

Abeid, a head of the Initiative for the Resurgence of the Abolitionist Movement in Mauritania (IRA Mauritania), an antislavery group, won a seat in the parliament in 2018. However, he was arrested allegedly without a warrant and held in pretrial detention during the elections as authorities investigated claims that he had threatened a journalist, which IRA Mauritania denied. Abeid was released later that year after receiving a sentence shorter than time served.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 2 / 4

In 2018, the government appointed a new Independent National Electoral Commission (CENI) following a series of dialogues with some opposition parties. However, the FNDU, which had boycotted the dialogue process, rejected the commission and demanded its dissolution. That July, the government appointed a former FNDU member as CENI president. Despite the controversies over its composition, the new commission organized 2018 elections that were generally viewed as successful. In 2019, prior to the presidential elections, government and opposition groups agreed to a compromise that allowed members of the opposition greater participation in the CENI.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 4 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 2 / 4

Several obstacles prevent parties from successfully mobilizing their bases. A 2018 decree commanded the government to dissolve all political parties unable to gain at least 1 percent of votes in two consecutive district elections. In March 2019, 76 parties were disbanded under the decree.

Demonstrations organized by political parties are often prevented or dispersed. Authorities have denied registration to activist parties, including the Progressive Forces for Change and the Radical Party for a Global Action, which oppose racial discrimination and slavery. The Progressive Forces for Change's legal petition to gain recognition has been pending before the Supreme Court since 2015. The ruling party is frequently successful in efforts to co-opt leaders of smaller parties with comparatively fewer resources.

The environment for opposition figures has improved since President Ould Ghazouani came to power. Ould Ghazouani has met with opposition leaders and civil society activists, and in February 2020, the government quashed legal proceedings against three prominent critics of former president Ould Abdel Aziz. One of the critics who had not resided in Mauritania since 2011, Ould Limam Chafi, returned in October 2020.

Most opposition parties lack an institutional base. Some are formed by splinter factions of the UPR that later rejoin it, sometimes because of active co-optation. After boycotting elections for years, opposition parties participated in recent presidential and legislative elections. Although the UPR benefitted from incumbency advantages in the 2019 presidential election, opposition parties managed to gain sizable number of votes, totaling over 47 percent.

Though opposition parties took part in the September 2018 elections, the UPR remained dominant, winning a large legislative majority. Opposition parties fared somewhat better in the municipal and regional elections. Opposition leaders may face repression for criticizing government policies.

The political choices of Mauritians are greatly influenced by the military, which plays a key role in the political system. Since 1978, Mauritania has either been under military rule or led by a military leader, with the exception of 18 months of civilian government between 2007 and 2008. President Ould Ghazouani is a former defense minister and general, though he was elected in a competitive and democratic poll. Though in recent years the overt influence of the military in politics has receded somewhat, the influence of religious leaders has grown stronger.

The Bidhan ethnic group dominates the Mauritanian government, while Black Mauritians and the Haratin ethnic groups are underrepresented in elected positions and in high-level government roles. Discrimination hinders the ability of these groups to gain power. Thousands of Black Mauritians who were forced out of their villages by the military in 1989 have been allowed to return, but face difficulties when trying to enroll in the census and register to vote. Civil society activists have denounced the increasing importance of tribal affiliation in government appointments.

Women participate in politics at lower levels than men, largely due to cultural norms, and women's interests are poorly represented in national politics in practice. Women hold 31 of the 157 National Assembly seats.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 4 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 1 / 4

The executive dominates the legislative branch. The president has the power to dissolve the National Assembly, but the legislature has no impeachment power over the president. The military maintains a great deal of influence on policymaking.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 2 / 4

Despite numerous anticorruption laws and anti-money-laundering and anti-terror-financing measures, corruption remains widespread, and laws are not effectively enforced. Public contracts are typically awarded in exchange for bribes or on the basis of patronage. Bribes are often necessary for ordinary government processes like obtaining licenses and permits.

The Ould Ghazouani government has ostensibly prioritized combating corruption. In December 2021, the government increased the number of state auditors. However, critics claim the government at times uses anticorruption efforts to target political opponents.

In March 2021, former president Ould Abdel Aziz was charged with corruption, money laundering, and misappropriation of public funds. He had been under house arrest since August 2020 and was taken into custody in June 2021 for noncompliance with his house arrest requirements and for disturbing the public order. Fourteen other high-profile members of Ould Abdel Aziz's government are under investigation. In May, several civil society organizations created an anticorruption alliance to help the government recover funds stolen during Ould Abdel Aziz's tenure.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 1 / 4

The government does not operate with transparency, particularly in granting mining and fishing licenses, land distribution, government contracts, and tax payments. The construction of a new airport in Nouakchott that opened in 2016 drew criticism—a company with no experience in airport construction won a contract to build the facility through an opaque procurement process.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 21 / 60D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 9 / 16*D1. Are there free and independent media? 2 / 4

Mauritania has a vibrant media landscape, with several privately owned newspapers, television stations, and radio stations in operation. However, journalists who cover sensitive topics or scrutinize the political elite may face harassment, wiretapping, and occasional arrest. Several repressive laws remain on the books, including those criminalizing defamation, the dissemination of "false" information, cybercrime, and blasphemy.

Authorities routinely arrest journalists for critical content they publish. Among other cases during 2021, in January, police in Nouadhibo arrested journalist Salem Kerkoub and two others who helped Kerkoub gather information. Kerkoub had posted on Facebook denouncing fraud in the management of COVID-19 funds.

Mauritania is an Islamic republic. Non-Muslims cannot proselytize or become citizens, and those who convert from Islam to another religion lose their citizenship. In practice, however, non-Muslim communities are not generally targeted with persecution.

Though no one has been executed for apostasy, it is punishable by death. In 2018, the parliament passed a law strengthening capital punishment for certain blasphemy offenses and removing the possibility of repentance to avoid a death sentence. In June 2020, journalist Eby Ould Zeidane was accused of blasphemy after he called for Ramadan to be held on fixed dates. He was released and officially repented the next month.

In July 2021, the government and the religious authorities decided to cancel the Eid al-Kebir prayer, a collective prayer held during a Muslim annual holiday, amidst a surge of COVID-19 cases. In March 2020, authorities ordered the closure of mosques in response to COVID-19, though they were allowed to reopen that May. An imam accused of violating the closure order was arrested in Nouakchott in April 2020, though he was released from detention while awaiting trial the next month.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 3 / 4

Academic freedom is largely respected. However, in 2018, the government instituted a new rule prohibiting high school graduates aged 25 and above to register in public universities. The rule was suspended in late 2019, after police violently dispersed a protest against the policy.

The increasing use of Arabic as the language of instruction in universities has hindered access to education for Black Mauritians, who mainly speak other languages. Student activists sometimes face pressure from university administrators, including threats of expulsion and intimidation.

In November 2021, the parliament passed a law aiming to protect national symbols. The law criminalizes acts associated with the violation of the principles and sanctity of the Islamic religion and the prestige of the State and its symbols, as well as the honor of citizens. The law punishes such acts whether they are committed using media, social media, or other digital communication technology. The opposition criticized the law, arguing that it may serve to further restrict free speech. Individuals have faced reprisals for expressing views critical of the government on social media, including termination of employment from government agencies.

In June 2020, the parliament approved legislation punishing the dissemination of purportedly false news, the creation of false identities online, and other offenses. Offenders can receive prison sentences of up to five years and fines ranging from 50,000 to 200,000 Ouguiya ($1,400 to $5,500).

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 4 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 1 / 4

While the constitution guarantees freedom of assembly, organizers are required to obtain consent from the government for large gatherings, which is often denied. While the government imposed COVID-19-related restrictions on assemblies in March 2020, protests did occur as the year progressed. In 2021, the government reintroduced some public gathering restrictions during two separate rises in coronavirus cases but lifted those measures as case numbers subsided.

In 2021, residents of several villages in southern Mauritania, including Ferallah and Ngawlé, in the Brakna and Trarza regions, respectively, protested against what they view as an unlawful expropriation of their land by the government and other powerful investors. Police harshly repressed participants of a November protest by Ngawlé villagers, arresting nine people.

Nongovernmental organizations (NGOs), particularly antislavery organizations, frequently encounter intimidation, violence, and repression in carrying out their activities.

In January 2021, the parliament passed a new law to replace the Law of Associations of 1964, considerably easing the process to create and register an organization by allowing associations to automatically gain legal status after filing their bylaws with the government. However, the Interior Ministry would be allowed to temporarily suspend associations without notice. In December 2021, the government announced the creation of an online platform for registering associations.

In December 2021, Biram Dah Abeid, the leader of the antislavery movement IRA Mauritania, announced that authorities had officially recognized the movement as a human rights organization. Since its creation in 2008, IRA Mauritania had repeatedly been denied permission to register as an NGO.

The Alliance for the Refoundation of the Mauritanian State, which opposes the country's caste system, has faced government scrutiny. Authorities arrested 14 people who attended its inaugural meetings on two occasions in February 2020. Five were kept in pretrial detention and convicted of "violating the sanctity of God" that October; two received prison sentences shorter than their detention and were released, while the other three were released later that month. Another three received sentences and fines in absentia.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 2 / 4

Workers have the legal right to unionize, but unions require approval from the public prosecutor to operate and often confront hostility from employers. The right to collective bargaining is not always respected, and the government sometimes pressures union members to withdraw their membership. The right to strike is limited by notice requirements and other onerous regulations.

F. RULE OF LAW: 4 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 1 / 4

Mauritania's judiciary lacks independence. The president has the power to unilaterally appoint many key judges, including three of the six judges on the Constitutional Court and the chair of the Supreme Court. The courts are subject to political pressure from the executive branch. Instances of judges facing retaliatory measures for issuing rulings against the government have been reported.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 1 / 4

Due process rights are often not respected in practice. Suspects are frequently arrested without being informed of the charges against them. Lengthy pretrial detentions are common. Arbitrary arrests of opposition politicians, journalists, and human rights activists occur with some frequency.

In May 2021, the police broke into former president Ould Abdel Aziz's residence in search of evidence of embezzlement. Although they reportedly had a search warrant issued by a judge, the search occurred illegally, while neither Ould Abdel Aziz nor his lawyer was present.

Torture and abuse at Mauritania's prisons and detention centers remain problematic, and perpetrators are rarely held accountable. Prisons are plagued by violence, are overcrowded, and lack basic sanitation; food shortages are also common. Children are sometimes held with the adult prison population.

In December 2021, several people who had been arrested in Rosso went on a hunger strike to denounce prison overcrowding and inadequate food. Police frequently beat suspects following their arrest. In May 2020, three police officers were dismissed for assaulting a group they had arrested in Nouakchott, after one of them published a video of the incident online.

Same-sex sexual activity is illegal in Mauritania and punishable by death for men. LGBT+ individuals generally hide their sexual orientation or gender identity due to severe persecution. In January 2020, eight men attending a birthday celebration in a Nouakchott restaurant were arrested for “imitating women,” along with a woman, who received a suspended sentence, and the restaurant’s owner. The owner was acquitted, but the eight other defendants received two-year sentences for charges including indecency in February 2020, after police had described them as “sodomizers” to the court. In early March of that year, an appeals court upheld their convictions but suspended the sentences of seven men and reduced the sentence of the eighth. Racial and ethnic discrimination remains a serious problem.

Sharia law as it is applied in Mauritania discriminates against women. The testimony of two women is equal to that of one man. Female victims of crime are entitled to only half the financial compensation that male victims receive.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 4 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 1 / 4

While the Bidhan population is relatively free to make personal decisions about residence, employment, and education, the choices of Black Mauritians and the Haratin are often constrained by racial and caste-based discrimination. People without government identity cards are not allowed to travel in some regions, which disproportionately affects Black Mauritians.

COVID-19-related restrictions on movement were imposed periodically from March 2020 through 2021 during spikes in the number of coronavirus cases.

Though the law guarantees property rights, these rights are not always enforced in practice, as it can be difficult to get property disputes fairly adjudicated in court. Complex laws and an opaque bureaucracy present challenges to starting a business.

Many Black Mauritians who left their homes in the Senegal River Valley in the wake of the 1989 conflict have returned but have been unable to regain ownership of their land. Local authorities reportedly allow the Bidhan to appropriate land used by the Haratin and Black Mauritians. Residents of villages in southern Mauritania, including Ferallah and Ngawlé, in the Brakna and Trarza regions, respectively, have pushed back against what they see as unlawful expropriation of their land by the government and other powerful investors.

Many girls are married before the age of 18. Female genital mutilation (FGM) is illegal, but the law is rarely enforced, and the practice remains common. Domestic violence and rape remain problems, victims rarely seek legal redress, and convictions for these crimes are rare. Laws banning adultery and morality offenses discourage sexual-assault survivors from reporting incidents to police. Parliament has rejected a bill sanctioning gender-based violence (GBV).

Despite 2015 amendments to the antislavery law, slavery and slavery-like practices remain a challenge, with many former slaves still reliant on their former owners due to racial discrimination, poverty, and other socioeconomic factors. The government cracks down on NGOs that push for greater enforcement of the law and rarely prosecutes perpetrators. However, in July 2020, two slave owners received 10- and 15-year sentences, while a third received a suspended sentence. The court also ordered the government to ensure the legal status of the former slaves and their relatives.

Mauritius

Population: 1,300,000

Capital: Port Louis

Freedom Status: Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Mauritius is home to an open, multiparty system that has allowed for the regular handover of power between parties through free and fair elections. Civil liberties have historically been upheld but have increasingly been called into question. The political leadership remains dominated by a few families and ethnic divisions are increasingly prominent in politics. Corruption is a problem, journalists report increasing limitations and occasional harassment, integration of women into the political system has been slow, and LGBT+ people face threats and discrimination.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- The Militant Socialist Movement (MSM) government indefinitely suspended municipal elections scheduled for June through the Local Government (Amendment) Act 2021, citing the COVID-19 pandemic. Concomitantly, authorities lifted other public health restrictions designed to curb the spread of the virus. As a result, the MSM has maintained power in local government without a mandate.
- In March, three leading opposition representatives were suspended for the remainder of the legislative session for lodging corruption allegations against the prime minister. The speaker of Parliament has on multiple occasions suspended or expelled opposition parliamentarians for publicly alleging corruption by the prime minister since revelations of the Angus Road corruption scandal in 2020.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 36 / 40 (-1)

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 11 / 12 (-1)

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The president, whose role is mostly ceremonial, is elected by the unicameral National Assembly to a five-year term. Pritivirajsing Roopun, a lawmaker from the MSM, was elected president in December 2019, following the previous month's parliamentary elections.

Executive power resides with the prime minister, who is appointed by the president from the party or coalition with the most seats in the legislature. Pravind Jugnauth of the MSM, who had succeeded his father as prime minister when the latter stepped down in 2017, was reinstalled with the success of the MSM in the 2019 elections. Despite numerous opposition challenges in the Supreme Court, the Mauritian Supreme Court and international groups have determined the elections were generally considered credible.

Of the National Assembly's 70 members, 62 are directly elected in 21 constituencies, including 2 members from a constituency representing the autonomous island of Rodrigues. Up to 8 "best losers" are appointed from among unsuccessful candidates who gained the largest number of votes to ensure fair representation of the country's different ethnic communities. The members of the National Assembly serve five-year terms. Rodrigues island has its own elected Regional Assembly.

The MSM's Morisian Alliance won 42 seats in the November 2019 National Assembly elections. The opposition National Alliance, led by former prime minister Navinchandra Ramgoolam's Mauritian Labor Party (PTR), took 17 seats, followed by former prime minister Paul Bérenger's Mauritian Militant Movement (MMM) with 9, and the Organization of the People of Rodrigues (OPR) with 2. Opposition leaders filed court challenges over alleged irregularities, but African Union (AU) election observers concluded that polling was conducted peacefully and professionally. Voter turnout was approximately 77 percent.

The Electoral Supervisory Commission is broadly viewed as impartially supervising the electoral process. There is no law on the financing of electoral campaigns. Long-running discussions on electoral reform and party financing laws have not led to any concrete action as of the end of 2021.

The MSM government indefinitely suspended municipal elections scheduled for June 2021 through the Local Government (Amendment) Act 2021, citing the COVID-19 pandemic. Concomitantly, authorities lifted other public health restrictions designed to curb the spread of the virus. As a result, the MSM has maintained power in local government without a mandate.

Score Change: The score declined from 4 to 3 because the parliament adopted legislation that indefinitely suspended imminent municipal elections allegedly due to public health concerns, even though general public health restrictions were partially lifted.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 15 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 4 / 4

Political parties are generally free to form and operate. More than 70 parties competed in the 2019 elections, only four formed the government.

Former attorney general and PTR member Jayarama Valayden was arrested in May 2021 for violating the Quarantine Act's prohibition on gatherings of more than 10 people. However, Valayden was arrested at a peaceful rally with nearly 100 people, and other such rallies proceeded during the year without arrests. Opposition parties claim authorities used the law to target Valayden.

Since independence, political power has peacefully rotated among the three largest parties—the PTR, the MSM, and the MMM. The MSM has been in power since 2014, when it defeated the PTR.

Voters and candidates are generally able to express their political choices without pressure from actors who are not democratically accountable. However, money plays an important role in politics, and there is no law on the financing of electoral campaigns. The Jugnauth and Ramgoolam families have long-running holds on political leadership positions, which may influence intraparty politics.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 3 / 4

The government officially recognizes four distinct communities: Hindus, Muslims, Sino-Mauritians, and the general population, which includes Mauritian Creoles, Franco-Mauritians, and people of African descent. Ethnic minority groups such as Rodriguais and Chagossians are considered Creole. The Truth and Justice Commission (TJC) and the Equal Opportunities Commission (EOC) sought to ensure that all ethnic minority groups hold equal legal rights and access, though in practice linguistic nationalism has maintained a social hierarchy that marginalizes Mauritian Creoles politically and favors the Hindu majority, who hold most positions of political influence.

Women held 3 of 24 seats in the prime minister's cabinet as of 2021 and are generally underrepresented in politics. Fourteen women secured seats in the 2019 parliamentary elections. Local elections require that at least one-third of political parties' candidates in each district be women. Discrimination against LGBT+ people can discourage their active political participation.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 10 / 12C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 4 / 4

Elected representatives are duly seated, and the government has been able to make policy without interference or major political disruptions.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 3 / 4

The country's anticorruption framework is robust. The Prevention of Corruption Act of 2002 covers most dishonest, fraudulent, and abusive governance practices but is inconsistently applied. Prime Minister Jugnauth has repeatedly come under scrutiny for what is known as the Angus Road corruption scandal, relating to the purchase of land in the early 2000s, which emerged in 2020. That year, the speaker of the parliament suspended or expelled opposition parliamentarians 14 times for publicly alleging corruption by the prime minister. In March 2021, three leading opposition representatives were suspended for the remainder of the legislative session for lodging additional corruption allegations.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 3 / 4

The government openly debates the country's budget in the National Assembly, publishes it and other legislation online and in the press, and maintains a National Open Data

Portal. However, Transparency International has noted concerns about opaque hiring processes that may be affected by nepotism and cronyism. In 2020, the corruption watchdog warned of government opacity in the management of medical supplies during the COVID-19 pandemic, as well as ways in which nepotism led to the Wakashio oil spill. No law provides for individuals' access government information. The prime minister hasn't held open press conferences since August 2020, despite significant crises occurring during that time frame.

In May 2020, the National Assembly passed the Quarantine Act and the COVID-19 Act, which was criticized for increasing the discretionary powers of the prime minister without transparency requirements. Further, under these laws the prime minister does not need to consult with public health officials when setting public health guidelines. Policies instituted under the two laws do not need to incorporate an expiration date (sunset clause) for their implementation.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 50 / 60D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 14 / 16*D1. Are there free and independent media? 3 / 4

The constitution guarantees freedom of expression. Several private daily and weekly publications report on the ruling and opposition parties, but the state-owned Mauritius Broadcasting Corporation's radio and television services generally reflect government viewpoints. A small number of private radio stations compete with the state-run media. The media regulatory agency is within the executive branch and lacks independence. Its sanctions disproportionately target opposition media and under 2018 revisions to the Information and Communication Technologies (ICT) Act, journalists can face prison sentences for content that causes "inconvenience, distress, or anxiety."

Journalists occasionally face legal pressure. One of the main newspapers, L'Express, has faced verbal attacks by authorities, who have also reduced public advertising with the outlet. Its journalists have faced legal and other harassment, though no reporter has been imprisoned and most are broadly perceived as operating freely. L'Express and other media outlets have been barred from or marginalized in state briefings such as those on the 2020 Wakashio oil spill.

Critics fear that amendments proposed to the Independent Broadcasting Authority (IBA) Act in December 2021 could jeopardize the independence of private radio stations, posing a significant threat to press freedom.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 4 / 4

Religious freedom is generally upheld. The government grants subsidies to Hindu, Roman Catholic, Muslim, Anglican, Presbyterian, and Seventh-day Adventist communities, but not to smaller groups, though all religious groups may apply for tax-exempt status. Tensions between Muslim and Hindu communities continue to be reported.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

Academic freedom is generally upheld.

Private discussion is generally unrestricted. However, 2018 amendments to the Information and Communication Technologies (ICT) Act made the online publication of material deemed false, harmful, or illegal punishable by up to 10 years in prison. In 2020 and 2021, multiple individuals were arrested under the ICT Act for expressing criticism of the government and its policies. In the first half of 2021, 153 cases were referred to the government's Cybercrime Unit—which investigates violations of the ICT Act—though the charges were shared with the public.

Proposed amendments to the ICT Act were released in April 2021 that would create government proxy servers through which all encrypted social media traffic must pass, be decrypted, and be stored. A National Digital Ethics Committee (NDEC) would be created in the executive branch and would be empowered to review social media posts and refer individuals for arrest without judicial review.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 11 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

Freedom of assembly is usually upheld, though authorities' responses to some protests have raised concerns in recent years. The May 2020 passages of the COVID-19 Act and Quarantine Act have been cited by some as government overreach. All assembly was banned during the government-imposed lockdown, and provisions of the laws increased policing powers to enforce this provision and others.

In January 2021, authorities deployed security forces that were heavily militarized to intimidate and block peaceful protesters expressing anger over the Wakashio oil spill. However, a peaceful protest against the government was permitted in February 2021, the third such large demonstration since August 2020.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 4 / 4

Civil society groups operate freely. However, many are reliant upon government funding that could compromise their independence.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 3 / 4

Unions regularly meet with government leaders, protest, and advocate for improved compensation and workers' rights. There are more than 300 unions in Mauritius. However, the COVID-19 Act, passed in May 2020, has been criticized for limiting workers' rights, including through reductions of additional pay for night-workers and overtime, annual days of leave, and other protections in the Workers' Rights Act (WRA) of 2019. The law also specifically targets workers earning less than 50,000 Mauritian rupees ($1,303) per month who work in sectors deemed essential and enables employers to bypass union negotiations and make direct requests for the mass termination of workers' contracts to a Redundancy Board created by the WRA; before the Act, employers had to negotiate with unions to find alternatives. Whereas before workers could file a grievance with the Commission for Conciliation and Mediation, under the COVID-19 Act, all decisions are made by the Redundancy Board. If the Board rules in favor of the worker, the worker receives a one-time financial compensation.

F. RULE OF LAW: 13 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 3 / 4

The generally independent judiciary administers a legal system that combines French and British traditions. However, judicial independence has been questioned in some cases involving politicians.

Mauritius has maintained the right of appeal to the Privy Council in London.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 4 / 4

Constitutional guarantees of due process are generally upheld. However, Mauritian criminal law allows for police to charge suspects provisionally and then hold them for months until a formal charge is issued. Due to court backlogs, many of those being held in prison are in pretrial detention, and some detainees reportedly wait years before facing trial.

Mauritius is free from war and insurgencies, and the 2016 Independent Police Complaints Commission (IPCC) was formed to manage complaints. However, allegations of abuses by police continue. Under the Quarantine Act passed in May 2020, police powers were extended to include boarding a ship or aircraft, entering private premises without a warrant, and arresting someone without a warrant believed to be in violation of the Act.

Though the law and the EOC do not allow for discrimination in the workforce, some citizens view economic leadership to be closed to ethnic minority groups. Chagossians and other minorities form an underclass, while Hindu Mauritians are more privileged, albeit within a differentiated ethnic structure with remnants of a caste system. Women generally earn less money than men for equal work.

LGBT+ people face discrimination and the risk of targeted violence. Laws that criminalize same-sex relations remain on the books, even if rarely invoked.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 12 / 16G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

Citizens are generally allowed to move freely within Mauritius, but there are restrictions on travel to the Chagos Islands. Mauritians are free to change their place of residence, employment, and education.

Mauritius is considered among the most business-friendly countries in Africa. However, the Non-Citizen Property Restriction Act limits most noncitizens from owning or acquiring property. Corruption can hamper business activity.

The government generally does not limit social freedoms, though same-sex unions are not recognized. Rape is against the law, but spousal rape is not specifically criminalized. Domestic violence is illegal but remains a significant concern.

In June 2021, Mauritius added provisions to the Quarantine Act requiring all citizens be vaccinated with at least one dose of a COVID-19 vaccine. Penalties for violating the requirement include up to a five-year jail term.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 2 / 4

Women and children are vulnerable to sex trafficking. While the government has made some efforts to prosecute traffickers and provide services to victims, these efforts are generally inadequate.

The position of migrant workers in the manufacturing and construction sectors can be precarious. During the COVID-19 pandemic, Mauritian labor rights advocacy organizations have claimed that the government's rolling back of labor protection laws have led to more exploitation of migrant workers.

Mexico

Population: 128,800,000

Capital: Mexico City

Freedom Status: Partly Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Mexico has been an electoral democracy since 2000, and alternation in power between parties is routine at both the federal and state levels. However, the country suffers from severe rule of law deficits that limit full citizen enjoyment of political rights and civil liberties. Violence perpetrated by organized criminals, corruption among government officials, human rights abuses by both state and nonstate actors, and rampant impunity are among the most visible of Mexico's many governance challenges.

- With nearly 300,000 deaths and 4 million cases, people in Mexico remained severely affected by the COVID-19 pandemic throughout the year, although nearly 63 percent of the population had received at least one vaccine dose by year's end.
- In midterm elections in June, President Andrés Manuel López Obrador's National Regeneration Movement (MORENA) and its coalition allies maintained a majority in the lower house of Mexico's Congress, but lost the supermajority they had held since 2018. MORENA made gains at the state level, with candidates winning 11 of 15 gubernatorial races.
- President López Obrador continued to verbally attack his critics and perceived opponents, including media outlets, civil society organizations, and autonomous state institutions, routinely using inflammatory language.
- Mexico remained one of the most dangerous countries in the world for members of the media. As of November, at least seven reporters had been killed, along with hundreds of threats and attacks attributed to organized crime groups, political officials, and various other actors.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 27 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 9 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 3 / 4

The president is elected to a six-year term and cannot be reelected. Andrés Manuel López Obrador of the left-leaning National Regeneration Movement (MORENA) won the 2018 poll with a commanding 53 percent of the vote. His closest rival, Ricardo Anaya—the candidate of the National Action Party (PAN) as well as of the Democratic Revolution Party (PRD) and Citizens' Movement (MC)—took 22 percent. The results of the 2018 poll represented a stark repudiation of outgoing president Enrique Peña Nieto and the Institutional Revolutionary Party (PRI), which took just 16 percent of the vote.

A 2019 constitutional amendment enables citizens to initiate a recall referendum halfway through the president's term. López Obrador considers the recall an opportunity to reinforce his political authority, and in December 2021 both the Supreme Court and the Federal Electoral Tribunal (TEPJF) ordered the National Electoral Institute (INE) to move forward with planning the referendum for April 2022, despite INE's claim that the state had budgeted insufficient resources to undertake the balloting.

The 2018 election campaign was marked by violence and threats against candidates for state and local offices; at least 145 people died because of election-related violence. Accusations of illicit campaign activities remained frequent at the state and municipal level.

Senators are elected for six-year terms through a mix of direct voting and proportional representation, with at least two parties represented in each state's delegation. In the Chamber of Deputies, the lower house of the bicameral Congress, 300 members are elected through direct representation and 200 through proportional representation, each for three-year terms. Under a reform that took effect for legislators elected in 2018, senators are eligible to serve up to two six-year terms, and deputies are permitted to serve up to four three-year terms.

Since the 2018 elections, the MORENA-led coalition has commanded a majority in the 128-member Senate with 70 seats, compared to 24 for the PAN and 15 for the PRI. In the June 2021 Chamber of Deputies balloting, MORENA won 198 seats; combined with its allies in the Workers' Party (PT) and the Green Party (PVEM), the governing coalition maintained a majority with 278 seats, but lost the supermajority that had allowed it to pursue constitutional changes. The PAN led the opposition, winning 114 seats, while its electoral coalition partners in the PRI and PRD won 70 and 15 seats, respectively.

Accusations of illicit campaign activities are frequent at the state and federal level, and violations reported in 2021 included misuse of public funds, vote buying, and widespread flouting of campaign finance laws.

The INE supervises elections and enforces political party laws, including strict regulations on campaign financing and the content of political advertising, although control is uneven in practice. While the 2018 and 2021 elections were both generally considered free and fair, the INE and the TEPJF struggled to comprehensively address problems including misuse of public funds, vote buying, and non-transparent campaign financing. Throughout 2021, the INE and the TEPJF were subjected to frequent verbal attacks by López Obrador and MORENA supporters, especially after the party's gubernatorial candidates in Guerrero and Michoacán were among the dozens of MORENA candidates disqualified for failing to file campaign spending reports. However, the administration of the June balloting was considered successful.

President López Obrador has extolled the use of referendums known as citizen consultations. In August 2021, only 7 percent of voters turned out for a consultation on whether to initiate investigations into criminal conduct by López Obrador's five immediate presidential predecessors, far below the 40 percent necessary for the poll to be binding.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 13 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 4 / 4

Mexico's multiparty system features few official restrictions on political organization and activity. Opposition parties are competitive in many states, and independent candidacies are becoming more common, though independents achieved few wins in 2021. MORENA includes a wide range of ideological and political currents, and internal tensions were visible during the 2021 campaign. Most opposition parties, meanwhile, base their strategies around mobilizing anti-MORENA sentiment rather than proposing coherent policy agendas.

Nearly half of Mexico's states held gubernatorial elections in 2021. MORENA candidates won in 11 of the 15 races, cementing the party's strength at the subnational level. MORENA officials now govern 16 states and Mexico City. However, opposition candidates demonstrated strength in many urban areas and won a majority of Mexico City's boroughs, reversing previous MORENA dominance in the city.

Power has routinely changed hands at the national level since 2000. The dominant victory of López Obrador and MORENA in 2018 followed six years of government control by the PRI, which had ruled Mexico without interruption from 1929 to 2000, before losing consecutive presidential races to the right-leaning PAN in 2000 and 2006.

In order to avoid fragmenting the anti-MORENA vote in the 2021 elections, the PAN, PRI, and PRD united in an electoral coalition, resulting in increased seat share, though the PRI's precipitous decline at all levels continued. The opposition also made gains in large cities and among middle-class voters, revealing possible shifts in the electorate that could increase competitiveness in subsequent elections.

Criminal groups, while increasingly fragmented, exert powerful influence on the country's politics through threats and violence against candidates, election officials, and campaign workers, particularly at the local level. At least 102 political officials were killed in campaign-related violence during the 2021 election season, including 36 candidates; according to election violence monitoring group Etellekt Consultores, 77 percent of the 1,066 election-linked attacks involved municipal races.

The López Obrador administration has assigned an increasing number of governance tasks to the military, one of Mexico's least accountable institutions. The army is involved in the construction of several of the president's signature projects, and in March 2021 the government announced that the army would maintain control of a tourist railroad in the Yucatán Peninsula known as the Maya Train—and receive any profits—upon the project's completion, heightening concerns about military politicization.

Mexico has a large Indigenous population, and Indigenous people and groups are free to participate in politics. There are some provisions for the integration of Indigenous community customs in electing leaders in some states, though only for local authorities. In practice, Indigenous people remain severely underrepresented in political institutions. Mexico's small Afro-Mexican population is similarly underrepresented in national politics, though they are recognized in the constitution.

The 2018 and 2021 elections confirmed the success of gender requirements for candidacies and party lists: following the 2021 elections, 50 percent of representatives in the Chamber of Deputies and 49 percent in the Senate are women. Women also won an unprecedented six gubernatorial elections in 2021. However, the 2021 elections were marked by controversy surrounding MORENA's gubernatorial candidate in Guerrero, Félix Salgado Macedonio, who faced multiple rape allegations. Women's rights advocates faulted President López Obrador for continuing to support Salgado; following his disqualification for campaign finance violations, his daughter replaced him and was elected governor.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 5 / 12C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 2 / 4

Organized crime and related violence have limited the effective governing authority of elected officials in some areas of the country, as well as of the federal government. Members of organized crime groups have persisted in their attempts to infiltrate local governments in order to plunder municipal coffers and ensure their own impunity, a practice that again influenced electoral dynamics in 2021. The notorious and still unsolved mass disappearance of 43 students in Guerrero in 2014 was linked to a deeply corrupt local government collaborating with a drug gang, as well as corrupt or complicit members of various state security forces. In the most violent regions, the provision of public services has become more difficult, as public sector employees face extortion and pressure to divert public funds.

Official corruption remains a serious problem. The billions of dollars in illegal drug money that enter the country each year from the United States profoundly affect politics, as does rampant public-contract fraud and other forms of siphoning off state funds. Attempts to prosecute officials for alleged involvement in corrupt or criminal activity have often failed due to the weakness of police and judicial capacity.

The López Obrador administration has made the pursuit of corruption a mantra, and a series of prominent figures from the Peña Nieto administration have been indicted or arrested on graft charges. However, critics describe López Obrador's anticorruption efforts as politicized and generally ineffective. Political opponents are arrested with great fanfare, but few convictions have occurred. In contrast, investigations involving government allies and favored institutions are rare or perfunctory, as exemplified by the case of former army chief Salvador Cienfuegos, who was exonerated by prosecutors in January 2021, two months after being returned from the United States, where he had been arrested on drug trafficking charges in October 2020.

Despite some limitations, several freedom of information laws passed since 2002 have successfully strengthened transparency at the federal level, though enforcement is uneven across states. In recent years, the government has failed to release relevant information on some of the country's most controversial issues, including abuses by the security forces. The military, assigned ever-expanding roles under López Obrador, is one of the least transparent state institutions. In September 2021 the National Access to Information Institute (INAI) ordered the quasi-military National Guard to release data on the use of force by its agents, but as of year's end officials had not complied. A November decree shielding public infrastructure projects from transparency and other administrative requirements was vocally denounced by transparency advocates. On several occasions in 2021, President López Obrador suggested shuttering INAI, prompting criticism by transparency advocates.

Throughout the COVID-19 pandemic, government officials were accused of inadequate and incompetent management, including opacity about the virus's true toll; data from the national statistics agency released in August showed far more deaths than federal figures.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 33 / 60 (-1)

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 12 / 16 (-1)

D1. Are there free and independent media? 2 / 4

The security environment for journalists remains highly challenging. Reporters probing police issues, drug trafficking, and official corruption face serious, sustained risk of physical harm. The Committee to Protect Journalists (CPJ) named Mexico the deadliest country for journalists in 2020, and as of November 2021 CPJ had recorded the deaths of at least three journalists in Mexico in connection with their work, with another four killings of reporters and one journalist's disappearance under investigation. Self-censorship has increased, with many newspapers in violent areas avoiding publication of stories concerning organized crime. Press watchdog groups have decried the slow pace of the federal government's special prosecutor for crimes against freedom of expression since the office gained authority in 2013. Several convictions in prominent cases of murdered journalists occurred in 2021, though 90 percent of cases of journalists who are killed are unresolved.

The Federal Protection Mechanism for Human Rights Defenders and Journalists within the Interior Secretariat, created in 2012, has successfully protected hundreds of activists and reporters, providing them safe houses, panic buttons, and bodyguards. However, the mechanism is underfunded and has not always proved effective: according to Article 19, 12 journalists receiving protection were killed between 2016 and June 2021.

Diversity of viewpoints in print and online media remains high, but broadcast television has long been dominated by the duopoly of Televisa and TV Azteca. Media outlets depend on government advertising and subsidies. Congress enacted legislation to regulate the distribution of state publicity in 2018; such advertising subsequently diminished significantly, but distribution remains heavily skewed toward a few of the largest outlets. In September 2021 the Supreme Court ruled that Congress must pass a more detailed rules governing state publicity.

Throughout 2021, López Obrador continued his daily morning news conferences, dominating news cycles and often chastising and demeaning specific reporters and news outlets. In addition, Article 19 has documented an increase in judicial harassment of journalists and activists, with 22 civil and criminal cases registered in the first half of 2021.

Mexico has been at the forefront of citizen-led efforts to ensure internet access. The 2013 amendments to Article 6 of the constitution made access to the internet a civil right. However, gangs have engaged in threats and violence against bloggers and online journalists who report on organized crime.

Religious freedom is protected by the constitution and is generally respected in practice, though religious minorities, particularly Indigenous Evangelical communities in Chiapas, face occasional persecution by local authorities.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 3 / 4 (-1)

While the government has generally refrained from restricting academic freedom, frictions between the government and the academic community rose sharply in 2021, with President López Obrador and other officials frequently stigmatizing universities as “neoliberal” institutions whose political orientation had “moved right.” More ominously, in August prosecutors began requesting arrest orders against 31 academic scientists for allegedly misusing public funds. Amid domestic and international outcry over the seemingly disproportionate charges—which included organized crime and money laundering—judges denied the requests, but academics and free expression advocates warned of an increasing atmosphere of intimidation facing university researchers and administrators. In November, students at a prestigious public university, the Center for Economic Teaching and Research, initiated a series of protests challenging the irregular appointment of new administrators perceived to be aligned with the government and arbitrary dismissals of several professors.

Score Change: The score declined from 4 to 3 due to repeated attacks on academic freedom in Mexican universities, including the launch of criminal investigations against dozens of academic scientists on disproportionate charges.

While there are no formal impediments to free and open discussion, fear of criminal monitoring restricts citizens’ willingness to converse publicly about crime in some areas of the country.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 7 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 3 / 4

The constitution guarantees the right to peacefully assemble. Protests are frequent, though political and civic expression is restricted in some regions, and police frequently use excessive force and detain protesters arbitrarily.

During the López Obrador administration, controversy regarding protest-related violence has often centered on women’s rights demonstrations. In March 2021, several thousand women protested against violence against women and other forms of gender discrimination in Mexico City, resulting in clashes with police that left dozens of police and protesters injured; a march in support of abortion rights in September ended with a similar toll.

Although highly active, nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) sometimes face violent resistance; the Office of the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights counted 10 activist deaths by September 2021. Environmental activists and representatives of Indigenous groups contesting large-scale infrastructure projects have been particularly vulnerable. Revelations emerged in 2017 that government agencies had purchased the infamous Israeli Pegasus spyware to potentially surveil the electronic communications of numerous civil society activists; in 2021, activists continued to demand consequences amid ongoing investigative delays and news of additional potential victims.

The Federal Protection Mechanism for Human Rights Defenders and Journalists has provided physical security for hundreds of activists since its 2012 inception, though rights groups consider it sluggish and subject to government neglect.

Civil society members freely criticize state policies, but López Obrador's penchant for dismissing criticism and insulting perceived opponents generated ongoing tension between the president and civil society organizations throughout 2021.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 2 / 4

Trade union membership has diminished significantly in recent decades. In 2019 major labor reform brought hope of an end to the rampant use of informal, nontransparent negotiations between employers and politically connected union leaders creating "protection contracts" never seen by workers. Labor rights provisions of the 2020 United States-Mexico-Canada free trade agreement have facilitated workers' demands against abusive employers and complicit unions. In May 2021 the United States demanded review of a vote on an alleged protection contract at a General Motors plant in Guanajuato; following the determination that voting conditions were unfair, an August revote resulted in the rejection of the contract.

F. RULE OF LAW: 5 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 2 / 4

The Supreme Court (SCJN) has been regarded in recent years as generally independent, but a series of appointments of justices viewed as close to the government has raised concerns about diminished autonomy under López Obrador. Such concerns persisted in 2021, with judicial independence advocates vocally objecting to an April 2021 law extending by two years the term of Arturo Zaldívar—viewed as an ally of President López Obrador—as president of the Supreme Court. Following months of criticism, Zaldívar announced in August that he would not extend his term past its originally scheduled end.

Mexico's justice system is plagued by delays, unpredictability, and corruption, which often lead to impunity for perpetrators of crimes. Implementation of an adversarial system was technically completed in 2016 and generated some improvements, but judicial system capacity remains inadequate. A lack of political commitment to prosecutorial autonomy and disinterest in deep reform has limited the efficacy of a 2018 overhaul of the prosecutorial services. Attorney General Alejandro Gertz Manero was subject to increasing criticism in 2021 as frustration mounted with the contrast between the agency's lethargy in prominent matters including corruption and disappearance cases and its punitive zeal in pursuit of organized crime charges against scientists and other matters in which Gertz took personal interest.

Widespread bribery, limited capacity, and weak coordination undermine the integrity of the lower courts and law enforcement agencies. According to a September 2021 government report, the vast majority of crimes committed in 2020 went unreported, largely because underpaid police were viewed as either inept or in league with criminals. Widely publicized raids often result in the release of accused criminals due to grave procedural deficiencies. Amid faltering efforts to improve investigative and prosecutorial competence and efficacy, the López Obrador administration has sought to harden penalties and limit defendants' rights, producing a sharp rise in the use of preventive detention and a rapidly increasing rate of prisoners in pretrial detention, most of whom are poor people charged with minor crimes.

Mexicans are subject to the threat of violence at the hands of multiple actors, including individual criminals, criminal gangs that operate with impunity, and police officers who are often susceptible to bribery. A missing-persons registry—which continues to grow despite increased government efforts in recent years—reflects an epidemic of enforced disappearances. Mexicans in police or military custody are at risk of torture by the authorities, and must also navigate a prison system that respects neither due process nor physical safety.

Abuses during arrests and criminal investigations are rife, and detainees report routine physical abuse while being detained and held. The 2017 General Law on Torture established a prohibition on the use of torture and disqualified evidence obtained through its use. Though it has contributed to mild progress in excluding torture-based confessions from prosecutions, impunity remains almost universal.

Human rights advocates consistently express concern about a lack of accountability for abuses committed by members of the military, including torture, forced disappearances, and extrajudicial executions. Only a handful of soldiers have been convicted in civilian courts for abuses against civilians, despite myriad NGO and National Human Rights Commission (CNDH) reports implicating state security forces in grave human rights abuses. In April 2021, 30 Navy members were arrested in connection with a burst of dozens of murders and disappearances allegedly perpetrated by Navy units in Nuevo Laredo in 2018.

Forced disappearances and killings remain a crisis in Mexico, despite recent efforts to be more responsive to victims. The 2017 General Law on Disappearances removed the statute of limitations on missing-persons crimes, but progress remains very limited. As of the end of 2021, cases in the national registry numbered over 95,000, while an August report by a coalition of victims groups described a backlog of at least 52,000 unidentified remains. A September report by the Washington Office on Latin America covering 26 states found only 25 convictions on disappearance charges between 2018 and 2020, while federal prosecutors have made even fewer advances.

The kidnapping and presumed deaths of 43 students in Guerrero in 2014 remains a watershed case. President López Obrador created a presidential commission to investigate the case after taking office, and in 2019 a new special prosecutor was assigned to manage it. Slow advances continued in 2021, but the truth about the missing students' fates remained unknown at year's end.

As in previous years, the government's primary response to insecurity hotspots was the deployment of militarized forces. In 2019, a law pushed by President López Obrador established a nominally civilian-led gendarmerie that drew from the Army, Navy, and federal police. This National Guard has been sharply criticized by rights advocates for reinforcing the militarization of public security. Although the force is legally required to undergo a process of civilianization, there was no indication of progress in this direction in 2021.

Homicides have plateaued in recent years, but remained near historic highs in 2021. Violence linked to organized crime was particularly acute in Zacatecas, Baja California, and Colima, while Michoacán was characterized by intense localized violence throughout the year. While large organizations like the Jalisco New Generation Cartel (CJNG) and the Sinaloa Cartel continue to drive insecurity in some areas, the splintering of other criminal groups, along with the diversification of their revenue sources, has made efforts to combat the violence even more daunting.

Mexican prisons remain highly unsafe, with inmates commonly engaging in criminal activity while incarcerated. Fears about the spread of COVID-19 in overcrowded prisons provided impetus to pass the Amnesty Law in April 2020, but the measure was limited in scope, and in its first year it benefited only 5 prisoners.

Mexican law bans discrimination based on ethnic origin, gender, age, religion, and sexual orientation. Nevertheless, lighter-skinned Mexicans enjoy substantial social advantage compared to Indigenous people and other distinct groups. The large Indigenous population experiences social and economic discrimination, and approximately 77 percent of Indigenous people live in poverty. Southern states with high concentrations of Indigenous residents suffer from deficient services, a problem that had particularly negative health consequences during the COVID-19 pandemic. Because Indigenous groups are in particular danger from criminal violence, communities in Guerrero and Michoacán have formed self-defense groups, some of which were subsequently legalized. In 2021, a sharp rise in organized crime threats and violence targeting Indigenous communities prompted a wave of self-defense group formation in Chiapas. Afro-Mexicans face discrimination, though the 2020 census included an option for Afro-Mexican self-identification for the first time.

LGBT+ people have strong legal protections, but they are not uniformly enforced. Transgender women in particular face discrimination and violence.

Migrants from Central America and other regions, many of whom move through Mexico to reach the United States, have long faced persecution and criminal predation. The López Obrador administration initially sought to protect migrants, but reversed course in 2019 under United States threats of punitive economic measures. In response, the National Guard was ordered to block or arrest migrants moving northward, a policy that led to both record detentions and numerous complaints of serious rights abuses in 2021. In January the bodies of 19 murder victims, including multiple migrants, were found in Tamaulipas, leading to February murder charges against 12 Tamaulipas police officers.

The combination of increasing migration and a series of United States policies, including the 2019 Migrant Protection Protocols (MPP) and the rapid deportations implemented in response to the COVID-19 pandemic, have resulted in tens of thousands of people stranded in border cities like Ciudad Juárez and Nuevo Laredo and facing extreme risk of kidnapping and extortion. The COVID-19 pandemic exacerbated harsh migrant shelter conditions. The government has made some remediation efforts, but conditions along the border remained highly precarious throughout 2021.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 9 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 3 / 4

Citizens are generally free to change their place of residence, employment, or education. However, criminals have impeded freedom of movement by blocking major roads in several states in recent years, and ordinary citizens avoid roads in many rural areas after dark.

Property rights in Mexico are protected by a modern legal framework, but the weakness of the judicial system, frequent solicitation of bribes by bureaucrats and officials, and the high incidence of criminal extortion harm security of property for many individuals and businesses. Large-scale development projects, including high-priority López Obrador initiatives, have been accompanied by corruption and rights-related controversy in recent years, exemplified in 2021 by the ongoing dispute over the Maya Train.

Sexual abuse and domestic violence against women are common, and perpetrators are rarely punished. Implementation of a 2007 law designed to protect women from such crimes remains halting, particularly at the state level, and impunity is the norm for the killers of hundreds of women each year. State authorities can issue “gender alerts” that trigger greater scrutiny and an influx of resources to combat an epidemic of violence against women, but the mechanism has proven ineffective. According to official statistics, femicides and rapes rose in the first 11 months of 2021.

The government has made some efforts to combat violence and promote gender equality, but the López Obrador administration has also cut funding for women’s services and in 2021, as in previous years, the president frequently dismissed feminists as allies of the political opposition.

Abortion has been a contentious issue in recent years. Many states reacted to Mexico City’s 2007 liberalization of abortion laws by strengthening their own criminal bans on the procedure. In a landmark ruling in September 2021, the Supreme Court declared laws criminalizing abortion unconstitutional, though state-by-state legislative reforms or judicial challenges will be required to give the ruling effect beyond the four states that had already legalized the procedure.

Mexico has taken steps toward equality for LGBT+ people, though significant cultural and legal barriers persist. A 2015 Supreme Court decision overruled state laws defining the purpose of marriage as procreation. Following a decree by the Guanajuato state executive in December 2021, 26 states had legalized same-sex marriage. In September 2021, Morelos became the 15th state to allow gender changes on identification documents.

Economic opportunity is limited in Mexico, which maintains a high rate of economic inequality. Migrant agricultural workers face brutally exploitative conditions in several northern states. In 2018, the Supreme Court ruled that Mexico’s millions of domestic workers—the vast majority of whom are women—must be incorporated into the formal sector and receive social security and health benefits. The López Obrador administration has increased some forms of redistributive spending, and in recent years has sharply increased Mexico’s minimum wage.

Mexico is a major source, transit, and destination country for trafficking in persons, including women and children, many of whom are subject to forced labor and sexual exploitation. Organized criminal gangs are heavily involved in human trafficking in Mexico and into the United States. This danger has been exacerbated since 2019 by the United States’ denial of entry to migrants and asylum seekers, which has forced thousands of migrants to wait in dangerous nearby cities, as well as by the economic disruption associated with the COVID-19 pandemic.

Micronesia

Population: 100,000

Capital: Palikir

Freedom Status: Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: The Federated States of Micronesia (FSM) is a relatively stable democracy that holds regular, competitive elections. However, secessionist movements have sometimes unsettled the country's politics and threatened its unity. The judiciary is independent, and civil liberties are generally respected. Ongoing problems include underreporting of domestic violence and the exploitation of migrant workers.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- In February, the FSM announced that it would move to end its membership in the Pacific Islands Forum along with four other member states. The group announced its intention to depart after the Republic of the Marshall Islands candidate for secretary-general was not selected for the post. The decision to leave will take effect in 2022.
- In March, all 10 incumbents holding single-member seats in Congress were reelected.
- In July, Palikir and Washington reached an agreement on the construction of a US military base in the FSM.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 37 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 12 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The president is both chief of state and head of government and receives assistance from the vice president. Both offices are indirectly elected for four-year terms by members of Congress, with candidates from among the legislature's four at-large, directly elected state representatives, known as senators. In March 2019, David Panuelo, the senator representing the state of Pohnpei, was chosen as president, defeating incumbent Peter Christian. Vice President Yosiwo George was reelected.

Each of the four states (Yap, Chuuk, Pohnpei, and Kosrae) has its own elected governor.

The 14-member unicameral Congress includes four senators, one from each state, who serve four-year terms and are elected by proportional representation. Another 10 members serve two-year terms in single-member districts allocated by population. Each state also has its own elected legislature. All 10 single-member incumbents in Congress won reelection in the March 2021 midterm elections.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 4 / 4

Elections in the FSM, which are generally considered free and fair, are administered by a government agency headed by a national election director and one commissioner from each state. Constitutional amendments must be approved by three-quarters of voters in at least three of the four states.

The FSM's fourth Constitutional Convention was convened in January 2020 but went into recess that March due to COVID-19. It remained in recess as of December 2021. However, proposals to allow dual citizenship and introduce lowered thresholds for referendums will be considered by voters in 2022.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 15 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 4 / 4

There are no formal political parties, but there are no restrictions on their formation. All candidates run as independents.

The FSM has an established record of democratic power transfers. Under an informal agreement, the presidency has typically rotated among the four states, but Congress has sometimes deviated from this pattern.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 4 / 4

Traditional leaders and institutions exercise significant influence in society, especially at the village level. However, neither these nor donor countries like the United States and China exert undue control over the political choices of voters or candidates. Investments from United States and China have been met with pushback in recent years, as citizens are concerned about how those funds might impinge upon the FSM's political, economic, and cultural independence.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 3 / 4

Women and minority groups formally have full political rights, and they are free to participate in practice, though women's political engagement is limited to some extent by discriminatory attitudes. The FSM remains one of the few countries in the world with no women in its national legislature. A small number of women were elected to state-level legislatures.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 10 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 4 / 4

Elected officials determine and implement policy and legislation at the federal level, though considerable authority is vested in the states and their elected governments. Some leading politicians from Chuuk, by far the most populous state, have advocated independence from the FSM in recent years, and the issue remained a topic of public discussion under the guidance of the Chuuk Political Status Commission. Opponents of Chuuk's secession have argued that its separation from the FSM would be unconstitutional. A referendum was planned for 2019 but was delayed that year and again in 2020; it is now scheduled for 2022.

The FSM relies on defense guarantees and economic assistance from the United States under a 1986 Compact of Free Association (CFA), which extends through 2023. In 2019, the funding and security commitments of the CFA were reaffirmed by the United States. In July 2021, Palikir and Washington reached an agreement on the construction of a US military base in the FSM.

China has become an increasingly important partner for trade and development aid in recent years, though its role does not amount to an undue interference in FSM governance and citizens and officials have been wary of it becoming so.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 3 / 4

Official corruption is a problem and a source of public discontent. Complaints about misuse of public resources are frequent, particularly from US authorities overseeing aid funds. Government entities responsible for combating corruption, including the attorney general's office and public auditor, are independent and fairly effective, though some corrupt officials reportedly enjoy impunity.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 3 / 4

Government operations and legislative processes are generally transparent, though there is no comprehensive law guaranteeing public access to government information. Limited technical capacity and the country's sprawling geography pose practical barriers to openness and accountability in the FSM. Officials are not legally obliged to submit asset disclosures.

In 2020, the Chuuk Office of the Public Auditor warned that records related to the state debt-relief fund were improperly maintained, and that financial statements did not fully report liabilities to the public.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 55 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 16 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 4 / 4

The news media operate freely. Print outlets include government-published newsletters and several small, privately owned weekly and monthly newspapers. There are several radio stations, cable television is available, and satellite television is increasingly common. The FSM's internet penetration rate stood at 35.3 percent as of January 2021.

Lack of resources is a problem for the broadcasting of important meteorological forecasts for the population of Chuuk, which will face rising sea levels and extreme weather events.

Religious freedom is generally respected, and religious groups are not required to register with the government. About 96 percent of the population is Roman Catholic or Protestant. A small Ahmadi Muslim community has reported some instances of discrimination and vandalism. Intolerance for non-Christian religions in several states is a growing concern.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

The educational system is free from extensive indoctrination.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 4 / 4

The constitution guarantees freedom of expression, and there are no significant constraints on this right in practice. The government does not improperly monitor personal communications or social media activity.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 11 / 12E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

Freedom of assembly is constitutionally protected. Demonstrations typically proceed peacefully.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 4 / 4

Citizens are free to organize in civic groups, and a number of students' and women's organizations are active.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 3 / 4

Union rights are generally respected, and there are no laws to prevent workers from forming unions, engaging in collective bargaining, or striking. However, such activities are not specifically protected or regulated by law, and few employers are large enough to support unionization in practice.

F. RULE OF LAW: 15 / 16F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 4 / 4

The judiciary is independent. The chief justice, who administers the judicial system, and the associate justices of the Supreme Court are appointed by the president with the approval of a two-thirds majority in Congress. They are appointed for life-long terms and cannot be removed arbitrarily.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 4 / 4

The police respect legal safeguards against arbitrary arrest and detention, and defendants are generally provided with basic due process guarantees surrounding trials and appeals. However, a shortage of lawyers may sometimes impair detainees' access to counsel in practice.

Criminal activity does not pose a major threat to physical security, though police have struggled to deal with illegal fishing. Mistreatment of individuals in custody is known to occur.

In October 2019, the acting attorney general on Yap, American Rachelle Bergeron, was murdered; her murder was allegedly connected to her efforts against human trafficking in the FSM. Frances Choay Buchun and Anthony Rutun Teteeth were accused of conspiring to murder Bergeron that month, though the trial against them was delayed due to the COVID-19 pandemic; they remained in custody as of September 2021. Several people of interest have also been identified after Bergeron's murder. Status hearings on the Bergeron case have been held, though little progress has been made on its ultimate adjudication.

The constitution gives citizens equal protection under the law and prohibits discrimination based on race, ancestry, national origin, gender, sexual orientation, language, or social status. In 2018, Congress passed a landmark law prohibiting discrimination based on sexual orientation, which then president Christian signed. However, the law did not mention gender identity, leaving transgender people vulnerable to continued discrimination.

Half as many women enjoy formal employment as do men, and women generally participate far less in the formal and informal labor markets.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 13 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

Freedom of movement is generally respected. Under the CFA, Micronesians are free to travel to the United States without visas for residence, education, and employment. Many Micronesians have migrated to US Pacific states or territories such as Hawaii and Guam.

Travel out of the FSM was severely impacted by COVID-19-related measures. Inbound travel was effectively halted by March 2020 but limited repatriation has since been allowed. Outbound travel restrictions ended that November.

Property rights are protected by law, and individuals are able to operate private businesses; most such enterprises are small and family-owned in practice. Property and business rights are somewhat restricted for foreigners. Noncitizens are legally prohibited from owning land, and a number of regulations limit the kinds of businesses that they can own and operate.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 3 / 4

Personal social freedoms are largely protected. However, there are no specific laws against spousal rape, and both rape and domestic violence are rarely prosecuted due to societal inhibitions against reporting such crimes. The FSM's first support center for survivors of gender-based violence (GBV) opened in Chuuk in 2020.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 3 / 4

Forced labor is prohibited, and the government enforces basic standards for working conditions in the formal sector. Foreign migrant workers nevertheless remain vulnerable to exploitative labor practices, including on foreign fishing vessels in FSM waters. Micronesian women are at risk of sex trafficking.

The 2021 edition of the US State Department's Trafficking in Persons Report noted the government's efforts to address trafficking, but also reported that traffickers received light sentences and that efforts to support survivors were insufficient.

Moldova

Population: 3,500,000

Capital: Chişinău

Freedom Status: Partly Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Note: The numerical scores and status listed above do not reflect conditions in Transnistria, which is examined in a separate report. Freedom in the World reports assess the level of political rights and civil liberties in a given geographical area, regardless of whether they are affected by the state, nonstate actors, or foreign powers. Disputed territories are sometimes assessed separately if they meet certain criteria, including boundaries that are sufficiently stable to allow year-on-year comparisons. For more information, see the report methodology and FAQ.

Overview: Moldova has a competitive electoral environment, and freedoms of assembly, speech, and religion are mostly protected. Nonetheless, pervasive corruption in the government sector, links between major political figures and powerful economic interests, as well as critical deficiencies in the justice sector and the rule of law continue to hamper democratic governance.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- In April, President Maia Sandu dissolved Parliament after a protracted disagreement between key political parties and the Constitutional Court. Snap parliamentary elections were held in July, resulting in the election of a stable parliamentary majority led by the Action and Solidarity Party (PAS) under Prime Minister Natalia Gavrilita.
- The COVID-19 pandemic remained a serious health concern throughout the year; more than 230,000 cases and over 7,000 deaths were recorded between January and December.
- In December, the Council of Europe's Venice Commission cautioned the government about proposed legislation aimed at reducing corruption in the country's highest courts, finding that the amendments did not establish actionable measures that would increase confidence in judicial integrity or enhance public trust in the judiciary.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 27 / 40 (+1)

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 10 / 12 (+1)

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The president is elected by direct popular vote for up to two consecutive four-year terms. If no candidate receives more than 50 percent of the votes in the first round, the two leading candidates compete in a second round. Former premier Maia Sandu of the PAS defeated incumbent president Igor Dodon in the two-round November 2020 contest. Sandu won 57.7 percent of the second-round vote, while Dodon won 42.3 percent. Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE) observers called the election competitive, but reported that electoral authorities did not investigate allegations of first-round irregularities.

A prime minister nominated by the president and confirmed by Parliament holds most executive authority. Following snap parliamentary elections in July 2021, Natalia Gavrilita of the PAS was confirmed as prime minister in August. The election was generally regarded to be free and fair.

Voters elect the 101-seat unicameral Parliament to four-year terms. In February 2019, Moldova held its first parliamentary elections using a mixed electoral system, under which 51 lawmakers were elected in single-member constituencies through the first-past-the-post system and 50 were elected through proportional representation from closed party lists in one national constituency.

In April 2021, the Constitutional Court found sufficient grounds to allow Sandu to dissolve the incumbent Parliament following the December 2020 resignation of former prime minister Ion Chicu. Snap elections were held in July 2021, and saw the PAS win 63 parliamentary seats, constituting a majority. In addition to the PAS majority, one electoral bloc and one party are represented in Parliament: the Electoral Bloc of Communists and Socialists with 32 seats, and the Eurosceptic Sor Party with 6 seats.

OSCE observers considered the elections well administered, competitive, and largely respectful of fundamental freedoms, but noted the negative impact that media bias, a lack of effective campaign finance oversight, inadequate legal frameworks for electoral dispute resolution, and weak judicial independence had on impartiality and trust in the electoral process.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 3 / 4 (+1)

The July 2021 parliamentary elections marked a return to an electoral system based on proportional representation, and saw fewer irregularities than in the February 2019 parliamentary elections, which had been administered using a mixed system featuring both single-member constituencies and seats allocated proportionally by party lists.

The OSCE election observation mission found the legal framework governing the 2021 elections to be in line with international good practice, and commended the implementation of key revisions, including lowering thresholds for party registration and strengthening the gender quota for candidate lists, in line with previous recommendations. However, the mission recommended further improvements to the legislation, including to the framework on the complaints and appeals process and campaign finance oversight.

Both lower-level electoral commissions and the Central Electoral Commission (CEC) performed well overall in the July 2021 elections, and the election administration was generally considered trustworthy, according to the OSCE election observation mission. However, key decisions made by the CEC appeared to follow partisan lines, including decisions regarding the number of polling stations to be established abroad and for voters residing in Transnistria, as well as on issues of voter transportation.

While confidence in electoral administration improved in 2021, the CEC continues to face allegations of improper conduct, including the exclusion of the opposition from the CEC leadership selection process and irregular interference in local elections.

Score Change: The score improved from 2 to 3 because the July parliamentary elections were administered under a reformed legal framework and featured fewer irregularities than in previous years.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 12 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 3 / 4

Political party legislation in Moldova is generally liberal, but does include restrictions.

In February 2020, the Constitutional Court ruled that the requirement for parties seeking registration to enlist a minimum of 4,000 members coming from at least half of Moldovan districts was unconstitutional, and ordered Parliament to revise the Law on Political Parties. Parliament amended the legislation in July 2020, reducing the minimum number of party members to 1,000 and removing the requirement for members to represent at least half of Moldovan districts.

Following the adoption of these amendments, 20 political parties, 2 electoral blocs and an independent candidate ran in the July 2021 parliamentary elections, representing a significant increase in participating parties compared to the previous election. However, though requirements for legal party registration have been eased, the amended party-registration restrictions still disproportionately affect regional, municipal, and local parties, as well as parties representing geographically concentrated ethnolinguistic minorities (for example, Gagauzians and Bulgarians).

Opposition parties have a strong presence in Parliament and other elected offices, and can gain support through elections.

Following the July 2021 snap parliamentary elections, the PAS, formerly an opposition party, gained a majority in Parliament, returning the Socialist Party to opposition status.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 2 / 4

Oligarchs and business interests strongly influence and corrupt national and local political institutions, undermining political accountability.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 3 / 4

Women and members of ethnic, religious, and other minority groups do not face direct legal barriers to political participation, though representation of women, people with disabilities, and members of the Romany minority has historically been low. However, despite social and historical obstacles, several members of Moldova's ethnic minorities, including Gagauzian, Bulgarian, and Roma hold parliamentary seats, and women's participation in Parliament and in high level political positions has significantly increased in recent years.

The president, prime minister, and head of the CEC are all women, and in 2021, 40 women gained seats in Parliament, setting a new national record. Women now comprise 40 percent of the legislative body, in line with the qualified gender quota adopted by Moldova's Parliament in 2016, which mandates that women must make up a minimum of 40 percent of every party's candidates and of cabinet nominees.

LGBT+ people organize and advocate for equal rights, but are discouraged from political engagement due to harassment.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 5 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 3 / 4

Since the appointment of a new government under the leadership of Natalia Gavrilita in July 2021, governmental policies have generally been determined at the legislative level. However, despite holding a nonexecutive, nonpartisan office, President Sandu actively participates in policy setting and public administration processes.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 1 / 4

Corruption remains entrenched in all levels of government, and existing anticorruption laws are inadequately enforced. Moldova is still recovering from a 2014 banking scandal, in which $1 billion was stolen. In 2016, former prime minister Vlad Filat received a nine-year prison sentence in connection with the scandal, but was conditionally paroled in December 2019. Two key actors in the fraud, oligarchs Vladimir Plahotniuc and Ilan Șor, left Moldova in 2019, and attempts at securing their extradition have been repeatedly frustrated.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 1 / 4

Although the government formed in July 2021 appears to be more transparent than its predecessors, serious issues, including the late publication of plans, draft policies, and bills for consultation, persist. Efforts to transparently appoint public officials have been marred by procedural failures and allegations of political bias.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 35 / 60D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 12 / 16*D1. Are there free and independent media? 2 / 4

The media environment is dominated by outlets connected to political parties and oligarchs. With few exceptions, nationally broadcasting television stations are owned by people affiliated with political parties. Reporters have previously faced difficulty accessing publicly important information and threats of legal action from public figures and politicians.

In September 2021, public trust in media independence was further undermined when Natalia Morari, a well-known investigative journalist and cofounder of the nonprofit television network TV8, was discovered to be involved in a personal relationship with Veaceslav Platon, a wealthy businessman who has been charged with a wide range of financial crimes.

Legal changes made to the Code of Audiovisual Media Services in November and December 2021 allowed Parliament to establish control over the public broadcaster Teleradio-Moldova and to restructure the Audiovisual Council with three appointees from Parliament, two civil society appointees, one presidential appointee, and one governmental appointee. These amendments drew criticism from Moldova's National Anticorruption Center (NAC) and the European Broadcasting Union (EBU) on the grounds that such changes compromise media independence and encourage politicization of the media.

While the constitution proclaims religious freedom and separation of state from religion, the law also provides special status to the Moldovan Orthodox Church. Orthodox symbols have been placed in public institutions, and Orthodox churches are sometimes present within public hospitals and some schools.

In June 2021, the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR) ruled that the government had violated the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR), to which it is a signatory, in ordering the dissolution of the Falun Gong religious organization in Moldova and banning its symbol, which is known as the Falun.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 3 / 4

Academic freedom is generally respected in Moldova. However, the Orthodox Church strongly indoctrinates the Moldovan educational system, with educational officials at all levels frequently promoting the church and Orthodox beliefs.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 4 / 4

Individuals are generally able to engage in discussions of a political nature without fear of retribution.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 8 / 12E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 3 / 4

Freedom of assembly is constitutionally guaranteed and mostly upheld in practice. While some COVID-19-related limitations remained in place throughout 2021, public gatherings, including opposition protests, were generally permitted.

However, past instances of police violence and politically motivated arrests have at times infringed upon individuals' right to freely assemble. In September 2021, the European Court of Human Rights ordered Moldova to pay damages to members of the Petrenco group, associates of opposition politician Grigore Petrenco who were detained following a 2015 opposition rally and prohibited from attending future public gatherings, finding that the group's right to freely assemble had been unlawfully restricted. And in July 2020, during a veterans' protest, several participants were arrested and beaten by security forces in front of the Parliament building in Chișinău.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 3 / 4

The nongovernmental organization (NGO) sector is active and largely operates without undue restriction.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 2 / 4

Trade unions do not encounter major obstacles in Moldova. However, trade unions are not active or visible, and do not play an active role in protecting workers' rights.

F. RULE OF LAW: 6 / 16F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 1 / 4

Moldova's judicial branch continues to be highly susceptible to political pressures that hamper its independence, and judicial appointment processes lack transparency.

In October 2021, General Prosecutor Alexandr Stoianoglo was arrested on charges relating to corruption and abuse of power. After his arrest and removal from office, Stoianoglo suggested that the decision to levy these charges against him was politically motivated, though PAS officials deny that allegation.

In December, the Council of Europe's Venice Commission issued an opinion on amendments made to the legal procedures used to select administrative officials for the judiciary, including the Superior Council of Prosecutors, Moldova's supreme prosecutorial governance body. The commission found that the amendments did not provide actionable measures that would increase confidence in judicial integrity or enhance public trust in the judiciary.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 1 / 4

Due process rights are poorly upheld in the Moldovan justice system. Lengthy pretrial detentions are common.

A criminal trial against Ilan Șor, who was accused of involvement in the 2014 banking scandal and fled Moldova in 2019, is still ongoing, but court hearings have been repeatedly postponed.

In September 2021, the European Court of Human Rights ruled that Moldova had violated the ECHR in the arbitrary detention of seven Moldovan nationals known as the Petrenco group following an opposition rally in 2015. The court also ruled that five of the group members had been unlawfully restricted in their right to freely assemble.

Prisoners and detainees face maltreatment and torture, and those who engage in such behavior face little consequence. Individuals responsible for 2009 acts of torture and maltreatment against postelection protesters remain largely uninvestigated and unsentenced. Those involved in the case of Andrei Braguța, who died in police custody in 2017 after a traffic violation, have not yet been adequately sentenced.

Overcrowding and inhumane conditions are common in Moldovan prisons. Health care in pretrial and penitentiary institutions remains poor. COVID-19 clusters were identified in some of these facilities as the pandemic progressed.

The 2012 Moldovan Law on Ensuring Equality provides a framework for preventing and addressing discrimination. The law's main operational body, the Equality Council, has been praised for effective work and principled stance on difficult and complex discrimination issues, but has been underfunded by successive governments.

Women, persons with disabilities, Roma people, linguistic minorities, Muslims and other non-Orthodox believers, people of African and Asian descent, older persons, and LGBT+ people often face employment discrimination. Some of these groups also face discrimination in education, housing, and public service. Hate speech against minority groups is often promoted by some media outlets and public figures.

Schools and universities generally do not provide education in the Ukrainian, Gagauz, Bulgarian, or Romani languages. Low-quality public schools in the south, populated by many Gagauzians and Bulgarians, often fail to prepare graduates for admission to Romanian-language universities.

In June 2021, a violent conflict broke out between the Romany community and the non-Romany population in the town of Otaci; after several days of unrest, which had allegedly gone unchecked by local police, an intervention by Moldovan special forces was able to restore peace. The Belgium-based European Roma Rights Center (ERRC) has requested that Moldovan authorities carry out an impartial investigation into the conflict, noting possible racial motivations for the violence.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 9 / 16G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 3 / 4

The law protects freedom of internal movement and foreign travel, and the government generally respects these rights. There are no formal restrictions on the right to change one's place of employment or education, but bribery is not uncommon in educational institutions. Travel to Transnistria is subject to checks by the de facto territorial authorities.

While Moldovan authorities issued largely proportional COVID-19-related movement restrictions, large fines were sometimes issued for those who violated them.

Although Moldovan law guarantees property rights, they are undermined by a weak and corrupt judiciary. Widespread corruption affects fair competition and normal business activity. Allies of powerful individuals have been accused of benefiting economically from selective enforcement of business regulations. Some businesses also reported receiving arbitrary COVID-19-related fines.

Most personal social freedoms are protected, but domestic violence and sexual abuse are common. A 2016 report by several Moldovan NGOs found that more than 63 percent of women and girls over the age of 15 had experienced some form of gender-based violence in their lifetime, while over 20 percent of men admitted to having had nonconsensual sex with a woman. Domestic and gender-based violence laws are inadequately enforced, and abuses that do not result in significant injury are subject only to administrative penalties. Local groups reported an increase in violence against women during the ongoing COVID-19 crisis.

Sexual harassment in the workplace remains common, and such incidents are inadequately addressed.

In October 2021, the Moldovan Parliament ratified the Council of Europe's Istanbul Convention on preventing and combating violence against women.

Child marriages are reported in the Romany community. Neither marriage nor civil unions for same-sex couples are legally recognized.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 2 / 4

Due to weak labor rights protection and enforcement by authorities and trade unions, reports of exploitative labor practices, including long work hours, low wages, and fully or partially undocumented work or wages, are common. The rural population, women, and Roma are especially vulnerable to these practices. Regulations meant to prevent exploitative or unsafe working conditions remain poorly enforced. Human trafficking remains a problem, although the authorities do attempt to prosecute traffickers.

Monaco

Population: 40,000

Capital: Monaco

Freedom Status: Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: The Principality of Monaco is a constitutional monarchy headed by Prince Albert II. The prince appoints the government, which is responsible only to him. Legislative power is exercised jointly by the prince and the freely elected parliament. Civil liberties are generally respected.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- In January, new rules of procedure for members of the parliament took effect. Among other things, the rules imposed new requirements on the acceptance of gifts and the management of potential conflicts of interest.
 - In June, the parliament passed a law that provides legal status to non-Monegasques who were born or adopted in Monaco and have since resided in the country. The legislation was gazetted in July.

- In an October report, the Council of Europe's (CoE) Group of States against Corruption (GRECO) noted that Monegasque authorities made significant progress in addressing government transparency and ethics. In its report, GRECO noted that legislation, proposals, and amendments were more accessible to the public via the parliament's website.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 27 / 40 (+1)

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 8 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

The hereditary monarch holds extensive executive authority, including the exclusive right to change the government, and there are no constitutional provisions allowing citizens to alter this system. The current prince, Albert II, took the throne after his father's death in 2005. The head of government, known as the minister of state, is traditionally appointed by the monarch from a candidate list of three French nationals submitted by the French government. Pierre Dartout took office as minister of state in 2020.

The 24 members of the unicameral National Council are elected for five-year terms; the 16 candidates who receive the most votes are elected, and the remaining 8 seats are filled through list-based proportional representation. The 2018 elections were considered credible by international observers. The new political movement Priorité Monaco, led by veteran politician Stéphane Valeri and defectors from the more established Horizon Monaco, won 58 percent of the vote and 21 seats. Horizon Monaco itself took 26 percent and 2 seats, while the Union Monégasque took 16 percent and 1 seat. After the elections, Valeri became president of the National Council, which is regarded as the most powerful elected office in Monaco.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 4 / 4

The legal framework provides an adequate basis for credible elections, and a number of recent changes have improved the conduct of elections, including the modification of campaign finance rules in 2017 and the broadening of suffrage rights for detainees in 2014. However, in a 2018 report, the Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE) argued that the campaign finance system could be further strengthened.

Municipal authorities, led by the mayor of Monaco, form an Electoral Committee that administers elections with support from the Interior Ministry, and observers consider their conduct to be credible. However, technical meetings in preparation for elections are not open to the public, limiting the committee's transparency.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 10 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 3 / 4

Political associations, groupings of people who hold similar political viewpoints, compete in Monaco, rather than traditional parties. There are no undue restrictions on the formation of new political associations. However, office seekers are prohibited from running as individual independent candidates; independents must instead form a list of at least 13 candidates to participate in elections.

Opposition political associations are able to gain seats in the parliament. In 2018, Priorité Monaco, also known as Primo!, won 21 seats, while Horizon Monaco fell from 20 seats to 2. However, there are structural limits on the opposition's ability to secure executive power through elections, as the cabinet—appointed by the prince—is not responsible to the elected parliament.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 2 / 4

The fact that the head of government is a French national appointed from a list submitted by Paris, and that the powerful head of state is an unelected monarch, means that people's political participation is heavily circumscribed by democratically unaccountable forces. Nevertheless, voters' and candidates' choices with respect to parliamentary representation are largely free from domination by such entities.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 3 / 4

Only about 9,000 of Monaco's residents—roughly a quarter of the total—are citizens, and noncitizens do not have the right to vote or run for office, though a number of legal routes to naturalization are available. Most noncitizen residents are nationals of neighboring France or Italy.

Among the citizen population, women and members of racial or ethnic minority groups are free to participate in elections, both as voters and candidates, but women's interests are not always well represented in the political system, and only eight women were elected to the parliament in 2018. The six-member council of ministers included one woman as of 2021.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 9 / 12 (+1)C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 2 / 4

The hereditary prince has significant governing authority, including the exclusive power to initiate legislation, conduct foreign policy, and approve changes to the constitution. However, all legislation and the budget require parliamentary approval, and the parliament is generally free from interference by unelected groups.

There have been a series of recent improvements in the legal framework for combating corruption. Rules on accepting gifts and potential conflicts of interest were included in the rules of procedure that took effect in January 2021. A report from GRECO published in October noted that Monegasque authorities made significant progress in strengthening the country's ethics framework. In May, for example, the post of ethics adviser was filled, while the National Council established an ethics committee in July. The GRECO report concluded that Monaco partially or fully adopted 11 of its 16 recommendations.

Nevertheless, high-level corruption remains a problem, and officials sometimes act with impunity. In 2017, Philippe Narmino resigned as director of judicial services, or justice minister, after it was revealed that wealthy Russian businessman Dmitriy Rybolovlev provided gifts in exchange for pursuing fraud charges against Swiss art dealer Yves Bouvier.

The Rybolovlev case revealed extensive corruption within the judiciary. In 2019, Laurent Anselmi was replaced as justice minister months after he unexpectedly denied a request for a term renewal from the judge overseeing the investigation into the Rybolovlev scandal. However, Anselmi then became foreign minister. In September 2021, Rybolovlev—who legally pursued Bouvier in five countries and territories—effectively lost his ninth case against the art dealer when a Swiss prosecutor dropped proceedings, though Rybolovlev vowed to appeal.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 4 / 4 (+1)

The law generally provides for public access to government information, including draft laws and proposed legislation. Parliamentarians are bound by the newly implemented rules of procedure and are subject to scrutiny from the ethics adviser, who is empowered to investigate conflict-of-interest and asset-declaration concerns. The rules of procedure also require the publication of legislative committee agendas and written opinions. The October 2021 GRECO report also noted that the National Council's website hosted legislation, proposals, and amendments to enhance public access to such material.

There are no financial disclosure laws in place for lawmakers or officials appointed by the prince.

Score Change: The score improved from 3 to 4 because the parliament implemented several rule changes to increase the openness of parliamentary processes, including publishing amendments, proposals, and legislation online.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 57 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 16 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 4 / 4

The constitution provides for freedom of expression, and press freedom is generally respected in practice. Monaco has a weekly government newspaper, an English-language monthly, and several online publications. There is one major private broadcaster based in the country. French and Italian broadcast and print media are widely available, and internet access is not restricted.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 4 / 4

Roman Catholicism is the official state religion, but the constitution guarantees freedom of religion and public worship, and this is largely respected in practice. Jehovah's Witnesses have struggled to secure official recognition as a religious association despite favorable rulings by the Supreme Court.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

There are no undue restrictions on academic freedom.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 4 / 4

People are generally free to express their personal views without fear of retribution. Insulting the ruling family is illegal and can result in prison sentences of up to five years, but the law is infrequently enforced.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 12 / 12E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

The constitution provides for freedom of assembly, which is generally respected in practice.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 4 / 4

No significant restrictions are imposed on the formation or operation of nongovernmental organizations (NGOs).

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 4 / 4

The law grants workers the right to establish unions and bargain collectively, and anti-union discrimination is prohibited. All workers except government employees have the right to strike. Unions and employers engage in collective bargaining in practice.

F. RULE OF LAW: 14 / 16F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 3 / 4

The constitution provides for an independent judiciary. The prince names five full members and two judicial assistants to the Supreme Court based on nominations by the National Council, government bodies, and the lower courts. The recruitment process for judges lacks transparency, which contributes to a perception that they may lack independence. The Judicial Service Commission (CSJ) is responsible for ensuring the independence of the judiciary. While the CSJ's autonomy was recently strengthened, only some of its members are selected by their peers. In its October 2021 report, GRECO noted that CSJ activity reports are not publicly available. The state secretary for justice, formerly known as the director of judicial services, oversees the judicial and law enforcement systems and is responsible only to the prince. Approximately half of the judges in Monaco are Monegasque nationals, and the other half are French nationals.

Concerns about judicial independence resurfaced in 2019, when the director of judicial services turned down a request for a three-year term renewal from the judge overseeing the investigation into the Rybolovlev corruption scandal. The director was replaced later that year.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 4 / 4

Due process rights are generally respected. Defendants are presumed innocent until proven guilty and are informed of the charges against them promptly. Defendants have access to attorneys and sufficient time to prepare a defense. A May 2021 report by the CoE's Committee for the Prevention of Torture and Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment criticized the relatively poor conditions of the Remand Prison and the size of court waiting cells, though the body reported that prisoners were generally well treated.

The population faces no major threats to physical security. Violent crime and excessive use of force by police are both rare in Monaco.

Monaco lacks a law that broadly prohibits discrimination based on race or ethnicity, though insults and defamation on such grounds are illegal. In the absence of a comprehensive law, Article 14 of the European Convention on Human Rights is used to prevent and punish discrimination.

The law prohibits discrimination based on gender, and women's rights are generally respected. However, the European Commission against Racism and Intolerance has noted that women do not enjoy the same rights to social benefits as their male counterparts, as men receive head-of-household status by default, and has called for the establishment of a program guaranteeing the equal treatment of LGBT+ people.

A law passed in June 2021 and gazetted in July provides legal status to non-Monégasques who were born or adopted in Monaco and have since resided in the country. Individuals in the "Children of the Nation" category, who were previously regarded as foreigners, would effectively receive expanded access to housing and employment under this legislation.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 15 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

There are no significant restrictions on freedom of internal movement or foreign travel. Temporary movement restrictions that were imposed during the COVID-19 pandemic in 2021 were generally considered legitimate measures to protect public health.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 3 / 4

Property rights are respected, and noncitizens holding a residence permit may purchase property and establish businesses. However, obtaining government approval to start a business is often a lengthy and complex process, and related costs can be prohibitively expensive.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 4 / 4

Personal social freedoms are generally respected. Abortion remains illegal except under special circumstances, including rape and a risk to the pregnant person's life or physical health. In 2019, however, the parliament passed legislation that removed criminal punishments for people who undergo abortions; health professionals could still face penalties for performing an abortion in Monaco. Also in 2019, the parliament adopted a law that allows civil partnerships for all couples, including those of the same sex. Domestic violence is outlawed in Monaco, and there are few reported incidents. The government and NGOs provide a network of support services for victims of domestic violence.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 4 / 4

Legal protections against labor exploitation are adequately enforced.

Mongolia

Population: 3,400,000

Capital: Ulaanbaatar

Freedom Status: Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Following a peaceful revolution in 1990, Mongolia began holding multiparty elections and established itself as an electoral democracy. Political rights and civil liberties have been firmly institutionalized, though the two dominant parties continue to rely on patronage networks rather than a competition of policy visions, and widespread corruption hampers further development.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- Ukhnaagiin Khürelsükh of the Mongolian People's Party (MPP) resigned as prime minister in January, ostensibly in response to COVID-19-related protests. However, he was nominated to run and won election for the presidency in June with 67.69 percent of the vote. The opposition National Labor Party (HUN) candidate Enkhbat Dangaasuren finished second, with 20.31 percent of the vote, which represented the largest margin of victory since the establishment of the democracy in 1990.
- President Khürelsükh announced in September that he would relinquish the authority to appoint judges to allow for greater judicial independence. However, this was not codified in legislation by the end of the year.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 36 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 11 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

Under 2019 amendments to the 1992 constitution, the president is directly elected for a single six-year term. Ukhnaagiin Khürelsükh of the Mongolian People's Party (MPP) resigned as prime minister in January 2021, ostensibly in response to COVID-19-related protests but was nominated to run as the MPP candidate for president in the June elections. The Democratic Party (DP) attempted to renominate President Khaltmaa Battulga, whose first presidential term had begun before 2019 constitutional amendments that created a one-term limit were enacted. In April, however, the Constitutional Court barred Battulga from running again. Due to internal party turmoil, in May two separate DP factions nominated former prime minister Norovyn Altankhuyag, whose candidacy the General Election Commission (GEC) rejected, and party chair Sodnomzundui Erdene, whose candidacy the GEC accepted, despite protests from within the party.

In response to the Constitutional Court's decision to bar him from running again, President Battulga attempted to dissolve the MPP by decree, alleging that the party was no longer independent and had become an arm of the military. Neither the Supreme Court nor Parliament adhered to the decree.

The election campaign for the presidency occurred with some COVID-19 restrictions in place that may have prevented some voters from participating, particularly those who live in Ulaanbaatar but are registered to vote elsewhere. Voter turnout in the June election reached 59.35 percent, only slightly lower from the 2017 election. Khürelsükh won the presidency with 67.69 percent of the vote and the greatest margin of victory in any presidential election since 1990. Erdene only received 5.99 percent of the vote while the opposition National Labor Party (HUN) candidate Enkhbat Dangaasuren received 20.31 percent. There were no significant irregularities reported during the election by an observer mission from the Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE).

Oyun-Erdene Luvsannamsrai was confirmed by Parliament to replace Khürelsükh as prime minister in January 2021.

Members of the 76-seat parliament, the State Great Hural, are elected for four-year terms. All members were elected to multimember constituencies in the June 2020 elections, with 48 elected via simple-majority voting and 28 via proportional representation. The MPP won 62 seats while the DP won 11. The Mongolian People's Revolutionary Party, the HUN, and an independent each won 1 seat. Turnout stood at 73.7 percent. An OSCE electoral observation mission was in Mongolia for the election.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 3 / 4

Electoral laws are generally fair, though they are often changed shortly before elections and tend to favor the two largest parties.

While the GEC is sometimes regarded with suspicion over political influence, no major complaints arose from its management of the June 2021 elections other than those associated with the nomination of the DP candidate.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 16 / 16B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 4 / 4

While the Mongolian political system features multiple parties, it has also been marked by the dominance of the MPP and DP in the past. Parties are built around clientelist patronage networks rather than policy platforms. Representatives of large business groups play an important role in funding and directing the MPP and DP.

The DP has been wracked with internal turmoil in recent years, and the HUN has stepped into the political space it has vacated.

There are no undue barriers preventing opposition parties from gaining power through elections, though there are practical hurdles. The rise of HUN illustrates that there is room for a new political party to gain support.

Powerful business interests have some influence over candidates and have supported them through a nontransparent party-finance system. However, candidates and voters are generally free to make political choices without excessive outside influence, in part because corporate interests are balanced across various factions of the two main parties. There have been fears about outside (most commonly, Chinese or Russian) interference in Mongolian elections, though no evidence of such interference came to light in the 2021 elections.

All adult citizens other than those who are incarcerated are entitled to full political rights, and these are generally observed in practice. However, despite quotas supporting gender diversity, women remain underrepresented in politics, holding about 17 percent of parliamentary seats and few senior government posts. No party nominated a woman as a presidential candidate in 2021. Ethnic Kazakh parliamentarians are regularly elected in Bayan-Ölgii, which is predominantly Kazakh.

LGBT+ people face some societal discrimination that hampers their ability to advocate for their interests in the political sphere, though such advocacy has been increasing in recent years.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 9 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 4 / 4

Freely elected representatives are duly seated and generally able to craft government policy without improper interference. However, corporations, aided by opaque party-finance procedures, have also been able to influence policymaking.

Parliamentarians were previously allowed to hold concurrent cabinet positions, effectively making a relatively large number of members bound to the premier. Constitutional amendments passed in 2019 limited the number of parliamentarians who could serve in a cabinet.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 2 / 4

Corruption, which is endemic in Mongolia, is widely perceived to have worsened in recent years, particularly with respect to state involvement in the mining sector. Anticorruption laws are vaguely written and infrequently enforced. The Independent Authority Against Corruption (IAAC) has been criticized as ineffective in pursuing cases. The IAAC's independence was weakened in 2019 when emergency legislation allowed the National Security Council (NSC) to recommend the chief's dismissal before the end of their term. The chief and the prosecutor general, who had called for prosecutions against parliamentarians implicated in corruption, were dismissed that year.

High-profile corruption cases were resolved in 2020. For example: in May, former prime minister Mendsaikhany Enkhsaikhon received a four-and-a-half-year prison sentence for corruption, but had his sentence reduced in November. Former prime ministers Jargaltulgyn Erdenebat and Sanjaagiin Bayar received prison sentences over separate accusations of corruption in July.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 3 / 4

While there are many laws and regulations designed to maintain government transparency and accountability, implementation and enforcement is inconsistent. The 2011 Law on Information and Transparency and Right to Information contains exemptions allowing certain types of information to be withheld from the public, which authorities often invoke to limit disclosures. The 2019 constitutional amendments established an auditing body that would maintain powers over the government. The E-Mongolia platform, which is meant to make government services more accessible, launched in October 2020 and is a priority on Prime Minister Oyun-Erdene's agenda.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 48 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 14 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 3 / 4

Press freedom is generally respected, and media outlets collectively present a wide range of views. However, coverage can be partisan; the OSCE noted in its 2021 election observation mission report that many media outlets are dependent on the finances of their politically connected owners, who attempt to exert editorial control. Ownership of media companies remains opaque. Many journalists self-censor to avoid offending political or business interests and facing costly libel or defamation suits.

Authorities imposed criminal penalties for the dissemination of purported disinformation in March 2020, as the COVID-19 pandemic took hold worldwide. Journalists reportedly engaged in self-censorship while reporting on the pandemic.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 4 / 4

Individuals are free to practice their religion under the law and in practice, though religious groups are required to register with the government and the ease of registration procedures varies by region and locality.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

Academic freedom is generally respected.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 3 / 4

There are few significant impediments to free and open private discussion. Fear of repercussions from powerful actors continue to deter open expression for some.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 11 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

Freedom of assembly is upheld in practice, though public assembly was restricted for much of 2021 under COVID-19-related measures.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 4 / 4

Numerous environmental, human rights, and social welfare groups operate without restrictions, though most are small. Individual activists sometimes report incidents of intimidation and harassment.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 3 / 4

Trade unions are independent and active, and the government generally respects their rights to bargain collectively and engage in legal strike actions. However, labor rights are restricted for certain groups, such as foreign and temporary workers, and there are some reports of employers unlawfully disrupting union activity.

F. RULE OF LAW: 11 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 2 / 4

Judges are appointed by the president on the recommendation of the Judicial General Council, whose five members in turn are nominated by the three tiers of courts, the bar association, and the Justice Ministry. However, legislation passed in 2019 allows the NSC to recommend the dismissal of judges. President Khürelsükh announced in September 2021 that he would voluntarily relinquish his authority to appoint judges to allow for greater judicial independence. However, this was not codified in legislation by the end of the year.

Corruption and political influence in the daily work of judges remain concerns.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 3 / 4

Due-process rights are generally respected, but cases of arbitrary arrest and detention have been reported. The right to a fair trial can be undermined by intimidation or bribery.

While Mongolians face few major threats to physical security, there have been reports of police illegally using physical abuse to obtain confessions. Some prison and detention facilities feature insufficient nutrition, heat, and medical care.

There are no formal barriers to equal treatment under the law. Discrimination based on gender, race, sexual orientation, gender identity, and other categories is prohibited. However, women and LGBT+ people continue to face societal discrimination and harassment, including in the workplace. Public events in support of LGBT+ equality have grown in attendance and visibility over the past several years.

Rape and other acts of sexual violence against LGBT+ people have historically gone unprosecuted. A 2017 criminal code revision includes stronger protections for this community; law enforcement officials have gradually received training to comply with the new code.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 12 / 16G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

The government respects freedom of movement. Exit bans imposed on individuals involved in legal cases are overseen by the courts.

The COVID-19 pandemic has brought some temporary restrictions on domestic movements, but perhaps more significantly has severely reduced air travel, including restricting Mongolians' ability to return to the country from abroad.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 3 / 4

People are generally free to own property and establish private businesses, though state-owned enterprises play a prominent role in some sectors. Corruption also hampers many private business activities. Officials have reportedly withheld operating licenses and other documentation from businesses until bribes are paid. There is a history of corruption and government interference in the mining industry.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 3 / 4

Individual rights on personal-status issues such as marriage and divorce are protected by law. However, domestic violence remains a problem. The government has initiated programs to encourage better police responses to domestic violence complaints in recent years. A government survey conducted with the United Nations (UN) and published in 2018 found that nearly a third of women faced physical or sexual abuse from a partner. Just 10 percent of those who had suffered severe sexual violence by a nonpartner reported the crimes to the authorities. Sexual harassment is not explicitly restricted and is widespread.

The government has struggled to cope with economic inequality, particularly as large numbers of rural Mongolians migrate to cities that lack sufficient housing and infrastructure. Their situation has become even more precarious as the capital of Ulaanbaatar has restricted the registration of new residents in an effort to curb winter-time air pollution.

Women, children, people living in poverty, and other vulnerable segments of the population are at some risk of becoming trafficking victims, and can be compelled to engage in sex work, forced labor, or begging. Mine workers are subject to exploitative conditions, as are contract workers from China. The government has made efforts to better prosecute trafficking cases, but corruption and a lack of will to address the issue impede progress.

Montenegro

Population: 600,000

Capital: Podgorica

Freedom Status: Partly Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: An opposition coalition came to power in late 2020 following elections held that August, ending three decades of rule by the Democratic Party of Socialists (DPS). However, the DPS maintains control over the judiciary. Corruption and party hiring remain problems, though the relationship between the government and the media has improved. The new administration has been more responsive to criticism from civil society and its political opponents.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- The government in November unveiled the Europe Now program, which introduced a progressive tax rate and increased the minimum wage from €250 to €450, among other reforms. The program, which the parliament adopted in December, seeks to improve living standards and reduce the prominence of the illegal economy.
- In October, President Đukanović and his son Blažo were listed in the Pandora Papers, an investigation by the International Consortium of Investigative Journalists (ICIJ) that revealed the improper financial system and connections of rich and powerful actors around the world. The ICIJ investigation revealed that Đukanović and his son had placed money in offshore accounts via two so-called irrevocable trusts, which protect the signatories even in the event of criminal prosecution.
- In June, Parliament adopted a resolution recognizing the 1995 genocide in Srebrenica. Parliament also dismissed the justice minister, who had questioned whether the genocide took place, on the same day.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 26 / 40 (+2)

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 9 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 3 / 4

The president is chief of state and is directly elected for up to two five-year terms. In April 2018, Milo Đukanović of the DPS, who has served as either prime minister or president for most of the last three decades, was elected president with 53.9 percent of the vote. Independent candidate Mladen Bojanić finished second with 33.4 percent. Though Đukanović refused to participate in public debates and some irregularities such as misuse of public resources were reported, the Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE) monitoring mission stated that the polling was generally credible and respected fundamental rights. However, the mission noted that Đukanović and the DPS enjoyed significant institutional advantages that reduced the poll's competitiveness.

The president nominates the prime minister, who requires legislative approval. Following the parliamentary elections in August 2020, Đukanović nominated Zdravko Krivokapić, leader of the strongest electoral list in the postelection coalition, for the position. Krivokapić's government was approved that December.

Members of the unicameral, 81-seat parliament—the Skupština—are directly elected for four-year terms.

While the DPS once again posted the strongest performance by a single party in the 2020 parliamentary election, taking 30 seats, it failed to secure a majority with its traditional coalition partners. With a narrow 41-seat majority, a new alliance consisting of three coalitions—the Future of Montenegro (27 seats), Peace is Our Nation (10), and In Black and White (4)—gained power. Turnout was high, at 76.64 percent.

The OSCE and the European Network of Election Monitoring Organizations (ENEMO) noted that the polls took place in an atmosphere of high polarization over issues including church affiliation and national identity. The election administration in some ways violated provisions of the constitution, including because the early election date was never harmonized with other legal obligations; pandemic restrictions on movement and assembly impeded campaign activities; and several lawmakers were arrested or charged with various offenses without their parliamentary immunity first being waived. The line between the ruling parties and the state was again blurred during the campaign, as the DPS and its coalition partners gained undue advantage through the widespread misuse of state resources, thus affecting the principle of equal opportunity in the campaign.

Nevertheless, the polls were widely considered an improvement from previous years' contests, with monitors and other analysts concluding that they were conducted in a more secure, orderly, and transparent manner and featured robust participation from across society.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 3 / 4

The conduct of elections in Montenegro is facilitated by a comprehensive legal and administrative framework, but opposition parties have long claimed that this framework was seriously flawed. In 2018, Parliament voted to form a committee, composed of seven members from the ruling coalition and seven from the opposition, tasked with crafting legislation to reform electoral laws, taking into consideration recent recommendations of the OSCE and the European Commission (EC). However, numerous opposition parties refused to participate in the committee's efforts. Nevertheless, in 2020 these parties participated in elections run under a framework they had previously characterized as unfair.

A new Committee on Comprehensive Electoral Reform, comprised of all parliamentary parties, was formed in March 2021 and began to reform and improve the legal framework to ensure free and fair elections. The committee was to complete its work by June, but in December received an extension to mid-2022.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 11 / 16 (+1)B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 3 / 4 (+1)

Political parties are for the most part able to form and operate without direct interference.

In 2021, the ruling party refrained from intimidating and delegitimizing opposition activity by equating it with threats to the state or to public order. Because of this calmer political environment, new antigovernment political groups emerged, competed in local elections, and participated in the public sphere without being pressured or demonized as “enemies of the state.”

Score Change: The score improved from 2 to 3 because political groups face fewer obstacles to their functioning than in past years.

Prior to the 2020 elections, the DPS had been in power since 1991, which has provided it with significant structural advantages over opposition parties. In 2020, the opposition gathered in three coalitions, some led by figures relatively new to national politics, to focus efforts on criticizing the DPS, which proved to be a winning strategy. Surveys taken in 2021, as well as results from March local elections in Nikšić (the largest municipality), demonstrate that though the DPS remains the strongest political party, new political groups pose legitimate challenges to its power.

While voters are generally free to express their political choices, the DPS has created extensive patronage systems and widespread corruption, in both public and private companies with links to the state, which encourage loyalty to the DPS. Moreover, many members of the DPS are believed to have ties to organized crime, which continues to provide opportunities for illicit pressure on voters and candidates. The new government did not put a stop to the practice of clientelism, thus severely undermining the planned depoliticization and professionalization of public administration and the creation of a proclaimed meritocratic system.

The Serbian Orthodox Church (SOC) in Montenegro has exerted notable influence on the government's personnel policy.

All citizens have full political rights and electoral opportunities. Small political parties representing interests of ethnic, religious, and other minority groups participate in the political sphere, and members of these minorities are also represented within larger parties—though the Romany population remains underrepresented. In the 2020 elections, voter materials were provided in the Albanian language, but not the Romany language.

Women are underrepresented in political leadership positions and politics generally. Though the government formed in 2020 has taken steps to increase women's participation, including through gender quotas on electoral lists, implementation remains uneven. Draginja Vuksanović, the first woman presidential candidate in Montenegrin history, won 8 percent of the vote in the 2018 elections.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 6 / 12 (+1)C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 3 / 4 (+1)

Đukanović has wielded vast personalized power for decades through his tenure as both prime minister and president, as well as during his time outside of government as chair of the DPS. Although the constitution provides for a parliamentary system of government, Parliament passed a new law after Đukanović's April 2018 election that expanded presidential powers, including by allowing the president to form councils, committees, and working groups within the presidency.

The coalition led by Prime Minister Krivokapić, which formed a new government in December 2020, rose to power through a narrow parliamentary majority. Their dependency on this narrow majority has pushed Krivokapić to be more responsive to lawmakers than his predecessors and has enabled the parliament to be stronger in its oversight functions.

Score Change: The score improved from 2 to 3 because the parliament has engaged in more oversight over the executive during the year.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 1 / 4

Corruption and cronyism remain widespread, and modest efforts by authorities to address the problem, prompted in part by EU accession requirements, have not produced significant results. EC Progress Reports have consistently questioned the integrity, credibility, impartiality, independence, accountability, and priority-setting of the agency. The 2021 EC report noted that the agency's new management has had a more proactive approach in public outreach activities, but its independence, priorities, approach, and decision-making remain impaired. The report also emphasized a need for the political will to address the prevalence of high-level corruption and the lack of independence of various public institutions. Senior officials implicated in corruption schemes rarely face prosecution. Civil society organizations and independent media provide some accountability by reporting on official corruption and its effects.

While the Krivokapić government has made some strides in fighting corruption, state prosecutors—in particular, the prosecutor responsible for pursuing organized crime and terrorism cases—are loyal to the DPS, which impeded those efforts in 2021.

In October 2021, President Đukanović and his son Blažo were listed in the Pandora Papers, an investigation by the ICIJ that revealed the improper financial system and connections of rich and powerful actors around the world. The ICIJ investigation revealed that Đukanović and his son had placed money in offshore accounts via two so-called irrevocable trusts, which protect the signatories even in the event of criminal prosecution. Đukanović's sister, Ana Kolarević, had been named in the Panama Papers in 2016.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 2 / 4

Despite the Krivokapić government's promises to change the nontransparent practices of the past and be more open to the public, citizens still have few opportunities for meaningful participation in public consultations on legislation and policy reforms. Budget plans are not widely available, nor is information on government contracts, which has led to criticism from civil society of the Krivokapić government's continuation of the nontransparent practices of its predecessors.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 41 / 60 (+2)D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 10 / 16 (+2)*D1. Are there free and independent media? 3 / 4 (+1)

A variety of independent media operate in Montenegro, and media coverage continues to be partisan and combative on certain issues. Unlike the DPS government, the Krivokapić government has not sought to pressure reporters, nor does it exercise control of the public broadcaster, Radio and Television of Montenegro (RTCG). In June 2021, Parliament appointed a new RTCG Council, which in August appointed a new director. Following these changes, the RTCG began to feature more balanced editorial policy and more inclusive and diverse political content.

The lack of external pressure during 2021 made internal censorship within media houses and self-censorship among journalists less prominent. Structural problems inherited from the previous regime remain, as reporters who cover corruption and organized crime still risk violence. The interior minister claimed in November 2021 that all attacks on journalists during the year were investigated promptly, and the perpetrators were prosecuted. In December 2021, two suspects were detained in connection with the 2018 shooting and wounding of investigative reporter Olivera Lakić.

Score Change: The score improved from 2 to 3 because the country's public broadcaster operates with more independence under the new government and self-censorship has eased.

The constitution guarantees freedom of religious belief. However, during the final years of the DPS government, the SOC and its adherents were subjected to discrimination and hate speech, and its clergy has been characterized by the DPS as enemies of the state.

In late December 2019, a wave of protests erupted against the newly adopted and controversial Law on Freedom of Religion or Belief and the Legal Status of Religious Communities, which contained language SOC leaders said would allow the transfer of SOC buildings and other property to the Montenegrin state. It was adopted after rancorous sessions of Parliament that saw, among other things, the arrest of opposition lawmakers. Discontent among the SOC community—the largest confessional group in Montenegro—eventually led to a wave of SOC-organized peaceful protests against the law in 2020. The protests were reportedly the largest in the history of Montenegro; at times, a fifth of the population was in the streets across the country.

In late December 2020, in a somewhat rushed procedure, the new parliamentary majority removed provisions of the Law on Freedom of Religion regulating property rights and ownership of church buildings and estates. The enthronement of a new SOC church leader in September 2021 sparked anti-SOC protests and clashes with the police in Cetinje.

Academic freedom is guaranteed by law and generally upheld. However, the public maintains a generally disengaged relationship with researchers and university professors. In 2017, the rector of the University of Montenegro, who was appointed in 2014 and enacted a series of reforms, was removed by the government, violating university autonomy. In March 2020, the Supreme Court upheld the Podgorica High Court's previous ruling that her removal was unlawful. In February 2021, the governing board of the university, at the behest of the new government and student representatives, removed the rector who had been appointed in 2017. A new rector was elected by the university's managing board in July 2021.

People are generally free to engage in public discussions. The Krivokapić government has not sought to silence dissenting voices by directing police to arrest social media users that post critical or satirical content. Individuals' fear of retribution for expressing their opinions online has diminished, and criticism of the parliamentary majority and the government has become somewhat commonplace.

Score Change: The score improved from 2 to 3 because individuals face less retribution for expressing their personal views under the current government.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 9 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 3 / 4

While citizens generally enjoy freedom of assembly, the governing majority in Parliament has used similar rhetoric as its predecessors to delegitimize antigovernment protests.

Police used tear gas against rock-throwing, anti-SOC protesters in Cetinje in September 2021 and detained Đukanović's security advisor, Veselin Veljović after he tried to break the police barrier. The deputy prime minister subsequently accused participants of being terrorists who wanted to destabilize the country.

Although most nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) operate without interference, those that investigate corruption or that criticized the former DPS government faced pressure. In 2020, Đukanović accused the NGO sector (and independent media) of being responsible for the "bad image of Montenegro in the international community."

However, Krivokapić's government, which took power at the end of 2020, has recognized civil society actors as strategic partners in crafting comprehensive government reforms. Though some prominent NGO professionals taking positions in state institutions, some civil society members have criticized the government's reform commitments as being solely declarative and superficial in nature.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 3 / 4

There is freedom for trade unions, which remain relatively strong in the public sector. However, reports of intimidation of labor activists by employers continue.

F. RULE OF LAW: 9 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 2 / 4

Efforts to bolster judicial independence continue, though the judiciary remains susceptible to pressure from the DPS, and judicial corruption remains a problem. Secret audio recordings and official documents leaked in 2019 implicated then-Supreme State Prosecutor Ivica Stanković (who retired in June 2021) and then-president of the Supreme Court Vesna Medenica (who resigned in December 2020) in bribery and corruption affairs; these issues are yet to be resolved. Responsibility for prosecutions remains under the tight grip of the DPS, and selective justice remains a systemic problem. There are serious deficiencies in transparency, openness, professionalism, and accountability in the judicial system.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 1 / 4

Constitutional guarantees of due process are inconsistently upheld. Legal proceedings are lengthy and often highly bureaucratic, particularly when involving business dealings.

Police frequently hold suspects in extended pretrial detention while completing investigations. Courts are poorly funded and often overburdened.

Two Democratic Front (DF) leaders, Andrija Mandić and Milan Knežević, who were charged with plotting a coup in 2016, were found guilty in May 2019 and were each given sentences of up to five years in prison. Legal procedures surrounding the trial were chaotic and opaque, several witnesses recanted testimony, and many details of the alleged plot remained murky after the trial closed. In February 2021, an appeals court overturned the convictions of and ordered a retrial for 13 suspects accused of plotting the coup, including Mandić and Knežević, citing procedural mistakes and violations of criminal law.

In May 2021, the government voted to change the law governing prosecutor appointments by the Prosecutorial Council, even though concerns about the Council's potential politicization were raised by the Venice Commission of the Council of Europe (CoE).

Violent crime is not a significant problem, although several apparent executions by criminal gangs of rivals have taken place in recent years. Prison conditions do not meet international standards for education or health care, and prison guards reportedly abuse inmates regularly and with impunity.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 3 / 4

Members of the Romany, Ashkali, Egyptian, and other ethnic minority groups, as well as LGBT+ people, face discrimination. Women in Montenegro are legally entitled to equal pay for equal work, but patriarchal social norms often limit their salary levels, as well as their educational opportunities.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 11 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 3 / 4

The freedom of movement and the right of citizens to change their residence, employment, and institution of higher education are generally respected in practice. However, despite the fall of the DPS government, jobs in the public sector are still awarded through patronage network, limiting access for those without connections.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 2 / 4

The state sector dominates much of Montenegro's economy, and related clientelism, as well as corruption, pose obstacles to normal business activity.

The government for the most part does not place restrictions on personal social freedoms. In July 2020, Montenegro legalized same-sex civil partnerships. The first same-sex civil partnership was registered in July 2021.

Domestic violence is an increasingly severe problem, sometimes resulting in death due to the failure of law enforcement institutions to act preventively.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 3 / 4

Most workers employed in the private sector remain unprotected from exploitation and arbitrary decisions of their employers. Human trafficking for the purposes of prostitution and forced labor remains a problem. The government does not fully meet the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking but is increasing efforts to do so compared to the previous reporting period, according to the US State Department's 2021 Trafficking in Persons Report.

The government in November unveiled the Europe Now program, which introduced a progressive tax rate and increased the minimum wage from €250 to €450, among other reforms. The program, which the parliament adopted in December, seeks to improve living standards and reduce the prominence of the illegal economy.

Morocco

Population: 36,300,000

Capital: Rabat

Freedom Status: Partly Free

Electoral Democracy: No

Note: The numerical scores and status listed above do not reflect conditions in Western Sahara, which is examined in a separate report. Freedom in the World reports assess the level of political rights and civil liberties in a given geographical area, regardless of whether they are affected by the state, nonstate actors, or foreign powers. Disputed territories are sometimes assessed separately if they meet certain criteria, including boundaries that are sufficiently stable to allow year-on-year comparisons. For more information, see the report methodology and FAQ.

Overview: Morocco holds regular multiparty elections for Parliament and local bodies. Reforms in 2011 shifted some authority over government from the monarchy to the national legislature. Nevertheless, King Mohammed VI and his palace maintain full dominance through a combination of substantial formal powers and informal lines of influence in the state and society. Many civil liberties are constrained in practice.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- The ruling Party of Justice and Development (PJD), a moderate Islamist party, was trounced in the September elections. The National Rally of Independents (RNI) and the Istiqlal Party, both closely aligned with the palace, were the primary victors. Pro-palace parties and technocrats dominated the subsequently formed government and are unlikely to pose any challenge to the king.
 - In April, Ibrahim Ghali, the leader of the Polisario Front—which calls for independence in Western Sahara—was allowed into Spain to seek treatment for COVID-19. In May, Moroccan authorities reportedly retaliated by allowing thousands of migrants to enter the Spanish enclave of Ceuta.
 - In July, Akhbar al-Yaum editor in chief Soulaïmane Raïssouni was sentenced to five years in prison on sexual assault charges that rights groups described as fraudulent. His was the latest in a series of prosecutions against journalists based on dubious claims of improper personal behavior.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 13 / 40A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 5 / 12*A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 1 / 4

Constitutional reforms in 2011 require the king to appoint the prime minister from the party that wins the most seats in parliamentary elections. However, the reforms preserved nearly all of the king's existing powers: the monarch can disband the legislature, rule by decree, and dismiss or appoint cabinet members.

The ruling PJD was trounced in September 2021 elections, and the RNI and the Istiqlal Party, both closely aligned with the palace, were the primary victors. The king tapped Aziz Akhannouch of the RNI as prime minister. Akhannouch, whose oil-and-gas fortune is reportedly worth $2 billion according to Forbes, is the second-richest person in Morocco after the king, whose wealth is estimated at $5.7 billion.

In October, in keeping with royal prerogative, the king announced the new 24-member cabinet, with key positions going to technocrats.

The lower house of Parliament, the Chamber of Representatives, has 395 directly elected members who serve five-year terms. Of these, 305 are elected from 92 multimember constituencies. The remaining 90 are elected from a single nationwide constituency, with 60 seats reserved for women and 30 for people under the age of 40. Members of the 120-seat upper house, the Chamber of Counselors, are chosen by an electoral college—made up of professional, labor, and business organizations as well as local and regional officials—to serve six-year terms.

In the much-anticipated September 2021 parliamentary and municipal elections, the PJD won only 13 seats, down from 125 previously. The PJD performed more poorly than preelectoral forecasts, which predicted a fall in support, had suggested. The RNI and the Istiqlal Party, both closely aligned with the palace, were the effective winners, taking 102 and 81 seats respectively; the Authenticity and Modernity Party (PAM) took 87. The low turnout figure of 50.4 percent was nevertheless an improvement over the 43 percent figure seen in the 2016 elections. Turnout was likely higher in 2021 because the parliamentary elections were held simultaneously with local and municipal elections.

The PJD claimed fraud and irregularities, but offered little evidence. A more plausible explanation for the party's electoral misfortune is that it had delivered poorly on past electoral promises—though follow-through is difficult in a political system dominated by the monarchy, which regularly gives key ministries to other parties. The PJD was also blamed for the December 2020 normalization of relations with Israel, an unpopular policy among many Moroccans.

The 2021 election results effectively solidified the power of the monarchy, since pro-palace parties and technocrats dominate the new government and are unlikely to challenge the king.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 2 / 4

The constitutional and legal framework allows for competitive legislative elections, but the transparency of the process is not guaranteed. Elections are overseen by the Interior Ministry, with some participation by the Justice Ministry, rather than an independent electoral commission. Approximately three million Moroccans live abroad, and electoral laws make it exceedingly difficult for voters outside of Morocco to cast their ballots.

Changes in the electoral law made in March 2021 made it less likely for one party to win decisively.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 5 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 2 / 4

Morocco has a multiparty system in which new parties frequently organize and emerge but are generally unable to assert themselves relative to the power of the palace. There remains significant cynicism toward electoral politics—a combination of distrust of party leadership, which is generally seen as corrupt and co-opted, and a belief that the palace ultimately makes major decisions instead of elected leaders.

Justice and Charity (Al-Adl wa al-Ihsan) is an illegal Islamist movement that does not participate in elections. Nevertheless, it enjoys widespread support, and authorities largely tolerate its activities. The reformist February 20 Movement, which emerged from the 2011 Arab Spring protests, and Hirak Rif, a campaign that began in Morocco's largely Amazigh (Berber) Rif region in 2016, enjoy considerable popular support, but both movements also face severe government repression.

Although there was a significant change in the government with the September 2021 election—with the PJD replaced by a new coalition led by the RNI, Istiqlal, and PAM—the shift does not presage a significant change in policy or power. The cabinet (announced by the king in October) maintains fundamental continuity, with technocratic, unaffiliated ministers appointed to strategic ministries.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 1 / 4

The constitution and informal practice give the king overwhelming influence over political affairs, including government formation. The monarch and his circle of advisers and associates—known in Morocco as the Makhzen (“central storehouse”)—wield enormous private economic power that can be used to shape political outcomes through patronage networks.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 1 / 4

The political system features universal suffrage, but parties based on religious, ethnic, or regional identity are prohibited, and the concerns and interests of women and the Amazigh population are not adequately addressed.

At least 40 percent of the population is Amazigh, and the majority of Moroccans have Amazigh roots. Amazigh elites enjoy access to the monarchy and have their interests represented in Parliament, but the bulk of the Amazigh population is socially, economically, and politically marginalized. Recent unrest in Al Hoceïma, the surrounding Rif region, and other cities across Morocco stemmed in large part from inequities experienced by many Amazigh residents and their inability to obtain redress for their grievances through the political system.

A system of reserved seats for women is meant to encourage their participation in the electoral process at the national and local levels, partly offsetting traditional social pressures that deter such engagement. Recent electoral laws helped facilitate an increase in women candidates for the September 2021 local and municipal elections: 27 percent of candidates were female, compared to 12 percent for the last municipal elections in 2015. Despite this, women lead only 1 percent of districts. For the national elections, 60 of the 395 seats in the Chamber of Representatives are reserved for women; additionally, half of the 30 seats reserved for youth are to be filled by women. The cabinet formed in October included a record 7 women.

The 2019 conviction of journalist Hajar Raissouni, for supposedly having an illegal abortion and engaging in extramarital sex, continues as a cause célèbre; it underscores the increasing political mobilization on behalf of women's rights and contributed to a nationwide petition calling for an end to outmoded and discriminatory laws. The ongoing "outlaws" campaign continued to gather signatures in its efforts to prompt criminal-code changes.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 3 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 1 / 4

While elected officials are duly installed in government, their power to shape policy is sharply constrained by the king, who determines the composition of the cabinet, sets domestic and foreign policy, commands the armed forces and intelligence services, and is at the heart of the Makhzen. Royal commissions are formed ad hoc and tend to wield more power than ministries.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 1 / 4

Corruption is rife in state institutions and the economy. Despite official rhetoric about combating corruption, the palace and government have a mixed record on enforcement and progress has been slowed by a lack of political will, low institutional capacity, and the influence of elites who benefit from the status quo. In March 2021, Parliament strengthened the National Commission on Probity, Prevention and Fight against Corruption by broadening the definition of corruption and giving the body greater investigatory powers, though the results of this reform remain to be seen.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 1 / 4

Overall transparency is limited. Civil society leaders have faulted a controversial 2018 access to information law for provisions that criminalize "misuse" of government information or "distortion of content." The government publishes budget and financial information online, and public officials—including parliamentarians, judges, and civil servants—are required to declare their assets.

However, the monarchy itself, with its vast array of economic interests, is not subject to these rules, and the extent of its activities is opaque. In October 2021, the king's sister, Princess Leila Hasnaa, was revealed to own property in London using a shell company when the Pandora Papers—an investigation by the International Consortium of Investigative Journalists (ICIJ) that revealed the secretive financial conduct of rich and powerful actors around the world—were released. The property was reportedly acquired using royal funds.

Transparency is lacking with respect to the king's health, a subject considered taboo.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 24 / 60D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 7 / 16*D1. Are there free and independent media? 1 / 4

The state dominates the broadcast media, but affluent Moroccans have access to foreign satellite television channels. Although the independent press enjoys a significant degree of freedom when reporting on economic and social policies, the authorities use a number of financial and legal mechanisms to punish critical journalists who focus on the king, his family, the status of Western Sahara, or political Islam. The authorities also occasionally disrupt websites and internet platforms.

Since 2018, several independent journalists have faced prosecution on dubious charges of sexual assault or of financial misconduct. Most notably, Akhbar al-Youm editor in chief Soulaïmane Raïssouni in July 2021 was sentenced to five years in prison on sexual assault charges the Committee to Protect Journalists (CPJ) and other rights groups described as fraudulent.

Nearly all Moroccans are Muslims, and the king, identified as “commander of the faithful” in the constitution, has ultimate authority over religious affairs. Imams are required to obtain state certification, and mosques are monitored by the authorities. The government operates a well-financed training program for imams and female religious counselors tasked with promoting a state-sanctioned version of “moderate Islam,” which some critics charge is also intended to promote political quiescence.

Despite deep societal prejudices, a 3,000-person Jewish community is permitted to practice its faith, though many synagogues are unmarked. The Christian community, which numbers approximately 50,000, also experiences prejudice. Christian marriages are not legally recognized by the government.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 2 / 4

Universities provide a relatively open space for discussion, but professors practice self-censorship when dealing with sensitive topics. Salafists—adherents of a fundamentalist form of Islam—are closely monitored in universities. Periodic violence between university student groups, often stoked by Morocco’s political, ethnic, and sectarian differences, inhibits the right to peaceful student activism.

State surveillance of online activity and personal communications is a serious concern, and the arrests of journalists, bloggers, and activists for critical speech serve as a deterrent to uninhibited debate among the broader population. The use of spyware and surveillance technologies by the government is widespread. In December 2020, the Citizen Lab named the Moroccan government as a likely customer of Circles, a company that allows customers to monitor mobile phone users by exploiting weaknesses in telecommunications infrastructure.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 5 / 12E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 1 / 4

Freedom of political assembly is sharply restricted. The authorities sometimes use excessive force and violence to disperse protests.

The government suppressed the 2016–17 Hirak Rif protest movement against corruption and economic deprivation. Nasser Zefzafi and other protest leaders received 20-year prison sentences in 2018, while 50 other activists received shorter sentences. Authorities also harass activists involved in organizing antigovernment demonstrations that protest hogra, an Arabic term referring to the loss of dignity due to perceived official indifference or contempt.

Ongoing economic dislocation stemming from structural inequities in the economy and COVID-19 prompted unrest in 2021. Most significantly, protests emerged after the August death of Yassine Lekhmidi, a 25-year-old man in Sidi Bennour. Lekhmidi's food cart was confiscated in July because he was not wearing a face mask; he paid a fine, but authorities did not return the cart. Lekhmidi then self-immolated, dying of his injuries in August. Hundreds subsequently protested in Sidi Bennour, while Moroccans nationwide followed events closely. However, in an apparent sign of the Makhzen's power, the protests did not have clear nationwide consequences.

While civil society organizations are active, they are subject to legal harassment, travel restrictions, intrusive surveillance, and other impediments to their work. The authorities routinely deny registration to nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) with links to Justice and Charity or that assert the rights of marginalized communities.

The Moroccan Association for Human Rights (AMDH), one of Morocco's most prominent NGOs, is frequently targeted by the government. The authorities have cancelled numerous AMDH events in recent years and are known to impede its efforts to rent space and open bank accounts. In 2020, its vice president was charged with defamation for criticizing the COVID-19-related confiscation of street merchants' goods in the city of Nador but was later acquitted.

Amnesty International has been prohibited from carrying out research in Morocco since 2015.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 2 / 4

Workers are permitted to form and join independent trade unions, and the 2004 labor law prevents employers from punishing workers who do so, but there are undue legal and employer restrictions on collective bargaining and strikes. The authorities sometimes forcibly break up labor-related protests. Unions are closely affiliated with political parties.

F. RULE OF LAW: 5 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 1 / 4

The court system is not independent of the monarch; the king chairs the Supreme Council of the Judiciary. In practice, the courts are regularly used to punish perceived opponents of the government, including dissenting Islamists, human rights and anticorruption activists, and critics of Moroccan rule in Western Sahara. Local courts are perceived as corrupt and serving powerful interests.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 1 / 4

Police frequently violate legal and procedural safeguards against arbitrary arrest and detention, and many convictions rely on confessions that are coerced. Pretrial detainees are reportedly held beyond a one-year limit, and there are no provisions in the law allowing for pretrial detainees to challenge their detentions in court. Some suspects, particularly those accused of terrorism, are held in secret detention for days or weeks before formal charges are filed.

Cases of excessive force by police and torture in custody continue to occur. Prisons often suffer from overcrowding, and prisoners faced heightened risks of contracting COVID-19.

Terrorism remains a threat to physical security in Morocco.

Constitutional reforms in 2011 granted official status to Tamazight languages, which have been promoted in schools along with Amazigh culture. Nevertheless, Amazigh and other communities that do not identify with the dominant Arab culture tend to face educational and economic disadvantages. Civil society groups that promote Amazigh rights have faced government interference.

Gender equality was also recognized in the 2011 constitution, but women continue to face significant discrimination at the societal level and are underrepresented in the labor force.

LGBT+ people face harsh discrimination and occasional violence. Same-sex sexual relations can be punished with up to three years in prison.

The government has granted temporary residency permits to refugees and migrants as part of an effort to regularize their status and provide them with basic services. However, many registered refugees living in Morocco still do not possess residency or work permits.

The decision of the United States in December 2020 to recognize Morocco's claims to Western Sahara emboldened Rabat to press other countries—especially Spain—to take similar steps. In May 2021, the government “weaponized” migration to protest Spain's April admission of Polisario Front leader Ibrahim Ghali for COVID-19 treatment: Moroccan authorities reportedly allowed several thousand migrants to enter the Spanish enclave of Ceuta, though Spain returned many of the migrants to Morocco.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 7 / 16G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 2 / 4

Moroccan law guarantees freedom of movement and the ability to change one's place of employment or education, but in practice poor economic conditions and corruption limit these rights. Widespread bribery, nepotism, and misconduct within the educational sector constrain merit-based advancement.

Well over a third of the land is collectively owned by tribes and managed by the Interior Ministry, and in recent years it has been subject to private development without fair compensation to previous occupants. Moreover, under tribal rules of inheritance, women cannot hold the rights to occupy and use such lands, leaving them more vulnerable to displacement. Ordinary inheritance rules also put women at a disadvantage, generally granting them half the property of an equivalent male heir.

Private business activity is hampered in part by the dominant role of the king, his family, and the Makhzen. Among other assets, Mohammed VI has a majority stake in Al Mada, a massive holding company with stakes in virtually every economic sector, including mining, tourism, food, banking, construction, and energy.

The 2004 family code granted women increased rights in the areas of marriage, divorce, and child custody, though a number of inequities and restrictions remain, and implementation of the code has been uneven.

All extramarital sexual activity is illegal, which deters rape survivors from bringing charges, among other repercussions.

Domestic violence is rarely reported or punished due to social stigma, though Moroccan NGOs offer support to domestic-violence survivors. A 2018 law criminalized domestic violence and forced marriage, and imposed more stringent penalties on those convicted of rape. Although the law was considered a step forward, critics faulted the legislation for failing to outlaw spousal rape, not providing a clear definition of domestic violence, and not mandating the government to provide greater support for survivors. In July 2020, a network of NGOs reported that domestic violence increased during the country's COVID-19 lockdown.

Poverty is widespread, and economic opportunities are scarce for a large portion of the population.

Child laborers, especially girls working as domestic helpers, are denied basic rights and are frequently abused by their employers. A 2018 labor law meant to protect young women employed as household workers requires employers to use written contracts, sets a minimum working age of 18 (after a five-year phase-in period during which 16- and 17-year-olds are allowed to work), mandates a day off each week, and sets a minimum wage. Rights groups criticized the legislation for failing to provide support to reintegrate domestic workers into society, and for permitting girls under 18 to work until 2023.

A 2016 law criminalized human trafficking; existing measures had defined and banned only some forms of trafficking and left many victims unprotected. Immigrant laborers, especially from sub-Saharan Africa, are often employed informally and subject to significant exploitation.

Mozambique

Population: 32,000,000

Capital: Maputo

Freedom Status: Partly Free

Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: The ruling party's unbroken incumbency before and since the first multiparty elections in 1994 has allowed it to establish significant control over state institutions. The opposition has disputed the results of recent elections, and its armed wing fought a low-level conflict against government forces that persisted until a truce was signed in 2016. Hundreds of thousands of people have since been internally displaced due to an ongoing Islamist insurgency. Mozambique also struggles with corruption, and journalists who report on it and other sensitive issues risk violent attacks.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- The ongoing Islamist insurgency in Cabo Delgado continued during the year, and the government reluctantly accepted support from regional partners, including Rwanda and the Southern African Development Community (SADC) in August, who helped reclaim significant territory. Security forces deployed to fight the insurgents have also been accused of extrajudicial killings, kidnappings, and other abuses.
- In August, the corruption trial began for the perpetrators of the 2016 “dividas ocultas” (“hidden debts”) scandal, when three companies secretly and illegally received a more than $2 billion loan. Nineteen defendants—former high-level government officials, former finance minister Manuel Chang, and the son of a former president—have been charged with corruption. President Filipe Nyusi, who was minister of defense at the time, has been cited by multiple defendants as having played a prominent role.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 14 / 40A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 3 / 12*A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 1 / 4

The president, who appoints the prime minister, is elected by popular vote for up to two five-year terms. President Nyusi of the Front for the Liberation of Mozambique (FRELIMO) won the presidential contest in 2019 with 73 percent of the vote. Additionally, because FRELIMO won the most votes in all provinces, it received the right to select all 10 of the country’s provincial governors. Turnout was reported at just over 50 percent.

The campaign was marred by violence, much of which targeted opposition members or their supporters, and several politicians and activists were killed. Anastácio Matavel, a respected independent election observer, was killed that October, with members of an elite police unit accused of carrying out the murder. Further violence was reported at dozens of polling stations on election day, as were instances of harassment of poll workers, notably those appointed by the opposition, with police taking part in the intimidation. Additionally, there were credible reports of ballot-box stuffing; interference with the registration of election observers; serious voting-register inaccuracies, particularly in Gaza Province; and tabulation irregularities. As in past elections, FRELIMO enjoyed a strong advantage due to its use of state resources to fund campaign activities and secure media coverage.

Opposition parties denounced the election as fraudulent. Civil society organizations characterized the polls as not free, unfair, nontransparent, and the worst since the introduction of multiparty democracy in 1994. They also argued that the ruling party had captured the electoral machinery through the National Elections Commission’s (CNE) appointment process. International observers from the Community of Portuguese Language Countries, the European Union, and the US embassy expressed concern about the reports of irregularities and election-related violence, but ultimately recognized the outcome.

Members of the 250-seat unicameral Assembly of the Republic are elected to five-year terms. The 2019 legislative elections were held concurrently with the presidential election. FRELIMO took 184 seats, up from 144 previously. The Mozambique National Resistance (RENAMO) won 60 seats, down from 89 previously, and the Democratic Movement of Mozambique (MDM) took 6 seats, down from 17 previously.

The legislative polls were marred by the same violence, irregularities, and fraud allegations as the presidential election. International observers objected to their conduct but accepted the results; opposition parties rejected the elections; and a coalition of civil society groups called them patently flawed.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 1 / 4

Elections are administered by the CNE and a support body, the Technical Secretariat for Electoral Administration. While the CNE's members hail from FRELIMO, RENAMO, the MDM, and civil society, FRELIMO effectively controls the selection process. Domestic and international observers have long argued that this structure has led to the politicization of the body and deeply undermines stakeholder confidence in its operations. Seven new CNE members were selected by the FRELIMO-controlled parliament in December 2020.

The CNE's administration of the 2019 elections drew sharp domestic and international criticism. Among other significant issues, large discrepancies emerged between the CNE's voter rolls and records kept by the National Institute of Statistics, notably in Gaza Province, a FRELIMO stronghold. CNE records showed more than 300,000 more registered voters in Gaza than voting-age adults counted in the 2017 census.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 7 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 2 / 4

The right to form political parties is largely respected. While many parties compete, most lack resources to campaign effectively and build a public following. Opposition leaders face harassment and threats for speaking out against the government. Figures within FRELIMO perceived as acting in conflict with the aims of the party can encounter obstacles, including intraparty disciplinary measures. In August 2021, the corruption trial of several former ministers and a son of former president Armando Guebuza began, creating tensions within the ruling party.

FRELIMO first took power when Mozambique gained independence in 1975 and has maintained it since the 1992 agreement that ended the country's civil war and the 1994 multiparty elections. Since then, FRELIMO has maintained an electoral advantage by using public resources to fund campaign activities.

In 2018, the parliament overwhelmingly approved constitutional reforms that would allow the indirect election of provincial governors, district administrators, and mayors. The changes were viewed as beneficial to RENAMO and a step toward greater decentralization and political stability. However, because FRELIMO secured an overwhelming victory in the severely flawed 2019 elections, ostensibly winning the most votes in all provinces, it selected all the country's provincial governors, effectively nullifying the constitutional reforms.

Unelected elites in FRELIMO, including military figures and powerful businesspeople, retain great influence and play a large role in shaping the party's platform. Civil servants face acute pressure to campaign and vote for the ruling party, and to make financial contributions to it. Those who openly support opposition candidates face intimidation by elements of the party embedded in state administration and the police.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 2 / 4

Ethnic minorities are generally able to participate fully in political life, and people from various ethnic groups hold high-level government positions. However, FRELIMO's support base lies in the extreme north and extreme south, and ethnic groups concentrated in other regions, such as the Ndau and Macua, are underrepresented. In 2019, three districts affected by the regional conflict in Cabo Delgado Province could not vote for security reasons. Many ethnic-minority voters who live there, notably members of the Makonde and Mwani ethnic groups that are concentrated in the region, were effectively disenfranchised. Women hold 42.4 percent of seats in the parliament, and a few were appointed to notable cabinet roles in a January 2020 reshuffle. Nevertheless, men continue to hold most key political positions.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 4 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 1 / 4

Power remains generally centralized in the executive branch, which dominates the parliament and all other branches of government. The 2018 constitutional reforms introduced some measures to reduce centralization but were effectively overridden by FRELIMO's victory in the severely flawed 2019 elections.

Foreign donors have significant influence on policymaking, specifically as it relates to economic policy and public sector reform. Business elites connected to FRELIMO have a strong impact on government decisions, particularly on those related to foreign investment in the oil, gas, and agriculture sectors.

Corruption remains widespread at the highest levels of government. Patronage networks are deeply entrenched, with various groupings competing for state resources. The anticorruption legal framework is undermined by a variety of loopholes: for example, embezzlement is not included in the Anti-Corruption Law. The judiciary, susceptible to pressure from the executive branch, further impedes the enforcement of anticorruption laws.

In August 2021, the corruption trial began for the perpetrators of the 2016 “dividas ocultas” (“hidden debts”) scandal, when three companies secretly and illegally received a more than $2 billion loan. Nineteen defendants—former high-level government officials, former finance minister Manuel Chang who approved the illegal loans, and the son of a former president—have been charged with corruption. President Nyusi, who was minister of defense at the time, has been cited by multiple defendants as having played a prominent role.

However, in November 2021, a South African court ruled that Chang should be extradited to the United States, where he was indicted in a New York district court in 2018; Chang had been imprisoned in South Africa since 2018. Mozambican authorities challenged the ruling.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 2 / 4

Despite the passage of a freedom of information law in 2014, it is difficult to obtain government information in practice. The government is especially opaque regarding the Islamist insurgency in Cabo Delgado Province.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 29 / 60D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 9 / 16*D1. Are there free and independent media? 2 / 4

State-run outlets dominate the Mozambican media sector, and authorities often direct such outlets to provide coverage favorable to the government. However, several smaller independent outlets provide important coverage. Journalists frequently experience government pressure, harassment, and intimidation, which encourages self-censorship.

The government is known to retaliate against journalists who criticize them, including by cancelling public advertising contracts. Journalists and political commentators appearing on television programs have been the targets of attacks and kidnappings in recent years.

Police frequently harass, assault, and detain journalists. In October 2021, police officers assaulted reporter Armando Nenane in Maputo after covering a traffic accident; the officers demanded that he erase video footage on his phone.

Religious freedom is generally respected, but government responses to attacks by armed Islamists have involved closing mosques and detaining Muslim leaders, alarming human rights activists.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 2 / 4

There are no legal restrictions on academic freedom. However, academics have been hesitant to criticize the government since law professor Gilles Cistac was murdered after supporting RENAMO in a televised appearance in 2015.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 2 / 4

Civil society groups claim that authorities monitor criticism of the government posted online. There have been reports of government intelligence agents monitoring the emails of opposition party members.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 6 / 12E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 2 / 4

Freedom of assembly is constitutionally guaranteed, but the right to assemble is subject to notification and timing restrictions. The government frequently disallows protests due to errors in the organizers' official applications.

Despite these obstacles, protests do take place. In May 2021 in Tete Province, laborers protested outside the headquarters of Brazilian mining company Vale before a meeting between government representatives and the company about compensation claims. During the demonstration, two people were injured and many were detained by police.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 2 / 4

Most nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) operate without significant legal restriction. However, rights defenders and members of groups perceived as critical of the government continue to report acts of intimidation, which increased ahead of the 2019 election. NGOs involved in election-monitoring activity reported significant obstruction and harassment, including death threats.

The Mozambican Association for the Defense of Sexual Minorities (LAMBDA) has applied for registration multiple times since 2008 without success. While LAMBDA has operated with the occasional cooperation of local authorities, its legal status remains unresolved.

Humanitarian operations in northern Mozambique have some restrictions to operate freely because of violence in the region.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 2 / 4

Workers have the right to form unions, but several restrictions impede the right to strike and make the practice rare. Public-sector workers are not allowed to strike.

F. RULE OF LAW: 6 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 2 / 4

Judicial independence is hampered by the dominance of the executive branch. The attorney general is directly appointed by the president, with no legislative confirmation process. Pressure from FRELIMO's leadership often impedes investigations into corruption and fraud. While former president Armando Guebuza and members of his administration have been implicated in fraud and embezzlement, prosecutions were not promptly launched against them, though Guebuza-era finance minister Manuel Chang was eventually charged for corruption in late 2020. Observers claim that this historical inaction results from the influence of FRELIMO's leadership.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 2 / 4

Although due process rights are constitutionally guaranteed, these rights are not always respected in practice. RENAMO leaders assert that the police arrest members of their party arbitrarily. Due to resource constraints and an understaffed judiciary, lengthy pretrial detentions are common.

Fighting between RENAMO and FRELIMO lasted for over a year before the parties agreed to a truce in late 2016. While a formal agreement was reached in August 2019, a dissident group of RENAMO fighters resisted demobilization. In August and September 2020, this group reportedly launched several attacks against civilians in central Mozambique, leading to several dozen deaths. Mariano Nhongo, the leader of the dissident group, was killed in October 2021 in an apparent military operation, though the details are unclear.

Residents of Cabo Delgado Province continue to suffer from violence and displacement due to an ongoing Islamist insurgency. Insurgents captured towns in the north during 2020, killing and kidnapping civilians. Fighting continued in 2021, and the government reluctantly accepted support from regional partners, including Rwanda and the SADC, who helped reclaim significant territory. Security forces deployed to fight the insurgents have also been accused of extrajudicial killings, kidnappings, and other abuses.

Mozambican police reportedly discriminate against Zimbabwean, Somali, and Chinese immigrants. People with albinism continued to face discrimination, persecution, and violence.

Women experience discrimination in education and employment; on average, women are less educated and earn less than men. Sexual harassment in the workplace and at schools remains widespread. Homosexuality was decriminalized in 2015, but LGBT+ people face significant discrimination.

The number of internally displaced persons (IDPs) has increased in Cabo Delgado and Niassa provinces due to the escalating conflict. In September 2021, a Rwandan refugee living in Mozambique was murdered. Many Rwandan refugees, some of whom fled violence perpetrated by the Rwandan military, have reported feeling unsafe due to the Rwandan army's presence in Cabo Delgado.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 8 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 2 / 4

Although Mozambicans face no formal restrictions on domestic or international travel, movement is hampered by the presence of checkpoints manned by corrupt police officials, who often harass and demand bribes from travelers.

Hundreds of thousands of Mozambicans have been displaced due to the ongoing insurgency in Cabo Delgado Province. In December 2021, the Office of the UN High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) recorded over 744,000 IDPs in Mozambique, mostly from Cabo Delgado. Many IDPs resided in the provincial capital of Pemba, pushing authorities to create a resettlement plan to decongest the city. Authorities in Niassa Province have also asked for help managing the displaced population.

The law does not recognize private property outside urbanized areas; citizens instead obtain land use rights from the government. Many citizens are uninformed about the land law and fail to properly register their holdings. The government must approve all formal transfers of land use rights in an often opaque and protracted process. As a result, most land transactions occur on an extralegal market.

There is no legal restriction to private business. However, businesspeople do face kidnappings and extortion.

Under customary law, women usually cannot inherit property. The government does not frequently intervene to protect women's property rights when inheritance is denied.

Domestic violence is pervasive in Mozambique and laws against it are infrequently enforced. Early and forced marriages remain common in rural areas.

Mozambique has historically possessed one of the world's highest rates of child marriage, though the government passed legislation closing a loophole that previously allowed the practice in 2019. Children and women have been especially impacted by ongoing violence in Cabo Delgado. Insurgents have kidnapped children to be used as soldiers, and women are being captured as sexual slaves.

Many women and girls from rural areas are at risk of becoming drawn into sex trafficking and domestic servitude. Government efforts to confront trafficking are improving but remain inadequate, according to the US State Department's 2021 Trafficking in Persons Report, which also stated that the authorities did not proactively identify survivors outside of criminal cases and have not enacted an action plan or legislation that would better support them.

Child labor is permitted for children between 15 and 17 years old with a government permit. However, children under 15 frequently labor in the agriculture, mining, and fishing sectors, where they often work long hours and do not attend school. Many observers note that the government's 2017 plan of action to address the high number of children who are employed has been ineffective.

Myanmar

Population: 55,500,000

Capital: Nay Pyi Taw

Freedom Status: Not Free

Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: Myanmar's already-stalled democratic transition was completely derailed in February 2021, when the military, known as the Tatmadaw, seized control of the government, arresting dozens of senior government officials and preventing the newly elected parliament from convening. The National League for Democracy (NLD), which won a sweeping victory in the November 2020 elections, led a broad-based opposition to the takeover, organizing a country-wide Civil Disobedience Movement (CDM) that continued throughout the year. Protesters were met with indiscriminate violence from military forces, and journalists, activists, and ordinary people risked criminal charges and detention for voicing dissent. Armed conflict between the military and ethnic rebel groups continued, as did the forced displacement of hundreds of thousands of Rohingya, a mostly Muslim ethnic minority.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- Alleging fraud and irregularities in the November 2020 elections, the military carried out a coup in February, hours before the newly elected parliament was due to be seated. After taking power, the military declared a state of emergency, imposed a broad-based communications shutdown, expanded the range of laws used to punish dissent, and arrested dozens of political and cultural figures—including both President Win Myint and State Counselor Aung San Suu Kyi.
 - A group of ousted elected lawmakers formed the National Unity Government (NUG) in April as an alternate power base to the military regime. The widely popular NUG operated as a shadow government throughout the year, with its members in hiding or in exile.
 - In August, Min Aung Hlaing declared himself prime minister and head of a caretaker government that would enforce military rule until August 2023, when the military has promised to hold new elections.
 - The widespread CDM gathered steam in the weeks after the coup and continued throughout the year, involving multiple political parties and civil society groups. By the end of the year, more than 11,000 protesters had been arrested, almost 1,400 had been killed by military forces, and nearly 2,000 faced criminal charges handed down by the junta, while others were subjected to grave abuses, including torture, in overcrowded prisons.
 - Fighting between the army and ethnic minority groups in Chin, Kachin, Karen, Rakhine, and Shan States intensified during the year, displacing thousands of civilians and limiting free movement. Ethnic rebel groups provided sanctuary to those seeking to escape the military regime.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 0 / 40 (-13)

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 0 / 12 (-5)

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4 (-2)

Under the 2008 military-drafted constitution, the legislature elects the president, who serves as chief of state and head of government and makes a number of key ministerial appointments. Military members of the legislature have the right to nominate one of the three presidential candidates, and the elected members of each chamber nominate the other two. The candidate with the largest number of votes in a combined parliamentary vote wins the presidency; the other two candidates become vice presidents, ensuring that a military nominee is always either president or vice president. The commander in chief of the armed forces retained broad powers under the 2008 constitution, including control over security-related cabinet ministries (home, defense, and border affairs), and is selected through an opaque process by the military-dominated National Defense and Security Council (NDSC).

A new president was set to be selected in early 2021, following the November 2020 parliamentary elections; this process was disrupted by the February 2021 military coup, which dissolved parliament and installed a military junta led by the unelected Senior General Min Aung Hlaing, head of the armed forces. President Win Myint and State Counselor Aung San Suu Kyi, de facto leader of the NLD, were both detained in the early hours of the coup, along with over one hundred other political leaders. In early December, the military regime sentenced Win Myint and Suu Kyi to four years' imprisonment on charges of incitement; soon after, the sentences were reduced to two years. In addition, Suu Kyi has been charged with illegally importing communications equipment, violating pandemic restrictions, corruption, electoral fraud, and breaching the Official Secrets Act. The military retained control of the government throughout 2021.

Score Change: The score declined from 2 to 0 because the president and reelected civilian government officials were ousted in a military coup.

The bicameral Assembly of the Union consists of the 440-seat lower House of Representatives and the 224-seat upper House of Nationalities. Representatives serve five-year terms. A quarter of the seats in both houses are reserved for the military and are filled through appointment by the commander in chief of the armed forces. The remainder are filled through direct elections in a first-past-the-post system.

The 2020 parliamentary elections featured significant flaws, including the exclusion of many Muslim candidates and the disenfranchisement of hundreds of thousands of Rohingya. The Union Election Commission (UEC) canceled voting in a number of conflict-affected districts, preventing about one million people from electing new representatives. Other electoral flaws included limited access of opposition parties to state-run media during the campaign period and pandemic-related restrictions on in-person campaigning.

The NLD won a convincing majority in the overall popular vote, taking 138 of the 168 elected seats in the upper house, 258 of the 330 elected seats in the lower house, and 501 of 660 elected seats across 14 state and regional legislatures. The military-backed Union Solidarity and Development Party (USDP) refused to accept the election results, alleging widespread fraud.

In February 2021, hours before a new session of parliament was set to begin, the military seized control of the government, imposing a state of emergency, dissolving parliament, and preventing elected representatives from taking their seats. Several elected officials were detained, and hundreds more were placed under house arrest.

Score Change: The score declined from 2 to 0 because the military coup prevented recently elected members of parliament from convening.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 0 / 4 (-1)

Various features of the electoral framework have undermined the democratic nature of recent elections. These include the military's role in presidential nominations and appointments to both chambers of parliament, as well as rigid citizenship laws and excessive residency requirements that prevent large numbers of people from voting or standing for office.

The UEC, which is responsible for electoral administration, is empowered to adjudicate complaints against itself. Its members are appointed by the president and confirmed by the legislature, which has only limited authority to reject nominees. In 2020, UEC decisions to limit or cancel voting in several dozen townships populated by ethnic minority groups, as well as its rules surrounding access to and censorship of broadcast time allotted to political parties, were criticized as lacking sufficient transparency and disenfranchising voters.

After seizing power in February 2021, military leadership cited the USDP's fraud allegations, flaws in electoral administration during the 2020 elections, and the NLD's "failure" to address alleged voter list irregularities to justify rejecting the 2020 election results and deposing the elected government. The military regime also dissolved the UEC before reinstating the body with all new members, later charging a number of former UEC commissioners with electoral fraud. In July, the new UEC officially overturned the results of the November 2020 vote, and the following month, Min Aung Hlaing announced that new elections would be held in August 2023, extending the military's initial one-year timeline.

Less than a month after taking power, the military regime proposed that the current first-past-the-post system be replaced with a proportional representation system. In October, the reconstituted UEC announced that it plans to introduce the change prior to the country's next elections despite widespread criticism of the proposed change, which opposition parties claim is an attempt to keep the military in power.

Score Change: The score declined from 1 to 0 because the military effectively suspended the constitution and overturned existing electoral laws, rejecting election results that had been confirmed by the Union Election Commission.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 3 / 16 (-5)

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 1 / 4 (-2)

Party competition in the lead-up to the 2020 elections was robust, with 7,000 candidates from more than 90 parties participating, including the NLD, the USDP, and regionally based ethnic parties. Following the February 2021 coup, political parties continued to function, despite facing considerable restrictions and harassment. A number of prominent lawmakers and nonmilitary political leaders have been arrested by the military regime, and some have been charged with criminal offenses and put on trial, including much of the NLD leadership.

Following the 2021 coup, a group of previously elected officials unseated by the military regime formed the Committee Representing Pyidaungsu Hluttaw (CRPH), which claims to represent a legitimate parliament and perform the duties of an elected government. In April, the CRPH established the National Unity Government (NUG), a resistance government largely made up of ousted NLD politicians. Throughout 2021, the NUG operated as an alternate power structure with influence over small pockets of the country, and organized countrywide opposition to the coup. Shortly after the NUG was formed, Myanmar's military leadership classified the NUG, its armed People's Defense Force (PDF), and the CRPH as terrorist organizations, which could result in prosecution and detention for anyone who communicates with the groups' members.

The constitution contains a requirement that political parties be loyal to the state, which carries the potential for abuse. Laws allow penalties, including deregistration, for political parties that accept support from foreign governments or religious bodies, or that are deemed to have abused religion for political purposes or disrespected the constitution. In August 2021, the UEC announced plans to conduct financial audits of political parties, which many opposition leaders fear will be used to justify dissolving certain parties.

Score Change: The score declined from 3 to 1 due to the mass arrest of political party leaders and the suspension of ordinary political activity during the military coup and state of emergency.

The military's constitutional prerogatives, as well as its close ties to the USDP, limit the degree to which any other force can secure control over the executive or the legislature through elections. Despite such limitations, the NLD won a convincing majority in the November 2020 elections. Following the coup in February 2021, the military announced that new elections would be held within a year; in August, Min Aung Hlaing announced that the military's timeline had been extended, and new elections would not be held until August 2023. While there was no immediate electoral opportunity through which the opposition could gain power during 2021, the shadow NUG gained strength as an alternative power base, due in part to its ability to fundraise and form alliances.

Score Change: The score declined from 2 to 1 because the military's seizure of power sharply reduced the prospects of a change in government through elections.

After the NLD came to power in 2015, the military's ability to influence electoral outcomes lessened, though it maintained considerable power over political affairs. The November 2020 elections, however, resulted in the defeat of the military's civilian proxy party, which was widely viewed as an endorsement of Aung San Suu Kyi's civilian government. The military refused to accept the election results, and in February 2021, seized control of the government. Following the coup, the military used force to contain the widespread protests against military rule that continued throughout the year—including the arrest of political leaders and civilian protestors, excessive violence and custodial abuse, and mass killings—in an attempt to secure its takeover.

Score Change: The score declined from 2 to 0 due to the military leadership's consistent and widespread use of armed force to secure its rule and control political outcomes during and after the coup.

Members of Myanmar's Buddhist and ethnic Bamar majority hold most senior leadership positions in the country, including in major national political parties, the pre-2021 civilian government, and the military. Members of ethnic and religious minority groups face restrictions on their political rights and electoral opportunities, including through discriminatory citizenship, residency, and party registration laws.

The 1982 Citizenship Law does not allow for anyone who entered the country or is descended from someone who entered the country after 1948 to become a full citizen with political rights. Naturalization of spouses is only allowed if the spouse holds a Foreigner's Registration Certificate from before the law's enactment. The majority of the mainly Muslim Rohingya were rendered stateless by the 1982 Citizenship Law, which also dictates that only those who are descended from ethnic groups deemed to be native to the country prior to 1823 are considered full citizens. A 2015 presidential decree revoked the temporary identification cards that had allowed Rohingya to vote, and most of the 600,000 Rohingya remaining in Myanmar were unable to vote in the 2020 elections.

Women remain underrepresented in the government and civil service, due largely to societal biases that discourage their political participation. Notwithstanding the prominence of Aung San Suu Kyi, whose father led Myanmar's independence struggle, few women have achieved ministerial-level appointments.

Following the February 2021 coup, the General Strike Committee of Nationalities (GSCN) was formed by members of 29 ethnic groups. The GSCN was established to support antimilitary protests and present the coordinated demands of Myanmar's minority groups, which include an end to military rule and the creation of a federal democratic union. The NUG and CRPH have also made a concerted effort to include members of Myanmar's ethnic groups, and have formed alliances with many of the country's Ethnic Armed Organizations (EAOs) in opposition to Tatmadaw rule.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 1 / 12 (-3)

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 0 / 4 (-2)

In February 2021, the military deposed the sitting government, prevented newly elected representatives from taking office, and assumed full control over all areas of government policy. The 2008 constitution allows the military to dissolve the civilian government and the parliament and rule directly if the president declares a state of emergency. The military used this provision to execute the 2021 coup; after arresting senior government leaders, military forces declared a state of emergency and assumed control of the government.

Effective governance and control over territory in some regions remains contested between the armed forces and ethnic minority rebel groups. Following the 2021 coup, many of these groups offered protection for those fleeing from military violence.

Since May 2021, the NUG, composed of previously elected representatives, has operated as a shadow government with considerable popularity and legitimacy, although it does not exercise control over state institutions or decision-making.

Score Change: The score declined from 2 to 0 because the military coup prevented duly elected executive and legislative representatives from taking office and determining government policy.

Despite government initiatives aimed at curbing official corruption, it remains rampant at both the national and local levels. An Anti-Corruption Commission (ACC), established in 2014, had brought a number of cases against high-ranking officials. Following the 2021 coup, the military brought multiple corruption charges against Aung San Suu Kyi, including bribery; she has denied the charges, and no evidence was produced in trial hearings apart from witness statements. In December, the military regime brought a corruption charge against Win Myint.

Privatization of state-owned companies and other economic reforms in recent years have allegedly benefited family members and associates of military and government officials. After the February 2021 coup, the children of high-ranking military leaders allegedly attempted to use their connections to secure lucrative supply contracts and other kickbacks.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 0 / 4 (-1)

After the Tatmadaw took power in 2021, the already limited transparency mechanisms of the previous government were dismantled; oversight by civil society groups and the media has been completely suppressed under military rule.

The military also owns an extensive network of “crony companies” whose revenues enable it to avoid accountability and public oversight and engage in human rights violations with impunity, according to a UN report released in 2019.

Score Change: The score declined from 1 to 0 because the military leadership further suppressed state and nonstate transparency mechanisms following the coup, including oversight by legislators, independent media, and civil society groups.

ADDITIONAL DISCRETIONARY POLITICAL RIGHTS QUESTION

Is the government or occupying power deliberately changing the ethnic composition of a country or territory so as to destroy a culture or tip the political balance in favor of another group? -4 / 0

The central authorities have long used violence, displacement, and other tactics to alter the demographics of states with ethnic unrest or insurgencies. The Rohingya in Rakhine State have faced particularly harsh restrictions for decades, including limits on family size and the ability and right to marry, the denial of legal status and social services, and disenfranchisement and loss of citizenship. Human rights experts and the United Nations have labeled the abuses against the Rohingya as crimes against humanity and ethnic cleansing, and many have argued that they constitute either genocide or a precursor to genocide.

In 2017, repression against the Rohingya escalated; military operations across the northern part of the state led to reports of torture, rape, indiscriminate killings, and the burning of villages, worsening already dire humanitarian conditions and causing 740,000 Rohingya refugees to join the 200,000 others already in Bangladesh. Aung San Suu Kyi, then head of state, did not explicitly acknowledge or condemn such organized official violence against Rohingya civilians; there has been little meaningful accountability for the atrocities. In 2020, the International Court of Justice (ICJ) ruled that mass human rights violations had been committed against the Rohingya and ordered the government to implement emergency measures to protect the group; proceedings at the ICJ continued in 2021.

Though the UN's Independent Investigative Mechanism for Myanmar (IIMM) continued to collect evidence and interview witnesses in 2021, the February 2021 coup and subsequent closure of the country limited international observers' access to Myanmar, further frustrating efforts to hold perpetrators accountable.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 9 / 60 (-6)

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 3 / 16 (-2)

D1. Are there free and independent media? 1 / 4

Following the coup in 2021, the military seized control of state-owned broadcast media, took private broadcasters off the air, and severely restricted internet access, including access to social media platforms and news outlets. Licenses for several independent media organizations were rescinded in March. However, a number of independent media outlets continued to provide news coverage, operating in hiding and in exile.

In February, the military amended sections of the criminal code and the Electronic Transactions Law to include provisions criminalizing antiregime statements. Human rights groups have warned that the amendments disproportionately affect independent media outlets, and enable the regime to easily detain and prosecute journalists. Dozens of journalists have been forced to flee following the military's crackdown on press freedoms; according to the Committee to Protect Journalists (CPJ), more than 100 journalists were arrested in 2021. Though the regime released several journalists throughout the year, many of those jailed face criminal charges.

The constitution provides for freedom of religion. It distinguishes Buddhism as the majority religion, but also recognizes Christianity, Islam, Hinduism, and animism. The government occasionally interferes with religious assemblies and attempts to control the Buddhist clergy. Authorities discriminate against minority religious groups—particularly Muslims—in practice, refusing them permission to hold gatherings and restricting educational activities, proselytization, and construction and repair of houses of worship.

Anti-Muslim hate speech and discrimination have been amplified by social media, and by some state institutions and mainstream news websites. The officially illegal Buddha Dhamma Parahita Foundation, formerly known as Ma Ba Tha, agitates for the protection of Buddhist privileges, urges boycotts against Muslim-run businesses, and disseminates anti-Muslim propaganda. Muslims face systematic discrimination in obtaining identity cards, and “Muslim-free” villages have been established with the complicity of officials.

Political activity on university campuses is generally restricted, and universities are not autonomous. Student unions—which have historically been important advocates for human rights—are discouraged, have no formal registration mechanisms, and are viewed with suspicion by authorities. A 2018 directive from the Ministry of Education required students to submit detailed information in order to get permission to hold events on campus.

University students and staff played a key role in antimilitary protests and strikes following the February 2021 coup; in March, the military stormed dozens of universities, seizing control of the campuses and arresting hundreds of students and faculty members. In May, more than 11,000 university staff were suspended for striking in protest against the military coup, and those who were not suspended were pressured into declaring allegiance to the ruling junta.

Score Change: The score declined from 1 to 0 because universities were subjected to military raids and mass staff suspensions after students and faculty expressed opposition to the coup.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 1 / 4 (-1)

Private discussion and personal expression—already constrained by state surveillance and laws inhibiting online speech—became more difficult following the 2021 coup. Upon taking power, the regime enacted sweeping revisions of existing legal code, removing several key human rights protections, including those against arbitrary surveillance. The legal reforms also included amendments to the penal code that severely curtailed freedom of expression. In March, the military banned the use of circumvention tools such as virtual private networks (VPNs) and other communications technology in an attempt to keep people from evading surveillance.

Hundreds of people were arrested and prosecuted under the revised legal code, usually for comments made online; hundreds of others have been forced into hiding or exile to avoid arrest, and a smaller number were killed in protests or targeted for attack.

Score Change: The score declined from 2 to 1 due to mass arrests of social media users and new restrictions on communications technology in the wake of the coup.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 2 / 12 (-3)

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 0 / 4 (-1)

Freedom of assembly has been increasingly restricted in recent years. A blanket ban on protests in 11 townships of central Yangon has been in place since 2017, and in 2020, an extended internet shutdown in parts of Rakhine and Chin states severely impeded activists' ability to organize protests. Unauthorized demonstrations are punishable with up to six months in prison under the Peaceful Assembly and Peaceful Procession Law; a variety of other vaguely defined violations can draw lesser penalties.

After the 2021 coup, freedom of assembly was violently curtailed in response to widespread antimilitary protests. Within a week of taking power, the military banned all gatherings of more than five people, imposed a strict curfew, and began using lethal and indiscriminate force against peaceful protesters. Widespread internet restrictions were also deployed to hinder the organization of protests. Military violence in response to protests continued throughout the year, resulting in the deaths of hundreds of protesters and the arrest of thousands more.

Score Change: The score declined from 1 to 0 due to the military's crackdown on protests following the coup, which included curfews, mass arrests, internet shutdowns, and the extensive use of lethal force.

The ability of nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) to engage in human rights- and governance-related work significantly decreased after the 2021 military coup. Activists face arrest and prosecution, and many prominent activists have been forced to go into hiding or exile; in some cases, family members of activists have been arrested as a pressure tactic. In March, the regime introduced new restrictions on NGO activity, including pausing all NGO registration and renewal processes, and began to heavily monitor NGO bank activity. NGOs were increasingly subject to harassment and interference by authorities throughout the year, and a large number of NGOs effectively shut down or disbanded. Despite such limitations, a number continue to quietly monitor human rights abuses and engage in advocacy with international stakeholders.

Score Change: The score declined from 2 to 1 because the military increased pressure on human rights activists following the coup, in part by detaining their family members, and the broader crisis obstructed the work of humanitarian organizations.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 1 / 4 (-1)

Union activity took root in Myanmar following the lifting of the ban on trade unions in 2011, despite weak legal protections for workers against abuse by employers. In 2021, unions played a leading role in organizing antimilitary protests and strikes immediately following the coup. In response, military authorities declared most unions illegal, and conducted violent raids and mass arrests in areas populated by striking union workers; the regime also threatened dozens of key leaders with arrest, causing many to flee. By June, thousands of civil servants and private sector employees had been fired for their participation in the widespread CDM.

Score Change: The score declined from 2 to 1 due to a wave of reprisals against unions that participated in civil disobedience actions, including bans, raids, dismissals, arrests, and extrajudicial killings.

F. RULE OF LAW: 0 / 16 (-1)

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 0 / 4

The judiciary is not independent. Judges are nominated by the president, and lawmakers can reject the choice only if it is clearly proven that the nominee does not meet the legal qualifications for the post. The courts generally adjudicate cases in accordance with the government's interests, particularly in major cases with political implications.

Following the February 2021 coup, the military regime took control of Myanmar's judicial system.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 0 / 4 (-1)

Following the 2021 military coup, revisions to the criminal code and the imposition of an indefinite state of emergency allowed the regime to remove existing safeguards against arbitrary arrest and detention. In March, the Tatmadaw declared martial law in 11 townships of Yangon and Mandalay, enabling military tribunals to impose death sentences on civilians; by the end of 2021, military tribunals had sentenced more than 90 civilians to death.

The number of political prisoners rose dramatically in 2021; most were arrested while protesting, although dozens of prominent political leaders and several cultural figures were specifically targeted. According to the Assistance Association for Political Prisoners (AAPP), as of December 2021, 11,296 individuals had been arrested; an additional 1,964 arrest warrants remained open.

Score Change: The score declined from 1 to 0 due to the suspension of existing safeguards against abuse of power by security forces and the widespread use of arbitrary arrest and detention during the military coup and state of emergency.

The February 2021 military coup resulted in a sharp increase in civilian exposure to violence, armed conflict, and the illegitimate use of physical force. Indiscriminate shelling and aerial attacks, the destruction of villages, extrajudicial killings, forced disappearances, arbitrary detentions, torture, rape, and other abuses by the military escalated during 2021. In December, 40 civilians were burned alive by military forces in Kayah State.

Long-standing armed conflicts between ethnic rebel groups and the central government continued in 2021 in Shan, Kachin, Kayin, Chin, and Rakhine States. Even ethnically Bamar areas, particularly Sagaing Region and major urban centers including Yangon and Mandalay, experienced high levels of violent conflict between Tatmadaw forces and antimilitary protesters. Military attacks on peaceful protesters, including the use of lethal force, took place across the country; in response, civilian youth across the country formed armed people's defense forces (PDFs) that carried out guerilla attacks against military targets. After the NUG declared a "people's war" against the military in September, it engaged in efforts to coordinate among the shadow government, the PDFs, and ethnic rebel groups.

The number of displaced civilians increased throughout the year, with those displaced by earlier rounds of fighting in ethnic areas joined by those fleeing the newly installed military regime; between February and December, more than 400,000 civilians were displaced.

Prisons in Myanmar are severely overcrowded, and conditions for inmates are sometimes life-threatening. Following the coup, prison conditions further deteriorated, as numbers of detainees rapidly increased and grave abuses that had been prevalent during previous periods of military rule resurfaced. Sanitary conditions in prisons are extremely poor, and authorities have reportedly taken few measures to curb the spread of the COVID-19 virus within the prison system; in 2021, at least 12 inmates died after contracting COVID-19, and hundreds more tested positive for the virus.

Some of the country's worst human rights abuses, commonly committed by federal military troops, are against ethnic and religious minority populations. The government's failure to protect victims, conduct investigations, and punish perpetrators is well documented. The post-coup period in 2021 was characterized by further deterioration in the country's human rights situation and a lack of accountability for offenders.

Ethnic minority groups such as the Shan, Mon, Chin, Karen, and Kachin, as well as non-Rohingya Muslims, also face some societal discrimination, while the ethnic Bamar, Buddhist majority retains a privileged position.

In addition to conflict-related violence, women are subject to discrimination in employment, against which there are no explicit legal protections. A number of laws create a hostile environment for LGBT+ residents. Same-sex sexual activity is criminalized, and police reportedly harass, extort, and physically and sexually abuse LGBT+ people.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 4 / 16G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 1 / 4

Prior to 2021, freedom of internal travel for Myanmar citizens was generally respected outside of conflict zones. However, after the coup in February 2021, movement was increasingly restricted across the country. The military erected road blocks and checkpoints; enforced exit controls, curfews, and residency rules for private dwellings that require reporting overnight guests; engaged in violent raids of neighborhoods and villages; and regularly responded with disproportionate force to ongoing civic action. Some high-profile dissidents were arrested as they attempted to leave Myanmar by air, while thousands more have fled to neighboring countries by land despite the dangers posed by military forces.

Additionally, Myanmar's large population of stateless residents remain subject to significant restrictions on their movement, particularly the 600,000 Rohingya who remain in Rakhine State and are confined to designated camps and villages; those who attempt to travel outside these areas are regularly arrested and detained.

Disputes over land grabbing and business projects that violate human rights are common. Myanmar's property-transfer laws prohibit transfers to or from a foreigner except in certain state-approved cases of inheritance, and require registration of foreign-owned property. Stateless residents, including the Rohingya, cannot legally buy or sell property or set up a business.

Instances of forced eviction and displacement, confiscation, lack of sufficient compensation, and direct violence against landholders by state security officials abound. Court cases are frequently brought against farmers for trespassing on land that was taken from them. The resumption of armed hostilities following the coup led to military attacks and arbitrary destruction of property—including entire villages—in 2021.

Multiple sources continued to report that Rohingya land and property have been razed, confiscated, appropriated, or built on, often with the direct involvement of the military, and sometimes under the guise of development assistance.

Men and women formally enjoy equal rights on personal status issues, though there are restrictions on marriages of Buddhist women to non-Buddhist men. Laws that might protect women from domestic abuse and rape are weak and poorly enforced, and such violence is an acute and persistent problem. The army has a record of using rape as a weapon of war against ethnic minority women, and security personnel typically enjoy impunity for sexual violence. Following the 2021 coup, numerous instances of gender-based violence were reported by detainees.

Human trafficking, forced labor, child labor, and the recruitment of child soldiers are serious problems in Myanmar. Child soldiers are enlisted by the military and ethnic rebel groups, which also recruit civilians for forced labor. Various commercial and other interests continue to use forced labor despite a formal ban on the practice. Trafficking victims include women and girls subjected to forced sex work and domestic servitude, as well as women who are sold as brides to men in China—an expanding practice in some ethnic minority states. People displaced by ongoing conflicts are especially vulnerable to sexual and labor exploitation.

Namibia

Population: 2,600,000

Capital: Windhoek

Freedom Status: Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: While Namibia is a multiparty democracy, the South West Africa People's Organisation (SWAPO) has ruled since independence. Protections for civil liberties are generally robust. Minority ethnic groups accuse the government of favoring the majority Ovambo in allocating services. The nomadic San people suffer from poverty and marginalization. Other human rights concerns include police brutality, the criminalization of same-sex sexual relations, and discrimination against women.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- In September, the Electoral Court ordered a recount of the 2020 regional elections for the Ndonga Linena constituency, following complaints from the losing party. Though SWAPO, which initially had won the election, also won the recount, in October, President Hage Geingob encouraged SWAPO supporters to retaliate against the Electoral Commission of Namibia (ECN) for permitting the rejection of the initial results.
- In July, SWAPO pushed through appointments for the leadership of the Anti-Corruption Commission (ACC) and the ECN during brief windows of time between COVID-19-related suspensions of parliamentary sessions. Opposition parties claimed the appointments were performed illegally, though their August bid for the High Court overturn them failed.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 31 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 11 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The president is both chief of state and head of government and is directly elected for up to two five-year terms. In 2019, Hage Geingob of the South West Africa People's Organisation (SWAPO) was reelected with 56.3 percent of the vote. While international observers deemed polls peaceful and credible, concerns were raised about the lack of verifiable paper trail, long waiting times, and delays in the counting and release of results.

The National Council, the upper chamber of the bicameral parliament, has 42 seats, with members appointed by regional councils for six-year terms. The lower house, the National Assembly, has 96 seats filled by popular election for five-year terms using party-list proportional representation.

SWAPO won a lower-house majority of 63 seats (65.5 percent of the vote) in the 2019 elections. The Popular Democratic Movement (PDM) won 16 seats, while the Landless People's Movement (LPM) won 4. International observers considered the polls competitive and credible, though concerns were raised about several aspects of the electoral process.

SWAPO also won a majority of votes cast in the regional elections were in November 2020. In December 2020, the Electoral Court accepted a motion from the ECN to reject some results due to some irregularities flagged by the opposition All People's Party (APP) and ordered a recount in September 2021 for the Ndonga Linena constituency. The SWAPO candidate won the recount. In October 2021, President Geingob encouraged party supporters to retaliate against the ECN for permitting the rejection of the initial results.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 3 / 4

The electoral framework is robust and generally well implemented. However, political parties fail to follow financial transparency rules. The controversy around the use of electronic machines dominated the 2019 elections, with some party leaders expressing doubt about the results for want of a verifiable paper trail. The polls were declared free and fair by the Commonwealth Observer Group and the South African Development Community, although they raised concerns over other aspects of the electoral process.

The use of electronic voting machines without paper trails was ruled invalid in February 2020. In July 2020, the High Court ruled that the ECN acted unconstitutionally when it removed names from a PDM candidate list.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 12 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 3 / 4

Political parties may form and operate freely. Registration requirements are not onerous and there were no time limits for parties wishing to register and participate in the 2019 elections. However, candidate-registration fees and campaign financing can place an undue burden on smaller parties. Parties that hold parliamentary seats receive annual public support based on parliamentary representation, which disproportionately benefits SWAPO. Small parties lack financial resources or broad nationwide membership bases, impeding their ability to mobilize support.

Opposition parties may freely compete in elections and generally do not encounter intimidation or harassment during election campaigns. Although opposition parties have historically been regarded as weak and fragmented, they gained several seats in the 2019 elections, dislodging SWAPO from the two-thirds majority it held since 2014. Eleven of the 15 parties that registered for the 2019 parliamentary elections secured seats. Opposition parties also did well in the November 2020 local and regional elections, though only six parties won regional seats.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 3 / 4

People are generally able to express their political choices without undue influence from external actors, including the church and traditional leaders. However, the historic domination of SWAPO—an ideologically diverse party that often faces intraparty disputes—limits voters' ability to directly express a preference for particular policies.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 3 / 4

The constitution guarantees political rights for all, and the government works to uphold these rights in practice. Namibia has made great strides in increasing parliamentary representation of women, who hold 46 National Assembly seats. Nevertheless, women are often discouraged from running for office and few contested the November 2020 regional and local elections.

Almost all ethnic groups are represented in the parliament and in senior political positions. However, members of the San ethnic group have faced restrictions on their political rights due to widespread discrimination and marginalization. LGBT+ people face discrimination that hampers their ability to openly advocate for their interests. In May 2021, Ephraim Nekongo, secretary of SWAPO's youth wing, used derogatory language against LGBT+ people in a statement to party members, reprimanding those who entertained legislation to increase LGBT+ rights.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 8 / 12C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 3 / 4

The democratically elected government freely determines policies. However, 2014 reforms increased executive power, including by adding parliamentarians who are appointed by the president and by limiting the National Council's power to review certain bills. Concerns have grown over the Chinese Communist Party's influence and ties to Namibian political elites.

The government suspended parliamentary sessions during parts of 2020 and 2021 due to the COVID-19 pandemic. In July 2021, SWAPO pushed through appointments for the leadership of the Anti-Corruption Commission (ACC) and the ECN during brief windows of time when Parliament was not suspended. Opposition parties claimed the appointments were performed illegally, though their August bid for the High Court overturn the appointments failed.

While Namibia has a sound legal anticorruption framework, concerns remain that anticorruption laws are inconsistently enforced, and difficulties in accessing government-held information present barriers to gathering evidence. The Witness Protection Act and the Whistleblower Protection Act, signed in 2017, have not been enforced.

Light sentences in high-profile cases and low prosecution and conviction rates undermine the work of the ACC, which is also underfunded. In July 2021, the National Assembly approved the president's extension of the ACC head, Paulus Noa, for another five years, a decision criticized by those who believe that his 15-year tenure has been largely ineffective. The appointment process also lacked transparency. In April 2021, it was reported that the ACC was investigating 20 high-profile cases, including what has become known as the Fishrot corruption scandal.

The government's purchase of two farms from the prime minister in 2020 at an allegedly inflated price came under intense scrutiny in April 2021.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 2 / 4

Namibia lacks access-to-information laws, despite government promises to finalize this legislation, which was resubmitted to the National Assembly in September 2021 but was not passed by year's end. According to a September 2020 report from the Media Institute of Southern Africa, Namibian government agencies denied some requests for information in 2020, citing the COVID-19 pandemic. A report on ancestral land issues submitted to the president in 2020 was leaked online in January 2021 after the government failed to release it.

A veil of secrecy exists over the extractive industry, military spending, statehouse upgrades, state security infrastructure, and private funding of political parties. The government budget process also lacks transparency.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 46 / 60D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 14 / 16*D1. Are there free and independent media? 3 / 4

The constitution guarantees media freedom and freedom of expression. In practice, journalists face few legal restrictions and generally work without risking their personal safety. While self-censorship is common in state media, private media remain critical of the government. The absence of information laws obstructs investigative journalism and was on Parliament's 2021 agenda. Journalists have faced impediments during the COVID-19 pandemic. In September 2021, the labor minister, Utoni Nujoma, filed a defamation suit against the owners of the weekly Windhoek Observer and its editor over a 2019 article alleging he had extorted money from a farmer in 2017 and 2018.

Religious freedom is generally respected in practice.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

Academic freedom is guaranteed by law and generally respected in practice.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 3 / 4

Freedom of expression is legally guaranteed and generally observed in practice. However, Namibia lacks cyber-harassment or data-protection legislation. The government reportedly maintains significant capabilities to conduct surveillance on citizens, which may discourage people from expressing dissent. In March 2021, the government published new regulations of the 2009 Communications Act that would enable interception of telecommunications by national intelligence and the police. Defamation laws may also discourage free speech.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 11 / 12E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 3 / 4

Freedom of assembly is legally guaranteed and is usually observed in practice. Though restrictions on public gatherings were imposed during the government's state of emergency to address the coronavirus, several protests took place during 2021. In September, about 300 protesters stormed Parliament ahead of a scheduled vote on a $1 billion compensation offer from Germany for genocide committed against the Herero and Nama people during colonial rule.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 4 / 4

Human rights groups generally operate without interference, though government leaders sometimes use public platforms against civil society.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 4 / 4

Constitutionally guaranteed union rights are respected and observed in practice, though essential public-sector workers do not have the right to strike. Collective bargaining is not widely practiced outside the public-service sector and the mining, construction, and agriculture industries. Union membership has declined in recent years, with 25 percent of the labor force unionized.

Reports of unfair labor practices and the firing of union leaders by a state-owned Chinese company, China National Nuclear Corporation Rössing Uranium (CNNC RUL), led to an international solidarity campaign on behalf of the Namibian miners.

F. RULE OF LAW: 11 / 16F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 3 / 4

By law and in practice, the separation of powers is observed, and judges are not frequently subject to undue influence. However, the judiciary lacks adequate resources and is vulnerable to budget cuts. Judges are appointed by the president upon the recommendation of the Judicial Service Commission, which the president has some influence over. Public access to court documents and proceedings has been restricted in recent years; in 2019, documents implicating the president and justice minister in a fraud case were kept out of public view by a court ruling.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 3 / 4

The rule of law and fair-trial rights are constitutionally protected, though equal access to justice is obstructed by factors including economic and geographic barriers, a shortage of public defenders, a lack of resources, and case backlogs. In October 2021, the High Court overturned a 2018 corruption indictment of two men, including National Assembly member Tobie Aupindi, on the grounds that they did not receive a fair trial. A September 2021 auditor general report for 2014–18 revealed that only 8,172 cases were finalized and 29,608 were pending.

Some cases were postponed, and services were severely affected in lower courts due to government-imposed public health restrictions intended to curb the spread of COVID-19.

Namibia is free from war and insurgencies. However, police brutality and the abuse of suspects in custody are problems. There is no independent police oversight mechanism as investigations are conducted by an Internal Investigation Directorate.

While the constitution prohibits discrimination, challenges remain. The San people face widespread discrimination and marginalization and lack land access. In October 2021, Amnesty International issued a report condemning the government's "rampant discrimination" against the San communities in the Omaheke and Otjozondjupa regions.

Same-sex sexual relations remain criminalized, though the prohibition is not enforced. LGBT+ people, people living with disabilities, and women face widespread discrimination. In October 2020, an organization representing members of the Baster and Zambesi groups noted widespread discrimination in a report to the Office of the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights (OHCHR).

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 10 / 16G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 3 / 4

Freedom of movement is constitutionally guaranteed and generally observed in practice. However, it was restricted when authorities imposed COVID-19-related restrictions when a state of emergency was declared in March 2020.

The illegal fencing of communal land, condemned by the Commission of Inquiry into Ancestral Land Rights in January 2021, and its impact on freedom of movement and access to resources found in communal areas remains a challenge.

Private property rights are guaranteed in law and largely respected in practice. The constitution prohibits expropriation without compensation. There are no legal barriers to women's access to land. However, customs regarding inheritance procedures and property rights limit women.

Land rights remain a contentious and unresolved issue. The Commission of Inquiry into Ancestral Land Rights and Restitution presented its report to President Geingob in July 2020. That April, the Indigenous Hai//om group sued the government in an effort to gain recognition for its ancestral rights to land in the Etosha National Park; the case had not been resolved by the end of 2021.

Same-sex marriages are not recognized, and many churches have in the past indicated their unwillingness to recognize or perform them. Legal challenges from people in same-sex partnerships exist in the courts, seeking either residency permits or recognition of their marriages. In April 2021, a court refused to grant a same-sex couple travel documents for their twin surrogate daughters, who were born in South Africa, and asked them to prove a biological link to the children. The government issued emergency travel documents for the children to enter Namibia in May.

Rates of gender-based violence and rape of minors are high. Abortion is only available for those in medical danger and for survivors of rape and incest. Forced and child marriages occur; 7 percent of girls are married before turning 18.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 2 / 4

Slavery and servitude are constitutionally outlawed. However, forced child labor is prevalent in the agricultural sector and in domestic settings. San and Zemba children are especially at risk. The US State Department reported in its 2021 Trafficking in Persons Report that Namibia fully met antitrafficking standards.

Nauru

Population: 10,000

Capital: Yaren District

Freedom Status: Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: People in Nauru generally enjoy political rights and civil liberties, though the government has taken steps to sideline its political opponents—particularly the Nauru 19, a group of activists who had been charged with a variety of crimes in connection with a 2015 antigovernment protest. Corruption is an ongoing challenge. Asylum seekers and refugees housed in Nauru under an agreement with Australia live in dire conditions, and the country has attracted sustained international criticism over the persistent reports of abuses against them.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- As of August, 398 asylum seekers had been resettled from Nauru to the United States. In October 2020, the United States had agreed to resettle over 1,100 asylum seekers who were in the Nauru and Papua New Guinea processing centers by early 2021.
- In February, the University of the South Pacific, a regional university with campuses on many Pacific Island countries, including Nauru, removed vice-chancellor and president Pal Ahluwalia from his post and deported him from Fiji, the site of the university's headquarters. Ahluwalia had reported on financial mismanagement at the university. After accepting a temporary post at the Nauru campus of the university that same month, Ahluwalia was reinstated by the university's council in August.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 34 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 12 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

Nauru is a parliamentary republic, and the parliament chooses the president and vice president from among its members.

In the August 2019 parliamentary elections, which were independently monitored by the Pacific Islands Forum, incumbent president Baron Waqa lost reelection in his constituency, and thus the opportunity to be reelected president. Lionel Aingimea was subsequently chosen to be president, winning with 12 votes to 6 over rival David Adeang.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The 19-member unicameral Parliament is popularly elected from eight constituencies for three-year terms. In the 2019 parliamentary elections, observed by the Pacific Islands Forum monitoring mission, then-president Waqa was accused of manipulating the electoral rolls by granting citizenship to around 118 foreigners. However, the 2019 elections were generally regarded as free and fair, and Waqa did not win reelection.

In 2019, former president Waqa proposed changing the constitution to extend representatives' terms to four years, although no such changes were made by the end of 2021.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 4 / 4

The electoral laws are generally fair and implemented impartially. The Nauru Electoral Commission is responsible for managing the entire election process. Voting is compulsory.

In the August 2019 elections, a recount was conducted for the Ubenide electorate after six paper ballots were discovered in the parliamentary chamber. The recount did not change the outcome of the election, and there was no evident manipulation of the initial tally.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 14 / 16B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 4 / 4

Although political parties are permitted, most candidates run as independents.

A contempt-of-court law enacted in 2018 was criticized as being designed to intimidate opposition figures and others who supported the Nauru 19 activist group. Members of that group faced prosecution, though official interference into their lives reportedly eased in 2019. President Aingimea denied that the government had ever taken steps to prevent them from traveling or gaining employment.

Intense political rivalries created political instability prior to 2013. However, former president Waqa served two full terms before losing his seat as a representative and being replaced by Lionel Aingimea in 2019.

The 2019 elections also featured significant turnover of representatives, with about half of incumbents losing their seats in parliament.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 4 / 4

People's political choices are generally free from domination by powerful interests that are not democratically accountable. In 2019, a former representative alleged that bribery was rife in the electoral process, claiming that candidates routinely buy motorcycles and kitchenware for constituents.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 3 / 4

The constitution provides for universal suffrage. However, widely held biases regarding the role of women in society have discouraged women's participation in politics and elections; just two women won seats in Parliament in 2019, one of whom was an incumbent. Including those two representatives, only three women have been elected in Nauru's modern history.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 8 / 12C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 3 / 4

The freely elected parliament, led by the speaker, sets and makes policy. However, the Australian government has had considerable influence over politics due to the processing center for asylum seekers they base on Nauru. Australian authorities have detained many refugees on the island indefinitely, a significant source of income for Nauru's government. In September 2021, the Nauruan government signed a memorandum of understanding (MOU) with Australia to indefinitely maintain operations of the immigration detention center on the island. The Australian government's budget for fiscal year 2021–22 included AUD $513.6 million (US$385.5 million) for the "provision of welfare and garrison services" on Nauru. In February 2021, Nauru announced its intentions to leave the Pacific Islands Forum (PIF), after tensions grew over the appointment of a new general secretary. The PIF maintained significant influence over government policy and processes.

Corruption remains a problem. Allegations of improper payments to senior government officials, including former President Waqa, by an Australian phosphate company emerged in 2016. In June 2021, reports emerged that in February 2020, Australian authorities had officially charged the company at the center of the allegations with conspiracy to bribe a foreign public official; proceedings were ongoing at the end of 2021. Legal proceedings related to the scandal also took place in Singapore in 2018, where a local company was fined for bribing a member of Nauru's Parliament.

The Australian Broadcasting Corporation (ABC) reported in 2018 that many family members of Nauruan politicians owned shares of the land where the Australian-run processing center is situated; they disproportionately benefit from their ability to collect high rents or secure high-paying jobs or other contracts at the center. These concerns were echoed by former president Sprent Dabwido, who claimed in 2019 that offshore processing of asylum seekers had led to a vast amount of corruption.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 2 / 4

Nauru lacks a law on access to public information, but the Government Information Office releases some budget figures. Government officials are not required to disclose financial information.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 43 / 60D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 13 / 16*D1. Are there free and independent media? 2 / 4

Freedom of expression is constitutionally guaranteed but not always respected in practice. Foreign journalists have a particularly difficult time operating in Nauru, as the government has implemented restrictions that appear to be aimed at deterring outside coverage of conditions for asylum seekers and refugees. Since 2014, foreign journalists have been subject to a visa application fee of roughly AUD $8,000 ($5,500), up from approximately AUD $150 ($103) previously. The media visa fee remained unchanged at the end of 2021.

The 2016 Crimes Act introduced criminal charges for defamation, now punishable with up to three years in prison. Similarly, the Administration of Justice Act, a contempt-of-court law passed in 2018, serves as a deterrent for journalists to publish pieces critical of the government and the judiciary.

The constitution provides for freedom of religion, which the government generally respects in practice.

Academic freedom is generally respected.

Reports emerged in 2020 that the University of the South Pacific, a regional university with campuses located in various countries in the South Pacific including Nauru, was plagued by allegations of corruption. In February 2021, the university's vice-chancellor and president, Pal Ahluwalia, was removed from his post and deported from Fiji, the site of the university's headquarters, after reporting on financial mismanagement at the university. After accepting a temporary post at the Nauru campus of the university at Aingimea's invitation that same month, Ahluwalia was ultimately reinstated by the university's council in August 2021.

Authorities are not known to illegally monitor private online communications. In June 2020, the president presented the National Disaster Risk Management (Amendment) Bill 2020, which outlawed publishing or posting messages on social or mass media that are intended to cause fear, mislead the public, or distort official information, with severe punishments. The new law also expands police powers to act in a national disaster without a warrant. How the new law will be applied and what level of oversight will be exercised was unclear at the end of 2021.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 9 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 3 / 4

The constitution upholds the right to assemble peacefully, but this right has not always been respected in practice. Demonstrations related to the treatment of asylum seekers housed at the Australian processing center are often repressed. Members of the Nauru 19 group, who were arrested for their 2015 antigovernment protests, were sentenced to jail time in December 2019.

Failure to adhere to public gather restrictions that were introduced to curtail the spread of COVID-19, including social distancing regulations, can result in hefty fines of up to AUD $5,000 ($3,438) or imprisonment. The COVID-19 state of emergency, first declared in March 2020, remained in force throughout 2021.

There are no legal restrictions on the formation of nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) in Nauru. There are several advocacy groups for women, as well as development-focused and religious organizations. However, authorities have interfered with the operations of activists seeking to improve the treatment of asylum seekers.

In late 2020, the Nauruan parliament passed the Registration of Associations Act, which provides official recognition of domestic and foreign NGOs, including provisions allowing registered associations to own property and sue or be sued. Eligible organizations are required to register prior to commencing their operations, and the Registrar must provide reasons for decisions such as refusing or canceling registration.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 3 / 4

There are no formal trade unions and only limited labor protection laws, partly because there is little large-scale private employment. The rights to strike and to collectively bargain are not protected by law. Trade unions were expressly excluded from the Registration of Associations Act of 2020, meaning they do not enjoy the benefits provided by the Act, including property rights.

F. RULE OF LAW: 9 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 2 / 4

There have been concerns about undue influence on the judiciary from government officials, who have been accused of dismissing judges for unfavorable rulings. Many are concerned that government officials have pressured the judiciary in connection with the Nauru 19 case.

The Supreme Court is the highest authority on constitutional issues in Nauru. Appeals had previously been heard in the high court of Australia, but in 2018, Nauruan Justice Minister David Adeang announced that the country would sever links with Australia's justice system, citing both onerous costs associated with case proceedings in another country and the need for Nauru to establish greater independence. However, some skeptics viewed the development as a means of denying members of the Nauru 19 activist group an avenue to appeal their cases. Nauru later signed memoranda with neighboring Pacific countries, including Papua New Guinea, Kiribati, Solomon Islands, and Vanuatu, to provide justices for Nauru's new Court of Appeals.

The Nauruan government has been accused of interfering with the judicial process and undermining the rule of law. The 2018 contempt-of-court law outlaws criticism of witnesses, judicial officers, or legal representatives in a pending court matter, as well as undermining judicial officials or the authority of courts. Violations of the law, which contains exemptions for government officials deemed to be acting in good faith or the interests of national security, are punishable by fines of up to AUD $20,000 ($15,469) for individuals and AUD $50,000 ($38,673) for corporations.

Australian Supreme Court Justice Geoffrey Muecke claimed the government terminated his contract as a result of his granting a permanent stay in 2018 for the Nauru 19 court proceedings. He claimed the government also pressured the sentencing magistrate to issue maximum penalties to members of the group. In 2019, the Nauru government accused supporters of the Nauru 19 of being in contempt of court, while Nauru's chief justice insisted that the government had not interfered in the proceedings. President Aingimea claimed that neither he nor the preceding government had interfered with the judiciary's independence. The members of the Nauru 19 were ultimately convicted and sentenced to jail time in 2019. As a result of the events surrounding the Nauru 19 case, the New Zealand government withdrew its financial support of the Nauruan judiciary.

Though the constitution provides for due process rights, the resumption of legal proceedings against members of the Nauru 19 as well as changes to the appellate jurisdiction indicate that due process is not always respected in practice.

In 2017, the government passed a law that distinguishes between public servants who testify in favor of the government or against it. Analysts said it appeared that those who miss work to testify against the government would be placed on leave without pay, and that the law appeared to represent an attempt to discourage civil servants from testifying in favor of the Nauru 19.

Legal proceedings against the Nauru 19, which had been permanently stayed in 2018 by Justice Muecke, were renewed after the stay was overturned by the Nauru Appeals Court in 2019. Muecke had been fired after granting the stays. The members of the Nauru 19 were sentenced to jail time in December 2019.

Civilian authorities control the small police force. Nauru has no armed forces; Australia provides defense assistance under an informal agreement.

The Australian processing center for asylum seekers has received considerable international criticism for poor treatment of asylum seekers housed there. Few arrests have been made in connection with alleged abuses of its residents.

The constitution provides for equal treatment regardless of race, country of origin, ethnicity, politics, or gender, but those rights are not always protected in practice. There are few legal protections against discrimination, which is notably a problem for women in the workplace. In 2016, the government decriminalized same-sex sexual relations, which had previously been punishable by up to 14 years of hard labor.

Several reports have detailed widespread abuse of refugees and asylum seekers forcibly transferred to Nauru under its agreement with Australia. Crimes committed against asylum seekers outside the processing center, where most refugees are housed, frequently go uninvestigated. The asylum seekers suffer from grossly inadequate housing; denial of health care for life-threatening conditions; and a high rate of self-harm attempts among residents—who wait, at times, for years for their asylum applications to be processed. Rates of self-harm among refugees was found to be 200 times more likely than that of Australian citizens. Thoughts of self-harm among children were particularly alarming, and reports of this mental health issue were ignored by authorities. The last children were evacuated from Nauru and resettled in the United States in 2019. Reports from the Australian Broadcasting Corporation (ABC) that year found that refugees had been exposed to asbestos for prolonged periods. In November 2019, the Nauruan government denied the medical evacuation of over 20 individuals, all of whom had been vouched for by Australian doctors.

In October 2020, the United States agreed to resettle over 1,100 asylum seekers who were in the Nauru and Papua New Guinea processing centers by early 2021. As of August 2021, 398 asylum seekers had been resettled from Nauru to the United States. As of October, 108 asylum seekers transferred to Nauru from Australia remained in the country.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 12 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 3 / 4

Most people in Nauru are free to move around the island. However, while asylum seekers were granted freedom of movement across the island in 2015, there are limits on their ability to leave, and they face significant difficulties in obtaining employment and education. Many asylum seekers had lived in tents and converted storage containers at the Australian processing center, where they were under heavy surveillance. In 2018, the aid group Doctors Without Borders (MSF) was asked by Nauru officials to stop providing care for asylum seekers, and the group subsequently left the country. In the days afterward, MSF condemned conditions for the asylum seekers and refugees in Nauru and claimed they had been forced out.

The government has withheld the passports of some political opponents in recent years, including at least three people associated with the Nauru 19, among them two former opposition lawmakers. These two opposition lawmakers blame the government for the death of former president and Nauru 19 member Sprent Dabwido. Legal action, filed in July 2019 by the two former lawmakers, claims that the Nauruan government delayed in returning Dabwido his passport, preventing him from receiving treatment for cancer in Australia in time to be cured.

To prevent the introduction of COVID-19 into the country, Nauruan stopped most international flights landing in Nauru in March 2020 and imposed quarantine requirements for most international arrivals, except for those arriving from a regularly updated list of “safe countries” deemed to have sufficiently low levels of COVID-19 in their respective populations. Other movement restrictions, including curfews, were enforced with strict punishments.

The constitution protects the right to own property and people in Nauru are able to freely establish businesses. However, as of 2014, foreigners must pay approximately AUD $6,000 ($4,500) a year for a business visa, up from AUD $400 ($300).

In his ruling on the Nauru 19 case, Judge Muecke said that the government of Nauru maintained an unwritten blacklist under which the Nauru 19 were denied employment and the right to conduct business on the island.

Domestic violence, which mostly affects women, remains a serious problem, and children are also vulnerable to violence. However, authorities have taken some efforts to address these problems, notably by approving the new protections within the 2017 Domestic Violence and Family Protection Bill, and the 2016 Child Protection and Welfare Act. In 2020, the government simplified the process for victims of domestic violence to obtain safety and protection orders against their abusers. Marital rape was also made a criminal offense in 2016. In June 2020, the government of Nauru announced that it would introduce harsher laws for sex offenders, including by reducing the ability of sex offenders to receive bail and introducing laws that prevent the age of the perpetrator a mitigating factor in sex offences.

Same-sex marriage is not recognized by law. Abortion is only allowed when the mother's life is in danger, but not in cases of rape, which was a point of controversy after an asylum seeker was raped in in 2016 in the Australian processing center.

In response to international pressure, the government of Nauru had committed to establishing a national human rights institution, though none had been set up as of 2021.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 3 / 4

With the exception of asylum seekers, individuals generally enjoy equal economic opportunities. However, economic opportunities are limited to sectors such as phosphate mining and the public sector.

There are no health and safety laws to protect workers outside the public sector, and issues relating to dust exposure for phosphate miners are of serious concern. According to the US State Department, there have been no reports of human trafficking in Nauru in recent years.

Nepal

Population: 30,400,000

Capital: Kathmandu

Freedom Status: Partly Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Since the end of a decade-long civil war in 2006, Nepal has held a series of competitive elections and adopted a permanent constitution. As politics have stabilized, pressure on journalists has decreased, and authorities have been more tolerant of peaceful assembly. However, corruption remains endemic in politics, the government, and the judicial system. Other problems include gender-based violence, underage marriage, and bonded labor. Transitional justice bodies have struggled to fulfill their mandates.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- The Supreme Court twice served as an effective check against the executive in February and July, when the court reinstated the parliament after former prime minister Khadga Prasad Sharma Oli dissolved the body in December 2020 and May 2021. The court subsequently appointed Sher Bahadur Deuba as prime minister in July, after Oli was forced out of office.
- The Nepal Communist Party (NCP), dissolved in March after it underwent an internal split in 2020 based on disagreements between former prime minister Oli and former rebel leader Pushpa Kamal Dahal, better known as Prachanda. The Supreme Court ruled that month that the name of the NCP had already been in use before the two parties merged, which invalidated the party's registration and forced the reemergence of the two distinct parties.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 25 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 10 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 3 / 4

The president is the head of state and is elected to up to two five-year terms by a parliamentary electoral college and state assemblies. The prime minister is elected by the parliament. The legitimacy of executive office holders is largely determined by the conduct of legislative and provincial elections.

Sher Bahadur Deuba was sworn in as prime minister in July 2021. He was appointed following a Supreme Court decision that reinstated the parliament for the second time that year—former prime minister Oli dissolved the body in December 2020 and May 2021, causing a constitutional crisis.

The current president, Bidhya Devi Bhandari, was reelected in March 2018.

Members of the 275-seat House of Representatives are elected to five-year terms; 165 are directly elected in single-seat constituencies, while 110 are elected by proportional representation. The National Assembly has 59 members; 56 are indirectly elected to six-year terms by an electoral college comprised of provincial and local leaders, while 3 are appointed by the president on the government's recommendation.

Elections were held for 18 National Assembly seats in January 2020. The Nepal Communist Party (NCP), the product of a 2018 merger between the Communist Party of Nepal—Unified Marxist-Leninist (CPN-UML) and the Communist Party of Nepal—Maoist (UCPN-M) parties, won 16 seats, while the Rastriya Janata Party-Nepal (RJP-N) won the other 2. In late 2020 and in May 2021, former prime minister Oli's control over his party diminished and he dissolved the parliament in a bid to hold on to power through new elections. In July, the Supreme Court restored the National Assembly, and legitimately elected representatives remained in power.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 3 / 4

The legal framework for elections is sound and facilitates the conduct of credible polls. Though the parliament has yet to address grievances regarding province demarcation and proportional representation based on population, current institutions and province boundaries have stabilized and most stakeholders seem to accept them. Nepal's Election Commission generally conducts fair and credible contests.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 10 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 3 / 4

Political parties are generally free to form and operate. Opposition figures do sometimes face arrest. Alliance for Independent Madhesh (AIM) leader CK Raut was arrested in 2018 on charges of disturbing law and order and voicing views against the state but was released in 2019 after agreeing to refrain from supporting an independent Madhesi state. The AIM—renamed the Janamat (Mandate) Party—endorsed Raut's agreement.

The 2018 alliance between the UCPN-M and the CPN-UML, which merged to form the NCP, dissolved in 2021, after the NCP underwent an internal split in 2020 based on disagreements between former prime minister and CPN-UML leader Oli and former rebel leader Dahal, better known as Prachanda, of the UCPN-M. In March, the Supreme Court ruled that the name of the NCP had already been in use before the two parties merged, invalidating the current NCP's registration and forcing the reemergence of the two distinct parties.

Opposition parties have a realistic chance of gaining power through elections. The CPN-UML, then in opposition, won the 2017 elections. Smaller opposition parties have difficulty gaining power at the national level, partly due to a 3 percent threshold for proportional representation in the lower house, and thus perform better at the local level. However, the March 2021 dissolution of the NCP may open up the competitiveness of national elections for smaller parties, which will be able to form alliances.

Nepalis' ability to freely exercise their political choices is occasionally limited by sporadic outbursts of political violence, as well as by security agents who have cracked down on political demonstrations. Vote buying has been reported in recent elections.

Though the constitution has requirements for women and minority participation in the legislature, social discrimination continues to hinder their political involvement. A limited definition of citizenship disenfranchises stateless people. Bidhya Bhandari is the first woman to be president in the country, and women comprise 32.7 percent of lower-house; however, few hold senior political positions.

Indigenous Nepalis and members of the Dalit group are underrepresented in politics and in civil service, despite policies meant to bolster their participation. Members of the Chhettri and Hill Brahmin groups, meanwhile, remain relatively overrepresented.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 5 / 12C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 3 / 4

Nepal ratified a new constitution in 2015, an important step in its democratic transition. Successful elections were held in 2017 and 2020, though representative rule is not fully consolidated. In December 2020 and May 2021, former prime minister Oli twice dismissed parliament and called for new elections. However, the Supreme Court in both instances restored freely elected representatives to office.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 1 / 4

Corruption is endemic in Nepali politics/government and often goes unpunished. Corruption by officials has often obstructed the delivery of foreign aid. However, aid related to the COVID-19 pandemic has seen fewer incursions by corrupt actors, even if politically connected elites were able to access vaccines and hospital beds more readily than the general public.

The top Nepali anticorruption agency, the Commission for Investigation of Abuse of Authority (CIAA) has been more active in recent years. However, the CIAA has been accused of excessively focusing on low-level cases; in July 2020, a special court posthumously acquitted a tax official accused of accepting a 1,000-rupee ($9) bribe. The official died by suicide in 2019, after release from CIAA custody.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 1 / 4

The government generally operates with opacity. The Truth and Reconciliation Commission (TRC) and the Commission of Investigation on Enforced Disappeared Persons (CIEDP), among others, have been criticized for lack of transparency. Mechanisms for utilizing the 2007 Right to Information Act are poorly defined, and the law remains inconsistently enforced.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 32 / 60 (+1)D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 10 / 16*D1. Are there free and independent media? 2 / 4

The 2015 constitution guarantees freedom of expression and prohibits prior restraints on press freedom, though these rules can be suspended in a national emergency, and future press restraints for national security reasons are allowed.

In 2021, the parliament continued to consider draft laws introduced in 2019, including an Information Technology Bill to replace the National Transaction Act (NTA), which was intended to fight cybercrime but has been used to target journalists and artists. Other draft laws brought forward that year, including a Media Council Bill and a Mass Communications Bill, would create a new media regulator.

Journalists reporting on the COVID-19 pandemic have faced harassment and detention over their work.

The 2015 constitution identifies Nepal as secular, signaling a break with the Hindu monarchy that was toppled after the 1996–2006 civil war and formally abolished in 2008. Religious freedom is constitutionally protected, and tolerance is broadly practiced, though some religious minorities occasionally report harassment. Muslims in Nepal are particularly impoverished, occupying a marginalized space. Proselytizing is prohibited under a 2017 law, and some Christians have been prosecuted under this law.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 3 / 4

The government does not restrict academic freedom. Much scholarly activity takes place freely, including on political topics. Authorities exercise some control over the primary education curriculum but have relatively little over universities. Neither professors nor students face repercussions for political speech, and peaceful campus protests are tolerated. However, student unions affiliated with major political parties sometimes clash violently, and police occasionally use force to disperse them. Student groups were involved in relatively peaceful protests related to former prime minister Oli's dissolution of the parliament.

Minorities, including Hindi- and Urdu-speaking Madhesi groups, have complained that Nepali is enforced as the language of education in government schools.

While the freedom to engage in private discussions on sensitive topics has expanded with Nepal's political stabilization, authorities occasionally crack down on individuals who criticize the government on social media.

In 2021, the parliament also continued to consider legislation, such as the Mass Communications Bill, which would dramatically impact online expression.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 7 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 3 / 4

Although the constitution guarantees freedom of assembly, security forces have been known to violently disperse protests and demonstrations, particularly in the south, where a large Madhesi population and related secessionist movement exist.

In January 2021, nationwide protests were held over former prime minister Oli's dissolution of Parliament; thousands of people participated in defiance of COVID-19-related public health restrictions. Additional large protests on separate issues, including a challenge to the activities of a United States aid program, the Millennium Challenge Corporation, occurred after the dissolution of Parliament was resolved.

Although the constitution allows nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) to form and operate in Nepal, legal restrictions sometimes make this difficult in practice. The District Administration Office (DAO), which is responsible for registering NGOs, is often understaffed and lacks essential resources. Foreign NGOs must enter project-specific agreements with the Nepali government. There is a widespread view that NGOs should not be overly political, which hinders some groups from engaging in certain forms of public advocacy. Some federal states are more open to NGO activities than others.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 2 / 4

The 2015 constitution provides for the right to form trade unions. Labor laws protect the freedom to bargain collectively, and unions generally operate without state interference. Workers in a broad range of "essential" industries cannot stage strikes.

F. RULE OF LAW: 7 / 16 (+1)F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 3 / 4 (+1)

The 2015 constitution provides for an independent judiciary. However, judicial independence is compromised by endemic corruption in many courts.

The state has often ignored local court verdicts, Supreme Court decisions, and National Human Rights Commission (NHRC) recommendations addressing crimes committed during the 1996–2006 civil war. In late 2020 and early 2021, the Oli government took steps to weaken the NHRC and other Constitutional Council bodies: President Bhandari amended the Constitutional Council rules, allowing it to hold meetings without a quorum and make decisions based on a simple majority. The Constitutional Council recommends appointments to the NHRC.

However, the Supreme Court was twice able to serve as an effective check against the executive in 2021. In February and July, the court reinstated the parliament after former prime minister Oli attempted to dissolve the body in December 2020 and May 2021, respectively. The court ordered opposition leader Sher Bahadur Deuba to be appointed prime minister.

Score Change: The score improved from 2 to 3 because the Supreme Court's ruling on the legality of the former prime minister's dissolution of the parliament reflected its increasing independence.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 1 / 4

Constitutional due process guarantees are poorly upheld in practice. Arbitrary arrests do occur. Heavy case backlogs and a slow appeals process result in long pretrial detentions. The government provides legal counsel to those who cannot afford their own, but only at a defendant's request. Those unaware of this right often end up representing themselves.

Rights advocates continue to criticize Nepal for failing to punish abuses and war crimes committed during the 1996–2006 civil war.

Neither the TRC nor the CIEDP, key transitional justice bodies, have implemented reforms demanded by the United Nations and the Supreme Court. Although the two institutions have received thousands of reports of human rights violations and enforced disappearances, no alleged perpetrators have been prosecuted. In February 2021, the government extended the tenure of both bodies, though because they have done little to address the problem, many have called for civilian and criminal courts to hear conflict-era cases.

The 2015 constitution includes rights for sexual minorities. The first passport on which the holder was permitted to select a third gender was issued in 2015. However, LGBT+ people face continued harassment by the authorities and other citizens, particularly in rural areas.

The constitution frames the protection of fundamental human rights for Nepali citizens only. This potentially leaves equal rights of noncitizens, including migrants and people who cannot prove citizenship, unprotected.

Tibetans in Nepal face difficulty achieving formal refugee status due to Chinese pressure on the Nepali government. Women often do not receive the same educational and employment opportunities as men.

Muslims enjoy greater freedom to practice their religion under the 2015 constitution but continue to face widespread discrimination.

Children living with disabilities are sometimes excluded from the education system, or face segregation in the classroom.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 8 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 3 / 4

Freedom of movement is generally respected in Nepal. There are legal limits on the rights of refugees to move freely, but restrictions are rarely enforced. Citizens generally enjoy choice of residence, though bribery is common in the housing market as well as the university admittance process.

In rural areas, women remain subject to chhaupadi, a traditional practice in which menstruating women are physically separated from their families and communities; the practice was criminalized under a 2018 law. The first arrest under this law occurred in 2019, when a Nepali man was arrested after his sister-in-law died of smoke inhalation in a chhaupadi hut. Arrests have occurred inconsistently since then.

Although citizens have the right to own private businesses, starting a business in Nepal often requires bribes to a wide range of officials. Licensing and other red tape can be extremely onerous. Women face widespread discrimination when starting businesses, and customs and border police are notoriously corrupt in dealing with cross-border trade. Foreigners generally cannot own land, though in practice individuals, businesses and organizations have found ways around this rule with long term leases of properties technically owned by Nepalis.

Gender-based violence remains a major problem and increased during the COVID-19 pandemic. The 2009 Domestic Violence Act provides for monetary compensation and psychological treatment for victims, but authorities rarely prosecute domestic violence cases, and these are sometimes handled informally.

Underage marriage, especially of girls, is widespread. In 2019, the UN Children's Fund (UNICEF) reported that Nepal had one of the world's highest child marriage rates.

Foreign men married to Nepali women must wait 15 years to obtain naturalized citizenship, while foreign women married to Nepali men can immediately become citizens. Children of foreign-born fathers and Nepali mothers must apply for naturalized citizenship, while children of foreign-born mothers and Nepali fathers are automatically granted citizenship. In June 2020, a parliamentary committee endorsed an amendment to the Citizenship Act that would require foreign-born wives to wait 7 years before attaining their own citizenship. The amendment remained under consideration at year's end.

Trafficking of children and women from Nepal for prostitution in India is common, and police rarely intervene. Bonded labor is illegal but remains a serious problem. Most workers in Nepal remain in the informal sector and lack legal protections.

Child labor also remains a problem; children can be found working in the brickmaking, service, and other industries, as well as in forced begging and sex work. The COVID-19 pandemic, which left many children out of school, has worsened these challenges; how many children will eventually return to school is unclear.

Netherlands

Population: 17,500,000

Capital: Amsterdam

Freedom Status: Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: The Netherlands is a parliamentary democracy with a strong record of safeguarding political rights and civil liberties. Nevertheless, Muslims and immigrants experience harassment and discrimination, and polarization around cultural identity issues has increased. Harsh asylum policies are a source of controversy. The Kingdom of the Netherlands also has overall responsibility for human rights compliance on six Caribbean islands. Corruption, prison conditions, and asylum policies are of concern on the islands.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- In January, Prime Minister Mark Rutte of the People's Party for Freedom and Democracy (VVD) and his cabinet resigned over a scandal stemming from the collection practices of the Tax and Customs Administration (Belastingdienst). Official investigations into the Belastingdienst, which wrongly accused tens of thousands of families of fraud, continued throughout the year.
- The VVD won a plurality of seats in the already scheduled March parliamentary elections. The previous coalition renewed a governing agreement in December, following a record 271 days of negotiations, allowing Rutte to retain his position; the new government was not sworn in before year's end.
- Numerous protests took place across the country during the year, many of which were marked by violent confrontations between demonstrators and police. In several instances, police were accused of using disproportionate force to disperse demonstrations, resulting in criminal charges being filed against at least three officers by year's end.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 39 / 40 (-1)

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 12 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The Netherlands is a parliamentary constitutional monarchy. The government is formed by the parliament after elections.

In January 2021, the coalition government—composed of Prime Minister Mark Rutte's VVD, the Christian Democratic Appeal (CDA), the Democrats 66 (D66), and the Christian Union—resigned in the wake of a scandal that saw the nation's tax agency wrongly accuse tens of thousands of families of fraud. The Rutte cabinet served in a caretaker role until a new government could be formed following the already scheduled March general election; the VVD won a plurality of seats in those polls. In December, the outgoing coalition agreed to form another government after a record 271 days of negotiations, with Rutte retaining his position for a fourth term. He had not been sworn in by year's end.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The bicameral States General consists of the 75-seat First Chamber, elected indirectly by the members of the 12 provincial councils, and the 150-seat Second Chamber, members of which are directly elected to serve four-year terms. In the March 2021 elections, the VVD won a plurality of seats on a turnout of 78.7 percent.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 4 / 4

Elections are administered by the Electoral Council, which works impartially and professionally. Voting procedures were adapted ahead of the March 2021 parliamentary elections to improve accessibility for people with disabilities and to incorporate COVID-19-related public health measures.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 16 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 4 / 4

Political parties operate freely. The Elections Law does not impose any undue restrictions on the creation of political parties and the registration of candidates for elections.

Government funding extends to all parties with at least 1,000 members and at least one seat in the parliament.

The composition of ruling coalitions regularly changes after elections.

A record 17 parties entered the Second Chamber following the March 2021 elections, including 4 new parties: JA21, which emerged following a split from the controversial far-right Forum for Democracy (FvD) party; Volt, a pro-European Union (EU) party; the Farmer-Citizen-Movement (BBB); and the left-wing BIJ1.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 4 / 4

The people are free to make their own political choices without pressure from democratically unaccountable groups.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 4 / 4

Marginalized groups participate freely in the political process. Several political parties specifically cater to the (perceived) interests of religious groups or ethnic minorities. Underrepresentation in politics of persons without higher education is sometimes identified as a problem.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 11 / 12 (-1)

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 4 / 4

Government policies reflect the choices of freely elected members of the parliament. Inordinate influence of corporate interests over government policies continued to be criticized by investigative journalists and nongovernmental organizations (NGOs).

Following the Taliban's August 2021 takeover of Afghanistan, the parliament issued a motion in September condemning the government for its failure to adequately protect people in the country who had previously worked with Dutch organizations, prompting the resignations of the foreign and defense ministers.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 4 / 4

The Netherlands has low levels of corruption, and anticorruption mechanisms are generally effective.

In response to the Council of Europe's Group of States against Corruption (GRECO) 2019 recommendation to strengthen integrity safeguards for parliamentarians, the Second Chamber created a Code of Conduct in September 2020. Legislation establishing an independent complaints body, which is tasked with addressing Code of Conduct violations, came into effect in April 2021.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 3 / 4 (-1)

Laws recognizing the right to request government information are generally enforced, although delays in responding to requests for information are common. In 2021, the parliament passed the Open Government Act (WOO), which requires the government to make documents available online rather than by request; the WOO had not entered into force by year's end.

During 2020, reports emerged about significant malpractice regarding Belastingdienst collection processes, including illegal practices involving childcare allowances, beginning in 2012. The Dutch Data Protection Authority (DPA) concluded that discriminatory use had been made of data on the (double) nationality of certain applicants. In December 2020, a special parliamentary committee reported that families were punished illegitimately, and, when legitimate, to disproportionate extremes.

In May 2020, the government asked the public prosecutor to investigate Belastingdienst officers for extortion and discrimination. The public prosecutor declined in January 2021, saying the matter was political rather than criminal. An appeal against that decision was launched in April and remained undecided at year's end. Criminal complaints of discrimination and extortion filed against specific tax officers were also investigated during the year.

Throughout 2021, numerous politicians and government officials advocated for a change in the country's "culture of governance" to increase transparency and enhance public trust. Rutte and his cabinet resigned in January over the Belastingdienst scandal, citing a wish to take responsibility for mistakes made "at every level of the state." In March, the cabinet informed lawmakers that the Belastingdienst had violated a wide range of laws and regulations, sometimes systematically. Such violations include persistently exceeding decision deadlines and withholding information from both citizens and the judiciary. Investigations into the matter remained ongoing at year's end.

Score Change: The score declined from 4 to 3 because the Dutch tax-collection agency systematically violated laws and regulations over the course of several years, falsely accused residents of fraud, and withheld information from the public.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 58 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 16 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 4 / 4

A free and independent press thrives in the Netherlands. However, journalists occasionally face isolated instances of harassment, and several members of the press reported being threatened and physically attacked while reporting on antigovernment demonstrations during 2021. In July, well-known crime reporter Peter de Vries was murdered; two men were later arrested in connection with the killing, which was reportedly linked to de Vries's investigation into an organized crime network.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 4 / 4

The constitution guarantees freedom of religion, which is generally respected in practice. A prohibition of burqas and niqabs in public establishments and on public transport came into force in August 2019. However, a report by de Volkskrant showed that no fines had been issued at all as of October 2020.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

Academic freedom is largely respected in the Netherlands.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 4 / 4

There are no restrictions on freedom of speech or expression, apart from the criminalization of hate speech. In July 2021, the Supreme Court upheld the 2016 hate-speech conviction of FvD politician Geert Wilders, who had called for the reduction of the number of Moroccans in the Netherlands at a campaign rally in 2014.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 12 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

Freedom of assembly is constitutionally guaranteed and generally respected by authorities. The government restricted assembly rights periodically throughout both 2020 and 2021 due to COVID-19. Despite such restrictions, several large protests were held in 2021, including nationwide demonstrations by environmental activists in March. Limitations placed on participants varied significantly between cities, leading some protest organizers to lodge formal complaints against the restrictions, which they said unduly suppressed their right to protest.

Thousands of people participated in demonstrations against the government's lockdown measures during the year. Many of these antilockdown protests turned violent, resulting in dozens of arrests; several were forcibly dispersed by police, who were accused of using disproportionate force in numerous instances. Internal police investigations concluded that a number of officers had acted "unprofessionally," and criminal charges were filed against at least three officers accused of using excessive force against demonstrators by year's end.

Police were also accused of using disproportionate force to violently disperse peaceful protests against a lack of affordable housing in September and October; several people were injured and dozens of demonstrators were arrested during the protests.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 4 / 4

NGOs operate freely and without interference from the government or nonstate actors.

A draft bill proposed in 2020 would enable local authorities and prosecutors to gather information from NGOs on any foreign funding that they receive. In response to concerns over the law's potentially discriminatory application, amendments to the draft bill were made in June 2021. The draft would broaden the scope of the review process to include all donations of at least €15,000 ($15,800), regardless of their origin.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 4 / 4

Workers' rights to organize, bargain collectively, and strike are protected.

F. RULE OF LAW: 15 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 4 / 4

The judiciary is independent, and the rule of law generally prevails in civil and criminal matters.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 4 / 4

The right to a fair trial is legally guaranteed and respected in practice. Though a COVID-19-related case backlog arose in 2020, extra judicial capacity had been allocated to address the situation by that June; nearly 70 percent of the backlog was resolved by February 2021.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 4 / 4

The police are under civilian control, and prison conditions mostly meet international standards. In early 2021, inmates in several prisons were temporarily quarantined in response to a spike in the number of COVID-19 cases; lawyers criticized the measures, which included a prohibition on showering, citing concern for the welfare of the prisoners.

Substandard prison conditions continued to be reported on Caribbean islands under the jurisdiction of the Netherlands, notably including Sint Maarten.

The Netherlands has antidiscrimination laws and hate speech laws on the books. In 2021, the government introduced the position of national coordinator against racism and discrimination. The national coordinator, who began work in October, is tasked with creating a national antidiscrimination program.

Rising anti-immigrant sentiment in recent years has been accompanied by more open expression of anti-Islamic views. Muslims and people with a migrant background experience harassment and intimidation. Persistent labor market discrimination on ethnic grounds, of older people, of pregnant women, and of disabled people continued to be documented in 2021.

Antisemitism in the Netherlands has risen in recent years, with one NGO reporting a 35 percent increase in antisemitic incidents between 2020 and 2021. In April 2021, the government appointed Eddo Verdoner as national coordinator for combating antisemitism (NCAB).

In September 2021, a Dutch court ruled that security forces could use ethnicity as a factor in selecting individuals for security checks at the border. Rights groups condemned the verdict as "harmful," and vowed to appeal. In November, the Royal Netherlands Marechaussee—a gendarmerie that performs border controls—announced that it would no longer use ethnic profiling when conducting security checks.

Dutch asylum policies have long drawn criticism for being unduly harsh. In June 2021, the Court of Justice of the European Union (CJEU) ruled that by refusing to consider the claims of applicants who had previously been rejected over documentation concerns, Dutch asylum policies were incompatible with EU law.

Additionally, the UN Human Rights Committee has urged the government to review its legislation and establish a procedure for determining statelessness in recent years. In February 2021, a parliamentary vote moved to allow roughly 10,000 stateless refugees to apply for Dutch citizenship; however, implementation of the motion was delayed several times before being carried out in July.

The Caribbean islands that are part of the Netherlands lack well-developed asylum procedures. NGOs continue to call for more government action to support Venezuelan refugees on Aruba and Curaçao. In March 2021, authorities in Curaçao announced that undocumented migrants meeting certain conditions would be allowed to apply for residence permits. Curaçao's justice ministry also announced in June that aid workers and relatives would be given access to asylum seekers who had been detained.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 15 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

Residents generally enjoy freedom of movement and choice of residence, employment, and institution of higher education. Though the government periodically implemented lockdown measures to curb the spread of COVID-19 during 2020 and 2021, such regulations were largely in line with public health guidance.

Property rights are legally protected and generally upheld in practice.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 4 / 4

Personal social freedoms are largely respected. Domestic violence is a persistent problem. According to data published in December 2020 by Statistics Netherlands, nearly half of all young adult women have experienced some form of sexual violence.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 3 / 4

Exploitative working and housing conditions for migrants, particularly in the agricultural and meat-processing sectors, persisted in 2021, despite government efforts to address the problem. In October, research released by the International Institute of Social Studies (ISS) in The Hague showed that migrant workers, mainly from Eastern Europe, were living in degrading conditions, were not ensured proper compensation, and were housed illegally. Government policies created in December 2019 have been widely criticized as insufficient and have not properly regulated temporary employment agencies, which are often the cause of the problem.

New Zealand

Population: 5,100,000

Capital: Wellington

Freedom Status: Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: New Zealand is a parliamentary democracy with a long record of free and fair elections and of guaranteeing political rights and civil liberties. Concerns include discrimination against the Māori and other minority populations, as well as reports of foreign influence in politics and the education sector.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- In September, Ahamed Aathil Mohamed Samsudeen attacked people in an Auckland supermarket, injuring eight before being shot dead by police. In response to the attack, the government quickly amended counterterrorism laws to criminalize the planning of a terrorist attack, among other provisions.
- In February, voters approved a referendum to remove their own ability to block local councils' creation of Māori wards—special constituencies representing registered Māori voters in local government. This veto power had been used to prevent the creation of all but two Māori wards since their introduction in 2002. At least 25 councils moved to create Māori wards following the amendments.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 40 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 12 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

A governor general, appointed by the United Kingdom's Queen Elizabeth II on advice from the prime minister, represents the British monarch as New Zealand's ceremonial head of state. In October 2021, Dame Cindy Kiro was appointed as governor general, becoming the first Māori woman to serve in the position. The prime minister, who is head of government, is appointed by the governor general and is usually the leader of the majority party or coalition in the directly elected parliament. Jacinda Ardern, leader of the Labour Party, was reelected as prime minister in 2020 following legislative elections, which were considered well administered and credible.

The 120 members of Parliament's single chamber, the House of Representatives, serve three-year terms. The mixed electoral system combines voting in geographic districts with proportional representation. Elections in New Zealand are generally well administered, and their results considered credible.

In the October 2020 elections, the Labour Party secured a 65-seat majority in the 120-seat parliament. The opposition National Party claimed 33 seats, and the leftist Green Party won 10 seats. The anti-immigration New Zealand First party, which had been in coalition with Labour, lost all nine of the seats it won in 2017. Election day was delayed by a month amid a nascent second wave of the COVID-19 pandemic in Auckland.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 4 / 4

The legal framework supports democratic elections, and elections are implemented fairly in practice. The independent New Zealand Electoral Commission administers polls and referendums, promotes compliance with electoral laws, and provides public education on electoral issues.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 16 / 16B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 4 / 4

New Zealanders organize political parties without undue legal restrictions or other obstacles, and parties are free to operate and campaign for support.

The political system has experienced regular democratic transfers of power between rival parties. Power has traditionally alternated between the center-left Labour Party and the center-right National Party. Currently, the National Party serves as a strong opposition force in parliament.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 4 / 4

People are generally able to act on their political preferences without undue influence from powerful groups. However, several studies in recent years have raised concerns over the likelihood that sizable political donations from Chinese businesspeople and other Chinese figures have influenced the policy positions of political parties and lawmakers. Some have claimed the government has been more hesitant to criticize Chinese government human rights abuses. In May 2021, the Labour Party drew criticism for a “cash for access” scheme, which gave wealthy donors access to Prime Minister Ardern and other senior ministers at fundraising events that cost up to NZ$2,064 (USD $1,442) per person.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 4 / 4

Political rights and electoral opportunities are granted to all New Zealand citizens, and permanent residents have the right to vote. Seven of Parliament’s constituency seats are reserved for representatives of the Māori population, though Māori may also vote or run in general electoral districts. Māori representatives comprise 21 percent of seats in Parliament, with the Māori Party holding two seats. In October 2021, Dame Cindy Kiro became the first Māori woman to be appointed governor general.

In February 2021, voters approved a referendum to remove their own ability to block local councils’ creation of Māori wards—bodies representing registered Māori voters in local government. This veto power had been used to prevent the creation of all but two Māori wards since their introduction in 2002. At least 25 councils moved to create Māori wards following the amendments.

Also in February, Rawiri Waititi, co-leader of the Māori Party, was temporarily removed from Parliament for not wearing a necktie, as required by the parliamentary dress code. Waititi, who wore a traditional Māori hei-tiki pendant in place of a necktie, successfully pushed for the necktie requirement to be removed.

Women are relatively well-represented in politics, and the government has taken steps to encourage their participation. Ardern is the third woman to serve as the country’s prime minister. The 2020 elections were the second in New Zealand’s history to be contested with both major parties led by women.

The 2020 elections also saw the first lawmakers of African, Latin American, and Sri Lankan background voted into Parliament, while Iranian refugee Golriz Ghahraman was reelected to a second term.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 12 / 12C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 4 / 4

The prime minister and cabinet ministers, with the support of a majority in the House of Representatives, determine and implement the government's policy agenda without improper interference from any unelected entity. In 2020, the COVID-19 pandemic affected the functioning of Parliament, with sittings suspended for five weeks between late March and early May. Parliament operated relatively unhindered throughout 2021. Lawmakers prevented from attending Parliament in-person in 2021 were able to work remotely.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 4 / 4

Government corruption is not considered a significant problem in New Zealand, and cases of official malfeasance are routinely investigated and prosecuted.

Despite the country's strong anticorruption record, the government's Serious Fraud Office (SFO), tasked with investigating suspected corruption, has increased its attention to political party funding. Several investigations yielded charges for alleged campaign finance violations in 2020.

In May 2021, it was revealed that the SFO was prosecuting several Labour Party donors for breaches of campaign finance rules; of six political parties to have recently held seats in parliament, the SFO was investigating or prosecuting four.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 4 / 4

The government operates with a high level of transparency, and new legislation is openly discussed in Parliament and the media. Parliamentary records, government policies, and commissioned reports are published online and readily available as required by law, though the government is sometimes slow to respond to freedom of information requests. The government upholds transparency in budgetary procedures, and representatives must submit annual financial disclosure statements.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 59 / 60D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 16 / 16*D1. Are there free and independent media? 4 / 4

New Zealand has a free and robust independent media sector, including a Māori-language public network and radio station. In November 2020, the large New Zealand media outlet Stuff issued a public apology after an internal investigation revealed systemic racism in its reporting, particularly in portrayals of Māori people.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 4 / 4

Religious freedom is protected by law and generally respected in practice. Only religious organizations that wish to collect donations and receive tax benefits need to register with the government, and the process is not onerous.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

Academic freedom typically prevails at all levels of instruction. However, concerns persist regarding Chinese interference in New Zealand's higher education sector.

In 2020, an academic at the University of Canterbury published a report which found that various New Zealand universities had links with the Chinese government and military.

Other members of academia have been critical of the findings of the report, maintaining that it is common for educational institutions to have international links.

New Zealanders are free to discuss personal views on sensitive topics. However, new intelligence and security legislation adopted in 2017 allows law enforcement agencies to access private communications under certain conditions in order to protect national security.

In 2019, Parliament passed the Terrorism Suppression (Control Orders) Act, which had been criticized by the privacy commissioner for authorizing an overly intrusive regime of monitoring and restrictions on individuals designated as having been involved in terrorist activities abroad. Authorities invoked the law against Islamic State (IS)-linked woman, Suhayra Aden, who was extradited to New Zealand from Turkey in August 2021. The order was approved by a High Court judge and imposes broad restrictions on Aden, including prohibiting her from leaving New Zealand or possessing a passport.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 12 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

The government generally respects free assembly and association rights, which are legally protected. Public gatherings were severely restricted in 2020 and 2021 during lockdowns imposed periodically to curb spread of the COVID-19 pandemic. Demonstrations in several major cities denouncing the lockdowns were largely peaceful, though police monitored demonstrators and a number of organizers were later arrested. Observers noted that far-right groups had infiltrated antilockdown protests, with at least one protest organizer having expressed anti-Muslim and anti-LGBT+ statements.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 4 / 4

There are no significant restrictions on nongovernmental organizations' ability to form, operate, and solicit funds.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 4 / 4

Workers may freely organize and bargain collectively, and trade unions actively engage in political debates and campaigns. Workers also have the right to strike, with the exception of uniformed police personnel.

F. RULE OF LAW: 15 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 4 / 4

The New Zealand judiciary is generally independent. Most judges are appointed by the governor general on the recommendation of the attorney general, who first consults with senior jurists.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 4 / 4

Law enforcement practices and court procedures provide for due process protections in civil and criminal matters. Defendants and detainees are presumed innocent until proven guilty and by law must immediately be notified of the charges against them.

Pretrial detention durations have increased in recent years, as authorities have tightened bail requirements and relaxed the time limit in which cases must be concluded.

Rates of violent crime are relatively low, and residents have legal recourse to seek redress for violations of their physical security. The 2019 Christchurch terrorist attack was the worst mass shooting in New Zealand's modern history. The shooting, which took place at two mosques and killed 51 people, was preplanned and accompanied by an 87-page document filled with anti-immigrant and anti-Muslim hate speech. Following the attack, government representatives collaborated with tech companies, including Google and Facebook, to ensure the removal of material on online platforms depicting the attack and prevent livestreaming of potential future attacks. The perpetrator of the shootings, Brenton Tarrant received a life sentence in August 2020. A Royal Commission inquiry into the causes of the attack identified serious failures by the country's intelligence services.

In September 2021, Ahamed Aathil Mohamed Samsudeen attacked people in an Auckland supermarket, injuring eight before being shot dead by police. In response to the attack, the government quickly amended counterterrorism laws to criminalize the planning of a terrorist attack, among other provisions. The amendments give police warrantless powers of entry, search, and surveillance if an individual is suspected of planning an attack. Some have expressed concern about the lack of oversight in the new laws and the potential for overreach.

Prison conditions generally meet international standards, though some facilities are poorly equipped to house detainees with disabilities or mental health problems.

The 1993 Human Rights Act protects all people in New Zealand from discrimination on the basis of gender, religion, ethnicity, and sexual orientation, among other categories, and its provisions are generally respected in practice. However, Māori—who account for approximately 16 percent of the population—and Pacific Islanders experience some discrimination in schools, the workplace, and the health system. They are also disproportionately represented in the penal system, accounting for just over half of the prison population as of 2019. Recent campaigns to recruit more officers of Māori, Pacific Islander, and Asian descent aim to improve cultural and ethnic sensitivity within the police force and combat profiling and discrimination.

The annual Child Poverty Monitor Technical Report has documented for many years that children of Māori and Pacific Islander descent are more likely to experience poverty. The Ardern government has been criticized for its inefficacy in addressing this issue, which it claimed was a policy priority.

Racism and discrimination towards people of Asian descent, as well as first generation immigrants, is a challenge, one that has grown during the COVID-19 pandemic. Approximately 50 percent of people of Asian descent reported experiencing racism or discrimination since the start of the pandemic.

Women continue to face some disparities in employment, including a gender pay gap and underrepresentation in leadership positions in both the public and private sectors. The government enforces strong legislation protecting the rights of LGBT+ people. However, LGBT+ people report workplace discrimination and poorer physical and mental health compared to the general population.

Though the government routinely accepts refugees and asylum seekers, the New Zealand Human Rights Commission has raised concerns that refugees are not always given sufficient information to enable them to access important services such as interpreters, housing, and English-language instruction. Separately, asylum seekers are sometimes detained alongside criminal inmates while their identity is being confirmed.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 16 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

The government respects freedom of movement, and neither state nor nonstate actors place undue restrictions on people's ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education.

The New Zealand government periodically imposed lockdowns in 2020 and 2021 to contain outbreaks of the coronavirus. International travel has been limited, with arrivals forced to complete a state-supervised fourteen-day quarantine throughout much of the pandemic.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 4 / 4

New Zealand's legal and regulatory frameworks are broadly supportive of private business activity and provide strong protections for property rights.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 4 / 4

Personal social freedoms are broadly protected, including on issues like marriage and divorce. Same-sex marriage was legalized in 2013, and same-sex couples may jointly adopt children. However, violence against women and children remains a critical problem in many communities. A government survey released in 2020 reported that over one in three people identifying as women had been a victim of sexual violence in their lifetime. Abortion is legal in New Zealand; in March 2020 Parliament removed all restrictions up to 20 weeks of pregnancy and fully decriminalized the procedure.

Residents generally have access to economic opportunities, but the Māori and Pacific Islander populations have disproportionately high rates of unemployment, affecting their economic and social mobility. Women and Pacific Islander people are among the most likely groups to receive lower pay for equal work. In December 2020, the Human Rights Commission announced an inquiry into the unequal pay and equal employment discrimination faced by Pacific Islander workers.

Migrant workers are vulnerable to exploitative conditions including forced labor in industries such as fishing, agriculture, construction, hospitality, and domestic service. The government has taken action to combat these abuses, and in August 2020 authorities announced a crackdown on exploitation and protections to help migrant workers escape exploitative environments.

Nicaragua

Population: 6,700,000

Capital: Managua

Freedom Status: Not Free

Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: The election of Sandinista leader Daniel Ortega in 2006 began a period of democratic deterioration marked by the consolidation of all branches of government under his party's control, the limitation of fundamental freedoms, and unchecked corruption in government. In 2018, state forces, with the aid of informally allied armed groups, responded to a mass antigovernment movement with violence and repression. The rule of law collapsed as the government moved to put down the movement, with rights monitors reporting the deaths of at least 325 people, extrajudicial detentions, disappearances, and torture. Since then, antigovernment activists report surveillance and monitoring, and Ortega has consolidated his power with sweeping arrests of his political opponents.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- Beginning in May, the Ortega administration arrested dozens of opposition presidential and National Assembly candidates and government critics. The Supreme Electoral Council annulled the legal status of parties that presented legitimate competition to Ortega's Sandinista National Liberation Front (FSLN)—including the Democratic Restoration Party (PRD) and Citizens for Liberty (CxL)—and ended the candidacy of Ortega's rivals, banning them from running for or ever holding public office.
- In November, the government announced that Ortega had been reelected with 75 percent of the vote; authorities reported that the FSLN had won 74 percent of the vote and 75 seats in the National Assembly. Authorities claimed voter turnout was 65 percent, but the local citizen-run election watchdog, Urnas Abiertas, recorded that turnout was likely close to 18.5 percent. Observation groups, who were barred from monitoring the polls, stated that the elections were neither free nor fair because of the crackdown on the opposition.
- Authorities continued their campaign of repression against independent media outlets and journalists. In August, security forces raided the facilities of La Prensa and arrested its manager, Juan Lorenzo Holman. Fernando Chamorro, editor and founder of El Confidencial, fled to Costa Rica in June following the arrest of his sister, who was a presidential candidate.
- In August, the National Assembly canceled the legal status of 15 organizations, including several that supported development projects for rural women. The Matagalpa Women's Collective (Colectivo de Mujeres de Matagalpa)—which was shut down after providing care to women and children, libraries and community houses, and more for 31 years—stated that the government's actions were intended to impose “fear and silence” for civil society groups in the country.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 5 / 40 (-5)

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 0 / 12 (-3)

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4 (-1)

The constitution provides for a directly elected president, and elections are held every five years. Constitutional reforms in 2014 eliminated term limits and required the winner of the presidential ballot to secure a simple plurality of votes. Daniel Ortega has been president since returning to power in 2006. His reelection in 2016 was through a severely flawed poll that was manipulated by the Supreme Court (CSJ) and Supreme Electoral Council (CSE), which are controlled by Ortega's allies. Ortega's wife, Rosario Murillo, also won reelection as vice president.

In December 2020, the FSLN-controlled National Assembly passed the Law in Defense of the Rights of the People to Independence, Sovereignty and Self-Determination for Peace, also known as the “Sovereignty Law,” which provides authorities a broad framework to arbitrarily detain, investigate, and ban individuals from running for or holding public office. Beginning in May 2021, the Ortega administration used this law to arrest dozens of opposition candidates, prominent opposition party members, and government critics. Among those arrested were significant challengers for president and vice president, including Cristiana Chamorro, Arturo Cruz, Félix Maradiaga, Juan Sebastián Chamorro, Miguel Mora, Medardo Mairena, and Noel Vidaurre. This wave of repression continued through October. The CSE also annulled the candidacy of Ortega’s rivals and banned them from running for or holding public office.

In November 2021, the government announced that Ortega had been reelected, allegedly taking 75 percent of votes, ahead of the Constitutionalist Liberal Party (PLC) candidate, Walter Espinoza. Authorities claimed voter turnout was 65 percent, but the local citizen-run election watchdog, Urnas Abiertas, recorded that turnout was likely close to 18.5 percent. In October, the Organization of American States (OAS) stated that the November poll could not meet the criteria for free and fair elections due to the crackdown on Ortega’s challengers. OAS and European Union (EU) election observers and journalists were barred from monitoring the polls.

Score Change: The score declined from 1 to 0 because the government’s crackdown on opposition party candidates removed all credible competition from the presidential election.

The constitution provides for a 92-seat unicameral National Assembly, with members chosen through proportional representation. Two seats in the legislature are reserved for the previous president and the runner-up in the most recent election. Legislative elections are held every five years.

Leading up to the November 2021 parliamentary elections, the Ortega government initiated a wave of arrests of opposition candidates and party members, including those running for seats in the National Assembly. The CSE annulled the legal status of FSLN rivals, including the PRD and CxL. Political parties that remained to oppose the FSLN presented no real challenge to its control of the legislature. The government announced in November that the FSLN had won 74 percent of the vote and were assigned 75 seats in the National Assembly. Election monitoring missions were not allowed to observe the vote. The OAS had rejected the credibility of the poll a month before it took place, claiming that the actions of the Ortega government had precluded any possibility of a free or fair election.

Score Change: The score declined from 1 to 0 because the government’s crackdown on its political opponents left no legitimate opposition to compete in the year’s parliamentary elections.

The CSE and judiciary generally serve the interests of the FSLN and have played a crucial role in strengthening Ortega and the FSLN’s power. In 2016, the CSE removed Eduardo Montealegre from the Independent Liberal Party’s (PLI) leadership and forced out 16 opposition lawmakers who protested that decision.

In early 2021, the FSLN-controlled National Assembly appointed to the CSE's new governing committee individuals who all had ties to Ortega. The CSE also employed the Sovereignty Law to ban opposition candidates from running in the November elections and from ever holding public office. In May and August, the CSE annulled the legal status of the PRD (a member of the National Coalition) and CxL, respectively.

Score Change: The score declined from 1 to 0 because the government-controlled CSE prevented competitive opposition parties and candidates from participating in the year's elections.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 3 / 16 (-1)

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 0 / 4 (-1)

Political parties face legal and practical obstacles to formation and operations. Party leaders are easily co-opted or disqualified by Ortega-aligned institutions, including the CSE. Membership in the FSLN is often required in order to hold civil service positions, discouraging people from registering as members of other parties. Under 2014 constitutional reforms, legislators must follow the party vote or risk losing their seats.

The Foreign Agents Law, passed in October 2020, requires anyone receiving funds from foreign governments, organizations, or individuals to register as a foreign agent, and prohibits such agents from engaging in political activities or holding public office. In December 2020, the National Assembly passed the Sovereignty Law, which empowers authorities to ban individuals arbitrarily designated as "traitors" from running for or holding public office for life. In the months before the 2021 election, the CSE relied on the powers provided by these two laws to end the legal status of opposition parties and prevent legitimate candidates from participating in the elections. Authorities then arrested dozens of candidates for president, vice president, and the National Assembly. Further, opposition candidates and activists are subject to surveillance and harassment at the hands of security forces, including the police and paramilitary groups.

Score Change: The score declined from 1 to 0 because the CSE ended the legal status of legitimate opposition parties and the government arrested dozens of opposition candidates in the run-up to the year's elections.

Nicaragua's opposition lacks the opportunity of increasing its support or gaining power through elections. Few opposition figures hold legislative seats or other government positions. The police and progovernment armed groups employed lethal force in 2018 against peaceful antigovernment protesters, and the government has continued its campaign of harassment, arbitrary detention, and violence against any who would oppose it. In 2021, the CSE banned opposition party candidates from participating, effectively ensuring that only Ortega-friendly parties and candidates would challenge his presidency. Opposition candidates and activists were arrested en masse in the leadup to the November 2021 elections.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 1 / 4

President Ortega has consolidated all branches of government and most public institutions, as well as the country's media, under his party's control, allowing him and the FSLN great influence over people's political choices. Public sector workers experienced pressure to keep away from the antigovernment protest movement in 2018, and hundreds of health professionals were dismissed from public hospitals for providing medical assistance to protesters, or for their alleged role in the demonstrations.

Police and state-allied armed groups were the primary perpetrators of violence during the 2018 crisis, and they have continued to attack perceived regime opponents. In a report released in December 2020, the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights (IACHR) identified a "revolving door" system of short-term arbitrary detentions intended to intimidate and disrupt regime opponents.

In November 2020, hurricanes Eta and Iota devastated sections of the country. As damage assessment and aid efforts commenced, accusations emerged that the government was prioritizing Sandinista-led areas, as well as hindering independent journalistic coverage of the crisis.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 2 / 4

Minority groups, especially the Indigenous inhabitants of Nicaragua's eastern and Caribbean regions, are politically underrepresented across parties and institutions, including the National Assembly. The government and FSLN largely ignore their grievances.

In 2021, George Henríquez sought to become the country's first president of Afro-Nicaraguan descent with the CxL, though his candidacy was rejected shortly before the CxL was disbanded.

In practice, successful political advocacy by women is generally restricted to initiatives that enjoy the support of the FSLN, which has not prioritized women's policy concerns. However, the World Economic Forum ranked Nicaragua in fifth place globally for the political empowerment of women in their 2021 Global Gender Gap Report.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 2 / 12 (-1)

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 0 / 4 (-1)

The FSLN dominates most public institutions, and the Ortega administration has co-opted other government bodies that may have served as a check on his power. The FSLN won an absolute majority of seats in the National Assembly in the 2021 elections, which were neither free nor fair. This enables the FSLN to determine policies without any credible claim to representing the people's will.

Under 2014 constitutional reforms, President Ortega has a wide degree of discretionary powers to set policy. Executive dominance of the legislature results in a consistent lack of oversight.

Score Change: The score declined from 1 to 0 because both the president and the governing party in the National Assembly were not freely elected.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 1 / 4

Corruption in Nicaragua is widespread but rarely investigated. Because the justice system is dominated by Ortega, allegations of corruption against government officials rarely see thorough investigation or prosecution. However, authorities commonly launch antigraft probes targeting opposition members, often forming part of a politically motivated scheme to delegitimize or arrest them. This trend has deepened under the new legal framework created by the Sovereignty Law.

The intermixing of the Ortega family, the FSLN, and government interests have long been criticized as presenting significant conflicts of interest and opportunities for corruption. Ortega's sons and daughters have been appointed to prominent positions such as ambassador and presidential adviser. Several of the president's sons are among the multiple Nicaraguan officials sanctioned by the US Treasury Department for alleged involvement in corrupt activities. The US government has in the past also sanctioned Ramón Avellán of the National Police, Lumberto Campbell of the CSE, and Roberto López of the Nicaraguan Social Security Institute (among others) for corruption and other abuses. In November 2021, the US government announced additional sanctions against Ortega's family members and 100 people from the country's political and judicial elite. In October 2021, the EU also renewed its sanctions from 2020.

International corruption watchdog Transparency International claimed that corruption was present in every aspect of the government's response to the COVID-19 pandemic.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 1 / 4

Government operations and policymaking are generally opaque. The 2007 Law on Access to Public Information requires public entities and private companies doing business with the state to disclose certain information. Government agencies at all levels generally ignore this law.

Ortega rarely holds press conferences. The Communications and Citizenry Council, which oversees the government's press relations, is directed by Vice President Murillo and has been accused of limiting access to information.

In 2020, independent observers alleged that the government intentionally underreported the number of COVID-19 cases in the country, and the Pan-American Health Organization was denied access to Nicaraguan hospitals. Many people whose deaths were attributed to "atypical pneumonia" were nonetheless given express burials that family members were barred from attending. Health workers were reportedly prevented from using personal protective equipment (PPE) and implementing safety protocols in public hospitals, and dozens of nurses and doctors were fired for signing a letter criticizing the government's response to the pandemic.

In 2021, doctors were harassed, threatened, or sometimes forced into exile for questioning the government's response to the pandemic. Doctors who claim that the number of cases and deaths is far higher than the official data have been accused of "false news" and "health terrorism" by Vice President Murillo and other senior government officials.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 18 / 60 (-2)

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 5 / 16 (-2)

D1. Are there free and independent media? 0 / 4 (-1)

The Ortega regime has cracked down on free and independent media and journalists since Ortega returned to power in 2007. The administration has engaged in systemic efforts to obstruct and discredit media critics. The FSLN government has intimidated and arrested journalists, censored media outlets, and sought to deprive print media of essential supplies—including ink and paper. Such measures forced El Nuevo Diario and Metro to end their print publications in 2019. In 2020, the FSLN-controlled National Assembly passed the Special Cybercrimes Law, making it easier to criminalize dissent in traditional news outlets and on social media.

In 2021, the Ortega administration intensified its efforts to silence journalists. The FSLN government oversaw the closure or appropriation of 20 independent news outlets across 12 regional departments. The government suspended the transmission Confidential Radio and Onda Local—two radio shows critical of the government—preventing them from airing, allegedly due to their links to a money laundering scheme. In August, the government seized the paper used to print newspapers La Prensa and Hoy, which forced them to cease their circulation. Also in August, security forces raided the facilities of La Prensa and arrested its manager, Juan Lorenzo Holman. Fernando Chamorro, editor and founder of El Confidencial, fled the country to Costa Rica in June following the arrest of his sister, who was a presidential candidate.

Government censorship also extended to foreign outlets in 2021. Authorities summoned María Lily Delgado, a freelance journalist of Univision, to testify in a politically charged case against presidential candidate Cristiana Chamorro. The regime also prevented New York Times reporters from entering the country in June.

Score Change: The score declined from 1 to 0 because the government increased its campaign of censorship and persecution against media outlets and journalists.

Religious freedom was generally respected prior to the 2018 crisis, though some Catholic and Evangelical leaders had reported retaliation by the government, including the confiscation or delay of imported goods and donations, for criticism of the Ortega regime and providing refuge to protesters. Since the political crisis ignited, however, church officials have been denounced and smeared by authorities for accompanying or defending antigovernment protesters; progovernment mobs have attacked churches where protesters were sheltering; and members of the clergy have received threats and experienced surveillance. There have been reports that Ortega supporters have infiltrated parishes and harassed or intimidated parishioners during church services. These attacks continued in 2021. In 2020, Ortega accused local bishops of participating in a plot to overthrow him.

The Ortega regime has turned to Evangelical pastors to rally support, exploiting tensions between them and the Catholic leadership. Reports indicate that Ortega has rewarded loyal ministers with the deeds for valuable properties. Progovernment ministers played a fundamental role in bringing about the termination of the PRD, led by Evangelical minister Saturnino Cerrato.

Prior to the 2018 crisis, academic freedoms were generally respected, although some academics refrained from open criticism of the government. Since then, teachers have reported being required to attend training that promotes government views and reaffirms the government's version of the 2018 political crisis. They have experienced harassment from authorities and progovernment groups and must follow strict guidelines mandated by the Ministry of Education. In the public primary and secondary school system, there have been reports of students being required to attend progovernment rallies and of pro-FSLN materials being displayed in school buildings.

University students at the forefront of the movement demanding Ortega and Murillo step down from power have experienced extreme repression. Police and paramilitary groups assaulted and killed students participating in the 2018 protests and continued to harass and arrest them in 2021. Faculty members with ties to protestors or the opposition are subject to intimidation and retaliation—including losing their jobs.

A campaign of repression and intimidation by state and progovernment forces continued to inspire a general climate of fear and terror that restricts free expression in Nicaragua. State and progovernment forces routinely monitor the activities of individuals who oppose the regime. The families of victims of regime violence and people who return from abroad are also monitored and surveilled. In 2019, the Special Rapporteurship on Economic, Social, Cultural, and Environmental Rights (REDESCA) of the IACHR reported that state employees had experienced discrimination and retaliatory threats for disagreeing with or acting against state policy.

The 2020 Special Cybercrimes Law criminalized the spread of “false news” and targeted whistleblowing by government employees. The law also gives the government broad access to user data. Additionally, in January 2021, the National Assembly amended the constitution to allow for life sentences for hate crimes. Ortega has often referred to opposition actions as hate crimes, and analysts fear the law would be used to target political opponents.

The Ortega administration relied on the Sovereignty and Foreign Agents Laws extensively in 2021 to carry out its crackdown on the political opposition. The number of political prisoners arrested for their criticism of the government and free and legitimate political speech increased drastically, according to the Mechanism for the Recognition of Political Prisoners.

Score Change: The score declined from 2 to 1 because the government has increasingly monitored, harassed, and detained ordinary citizens to silence their political dissent.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 2 / 12E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 0 / 4

Freedom of assembly has severely deteriorated since the 2018 protests, when at least 325 people were killed in a brutal crackdown on that year’s antigovernment protest movement against the authorities’ security reforms; it soon turned into a broader antigovernment movement aimed at forcing the Ortega regime from power. Most abuses have been attributed to the national police and armed allied groups, which a UN Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights (OHCHR) 2018 report claimed operated with “total impunity.”

Assembly rights continued to be severely restricted through 2020 and 2021. Attempts to gather in 2020 faced violent obstruction, and police routinely deny permits for public demonstrations and occupy public spaces to prevent protests.

In September 2021, the FSLN-packed Supreme Electoral Council prohibited in-person rallies of more than 200 attendees for campaigning purposes, ostensibly to spread of the COVID-19 pandemic. However, President Ortega held progovernment rallies for the 42nd anniversary of the Sandinista Revolution in July and the country’s bicentennial in September.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 0 / 4

Groups critical of the government or that focus on issues like corruption have operated within an increasingly restrictive environment under the Ortega administration, which, among other measures, has used registration laws to choke off sources of funding.

Authorities have targeted nongovernmental organizations (NGOs), accusing them of undermining the regime or acting as foreign agents. Human rights groups have reported continued monitoring and surveillance. In September 2020, a group of domestic and international human rights NGOs denounced a wave of activist repression, including sexual assaults of women activists. The government has also suppressed actions by NGOs and church groups providing public health assistance to protesters and in response to the COVID-19 pandemic.

In August 2021, the National Assembly canceled the legal status of 15 organizations, including several organizations that supported development projects for rural women. Many of those shut down had long legacies of providing aid to communities around Nicaragua. The Matagalpa Women's Collective—which was shut down after providing care to women and children, libraries and community houses, and more for 31 years—stated that the government's actions were intended to impose “fear and silence” for aid groups in the country. Since 2018, the government has shut down 55 national and international organizations.

The Foreign Agents Law enacted in 2020 further impedes the operations of independent groups. Recipients of foreign funding who register as foreign agents must also provide monthly reports detailing their income, along with actual and planned expenditures.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 2 / 4

The FSLN controls many of Nicaragua's labor unions, and the legal rights of non-FSLN unions are not fully guaranteed in practice. Although the law recognizes the right to strike, approval from the Ministry of Labor is almost never granted. Employers sometimes form their own unions to avoid recognizing legitimate organizations. Employees have reportedly been dismissed for union activities, and citizens have no effective recourse when those in power violate labor laws.

Unions loyal to the Ortega regime shifted their stance on wage readjustments in early 2021, a blow to the strength of organized labor's position. In January, the Sandinista Workers' Center, which represents the leading public sector unions and has strong ties to the FSLN, said it favored a 5 percent wage increase. However, they quickly reneged this position and supported the 3 percent increase proposed by the government and its private sector allies. Further, FSLN-controlled unions have criticized what they viewed as foreign intervention by the United States and EU in Nicaragua's domestic affairs. These unions endorsed Ortega's reelection bid.

F. RULE OF LAW: 3 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 1 / 4

Nicaragua lacks an independent judiciary. The executive branch strongly influences the nomination of judges, and loyalty to the ruling party determines their appointments. Local analysts estimate that over 70 percent of the country's judges have ties to the FSLN. In the run-up to the 2021 election, the judiciary played a critical role in ordering the arrest of opposition members and upholding the cancellation of the legal status of opposition parties, as dictated by the CSE. Multiple foreign governments sanctioned members of the judiciary—including the Supreme Court—for undermining democracy and serious human rights abuses.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 0 / 4

Since protests erupted in 2018, UN investigators and other human rights organizations have documented rampant violations of due process rights. These include widespread arbitrary and politically motivated arrests and detentions by police and allied progovernment forces, failure to produce search or arrest warrants, no discussion of detainees' rights, no public registry of detainees or their location, and individuals being held incommunicado during initial detention. Repressive laws passed in 2020 continued the deterioration of due process rights.

The government announced in February 2019 that it would release political prisoners detained during the 2018 protests. Between March and June, the government released nearly 400 people, and another 91 were released in late December; most were placed under house arrest while charges against them remained active. Released prisoners were subjected to harassment and surveillance. Defense attorneys of political prisoners also reported being harassed. As of December 2021, the Mechanism for the Recognition of Political Prisoners registered 160 political prisoners still in custody.

The 2018 antigovernment protest movement—and protests since then—have been met with violent repression by police and informally allied armed forces. Reports from the OHCHR in 2018 and from the relatives of political prisoners in 2021 have documented severe abuses of detainees, including psychological and physical torture, sexual violence, forced confessions, disappearances, significant deterioration of prison conditions, and extrajudicial killings. In 2019, there were reports of dozens of antigovernment activists being killed in more remote parts of the country, allegedly by police and paramilitary groups.

As of April 2021, the Office of the UN High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) estimated that more than 108,000 Nicaraguans had fled the country since 2018 due to the violence, with two-thirds of them seeking refuge in Costa Rica.

To prevent the spread of COVID-19 within prisons, the government released over 2,800 prisoners to house arrest in May 2020, but political prisoners were not among those freed.

The constitution and laws nominally recognize the rights of Indigenous communities, but those rights have not been respected in practice. Approximately 5 percent of the population is Indigenous and lives mostly in the North Caribbean Coast Autonomous Region (RACCN) and the South Caribbean Coast Autonomous Region (RACCS). While Indigenous populations have been granted legal rights and protections to land, the government does not enforce these laws.

Attacks against Indigenous populations and land incursions in recent years have been perpetrated with impunity. In August 2021, according to the Center for Legal Assistance to Indigenous Peoples and the Del Río Foundation, settlers killed 12 Miskito and Mayangna people and tortured others in the Bosawas nature reserve, where illegal mining and logging has been reported despite the areas' protected status. In October, another Mayangna person was killed, and three others went missing after assailants, likely settlers, shot at them.

LGBT+ people are subject to threats and discrimination, and many, particularly transgender Nicaraguans, have been forced to seek exile.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 8 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 2 / 4

The 2018 collapse of institutions, that year's bloody crackdown on dissenters, the 2021 crackdown on political opponents, and continued surveillance and harassment at the hands of police and paramilitary groups have created a climate of fear and mistrust that discourages free movement. Poor infrastructure limits free movement in some majority-Indigenous areas.

In late 2020, two hurricanes—Eta and Iota—struck the country's northeastern Caribbean coast, resulting in substantial damage that restricted free travel. The United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights claimed that the hurricanes killed at least 21 people and displaced over 160,000 people.

Property rights are protected on paper but can be tenuous in practice. Titles are often contested and individuals with connections to the FSLN sometimes enjoy an advantage during property disputes. Conflict over land in the RACCS and the RACCN between Indigenous residents and settlers continued in 2021, resulting in numerous deaths. The Center for Justice and International Law (CEJIL) warned in a 2019 report that Miskito communities in the north could be at risk of extinction due to land invasions.

Gender-based violence has increased in recent years, and the Network of Women Against Violence has claimed that the rising rates of femicides have reached near-epidemic levels. According to Human Rights Collective Nicaragua Never Again, 716 femicides occurred between 2010 to 2020. Legislation introduced to address gender-based violence—the 2012 Comprehensive Law against Violence toward Women and subsequent amendments—have had little effect, and allows for mediation between the perpetrator and victim of sexual violence, despite concerns from rights groups. In January 2021, the National Assembly increased the punishment for femicide from 30 years to life imprisonment.

Abortion is illegal and punishable by imprisonment, even when performed to save the pregnant person's life or in cases of rape or incest. Medical practitioners of and people who get abortions can be punished with eight-year prison sentences.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 2 / 4

Nicaragua is a source country for women and children forced into prostitution; adults and children are also vulnerable to forced labor, notably in the agriculture and mining sectors, and as domestic servants. The Trafficking in Persons Report 2021 from the US State Department listed Nicaragua in Tier 3 for failing to meet the obligations of the Trafficking Victims Protection Act (TVPA) and lacking significant efforts to address the issue. The report also notes that Afro-Nicaraguans and Indigenous people are particularly susceptible to exploitation.

Niger

Population: 25,100,000

Capital: Niamey

Freedom Status: Partly Free

Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: Niger saw its first transfer of power between democratically chosen presidents in the 2020–21 elections, though the polls were impacted by allegations of fraud and sometimes-violent protests.

The struggle to meet security challenges posed by active militant groups has served as an alibi for the government to restrict civil liberties. Security, transparency, and gender equality are limited.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- Mohamed Bazoum, the candidate of the ruling Nigerien Party for Democracy and Socialism (PNDS Tarayya), won the second round of the presidential election in February, making the first transfer of power between elected presidents in Nigerien history. Former president Mahamane Ousmane, who came in second place, unsuccessfully contested the results, alleging fraud.
- Insecurity affected the immediate postelectoral period; protests were held in several towns as well as Niamey, where events turned violent, in late February. At least 2 people died, while 468 were arrested as of February 25. The government restricted internet access for 10 days beginning in late February. The government also claimed to foil a coup attempt in late March, days before Bazoum's inauguration.
- In July, President Bazoum committed to repatriating 100,000 internally displaced persons (IDPs) to their home villages by the end of the year. The Office of the UN High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) reported that 40,000 returned to their homes in its August update.
- Militants launched attacks against civilian and military targets throughout the year. Suspected militants killed 100 civilians when they attacked villages in the region of Tillabéri in January. In August, Boko Haram reportedly attacked an army outpost in Diffa Region; 16 soldiers were killed along with approximately 50 militant fighters.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 23 / 40 (+1)A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 8 / 12 (+2)*A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 3 / 4 (+1)

The president is directly elected to up to two five-year terms. The first round, held in December 2020, was marked by isolated reports of attempted vote buying and the disqualification of a major opposition candidate but was largely peaceful.

Mohamed Bazoum, a former interior minister and the candidate of the PNDS Tarayya, won 55.7 percent of the vote in the February 2021 runoff. His opponent, former president Mahamane Ousmane (1993–96), won 44.3 percent. The Independent National Electoral Commission (CENI) reported a turnout of 62.9 percent. Domestic and international observers deemed the electoral process satisfactory despite irregularities. While Ousmane contested the results, alleging fraud, the Constitutional Court validated Bazoum's victory in March. Bazoum was sworn in on April 2 to replace term-limited incumbent Mahamadou Issoufou, marking the first transfer of power between elected presidents in Nigerien history.

The postelectoral period was affected by insecurity. Protests were held in Niamey and several other towns after the second-round results were announced, with events in the capital becoming violent. The government reported that two people were killed during the protests on February 25. Internet access was restricted for 10 days beginning on February 24. The government also claimed to foil a coup attempt in late March, days before Bazoum's inauguration.

Score Change: The score improved from 2 to 3 because the presidential election was more peaceful and credible than the previous balloting—despite postelectoral violence and a reported coup attempt—and marked the first transfer of power from one elected president to another.

There are 171 seats in the unicameral National Assembly, 158 of which are directly elected from 8 multimember constituencies; 8 which are reserved for minority representatives, who are elected directly from special single-seat constituencies; and 5 that are reserved for Nigeriens living abroad.

Nigeriens abroad were unable to participate in the late December 2020 parliamentary elections due to the COVID-19 pandemic, but voters within Niger voted to fill the 166 domestic seats concurrently with the first round of the presidential contest. Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS) observers called the elections relatively free and fair, and lauded the participation of young and female voters. The PNDS Tarayya won 80 seats, the Nigerien Democratic Movement for an African Federation (MODEN/FA Lumana) won 19, and the Patriotic Movement for the Republic and the National Movement for the Development of Society each won 13. The new parliament took its seats in March 2021.

Score Change: The score improved from 2 to 3 because the December 2020 parliamentary elections, whose results were finalized in early 2021, were more peaceful and credible than the previous legislative balloting.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 2 / 4

The electoral code offers a framework for fair elections. However, the opposition, pointing to reports of widespread irregularities in recent elections, among other issues, has cast doubt over the impartiality of the CENI and the Constitutional Court, which together approve candidate lists and validate election results. In 2017, the government and the opposition disagreed over the appointment of a new commission to organize the 2020 elections; the government unilaterally appointed the new commission after the opposition boycotted the process.

Parliamentarians adopted a new electoral code and the CENI launched the process of enrollment in a biometric voter list in 2019. ECOWAS and the Organization of La Francophonie called the new voter file reliable after reviewing it in 2020.

While 41 candidates registered to participate in the 2020 presidential elections, 11, most of whom did not pay the registration fee, were disqualified by the Constitutional Court that November. MODEN/FA Lumana leader Hama Amadou was disqualified over a 2017 human-trafficking conviction which he called bogus.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 9 / 16 (+1)

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 2 / 4

By law, political parties may freely organize and conduct their activities. However, the PNDS Tarayya-led government has employed a variety of tactics to interfere in the operation of opposition parties, including persecution of opposition leaders and the co-option of key opposition figures. Over 150 political parties were registered as of November 2020.

In theory, the opposition can mobilize support and increase its membership. However, the opposition has suffered from a lack of leadership, partly due to the absence of Amadou, who previously served a prison sentence and lived in exile. Opposition parties have been divided into several coalitions and face serious difficulties in challenging the PNDS Tarayya's dominance. In addition, a history of government-led repression and co-optation has hindered their ability to gain power through elections.

Members of the opposition have expressed concern over the rising insecurity in several regions, particularly in the opposition stronghold of Tillabéri. Such insecurity has hindered the parties' ability to campaign and disturbed polling operations there. Tillabéri voter-enlistment agents have been targeted by militants, who threatened to attack anyone participating in elections.

Niger has experienced several military coups, most recently in 2010, and the influence of the military still looms over the political sphere. The government claimed to foil a coup attempt in March 2021. In the month that followed, at least one officer and several soldiers were arrested for their alleged involvement. The government claimed to foil coup attempts in 2015 and 2018.

The law provides for equal opportunity for all Nigeriens to seek political office and participate in political processes. However, women have been underrepresented both in elected and cabinet positions. A parity law adopted in 2020 calls for women to hold 25 percent of parliamentary seats and 30 percent of cabinet positions; 25.9 percent of parliamentary seats were held by women after the December 2020 elections, an improvement over the 14.6 percent figure in the previous parliament. However, the percentage of women in Bazoum's cabinet stood at about 15 percent. The quota does not guarantee that women participate equally once elected or appointed to cabinet positions.

While the Hausa and Zarma (or Djerma) ethnic groups have dominated many government positions, ethnic minorities are increasingly visible in politics, particularly Tuareg and Arabs. Nomadic groups, including the Fulani, are underrepresented in elected positions and have difficulty registering to vote.

Score Change: The score improved from 2 to 3 due to the increased political representation of women after the December 2020 parliamentary elections and because of increased political representation of Tuareg and Arabs.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 6 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 2 / 4

Elected representatives were duly installed into office following the 2020–21 polls. However, systemic harassment has impacted government legitimacy.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 2 / 4

Several anticorruption authorities and programs exist. The High Authority for Combating Corruption and Related Crimes (HALCIA) is the official anticorruption body. The government operates an anticorruption hotline and has established an anticorruption initiative focused on the judiciary. The HALCIA actively tracks corruption cases and informs the public of its activities. However, the government often has refused to carry through HAL-CIA recommendations or pursue identified corruption cases in court. Bribes are sometimes required to gain access to public services.

In 2021, the police arrested Ibou Karadjé, a former government official who is accused of embezzling more than 8 billion CFA francs ($14.5 million) between 2012 and 2017. In June, the Bazoum administration cancelled a contract signed by the former government for buying military aircraft because of suspected corruption.

A government audit completed in 2020 reported that as much as 76 billion CFA francs ($130 million) in public money was diverted due to the manipulation of defense procurements between 2014 and 2019. In December 2021, the government announced that it waived its right to bring civil charges against the suppliers, who agreed to compensate Niamey.

In recent years, the International Crisis Group has found increasing evidence of relationships between traffickers and politicians.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 2 / 4

Implementation and enforcement of the 2011 Charter on Access to Public Information and Administrative Documents has been uneven. Government information related to the mining, uranium, and oil sectors, and state-operated companies, is often not disclosed.

In 2020, Niger resumed its participation in the Extractive Industries Transparency Initiative (EITI). In 2017, Niger, a global leader in uranium production, withdrew from EITI after the organization suspended the country; EITI cited its failure to meet standards for transparent licensing allocation and contract disclosure, lack of a comprehensive public license register, and other concerns.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 28 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 10 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 2 / 4

In 2010, Niger adopted a press law eliminating prison terms for media offenses and reducing the threat of libel cases. However, journalists still face difficulties, including occasional police violence while covering protests, and detention or prosecution in response to critical or controversial reporting.

Journalistic activity is also affected by the 2019 Cybercrime Law. In September 2021, journalists Moussa Aksar and Samira Sabou appeared before a Niamey court on charges related to violations of that law; the journalists had reported on drug trafficking earlier in the year. Their case was still ongoing at year's end.

Freedom of religion is legally guaranteed, but there are some constraints on religious expression and worship in practice. The rise of militant groups has increased the threat of violence against Christians.

In 2019, citing security concerns, the government adopted a law that imposed greater control over religious activities, including building places of worship, preaching, and religious education. Places of worship were shuttered for part of 2020 due to the COVID-19 pandemic.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 3 / 4

Academic freedom is generally upheld, but insecurity and heavy-handed responses to campus protests can impede academic freedom.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 3 / 4

Freedom of expression is generally upheld in Niger. However, the government has shown some intolerance of criticism, and prosecuted people over social media comments. Authorities restricted internet access for 10 days in beginning in late February 2021 and prosecuted social media users for their activity during election-related unrest. Nigeriens reportedly self-censored after internet access was restored in March.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 6 / 12E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 2 / 4

Freedom of assembly is constitutionally guaranteed, but authorities do not always respect this right in practice, and police have at times used force to break up demonstrations. In 2017, the government announced the prohibition of public protests on “business days.”

Sometimes-violent protests took place after Mohamed Bazoum was named the winner of the presidential election in February 2021. The home of a Radio France International (RFI) journalist was damaged during the protests, as were other publicly and privately owned buildings. On February 25, the government reported that 2 people died in the unrest while another 468 were arrested. Hama Amadou was arrested in March for his alleged role in postelectoral violence, though was allowed to travel to France for medical treatment in April.

The government banned some rallies during 2021. An opposition rally was banned in late March, as was a planned December rally against the presence of foreign troops in Niger.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 2 / 4

The government occasionally restricts the operations of nongovernmental organizations (NGOs), and a lack of security in certain regions also impedes their functioning. The government has restricted the movement of UN personnel and aid workers without military escort in some areas, impacting the delivery of humanitarian assistance. In 2020, staff members of NGO ACTED were among eight people killed by armed assailants at a wildlife reserve.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 2 / 4

While the constitution and other laws guarantee workers the right to join unions and bargain for wages, a large portion of the workforce is employed informally and lacks access to formal union representation. The legal definition of “essential” workers not permitted to strike is broad, and mandatory arbitration processes can be invoked to settle strikes.

F. RULE OF LAW: 6 / 16F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 1 / 4

The constitution provides for an independent judiciary and courts have shown some level of independence, though the judicial system is subject to executive interference. Rulings against opposition leaders and civil society activists have decreased trust in the judiciary.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 2 / 4

Arbitrary arrests and imprisonments are frequent. Many people accused of crimes are held in pretrial detention for extended periods of time, sometimes in the same population as convicted individuals. In 2018, several military officers accused of plotting a 2015 coup received 5- to 15-year prison sentences, after spending over 2 years in pretrial detention.

States of emergency declared in several regions allow the army to engage in mass arrests and detain those suspected of links with terrorist organizations.

Nigeriens face insecurity due to ongoing militant activity. Several militant groups, including Boko Haram, are active within Nigerien territory and are known to attack civilians and military personnel.

Armed attacks took place throughout 2021, especially in Tillabéri and Tahoua. In January, suspected militants killed at least 100 civilians when they attacked two villages in Tillabéri. In March, at least 137 people were killed when gunmen attacked three villages in Tahoua. In August, Boko Haram reportedly attacked an army outpost in Diffa Region; 16 soldiers were killed along with approximately 50 militant fighters.

A reliance on nonstate armed groups to conduct counterterrorism operations has inflamed intercommunal tensions near the Niger-Mali border, leading to instances of violence. The government has imposed states of emergency within the regions of Diffa, Tillabéri, and Tahoua over ongoing insecurity.

The rights of ethnic minority groups are protected by law. While two ethnic groups, Hausa and Zarma (or Djerma), have dominated economic leadership positions, Tuareg and Arabs are increasingly represented. Same-sex sexual activity is not illegal in Niger, but same-sex relationships are highly stigmatized, and there is no protection against discrimination based on sexual orientation. Although the 2010 constitution prohibits gender discrimination, women suffer widespread discrimination in practice. The application of the law by customary courts often discriminates against women.

Niger has made efforts to accommodate Malian and Nigerian refugees as well as IDPs. In July 2021, the Bazoum administration committed to repatriating 100,000 IDPs to their home villages by December. The government also promised to take extra measures to guarantee the security of IDPs and refugees. Several international NGOs voiced their concerns over the risk of exposing these communities to further violence upon their repatriation. In an August operational update, the UNHCR reported that 40,000 people returned to their home villages.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 6 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 2 / 4

The constitution guarantees freedom of movement, but this is hampered by militant activity and bribery by security officials who guard checkpoints. COVID-19-related movement restrictions were also imposed for part of 2020. Air travel resumed in August 2020 and land borders reopened in June 2021, though travel was still governed by pandemic measures at the end of 2021.

Several complications undermine legal guarantees of the right to own property. Few people hold formal ownership documents for their land, though customary law provides some protection. The enforcement of both state and customary law often gives way to tension and confusion. Women have less access to land ownership than men due to inheritance practices and inferior status in property disputes.

Family law gives women inferior status in divorce proceedings. Female genital mutilation (FGM) was criminalized in 2003 and has declined, but it continues among a small percentage of the population. Penalties for rape are heavy, but societal attitudes and victims' fears of retribution discourage reporting, and when rape is reported it is often poorly investigated. Domestic violence is not explicitly criminalized, though women may lodge criminal allegations of battery against partners. Some cases have resulted in convictions, but reporting is similarly discouraged in practice.

Although slavery was criminalized in 2003 and banned in the 2010 constitution, it remains a problem in Niger. Estimates of the number of enslaved people vary widely but is generally counted in the tens of thousands. Niger remains a source, transit point, and destination for human trafficking.

Nigeria

Population: 211,400,000

Capital: Abuja

Freedom Status: Partly Free

Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: While Nigeria has made significant improvements to the quality of its elections since the 1999 transition to democratic rule, the 2019 presidential and National Assembly elections, which saw President Muhammadu Buhari reelected and the All Progressives Caucus (APC) regain its legislative majority, were marred by irregularities. Corruption remains endemic in the key petroleum industry. Security challenges, including insurgencies, kidnappings, and communal and sectarian violence in the Middle Belt region, threaten the human rights of millions of Nigerians. The military and law enforcement agencies often engage in extrajudicial killings, torture, and other abuses. Civil liberties are undermined by religious and ethnic bias, while women and LGBT+ people face pervasive discrimination. The vibrant media landscape is impeded by criminal defamation laws, as well as the frequent harassment and arrests of journalists who cover politically sensitive topics.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- In May, Abubakar Shekau, the leader of the Boko Haram militant group, died by suicide after being captured by the Islamic State West Africa Province (ISWAP), a Boko Haram splinter group. Over 1,000 fighters and relatives reportedly surrendered in subsequent weeks.
 - ISWAP continued to launch violent attacks during the year. Aid workers sheltered in a bunker when the group attacked the town of Dikwa in March, while ISWAP launched two attacks against a military base in Borno State in May.

- In June, Nnamdi Kanu, the leader of the separatist Indigenous People of Biafra (IPOB), was arrested and returned to Nigeria, where he was accused of charges including treason. Kanu's lawyer accused the Kenyan government of mistreating him before returning him to Nigeria, which it denied; Kanu remained in custody at year's end.
- The IPOB called on southeasterners to remain home in response to Kanu's arrest, which residents reportedly complied with for fear of violence. The group's instructions and armed attacks against electoral offices impacted the Anambra state gubernatorial election in November; only 10 percent of voters participated, the lowest turnout recorded there since 1999.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 20 / 40 (-1)

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 6 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 2 / 4

The president can serve a maximum of two four-year terms and is elected by a qualified majority vote. The president must also win at least 25 percent of the votes cast in 24 states. President Buhari of the APC was reelected in February 2019, winning 53 percent of the vote. People's Democratic Party (PDP) candidate Atiku Abubakar won 39 percent. Other candidates shared 8 percent.

A one-week voting delay, announced on the morning of the election, undermined confidence in the Independent National Electoral Commission (INEC). International observers noted serious irregularities when the election was held, including election-related violence, vote buying, and the intimidation of election officials and voters. Turnout was among the lowest seen in Nigeria, at 35.7 percent. Abubakar legally challenged the results that March, but the Supreme Court dismissed his appeal that October.

Members of the bicameral National Assembly, consisting of the 109-seat Senate and the 360-seat House of Representatives, are elected for four-year terms.

Legislative elections were held concurrently with the February 2019 presidential election. According to INEC, the APC won 212 seats, the PDP won 127, the All Progressives Grand Alliance (APGA) won 10, and another 7 parties won the remainder. In the Senate, the APC won 63 seats, the PDP won 44, and the Young Progressives Party (YPP) won 1. One Senate seat was reported vacant.

Observers reported irregularities including violence, intimidation of voters and officials, and vote buying. They also noted incidents where party officials directed voters on how to cast ballots at polling stations. INEC declined to certify winning candidates in two races because local returning officers operated under duress.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 2 / 4

The 1999 constitution and the Electoral Act of 2010 provide Nigeria's legal electoral framework. In 2018 and 2019, the National Assembly passed Electoral Act amendments designed to strengthen equal airtime obligations for broadcasters, make the voter register and election results more accessible to voters, and extend federal electoral regulations to local races. President Buhari repeatedly vetoed the bill during this period, citing inconsistencies with existing law. The National Assembly passed an Electoral Act Amendment Bill in November 2021. Buhari declined to sign it in December, objecting to its provisions for party primary contests.

European Union observers reported that the 2019 national elections were administered in general accordance with existing procedures but warned that the delay to presidential and congressional races that February affected turnout, confused voters, and undermined confidence in the electoral process. Other observers noted INEC's apparent lack of preparedness; its electoral security committee, cochaired by the national security adviser, was not in operation by election day.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 9 / 16 (-1)

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 3 / 4

Nigerians generally have the right to organize in different political parties. There were 91 registered parties and 73 presidential candidates in 2019, the largest number of parties and candidates since the 1999 transition to democracy. INEC removed 74 parties from the register in 2020, citing their inability to win the support of a sufficient number of voters and lack of representation nationwide. While 22 parties won an appeals court judgment that year, the Supreme Court ruled in favor of INEC's original decision in May 2021.

A constitutional amendment signed by President Buhari in 2018 allowed independent candidates to compete in federal and state elections. Buhari also signed a "Not Too Young to Run" bill that same month, lowering the age of eligibility to run for political office from 40 to 35 years. However, a lack of internal party democracy and high fees make it difficult for prospective candidates to vie for major-party nominations.

Nigeria's multiparty system provides an opportunity for opposition parties to gain power through elections, as demonstrated by Buhari's 2015 victory over predecessor Goodluck Jonathan. Buhari's election marked the first time in Nigerian history that a sitting president was peacefully replaced. Opposition parties can also gain influence when legislators cross the aisle; the APC lost its legislative majority when some of its legislators defected to the PDP during the 2015–19 term.

New political parties have successfully entered the National Assembly in recent years; the YPP won its first Senate seat in 2019. The APGA, which was formed in 2003, won 10 lower-house seats in 2019. However, the APC and PDP still hold most elected offices in Nigeria.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 1 / 4 (-1)

Citizens' political choices remain impaired or undermined by vote buying and intimidation, the influence of powerful domestic and international economic interests, and the local domination of either the military or armed groups in some regions. Wealthy political sponsors, or "godfathers," dispense patronage and use their considerable influence to cultivate support for candidates who then use their offices to enrich their backers.

Local elections held in 2021 were seriously affected by the presence and activities of armed groups. Several INEC offices were attacked by unidentified assailants during the year, including in Anambra State, which held a gubernatorial election in November. Campaigns in Anambra State were restricted during the electoral period, as candidates faced harassment from armed individuals.

Residents of Anambra State and other areas were intimidated by the IPOB, which called on southeasterners to abide by stay-at-home orders after the June 2021 arrest of its leader. Residents reportedly complied with these instructions for fear of violence, though the IPOB issued stay-at-home instructions more selectively beginning in August. In October, it called on residents of Anambra and several other states to remain home before rescinding that call days ahead of the Anambra contest. Turnout in Anambra State stood at 10 percent, the lowest recorded there since the transition to democratic rule.

Score Change: The score declined from 2 to 1 due to rising violence involving armed groups that has included attacks on election commission offices and disrupted political campaigns, particularly in the southeast.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 2 / 4

Nigeria's legal framework generally provides for equal participation in political life by the country's various cultural, religious, and ethnic groups. However, politicians and parties often rely on voters' ethnic loyalties, and the interests of a given group may be poorly addressed in areas where it forms a minority or when affiliated parties are not in power.

Women enjoy formal political equality, but restrictive societal norms limit their participation in practice. Only 8 women hold Senate seats, while 13 hold House of Representatives seats. Women are poorly represented in the cabinet; Buhari named 7 women to his 43-seat cabinet in July 2019.

Same-sex relationships were criminalized and LGBT+ advocacy groups were banned in 2014, when former president Jonathan signed the Same-Sex Marriage (Prohibition) Act. Openly LGBT+ people are deterred from running for office or working to advance their political interests.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 5 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 2 / 4

Elected officials generally make and implement policy in Nigeria, but are impaired by factors including corruption, partisan conflict, poor control over areas where militant groups are active, and the president's undisclosed health problems, which have caused him to seek treatment abroad in recent years.

President Buhari has demonstrated a willingness to obstruct government bodies. In 2019, for example, Buhari appointed an economic advisory council that superseded a constitutionally mandated economic-management body chaired by Vice President Yemi Osinbajo.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 1 / 4

The government has attempted to reduce corruption in public and private institutions, but the practice remains pervasive, particularly in the oil and security sectors. A whistleblower policy introduced in 2016, which rewards Nigerians who provide information on government corruption, has led to the recovery of significant monies in recent years. Customs officials have been known to smuggle goods through porous customs checks in return for bribes.

Senior law enforcement and anticorruption officials have faced corruption allegations in recent years. In February 2021, Abdulrasheed Bawa was appointed chief of the Economic and Financial Crimes Commission, following the 2020 suspension of former acting chief Ibrahim Magu over alleged ethics breaches. In July 2021, Deputy Commissioner of Police Abba Kyari was suspended pending a US Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) investigation into his alleged links to a money laundering scheme.

Nigerian politicians have been locked in an effort to curb corruption in the petroleum sector since at least 2001, when legislators first considered an expansive Petroleum Industry Bill (PIB). Legislators later split the PIB into several components to secure its passage, though this effort was unsuccessful. In late 2020, President Buhari introduced a new PIB, which was passed in July 2021 and signed into law in August.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 2 / 4

The 2011 Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) guarantees the right to access public records, but nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) have criticized government agencies for routinely refusing to release information sought through the law. The law has also encountered resistance in some states. As of May 2021, 2 states passed their own version of the FOIA. The other 34 have neither adopted the FOIA nor have they developed their own legislation.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 23 / 60 (-1)

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 9 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 2 / 4

Freedoms of speech, expression, and the press are constitutionally guaranteed. However, these rights are limited by sedition, criminal defamation, and so-called false-news laws. Sharia (Islamic law) statutes in 12 northern states impose severe penalties for alleged press offenses. Internet service providers sometimes block websites at the request of the Nigerian Communications Commission, particularly those advocating independence for the secessionist state of Biafra, which collapsed in 1970. The government has accused journalists of undermining national security when reporting on operations against Boko Haram. Officials restrict press freedom by publicly criticizing, harassing, and arresting journalists, especially when they cover corruption, human rights violations, separatist and communal violence, or other politically sensitive topics. In July 2021, the National Broadcasting Commission (NBC), the media regulator, called on television broadcasters to limit their reporting on unrest, saying detailed reporting may impact security operations.

Legislators considered amendments to the Nigerian Press Council (NPC) Act and the NBC Act that would have given the president more power to appoint NPC members while giving the NBC regulatory powers over “all online media.” The amendments would have instituted fines and jail terms for proscribed offenses. The amendments’ sponsor announced that their consideration was suspended in July 2021.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 1 / 4

Religious freedom is constitutionally protected, but the government has also embarked on crackdowns against religious groups that have questioned its authority. Nigeria has been locked in a long struggle against Boko Haram, a militant group that has itself targeted moderate Muslims and Christians along with their respective houses of worship. State and local governments have been known to endorse de facto official religions in their territory, placing limits on religious activity.

The government’s conflict with the Islamic Movement of Nigeria (IMN), a Shiite Muslim group that advocates for Islamic rule in Nigeria, escalated in 2019, when an Abuja court banned it and labeled it a terrorist organization. The IMN considers its leader, Sheikh Ibrahim el-Zakzaky, to be the ultimate source of authority in Nigeria, and does not recognize the government in Abuja.

The government has responded violently to IMN activity in recent years. In 2015, security forces raided el-Zakzaky's compound, arrested him and his wife, and killed at least 300 IMN members. Dozens more were killed in a 2018 army operation. In September 2021, 8 people were killed and 57 were arrested when security forces and the IMN clashed in Abuja.

Despite a 2016 court order to release him, el-Zakzaky and his wife were only freed in 2019 to seek medical attention in India. El-Zakzaky elected to return to Nigeria, citing interference in his medical care and security restrictions in India. In 2020, reports surfaced that a homicide trial against el-Zakzaky and his wife had begun in the Kaduna High Court. While the court dismissed the charges and freed the two in July 2021, the Kaduna state government appealed and filed new charges against them.

Individuals who express nonbelief can face legal consequences. In 2020, Mubarak Bala, a humanist, was arrested in Kaduna State for social media comments criticizing Islam. Bala, who was charged with blasphemy, was transferred to Kano State, and remained detained as of August 2021.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 3 / 4

The federal government generally respects academic freedom. However, some state governments mandate religious instruction in elementary and secondary curriculums and student admission and faculty hiring policies are subject to political interference.

Schoolchildren have been affected by Boko Haram's assault on secular education, which has caused the closure or destruction of primary, secondary, and tertiary institutions. Schoolchildren have also been abducted by Boko Haram. In late 2020, Boko Haram claimed responsibility for the disappearance of over 300 students in Katsina State, though they were released a week later. In August 2021, one of the 270 students abducted by Boko Haram in Borno State in 2014 was released; Boko Haram was still believed to hold 113 of them as of her release.

Criminals seeking ransom also target schoolchildren. Between December 2020 and July 2021, armed gangs abducted over 1,000 students from northern schools for ransom. In April, Amnesty International reported that over 600 northern schools were closed due to the risk of abduction.

Students have faced ill-treatment in unregulated Islamic schools, which have operated for decades. Some parents have patronized these schools for corrective services, as a robust juvenile-rehabilitation system is lacking in much of Nigeria.

Nigerians are generally free to engage in discussions on politics and other topics, though expression of critical views on political leaders or sensitive subjects like the military, religion, and ethnicity occasionally leads to arrests or violent reprisals.

By 2018, the National Assembly passed a Digital Rights and Freedom Bill, which would expand freedom of expression online by regulating government surveillance and prohibiting the suspension of internet services. The bill was sent to Buhari in 2019, who declined to sign it, stating that it covered too many technical subjects and did not address them extensively. Legislators reportedly expect that the bill will attain passage during the 2019–23 term.

The government targeted online platforms used by ordinary citizens and activists during 2021. In February, the central bank banned some transactions involving cryptocurrency, which supporters of the 2020 #EndSARS protests used to support their campaigns. Nigerians have reportedly continued to trade cryptocurrency despite the directive, however. In June, the government blocked access to Twitter after the company deleted a post from President Buhari threatening a violent response to unrest in the southeast. That restriction remained in force at year's end. Also in June, the NBC directed social network operators to apply for broadcast licenses, along with online broadcasting outlets.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 6 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 1 / 4

The right to peaceful assembly is constitutionally guaranteed. However, federal and state governments frequently ban public events perceived as threats to national security, including those that could incite political, ethnic, or religious tension. Rights groups have criticized federal and state governments for prohibiting or dispersing protests that are critical of authorities or associated with controversial groups, including the IPOB. IMN activities were banned in 2019 after an Abuja court classified it as a terrorist organization.

Authorities used force to disperse protests in 2021. In February, police physically attacked at least 6 protesters who opposed the reopening of the Lekki toll gate in Lagos; at least 12 people were killed by soldiers and police while protesting police brutality there in October 2020. Later in February, video surfaced of detained protesters being held in a physical position that may have indicated torture. In June, police in Abuja and Lagos deployed tear-gas to disperse antigovernment protests. Police reportedly harassed journalists covering the protests while destroying the mobile phones of some protesters.

Nigeria has a broad and vibrant civil society. However, members of some organizations face intimidation and physical harm for speaking out against Boko Haram, or encounter obstacles when investigating alleged human rights abuses committed by the military against Boko Haram suspects. Groups operating in the restive Niger Delta region face intimidation.

Aid workers operating in the northeast are impeded by restrictions imposed by civilian and military officials as well as by the activities of armed groups. According to the UN Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs, humanitarian workers in Adamawa, Borno, and Yobe states reported 1,157 incidents where their work was impeded in the first quarter of 2021; one aid worker died during this period. In March, ISWAP attacked the town of Dikwa, forcing aid workers to shelter in a bunker. In April, the Office of the UN High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) reported that its staff was forced to evacuate from the town of Damasak, which was also attacked by ISWAP.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 3 / 4

Workers are constitutionally allowed to form and join trade unions, engage in collective bargaining, and conduct strikes. Nevertheless, the government forbids strike action in some essential services, including public transportation and security.

In April 2021, the Judiciary Staff Union of Nigeria (JUSUN) launched a strike and called for greater financial autonomy for the judicial branch. In June, JUSUN suspended its strike at the request of the National Judicial Council. In August, National Association of Resident Doctors (NARD) members launched a strike over pay, conditions, and a lack of personal protective equipment. The NARD suspended the strike in October, citing progress in talks with the government.

F. RULE OF LAW: 4 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 2 / 4

Judicial independence is constitutionally and legally enshrined. The judiciary has achieved some degree of independence and professionalism, but political interference, corruption, equipment, and training remain important problems.

Former Supreme Court chief justice Walter Onnoghen was suspended for allegedly maintaining undisclosed assets weeks before the 2019 presidential election, sparking fears of a politically motivated effort to remove him. Onnoghen was convicted of falsely declaring assets that April, receiving a 10-year ban from public office.

Funding is a problem for the judiciary. In 2020, President Buhari signed an executive order ostensibly giving state-level judiciaries and legislatures financial autonomy. Nigeria's 36 state governors sued the federal government that September, alleging that it sought to avoid its financial responsibilities through the order; the Supreme Court did not issue a ruling by the end of 2021.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 1 / 4

There have been numerous allegations of extortion and bribe taking within the police force. Federal and state authorities have been criticized for disregarding due process, with prolonged pretrial detention of suspects even after courts ordered their release on bail. Children with suspected Boko Haram ties face military detention according to a 2020 United Nations report.

Accountability for the use of force during the 2020 #EndSARS protests has been lacking. In November 2021, a panel of inquiry found that authorities attempted to conceal their actions at the Lekki toll gate. While the panel made 32 recommendations to the Lagos state government that month, the government fully accepted 11 and modified 6.

Nigerians in the southeast risked arbitrary arrest during the government's campaign against the IPOB's armed wing, which began in January 2021. Residents with no IPOB affiliation were arrested during the campaign.

In late June 2021, IPOB leader Nnamdi Kanu was arrested and returned to Nigeria, with Abuja accusing Kanu of charges including treason. In July, Kanu's lawyer accused the Kenyan government of mistreating him before returning him to Nigeria, which it denied. Later that month, the United Kingdom called on Abuja to explain the circumstances of Kanu's arrest; Kanu maintains British citizenship.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 0 / 4

The military has been repeatedly criticized by local and international human rights groups for extrajudicial killings, torture, and other abuses, including during counterinsurgency efforts in the northeast and operations against separatist movements in the southeast.

In January 2021, the government launched a campaign targeting the IPOB's armed wing, the Eastern Security Network (ESN), which was formed in late 2020 and targeted police stations and other public buildings. Security personnel used excessive force and extrajudicially executed residents during their campaign. Amnesty International reported that security forces killed at least 115 people between March and June; many victims were not affiliated with the ESN.

Police have been accused of using excessive force. Amnesty International reported that the Special Anti-Robbery Squad (SARS) was responsible for at least 82 cases of torture, ill-treatment, or extrajudicial killings between 2017 and May 2020. Although SARS was dissolved in 2020, allegations of police abuse persist.

Sharia courts are known to impose the death penalty. In August 2020, a Sharia court in Kano State handed Yahaya Sharif-Aminu a death sentence over blasphemous comments. In January 2021, a court in Kano State overturned Sharif-Aminu's conviction and ordered a retrial.

Boko Haram remained active during 2021, though its operations were impacted by the May death of leader Abubakar Shekau, who died by suicide after being captured by ISWAP. Boko Haram was blamed for over 30,000 deaths under Shekau's leadership. The army reported that over 1,000 Boko Haram members and their relatives surrendered in subsequent weeks. Senior Boko Haram members either shifted their allegiance to ISWAP or surrendered.

ISWAP continued to launch attacks during 2021. In May, ISWAP attacked a military base in Borno State twice, killing 35 people. September, ISWAP killed at least 8 soldiers in an ambush in Borno State in September.

A rolling conflict between farmers and the Fulani, a seminomadic Muslim ethnic group, continued to destabilize northern Nigeria in 2021. The Fulani have abandoned degraded grasslands in the north, coming into increased conflict with farmers as they travel south to find new grazing lands.

Kidnapping and other forms of criminality are acute concerns. In July 2021, criminal gangs shot down a fighter jet on the border between Kaduna and Zamfara states, though the pilot survived. In October, security forces rescued 187 kidnapping victims in Zamfara State, several weeks after they were taken captive.

Various vigilante groups are active in Nigeria. The National Assembly unsuccessfully attempted to give official recognition to the Vigilante Group of Nigeria (VGN) in 2017 and 2019. In November 2021, the lower house passed a bill to extend official powers to the VGN.

Despite constitutional safeguards against ethnic discrimination, many ethnic minorities experience bias by state governments and other societal groups in areas including employment, education, and housing.

Women are subject to widespread societal discrimination regarding matters such as education and employment. Many poor families choose to send sons to school while daughters become street vendors or domestic workers. Women also face significant legal disadvantages in states governed by Sharia statutes.

LGBT+ Nigerians face widespread official and societal discrimination. Nigerians convicted of engaging in same-sex relationships can be imprisoned for as long as 14 years, while 12 northern states maintain the death penalty for same-sex relations. LGBT+ people are also subject to assault by police officers during arrests, extortion attempts, and discrimination when accessing public and private services. A 2019 survey showed widespread opposition to LGBT+ rights, with 74 percent of respondents supporting prison sentences for those engaging in same-sex activity.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 4 / 16 (-1)

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 1 / 4

While the freedom of movement is legally guaranteed, security officials frequently impose dusk-to-dawn curfews and other movement restrictions in areas affected by communal violence or by militant activities. The UNHCR reported that 2.2 million people were internally displaced as of December 2021.

Nigeria's poorly regulated property rights system hinders citizens and private businesses from engaging in the efficient and legal purchase or sale of property, including land. Bribery is a common practice when starting a business and registering property. Women belonging to certain ethnic groups are often denied equal rights to inherit property due to customary laws and practices.

However, the climate for private enterprise in recent years has benefited from advancements in credit accessibility, ease of starting a business, ease of paying taxes, and property registration.

The property rights of Fulani and of farmers are affected by violence as Fulani travel south to find new grazing lands. Herding groups' grazing lands have been used for cultivation, while Fulani herders have been observed expropriating farmers' land and crops. In May 2021, 17 state governors called for an open-grazing ban but President Buhari voiced his disagreement, questioning the proposal's legality.

Score Change: The score declined from 2 to 1 because the government has failed to protect the rights of farmers and herders who have had their land and property expropriated amid escalating communal violence in recent years.

Despite the existence of strict laws against rape, domestic violence, female genital mutilation (FGM), and child marriage, these offenses remain widespread, with low rates of reporting and prosecution. Women and girls in camps for displaced persons have reported sexual abuse by members of the military and other authorities. Boko Haram's attacks on women's rights have been particularly egregious, with victims often subjected to forced marriage and rape, among other acts.

Abortion is illegal unless the life of the mother is in danger. As a result, many women seek out dangerous illegal abortions, finding themselves at risk of medical complications. Women who face such complications often do not receive further medical treatment.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 1 / 4

Nigerian organized crime groups are heavily involved in human trafficking. Boko Haram has subjected children to forced labor and sex slavery. Both Boko Haram and a civilian vigilante group that opposes the militants have forcibly recruited child soldiers, according to the US State Department.

Meanwhile, implementation of the 2003 Child Rights Act, which protects children from sexual exploitation and other abuses, remains uneven; at the end of 2021, UNICEF noted that eight northern states have not implemented the legislation, though all eight were in the process of doing so.

The National Agency for the Prohibition of Trafficking in Persons (NAPTIP) continues to rescue trafficking survivors and prosecute some suspected traffickers, but its funding is reportedly inadequate and labor traffickers face few prosecutions. Survivors often find their freedom of movement withheld by NAPTIP in poorly managed shelters and experience discrimination when seeking access to public services after their release.

North Korea

Population: 25,900,000

Capital: Pyongyang

Freedom Status: Not Free

Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: North Korea is a one-party state led by a dynastic totalitarian dictatorship. Surveillance is pervasive, arbitrary arrests and detention are common, and punishments for political offenses are severe. The state maintains a system of camps for political prisoners where torture, forced labor, starvation, and other atrocities take place. While some social and economic changes have been observed in recent years, including a growth in small-scale private business activity, human rights violations are still widespread, grave, and systematic.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- The government continues to sharply restrict internal movement and has instituted shoot-to-kill orders at the border. In July, soldiers allegedly killed three Chinese sailors on a fishing boat that landed on a North Korean island to avoid Typhoon In-Fa.
- Authorities rejected offers from the World Health Organization (WHO) to provide the government with COVID-19 vaccines in September. They continue to claim that no infections or deaths attributed to the virus have been confirmed.
- North Korean forces resumed missile testing in March after a year pause, showcasing a range of new missile capabilities. The unresolved conflict with South Korea around North Korea's nuclear weapons program poses a threat to physical security, and negotiations with Seoul and Washington were stalled throughout the year.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 0 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 0 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

Kim Jong-un became the country's supreme leader in 2011 after the death of his father, Kim Jong-il, who had led North Korea since the 1994 death of his father. In 2016, the State Affairs Commission (SAC) became the country's top ruling organ, and Kim Jong-un was named its chairman.

In 2019, Kim was reelected as SAC chairman by the Supreme People's Assembly (SPA), the country's unicameral legislature, and given the new title of "supreme representative of all the Korean people and the supreme leader of the Republic."

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

Members of the 687-seat SPA are elected to five-year terms. All candidates are preselected by the Democratic Front for the Reunification of the Fatherland (DFRF), a coalition dominated by the ruling Korean Workers' Party (KWP) alongside a handful of subordinate parties and organizations. Each candidate then runs unopposed. Voting is compulsory for citizens who are at least 17 years old, and turnout commonly approaches 100 percent.

SPA elections were held in 2019, for all 697 seats filled by preselected candidates. Turnout was reported at 99.99 percent. Local elections were also held that year filling 27,876 posts with similar voter turnout.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 0 / 4

Although there is a clear framework for conducting elections, including official election monitors, the system's structure denies voters any choice and rules out opposition to the incumbent leadership. The government uses the mandatory elections as an unofficial census, tracking whether and how people voted, and interpreting any rejection of the preselected candidates as treason.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 0 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 0 / 4

North Korea is effectively a one-party state. Although a small number of minor parties and organizations legally exist, all are members of the DFRF.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 0 / 4

Any political dissent or opposition is prohibited and harshly punished. The country has been ruled by the KWP since its founding, which has always been controlled by the Kim family. Kim Jong-un was promoted from chairman to secretary general of the KWP in January 2021. His late father, Kim Jong-il, was dubbed the "eternal general secretary" of the party after his death.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 0 / 4

There is no opportunity for public political participation, and even KWP elites operate under the threat of extreme penalties for perceived dissent or disloyalty. The party is subject to regular purges aimed at reinforcing the Kim Jong-un's personal authority, and the regime has executed senior officials who have fallen out of favor.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 0 / 4

North Korea is ethnically homogeneous, with only a small Chinese population and a few non-Chinese foreign residents. With few exceptions, foreigners cannot join the KWP or serve in the military or government. Religious groups are harshly suppressed and unable to organize politically. Women hold few leadership positions in ruling bodies and hold only 121 of the SPA's 687 seats; the system does not allow these representatives to independently address the interests of women. The government typically denies the existence of LGBT+ people in North Korea.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 0 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 0 / 4

North Korea has no freely elected officials. Kim Jong-un and his inner circle determine the policies of the government, and the SPA gathers periodically to unanimously approve all decisions. High-level officials are subject to constant churn based on their performance and their perceived loyalties to Kim Jong-un.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 0 / 4

Corruption is believed to be endemic at every level of the state and economy, and government officials commonly engage in bribery. There are no independent or impartial anticorruption mechanisms.

Small-scale local markets have become prime targets of corrupt police officers, who solicit bribes from the operators and detain those who cannot pay. Market participants also pay bribes to supervisors at their official workplaces, to avoid discipline or imprisonment for abandoning their state-assigned roles.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 0 / 4

The government is neither transparent in its operations nor accountable to the public. Information about the functioning of state institutions is tightly controlled for both domestic and external audiences.

The authorities heavily restricted information about the presence of the COVID-19 pandemic in the country during 2021. Officials disclosed only fragmentary data regarding key aspects of public health measures, such as quarantines and testing. Authorities rejected offers from the WHO to provide the government with COVID-19 vaccines in September 2021; they continue to claim that no infections or deaths attributed to the virus have been confirmed.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 3 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 0 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 0 / 4

All domestic media outlets are run by the state. Televisions and radios are permanently fixed to state channels, and all publications and broadcasts are subject to strict supervision and censorship. The government occasionally allows a small number of foreign books, films, and television programs to be distributed and aired in the country, but this remains rare.

In recent years, several foreign news agencies have established bureau offices in Pyongyang, however their access is tightly controlled, and the government has been known to expel media crews in retaliation for their work. Select foreign media services are often invited to the country to cover key political events and holidays, although authorities strictly manage their visits.

Several US and South Korean media outlets broadcast shortwave and medium-wave Korean-language radio programming into North Korea, though the government works to jam their stations.

Campaigns to send information into the country via USB thumb drives, SD cards, and leaflets are common, and North Koreans often modify their radios to receive foreign broadcasts. However, South Korean authorities have banned the transmission of leaflets and other information across the border without government permission. The consumption of foreign radio broadcasts and possession of contraband devices are illegal, as are the facilitation and nonreporting of such activity; all are subject to severe punishment under North Korea's "anti-reactionary thought" law, up to and including the death penalty.

Although freedom of religion is guaranteed by the constitution, it does not exist in practice. State-sanctioned churches maintain a token presence in Pyongyang, and some North Koreans are known to practice their faith furtively. However, intense state indoctrination and repression preclude free and open exercise of religion. Crackdowns are common, and those caught are arrested and subjected to harsh punishments, including imprisonment in labor camps. Foreigners caught proselytizing also risk arrest and detention. As of May 2021, the nongovernmental organization (NGO) Christian Solidarity Worldwide estimates that approximately 200,000 people are being held in prison camps, many due to their Christian beliefs.

There is no academic freedom. The state must approve all curriculums, including those of educational programs led by foreigners. Although some North Koreans are permitted to study abroad at both universities and short-term educational training programs, those granted such opportunities are subject to monitoring and reprisals for perceived disloyalty.

Nearly all forms of private communication are monitored by a huge network of informants. Domestic third-generation (3G) mobile service has been available since 2008, with an estimated five or six million users nationally. Mobile phones operating on this network are used as surveillance tools by the state, which can review individuals' application usage and intranet browsing history and take screenshots of their activity. Newer mobile phones have been designed to block users' efforts to consume contraband media.

Ordinary mobile users do not have access to the global internet but can connect to a state-run intranet. Only a small number of elites have internet access, reaching it through their own service. Domestic and international mobile services are kept strictly separate, and crackdowns on users with Chinese-origin phones have been reported.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 0 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 0 / 4

Freedom of assembly is not recognized, and participants in any unauthorized gatherings are subject to severe punishment, including prison sentences.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 0 / 4

There are no legal associations or organizations other than those created by the state and ruling party.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 0 / 4

Strikes, collective bargaining, and other organized labor activities are illegal and can draw severe punishment for participants, including prison sentences.

F. RULE OF LAW: 0 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 0 / 4

North Korea's judiciary is subordinate to the political leadership in law and in practice. According to the constitution, the Central Court, the country's highest court, is accountable to the SPA, and its duties include protecting "state power and the socialist system."

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 0 / 4

Fundamental due process rights, including freedom from arbitrary detention and the right to a fair trial, are systematically denied. As many as 200,000 prisoners are believed to be held in internment camps in the country. Foreign visitors are also at risk of arbitrary detention. At least four South Korean citizens remain in custody as of 2021, having been accused of a range of crimes, including espionage and kidnapping.

In 2020, unofficial reports claimed the government had granted a mass amnesty to inmates who had displayed model behavior during their sentences. In August of that year, the SPA Presidium reportedly decreed an amnesty for those who had been convicted of crimes against the country and its people, set to take effect in September. It remains unclear how many prisoners were affected by the two reported amnesties.

Documented North Korean human rights violations include widespread torture, public executions, forced labor by detainees, and death sentences for political offenses. Defectors who seek safety in third countries are sometimes returned to North Korea, where they are subject to torture and disproportionate punishment. China's government considers North Korean escapees to be irregular economic migrants and regularly turns them back, violating international law.

There are currently strict pandemic containment measures and border controls in place, including shoot-to-kill orders for illegal exit or entry. In July 2021, soldiers allegedly killed three Chinese sailors on a fishing boat that landed on a North Korean island to avoid Typhoon In-Fa.

The unresolved conflict with South Korea around North Korea's nuclear weapons program poses a threat to physical security, and negotiations with Seoul and Washington remained stalled in 2021. North Korean forces resumed missile testing in March after a year pause, showcasing a range of new missile capabilities.

A 2021 United Nations (UN) report on human rights in North Korea noted that forced labor and torture were still rampant in the prison system, and that citizens often paid bribes to avoid arrest, mitigate their treatment in detention, and secure family visits.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 0 / 4

Discrimination is commonly based on perceived political and ideological nonconformity. All citizens are classified according to their family's level of loyalty and proximity to the leadership under a semihereditary caste-like system known as songbun. Those who are classified as "wavering" or "hostile" instead of "loyal" face official discrimination in employment, live in poorer housing, and receive limited educational opportunities, though rules can be manipulated through bribery. Relatives of suspected political and ideological dissidents, including defectors, are also subject to punishment in what amounts to guilt by association.

The ethnic Chinese population in North Korea has limited educational and employment opportunities, but somewhat more freedom of travel and trade. In 2021, the government reportedly began punishing those who slander China or North Korea's ethnic Chinese residents.

Women have legal equality but face rigid discrimination in practice and are poorly represented in public employment and the military. Despite fewer opportunities in the formal sector, women are economically active outside the socialist system, which can expose them to arbitrary state interference.

The law does not explicitly prohibit same-sex relations, but the government maintains that the practice does not exist in the country.

North Korea has historically denied the rights of people living with disabilities. Defectors report that disabled people have been quarantined, exiled, forcibly sterilized, experimented on, and sometimes executed. The UN special rapporteur for disability rights visited North Korea in 2017 but was escorted by government minders, prohibited from reviewing internal data, and denied access to a mental health institution during her trip.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 3 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 0 / 4

Residents have no freedom of movement, and forced internal resettlement is routine. Emigration is illegal. In recent years, authorities have employed stricter domestic controls to arrest the flow of defectors. The number of defectors arriving in South Korea dropped to only 63 in 2021 amid tighter pandemic-related travel restrictions across the region.

The regime imposed severe new limits on movement in response to COVID-19 during 2020 for security forces patrolling restricted border zones. In 2021, authorities reportedly enforced quarantines and other strict policies with fines and house searches to test for suspected coronavirus cases.

A person's songbun classification affects their place of residence as well as employment and educational opportunities, access to medical facilities, and even access to stores. All foreign travel—whether for work, trade, or education—is strictly controlled by the government. Freedom of movement for foreigners is also limited and subject to arbitrary constraints.

Most North Korean workers cannot freely choose their employment, with the government assigning men and unmarried women to their positions and often denying monetary compensation. Workers, especially women, seek informal employment to earn an income; they pay official employers bribes to cover their absences.

The formal economy remains both centrally planned and grossly mismanaged. A lack of infrastructure, scarcity of energy and raw materials, lingering foreign debt, and ideological isolation also hobble business activity in the country.

Informal and government-approved private markets and service industries have provided many North Koreans, especially women, a growing field of activity that is somewhat free from government control. However, the COVID-19 pandemic has hampered access to goods to sell in those markets, limiting people's ability to earn discretionary income. This has also increased dependence on domestic food production and distribution, causing growing concerns about a humanitarian food crisis.

Local officials have had some discretion in the management of special economic zones and over small-scale experiments with market-oriented economic policies.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 1 / 4

Men and women have formal equality in personal status matters such as marriage and divorce. However, sexual and physical violence against women—in the home, prisons and labor camps, and in other contexts—is common, and victims have little legal recourse. There are no specific legal penalties for domestic violence. UN bodies have noted the use of forced abortions on pregnant women when forcibly repatriated from China and infanticide of half-Chinese children.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 1 / 4

Forced labor is common in prison camps, mass mobilization programs, and state-run contracting arrangements in which North Korean workers are sent abroad. Human trafficking networks, sometimes operating with the assistance of government officials, target North Korean women; those ensnared are subject to sex slavery and forced marriages, often in China. Some women have also turned to prostitution to survive in recent years and are exploited by their employers and the police.

Economic opportunities are also hampered by international sanctions imposed in response to North Korea's continued nuclear pursuits. Since 2016, sanctions have targeted civilian industries including textiles and seafood. North Korea has also been cut off from the international banking system. While this has not deterred North Korea's pursuit of nuclear weapons, it has created growing difficulties for those dependent on markets and quasi-private businesses.

North Macedonia

Population: 2,100,000

Capital: Skopje

Freedom Status: Partly Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: North Macedonia is a parliamentary republic. Tensions in the wake of a 2017 parliamentary crisis have receded, with subsequent polls being conducted in a calmer environment. North Macedonia continues to struggle with corruption and clientelism. While media and civil society participate in vigorous public discourse, journalists and activists still face pressure and intimidation.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- The ruling Social Democratic Union of Macedonia (SDSM) performed poorly in the October local elections while the opposition Internal Macedonian Revolutionary Organization–Democratic Party for Macedonian National Unity (VMRO-DPMNE) did well, winning 22 mayoral races in the first round. Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE) observers called the polls competitive but also noted accusations of intimidation and vote-buying.
 - Prime Minister Zoran Zaev announced his intention to resign after the local elections and formally stepped down in late December, after securing a renewed governing coalition. Deputy Finance Minister Dimitar Kovacevski then became prime minister-designate, remaining in that effective post at year's end.
 - North Macedonia carried out its first census since 2002 in September, with final results expected in 2022. Members of the ethnic Albanian and Turkish communities voiced concerns over representation based on the results, though Zaev promised that the rights of established communities would not be affected.
 - The Bulgarian government maintained its block on North Macedonian talks to join the European Union (EU) during the year, though Bulgarian prime minister Kiril Petkov expressed an interest in renewing talks with Skopje in a December interview.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 28 / 40 (+1)A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 9 / 12*A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 3 / 4

The president is elected to as many as two five-year terms through a direct popular vote. President Stevo Pendarovski of the SDSM won his first term in May 2019, taking 51.7 percent of the vote against opponent Gordana Siljanovska-Davkova's 44.8 percent. Voter turnout was 46.7 percent—a low figure, but one consistent with recent North Macedonian elections. OSCE observers called the election free and credible, despite some technical challenges involving voter rolls and infrastructure, among other issues.

The unicameral Assembly elects the prime minister, who is head of government and holds most executive power. Parliamentary elections held in July 2020 resulted in a virtual tie, with the SDSM barely ahead of the VMRO-DPMNE. The SDSM formed a coalition government with smaller left-wing and ethnic minority parties, with Zaev's new cabinet being approved by the end of August.

Zaev announced his intention to resign in late October 2021, after the SDSM fared poorly in that month's local elections, and resigned as party leader in November. Zaev formally stepped down as prime minister in late December, after securing the Alternative Party's parliamentary support. Deputy Finance Minister Kovacevski became SDSM leader in mid-December and was named prime minister-designate a week after Zaev formally stepped down. Kovacevski's cabinet must be approved by the Assembly within 20 days of his appointment.

Members of the 120-seat Assembly are elected by proportional representation to four-year terms.

The July 2020 polls showed improvement from previous years, with instances of vote-buying, intimidation, and other misconduct reported less frequently. OSCE observers called the poll well-managed and free, but criticized last-minute changes to the electoral framework. The SDSM won 35.9 percent of the vote and 46 seats, while the VMRO-DPMNE won 34.6 percent and 44 seats. The Democratic Union for Integration (BDI), an ethnic Albanian party, won 11.5 percent and 15 seats, while the Alliance for Albanians–Alternative Party alliance won 9 percent and 12 seats.

Local elections were held in two rounds in October 2021. The VMRO-DPMNE won 22 mayoral races in the first round based on preliminary results, while the SDSM won 9 and the BDI won 3. VMRO-DPMNE-backed candidate Danela Arsovska won the Skopje mayoralty in the second round, defeating SDSM incumbent Petre Shilegov. OSCE observers called the local contests competitive and largely fair, but reported accusations of vote-buying, pressure on candidates to withdraw, and pressure on public employees to vote for specific candidates.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 3 / 4

Election laws have deficiencies, though the overall accessibility of election results and reporting by the State Election Commission (DIK) has improved since 2019. Ambiguities in election laws that remain unaddressed include candidate-registration regulations and resolution mechanisms for election-related disputes. OSCE observers have previously expressed concerns about inaccuracies in the electoral roll.

In 2018, the government held a referendum to approve the Prespa Agreement, signed with Greece, to change the country's name to North Macedonia. While the referendum did not reach the required 50 percent turnout, 90 percent of voters who participated voted in favor. OSCE observers called the results credible but said content had been inadequately explained to voters, and the DIK lacked transparency in carrying out the poll. The Prespa Agreement was ratified in 2019, despite the low turnout.

OSCE observers reported that the DIK was transparent in reporting results from the October 2021 local contests. However, the DIK was affected by vacancies in some positions and by electoral-law amendments passed only in mid-September. Voters also encountered biometric failures and other technical issues during the polls.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 12 / 16 (+1)

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 4 / 4 (+1)

The constitution protects the right to establish and join political parties, though patronage networks hamper democratic competition. While violence occurred in the parliament in 2017, in response to the selection of a SDSM-backed parliament speaker, tensions have since lessened.

Both the main center-left and center-right blocs lost votes in the 2020 parliamentary elections to ethnic Albanian minority parties and a far-left party, Levica, which won two seats and entered the Assembly for the first time.

Independent candidates also participated in the October 2021 local elections. VMRO-DPMNE-backed Skopje mayoral candidate Arsovska, for example, ran as an independent. OSCE observers noted the Bosniak Democratic Union's first independent campaign in these elections, while parties representing Serbian and Turkish communities additionally maintained their own campaigns.

Score Change: The score improved from 3 to 4 because more political parties and independent candidates are competing in national and local races.

In 2017, power rotated from the right-wing nationalist party, the VMRO-DPMNE—which had governed since 2006—to the left-leaning SDSM, which had governed through much of the 1990s and early 2000s. Before taking power in 2017, the SDSM had boycotted the parliament on several occasions over electoral-fraud claims and allegations of former prime minister Nikola Gruevski directing a wiretapping and surveillance program. However, competitive elections and the 2018 referendum reflected improvements in the country's electoral system.

The October 2021 local elections were marked by opposition gains. The VMRO-DPMNE won 22 mayoral races in the first round, while their preferred candidate won the Skopje mayoral race in the second round.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 2 / 4

Voters are largely free to make political decisions, though reports of intimidation and vote-buying remain an issue, especially among Roma and other socially vulnerable groups. Patronage networks remain influential in political life and can influence political outcomes.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 3 / 4

Ethnic Albanians make up 25 percent of the population according to the 2002 census, and a political party representing Albanians has sat in each ruling coalition. Roma remain politically marginalized, while Turkish, Serbian, and Bosnian minorities are comparatively well integrated.

A census was carried out in September 2021, though full results are not expected until March 2022. The BDI threatened not to recognize the results if ethnic Albanians represented less than 20 percent of the population, which is the legal threshold for the official use of a language and for public-sector employment quotas. Members of the ethnic Turkish community also voiced concerns over the census, though Zaev pledged that established communities would not lose rights due to the results.

Despite the introduction of parity laws and joint initiatives on behalf of nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) and electoral authorities, societal attitudes discourage women from participating in politics. Women represent 41.7 percent of the Assembly but are not as well represented at the local level. In the October 2021 local elections, women represented 45 percent of first-round local-council candidates, but only 8 percent of mayoral candidates were female. Only two women, including Skopje mayor Arsovska, won mayoral posts by the second round.

Small LGBT+ advocacy groups are politically active, but LGBT+ people have little representation in politics. Parliamentarians established an LGBT+ working group in 2018, however.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 7 / 12C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 3 / 4

The Assembly did not effectively function for much of 2017 due to VMRO-DPMNE attempts to prevent the formation of an SDSM-led government and due to the parliamentary altercation in which Zaev and other SDSM lawmakers were injured. A government was formed in mid-2017, allowing parliamentary activity to resume. The 2019 election of President Pendarovski, meanwhile, resolved an impasse between the legislature and executive that had persisted for years, as both bodies are now governed by the SDSM.

Parliamentary activity has sometimes been tense in recent years, however. In 2020, VMRO-DPMNE parliamentarians helped stall a proposal to allow Assembly members with COVID-19 or in isolation to convene online. In November 2021, after then prime minister Zaev voiced his intention to resign, the VMRO-DPMNE unsuccessfully attempted to replace the SDSM-led government through a no-confidence vote. The proceedings were marred by accusations that an Assembly member was kidnapped to keep the SDSM-led government in power, though the individual in question later said he declined to attend the parliamentary session.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 2 / 4

Corruption remains a serious problem, and there has been widespread impunity for corrupt government officials, including members of parliament and the judiciary. While the EU praised the pace of reform in a 2020 report, the Council of Europe's Group of States against Corruption (GRECO) reported that North Macedonia had not fully implemented its anticorruption recommendations in its April 2021 report.

In March 2021, businessman Jordan "Orce" Kamcev was detained after authorities considered him an active flight risk; in 2020, Kamcev was suspected of engaging in money laundering along with former prime minister Gruevski, who fled North Macedonia in 2018. Prosecutors successfully argued that Kamcev should remain in detention in a December 2021 hearing, claiming that he was planning to flee North Macedonia.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 2 / 4

The law on open access to public information is inconsistently implemented. According to a May 2021 report released by the Centre for Civil Communications, national and municipal governments made relatively little progress in improving transparency.

A European Commission (EC) report published in October 2021 noted that the Finance Ministry made progress in enhancing transparency related to public expenditures, however. The EC report also noted the government's transparency in reporting on COVID-19-related purchases.

Government procurement decisions have caused controversy. In July 2021, the Assembly passed legislation allowing the Zaev government to bypass tender rules while negotiating a highway construction contract, which was met with criticism from civil society advocates. In December, the Constitutional Court declined to review that decision, allowing the government to negotiate directly with construction firms Bechtel and ENKA.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 39 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 12 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 3 / 4

The media landscape is deeply polarized along political lines, and private media outlets are often tied to political or business interests that influence their content. However, a wide collection of critical and independent outlets operates, mainly online.

A June 2021 report from the Association of Journalists of Macedonia counted 14 threats and physical attacks against journalists in 2020, while only 4 such incidents were recorded in 2019. More than half of the targets were female journalists.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 3 / 4

The constitution guarantees freedom of religion. However, Islamophobia is present in political rhetoric and in public discourse, and is directed primarily at the ethnic Albanian community and Roma.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 3 / 4

Academic freedom is largely respected, but corruption in universities is significant. Textbooks have minimally covered postindependence events, primarily because ethnic Macedonians and ethnic Albanians interpret the 2001 civil conflict differently.

In February 2021, the Zaev government vowed to review existing textbooks over content that may be considered offensive to ethnic Albanians.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 3 / 4

Allegations of widespread wiretapping and monitoring of private citizens, journalists, politicians, and religious leaders by the VMRO-DPMNE government helped bring about its ouster. The SDSM-led government has since taken steps to reform the security services, which were believed to have surveilled targets at Gruevski's direction.

The Assembly passed a law limiting the secret police's surveillance activities in 2018. In 2019, the Directorate for Security and Counterintelligence (UBK) was replaced by the National Security Agency. A Council for Civilian Supervision was created to provide additional security-sector oversight in 2019.

In February 2021, former UBK chief Saso Mijalkov received a 12-year prison sentence over his involvement in the wiretapping scheme. In December, he was allowed to leave prison after filing an appeal on another case and providing 11 million euros ($12.5 million) as a guarantee against fleeing the country.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 8 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 3 / 4

Constitutional assembly guarantees are generally well respected, though riot police who typically monitor demonstrations are known to use disproportionate force. Property damage sometimes occurs during protests. Mass gatherings were restricted during 2020 in response to COVID-19, though protests were nevertheless held that year.

Several notable protests were held in 2021. In February, ethnic Albanians marched in Skopje, calling for the release of five ethnic Albanians who received prison terms over the 2012 murders of ethnic Macedonians. Police used shock grenades after participants threw rocks at them; at least seven officers were injured. In April, VMRO-DPMNE supporters were among those calling for the release of individuals who had been convicted over the 2017 parliament altercation in a Skopje event. In September, hundreds of protesters called for the resignation of then Tetovo mayor Teuta Arifi after a fire at a COVID-19 field hospital killed 14 people.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 3 / 4

NGOs generally operate in a freer and safer environment under the SDSM-led government, and public institutions have become more responsive to civil society work. However, NGOs, particularly those that receive foreign funding, face pressure from the VMRO-DPMNE and its supporters.

Levica members and leaders have also targeted civil society. In December 2021, a group of NGOs criticized Levica in an open letter, saying the party engaged in "hate speech" meant to delegitimize their work.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 2 / 4

Workers may organize and bargain collectively, though trade unions lack stable financing and skilled managers.

F. RULE OF LAW: 9 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 2 / 4

Concerns remain about the efficacy and independence of the judiciary. The EU has stressed judicial reforms as a key priority for North Macedonia's accession bid.

The EC's October 2021 report noted that the government made progress in enacting its judicial reform strategy, though the EC called on Skopje to continue implementing its action plan.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 2 / 4

Due process rights remain compromised by corruption and patronage within the justice system, in which the public has little confidence. Political interference in the work of prosecutors remains a problem. The selective application of justice also persists, although the government has carried out some reforms intended to ameliorate the issue.

Cases related to COVID-19 measure violations, the 2017 parliamentary altercation, and illegal wiretapping were affected by the pandemic during 2020, though the EC noted that progress on the adjudication of corruption cases was still achieved in its October 2021 report.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 3 / 4

The threat of physical violence has subsided significantly under the SDSM-led government. While interethnic violence does occur in North Macedonia, such incidents have lessened in recent years.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 2 / 4

The SDSM-led government passed an antidiscrimination law that prohibited discrimination based on sexual orientation in 2019. The Constitutional Court struck it down over procedural issues in May 2020, though the parliament again voted in favor of the legislation that October.

Laws prohibit workplace sexual harassment, but the issue persists, as most instances are not reported.

Ethnic Albanians suffer from employment discrimination and anti-Albanian sentiment. Roma face significant discrimination, including in the workplace.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 10 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 3 / 4

Travel and movement are generally unrestricted. Corruption can hamper people's ability to freely choose their place of employment or education. A 2021 report on discrimination provided to the EC noted that Romany students face segregation in educational settings, though the EC's October 2021 report noted that more Romany students were entering higher education.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 3 / 4

The right to own property and establish private businesses is generally respected, though corruption remains a barrier to free enterprise.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 2 / 4

Rape, including spousal rape, is illegal, as is domestic violence, which remains common; both are infrequently reported. Police are not consistently responsive to survivors. In January 2021, the Assembly passed legislation meant to combat gender-based violence (GBV), in line with the Istanbul Convention.

Child marriage occurs in the Romany community. According to 2018–19 data from the UN Children's Fund (UNICEF), 15.5 percent of Romany women had been married or were otherwise "in union" before the age of 15.

A 2017 Administrative Court ruling allowed people to change their gender in the country's official registry to match their gender identity.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 2 / 4

Laws do not impose rigid barriers to social mobility, though rampant corruption can effectively hamper upward income mobility. Though the government's 2018–22 economic formalization strategy has proven somewhat successful in addressing informal employment, the country's informal economy remains large, leaving many workers vulnerable to employer abuse.

The Assembly considered amendments to the labor code and to minimum-wage legislation during 2021. Under the revisions, the minimum wage would rise to 300 euros ($356) per month while Sunday would be declared a nonworking day except for employees providing certain vital functions. The revisions remained under consideration at year's end.

Workers in the garment industry are vulnerable to mistreatment, with employees sometimes earning less than the minimum wage. In February 2021, the Fair Wear Foundation and local NGO Glasen Tekstilec (Loud Textile Worker) reported that garment workers were sometimes forced to decline government aid by their employers.

Human trafficking remains a problem. The government has taken some steps to better identify trafficking victims, notably at government-run transit centers that house migrants and refugees. However, government support to NGOs that aid trafficking victims has decreased. Romany girls are vulnerable to trafficking for the purposes of child marriage.

According to the 2020 edition of the US Labor Department's Findings on the Worst Forms of Child Labor, Romany, Balkan Egyptian, and Ashkali children are vulnerable to forced labor, including forced begging.

Norway

Population: 5,400,000

Capital: Oslo

Freedom Status: Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Norway is one of the most robust democracies in the world. Elections are free and fair, and power regularly rotates between parties. Civil liberties are respected, with independent media and civil society actors holding the government to account. Discrimination against Roma and other marginalized groups remains a problem.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- National elections were held in September, with a voter turnout of 77.2 percent. In October, Labour Party leader Jonas Gahr Støre was appointed prime minister after the Labour Party and the Centre Party agreed to form a governing coalition.
 - Also in September, then finance minister Jan Tore Sanner was accused of unlawfully withholding the release of documents during the final days of the election campaign. An inquiry into the case was launched by the parliament's Control Committee the following month.
 - In May, Norway's welfare agency was found to have again misinterpreted EU rules when it denied benefits to recipients traveling abroad since 1994; the Supreme Court confirmed the agency had acted unlawfully in a July ruling. The agency first came under scrutiny in October 2019, when it was found to have wrongfully imprisoned at least 48 people on charges of welfare fraud since 2012.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 40 / 40A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 12 / 12*A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The constitutional monarch, currently King Harald V, appoints the prime minister, who is the leader of the majority party or coalition in the parliament. While the monarch is officially the head of state and commander in chief of the armed forces, his duties are largely ceremonial. National elections were held in September 2021; the following month, Labour Party leader Jonas Gahr Støre was appointed prime minister after the Labour Party and the Centre Party agreed to form a governing coalition.

Norway's unicameral parliament, the Storting, has 169 members who are directly elected for four-year terms through a system of proportional representation in multimember districts.

In the September 2021 election, the Labour Party won the largest share of votes, taking 48 seats, followed by the Conservatives with 36 seats, the Centre Party with 28, the right-wing populist Progress Party with 21, the Socialist Left Party with 13, the Red Party with 8, the Liberal Party with 8, the Green Party with 3, the Christian Democratic Party with 3, and the single-issue Patient Focus party with 1 seat. The election saw a turnout of 77.2 percent.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 4 / 4

Elections are regulated by the constitution and the Representation of the People Act of 2002. The National Electoral Committee, whose members are appointed by the king from all parliamentary parties, oversees the conduct of elections with the support of local-level committees. The 2017 Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE) election monitoring mission noted a high degree of public confidence in the country's electoral infrastructure.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 16 / 16B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 4 / 4

A range of political parties operate freely in Norway.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 4 / 4

Norway has a long history of democratic and peaceful transfers of power after elections. The center-left Labour Party, and center-right coalitions led by the Conservatives or the Christian Democrats, have typically rotated in and out of government. Smaller parties wield influence by participating in national and local coalitions.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 4 / 4

Citizens are generally free from undue interference in their political choices, and no military, foreign, or religious entities exert undemocratic pressure on voters. Public funding is the main source of party revenue, though the 2017 OSCE election monitoring mission noted a sharp increase in private contributions and conveyed concerns that this could allow wealthy donors to acquire undue influence over Norwegian politics.

Women and minority groups enjoy full political rights and electoral opportunities. Women are well represented in Norwegian politics: following the September 2021 elections, 50 percent of cabinet positions are held by women, and 45 percent of parliamentarians are women. Minority ethnic groups and the interests of LGBT+ people are addressed through robust antidiscrimination laws and various protections for same-sex couples.

The Indigenous Sámi population, in addition to participating in the national political process, has its own legislature, the Sameting, which has worked to protect the group's language and cultural rights and to influence the national government's decisions about Sámi land and resources. The national government has a deputy minister tasked specifically with handling Sámi issues.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 12 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 4 / 4

The freely elected government and parliament develop and implement policy without undue influence from actors who are not democratically accountable. In March 2020, in response to the COVID-19 pandemic, the parliament approved a law that gave the government discretionary powers to address the public health crisis. The law, which enables the government to make exceptions from current laws without going through the parliament for up to one month, only applies in urgent cases when ordinary parliamentary procedures would not be possible.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 4 / 4

Provisions of the penal code criminalizing corrupt activity are generally upheld. Official corruption is not viewed as a significant problem in Norway, though cases of corruption have surfaced at major firms in recent years. In January 2021, the Council of Europe (CoE)'s Group of States against Corruption (GRECO) recommended that the government introduce new accountability and enforcement mechanisms to prevent corruption among senior officials, including ministers, political advisers, and members of the police.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 4 / 4

The government generally operates with transparency. Several audits of public grants and other government spending were conducted in 2017, with auditors finding evidence of inadequate management.

The 2006 Freedom of Information Act provides for access to government documents. Investigative journalists have previously complained that senior government officials use various tactics to avoid or delay inquiries that would expose negligence or wrongdoing. In September 2021, then finance minister Jan Tore Sanner was accused of unlawfully withholding the release of documents during the final days of the election campaign. The parliament's Control Committee began an inquiry into case the following month.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 60 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 16 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 4 / 4

Freedom of the press is constitutionally guaranteed and generally respected in practice. Norwegians have access to news and commentary from a wide variety of independent outlets. In 2017, the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR) ruled that the Norwegian government could not compel journalists to reveal their sources, even if the source had come forward independently. In August 2020, the Norwegian Journalists' Association, the Verdens Gang newspaper, and the Norwegian Editors' Association sued the Attorney General for denying access to documents in a case. In March 2021, the Supreme Court ruled that the claimants were entitled to information in the case, but only to those documents that had already been surrendered, stating that those documents served as "a sufficient basis for public debate."

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 4 / 4

Freedom of religion is protected by the constitution and generally upheld in practice. However, religiously motivated hate crimes do occur. In 2020, the government launched an action plan to fight discrimination and hatred against Muslims, which includes requirements for police to separately register anti-Muslim crimes.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

Academic freedom is generally respected.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 4 / 4

Private discussion in Norway is free and vibrant.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 12 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

The right to freedom of assembly is generally respected. There have been tensions in recent years over demonstrations by extremist groups and their potential threat to public security. Public health measures intended to prevent the spread of COVID-19 limited the size of public gatherings during 2020 and 2021.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 4 / 4

Nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) form and operate without undue restrictions.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 4 / 4

The right to strike is legally guaranteed—except for members of the military and senior civil servants—and is generally respected in practice. All workers have the right to engage in collective bargaining.

F. RULE OF LAW: 16 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 4 / 4

The judiciary is generally considered independent, and the court system, headed by the Supreme Court, operates fairly. The king appoints judges on the advice of the Judicial Appointments Board, which is composed of legal and judicial professionals as well as representatives of the public. In April 2021, then prime minister Erna Solberg was fined for breaching COVID-19 rules. She paid the fine and apologized for her actions.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 4 / 4

Law enforcement agencies and the courts generally observe legal safeguards against arbitrary arrest and detention. Criminal defendants have access to counsel at the government's expense, and the principles of due process are typically respected during trial.

In October 2019, the Norwegian Labor and Welfare Administration (NAV) was found to have wrongfully imprisoned at least 48 people on charges of welfare fraud, having misinterpreted European Union (EU) rules on social security when it denied benefits to over 2,400 people who traveled to EU and European Economic Area (EEA) states since 2012. In September 2020, the NAV requested that individuals affected by the scandal contact them, to attempt to resolve the issue. They had already processed about 42,000 cases.

Additionally, in May 2021, the European Free Trade Association (EFTA) court found that since Norway became an EFTA member in 1994, the NAV had illegally denied welfare payments to people who had traveled to other EFTA countries while receiving benefits. The Norwegian Supreme Court confirmed that the NAV had acted unlawfully in a July ruling.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 4 / 4

The police are under civilian control, and physical abuse by law enforcement is rare. Prison conditions generally meet international standards.

Far-right and extremist violence is a recognized threat in Norway. In August 2019, a neo-Nazi sympathizer murdered his adopted sister, an ethnic Chinese woman, before unsuccessfully attacking a mosque in Bærum. In June 2020, he was sentenced to 21 years in prison with a minimum term of 14 years.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 4 / 4

The equality and antidiscrimination ombudsman enforces the Gender Equality Act, the Antidiscrimination Act, and other laws designed to protect the basic rights of women, minorities, and other groups at risk of mistreatment. These laws are generally upheld in practice. However, in a February 2021 report, the CoE recommended that Norway put more resources into supporting victims of discrimination.

Norwegian authorities reported 744 hate crimes in 2020, the majority of which were based on race, ethnicity, religion, or sexual orientation.

The national government also supports Sámi-language instruction and media outlets in the relevant regions. The Norwegian national human rights institution, however, has highlighted that Norway does not currently disaggregate statistical data by ethnicity or Indigenous status, which limits the evidence base for human rights monitoring and improving policy and service delivery for Indigenous groups such as the Sámi.

In the 2020 UN Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights report on Norway, it noted concern over evidence of people with visual impairments facing technological barriers at work; persons with an immigrant background continue to face discrimination in employment and access to healthcare; one third of older persons in hospitals and in health and care services are malnourished or at risk of malnutrition; and women still face a persistent pay gap, measuring 13.4 percent as of 2020.

In recent years, the CoE has encouraged Norwegian authorities to address widespread discriminatory attitudes toward Roma, and to ensure that they have equal access to education and employment.

Norway is increasingly coming under scrutiny for its restrictive refugee and asylum policies. The government increased the requirements for permanent residency in December 2020, from 3 to 5 years of living in Norway. In November 2020, 18-year-old Mustafa Hasan—who came to Norway as a 6-year-old—was deported by an Immigration Appeals Board (UNE) because his mother had provided inaccurate information. In July 2021, an Oslo court declared the board’s decision invalid, and ordered the case to be reexamined; the UNE had not issued a new decision on Hasan’s case before year’s end.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 16 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

Freedom of movement in Norway is generally respected. People can change their place of residence, employment, and education. However, some EU- and EEA-born welfare recipients living in Norway reportedly refrained from traveling abroad for fear of losing benefits; in November 2019, local NGO Caritas reported that several thousand were discouraged or stopped from traveling abroad in recent years.

As part of the government’s response to the COVID-19 pandemic, freedom of movement was limited in 2020 and 2021. In March 2020, strict rules prohibited travel outside of residents’ home county. Essential health workers were prohibited from traveling abroad, and only Norwegian nationals or residents were permitted to reenter Norway. EU citizens residing in Norway faced difficulties in returning to the country due to COVID-19-related regulations before the government relaxed entry restrictions in July 2021.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 4 / 4

The rights to own property and operate private businesses are established in Norwegian law and upheld in practice.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 4 / 4

The government generally does not restrict personal social freedoms. The Gender Equality Act provides equal rights for men and women with respect to marriage, divorce, and other personal status matters.

Domestic violence is a problem. In June 2019, Norway’s Institute for Human Rights (NIM) estimated that 150,000 people experience domestic violence annually. Amnesty International has also expressed concern that the penal code does not use a consent-based definition of rape and imposes a limited set of qualifying circumstances.

In 2018, the parliament passed a government-proposed law that bans face coverings, including the niqab and burqa, from teaching environments at all levels of education. The ban did not apply outside classroom settings, for instance during recess or staff meetings.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 4 / 4

The principle of equality of opportunity and legal protections against economic exploitation are generally upheld. The government has been active in combating labor and sex trafficking and works to provide services to victims. However, the US State Department’s 2021 Trafficking in Persons Report downgraded Norway’s status to Tier 2, saying that the government’s antitrafficking efforts were not “serious and sustained” in comparison to previous years, even taking into account the effects of the COVID-19 pandemic. There have been reports of forced labor in the agriculture, fishing, and construction sectors, including a case of Bangladeshi migrants being exploited on Norwegian farms through a Portuguese trafficker.

Oman

Population: 4,500,000

Capital: Muscat

Freedom Status: Not Free

Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: Oman is a hereditary monarchy, and power is concentrated in the hands of the sultan. The regime restricts virtually all political rights and civil liberties, imposing criminal penalties for criticism and dissent.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- The government published a new basic law, which introduced the position of crown prince, in January. Sultan Haitham bin Tariq's son, Dhi Yazan bin Haitham, was assigned to the post.
- In May, Omanis held demonstrations in several cities to protest unemployment and the introduction of a value-added tax (VAT). Some arrests and brief detentions were reported, while police used tear gas when clashing with protesters in the city of Sohar. Overall, however, security forces mounted a largely mild response, and most detainees were quickly released.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 6 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 2 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

In January 2020, Sultan Haitham bin Tariq succeeded his cousin, Sultan Qaboos bin Said, who died that month and had governed Oman since seizing power from his father, Sultan Said bin Taimur, in 1970. Sultan Haitham delegated to his cabinet ministers some of the responsibilities Sultan Qaboos had formally maintained, including the appointment of a foreign minister, that August. The basic law published in January 2021 created the position of crown prince; Sultan Haitham's eldest son, Dhi Yazan bin Haitham, was appointed.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 1 / 4

The 1996 basic law, promulgated by decree, created a bicameral body consisting of an appointed Council of State (Majlis al-Dawla) and a wholly elected Consultative Council (Majlis al-Shura). Citizens elect the Consultative Council for four-year terms, but the chamber has no legislative powers and can only recommend changes to new laws.

Consultative Council elections were held in October 2019, with 637 nonpartisan candidates, including 40 women, competing for the council's 86 seats. Two women were elected. In November 2019, the sultan appointed the 86 members of the Council of State for a four-year term, including 15 women.

Oman held its first-ever municipal council elections in 2012. In the most recent elections in 2016, voters chose among 731 nonpartisan candidates to fill 202 seats on the 11 councils, which correspond to Oman's 11 governorates. Turnout was about 49 percent. In May 2020, the Ministry of Interior (MoI) announced that the municipal elections set for 2020 would be postponed indefinitely due to the COVID-19 pandemic; the existing councils would continue until new elections could be held.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 1 / 4

The electoral framework allows all citizens over the age of 21 to vote unless they are in the military or security forces. However, the framework applies only to the Consultative Council and municipal councils, which serve largely as advisory bodies. Elections are administered by the MoI rather than by an independent commission.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 2 / 16B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 0 / 4

Political parties are not permitted, and the authorities do not tolerate other forms of organized political opposition. A 2014 law allows the revocation of citizenship for Omanis who join organizations deemed harmful to national interests.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 0 / 4

The sultan maintains a monopoly on political power. The structure of the constitutional system excludes the possibility of a change in government through elections.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 1 / 4

The nonpartisan nature of Oman's limited elections, the overwhelming dominance of the sultan in Omani society, and the authorities' suppression of dissent leave voters and candidates with little autonomy in their political choices.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 1 / 4

Noncitizens, who make up about 44 percent of the population, have no political rights or electoral opportunities. Citizenship is generally transmitted from Omani fathers. Foreign residents must live legally in the country for 20 years to qualify for citizenship, or 15 and 10 years for foreign husbands and wives of Omani citizens, respectively, if they have a son. These and other conditions make naturalizations relatively rare.

Omani women can legally vote and run for office, but they have few practical opportunities to organize independently and advance their interests in the political system. Two women were elected to the Consultative Council in 2019, up from one in 2015, and seven women won seats on municipal councils in 2016, up from four in 2012. Fifteen women serve on the appointed Council of State.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 2 / 12C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 0 / 4

Government policy is set by the sultan and an inner circle of advisers and senior ministers. The Council of State and the Consultative Council are advisory bodies with no lawmaking powers.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 2 / 4

Oman's legal code does not provide an effective framework for the prevention, exposure, and impartial prosecution of corruption. However, government officials are required to declare their assets and sources of wealth, and several high-profile corruption cases involving government officials and executives from Oman's oil industry have resulted in convictions and prison terms in recent years.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 0 / 4

The law does not provide freedom of information guarantees. Openness and transparency are limited in practice by the concentration of power and authority in a small inner circle around the sultan. The State Audit Institution monitors ministerial spending, conflicts of interest, and state-owned companies, but its findings are not released to the public, and it does not cover the sultan's court or the military.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 18 / 60 (+1)

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 5 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 1 / 4

Freedom of expression is limited, and criticism of the sultan is prohibited. There are private media outlets in addition to those run by the state, but they typically accept government subsidies, practice self-censorship, and face punishment if they cross political redlines. Media outlets were reportedly told to avoid reporting on demonstrations held in several cities in May 2021.

The government has broad authority to close outlets, block websites, revoke licenses, and prosecute journalists for content violations, and it has used this authority on multiple occasions in recent years. In March 2021, the Omani telecommunications regulator blocked access to social media application Clubhouse for want of a "proper license."

The government's efforts to suppress critical news and commentary extend to individuals active online and on social media. In February 2021, poet Salem Ali al-Maashani and Amer Muslim Bait Saeed were detained for criticizing planned construction in the Dhofar Plain. In March, the Court of First Instance in Salalah issued a six-month prison term and a fine against environmental activist Ahmed Issa Qatan for violating the Cyber Crime Law; Qatan had also campaigned against Muscat's plans for the Dhofar Plain.

In July, security forces detained activist Ghaith al-Shibli after he used Twitter to engage in dialogue on a variety of subjects under the hashtag #ghaith_spaces. In August, activist Khamis al-Hatali was arrested a day after disseminating a speech criticizing Sultan Haitham on Twitter.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 2 / 4

Islam is the state religion. Non-Muslims have the right to worship, but they are banned from proselytizing. Religious organizations must register with the government. The Ministry of Awqaf (religious charitable bequests) and Religious Affairs distributes standardized texts for mosque sermons, and imams are expected to stay within the content outlines of these texts.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 1 / 4

The government restricts academic freedom by preventing the publication of material on politically sensitive topics and placing controls on contacts between Omani universities and foreign institutions.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 1 / 4

The authorities reportedly monitor personal communications, and the growing number of arrests, interrogations, and jail terms related to criticism of the government on social media has encouraged self-censorship among ordinary citizens in recent years. The 2018 penal code increased the maximum penalties for slander of the sultan and blasphemy to 7 and 10 years in prison, respectively, from three years for both under the old code. In March 2021, an appeals court upheld a prison term against medical worker Muslim al-Badi, who had been accused of insulting Sultan Qaboos. Al-Badi began serving his sentence in April.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 4 / 12 (+1)

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 1 / 4 (+1)

A limited right to peaceful assembly is provided for in Oman's basic law. However, all public gatherings require official permission, and the government has the authority to prevent organized public meetings without any appeals process. The 2018 penal code prescribes prison terms and fines for individuals who initiate or participate in a gathering of more than 10 people that threatens security or public order, or who fail to comply with an official order to disperse. Police are seen in antiriot gear while on patrol and when responding to protests.

While demonstrations are rare in practice, protests against unemployment and the imposition of a VAT were held in several cities in May 2021. Some arrests and brief detentions were reported; police used tear gas when clashing with protesters in Sohar. Sultan Haitham, meanwhile, pledged to improve the labor market and offer stipends for those unemployed due to the effects of the coronavirus pandemic. Overall, security forces mounted a largely mild response; by comparison, the authorities forcefully dispersed demonstrations during the 2011 protests and used lethal force in at least one incident during that period.

Score Change: The score improved from 0 to 1 because protesters with primarily economic grievances were able to hold demonstrations in several cities and because authorities mounted a relatively mild response, with most detainees quickly released.

Oman's basic law allows for the formation of nongovernmental organizations, but civic life remains limited in practice. The government has not permitted the establishment of independent human rights organizations and generally uses its registration and licensing process to block the formation of groups it sees as a threat to stability. Individual activists focusing on issues including labor rights and internet freedom risk arrest. The 2018 penal code includes vague clauses that allow prison terms for individuals who establish, operate, or finance an organization aimed at challenging the "political, economic, social, or security principles of the state" or promoting class conflict.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 2 / 4

Omani workers are legally able to organize unions, bargain collectively, and strike. However, there is only one authorized trade union federation, and neither government employees nor household workers are permitted to join unions. Strikes, which are banned in the oil and gas industry, are rare in practice, partly because disputes are often resolved through employer concessions or government mediation.

F. RULE OF LAW: 4 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 0 / 4

The judiciary is not independent and remains subordinate to the sultan, who is empowered to appoint and remove senior judges. The sultan also chairs the Supreme Judicial Council, which nominates judges and oversees the judicial system, though a 2012 reform replaced the justice minister with the head of the Supreme Court as the council's deputy chair.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 1 / 4

Arbitrary arrest is formally prohibited but suspects arrested in vaguely defined security cases can be held for up to 30 days before being charged, and security forces do not always adhere to other rules on arrest and pretrial detention. Ordinary detainees are generally provided with access to legal representation.

Defendants in politically sensitive cases may face harsher treatment from the justice system. For example, prior to his trial in 2017, Mansour bin Nasser al-Mahrazi, a writer and researcher who was eventually sentenced to three years in prison for offenses including "insulting the sultan," spent at least two months in incommunicado detention, and the judge refused to hear defense witnesses.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 2 / 4

Prisons are not accessible in practice to independent monitors, but former detainees have reported beatings and other abuse. In March 2021, Sultan Ambo Saeedi accused the Internal Security Service of torturing him over a 30-day detention period in 2017. Saeedi subsequently fled Oman.

The country is generally free from armed conflict, and violent street crime is relatively rare.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 1 / 4

The 2021 basic law banned discrimination on the basis of sex, religion, ethnicity, and social class, but noncitizens are not protected from discrimination in practice. Women face disparate treatment under personal status laws and de facto bias in employment and other matters. Under the Personal Status Law, a woman must have a male guardian—usually a father—to contract her into marriage. Men are recognized as the head of the household. Same-sex relations are punishable with up to three years in prison, and LGBT+ people face societal discrimination.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 5 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 1 / 4

Most Omani citizens enjoy freedom of movement, but travel bans are often imposed on political dissidents. Foreign workers cannot leave the country without permission from their employer and risk deportation if they change employers without documentation releasing them from their previous contract. During 2021, the government periodically restricted internal travel and imposed curfews to prevent the spread of COVID-19. These measures were implemented in line with a rise of reported coronavirus cases.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 2 / 4

While the legal framework protects property rights, state-owned companies and the ruling family are dominant forces in the economy, limiting the role and autonomy of small and other private businesses. Women generally receive less property than men under inheritance laws.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 1 / 4

Omani citizens require permission from the MoI to marry noncitizens from countries outside the Gulf Cooperation Council. Spouses or children of Omani women cannot gain citizenship. Omani law does not specifically address domestic violence and sexual harassment or criminalize spousal rape, while extramarital sex is criminalized. Women who report rape have at times been prosecuted for engaging in extramarital sex, if authorities do not believe they were assaulted. Women are at disadvantage under laws governing matters such as divorce and child custody. The 2018 penal code included a new provision that criminalized the wearing of women's clothing by men.

Oman's labor policies put migrant workers at a severe disadvantage and effectively encourage exploitation. Household workers, who are not covered by the labor law, are especially at risk of abuse by employers. The government has pursued an "Omanization" process to replace foreign workers with native Omanis. Among other tactics, temporary visa bans for foreign workers in various professions have been issued or extended since 2013. In January 2021, the Ministry of Labor announced plans to bar expatriates from certain private-sector occupations, which would only be open to Omani citizens.

Despite a 2008 antitrafficking law and some recent efforts to improve enforcement, authorities have not always proactively identified or protected human trafficking victims. The US State Department's Trafficking in Persons Report 2021 notes that authorities are identifying more trafficking survivors but open few legal cases and secure few convictions. Government policies limit shelter stays to victims with cases actively being investigated.

Pakistan

Population: 225,400,000

Capital: Islamabad

Freedom Status: Partly Free

Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: Pakistan holds regular elections under a competitive multiparty political system. However, the military exerts enormous influence over security and other policy issues, intimidates the media, and enjoys impunity for indiscriminate or extralegal use of force. The authorities impose selective restrictions on civil liberties, and Islamist militants carry out attacks on religious minorities and other perceived opponents.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- In the Senate elections held in March, the ruling Tehreek-e-Insaf (PTI) party won 18 out of 48 seats contested, leaving it with 26 seats in total and without a majority in the upper house. The Pakistan People's Party (PPP), with 20 seats, became the largest opposition party in the Senate.

- Authorities continued to disrupt the political activities of the Pashtun Tahafuz Movement (PTM), which campaigns against ethnic violence in ethnic Pashtun areas. In November police in Quetta charged PTM leader Manzoor Pashteen and others for holding a rally without permission. Further, an Anti-Terrorism Court indicted Ali Wazir and 10 other PTM members for sedition on the basis of their role in a December 2020 rally in Karachi.
- In December, President Alvi signed a law that ostensibly “protects” journalists but includes vague provisions prohibiting incitement and the publication of allegedly false information. The government also has plans to establish a powerful media regulator, the Pakistan Media Development Authority (PMDA), which would have tribunal powers to punish journalists for infringements.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 15 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 5 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 1 / 4

A prime minister responsible to the bicameral parliament holds most executive power under the constitution. The president, who plays a more symbolic role, is elected for up to two five-year terms by an electoral college comprising the two chambers of the parliament and the provincial assemblies. Arif Alvi, nominated by PTI, was elected president in September 2018.

Imran Khan became prime minister in August 2018 when PTI formed a coalition government, having emerged from the general elections as the largest party in the National Assembly. In the run-up to the polls, observers documented concerted efforts by elements of the country’s military and judicial establishment to hamper the Pakistan Muslim League (PML-N) to increase the chances that Khan would attain a parliamentary majority. These included corruption, contempt-of-court, and terrorism charges against PML-N leaders and candidates, and their politicized adjudication and military influence on the judiciary to deny bail until after the election. Observers also noted pressure on and interference with the media, apparently at the behest of the security services, that resulted in muted coverage of the PML-N’s campaign. In 2021, opposition parties continued to challenge Imran Khan’s legitimacy as prime minister, claiming he had been “selected” by the army.

The parliament consists of a 342-member National Assembly and a 104-member Senate. Members of the National Assembly are elected for five years. Of the 342 lower-house seats, 272 are filled through direct elections in single-member districts, 60 are reserved for women, and 10 are reserved for non-Muslim minorities. The reserved seats are filled through a proportional representation system with closed party lists.

For the Senate, each provincial assembly chooses 23 members. The 8 seats representing the Federally Administered Tribal Areas (FATA) chosen by assembly members are being phased out, as the FATA region is being integrated with Khyber Pakhtunkhwa province. The National Assembly chooses 4 senators to represent the Islamabad capital territory. Senators serve six-year terms, with half of the seats up for election every three years. In the March 2021 Senate elections using the electoral college formed from directly elected members of the National and Provincial Assemblies, the ruling PTI won 18 out of 48 seats contested, leaving it with 26 seats in total and without a majority. The Pakistan People’s Party (PPP), with 20 seats, became the largest opposition party in the upper house.

International and domestic election observers delivered a mixed verdict on the July 2018 National Assembly elections. Polling was orderly and generally took place according to the electoral law, though serious technical difficulties with the Result Transmission System created significant delays in reporting the results. At the same time, the rash of judicial actions against PML-N leaders and restrictions on and interference with media coverage significantly disadvantaged the party, contributing to a substantial rise in PTI representation in the National Assembly.

The PTI received 32 percent of the vote and 149 seats, compared with just 35 seats previously, and formed a coalition government with the support of the Muttahida Qaumi Movement (MQM), other minor parties, and independents. The PML-N received 24 percent of the vote and 82 seats, down from 157 seats. The PPP received 13 percent of the vote and 54 seats, an increase of 12 seats. Notably, parties and candidates linked to active Islamist militant groups, including Tehreek-e-Labaik Pakistan (TLP) and Allah-o-akbar Tehreek (AAT), were able to participate. Voter turnout was 52 percent.

In the December 2021 local elections in Khyber Pakhtunkhwa, the Jamiat Ulema-e-Islam-Fazl (JUI-F), part of the Pakistan Democratic Movement (PDM) alliance, won control of the largest number of tehsil councils and the mayoralty of the provincial capital, Peshawar.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 2 / 4

Elections are administered by the Election Commission of Pakistan (ECP), whose members are current or retired senior judges nominated through a consultative process that includes the government and the parliamentary opposition. The ECP asserted its independence during the Senate election in March 2021 by insisting on use of the constitutionally mandated secret ballot. The prime minister and governing party severely criticized the ECP after their defeat in one of the electoral college votes. The ECP also continued to investigate accusations that the PTI received illegal foreign contributions to past election campaigns.

Electoral laws are considered largely fair, and candidates have extensive access to the courts in electoral disputes. However, in November 2021, the PTI government amended the 2017 Elections Law to mandate the use of electronic voting machines (EVMs). Opposition parties have opposed reliance on EVMs over fears of their vulnerability to poll-rigging.

Election observer missions in 2018 claimed that the ECP proved unable to counteract efforts by elements of the judicial and military establishment and their allies to manipulate the campaign environment. According to the Human Rights Commission of Pakistan, politically orchestrated judicial activism resulted in the disqualification of candidates, while the “censorship, intimidation, harassment, and abduction” of journalists who were critical of the security establishment or favored the PML-N or PPP ensured uneven access to the media.

Other, ongoing problems include lower rates of voter registration among women, a requirement that members of the Ahmadi religious minority register as non-Muslims despite considering themselves Muslims, and vague moral requirements for candidate nomination.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 6 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 2 / 4

Several major parties and numerous smaller parties and independents compete in elections and are represented in the parliament and provincial legislatures. However, established parties maintain patronage networks and other advantages of incumbency that hamper competition in their respective provincial strongholds. In recent years, major parties' freedom to operate is related to the strength of their relationships with unelected arms of the state, which have sought to sideline figures not to their liking through a variety of legal and extralegal means.

Additionally, Pakistani opposition parties maintained alliances and coordinated anti-government protests in 2021. The PDM held a series of protest rallies early in the year, calling for the PTI government to resign. Though the PPP left the alliance after the March elections, the PDM continued to hold rallies calling for the government to step down or for the military to withdraw its support. In December, the PDM announced plans to demonstrate against the government's failure to control inflation.

Opposition parties campaign and contest elections, and each of the last three national elections has resulted in an erstwhile opposition party taking power at the federal level. National opposition parties hold power or significant shares of assembly seats at the provincial level. However, the military is currently considered more powerful than elected politicians and able to influence the outcome of elections.

The PPP and PML-N have faced significant impediments to their competitiveness since the 2018 elections, as party leaders and senior figures faced a succession of charges from the National Accountability Bureau (NAB), the government's anticorruption body. Nawaz Sharif, his daughter Maryam Nawaz, his younger brother and former Punjab chief minister Shahbaz Sharif, Shahbaz Sharif's son Hamza, and former prime ministers Shahid Khaqan Abbasi and Raja Parvaiz Ashraf, all political figures within PML-N, and former president Asif Ali Zardari and his sister Faryal Talpur, both PPP politicians, have faced multiple court appearances, periodic detentions, and a ban from public office (Nawaz Sharif).

However, in 2021, Shahbaz Sharif and Asif Zardari were released on bail, and younger leaders Bilawal Bhutto-Zardari and Maryam Nawaz rose to prominence as political players in their parties. PML-N leader Nawaz Sharif stayed in self-imposed exile in London but was politically active.

Authorities continued to disrupt the activities of the PTM. The army reportedly suspects PTM leaders of opposing the Pakistani state and having links to the Indian intelligence agency, which PTM supporters deny. In the past, security forces have dispersed rallies, arrested participants and activists, suppressed media coverage, and charged rally participants with sedition. In November 2021, police in Quetta charged PTM leader Manzoor Pashteen and others for holding a rally without permission. Further, an Anti-Terrorism Court indicted Ali Wazir and 10 other PTM supporters for sedition, on the basis of their role in a December 2020 rally in Karachi.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 1 / 4

The manipulation of politics by religious extremists has long hampered voters' ability to freely express their political preferences. During 2021, the Sunni Barelvi militant party TLP continued to press for the release of its leader and activists as well as the expulsion of the French ambassador, after French President Emmanuel Macron made what they saw as disparaging remarks about Islam. The government initially banned the party in April 2021 but later capitulated to its demands in November 2021, when authorities reversed the party's ban, released its leader and activists. Thereafter, the TLP did not continue to demand the expulsion of the ambassador.

In recent years, the military has reasserted its role as a political arbiter—more powerful than either the judiciary or the elected government—setting the constraints within which civilian politics play out.

The heavy presence of security agents at many polling stations in 2018 was interpreted by observers, including the Human Rights Commission of Pakistan, as tantamount to voter intimidation. Several candidates in the 2018 election campaign had links with extremist groups that advocated or carried out acts of violence, further contributing to a sense of unease among many voters.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 1 / 4

A joint electorate system allows members of non-Muslim minorities to participate in the general vote while also being represented by reserved seats in the national and provincial assemblies through the party-list system. However, the participation of non-Muslims in the political system continues to be marginal. Political parties nominate members to the legislative seats reserved for non-Muslim minorities, leaving non-Muslim voters with little say in the selection of their supposed representatives. Ahmadis, members of a heterodox Muslim sect, face political discrimination and are registered on a separate voter roll.

Political parties maintain women's wings that are active during elections, but women face practical restrictions on voting, especially in Khyber Pakhtunkhwa and Baluchistan, where militant groups and societal constraints are stronger. Women rarely achieve leadership positions in parties or the government. The interests of LGBT+ people are generally not represented by elected officials.

The single member constituency system for national elections ensures that the major ethno-linguistic groups from each province are represented in the National Assembly and participate in party politics, government, and opposition. Although Sindhi, Pashtun, and Baloch figures all play visible roles in national political life—alongside the largest ethno-linguistic group, Punjabis—the military works to marginalize figures from minority groups it suspects of harboring antistate sentiments, as exemplified by its treatment of the PTM.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 4 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 1 / 4

Formally, the elected prime minister and cabinet make policy in consultation with the parliament, which holds legislative power. However, there has been a long-running struggle between these civilian structures and the military establishment for control of national security policy. The military has asserted primacy on relations with India, Afghanistan, China, and the United States, as well as on domestic counterterrorism policy. In the last two years of the previous PML-N government, it appeared that the civilian administration aspired to act independently of some military priorities, most notably through exploring détente with India. Since the August 2018 installation of the PTI government, the civilian administration has aligned itself more closely than its predecessor with the military's foreign policy, domestic security, and economic priorities. In October 2021, the army again appeared to usurp the authority of the prime minister by publishing that Lieutenant General Nadeem Anjum would take over as chief of the Inter-Services Intelligence (ISI) three weeks before Prime Minister Khan announced he had agreed to the appointment.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 1 / 4

Despite numerous formal safeguards, official corruption is endemic in practice. The use of accountability mechanisms is often selective and politically driven, as demonstrated by the charges which continued to be brought against PML-N and PPP leaders and former politicians, such as former prime minister Sharif and former president Zardari, in 2021. The NAB focuses on cases against politicians and senior officials, which tend to be protracted. The military and judiciary have their own disciplinary systems for corruption.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 2 / 4

The government has relatively progressive laws around public finances, procurement processes, and general government operations. Some effort is put into being seen as complying with international norms.

However, the military—which controls large parts of government functioning under the guise of national security concerns—is deeply opaque in its affairs. Military officials' ability to influence policies, politics, and legislation is formidable, and military intelligence agencies act without oversight and often without the public's knowing of their involvement. Intelligence agencies abduct, detain, interrogate, and torture individuals for extended periods without publicizing information of their whereabouts or the purpose for their detention. The military censors media and information published about its activity by means of vaguely worded regulations that empower officials to monitor and manage content deemed harmful to "national security interests." Since 2018, multiple high-ranking military officers have been appointed to government positions historically under civilian control.

Access-to-information laws have long been applied in Pakistan; the parliament passed the Right to Access of Information Act in 2017 to update a 2002 law. Information commissions have been established in the provinces supposedly to enable implementation, which is inconsistent. Determined citizens can demand information from departments and complain to the information commissions when departments fail to deliver. Many departments tend to ignore requests.

Vocal civil society groups and journalists often weigh in on policy debates. However, debates about policies with national security implications are shut down quickly. Members of both provincial and national assemblies are expected to make themselves accessible to constituents. Parliament regularly debates and scrutinizes the budget, accompanied by commentary from the media.

There is a procurement regulatory agency that uses many standard transparency tools, including procurement manuals and publication of tenders. However, international bodies such as the World Bank and the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD) have scrutinized Pakistan's public procurements. Parliamentarians and select public officials are compelled to submit asset declaration forms that civil society organizations often upload to the internet.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 22 / 60D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 6 / 16*D1. Are there free and independent media? 1 / 4

Over the past two decades, Pakistan has boasted a relatively vibrant media sector that presents a range of news and opinions, with more than 40 television news channels and some 700 newspaper print publications. However, both the civilian authorities and military in recent years have curtailed media freedom. In 2021, the government targeted prominent media personalities, individual journalists, television programs and stations, and media houses for raising issues authorities considered unpalatable by fining them, temporarily banning them, or withdrawing government advertising. In 2021, military intelligence agencies targeted critical journalists with violent attacks and temporary abductions. In May, Islamabad-based journalist Asad Ali Toor was severely beaten by individuals who identified themselves as ISI agents. A number of critical media figures sought sanctuary in exile but reported facing threats there, too, in the wake of suspicious deaths of Pakistani civil society activists abroad. Authorities used “troll farms,” to harass critical commentators, such as BBC Urdu-language service journalist Asma Shirazi.

Access to certain regions of the country is prohibited by the military, impeding coverage of issues there. In Baluchistan, local journalists are caught between authorities who order them not to cover separatist rebel activity, and rebel groups that threaten them for siding with the government.

In December 2021, President Alvi signed a law that ostensibly “protects” journalists but includes vague provisions prohibiting incitement and the publication of allegedly false information. The government also has plans to establish a powerful media regulator, the Pakistan Media Development Authority (PMDA), to replace the differing regulations for print, broadcast, and online media. The authority would have tribunal powers to punish journalists for infringements.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 1 / 4

Constitutional guarantees of religious freedom have not provided effective safeguards against discriminatory legislation, social prejudice, and sectarian violence. Members of the Shia sect, Christians, and other religious minorities remain at risk of blasphemy accusations that can arise from trivial disputes and escalate to criminal prosecution and mob violence. Blasphemy laws and their exploitation by religious vigilantes have also curtailed freedom of expression by Muslims.

Hindus have complained of vulnerability to kidnapping and forced conversions, and some continue to migrate to India. Vandals attacked and damaged a temple in Rawalpindi in March 2021, and a mob damaged a temple in Rahim Yar Khan in August.

Members of the Ahmadi community are legally prohibited from calling themselves Muslims and face discrimination. One Ahmadi man was killed during 2021 in a suspected hate crime. A Lahore High Court justice called on authorities to restrict Ahmadi religious content on social media.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 2 / 4

Pakistani authorities have a long history of using the education system to portray Hindus and other non-Muslims negatively and to rationalize enmity between Pakistan and India, among other ideological aims. Past attempts to modernize education and introduce religious tolerance into school textbooks have made little progress, and minority groups consider negative portrayals of non-Muslims in textbooks as a continuing source of hostility towards them. In August 2021, the government launched an integrated national curriculum at the primary school level, with a plan for a secondary school curriculum for subsequent years. Supporters claimed that it promoted tolerance within an Islamic and national framework. However, the initiative was also criticized for encroaching on provincial autonomy.

In recent years, scholars have been somewhat more able to discuss sensitive issues involving the military. However, there is no academic freedom on matters pertaining to religion, where academics remain vulnerable to blasphemy accusations.

Pakistanis are free in practice to discuss many topics both online and off, but the 2016 Prevention of Electronic Crimes Act (PECA) gives the executive-controlled Pakistan Telecommunication Authority (PTA) unchecked powers to censor material on the internet. The PTA encourages reporting of websites complainants consider offensive. The broad and poorly defined censorship mandate of the PTA includes preventing both morally objectionable content and the maligning of the “state, judiciary, or armed forces.” In practice, the agency censors content arbitrarily.

The constitutionality of 2020 social media rules, which enabled the banning of social media platforms, was challenged in the Islamabad High Court in November 2021. These rules obliged companies to enforce the government’s restrictions on objectionable content and required them to maintain a physical presence in the country, with threats of fines and service interruption for noncompliance. The PTA had banned TikTok for four months beginning in March, allegedly for blasphemous and irreverent content. TikTok reported that it had removed some six million objectionable videos in the first quarter of the year.

Extralegal violence, including mob attacks on individuals accused of blasphemy also deter unfettered speech.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 6 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 3 / 4

The constitution guarantees the right to assemble peacefully, though the government can harness legal provisions to arbitrarily ban gatherings or any activity designated a threat to public order. During 2021, the scale and frequency of political rallies returned to levels seen before the COVID-19 pandemic. The governing party and a range of opposition parties held multiple rallies, generally without interference from the authorities.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 1 / 4

The current government continued to crack down on nongovernmental organizations (NGOs), both domestic and foreign. Organizations are subject to intrusive registration requirements and vetting by military intelligence. Officials can demand that NGOs obtain a “no-objection certificate” (NOC) before undertaking even the most innocuous activity.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 2 / 4

The rights of workers to organize and form trade unions are recognized in law, and the constitution grants unions the rights to collective bargaining and to strike. However, these protections are not strongly enforced. Roughly 70 percent of the workforce is employed in the informal sector, where unionization and legal protections are minimal. The procedures that need to be followed for a strike to be legal are onerous. Strikes and labor protests are organized regularly, though they often lead to clashes with police and dismissals by employers.

F. RULE OF LAW: 4 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 1 / 4

The judiciary is politicized and has a history of involvement in the power struggles between the military, the civilian government, and opposition politicians. Judges have often aligned rulings with the priorities of the military. During 2021, corruption cases against Nawaz Sharif and other senior PML-N and PPP opposition politicians continued. The paucity of equivalent cases against PTI figures suggest that the judiciary has allowed itself to be instrumentalized in national politics. Leaked audio recordings and testimony from a former Gilgit-Baltistan chief judge purportedly proved that former chief justice Saqib Nisar acknowledged he had been influenced by the army to convict and deny bail to Nawaz and Mariam Sharif in the run-up to the 2018 election, though Nisar publicly denied this.

In 2021, Supreme Court Justice Qazi Faez Isa continued to fight legal action over allegations of undeclared family property in the United Kingdom, which he argued was an attempt to punish him for exercising independence.

The broader court system is marred by endemic problems including corruption, intimidation, insecurity, a large backlog of cases, and low conviction rates for serious crimes.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 1 / 4

Police have long been accused of biased or arbitrary handling of initial criminal complaints. Both the police and the prosecution service have been criticized for a chronic failure to prosecute terrorism cases and for their reliance on torture. In July 2021, the Senate passed legislation to ban torture.

Under the Army Act, the military continued to operate its own courts, primarily for its own personnel. However, the army asserted the right to selectively try civilians, on camera, under the Army Act courts, in cases of national security.

There has been progress in women's access to justice and generalized protection of their rights for all litigants in the former FATA, which in 2018 was absorbed into Khyber Pakhtunkhwa. Informal jirgas remain a form of local dispute resolution alongside the formal justice system.

In 2021, 663 people were killed in terrorist incidents, continuing an upward trend since 2019, though violence remained lower than the 2009 peak of 11,317 people killed. The worst attacks in 2021 were the killing of 11 Shia coalminers in Baluchistan in January and a suicide bombing in July that killed 13 workers on a dam project, including 9 Chinese engineers.

Most terrorist violence has historically been connected to three distinct conflicts. A low-intensity insurgency in Baluchistan pitted the Baloch Liberation Army and other Baloch separatist outfits against security forces. In Khyber Pakhtunkhwa, including the former tribal areas, the Pakistan Taliban Movement (TTP) conducted cross-border attacks from Afghanistan against security forces. Aided by elements in the Afghan Taliban government, Pakistan officials in November 2021 negotiated a one-month ceasefire with the TTP. However, in December the TTP refused to extend the ceasefire, claiming the government had reneged on a promised release of prisoners. The local branch of the Islamic State (IS), Islamic State Khorasan Province (ISKP), has also claimed responsibility for attacks on Shias.

Civilians face the threat of extralegal violence by state actors, including enforced disappearances. The Voice for Baloch Missing Persons, an advocacy NGO for those who have disappeared, accused the state of operating "death squads" to abduct and kill suspected separatist sympathizers. The number of cases of people registered as missing since 2011 by the official Commission of Inquiry on Enforced Disappearances rose to 8,279 as of the end of November 2021, of which 6,047 cases had reportedly been resolved. The International Commission of Jurists, an international human rights organization, found the Commission of Inquiry's approach had enabled impunity by diverting attention away from the judicial process into an ad hoc process vulnerable to political interference. Most victims are from Khyber Pakhtunkhwa, the former FATA, or Baluchistan, and typically are held incommunicado by security and intelligence agencies on suspicion of antistate agitation, terrorism, rebellion, or espionage.

In 2021, the Commission of Inquiry did not push for disciplinary action against agencies known to be involved in enforced disappearances; in December 2021, reports emerged that a secret military court sentenced human rights defender Idris Khattak, who had been abducted by the army in 2019, to 14 years imprisonment. The Commission of Inquiry claimed the case had been “disposed of,” and did not consider Khattak to be a victim of an abduction. In November 2021, the National Assembly passed weak legislation to criminalize enforced disappearances, though controversial provisions allow individuals to be prosecuted for bringing supposedly false complaints.

Women face discrimination in employment despite legal protections and are placed at a disadvantage under personal status laws. Perpetrators of gender-based violence (GBV) and sexual harassment or discrimination, which are societal challenges, often enjoy impunity. Individuals must register a “first information report” of a crime, and police are often reluctant to pursue complaints of crimes against women, including so-called crimes of honor. Videos of an incident in August 2021, in which a crowd of about 400 men abused a woman in a Lahore park, prompted acknowledgement that violence and degrading behavior by men were common. Prime Minister Khan was accused of perpetuating attitudes that drive endemic violence against women when he publicly opined in a June 2021 interview that women encouraged abuse by dressing inappropriately.

Ethnic and religious minorities, Afghan refugees, and LGBT+ people suffer legal or de facto discrimination and violence. The penal code prescribes prison terms for consensual sex “against the order of nature,” deterring LGBT+ people from acknowledging their identity or reporting abuses. Transgender and intersex people are authorized to register for official documents under a “third gender” classification recognized by the Supreme Court since 2009, and some transgender people were recognized in the 2017 census. However, they face targeted violence and discrimination in housing and employment. Access to identity papers has become increasingly important to avail of rights and services.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 6 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 2 / 4

There are some legal limitations on travel and the ability to change one’s residence, employment, or institutions of higher learning. Authorities routinely hinder internal movement in some parts of the country for security reasons. The main tool for restricting foreign travel is the Exit Control List (ECL), which blocks named individuals from using official exit points from the country. Though intended to prevent those posing a security threat and those facing court proceedings from fleeing, authorities periodically used it to control dissent.

In principle, Pakistan’s constitution, legal system, and social and religious values all guarantee private property and free enterprise. In reality, organized crime, corruption, a weak regulatory environment, and the subversion of the legal system often render property rights precarious. Powerful and organized groups continue to engage in land grabbing, particularly in Karachi and Punjab.

Inheritance laws discriminate against women, and women are often denied their legal share of inherited property through social or familial pressure.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 1 / 4

In some parts of urban Pakistan, men and women enjoy personal social freedoms and have recourse to the law in case of infringements. However, historically prominent social practices in much of the country subject individuals to social control over personal behavior, and especially choice of marriage partner. Despite successive attempts to abolish the practice, “honor killing,” the murder of men or women accused of breaking social and especially sexual taboos, remains common, and most incidents go unreported.

Though the legal age of marriage is 18 in most of the country, nearly 20 percent of girls are married before that age; 35 percent of child marriages take place in the former FATA. Nearly one-third of women in the country have experienced gender-based physical violence, according to the UN Population Fund. Abortion is illegal, except to save the pregnant person’s life.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 1 / 4

Bonded labor was formally abolished in 1992, and efforts to enforce the ban and related laws against child labor continue. For example, in November 2021, a court cancelled the bonds of 43 Hindus who worked for a Khuzdar landlord as agricultural workers. Gradual social change has also eroded the power of wealthy landowning families involved in such exploitation. Nevertheless, extreme forms of labor exploitation remain common. Employers continue to use chronic indebtedness to restrict laborers’ rights and hold actual earnings well below prescribed levels, particularly among sharecroppers and in the brick-kiln industry. Marginalized groups, such as itinerant workers, continue to face difficulties in obtaining a National Identity Card.

Palau

Population: 20,000

Capital: Ngerulmud

Freedom Status: Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Palau’s presidential republic is maintained through regular democratic elections. The judiciary and the media are independent, and civil liberties are generally upheld. The government has sought to combat official corruption in recent years. Many in the country’s large population of foreign workers remain vulnerable to exploitation.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- In December 2021, the government passed the Digital Residency Identification bill, after initially being defeated by the Senate. The law will offer virtual residency to non-Palauan citizens and the ability to have valid government identification, but it does not provide a pathway to citizenship.
 - In February, President Whipples announced Palau intended to leave the Pacific Island Forum (PIF), a regional body consisting mainly of island nations throughout the pacific. Members of the PIF had been divided over the forum's future leadership, which eventually was given to a Marshall Islands' diplomat. Whipps and others claimed the leadership should have been passed to a candidate from Micronesia.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 37 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 12 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The president, who serves as both head of state and head of government, is directly elected for up to two consecutive four-year terms using a two-round system, with a runoff if no candidate wins an absolute first-round majority. Surangel Whipps Jr., brother-in-law of term-limited incumbent Tommy Remengesau Jr., was elected in two rounds in November 2020, defeating outgoing vice president Raynold Oilouch. Whipps was sworn in as president in January 2021.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The bicameral National Congress consists of a 13-member Senate and a 16-member House of Delegates. All members of the National Congress are elected for four-year terms. Congressional elections were held in November 2020, concurrently with the presidential contest. Most House of Delegates incumbents won new terms, while seven senators were reelected.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 4 / 4

Electoral administration is widely considered to be fair and impartial. A review of the Senate's size and electoral system is undertaken every eight years by a Reapportionment Commission. During the 2016 review, the commission recommended the Senate maintain its current seat count. While the Supreme Court ruled that the body should only contain 11 seats in response to a petition, the court restored the original 13-seat count later that year.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 15 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 4 / 4

There are no laws restricting the formation of political parties, but in practice all candidates run and compete freely as independents. Politicians tend to organize in loose political alliances, often based on clan or family relationships.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 4 / 4

Although there are no political parties, lawmakers do organize into informal progovernment and opposition camps, and no single political force has control of the legislature. Power is transferred democratically between rival politicians.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 4 / 4

Palau receives financial assistance from the United States under a Compact of Free Association (CoFA), but the US government does not exert improper influence over the country's internal politics. While the political views of traditional chiefs are respected, they do not have authoritative control over the choices of voters.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 3 / 4

Women generally have equal political rights in law and in practice. Some state-level legislative seats are reserved for male chiefs, who in turn are customarily chosen by councils of women elders. After the November 2020 polls, only one woman held a seat in each house of the National Congress.

About a third of the population consists of foreign nationals who do not have political rights in Palau. Citizenship must be inherited from at least one parent, as there are no provisions for naturalization.

In 2019, former president John Toribiong (2009–13) launched a petition seeking to end the acceptance of absentee ballots, asserting that the petition would combat the political influence wielded by the increasing number of citizens living outside the country. In December 2021, the government passed the Digital Residency Identification bill, after initially being defeated by the Senate. The law will offer virtual residency to non-Palauan citizens and the ability to have valid government identification, but it does not provide a pathway to citizenship.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 10 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 4 / 4

Palau's democratically elected government determines and implements policy without undue interference. Traditional chiefs formally play an advisory role regarding customary matters through the national Council of Chiefs. While they also exercise informal influence over government policy, this is widely seen as a positive check on potential mismanagement or abuse of power by elected officials.

The CoFA, in effect since Palau became independent in 1994, ensures self-government but also provides for close military and economic relations with the United States, including responsibility for Palau's defense. A scheduled 15-year review of the compact resulted in a 2010 bilateral agreement on development aid and other benefits to last until the next review in 2024. In late 2017, former US president Donald Trump signed a defense bill that included implementing provisions for the compact review agreement. Meetings over the CoFA's extension began in 2019 and continued in 2020. In August 2020, then-US defense secretary Mark Esper became the first of his office to visit Palau. Then-president Remengesau invited the United States to establish a military facility in the country during that visit.

Palau maintains diplomatic recognition of Taiwan, amidst several other Pacific nations shifting their recognition to China. President Whipps used his inaugural address in January 2021 to reiterate his desire to support Taiwan and push back against Chinese government influence.

In February 2021, President Whipps announced Palau intended to leave the PIF. Members of the PIF had been divided over the forum's future leadership, which eventually was given to a Marshall Islands' diplomat. Whipps and others claimed the leadership should have been passed to a candidate from Micronesia.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 3 / 4

High-ranking public officials have faced corruption charges in recent years, and several have been convicted. The government and lawmakers have deliberated on strategies to deal with corruption more effectively. The Office of the Ombudsman currently operates as part of the president's office under an executive order.

In 2018, the European Union (EU) said that Palau authorities pledged to implement certain reforms and removed the country from its list of tax havens. Palau was returned to the EU's tax-haven list in February 2020, with the bloc saying Palau had not fulfilled its pledge. It remained on the list in 2021.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 3 / 4

A 2014 Open Government Act provides for public access to official documents and hearings, and government officials are obliged to submit annual financial disclosures that are available to the public. However, authorities have sometimes resisted disclosing requested information, particularly at the subnational level.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 55 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 16 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 4 / 4

Freedom of the press is respected. There are several independent news outlets, including newspapers and broadcasters, but they often struggle financially. Regional and international news services are also available. Internet access has been hampered by high costs and lack of connectivity outside the main islands.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 4 / 4

Constitutional guarantees of religious freedom are upheld in practice. Although religious organizations are required to register as nonprofit organizations, the process is not onerous or restrictive. Foreign missionaries are also required to obtain a permit.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

There have been no reports of restrictions on academic freedom.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 4 / 4

There are no constraints on political discussion, and the government does not monitor personal communications.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 11 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

Freedom of assembly is protected by the constitution and respected in practice.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 4 / 4

Nongovernmental organizations operate freely, with various groups focusing on issues such as environmental conservation, youth development, public health, and women's rights.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 3 / 4

Workers can freely organize unions and bargain collectively, but there are no laws specifically regulating trade unions or strikes or prohibiting antiunion discrimination. Union membership and activity are low in practice, as the private sector consists mostly of small, family-run businesses.

F. RULE OF LAW: 15 / 16F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 4 / 4

The judiciary has a reputation for independence and integrity. The president appoints judges to lifelong terms based on recommendations from an independent Judicial Nominating Commission, which is made up of three presidential appointees, three jurists named by their peers, and the chief justice.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 4 / 4

The authorities generally uphold legal safeguards against arbitrary arrest and detention, and trial proceedings ensure due process.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 4 / 4

Law enforcement agencies maintain internal order, and instances of abuse or impunity are rare, though overcrowding in the country's limited detention facilities remains a problem. In 2019, the vehicle of Narcotics Enforcement Agency chief Ismael Aguon was set ablaze. Aguon believed the action could be interpreted as retaliation for a series of upcoming drug trials.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 3 / 4

The legal system prohibits discrimination based on gender, race, place of origin, and other categories. Sexual orientation and gender identity are not protected categories, but Palau repealed legal provisions that criminalized consensual same-sex sexual activity in 2014. Then president Remengesau publicly called the country's same-sex marriage ban discriminatory in 2019, though the ban remained in place in 2021. Women generally enjoy equal treatment in practice.

Foreign nationals sometimes face discrimination regarding employment, education, and other matters. Growing tourism from China in particular has created jobs but also raised the cost of living, and some locals regard the presence of Chinese businesses and residents with hostility. However, the number of Chinese tourists has fallen in recent years due to Chinese state policy.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 13 / 16G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

There are usually no significant restrictions on freedom of movement, including internal and international travel. However, Palau restricted inbound travel in response to the COVID-19 pandemic in March 2020 and imposed mandatory quarantine periods for travelers that April. Tourists were effectively unable to visit Palau due to pandemic-related measures. These measures were progressively lifted throughout 2021 as the number of individuals vaccinated against the virus increased.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 3 / 4

The legal framework generally supports property rights and private business activity, and the government has undertaken reforms to improve conditions in recent years, though some bureaucratic obstacles and corruption-related impediments persist.

Noncitizens cannot purchase land, which is inherited matrilineally among Palauans.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 3 / 4

Personal social freedoms are largely respected, and women have equal rights regarding marriage, child custody, and other personal status matters. Rape, including spousal rape, and domestic violence are criminal offenses, though instances of domestic abuse are often not reported to police.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 3 / 4

Residents generally have access to economic opportunity, and the law provides some protections against exploitative labor practices. However, enforcement of such safeguards is inadequate, and foreign workers remain vulnerable to sexual exploitation, forced labor, or otherwise abusive working conditions in sectors including domestic service and agriculture. The minimum wage law does not apply to foreign workers. Some officials have been accused of complicity in human trafficking.

The 2021 US State Department's Trafficking in Persons Report noted that the government made efforts to combat human trafficking during its reporting period, including by charging a government official with labor trafficking and conducting research into trafficking with an international organization. However, the report noted that the government lacked standard operating procedures for identifying trafficking victims, had not made a conviction during the reporting period, and did not investigate potential contract violations faced by foreign workers.

Panama

Population: 4,400,000

Capital: Panama City

Freedom Status: Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Panama's political institutions are democratic, with competitive elections and orderly rotations of power. Freedoms of expression and association are generally respected. However, corruption and impunity are serious challenges, affecting the justice system and the highest levels of government. Discrimination against racial minorities is common, and Indigenous groups have struggled to uphold their legal rights with respect to land and development projects.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- A number of controversial electoral code reforms—including amendments removing gender parity requirements for political parties and lowering the statute of limitations for election-related crimes—were approved by the National Assembly in October, sparking widespread criticism and large protests. Three lawsuits challenging the constitutionality of the reforms were brought before the Supreme Court of Justice (CSJ) in December, and had not been resolved by year's end.

- In May, the CSJ ruled that certain COVID-19-related lockdown measures that were imposed during 2020, including rules that allotted separate days for men and women to leave quarantine, had been unconstitutional. The gender-based quarantine protocol had a disproportionately negative effect on transgender people, who were repeatedly subjected to discriminatory or humiliating treatment by police officers.
- Over 126,600 migrants illegally entered the country via the Darién Gap, a dangerous stretch of jungle along the border between Panama and Colombia, during the year—more than in the previous 11 years combined. Many migrants who traveled through the Darién Gap were subjected to physical and sexual violence by criminal groups that control the area.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 35 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 12 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The president is elected by popular vote for a single five-year term, and cannot serve a second consecutive term. In May 2019, Laurentino Cortizo of the Democratic Revolutionary Party (PRD) was elected president with 33.3 percent of the vote, narrowly defeating Democratic Change (CD) party candidate Rómulo Roux, who won 31 percent of the vote. José Blandón of the then ruling Panameñista Party (PP) won 10.8 percent. However, Organization of American States (OAS) election monitors described the contest as orderly, and a peaceful transition took place that July.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

Members of the 71-seat unicameral legislature, the National Assembly, are elected for five-year terms. The 2019 elections were held simultaneously with the presidential race and local contests. The PRD won 35 seats, while the CD won 18, the PP won 8, and the United for Change alliance (MOLIRENA) won 5. Another 5 seats went to independents.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 4 / 4

The country's electoral framework is generally fair and impartially implemented. The Electoral Tribunal (TE) of Panama is responsible for presiding over a multistakeholder commission that reviews the electoral code after each election and submits reform proposals to the National Assembly.

In October 2021, the National Assembly approved a number of electoral code reforms, including reducing the statute of limitations for election-related crimes and removing articles requiring gender parity in party primaries. The reforms—some of which were introduced by legislators without consulting the TE—were widely condemned by civil society organizations, which said that the changes reduced electoral transparency and accountability. Three lawsuits challenging the constitutionality of the reforms, including one filed by the magistrates of the TE, were presented to the CSJ in December. The lawsuits were ongoing at year's end.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 15 / 16B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 4 / 4

Political parties are free to form and compete in Panama's multiparty system, and since the 2014 elections, candidates have also been able to register as independents. Two new political parties were legally recognized by the TE in September 2021.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 4 / 4

Elections are competitive in practice, and orderly transfers of power between rival parties have been the norm since the end of de facto military rule in 1989.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 4 / 4

Voters and candidates are generally free from undue interference by groups outside the political system, though the threat that improper donations by drug traffickers and other powerful interests could influence the political process remains a concern, especially given regulatory gaps in campaign financing.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 3 / 4

The law does not limit the political rights of any segment of the citizen population. Though women's advocacy organizations have campaigned to improve women's representation in elected office, it remains low, and electoral code reforms adopted in October 2021 removed previously required gender parity regulations. Only 22.5 percent of National Assembly seats went to women in the 2019 election. That election also saw the first woman from the Guna Indigenous group take her seat.

The constitution establishes five Indigenous territories—three at the provincial level and two at the municipal level—and these are duly represented in the system of constituencies for the National Assembly, but the interests of Indigenous people, who make up about 11 percent of the population, remain inadequately addressed by the political system as a whole.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 8 / 12C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 4 / 4

The elected government and legislature generally determine and implement laws and policies without interference, though evidence of official corruption has raised concerns about the possibility that unelected entities could unduly influence governance.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 2 / 4

Safeguards against official corruption are relatively weak and ineffective, due in part to irregular application of the laws and a lack of resources for the judicial system. The Special Anticorruption Prosecutor's Office was formed in 2017 to prosecute those accused of corruption, but has failed to secure convictions in many of these cases.

Investigations have revealed extensive corruption in several presidential administrations. Former president Ricardo Martinelli and multiple top officials were implicated in connection with the Odebrecht case, a corruption scandal centered on a Brazilian construction firm that had repercussions across much of Latin America. Martinelli was arrested in the United States in 2017 and extradited to Panama in 2018, but in August 2019 he was acquitted on charges including wiretapping and the improper use of state funds. In July 2020 prosecutors announced new embezzlement charges; his trial began in July 2021. Martinelli was acquitted in November after the court ruled that there was insufficient evidence to prosecute him.

Martinelli's two sons were also implicated in the Odebrecht scandal; they were arrested in the United States in 2018 after Panamanian prosecutors accused them of large-scale corruption during their father's term in office. In July 2020, the brothers were arrested in Guatemala, and in late 2021 were extradited to the United States, where they were charged with facilitating $28 million in bribes during the Martinelli administration.

The Cortizo administration's anticorruption and transparency efforts have slowed since 2019, when the National Assembly rejected the president's proposal of a constitutional reform package that would have allowed the attorney general to investigate Supreme Court judges and legislators suspected of wrongdoing. The National Assembly also repeatedly refused to discuss anticorruption legislation throughout 2020 and 2021.

Critics in civil society describe a pattern of unresolved corruption investigations resulting in impunity, a dynamic reinforced by scandals and turnover in the Prosecutor General's Office in recent years.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 2 / 4

The law provides mechanisms for public access to government information. A transparency law was introduced in 2002, and the Varela administration adopted an open data policy, instructing public institutions to make data accessible to the public in clear, open, and machine-readable formats. However, in 2020 the pandemic and associated state of emergency led to a marked decline in transparency and effective controls on public contracting and procurement processes, as well as unresponsiveness by public officials to public information requests and passivity by the agencies charged with ensuring transparency. In September 2021, the National Authority for Transparency and Access to Information (ANTAI) published a two-year plan that introduced reform initiatives intended to combat nontransparency within the government, including in public procurement processes.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 48 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 15 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 3 / 4

News consumers have access to a wide variety of private media outlets that present a range of views, but the constitutional guarantee of freedom of the press is not consistently upheld. Journalists sometimes face harassment and intimidation for their work. Libel is both a civil and a criminal offense, while defamation and insult have also been defined in the criminal code. Such cases are often filed against journalists and media outlets.

Independent, critical journalists and outlets reportedly face editorial pressure from the government, and some journalists have experienced harassment when covering stories and opinions unfavorable to the government. In September 2021, journalist Mauricio Valenzuela was charged with gender-based violence (GBV) for allegedly harassing sitting parliamentarian Zulay Rodríguez. Valenzuela, who had recently contributed to a series of investigative reports implicating Rodríguez in various crimes, denied the accusation; his employer, digital media outlet Foco Panama, accused the government of using the judicial system to target critical media outlets. Valenzuela had not been tried by year's end.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 4 / 4

The constitution recognizes Roman Catholicism as the majority religion and requires general “respect for Christian morality and public order,” but freedom of religion is otherwise guaranteed and broadly upheld in practice. Catholic religious instruction is offered but not mandatory in public schools.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

The government generally honors academic freedom, and the schools are free from political indoctrination.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 4 / 4

Private discussion is free and vibrant, and use of social media platforms for the expression of personal views, including views on political or social issues, is not restricted.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 11 / 12E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

Freedom of assembly is generally respected, and peaceful demonstrations are common, though protests that block roads and highways often result in arrests and altercations with police.

Several large protests took place in 2021, including in September and October, when thousands of people protested against controversial electoral reforms that include provisions that, among other things, disadvantage both independent and women candidates. In April, women’s rights activists staged protests against a CSJ decision to acquit sitting legislator Arquesio Arias on charges of sexual assault. A number of protesters were detained and charged with disturbing public order, prompting further protests against the detentions.

In January, the Ombudsman’s Office introduced the Citizen Accompaniment Plan (PAC), a program intended to protect the rights of citizens participating in civic action, including protests. The PAC was created in accordance with guidelines set forth by the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights (OHCHR) for managing assemblies, and allows for human rights officers to observe demonstrations and facilitate communication between citizens and the authorities.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 4 / 4

Nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) operate freely, but some activists—particularly those focused on environmental issues and Indigenous rights—have complained of harassment and intimidation, including through lawsuits by private companies.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 3 / 4

The law generally protects workers’ rights to unionize, bargain collectively, and engage in legal, peaceful strikes. However, enforcement of labor protections is inadequate, and labor-related protests frequently feature clashes with police. Public employees are allowed to form associations to engage in collective bargaining and strike activities, but their rights have historically been weaker when compared to those of unions.

F. RULE OF LAW: 10 / 16F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 2 / 4

The country's judicial system is plagued by corruption and inefficiency. Public disagreements between the Prosecutor General's Office and judges over rulings that impeded major corruption cases in recent years have raised doubts about whether such cases would be heard impartially.

The implementation of a "judicial career law," which includes provisions establishing performance regulations and mandating that both sitting judges and those wishing to become members of the judiciary undergo robust evaluation processes, remained stalled in 2021 due to financial constraints and a lack of qualified officials available to oversee the process.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 2 / 4

Due process is constitutionally guaranteed but inconsistently upheld in practice. The justice system features extensive use of lengthy pretrial detention. According to official statistics, as of December 2021, pretrial detainees represented 37 percent of the country's prison population.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 3 / 4

The country is free from major threats to physical security such as war and insurgencies. However, police have been accused of beatings and other forms of excessive force, including while dispersing protests. The prison system is marked by overcrowding, poor health conditions, a lack of security, and widespread contraband smuggling.

The illegal drug trade and related criminal violence remain problems. Panama's homicide rate has steadily risen in recent years, including an increase of 11 percent between 2020 and 2021, though it remains below that of most countries in the region.

Discrimination based on gender, race, and other such categories is prohibited by law, but sexual orientation and gender identity are not covered, and racial minorities—including Indigenous people, Panamanians of African descent, and certain immigrant groups—face some discrimination in practice. Indigenous communities enjoy a significant degree of autonomy and self-government, but many Indigenous people live in poverty and lack equal access to basic services. An influx of migrants and asylum seekers from Venezuela, Cuba, and other troubled countries in the region has stoked anti-immigrant sentiment in recent years.

The number of migrants illegally crossing the 60-mile-wide Darién Gap, a dangerous stretch of jungle along the border between Panama and Colombia, reached a record high in 2021. Official statistics show that over 126,600 migrants entered Panama via the Darién Gap during the year—more than in the previous 11 years combined. Both local and international human rights groups have called on the government to do more to protect migrants, who are frequently subjected to physical and sexual violence from criminal groups that control the Darién Gap.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 12 / 16G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

The government generally respects freedom of foreign travel and internal movement, including the freedom to change one's place of residence, employment, or education. These freedoms were temporarily and intermittently curtailed in 2020 as part of efforts to limit the extent of the COVID-19 pandemic. In May 2021, the CSJ ruled that certain movement restrictions implemented during 2020, including those that had allotted separate days for men and women to leave quarantine, had been unconstitutional.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 3 / 4

Individuals can own private property and establish businesses freely under the law, but there are some practical impediments to defending property rights and operating businesses, including corruption and interference from organized crime.

Although Indigenous groups have substantial land rights under the law, implementation has been problematic. Such groups have long protested the encroachment of illegal settlers on their lands, government delays in the formal demarcation of collective land, and large-scale development projects that proceed despite dissent within indigenous communities.

Personal social freedoms are largely unrestricted. However, domestic violence is a concern; according to the Attorney General's Office, more than 17,000 domestic violence cases were registered in 2021, an increase of roughly 15 percent compared to those registered in 2020. Abortion is permitted in cases of rape or incest or to preserve the life or health of the woman, though there are significant procedural obstacles as well as potential penalties for abortions that do not meet the legal standard.

In September 2021, the CSJ rejected a case challenging the constitutionality of a 2019 TE refusal to register a same-sex marriage that had been legally performed in Colombia. Following the CSJ's verdict, the couple involved announced plans to bring their case before the Inter-American Court of Human Rights (IACHR).

During the COVID-19 lockdown, the government instituted a quarantine protocol allowing women and men were to leave home on alternate days. Human rights groups decried the measure's impact on transgender Panamanians, who were repeatedly subjected to discriminatory or humiliating treatment by police officers. In May 2021, the CSJ ruled that the gender-based quarantine protocol had been unconstitutional.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 2 / 4

Human trafficking for sexual exploitation and forced labor remains a serious problem despite some government efforts to combat it. Both Panamanian and migrant workers in certain sectors—including the agricultural sector, where many workers are Indigenous people—are subject to exploitative working conditions. Enforcement of basic labor protections is weak in rural areas and among informal workers.

Papua New Guinea

Population: 9,100,000

Capital: Port Moresby

Freedom Status: Partly Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Papua New Guinea (PNG) is a democracy in which elections are held regularly, but the polls have often been marred by irregularities and violence. Party allegiances are unstable, and only two governments have survived for a full term since independence in 1975. Since the turn of the century, a boom in mineral resources extraction has helped successive incumbent governments to consolidate control. The judiciary retains significant independence, and the media are mostly free to criticize the government. Corruption remains a serious problem.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- In July, the Supreme Court quashed stays on the execution of prisoners facing the death penalty, raising the possibility that executions would be carried out for the first time in decades. In September, however, the government formed a Power of Mercy Committee to hear commutation requests.
- In October, former prime minister Peter O'Neill was acquitted of the charge of abuse of power; the case stemmed from an investigation into irregularities or corruption surrounding the 2013 purchase of generators from Israel.
- Also in October, the Australian government decided to end an agreement under which PNG had accepted asylum seekers aiming to reach Australia. The PNG government agreed to offer measures including citizenship and family reunification for any remaining asylum seekers who wished to reside in the country.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 23 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 7 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 3 / 4

The governor general represents the British monarch as head of state and formally appoints the prime minister, who is the head of government, following an election process in Parliament. A law provides that the largest political party emerging from general elections has the first right to nominate a prime minister. Peter O'Neill of the People's National Congress (PNC) received a second term as prime minister after the 2017 elections. He resigned in May 2019 after internal party upheaval. Parliament selected former finance minister James Marape to replace O'Neill; a legal challenge against Marape's succession to the post was rejected by the Supreme Court in November 2020.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 2 / 4

Members of the unicameral, 111-member National Parliament are directly elected for five-year terms. A limited preferential voting system requires voters to choose three preferred candidates on their ballots.

Serious flaws, including bribery and voter fraud, were reported in the 2017 elections. Some areas, notably the Highlands Region, experienced election-related violence that resulted in dozens of deaths, as well as severe property damage. Due to irregularities, election results in Southern Highlands Province were released several months late and sparked renewed violence in the town of Mendi once made public. While the electoral process was smoother in coastal areas, those regions were not completely free from irregularities and violence. Allegations of voter roll manipulation that favored the incumbent government were widespread, though most clear abuses were localized in the Highlands. Election observers expressed disappointment that recommendations to clean up voter rolls were disregarded.

Parliamentary seats were ultimately divided among numerous parties. The PNC won 25, the National Alliance Party won 15, independents won 12, and the Papua and Niugini Union Party (Pangu) won 10. Lawmakers defected to Pangu in subsequent years; by April 2021, the party claimed the loyalties of 34 members.

In April 2021, Don Polye, who lost his seat in the 2017 polls, returned to Parliament after a court-ordered recount found that he outpolled the PNC candidate.

A by-election was held in Moresby North West in June 2021 to determine a successor for former prime minister Mekere Morauta, who died while holding the seat in February. The contest was marred by voter roll difficulties; registered voters discovered that other individuals had cast ballots using their names, while deceased individuals remained registered. A Pangu candidate won the seat.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 2 / 4

The electoral law, which requires voters to rank three candidates on a preferential ballot, is fair but complex to administer. The voter rolls are poorly maintained. Prime Minister Marape vowed that the 2021 census would be used to update the voter rolls. However, in July the National Statistical Office confirmed that the census would be deferred to 2024, blaming COVID-19.

At the local level, election management bodies are chronically lacking in independence, particularly in the Highlands. Irregularities do not necessarily benefit incumbents, more than half of whom usually lose their seats in elections.

Electoral officials have faced allegations of corruption in recent years. A trial against former electoral commissioner Patilias Gamato and election manager Terence Hetinu on charges related to their conduct during the 2017 elections began in September 2021. In November, Hetinu was convicted of corruption for receiving a bribe from a candidate. Gamato was acquitted.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 13 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 4 / 4

Political parties are able to form and operate freely, but many candidates run as independents and join factions only after reaching Parliament. Electoral loyalties are driven by local and personal factors at the constituency level. Lawmakers frequently switch affiliations and alliances. A law constraining freedom of movement between parties was ruled unconstitutional in 2010.

Prime Minister Marape has transformed Pangu, the country's oldest party, into his vehicle for reelection in 2022. A large number of lawmakers have defected from their former parties to join Pangu since 2019, making it the largest parliamentary group.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 4 / 4

The opposition has a reasonable chance of dislodging the government through elections, defections, or no-confidence votes. Since independence in 1975, only two governments have served a full five-year term: the Michael Somare-led government (2002–07) and the O'Neill-led government (2012–17). At the same time, the law granting the largest party the first opportunity to form a government creates an electoral advantage for sitting prime ministers, and no-confidence votes have been used by PNG politicians to seek incumbency ahead of elections. Incumbent governments have won all three elections since 2007.

The frequency of no-confidence votes has been diminished somewhat by a provision that grants an incoming prime minister an 18-month “grace period.” However, they remain regular occurrences. While Marape’s first grace period expired in November 2020, he was vulnerable for eight months before another 12-month grace period began ahead of the 2022 elections. An effort to dislodge him via a no-confidence vote collapsed in December 2020, and he avoided another vote in April 2021 when Parliament was adjourned, ostensibly due to COVID-19.

B3. Are the people’s political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 2 / 4

Most citizens and candidates are generally free to make political choices without undue interference. However, some local leaders, politicians, and candidate agents control the balloting process, particularly in the Highlands, and complete the ballot papers in bulk—a form of “assisted voting.” As a result, the affected citizens are effectively denied the right to vote.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 3 / 4

Although all citizens have equal political rights under the law, women are underrepresented in elected offices. The 2017 elections featured the highest number of women candidates ever, but none won legislative seats, and there are currently no women in the 111-seat Parliament. In April 2021, Attorney General Eric Kwa voiced his support for a proposal to reserve five seats for women. However, the government did not legislate to effect this change during the year.

LGBT+ people face societal discrimination that impedes their ability to advocate for their interests in the political sphere.

A 2001 peace agreement ended a civil war in Bougainville and provided for an independence referendum in the ethnically diverse autonomous region. Over 180,000 people participated in a nonbinding referendum in 2019, and 97.7 percent voted for independence. In a July 2021 statement, Marape and Bougainville president Ishmael Toroama agreed to finalize a political settlement “no earlier than 2025 and no later than 2027.” Marape has stated that the agreement would ultimately require the approval of Parliament.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 3 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 2 / 4

The prime minister heads the government, but cabinet ministers often exert considerable control over their portfolios without necessarily being answerable to the cabinet. Prime ministers frequently suspend Parliament during periods of vulnerability to no-confidence votes; speakers of Parliament wield significant power while the body is suspended, and suspensions can be lengthy.

There are no powerful external forces that determine the policies of government, though logging and mining companies have been known to obtain influence. The government has only a limited ability to implement its policies across the country, as the state’s presence in more remote areas is minimal.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 0 / 4

Corruption is pervasive and remains the most important hindrance to development. Anticorruption institutions have been subject to political interference. Task Force Sweep was established in 2011 to root out corruption, and it carried out a variety of investigations against politicians, civil servants, and businessmen. However, when the unit turned its attention to fraudulent payments made to Port Moresby law firm Paraka Lawyers and allegedly authorized by then prime minister O'Neill, he disbanded the task force; when courts ordered its resurrection, the government cut its funding.

O'Neill was arrested in May 2020 in connection with an investigation into procedural irregularities and possible corruption in the purchase of generators from Israel in 2013. He was acquitted of abuse of power in October 2021.

In November 2020, Parliament passed legislation to establish an Independent Commission against Corruption (ICAC). In February 2021, ICAC interim chairman Thomas Eluh warned that the body did not yet have the capacity or resources to address corruption cases. A National Fraud and Anti-Corruption Directorate exists within the police force but is also underresourced.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 1 / 4

Government operations are generally opaque, and the government does not frequently release reliable information about public expenditures, procurement processes, or officials' assets. PNG does not have an access to information law. When government figures are released, especially regarding public revenue and expenditure, they are often inaccurate and are sometimes manipulated.

In 2014, the PNG government used a A$1.2 billion (US$810.5 million) loan to purchase a share in the oil exploration firm Oil Search, which it later sold at a loss. Hearings into the deal began in 2019. In June 2021, a commission of inquiry heard that the loan, which was provided by Swiss bank UBS, was made despite warnings from within the cabinet. The commission additionally heard that the deal was only submitted to Parliament after it was put in place. The inquiry was ongoing as 2021 ended.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 39 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 14 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 3 / 4

Freedom of the press is generally respected. Local media provide independent coverage of the political opposition, as well as controversial issues such as alleged police abuse and official corruption. However, politicians have been known to harass media professionals over negative stories, and journalists can face physical attacks in the course of their work.

There have been fewer incidents of censorship of journalists during the Marape government compared with the frequent violations of the O'Neill era. However, Reporters Without Borders (RSF) noted in its 2021 report that journalists have been prevented from investigating Australian-operated detention centers for asylum seekers in PNG.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 4 / 4

Religious freedom is generally upheld. There have been reports of larger churches criticizing newer and smaller groups, and of anti-Muslim rhetoric that has accompanied the arrival of Muslim refugees, but no major infringements on religious liberty have been alleged in recent years.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 3 / 4

Academic freedom is generally respected, though the police have at times violently suppressed student demonstrations on campus.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 4 / 4

There are no major constraints on the expression of personal views. However, a 2016 cybercrime law allows the prosecution of people who publish defamatory material or incite violence on social media, raising concerns that it could be misused to punish legitimate speech.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 10 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 3 / 4

The constitution provides for freedom of assembly. However, marches and demonstrations require 14 days' notice and police approval, and authorities sometimes deny permits.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 4 / 4

A number of nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) operate in the country, including groups focused on human rights and environmental causes, as well as some that provide social services. Most are small and lack resources, but they are otherwise free of serious constraints on their activities.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 3 / 4

Workers' rights to strike, organize, and engage in collective bargaining are largely respected. However, the government has frequently imposed arbitration in labor disputes to avert strikes, and protections against antiunion discrimination are unevenly enforced. Most workers are employed in the informal sector and lack access to union protections.

F. RULE OF LAW: 7 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 3 / 4

While successive governments have exerted political pressure on the court system, the judiciary is generally independent. Judges are appointed by the largely apolitical Judicial and Legal Services Commission and cannot be removed arbitrarily. Laypeople sit on village courts to adjudicate minor offenses under customary and statutory law. In recent years, the higher courts have repeatedly demonstrated their impartiality by ruling against the government and its political interests.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 1 / 4

Constitutional guarantees of due process are poorly upheld. Arbitrary detention is relatively common, and opportunities to challenge such abuses are limited in practice. A shortage of trained judicial personnel is a key cause of lengthy detentions and trial delays. The police force is chronically underfunded. In 2020, then police commissioner Bryan Kramer alleged that officers are involved in criminality, including drug and firearms trafficking and land theft.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 1 / 4

Law enforcement officials are frequently implicated in acts of brutality. Prison conditions are poor, and the correctional service is understaffed. Prison breaks are common. Lack of economic opportunities exacerbates social unrest, frequently resulting in violent clashes, injuries, and deaths. An Australian police assistance program exists to help provide security, but its officers lack powers of arrest and are restricted by a 2005 court ruling that removed immunities from prosecution under local law.

Tribal violence and “payback” attacks are common in the Highlands Region. In April 2021, at least 19 people were killed in fighting in the Eastern Highlands.

Capital punishment was most recently reintroduced in 1991, though no executions have been carried out since 1954. In July 2021, the Supreme Court quashed stays on the execution of individuals who had received death sentences. In September, however, the government formed a Power of Mercy Committee to hear the commutation requests of those sentenced to death.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 2 / 4

The constitution guarantees equality regardless of race, tribe, religion, sex, and other categories, but various forms of discrimination are common in practice. Same-sex sexual relations are a criminal offense that can draw up to 14 years in prison, though the relevant laws are rarely enforced. There is some discrimination against people of Chinese origin; a growing Chinese business presence in the country has drawn resentment for allegedly disadvantaging other groups. Women face legal discrimination in employment in addition to societal biases. Allegations of sorcery have been used to target women for violence.

Australia long paid the PNG government to accept asylum seekers who arrived in Australian waters by boat, but as the program wound down in recent years, those who were not granted refugee status or did not agree to settle in PNG were left in limbo. While the Australian government remained reluctant to allow refugees to enter Australia, some have been sent to the United States as part of a deal between Canberra and Washington.

In 2016, PNG’s Supreme Court ruled that the Manus Island detention center, where Australia held asylum seekers as part of its partnership with PNG, was unconstitutional, and the facility officially closed in 2017. Many residents spent several years at the site amid reports of poor living conditions, violence, and mental health problems. In 2019, those remaining on Manus were moved to Port Moresby and held under especially poor conditions at the Bomana Immigration Detention Centre. Some eventually agreed to return to their country of origin, though 100 people reportedly remained in Port Moresby as of 2021.

In October 2021, the Australian government agreed to end its regional processing contract with PNG effective December 31, while the PNG government agreed to offer measures including citizenship and family reunification for any remaining asylum seekers who wished to reside in the country.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 8 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 2 / 4

Freedom of movement is somewhat restricted in the Highlands; survivors of tribal violence are known to limit their domestic travel or go into hiding in the immediate aftermath of skirmishes and attacks. Travelers in Port Moresby are subject to roadblocks, where authorities check the registration of their vehicles. Movement was also restricted for refugees and asylum seekers who resided on Manus Island and in Port Moresby.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 2 / 4

In PNG, 97 percent of the land area is theoretically under customary tenure, but Special Agriculture and Business Leases (SABLs) have been used to facilitate land grabs by unscrupulous investors. In 2013, a government commission found that most active SABLs were illegal and recommended their cancellation. In 2017, then prime minister O'Neill claimed that all SABLs were canceled, but the lands and physical planning minister acknowledged in 2018 that most were still being contested in court. Many of the leases remained in place in 2021, with local activists warning that large-scale logging was ongoing on land covered by the scheme.

Women face disadvantages regarding property rights and inheritance, particularly under customary law.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 2 / 4

The law provides some protections for individual rights on personal status matters like marriage and divorce, but early or forced marriage remains a problem, and legislation meant to combat widespread family violence and aid victims is poorly enforced. Abortion is illegal except when necessary to save the life of the child bearer.

About two-thirds of partnered women have experienced physical abuse, according to multiple studies. In one high-profile case in September 2021, three men suspected of murdering a woman were released from custody for lack of evidence; the woman's husband, who was one of the defendants, had reportedly confessed to the killing, and the woman's body was found in his car.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 2 / 4

Legal safeguards against exploitative working conditions are weakly enforced, and frequent abuses in sectors including logging and mining have been reported. The US Labor Department has previously assembled evidence of child labor in the coffee, cocoa, palm oil, and rubber sectors, as well as in commercial sexual exploitation.

According to the US State Department's Trafficking in Persons Report 2021, no anti-trafficking investigations or prosecutions took place in PNG during the reporting period. The State Department also noted that corrupt officials were facilitating sex trafficking as well as forced labor.

Paraguay

Population: 7,300,000

Capital: Asunción

Freedom Status: Partly Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Paraguay's democracy is dominated by the conservative Colorado Party. Corruption remains widespread, while organized crime, environmental destruction, and systemic discrimination damage the rights of rural and Indigenous populations. Poverty and gender-based discrimination also limit the rights of women and children.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- In March, allegations of corruption involving government mismanagement of the COVID-19 pandemic led to the resignation of then health minister Julio

Mazzoleni. The allegations, which triggered countrywide protests, prompted the opposition to initiate impeachment proceedings against President Mario Abdo Benítez; the impeachment attempt was blocked later that month by a congressional bloc aligned with former president Horacio Cartes.

- Due to the coronavirus pandemic, local elections originally scheduled for November 2020 took place in October; the elections, which saw the introduction of a ranked-choice voting system, were generally deemed free and fair by international observers. However, observers registered concern over a spike in election-related violence in the run-up to the polls, which resulted in the deaths of at least five people.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 28 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 10 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 3 / 4

The president is directly elected to no more than one five-year term. The conservative Colorado Party has held the presidency for most of the past 75 years. The most recent exception, left-wing former president Fernando Lugo, was removed from office in a legal, if highly controversial, “express impeachment” in 2012.

Mario Abdo Benítez of the Colorado Party won the presidency in the 2018 election, taking a little over 46 percent of the vote. Efraín Alegre, of the opposition Alianza Ganar coalition, took 43 percent. International observers described the election as largely fair, although allegations were made of fraud, vote-buying, and a media blackout affecting other candidates.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The bicameral Congress consists of an 80-member Chamber of Deputies and a 45-member Senate, with all members elected for five-year terms. The 2018 legislative elections resulted in a majority for the Colorado Party in the Chamber of Deputies, but no party won a majority in the Senate. Monitoring missions considered the polls to be generally competitive and credible.

Due to the coronavirus pandemic, local elections were delayed from November 2020 to October 2021, and party primaries, which were originally planned for July 2020, took place in June 2021. The local elections were deemed generally free and fair by international observers. However, observers registered concern over a spike in election-related violence in the run-up to the October polls, which resulted in the deaths of at least five people.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 3 / 4

The Superior Electoral Court of Justice (TSJE) regulates electoral processes. The government has yet to implement most recommendations the European Union (EU) election observation mission issued in 2013 and 2018, including securing the independence of the TSJE, making vote recounts possible, and making it easier for Indigenous peoples to vote.

The October 2021 local elections were administered under electoral code reforms adopted in 2019, which introduced a new system of ranked-choice voting. Additionally, both the June 2021 party primaries and the October local elections featured the use of new electronic voting machines.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 12 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 3 / 4

The Colorado Party has been in power for most of the past 75 years. The party dominates the national political scene with the opposition Authentic Radical Liberal Party (PLRA), though both contain rival internal factions.

Several smaller parties emerged or increased their standing in the 2018 elections, including Patria Querida (PPQ), Hagamos (PPH), and Movimiento Cruzada Nacional (MCN).

Despite the dominance of the Colorado Party, opposition parties have a realistic chance of gaining power through elections. Former president Lugo was able to come to power in 2008 due to a split in the ruling Colorado Party, while a liberal-left coalition, Alianza Ganar, came close to taking the presidency in 2018. In addition, rival factions within the Colorado Party serve as a kind of internal opposition and have recently alternated in power.

Citizens are generally free from direct interference in their political choices. However, the ruling Colorado Party has been accused of using its extensive patronage network and access to public-sector jobs to recruit voters. In March 2021, a Colorado Party candidate for the Asunción city council was accused of handing out Health Ministry medication while campaigning. The party also faced public backlash in July amid claims that thousands of people had been added to the party's public register without their consent; party officials claimed that the register had been hacked.

There is also some concern over the growing political influence of Brazilian landowners in eastern regions. The constitution bars military personnel from politics.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 2 / 4

Political office is overwhelmingly dominated by male and White or mestizo individuals. No Afro-Paraguayans or Indigenous people held legislative office in 2021. Women hold only 21 out of 125 seats in Congress, and no regional governorships.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 6 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 2 / 4

While elected officials determine government policy, the making and implementation of decisions is often influenced or hampered by organized crime and corruption.

A major scandal in July 2019 stoked fears that a renegotiation of the dividends of the Itaipú dam—a publicly owned hydroelectric facility shared with Brazil—due by 2023 will be determined by private interests.

Former president Cartes retains considerable influence over government policy and personnel. At the height of the 2019 Itaipú scandal, only the private intervention of Cartes saved Abdo Benítez from impeachment. A congressional bloc aligned with Cartes again blocked efforts to impeach Abdo Benítez in March 2021, when the opposition voted to begin impeachment proceedings against the president over his handling of the COVID-19 pandemic.

In October 2020, the lower house voted to suspend opposition deputy Celeste Amarilla of the PLRA for two months after she alleged that at least 60 of her 80 colleagues held their seats due to “dirty money.” Critics said her suspension, driven by the ruling Colorado Party, contravened the constitution and parliamentary privilege.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 2 / 4

Corruption and impunity are serious problems, and anticorruption laws have been poorly implemented. Cases often languish for years in the courts. Anticorruption protests and citizen transparency initiatives have forced the prosecution of officials from several parties under Abdo Benítez, who has taken a somewhat firmer line against corruption than his predecessors.

During 2020 and 2021, serious and credible allegations of corruption were made regarding the purchase of coronavirus-related supplies by the government, including by the Ministry of Health and state-owned fuels firm Petropar. In March 2021, reports emerged that medications meant to supply public hospitals were being sold on the black market, exacerbating a serious drug shortage within the country. The scandal triggered a wave of antigovernment protests and the resignation of then health minister Julio Mazzoleni. Another coronavirus-related scandal unfolded in May, when it was reported that more than 500 politically connected people had used their influence to receive COVID-19 vaccinations before becoming eligible. A senator implicated in the scandal later resigned.

In August 2021, the US Treasury Department sanctioned three prominent businessmen based in Paraguay for their alleged role in an international money-laundering scheme, which, according to US officials, involved local politicians, police, and judges.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 2 / 4

Government transparency is gradually improving, and the effective implementation of access to information laws has bolstered investigative journalism. Anticorruption demonstrations are becoming more common.

However, transparency initiatives often go unenforced. For example, in late 2019, an online platform intended to track publicly purchased Health Ministry supplies and allow citizens to report drug shortages was shut down without explanation.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 37 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 12 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 2 / 4

Constitutional freedoms of expression and the press are unevenly upheld. Ownership of Paraguay’s largest media outlets is increasingly concentrated in three powerful companies, whose political and business interests frequently influence media content.

Direct pressure against journalists, including threats by criminal groups and corrupt authorities, encourages self-censorship. In February 2020, Brazilian journalist Lourenço “Léo” Veras was shot and killed in the border city of Pedro Juan Caballero. Veras had reported receiving death threats from narcotraffickers.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 4 / 4

Diverse religious groups generally worship freely. However, the cultural dominance of the Catholic Church has spread further into public and private life, sometimes to the detriment of individual rights. Religious groups unaffiliated with the Catholic Church claim the government disproportionately subsidizes Catholic schools. There have also been concerns from human rights groups that Indigenous holidays are not respected by employers of other religious backgrounds.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 3 / 4

Although academia is generally independent, student elections and professional advancement often depend on affiliation with the Colorado Party or the PLRA.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 3 / 4

Citizens can, for the most part, engage in free and open private discussion, though the presence of armed groups in some areas can serve as a deterrent.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 8 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 3 / 4

Protests are common but sometimes repressed. Numerous largescale protests took place in 2021, including in September, when several thousand Indigenous demonstrators assembled in Asunción to protest a law that allows those convicted of “occupying” disputed land to be sentenced to up to ten years in prison. Violent clashes broke out between police and protesters when police attempted to forcibly disperse the protest. Another large land rights demonstration, which saw thousands of protesters demand that the government stop enforcing violent evictions of Indigenous communities, was held in December.

Protests over the government’s handling of the COVID-19 pandemic erupted across the country in early March; thousands of people participated in the antigovernment demonstrations, which were held daily through the end of the month. Though the protests were largely peaceful, riot police used tear gas and rubber bullets in an attempt to disperse the demonstrations, leading to violent confrontations between protesters and security forces.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights– and governance-related work? 3 / 4

Paraguay has a strong culture of largely free nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) working in the field of human rights and governance. However, political access tends to be given to organizations made up of senior business figures or religious groups.

In March 2021, a local NGO, the Center for Analysis and Dissemination of the Paraguayan Economy (CADEP), and the University of Illinois Chicago published a report alleging that for over 20 years, Paraguay’s tobacco industry has engaged in pervasive tax evasion and tobacco smuggling schemes. The following month, the Paraguayan Tobacco Union—which is affiliated with former president and tobacco magnate Horacio Cartes—filed a lawsuit against CADEP, accusing the organization of using “erroneous data” in its report. A judge also ordered CADEP to submit all research materials used in the report to the court. The lawsuit has been widely condemned as politically motivated.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 2 / 4

The right to unionize is constitutionally protected. However, registration procedures for trade unions are cumbersome, and only 7 percent of workers are unionized. Union membership is skewed toward public sector employees: as of 2019, 28 percent of state employees belonged to a union, compared to just 0.6 percent of private sector workers.

Labor activism was nevertheless robust in 2021, with a number of teachers’ unions declaring a strike in October to demand that the government comply with a 2018 law that guaranteed a 16 percent increase in teachers' salaries. The National Union of Physicians (SINAMED) also engaged in industrial action, and went on strike in September, calling on the government to increase both the health budget and physician salaries.

F. RULE OF LAW: 7 / 16F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 2 / 4

The judiciary is nominally independent, but money launderers, drug traffickers, and corrupt politicians have co-opted local judicial authorities. Public prosecutors show increasing signs of co-optation by the ruling Colorado Party.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 1 / 4

Constitutional guarantees of due process are poorly upheld, largely due to corruption that permeates the judicial system. Individuals with influence or access to money are frequently able to obtain favorable treatment in the justice system. Cases like the 2012 killings of 6 policemen and 11 peasant farmers in Curuguaty are yet to be investigated fully and fairly.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 2 / 4

Paraguay is one of the region's safer countries. However, the Paraguayan People's Army (EPP) guerilla group is still active in the northeast. A September 2020 raid on an EPP camp that resulted in the killings of two 11-year-old Argentine girls generated sharp criticism.

Violence between organized crime groups predominantly takes place along the Brazilian border, but is spreading. Illegal detention and torture by police and security forces still occur. Overcrowding and unsanitary conditions are serious problems in prisons.

Paraguay lacks legislation protecting against all forms of discrimination. While same-sex sexual activity is legal, members of the LGBT+ community face endemic discrimination.

Indigenous people similarly face discrimination and lack access to adequate health care. Rampant deforestation, man-made forest fires, severe droughts, and forced evictions threaten the last Indigenous Ayoreo groups in voluntary isolation and Indigenous Guaraní settlements.

Mennonite communities in the Chaco are afforded a wide degree of legal forbearance, as are Brazilian and European-descended ranchers in the eastern region.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 10 / 16G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 3 / 4

Freedom of movement is generally respected, though the presence of armed or criminal groups can discourage travel in some areas. Most people can change their employment without legal impediment. For students, moving between educational establishments can prove difficult as faculty often have the power to retain grades.

Although there are few formal restrictions on private business activity and property rights, land disputes, often linked to historic misappropriation of public land and disrespect of Indigenous land rights, remain a problem. In October 2021, the UN Human Rights Committee (OHCHR) ruled that in failing to prevent the “toxic contamination of Indigenous people’s traditional lands,” the government had violated their rights; among other things, the committee recommended that the government “make full reparation to the victims.”

The EPP has threatened, kidnapped, and extorted ranchers in northeastern areas.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 2 / 4

Women and children continue to suffer from high levels of gender-based violence (GBV) and sexual abuse. Authorities recorded 35 femicides in 2021. Abortion, same-sex marriage, and civil unions remain illegal. LGBT+ people, and especially transgender women, report feeling increasingly unsafe amid the country’s conservative shift.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 2 / 4

Approximately 26.9 percent of the population lived in poverty in 2020, with 3.9 percent living in extreme poverty. Some estimates suggest the country’s poverty rate reached 30 percent in 2021. Indigenous populations are particularly affected. Inequality in income and land ownership is extremely high and social mobility very limited. Employees are often unprotected from employer retaliation. Reports of forced labor and slavery periodically surface.

The ongoing illegal practice of criadazgo—temporary adoption whereby children, generally from poor families, work without pay for wealthier ones—severely limits the freedom of some 47,000 children across the country.

Peru

Population: 32,800,000

Capital: Lima

Freedom Status: Partly Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Status Change: Peru’s status improved from Partly Free to Free because the successful election of a new president and Congress served to ease, at least temporarily, a pattern of institutional clashes between the executive and legislative branches that had disrupted governance for a number of years.

Overview: Peru has established democratic political institutions and undergone multiple peaceful transfers of power. However, high-profile corruption scandals have eroded public trust in government, while bitter divides within a highly fragmented political class have repeatedly produced political turmoil. Indigenous groups suffer from discrimination and inadequate political representation.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- Pedro Castillo of the leftist Peru Libre party was elected president in June, narrowly defeating right-wing candidate Keiko Fujimori in a runoff with 50.13 percent of the vote. The official election results were not released until July, due to allegations of electoral fraud made by Fujimori; the National Board of Elections

(JNE) ultimately dismissed Fujimori's claims, and the election was deemed free and fair by both local and international election monitors.

- A new Congress was elected in April polls that international observers reported to be competitive and peaceful. Though no party won a majority of seats, Castillo's Peru Libre became the largest party in the legislature, taking 37 seats, followed by Fujimori's previously dominant, right-wing Fuerza Popular (FP) party, which took 24.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 30 / 40 (+1)

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 10 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 3 / 4

The president is chief of state and head of government. Presidents are directly elected to a five-year term and may serve nonconsecutive terms. Prior to 2021, the last president to be seated through a national election was Pedro Pablo Kuczynski. In 2016, Kuczynski won by a historically small margin of 0.2 percent over Keiko Fujimori. The elections took place peacefully, and stakeholders accepted the close result.

Kuczynski resigned in March 2018 as lawmakers prepared to hold an impeachment vote against him over corruption allegations. Vice President Martín Vizcarra was quickly sworn in to replace him, in accordance with legal procedures. Vizcarra repeatedly clashed with legislators, and used his authority to dissolve Congress in September 2019 following a vote of no confidence in his government. Vizcarra was ousted in November 2020 after congressional opponents invoked the constitution's controversial "moral incapacity" clause; many outside observers characterized the removal as an abuse of a vague constitutional clause.

Vizcarra was replaced by Manuel Merino, from the center-right Acción Popular party, who selected a conservative cabinet and signaled an aggressive policy agenda. An initial wave of protests in Lima were met with violent police repression, which provoked even larger protests across the country. After less than a week and the resignation of several cabinet members, Merino was forced to resign.

After Merino's resignation, Francisco Sagasti, who had been elected as president of Congress just days earlier, acceded to the presidency with a mandate of seeking unity and shepherding the country to general elections in April 2021.

Elections were held as planned in April 2021, followed by a second-round vote in June. The preliminary results of the runoff showed Pedro Castillo of the leftist Peru Libre party winning 50.13 percent of the vote, defeating Keiko Fujimori, who received 49.87 percent of the vote. The election, which saw a voter turnout of over 70 percent, was deemed free and fair by both local and international election monitors. However, Fujimori challenged the initial results, accusing Castillo of vote tampering, prompting electoral authorities to delay releasing the official results of the election. The JNE ultimately dismissed Fujimori's claims of electoral fraud, and officially declared Castillo's victory in July.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

Members of the 130-member unicameral Congress are elected for five-year terms; reelection is not permitted. Congressional balloting employs an open-list, region-based system of proportional representation, with a 5 percent vote hurdle for a party to enter the legislature.

Ten parties entered Congress following the 2021 general elections, which were deemed competitive and peaceful by international observers. Castillo's Peru Libre won 37 seats, becoming the largest party represented in Congress, followed by Keiko Fujimori's previously dominant, right-wing FP party, which took 24. No party won a majority of seats.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 3 / 4

The JNE has taken steps to improve transparency surrounding the electoral process, but insufficiently regulated campaign financing remains a serious issue. International observers praised the conduct of the JNE and the National Office of Electoral Processes (ONPE) during the 2021 elections, reporting that both bodies had operated efficiently and transparently.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 13 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 4 / 4

Peruvian parties, while competitive, are both highly fragmented and extremely personalized. Though there are limits on individual donations, there are no constraints on spending by political parties, offering an outsized advantage to parties able to secure abundant funds.

Since the party system collapsed during Alberto Fujimori's authoritarian regime in the 1990s, the political system in Peru has been described by academic observers as a "democracy without parties." Traditional political parties have been replaced by fragile and opportunistic political organizations that often have a very short life and little dedication to democratic practices.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 4 / 4

Opposition political parties have a realistic chance of winning power through elections, and the outcomes of elections at both the national and regional levels are subject to effective competition. Fragmentation, rather than lack of political opportunities, is the biggest obstacle faced by political actors attempting to gain and exercise power.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 3 / 4

While voters and candidates are generally able to exercise their political choices without undue influence, businesses regularly seek to bribe or otherwise influence political candidates' positions.

The concerns of members of ethnic and cultural minority groups, especially in remote mountain and Amazonian areas, remain inadequately addressed in politics. The 2011 Law of Prior Consultation attempted to improve the participation of Indigenous groups by guaranteeing consultation before mining and other development projects are undertaken. However, Indigenous groups have criticized the law, as the process gives Indigenous representatives no veto power, and there are ambiguities as to what qualifies a community as Indigenous.

While the political participation of women has increased over recent years, women hold few leadership roles in local and regional governments. In June 2020, Congress passed a law requiring moves toward full gender parity on party lists. After the 2021 elections, women make up 40 percent of the legislature, with 52 women holding seats in Congress.

Peru's first openly LGBT+ congressperson, Susel Paredes, was elected in 2021.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 7 / 12 (+1)C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 3 / 4 (+1)

Elected leaders and representatives are the key agents in creating and implementing policy. However, businesses and special interest groups influence officials through bribes and other illicit payments. Several former presidents and longtime opposition leader Keiko Fujimori have all been accused of accepting illegal funds.

Interparty battles, frequently conducted on behalf of party leaders with private stakes in public policy, have disrupted normal government functions in recent years. During his time in office, President Vizcarra constantly battled with Congress over his political and legislative agenda, especially regarding anticorruption reforms. Congress ultimately voted to remove Vizcarra in November 2020, a decision that was roundly rejected by the Peruvian public.

Though clashes between the executive and legislative branches remain common, large-scale interparty conflict, such as that which led to the removal of Vizcarra, mostly subsided in 2021. However, tension between the two branches was present throughout the year, largely due to Castillo's cabinet picks, including his controversial appointment of Guido Bellido as prime minister in July. Tensions eased somewhat in October, when Bellido, who was under criminal investigation for "defending terrorism" at the time of his appointment, resigned and was replaced by the more moderate Mirtha Vasquez. In both August and November, the opposition-led Congress narrowly passed a vote of confidence in Castillo's cabinet, allowing the executive to continue to function and preventing ongoing interbranch clashes from escalating to a constitutional crisis. The stability of the government was again threatened in October, when Keiko Fujimori introduced impeachment proceedings against Castillo; however, further political turmoil was averted when Congress voted against impeachment in December.

Score Change: The score improved from 2 to 3 because interparty conflicts have not interfered in the functioning of government to the degree they have in past years.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 2 / 4

Government corruption remains a critical problem in Peru, though law enforcement authorities frequently investigate and prosecute corruption allegations. Recent years have seen scandals involving allegations of illicit deals between the Brazilian firm Odebrecht and a number of the country's most senior political figures.

In a 2018 referendum, three anticorruption reforms introduced by President Vizcarra—including a ban on consecutive reelection for lawmakers, limits on campaign contributions, and an overhaul of the judicial appointment process—were approved by more than 85 percent of voters. However, Vizcarra's ouster followed allegations that he had received bribes for public works contracts while governor of Moquegua in 2014. Vizcarra's proposal to end parliamentary immunity for criminal prosecution was a key point of tension between the president and Congress; 68 of the 130 lawmakers elected in 2020 were subject to open criminal investigations as of November of that year.

Since taking office in July 2021, President Castillo has been the subject of several corruption allegations. Though Castillo has repeatedly denied the accusations, critics have questioned his commitment to fighting corruption, citing his ties to Vladimir Cerrón, the president of the Peru Libre party, who at the time of Castillo's election was serving a four-year suspended prison sentence for corruption. While Castillo has distanced himself from Cerrón since becoming president, several more of the president's associates were placed under investigation by Peru's Anticorruption Prosecutor's Office during the year; the investigations remained ongoing at year's end.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 2 / 4

Some government agencies have made progress on transparency, but much information related to defense and security policies remains classified under a 2012 law.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 42 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 15 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 3 / 4

Peru's dynamic press is mostly privately owned, and ownership is highly concentrated. Defamation is criminalized, and journalists are regularly convicted under such charges, though their sentences are usually suspended. In September 2020, criminal proceedings began for investigative journalist Paola Ugaz, who had written a book about alleged physical and psychological abuse within the Sodalitium Christianae Vitae, a Catholic organization. The criminal case against Ugaz remained ongoing at the end of 2021.

During the November 2020 political crisis, multiple press freedom watchdogs denounced an attempt by Manuel Merino's short-lived government to curtail the ability of state-run media outlets to cover protests against his administration. Journalists also protested dozens of acts of violence, mainly perpetrated by police, against reporters covering the protests. While murders of journalists have declined in recent years, numerous incidents of intimidation and assault are registered each year.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 4 / 4

The Peruvian constitution guarantees freedom of religion and belief, and these rights are generally respected.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

Academic freedom is unrestricted.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 4 / 4

People are generally free to engage in private discussion without fear of retribution or surveillance.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 8 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 3 / 4

The authorities generally recognize the constitutionally guaranteed right to peaceful assembly. Local disputes and protests—notably those related to extractive industries, land rights, and resource allocation among marginalized populations—at times result in instances of excessive use of force by security personnel. Efforts in recent years by the state ombudsman and the National Office of Dialogue and Sustainability (ONDS) have contributed to a reduction in protest-related violence during social conflicts.

In contrast to the antigovernment protests of November 2020—which were violently repressed by the police and included violence by protesters—protests were generally allowed to proceed peacefully in 2021. Demonstrations both in support of and against President Castillo were held throughout the year, including in August, when hundreds of people gathered in Lima to protest against the appointment of Guido Bellido as prime minister. Numerous demonstrations were also held between September and November by activists protesting against the negative environmental and health impacts of the mining sector on communities in Peru's "mining corridor."

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 3 / 4

Freedom of association is generally respected. However, efforts by environmental activists to discourage land development have been met with intimidation.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 2 / 4

Peruvian law recognizes the right of workers to organize and bargain collectively. Strikes are legal with advance notification to the Ministry of Labor, but few strikers abide by this regulation. Lengthy processes involved in registering a new union create a window in which labor leaders and activists can be easily dismissed from their jobs. Short-term contracts in many industries make unionization difficult. Less than 10 percent of the formal workforce is unionized.

F. RULE OF LAW: 8 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 2 / 4

The judiciary has been perceived as one of the most corrupt institutions in the country. In 2018, Congress approved a reform leading to the creation of a new National Board of Justice (JNJ) in charge of selecting, evaluating, and disciplining judges. The establishment of the JNJ was widely praised by civil society organizations as well as academia.

Peru's seven-member Constitutional Court has maintained sufficient autonomy to serve as a check on the other branches, and the constant tension between Congress and the executive heightens the importance of both the Court's composition and its decisions. Indeed, observers pointed to the process of appointing six new justices as a key driver of interbranch tensions leading up to the November 2020 political crisis. However, in July 2021, a Peruvian court ordered the selection of new Constitutional Court members to be suspended due to alleged irregularities in the selection process. Despite the ruling, Congress announced that the selection process would go ahead as planned, prompting the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights (IACHR) to urge the legislature to abide by judicial rulings.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 2 / 4

Constitutional guarantees of due process are unevenly upheld. Lawyers provided to indigent defendants are often poorly trained, and translation services are rarely provided for defendants who do not speak Spanish. Impunity for violence against environmental activists who challenge land development remains a problem.

In 2009, former authoritarian president Alberto Fujimori was sentenced to 25 years' imprisonment for human rights abuses committed while in office. Former president Kuczynski issued a controversial medical pardon in 2017, but in 2018 Peru's Supreme Court ordered him back to prison. Police officially returned him to prison in January 2019, where he remained throughout 2021.

While Peru's murder rate is lower than many of its regional peers, violent criminal organizations operate in the narcotics and illegal mining industries, and street crime is rampant. A report published in 2021 by the National Statistics Institute (INEI) indicated that between November 2020 and April 2021, 18.6 percent of Peruvians aged 15 and over in urban areas were victimized by crime and 82.3 percent nationwide believed they would be victims of a crime.

Abuses committed by the security forces are rarely punished. In March 2020, Congress passed a law that international rights groups criticized as generating additional barriers to police accountability.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 2 / 4

Discrimination against Indigenous populations and Afro-Peruvians is pervasive. LGBT+ people face discrimination, hostility, and violence. Indigenous Peruvians, who often live vast distances from under-resourced health services, were severely afflicted by COVID-19, while transgender Peruvians were subjected to police abuse during the lockdown.

After Colombia, Peru has received the highest number of migrants from Venezuela. While the country was initially welcoming, public opinion shifted against tolerance, and a 2019 report by the Ministry of the Interior found that more than half of the Venezuelans residing in Peru have felt or experienced discrimination. Disruptions associated with the COVID-19 pandemic posed additional problems for Venezuelan migrants, who were not eligible for key forms of state assistance. In January 2021, the government militarized the northern border with Ecuador in an attempt to prevent undocumented immigrants from entering the country.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 11 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

Peru does not place formal restrictions on movement. Although the use of road blockages as a protest tactic continued in 2021, such actions have generally decreased in recent years, easing movement around the country. People are able to freely change their place of employment or education. While Peru's COVID-19 lockdown was one of the most stringent in Latin America and included significant restrictions on movement, there were fewer accusations of arbitrary or abusive enforcement than in many neighboring countries.

The rights to own property and establish business are mostly respected, though tensions persist between extractive industries and Indigenous communities who demand inclusion in land use policy decisions. The Prior Consultation Law is designed in part to better protect Indigenous rights. Its implementation has resulted in some positive outcomes for communities that have taken part in consultation processes—though prior consultation still does not always take place, nor are the requests of Indigenous groups binding.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 2 / 4

Gender-based violence is widespread in Peru, with more than half of Peruvian women reporting instances of physical, sexual, or emotional abuse. More than 146 femicides were recorded in 2021.

Proposals to recognize civil unions for same-sex partners have been repeatedly introduced and rejected in Congress, and in November 2020 the Constitutional Court ruled against recognition of a same-sex marriage performed in Mexico by a Peruvian citizen. Abortion is permitted only in instances where a woman's health is in danger.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 2 / 4

The large share of Peruvians working in the informal sector leads to widespread economic precarity. Dependence on daily earnings—and the state's inefficiency in distributing aid—contributed to the depth of the COVID-19 pandemic in the country. Peruvian women and girls, especially from the Indigenous community, are vulnerable to sex trafficking. According to the US State Department's 2021 Trafficking in Persons Report, while the Peruvian government has not met the minimum standards for effectively combating trafficking, its antitrafficking efforts increased "significantly" in 2021. However, impunity for traffickers remains common.

Philippines

Population: 110,200,000

Capital: Manila

Freedom Status: Partly Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Although the Philippines transitioned from authoritarian rule in 1986, the rule of law and application of justice are haphazard and heavily favor political and economic elites. Democratic institutions that provide oversight and accountability are either weak or undermined. Long-term violent insurgencies have continued for decades, though their threat to the state has diminished in recent years. Impunity remains the norm for violent crimes against activists and journalists, and President Rodrigo Duterte's war on drugs has led to thousands of extrajudicial killings since it began in 2016.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- The Duterte administration assumed an increasingly hostile stance toward academics and universities that teach allegedly "subversive" materials. In January, authorities published the names of 27 University of the Philippines (UP) graduates, claiming they were members of the Communist Party and endangering them to be targeted with harassment, at the very least. Between September and November, an arm of the Duterte administration compelled at least four universities to remove and turn over all books about communism and "subversive" ideologies from their libraries.
 - In September, the Senate launched an investigation into the Duterte administration's purchase of 67 billion pesos ($1.3 billion) worth of overpriced medical supplies and expired COVID-19 testing kits. Initially flagged for irregularities by the Commission on Audit in August, Duterte refused to cooperate with the investigation and prohibited his staff from attending an inquiry.
 - On one day in March, referred to as "Bloody Sunday," nine activists were killed and six were arrested in provinces just outside the capital region. Two days prior, President Duterte had publicly stated that the police and the military should eradicate and kill communists in the country.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 25 / 40A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 9 / 12*A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 3 / 4

The president is both head of state and head of government and is directly elected to a single six-year term. Rodrigo Duterte won the 2016 presidential election with 39 percent of the vote. While polling was marked by dozens of violent episodes, including a number of killings, there were fewer such incidents compared to previous election years. Vote buying was also reported.

The vice president is directly elected on a separate ticket and may serve up to two successive six-year terms. Maria Leonor Robredo won the closely contested vice presidency in 2016 with 35 percent of the vote.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 3 / 4

The 24 members of the Senate are elected on a nationwide ballot and serve six-year terms, with half of the seats up for election every three years. The 299 members of the House of Representatives serve three-year terms, with 241 elected in single-member constituencies and the remainder elected through party-list voting.

Midterm elections for both houses of Congress and local government offices were held in May 2019. Despite a ballot redesign that led to a substantial party-list undervote, along with reports of vote buying and some election-related violence, the polls were generally perceived as credible. Though no single party won an outright majority in either house, pro-Duterte parties, including the newly formed Alliance for Change (HNP), created by the president's daughter Sara Duterte, secured majority alliances in both houses. The opposition Liberal Party did not win a single seat in the Senate.

The president appoints the Commission on Elections (Comelec), whose performance was generally deemed competent in 2016, though they were criticized for technical glitches and procurement issues that occurred in the 2019 midterm elections. The Comelec performs both election management and adjudication functions. Frequent litigation complicates the interpretation of electoral laws and makes the already complex framework even less accessible to the public.

In March 2021, the Commission on Appointments confirmed Aimee Ferolino-Ampolquino as Comelec Commissioner. In November, Rey Bulay joined the Comelec, the sixth member of the seven-person panel appointed by Duterte. The majority of Duterte appointees are from his home region of Davao.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 10 / 16B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 3 / 4

The Philippines has a strong record of open competition among multiple parties, though candidates and political parties typically have weak ideological profiles. Legislative coalitions are exceptionally fluid, and politicians often change party affiliation, typically to join the dominant bloc or the incumbent president's party.

In the past three decades, political dynasties have become more prevalent and more powerful, and hold many provincial governorships and a significant number of seats in Congress.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 2 / 4

The Philippines has seen regular rotations of power at the national level. However, in recent years opposition politicians have faced increasing harassment, and some have been arrested on charges denounced by the opposition and rights groups as politically motivated. An atmosphere of violence and a lack access to state resources for those not in power hinder the opposition's ability to challenge incumbents. Campaign finance rules, which make elections very costly, impede the ability of grassroots movements to mobilize, participate in, and win elections.

In February 2020, former senator Antonio Trillanes and others were indicted on charges of sedition as part of an alleged plot to oust Duterte. Senator Leila de Lima, one of the most outspoken critics of Duterte's war on drugs, remained in pretrial detention throughout her term. De Lima was arrested in 2017 on charges of accepting money from drug dealers and is recognized as a prisoner of conscience by international rights groups. In July 2021, she announced that she would seek reelection while in detention.

In 2021, the Duterte government intensified its campaign against the Communist Party of the Philippines (CPP) and its armed wing, the New People's Army (NPA). Senior government officials openly "red-tagged" (the tactic of alleging that an individual harbors communist, and thus terrorist sympathies or connections, resulting in stigmatization and increased risk of physical attack) members of the House of Representatives. The accused representatives subsequently received death threats.

The government labeled Makabayan bloc in November 2020 and the Kabataan Party-list in June 2021 as "legal fronts" for the Communist Party of the Philippines. The Office of the Solicitor General requested the disqualification of the Kabataan Party-list and the Gabriela Women's Party, which advocates for women's rights, from the 2022 elections, which had not occurred as of December 2021.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 2 / 4

Distribution of power is heavily affected by patronage and kinship networks. In the past 30 years, political dynasties have expanded, and analysts believe they will continue to increase in number and scope. Groups competing for party-list seats are frequently dominated by a few political families, and recent elections have increased the concentration of power into those families' hands. Election-related funding also contributes to the concentration of power: there are no limits on campaign contributions, and a significant portion of political donations come from a relatively small number of donors.

Social media platforms, especially Facebook, have been weaponized and exploited by Duterte and his supporters. In October 2020, Facebook removed hundreds of accounts for violating its policy against "coordinated inauthentic behavior on behalf of a foreign or government entity." One network originated in China, while another, which was linked to the Philippine police and military, criticized activists and the political opposition. Without challenging the findings, Duterte issued vague threats regarding Facebook's operations in the country.

No laws limit the participation of specific groups in the political process, and the constitution guarantees equal access to opportunities for public service. However, the dominance of political dynasties is an obstacle to the exercise of political rights for some groups. While women make up about 28 percent of the legislature, political life is dominated by men and few women are elected to positions in the national legislature from outside of the few politically powerful families. Muslims and Indigenous groups are not well represented. Perceptions of relative socioeconomic deprivation and political disenfranchisement, along with resentment toward Christian settlements in traditionally Muslim areas, have played a central role in the Philippines' Muslim separatist movements.

In 2013, the Supreme Court ruled that the party-list portion of the ballot for the House of Representatives, meant to ensure representation for marginalized or underrepresented groups, could also be open to national political parties, if they did not stand in the single-member constituency contests. In 2019, several party-list groups gained seats not by representing the sectors or interests as intended, but through substantial support from kinship networks in single geographic regions and through links with the Duterte administration.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 6 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 3 / 4

While elected government officials and legislative representatives determine state policies, the president dominates policymaking due to a political system that grants significant powers to the executive branch. A few dozen families continue to hold a disproportionate share of political authority. Several of Duterte's children hold elected office and exert increasing influence.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 1 / 4

Government corruption and impunity remain serious problems. The courts and other anticorruption institutions have failed to hold powerful politicians and their associates to account. President Duterte has fired numerous officials due to corruption, but his anticorruption drive has ultimately led to few convictions. Officials involved in corrupt activities are often reappointed to other offices.

The official anticorruption agencies, the Office of the Ombudsman and the Presidential Anti-Corruption Commission (PACC), have mixed records. The PACC lacks enforcement capabilities and has been led by known Duterte allies. The Ombudsman, tasked with investigating and filing complaints against government workers and officials, is poorly resourced. It has focused on major cases against senior government officials and those involving large sums of money, some of which languish for years in the Sandiganbayan (anticorruption court). Currently headed by a Duterte appointee, the Ombudsman's performance has received criticism for the significant decrease in the number of cases filed since 2018.

The government's response to the COVID-19 pandemic has been dogged by allegations of incompetence, negligence, and corruption at the national and local levels. In April 2020, senators called for the secretary of health's resignation for perceived deficiencies in addressing the pandemic; investigations in 2020 and 2021 into the Department of Health (DOH) found procurement anomalies and other problems. Also in 2020, an anticorruption task force exposed numerous instances of fraud, overpriced supplies, and other misdeeds within the Philippine Health Insurance Corporation, leading to charges against high-level government officers. In June 2021, these charges were dismissed by the Office of the Ombudsman. In September, the Senate launched an investigation into the Duterte administration's purchase of 67 billion pesos ($1.4 billion) worth of overpriced medical supplies and expired COVID-19 testing kits. Initially flagged for irregularities by the Commission on Audit in August, Duterte refused to cooperate with the investigation and prohibited his staff from attending an inquiry.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 2 / 4

Government transparency remains limited despite some positive initiatives. Local governments have been required to post procurement and budget data on their websites, and the national government has instituted participatory budgeting at various levels. The country's first freedom of information directive was issued by Duterte in 2016, but it mandates public disclosure only in the executive branch and allows major exemptions.

The DOH has failed to publish details regarding the purchase of COVID-19 vaccines, including for large quantities of the Chinese government's Sinovac vaccine. The Senate's investigations into fraud allegations in the DOH have not obtained this information, due to various confidentiality and nondisclosure agreements.

Duterte has refused to release a filing known as a statement of assets and liabilities and net worth (SALN); all previous presidents made the disclosure, pursuant to a 1989 law. The Ombudsman has restricted public access to elected congressmembers and government officials' SALNs, asserting they were being "weaponized." The office announced they were no longer conducting "lifestyle checks" that investigate officials' apparent unexplained wealth.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 30 / 60 (-1)

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 11 / 16 (-1)

D1. Are there free and independent media? 1 / 4

The constitution provides for freedoms of expression and the press, and private media are vibrant and outspoken. However, the Philippines remains one of the most dangerous places in the world for journalists, and the president's hostile rhetoric toward members of the media exacerbates an already perilous situation. The Philippine Center for Investigative Journalism has found that attacks and threats on the media have continued relentlessly throughout the Duterte administration, and state agencies have made no serious efforts to investigate serious incidents or otherwise address the problem. Journalists experience physical attacks; threats, including death threats and bomb threats; smear campaigns claiming they conspire against the government; red-tagging; and distributed denial-of-service (DDoS) attacks.

According to the Committee to Protect Journalists (CPJ), 11 journalists have been killed in the Philippines in connection with their work since 2016. In July 2021, a radio journalist was shot by an unidentified gunman; and in December, a newspaper reporter was shot by unknown assailants. The vast majority of violent attacks remain unpunished. In December 2019, however, a trial court found dozens of defendants guilty for the brutal massacre of 58 people, including 32 journalists, in Maguindanao in 2009. Datu Andal Ampatuan, Jr., the most prominent defendant, was sentenced to life in prison.

Other obstacles to press freedom include Executive Order 608, which established a National Security Clearance System to protect classified information, and the Human Security Act, which allows journalists to be wiretapped based on suspicion of involvement in terrorism. Libel is a criminal offense, and libel cases have been used frequently to quiet criticism of public officials.

In June 2020, Maria Ressa, winner of the 2021 Nobel Peace Prize, and Reynaldo Santos Jr. were found guilty of cyberlibel and sentenced to six years in prison. In August 2021, a Manila court dismissed a libel case against the online news site Rappler, Ressa, and other codefendants; another libel case had been dismissed a couple of months earlier. A new case was filed against Rappler and six other organizations in December by Duterte's secretary of energy. Rappler, which has criticized Duterte's war on drugs, had its corporate registration revoked by government regulators in 2018 for violating the prohibition on foreign ownership and control of Philippine media outlets. Rappler reporters were accused by Duterte of being part of a "fake news outlet," and banned from government events and from conducting interviews with state officials.

In 2020, ABS-CBN, the oldest and largest media network in the country, shut down its broadcast operations following the expiration of its operating license. Duterte had accused the network of bias against him and openly threatened to close it down since the 2016 campaign. The shutdown was condemned by numerous press freedom and human rights advocacy groups. In July 2021, ABS-CBN published online a list of the 70 lawmakers who voted to end the media franchise.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 4 / 4

Freedom of religion is guaranteed under the constitution and generally respected in practice. Under the Duterte administration, priests critical of the drug war have been killed and threatened. During the COVID-19 lockdown between July and August 2021, churches were not allowed to hold public religious services, though Duterte and his supporters held political rallies.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 3 / 4 (-1)

Academic freedom at the country's many public and private schools is generally respected, though the government has increasingly taken on a hostile stance toward academic independence, particularly the teaching of communist texts. In January 2021, the Armed Forces of the Philippines (AFP) Civil-Military Relations Office published the names of 27 University of the Philippines (UP) graduates, claiming they were members of the Communist Party. The release of the graduates' names endangered the individuals to be targeted with harassment, at the very least. In the same month, the 1989 accord between UP and the Department of National Defense (DND) was terminated, enabling police and military forces to enter public universities and arrest participants of antigovernment protests en masse.

Between September and November 2021, the National Task force to End Local Communist Armed Conflict and the National Intelligence Coordinating Agency (NICA), arms of the Duterte administration, compelled at least four universities to remove and turn over all books about communism and "subversive" ideologies from their libraries. Authorities closed 55 Indigenous primary schools in the Davao region in 2019 following allegations that the schools were teaching leftist ideology.

Security forces have increasingly monitored Islamic schools and schools attended by Indigenous peoples in areas of the southern Philippines where the military conducts counterinsurgency and antiterror missions. In October 2020, the military's top general stated that the armed forces would monitor the estimated 500 Islamic schools in the country as possible recruitment sites for militants, sparking criticism by Muslim religious leaders. A January 2020 proposal by the police chief of Manila to compile lists of all Muslim students in high schools and universities in the city was rescinded following condemnation by citizens and rights groups.

Score Change: The score declined from 4 to 3 because the government terminated limits on military and police operations at the University of the Philippines, red-tagged graduates of the university, and pushed several universities to purge their libraries of books associated with communist ideology.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 3 / 4

Social media use is very widespread in the Philippines, but rights groups have expressed concern about threats against and censorship of online criticism and the criminalization of allegedly libelous social media posts. Arrests increased following the March 2020 enactment of an emergency law, Bayanihan to Heal as One Act, which used overly broad language to criminalize the posting of fake news. Within weeks, investigators summoned over a dozen people for their social media posts. A human rights lawyer who had described the arrests as having a chilling effect was publicly attacked and insulted by Duterte, and multiple people who posted criticism or satirical posts about Duterte and the government were charged with crimes, including cyberlibel.

In April 2021, community pantries, set up to alleviate the rise in food scarcity and economic hardship brought on by the coronavirus pandemic, became targets of red-tagging. Organizers of the initiatives were accused on social media by pro-Duterte groups of being fronts for the communist movement and staging the pantries to recruit members. Several organizers feared that this red-tagging would result in harassment from law enforcement and others.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 6 / 12E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 2 / 4

Citizen activism is robust, and demonstrations are common. However, permits are required for rallies, and police sometimes use violence to disperse antigovernment protests.

Complaints of insufficient government aid amid the strict COVID-19 lockdown spurred protests that led to dozens of detentions and arrests in 2020. In addition, arrests occurred amid protests led by progressive organizations against the Anti-Terrorism Act signed into law in July 2020; protesters were charged with violating both pandemic-related restrictions and public assembly laws. While those demonstrators were charged for violating restrictions, in 2021, members of Duterte's party held mass political gatherings ahead of the 2022 elections, despite lockdown restrictions.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 2 / 4

Civil society has historically been robust in the Philippines, which hosts a range of active human rights, social welfare, environmental, and other groups. However, assassinations of civil society activists and human rights defenders continue; nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) and activists experience harassment and arrest; and President Duterte's public threats against those who oppose his policies have exacerbated an already dangerous atmosphere of impunity.

In August 2021, Rex Fernandez, a human rights lawyer, was shot and killed by a gunman in Cebu. Fernandez was the third lawyer killed in Cebu in 2021. During the Duterte presidency, 66 lawyers have been killed and many have been harassed. On one day in March 2021, referred to as "Bloody Sunday," nine activists were killed and six were arrested in provinces just outside the capital region. Two days prior, President Duterte had publicly stated that the police and the military should eradicate and kill communists in the country.

In July 2020, the government's Commission on Human Rights (CHR) published a report denouncing Duterte's "systematic attack" on human rights defenders; at least 134 human rights defenders had been killed under the Duterte administration. The report asserted that the impunity for such killings was connected to frequent presidential pronouncements dismissing human rights and stigmatizing human rights defenders as drug suspects and communists.

In April 2021, lawmakers from the opposition proposed a bill to criminalize red-tagging. The Department of Justice (DOJ) supported the initiative, even as the proposed 2022 government budget increased funds for agencies that frequently use red-tagging as a tactic.

In a June 2020 report, the Office of the UN High Commissioner on Human Rights (OHCHR) noted that police and military intimidation tactics targeting activists continued during the coronavirus lockdowns.

According to Sweden-based Qurium Media, the human rights group Karapatan's website experienced a series of DDoS cyberattacks between July and August 2021. The attacks were proxied using bots that originated from outside the Philippines. Karapatan's Secretary General Cristina Palabay claimed they were intended to prevent the public from accessing reports on the worsening state of human rights in the country.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 2 / 4

Trade unions are independent, though less than 10 percent of the labor force is unionized. Collective bargaining is common among unionized workers, however, and strikes may be called as long as unions provide notice and obtain majority approval from their members.

Trade union members and labor and professional groups continue to be targets of red-tagging, stigmatization, and violence, and membership has declined in recent years. Leaders of such groups have been targeted amid a broader increase in extrajudicial killings that has taken place in the Philippines over the past decade. In March 2021, a labor leader was shot dead in Calamba, Laguna, three weeks after nine people were killed by police in various raids targeting political activists.

F. RULE OF LAW: 3 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 1 / 4

Judicial independence has deteriorated during the Duterte administration. Chief Justice of the Supreme Court Maria Lourdes Sereno, a harsh critic of the president, was ousted in 2018 for allegedly failing to disclose all her assets. The decision was sharply criticized by the opposition as a brazen, politically motivated attack on the independence of the judiciary. In December 2020, an impeachment complaint was filed Edwin Cordevilla, secretary general of the Filipino League of Advocates for Good Government, against another Supreme Court justice, Marvic Leonen, who is generally perceived as a human rights advocate. In September 2021, the impeachment case against Leonen was dismissed by the House of Representatives.

Judicial independence is also hampered by inefficiency, low pay, intimidation, corruption, and high vacancy rates. Since 2016, nine retired or former judges and justices and 14 former and current city prosecutors have been killed.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 0 / 4

The justice system fails to guarantee due process rights. Arbitrary detention, disappearances, kidnappings, and abuse of suspects are common. The OHCHR catalogued numerous due process violations linked to Duterte's war on drugs, including the use of watch lists compiled by local officials that identify targets for home "visitations" that do not require warrants and often lead to extrajudicial execution.

The police and military have been implicated in corruption, extortion, and involvement in the illegal drug trade.

The Anti-Terrorism Act that took effect in July 2020 provides the state significant powers, including the warrantless arrest and detention of people designated as terrorists by an Anti-Terrorism Council appointed by the president. Rights advocates sharply criticized the law's broad definition of terrorism as endangering dissent and free speech and stated that limits incorporated into the law were too vague to offer effective protection. At least 37 petitions challenging the law's constitutionality have been filed in the Supreme Court. In December 2021, the Supreme Court upheld the constitutionality of the Anti-Terrorism Act.

The Philippines has been afflicted by long-running insurgencies, and more recently, violent extremism in Mindanao. Since his election in 2016, Duterte has waged a violent war on drugs that has led to widespread extrajudicial killings. A 2020 OHCHR report on human rights in the Philippines stated that the government's focus on countering terrorism and the drug war has resulted in numerous systematic human rights violations, including extrajudicial killings, arbitrary detention, torture of detainees, persistent impunity, and the vilification of dissent. A lack of effective witness protection has been a key obstacle to investigations against members of the security forces.

Authorities stated in July 2019 that 5,526 people had been killed in Duterte's antidrug campaign. However, human rights groups put the number of related deaths between 2017 and 2019 at as many as 27,000, according to the most recently available statistics. The victims include civilians and children who were deliberately targeted. Convictions for extrajudicial killings and other such crimes are rare, and Duterte has appeared to encourage such violence.

In September 2021, a prosecutor of the International Criminal Court (ICC) opened an investigation into the Duterte government's war on drugs to determine whether the campaign of state-sponsored violence constitutes crimes against humanity. In November, the ICC suspended its investigation after the Philippine government requested a deferral.

Conflict in Mindanao has caused severe hardship, more than 120,000 deaths, and the displacement of tens of thousands of people since it erupted in 1972. Both government and rebel forces have committed summary killings and other human rights abuses.

In September 2021, elections to the legislature for the self-governing Bangsamoro Autonomous Region in Muslim Mindanao (BARMM)—created through a 2014 government peace treaty with the Moro Islamic Liberation Front (MILF)—were postponed until 2025 by the Senate. In 2019, the Bangsamoro Transition Authority (BTA) was constituted as the governing body until elections, which were scheduled for 2022. However, militant groups that broke away from the MILF continue to carry out attacks.

In 2018, President Duterte ended peace talks with the Communist Party of the Philippines–New People's Army–National Democratic Front of the Philippines (CPP-NPA–NDFP), dashing hopes that the 50-year violent insurgency could reach a peaceful end during his administration. Deadly clashes between the NPA and the Philippine military continue to occur throughout the country. Pursuant to the Anti-Terrorism Act of 2020, the Anti-Terrorism Council designated the CPP-NPA as terrorist groups that December, allowing the Anti-Money Laundering Council to search for and freeze their assets.

Provisions mandating equal treatment are upheld inconsistently, and some groups lack legal protection. LGBT+ people face bias in employment, education, and other services, as well as societal discrimination. An antidiscrimination bill that passed the lower house in 2017 has not advanced further, though several cities, including Manila in October 2020, have passed ordinances recognizing LGBT+ rights and prohibiting acts of discrimination. In the absence of national legislation, birth identification documents cannot be altered.

In September 2020, Duterte pardoned a US soldier convicted of killing a Filipino transgender woman in 2014, an act the CHR described as “an affront” to LGBT+ Filipinos. During Manila’s pride march in June 2020, 20 LGBT+ people were arrested for violations of public health and public assembly laws. Several LGBT+ people were subjected to humiliating treatment after being arrested in April of that year for violating the COVID-19 curfew.

According to the World Economic Forum, the Philippines features one of the smallest measured gender gaps in the world; women’s educational attainment outpaces men’s, and women are well represented in professional roles. Women still face some credit constraints and employment discrimination, and the political realm remains dominated by men, with women occupying only 23 percent of national and local elective positions.

Indigenous rights are generally upheld, but land disputes and local development projects regularly cause friction and sometimes lead to violence. Indigenous people often live in conflict areas and are targeted by combatants for their perceived loyalties.

The law mandates that at least 1 percent of public jobs be reserved for people with disabilities, but this is poorly upheld.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 10 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 3 / 4

Citizens enjoy freedom of travel and choice of residence, except for in areas affected by violent conflict. Although martial law in Mindanao ended at the start of 2020, the military continued its counterterrorism measures, which included checkpoints and a curfew.

Lockdowns in both 2020 and 2021 to combat the spread of COVID-19 led to the establishment of several hundred checkpoints manned by security forces to limit intercity travel, with additional localized entry and exit restrictions in villages.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 2 / 4

Private business activity is often dependent on the support of local power brokers in the complex patronage system that extends throughout the country. Outside of conflict zones, individuals are generally able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors, notwithstanding the domination and corruption of economic dynasties.

The 2020 coronavirus-related emergency law empowered the president to direct the operations of privately-owned businesses, including medical facilities and businesses in the transportation and hospitality sectors required for quarantine and temporary housing.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 3 / 4

Most individuals enjoy personal social freedoms. However, divorce is illegal in the Philippines, though annulments are allowed under specified circumstances, and Muslims may divorce via Sharia (Islamic law) courts. In 2019, the Supreme Court denied a petition to recognize same-sex marriages, with a petition to reconsider denied in January 2020. Domestic violence is a significant problem, and while spousal rape is a crime, very few cases are prosecuted. Police data showed an increase in reported domestic violence against women and children during the COVID-19 lockdowns. Abortion is illegal in nearly all circumstances, though unregulated abortions are frequent. In December 2021, the Senate passed the Expanded Solo Parents Welfare Act of 2020, which extends the benefits and subsidies given to married parents to single parents.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 2 / 4

The Philippines is a source country for human trafficking, with some Filipinos taken abroad and forced to work in the fishing, shipping, construction, or other industries, or forced to engage in sex work. The country's various insurgent groups have been accused of using child soldiers.

The legal minimum wage in the agricultural sector in some regions falls far short of what is necessary for a family to avoid poverty. Violation of minimum-wage standards is fairly common. There is a wide gap between the salaries of top executives and their employees.

Children have been reported working as domestic laborers. There is a shortage of labor inspectors; authorities have acknowledged the problem but say they have limited funds to address it. The Philippines is a global center of online child sexual abuse, and reports indicated an increase of such abuse during the COVID-19 lockdowns.

Poland

Population: 38,200,000

Capital: Warsaw

Freedom Status: Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Poland's democratic institutions took root at the start of its transition from communist rule in 1989. Rapid economic growth and other societal changes have benefited some segments of the population more than others, contributing to a deep divide between liberal, pro-European parties and those purporting to defend national interests and "traditional" Polish Catholic values. Since taking power in late 2015, a coalition led by the populist, socially conservative Law and Justice (PiS) party has enacted numerous measures that have increased political influence over state institutions and damaged Poland's democratic progress. Recent years have seen an increase in nationalist and discriminatory rhetoric.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- In January, a near-total ban on abortion in Poland took effect, as a result of an October 2020 ruling of the Constitutional Tribunal (TK) declaring that terminations in cases of congenital disorder of the fetus were unconstitutional. Such cases previously represented around 98 percent of legal procedures in the country.
 - In July, the European Court of Justice (ECJ) ordered the immediate suspension of Poland's Disciplinary Chamber of the Supreme Court, citing concerns about the potential for political interference by both the legislature and executive in its functioning. In October, the ECJ imposed a daily fine of one million euros until Poland fully complies with the suspension.
 - In October, the TK ruled that parts of European Union (EU) law are incompatible with Poland's constitution, and that national law must take precedence. The European Commission responded in December, launching an infringement procedure against Poland for alleged violation of EU law.
 - In August, a political and humanitarian crisis began along the Poland-Belarus border, after Belarusian authorities had coaxed migrants to the Belarusian border and stranded them there, and many then attempted to enter Poland. In response, the Polish government declared a state of emergency in two border provinces in September, and in October, authorized border guards to forcibly expel migrants, in violation of international law.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 34 / 40A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 10 / 12*A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 3 / 4

The president of Poland is directly elected for up to two five-year terms. The president's appointment of a prime minister must be confirmed by the Sejm, the lower house of the parliament. While the prime minister holds most executive power, the president also has some influence, particularly over defense and foreign policy matters.

Andrzej Duda, the candidate of the national-conservative PiS party, was reelected in July 2020 in the second round of Poland's presidential election with 51 percent of the vote. Voter turnout was 68.1 percent, the second highest since 1989.

The election was originally scheduled for May 2020. In April, amid political conflict over whether to hold voting during the COVID-19 pandemic, the government drafted plans to hold the vote as scheduled in May, but with mail-in ballots, transferring the election's administration to the post office instead of the constitutionally legitimate National Electoral Commission (PKW). Ultimately, the government backtracked on these plans, and a new election was called in June, with a runoff a month later.

Observers noted that the government had failed to meet its constitutional obligations by abandoning the May vote without any formal procedure, and in September 2020, an administrative court ruled that the prime minister had broken the law in attempting to transfer the election administration to the post office. In May 2021, the country's Supreme Audit Office (NIK) blamed high-ranking officials for seeking to organize the mail-in vote without a legal basis and at a cost of almost $20 million to taxpayers. The government has repeatedly defended the legality of its actions.

Election observers from the Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE) concluded that the 2020 election was competitive and well-organized, but tarnished by "hostility" and "biased coverage by the public broadcaster," which PiS had effectively transformed into a government mouthpiece. The OSCE mission noted the insufficiency of regulations governing public officials' campaign activities, with the incumbent receiving an "undue advantage" from campaigning by high-ranking officials, including the prime minister. Further, the OSCE observers raised concerns over the persistent use of homophobic rhetoric by President Duda, his team, and PiS media allies.

The current prime minister, Mateusz Morawiecki, was appointed in 2017 with the approval of the PiS majority in the parliament. His mandate was bolstered by PiS's victory in the 2019 legislative elections.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

Members of the bicameral parliament are elected for four-year terms. The 460-seat Sejm, the lower house, is elected by proportional representation and holds most legislative authority. The 100 members of the Senate, the upper house, are elected in single-member constituencies. The Senate can delay and amend legislation, but has few other powers.

In the October 2019 parliamentary elections, PiS won a second term with 43.6 percent of the vote, retaining its 235 seats in the Sejm. This majority initially allowed PiS to continue governing without formal coalition partners, though two smaller parties, United Poland and Agreement, were included within its electoral lists and parliamentary caucus. In August 2021, Jarosław Gowin, the leader of Agreement, left the ruling camp with a number of lawmakers. The coalition continued to pass legislation throughout 2021 by making deals with smaller parties and individual members of parliament.

The Civic Platform (PO) party finished second in 2019, with 134 seats. Four other parties or coalitions passed the threshold to enter parliament, including left-wing and far-right parties that had been absent during the previous term. PiS, however, narrowly lost control of the Senate in 2019, where an opposition coalition took 51 of 100 seats; PiS took 48.

An OSCE mission concluded that the 2019 elections were generally conducted in a “professional and transparent” manner. However, they expressed concern that recent judicial reforms had left a “lack of trust in prosecutors and courts to handle election-related complaints independently.” They also noted that “nationalist and homophobic rhetoric gave rise to a sense of threat,” which they echoed in their report on the 2020 presidential election.

In December 2021, a research team at the University of Toronto reported that a mobile phone belonging to a Polish opposition politician had been hacked with Pegasus spyware in the period leading up to the 2019 parliamentary elections. At the time, the MP was the head of the election campaign team for PO. Text messages stolen from his phone were used in negative reports about him on PiS-controlled public TV news during the campaign. Phones of an opposition-linked lawyer and a prosecutor critical of the government’s judicial reforms were also hacked. Though opposition figures blamed the PiS for the incident, the government denied using surveillance for political purposes.

Poland’s electoral framework and its implementation have generally ensured free and fair elections, though legal changes introduced in 2017–18 have increased the potential for political influence over the PKW, which manages elections and oversees party finances, including the power to withhold state subsidies. Previously, all nine members of the PKW were nominated by courts. From the beginning of the new parliamentary term in December 2019, seven members are now chosen by the parliament. As the largest parliamentary grouping, PiS was allowed to nominate a maximum of three members but could also exert influence over the member picked by the Constitutional Tribunal (TK), which is currently led by PiS-installed judges. The new commission was formally approved by President Duda in January 2020.

One of the judicial reforms that came into force in 2018 gave the newly created chamber of the Supreme Court—the Chamber of Extraordinary Control and Public Affairs, whose members are appointed by the now-politicized National Council of the Judiciary (KRS)—the authority to validate or reject election and referendum results. The chamber’s substantial power, along with its vulnerability to politicization, further threaten the integrity of electoral oversight.

In 2020, PiS undermined the authority of the PKW by ordering the postal service to administer a mail-in vote without passing proper legislation. The head of the PKW and international democracy watchdogs said such a vote—which was ultimately abandoned—would have been neither fully free nor fair.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 16 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 4 / 4

Poland’s political parties organize and operate freely. While the party system has been dominated by PiS and the centrist PO for the better part of two decades, challengers have risen and fallen. The latest of these, Poland 2050, a new party founded by the defeated presidential candidate Szymon Hołownia in 2020, surged in the polls to become the largest opposition force between April and July 2021.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 4 / 4

There have been multiple rotations of power among rival parties since the transition from communist rule. However, the opposition faces obstacles including propaganda by PiS-controlled public media and legal changes related to electoral administration.

The PiS victory in the 2015 elections ended two terms of governance by PO, now in opposition. In 2019, PiS won a slim majority in the Sejm but lost control of the Senate. The Democratic Left Alliance (SLD) returned to the parliament, while four new parties entered for the first time.

The 2020 presidential campaign of pro-European Union (EU) Warsaw mayor Rafał Trzaskowski was one of the most significant challenges to PiS's grip on power since 2015. The presidential vote ended with the narrowest margin of victory for the incumbent since 1989.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 4 / 4

Voters and politicians are generally free from undue interference by outside groups, though there are some concerns that personnel changes associated with the PiS government's assertion of control over various state institutions could be exploited to mobilize political support among public employees ahead of future local and national elections.

Powerful priest Tadeusz Rydzyk, an ally of PiS, uses his media outlets to support the government's message, and has received generous state grants for organizations under his control.

Women have equal political rights and hold 28 percent of the seats in the Sejm; however, the number of government ministries was reduced from 20 to 14 in September 2020, leaving just one woman in the new cabinet.

Ethnic, religious, and other minority groups enjoy full political rights and electoral opportunities. However, LGBT+ people face significant challenges to entering politics and seeing their interests represented in Polish politics in practice. Homophobic rhetoric by government figures, including President Duda, is common; PiS and its media allies have frequently used homophobic rhetoric warning of the alleged dangers of LGBT+ rights. Despite such challenges, in 2020, Robert Biedroń, an openly gay member of the European Parliament, was nominated as a presidential candidate by an alliance of three left-wing parties.

Electoral lists representing recognized national minorities are not subject to the minimum vote threshold for parliamentary representation.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 8 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 3 / 4

Freely elected officials generally determine and implement laws and policies without interference, though PiS chair Jarosław Kaczyński—who was appointed deputy prime minister in September 2020, and had previously played a dominant role in the government despite not holding any official executive position—retains significant influence on government affairs. Throughout its time in power, PiS has sought to limit parliamentary scrutiny of legislation through various means, such as making use of private-members bills that require no consultation or impact assessments; introducing legislation unexpectedly at the last minute, sometimes in the middle of the night; and limiting opportunities for the opposition to question or amend legislation.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 3 / 4

PiS came to power promising to clean up corruption, cronyism, and nepotism. Cronyism, a problem under all previous Polish governments, is widespread under PiS, as it has altered, lowered, or removed many criteria for staffing of public institutions, allowing for appointments based on party loyalty and personal connections. In July 2021, PiS adopted a resolution prohibiting family members of politicians from taking jobs in state-owned companies. The resolution, however, does not apply retroactively and includes major exemptions.

In past years, the NIK, a state watchdog, has raised concerns about the misuse of public funds by PiS and its coalition partners. However, since the PiS-appointed chair of NIK took office in 2019, he has been investigated for possible irregularities in his property declarations and links to a criminal group. He has called the allegations a “smear campaign” and rejected the prime minister’s call for his resignation.

In July 2021, the NIK called for an investigation into the justice ministry for allegedly improperly dispensing hundreds of millions of zloty meant for victims of crime, including to political allies. In response, the justice minister is seeking to strip the NIK head of immunity from prosecution.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 2 / 4

The right to public information is guaranteed by the constitution and by the 2001 Act on Access to Public Information, but obtaining records and data from public institutions can be slow and difficult.

The current government avoids consulting outside experts or civil society organizations on policy ideas and tends to introduce and pass legislation rapidly, with little opportunity for debate or amendment.

In 2021, the government faced a string of scandals when official correspondence was leaked from private email accounts; the government has blamed the leak on Kremlin-backed Russian hackers, and claims that some of the emails are not authentic, but part of a Russian disinformation campaign.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 48 / 60 (-1)D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 13 / 16*D1. Are there free and independent media? 3 / 4

The constitution guarantees freedom of expression and forbids censorship, though libel laws have been used to harass journalists. Since 2015, nearly 200 lawsuits against independent media outlets and journalists have been filed by politicians and government-affiliated entities.

Public media and their governing bodies have been purged of independent or dissenting voices since PiS came to power in 2015. TVP, the state broadcaster, promotes government messages and often seeks to discredit the opposition, in flagrant breach of statutory obligations to present news in a “reliable and pluralistic manner.” In June 2021, an international study found that TVP is the least trusted of Poland’s most prominent news sources. TVP also depicts voices critical of the government, including NGOs and judges, as agents of the opposition or foreign forces. The broadcaster’s electoral coverage in 2020 was marked by “xenophobic, homophobic and antisemitic” rhetoric, according to the OSCE’s observers.

Since 2015, the government has regularly used state-run companies to exert control over local media. In December 2020, oil giant PKN Orlen bought the previously German-owned Polska Press, a media organization that publishes 20 regional daily newspapers, 120 regional weekly newspapers, and 500 online portals. While the company has pledged to safeguard editorial independence, more than a dozen editors-in-chief had quit or been dismissed by July 2021.

PiS leadership also promised to pass a law “deconcentrating” and “repolonizing” private media by reducing foreign ownership, a move that would disproportionately affect the outlets that most vigorously hold the current government to account. In August 2021, the Sejm passed a bill preventing companies registered outside the European Economic Area (EEA) from majority ownership of Polish media companies. While officials say tightening ownership rules would prevent states like China and Russia from influencing media, opposition figures have accused the government of seeking to silence the US-owned TVN, a prominent critic of PiS and the country’s largest private broadcaster. The bill was rejected by the Senate in September, but passed again by the Sejm in December, before being vetoed by Duda later that month.

Since 2015, state-controlled companies have also shifted their advertising to private media outlets that support the PiS government. More critical outlets have suffered a corresponding drop in advertising revenue, as well as a sharp decline in subscriptions from government ministries. In February 2021, the government proposed a new tax on media advertising revenue, which independent media organizations claimed would threaten media freedom; following widespread protests, including an unprecedented 24-hour media black-out, the government agreed to rewrite its proposal.

In September 2021, the government declared a state of emergency barring journalists from visiting two provinces on the border with Belarus amid a surge of illegal migrant crossings. Critics say the measure is designed to limit media scrutiny of official conduct in the area.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 4 / 4

The state respects freedom of religion. The PiS government is aligned with the Roman Catholic Church, which wields significant influence in the country. Religious groups are not required to register with the authorities but receive tax benefits if they do. Minority faiths are generally able to obtain registration in practice. There is a formal ban on state funding for church construction, but, in practice, a church can obtain Culture Ministry funding if it includes a museum.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 3 / 4

The ruling party has sought to discredit academics who challenge its preferred historical narrative, particularly with regard to the events of World War II. However, the right to pursue academic research has been upheld by courts.

In February 2021, a Warsaw district court ordered two Holocaust scholars to apologize to a woman who claimed they defamed her uncle in their book on wartime Poland; the book contained the testimony of a Holocaust survivor who accused the woman’s uncle—the mayor of a small Polish town during World War II—of collaboration with the Nazis. The case triggered international concern over the use of the judicial system to restrict academic freedom. An appeals court overturned the ruling in August, citing the importance of freedom in scholarly research and condemning the use of litigation to interfere with academic work.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 3 / 4

People are generally free to engage in private discussions on political and other matters without fear of harassment or detention by the authorities. However, Poland has harsh insult laws, including against offending religious feelings and insulting the president, which have been increasingly used to pursue criminal cases in recent years.

In March 2021, a popular Polish writer, Jakub Żulczyk, was charged with insulting the president on social media, for which he could face up to three years in prison; his trial began in November. Earlier that year, a Polish musician was convicted of blasphemy for posting a photo of a foot stepping on an image of the Virgin Mary. A Warsaw court ordered him to pay a fine, but he contested the judgment, and the case was dismissed in September.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 10 / 12E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 3 / 4

Freedom of assembly is generally respected in law and in practice. Public demonstrations are held with some regularity, though local authorities can limit demonstrations in their districts on grounds of maintaining public order.

Greater numbers of LGBT+ pride parades have taken place in Poland in recent years, with many staged in smaller and eastern cities for the first time. Authorities attempted to obstruct these events, including on grounds of safety, but in each case courts prevented authorities from stopping the organizers, arguing that freedom of assembly cannot be denied on the basis of potential violence by opponents.

Although NGOs have generally operated without government interference in Poland, public media and top government officials began systematically undermining the credibility of rights and governance-related groups in 2016, accusing many of lacking financial transparency and pursuing an opposition-led political agenda. A 2017 law centralized distribution of public NGO funding through a new body, the National Freedom Institute, which is indirectly attached to the prime minister's office. As anticipated, when the National Freedom Institute distributed funds in 2019, the money went disproportionately to organizations that fit the government's ideological profile.

In September 2021, the government imposed a state of emergency on the border with Belarus in response to repeated attempts by thousands of migrants, mostly from the Middle East, to enter Poland illegally. This decision barred NGOs from entering the area; international human rights organizations have criticized Polish authorities for refusing to allow NGOs to provide humanitarian aid to migrants stranded along the border or to monitor the conduct of border guards and police.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 4 / 4

Poland has a robust labor movement, though certain groups—including the self-employed, private contractors, and those in essential services—cannot join unions. Complicated legal procedures hinder workers' ability to strike.

F. RULE OF LAW: 10 / 16 (-1)F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 1 / 4

Since taking power in 2015, the PiS government has moved aggressively to assert control over the judiciary, passing legislation designed to curb the powers of the TK and to install progovernment judges on its benches. In a May 2021 ruling, the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR) found that the TK is not a “tribunal established by law,” because at least one of its judges was illegitimately appointed.

In 2017, three significant judicial reforms were adopted. The first gave the justice minister the power to appoint and dismiss presidents and deputy presidents of courts. The second, which came into force in 2018, mandated that 15 of the 25 members of the KRS, which is responsible for nominating judges, be appointed by the parliament instead of elected by the judiciary. In July 2018, new, lower retirement ages for the Supreme Court came into force, effectively meaning that 27 out of 73 judges had to step down unless they were given the president’s approval to remain. These judges were reinstated later that year after an infringement procedure from the European Commission and an interim ruling of the European Court of Justice (ECJ), which later confirmed that the measures had breached European law. The Supreme Court law also created powerful new chambers—the Chamber of Extraordinary Control and Public Affairs (responsible for declaring the validity of elections), and the Disciplinary Chamber.

In 2019 and 2020, the European Commission launched infringement procedures alleging that the Disciplinary Chamber undermined the independence of judges. In July 2021, the ECJ ordered that the activities of the Disciplinary Chamber be suspended, expanding the scope of an earlier judgment, which, according to critics, the Polish government had ignored. The ECJ’s July 2021 ruling stated that the Chamber lacked independence from the legislature and executive, and that measures needed to be taken immediately to rectify the situation. The same day, the TK ruled that the interim measures imposed by the ECJ conflict with Poland’s constitution, potentially opening the way for the government to ignore the ECJ’s rulings on the Disciplinary Chamber. In October 2021, the ECJ imposed a daily penalty of one million euros on Poland until the measures required by the Court’s order are fully implemented.

The same month, in response to a motion from Poland’s prime minister, the TK ruled that some parts of EU law are incompatible with Poland’s Constitution, which would have primacy in such cases. The European Commission responded by launching another infringement procedure, arguing that the TK’s July and October rulings had violated EU law. The Commission also expressed “serious doubts on the independence and impartiality” of the TK itself.

Since 2018, several European courts have rejected Polish arrest warrants and extradition requests, citing concerns about the independence of Polish courts. In September 2020, a Dutch court ruled that the Netherlands would suspend all extraditions to Poland until the Court of Justice of the EU (CJEU) responds to its concerns about the ability of the Polish judiciary to ensure fair trials for all defendants.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 3 / 4

Defendants generally enjoy due process protections in Poland, though the law allows for extended pretrial detention, and there is a large backlog of cases. The decision by the PiS government to merge the roles of justice minister and prosecutor general “creates potential for misuses and political manipulation” of the justice system, according to the Venice Commission. The use of pretrial detention has significantly increased since the PiS came to power.

Legislation introduced in 2016 gave law enforcement agencies broad authority to monitor citizens’ communications activity, including the ability to access metadata without a court order, monitor the movements of foreign citizens without prior court approval, and hold terrorism suspects without charge for up to two weeks. It also contained ambiguous provisions on collecting individuals’ data, arresting civilians, prohibiting demonstrations, and blocking internet access.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 4 / 4

Civilians are largely free from extralegal violence, though some incidents of abuse by police have been alleged in the context of antigovernment demonstrations. Human rights groups have reported inadequate medical care in prison facilities.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 2 / 4 (-1)

Women and ethnic minority groups generally enjoy equality before the law. LGBT+ people continue to face discrimination. Public support for LGBT+ rights, including same-sex civil partnerships, has risen in recent years. However, 2019 and 2020 saw major setbacks, as an intense anti-LGBT+ campaign led by PiS and parts of the church stoked fears of an “imported LGBT ideology.” By the end of 2020, more than 100 local governments had declared themselves “LGBT-ideology-free” zones or established “family charters,” in resolutions without specific legal implications that were described by domestic and international rights groups as “manifestations of hate” toward LGBT+ people. However, in 2021, the Polish government asked local authorities to repeal their anti-LGBT+ resolutions after the EU threatened to withdraw millions of euros in funding from towns that had adopted such declarations.

Because Poland’s law against inciting hatred does not cover crimes motivated by sexuality or gender identity, public figures have been free to make slurs that would be prosecuted if targeted at other marginalized groups.

In October 2021, the parliament authorized border guards to forcibly expel migrants who had crossed into the country illegally. This law was passed in response to the political and humanitarian crisis taking place along the Polish-Belarusian border, where Belarusian security forces were stranding migrants who then illegally crossed the border into Poland. The situation, apparently engineered by Belarusian President Alyaksandr Lukashenka, has trapped thousands of migrants between the two countries; approximately 20 migrants are believed to have died in the border zone in 2021. Human rights organizations, including the UN, have been denied access to the border zone, and have accused Polish authorities of putting migrants’ wellbeing and lives at risk with this policy of “illegal pushbacks.” In December, the European Commission proposed measures to allow for temporary extended asylum claim processes and expedited deportations.

Score Change: The score declined from 3 to 2 due to unlawful, violent pushbacks of migrants at the Belarusian border; and other mistreatment of migrants by border guards.¹⁸

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 14 / 16G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

People in Poland typically enjoy freedom of travel and choice of residence, employment, and institution of higher education.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 4 / 4

Citizens have the right to own property and establish private businesses. However, a 2016 law imposed onerous restrictions on sale and ownership of agricultural land, ostensibly to protect small-scale farmers. State and religious institutions are not bound by the new restrictions.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 3 / 4

Under Polish law, abortion is permissible through the 12th week of pregnancy if a woman's health or life is in danger or if the pregnancy is a result of a criminal act such as rape. In October 2020, the TK ruled that abortion in cases where the fetus has a congenital disorder is unconstitutional, effectively restricting legal abortion to cases involving rape, incest, or danger to the life or health of the mother. In response to the ruling, mass protests with hundreds of thousands of participants took place in Warsaw and other Polish cities. Despite delays in late 2020, the ruling went into effect in January 2021. UN human rights experts said the ruling violates Poland's human rights obligations, and has "effectively slammed the door shut" on legal and safe abortions in the country.

Since 2017, contraceptive pills have been available by prescription only, making Poland one of only two EU countries in which such a restriction is in place. A report by the NIK found that in many, especially rural, parts of Poland, gynecologists are rare. Many women must travel to obtain care, and reliable and timely access to contraception and other sexual-health services is limited.

Same-sex civil partnerships and marriages are not permitted, and same-sex couples are not legally allowed to adopt. The constitution places "marriage, as a union of a man and a woman," under the "care and protection" of the state. In August 2021, the leader of PO, Donald Tusk, pledged to introduce same-sex unions as one of his first acts if his party wins elections.

Since 2020, Poland's ministers have debated withdrawing from the Istanbul Convention, a treaty to combat domestic violence and violence against women, on grounds of its alleged promotion of "LGBT and gender ideology." In a September 2021 report, the Council of Europe praised several initiatives introduced by the Polish government to combat domestic violence, including a law passed in March 2020 mandating the immediate separation of perpetrators of domestic violence from their victims. The report further states that more progress must be made, specifically on changing the definition of rape to include all non-consensual sexual acts.

The law provides meaningful protections against abusive working conditions and child labor, especially in the formal sector. The authorities work to combat human trafficking, but women and children are still subjected to trafficking for sexual exploitation and foreign migrant workers are vulnerable to conditions amounting to forced labor.

State-owned entities have been expanding their already considerable presence in various sectors, such as banking, often by buying out foreign owners, as the government effectively renationalizes parts of the economy. Hiring for senior positions at such firms is often based on political loyalty or connections rather than merit, a longstanding issue under various governments that has grown more widespread under the current administration.

Portugal

Population: 10,300,000

Capital: Lisbon

Freedom Status: Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Portugal is a stable parliamentary democracy with a multiparty political system and regular transfers of power between rival parties. Civil liberties are generally protected. Ongoing concerns include corruption, certain legal constraints on journalism, poor or abusive conditions for prisoners, and the effects of racial discrimination and xenophobia. Prosecutors have pursued corruption cases against top officials in recent years.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- A new wave of the COVID-19 pandemic affected Portugal severely at the beginning of the year, leading officials to impose another lockdown, but restrictions were subsequently eased as a well-organized vaccination campaign reduced the severity of the health crisis.
- President Marcelo Rebelo de Sousa was reelected in January, easily defeating six challengers. Due to the pandemic, voter turnout was unusually low.
- An audit revealed in June that authorities in the capital had for years illegally shared protesters' personal information with the foreign governments they were demonstrating against.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 39 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 12 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

In Portugal's parliamentary system, the prime minister holds the most executive power, though the directly elected president can delay legislation through a veto and dissolve the parliament to trigger early elections. The president serves up to two five-year terms.

In January 2021, President Marcelo Rebelo de Sousa, supported by two center-right parties, won reelection with 61 percent of the vote. Socialist Party (PS) candidate Ana Gomes placed second with 13 percent, and far-right ultranationalist candidate André Ventura secured 12 percent, with four others capturing the remainder. Due to the COVID-19 pandemic, only about 39 percent of eligible voters participated.

António Costa of the PS has served as prime minister since 2015 and was reappointed in 2019, after his party won that year's parliamentary elections. In November 2021, the parliament rejected the government's budget bill, prompting the president to schedule general elections for January 2022.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The 230 members of the unicameral Assembly of the Republic are directly elected every four years using a system of proportional representation in 22 multimember constituencies.

In the 2019 legislative elections, the governing PS came in first with 106 seats, up from 86 in the previous parliament. The center-right opposition Social Democratic Party (PSD) placed second with 77 seats. The Left Bloc (BE) took 19 seats, the leftist and green Unitary Democratic Coalition secured 12, the conservative People's Party won 5, and the People-Animals-Nature (PAN) party took 4. Three new parties—Liberal Initiative, the far-right nationalist Chega, and the leftist and green Livre—entered the parliament with one seat each.

In September 2021, Portugal held municipal council elections, with voter turnout of about 54 percent. The PS won in 147 out of 308 municipalities, but they lost control over the capital, where the PSD entered government after 14 years of PS rule. The PSD took 72 municipalities overall, while the People's Party led in 34. Chega secured just 4.2 percent of the vote and no municipalities.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 4 / 4

Elections in Portugal are generally free and fair. The National Elections Commission oversees the process. An Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE) monitoring report issued after the 2021 presidential election called for further improvements to Portugal's legal framework, including shorter deadlines for reporting on campaign finances and the decriminalization of defamation.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 16 / 16B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 4 / 4

Political parties operate and compete with equal opportunity. There is no legal vote threshold for representation in the parliament, meaning smaller parties can win a seat with little more than 1 percent of the overall vote. Parties espousing racist, fascist, or regionalist ideologies are constitutionally prohibited.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 4 / 4

Portugal has established a strong record of peaceful and regular power transfers between rival parties since it returned to democracy in the late 1970s. Opposition parties maintain a sizable presence in the parliament and govern important municipalities, including the capital as of 2021.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 4 / 4

Both voters and politicians are free from undue interference by forces outside the political system.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 4 / 4

Women and members of ethnic, religious, and other minority groups enjoy full political rights and participate in the political process. Women held 38 percent of the seats in parliament as of 2021, and three of them were of African descent—although these women continued to face racist, xenophobic abuse, including by André Ventura, a lawmaker and founder of the Chega party. During the September 2021 local elections, Beatriz Gomes Dias, a woman of African descent who headed the Left Bloc's candidate list for the Lisbon city council, faced racist harassment on social media.

The autonomous regions of the Azores and Madeira—two island groups in the Atlantic—have their own political structures with legislative and executive powers.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 11 / 12C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 4 / 4

Elected officials are free to determine and implement laws and policies without improper interference by unelected groups.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 3 / 4

The country has struggled in recent years with major corruption scandals involving high-ranking politicians, officials, and businesspeople, though many individuals have been and are being duly prosecuted. In April 2021, it was announced that former prime minister José Sócrates would be tried on charges of money laundering and falsifying documents, but would not stand trial for other initial charges related to corruption. He had originally been arrested in 2014 on charges of corruption, tax evasion, and money laundering.

In 2020, the European Commission published a report that highlighted deficiencies in Portugal's efforts to combat corruption. While several laws to enhance accountability and transparency for elected officials were approved in 2019, enforcement and effectiveness remained unproven, and resources for auditors, police, and prosecutors were inadequate. Whistleblower protections are in place, but controversy surrounded the case of Rui Pinto, a hacker-turned-whistleblower who leaked troves of documents related to the business activities of European soccer clubs. His trial on dozens of charges began in September 2020 and continued in 2021.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 4 / 4

Portuguese law provides for public access to government information and judicial proceedings, and state agencies generally respect this right. In 2020, after the government resisted civil society groups' requests for information about its investment visa program, the courts compelled the release of detailed data. The government published all of its contracts related to the COVID-19 pandemic online, along with an overview of its procurements.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 56 / 60 (-1)D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 16 / 16*D1. Are there free and independent media? 4 / 4

Freedom of the press is constitutionally guaranteed. Public broadcasting channels are poorly funded and face strong competition from commercial television outlets, which provide a wide range of viewpoints, although this pluralism is threatened by ownership concentration. Internet access is not restricted. According to a 2021 report by the European University Institute's Centre for Media Pluralism and Media Freedom, the pandemic has worsened the precarious working conditions of journalists, who also occasionally face intimidation in the course of their reporting. In January 2021, journalists covering the presidential campaign of the Chega party were threatened and insulted by party supporters.

Defamation remains a criminal offense, and although prosecutions are uncommon, the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR) has repeatedly ruled against Portuguese authorities for their handling of both civil and criminal defamation cases against journalists. In July 2021, the ECtHR found that a €145,000 ($170,000) fine imposed on a Portuguese media company for its reporting errors was excessive. The broadcaster had mistakenly linked a politician to a child sex abuse case.

A January 2021 report revealed that in 2018, a prosecutor had ordered the police—without the approval of a court or judge—to follow four journalists in an attempt to discover their sources for reporting on a corruption scandal. The journalists' bank accounts and telephone messages were also monitored.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 4 / 4

Portugal is overwhelmingly Roman Catholic, but the constitution guarantees freedom of religion and forbids religious discrimination. The Religious Freedom Act provides benefits for religions that have been established in the country for at least 30 years or recognized internationally for at least 60 years. However, other groups are free to register as religious corporations and receive benefits such as tax-exempt status, or to practice their faith without registering.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

Academic freedom is respected. Schools and universities operate without undue political or other interference.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 4 / 4

There are no significant restrictions on private discussion or the expression of personal views, although defamation laws affect ordinary citizens and politicians.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 11 / 12 (-1)

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 3 / 4 (-1)

Freedom of assembly is upheld by the authorities, and demonstrations are common in practice. In July 2021, protesters turned out in Lisbon and Porto to denounce COVID-19 containment measures, including digital vaccine certificates and masking requirements.

In June, municipal authorities in Lisbon apologized for passing information to the Russian government about organizers of a January demonstration outside the Russian embassy in support of Russian opposition figure Aleksey Navalny. A week later, an audit of city government procedures showed that authorities in the capital had engaged in similar behavior for years, sharing personal information, including names and addresses, on the organizers of 182 protests with the relevant foreign embassies since 2012. Of those cases, 52 had occurred since the data transfers became illegal under European Union rules in 2018.

Score Change: The score declined from 4 to 3 due to the revelation of a long-standing practice whereby Lisbon authorities had illegally provided the personal data of protesters to the embassies of governments they had demonstrated against.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 4 / 4

Freedom of association is respected. National and international nongovernmental organizations (NGOs), including human rights groups, generally operate without interference. Civil society organizations whose work is focused on issues like racism or the rights of women and LGBT+ people have encountered harassment and threats from far-right groups in recent years.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 4 / 4

Workers enjoy the right to organize, bargain collectively, and strike, though there are some limits on the right to strike in a wide range of sectors and industries that are deemed essential.

A temporary state of emergency imposed in 2020 to curb the spread of COVID-19 included a suspension of the right to strike for essential workers. The number of labor actions rebounded in 2021, however, with strikes to demand better working conditions taking place at airports, in the railway system, and among police officers.

F. RULE OF LAW: 14 / 16F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 4 / 4

The judiciary is generally independent, though the Council of Europe (CoE) stated in a 2019 report that Portugal's efforts to fight corruption among judges and prosecutors were unsatisfactory.

In 2020, the government's decision not to renew the term of the president of the Court of Auditors drew attention to ambiguities in the law that could allow political factors to influence the appointment process.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 4 / 4

The authorities generally observe legal safeguards against arbitrary arrest and detention, though court backlogs result in lengthy pretrial detention for some defendants. Due process rights are guaranteed during trial.

Controversy surrounding the government's July 2020 appointment of José Guerra to the European Public Prosecutor's Office (EPPO) continued into 2021. Guerra had been supported by Portugal's High Council of Public Prosecutors, but a European committee of experts preferred another candidate for the post. Critics of the appointment alleged that it was politically motivated, noting that the government had included false information in its submission on Guerra's qualifications.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 3 / 4

Human rights groups and the CoE have expressed concern over abuse of detainees and excessive use of force by police, particularly against members of racial and ethnic minorities. Overcrowding in prisons remains a problem, as do poor health and safety conditions.

In 2020, border police at the Lisbon airport's detention center used batons to beat a Ukrainian citizen who was awaiting deportation after arriving without a visa; the man then died of his injuries while in custody. In May 2021, three border guards were found guilty of the murder and sentenced to between seven and nine years in prison.

Equal treatment under the law is guaranteed by the constitution. Various laws prohibit discrimination based on factors including sex, race, disability, gender identity, and sexual orientation. Nevertheless, problems persist with respect to gender bias—including in employment and compensation—and discrimination against members of minority groups, particularly Roma and people of African descent.

Racism and racist violence have become more prominent issues in the public discourse, due in part to growing support for far-right groups. In June 2021, the White suspect accused in the high-profile killing of a Black man in Lisbon in 2020 was sentenced to 22 years and nine months in prison; the assailant had reportedly used racist insults during the attack. Among other obstacles, Black residents are subject to disparities in housing, education, and employment. A 2019 study from the European Network Against Racism (ENAR) found "deeply rooted institutional" discrimination at every stage of the judicial process, from reporting through sentencing. In January 2021, the commander of a special police unit suspended a superintendent who had denounced racism inside the police force.

Discrimination against Roma remains common and rarely punished. Living conditions in Romany communities are generally poor, Romany children face segregation and poor educational outcomes in schools, and Romany adults experience high rates of unemployment.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 15 / 16G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

Freedom of movement and associated rights are protected in law and by the constitution, and the government respects these rights in practice.

In early 2021, the authorities imposed new lockdowns, curfews, and other restrictions on movement to combat a surge in cases of COVID-19. The measures were eased over the course of the year as the rate of vaccinations increased and helped to curb the severity of the public health crisis. A municipality in southern Portugal was accused in January of imposing discriminatory lockdown measures on a Romany neighborhood; after facing public criticism, municipal officials met with civil society groups to discuss the issue and develop more inclusive policies.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 4 / 4

The government does not interfere with the rights to own property, establish private businesses, and engage in commercial activity.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 4 / 4

There are no major restrictions on personal social freedoms. Portugal legalized same-sex marriage in 2010 and extended adoption rights to same-sex couples in 2015. A 2018 law eliminated the need for transgender people to obtain a medical certificate to formally change their gender or first name. Domestic violence remains a problem despite government efforts aimed at prevention, education, and victim protection.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 3 / 4

The authorities generally enforce legal safeguards against exploitative working conditions. However, Portugal remains a destination and transit point for victims of human trafficking, particularly from Eastern Europe, Asia, and West Africa. Although forced labor is prohibited by law, there have been some reports of the practice, especially in the agriculture, hospitality, domestic service, and construction sectors. Immigrant workers are especially vulnerable to economic exploitation.

The economic disruption caused by the COVID-19 pandemic disproportionately affected immigrant workers, and the temporary closure of schools for public health reasons was especially harmful to children in rural areas who lacked internet access.

Qatar

Population: 2,900,000

Capital: Doha

Freedom Status: Not Free

Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: Qatar's hereditary emir holds all executive and legislative authority and ultimately controls the judiciary. Political parties are not permitted, and the only elections are for an advisory municipal council. While Qatari citizens are among the wealthiest in the world, most of the population consists of noncitizens with no political rights, few civil liberties, and limited access to economic opportunity.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- In October, the first election for 30 of the 45 seats on the Advisory Council (Majlis al-Shura) were held. Though official turnout was 63.5 percent, in July the emir had signed a law restricting the voter franchise to “native” Qataris, whose families had settled in Qatar before 1930. The number of citizens denied voting rights due to the law is unclear.
- In February, a report from The Guardian estimated that more than 6,500 migrant worker deaths had been recorded in the 10 years since Qatar was awarded World Cup hosting rights. Three Norwegian journalists investigating migrant worker conditions in Qatar were arrested and briefly detained by the authorities in November.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 7 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 2 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

The emir appoints the prime minister and cabinet and selects an heir-apparent after consulting with the ruling family and other notables. In 2013, Sheikh Hamad bin Khalifa al-Thani abdicated as emir, handing power to his fourth-born son, Sheikh Tamim bin Hamad al-Thani. In January 2020, Sheikh Khalid bin Khalifa al-Thani succeeded Sheikh Abdullah bin Nasser al-Thani, a fellow member of the ruling family, as both prime minister and interior minister.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 1 / 4

The 2003 constitution stipulates that 30 of the 45 seats on the Advisory Council should be filled through elections every four years, with the emir appointing the other 15 members. After years of delay, the emir announced in November 2020 that elections for two-thirds of the body’s seats would take place in October 2021. Though official turnout for the election was 63.5 percent, in July 2021 Tamim signed a law restricting the voter franchise to “native” Qataris, whose families had settled in Qatar before 1930. The number of citizens denied voting rights due to the law is unclear. After public outcry and some small-scale protests, Emir Tamim supported amending the law to include all citizens for future votes.

Nonpartisan elections have been held since 1999 for the 29-member Central Municipal Council, a body designed to advise the minister for municipal affairs. Members serve four-year terms. Turnout for the April 2019 Central Municipal Council elections fell to 50.1 percent of registered voters.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 1 / 4

Electoral laws currently in force cover the Central Municipal Council and Advisory Council elections. Qatari citizens over the age of 18 who can demonstrate that their male ancestors were settled in Qatar prior to 1930 are eligible to vote, except those in the military or working for the Interior Ministry.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 2 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 0 / 4

The government does not permit the existence of political parties or other political groupings. All candidates for elections run as independents.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 0 / 4

The ruling family maintains a monopoly on political power, and the system excludes the possibility of a change in government through elections. Dissident members of the Qatari ruling family living abroad have at times advocated for political change in Qatar, though they have no organized public support.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 1 / 4

Public participation in the political arena is extremely limited. Voters and candidates who do take part in the municipal and Advisory Council elections are often influenced by tribal and family ties.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 1 / 4

Up to 90 percent of Qatar's population is composed of noncitizens, including expatriates and migrant workers as well as some stateless residents, who have no political rights or electoral opportunities. Citizenship is inherited exclusively from a Qatari father; residents can apply for citizenship after 25 years in the country, but this is rarely granted. The July 2021 changes to the electoral law distinguished between "native" Qataris, whose family settled in Qatar before 1930, and naturalized citizens, who are unable to vote. In late October, Emir Tamim instructed the cabinet to amend the law to promote "equal citizenship."

Qatari women enjoy some political rights, though they have little opportunity to organize independently and advocate for their interests. In the 2019 municipal council elections, 5 of the 85 candidates were women, and 2 of them—both incumbents—won seats. None of the 26 women candidates for the 30 open Advisory Council seats won in the 2021 elections. Emir Tamim appointed two women to the additional 15 seats, including Shaikha bint Yousuf Hassan al-Jufairi, who in 2003 became the first woman to win an election in any Gulf State.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 3 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 0 / 4

Decision-making authority is concentrated in the hands of the emir and his family, and the Advisory Council has only limited ability to offset executive power in certain areas. However, in July 2021, the emir granted the Advisory Council legislative powers, including the ability to propose laws and approve or reject the national budget.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 2 / 4

The authorities regularly punish lower-level public officials for bribery and embezzlement, but corruption remains a concern. No genuinely independent anticorruption mechanisms hold senior officials and members of the ruling family publicly accountable for the allocation of state resources. In May 2021, the finance minister, Ali Sharif al-Emadi, was removed from office and detained as part of an investigation into allegations of misuse of public funds and abuse of power.

Qatar has also been accused of employing corrupt tactics in its successful bid to host the International Federation of Association Football (FIFA) 2022 World Cup.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 1 / 4

Official information is tightly controlled, and critics complain of a lack of transparency in state procurement. Although the State Audit Bureau prepares budgets and accounts for government institutions, it does not share their full details with the public or the Advisory Council. A 2016 law empowered the bureau to make some aspects of its audit findings public, but the security ministries remained exempt from its oversight.

In April 2021, Abdullah Ibhaïs, a former employee of Qatar's World Cup organizers who exposed abuses against and mistreatment of migrant workers, was given a prison sentence for alleged bribery and misuse of funds. His sentence was reduced in December to three years.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 18 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 7 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 1 / 4

Both print and broadcast media are influenced by leading families and subject to state censorship. The international television network Al Jazeera is privately held, but the government has reportedly paid to support its operating costs since its inception in 1996. All journalists in Qatar practice a degree of self-censorship and face possible jail sentences for defamation and other press offenses. Access to the independent English-language website Doha News was restored in May 2020, having been blocked in late 2016 for operating without a required permit.

In January 2020, an amendment to the penal code made the sharing or publication of "false news" punishable with up to five years in prison or a maximum fine of 100,000 riyals ($27,500).

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 2 / 4

Islam is the official religion, though the constitution explicitly provides for freedom of worship. The Ministry of Islamic Affairs oversees the construction of mosques, the hiring of imams, and guidance for sermons. Churches have been built for Qatar's growing Christian community, but non-Muslims are not allowed to proselytize or worship in public.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 2 / 4

The constitution guarantees academic freedom, but scholars often self-censor on politically sensitive topics. Foreign universities have established branches in Qatar under a program meant to strengthen the country's educational institutions.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 2 / 4

While residents enjoy some freedom of private discussion, security forces reportedly monitor personal communications, and noncitizens often self-censor to avoid jeopardizing their work and residency status. Social media users can face criminal penalties for posting politically sensitive content. However, citizens and residents have become more active in debating current affairs and regional developments without apparent retribution in recent years.

Malcolm Bidali, a security guard from Kenya who blogged about labor rights in Qatar, was detained in May 2021, and charged by the Supreme Council of the Judiciary in July for publishing false news. Amid an international outcry, Bidali was deported in August after paying a fine of 25,000 riyals ($6,810).

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 2 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 1 / 4

The constitutional right to freedom of assembly is limited by restrictive laws and does not apply to noncitizens. Organizers of public events must obtain a permit from the Interior Ministry, and protests are rare. Small-scale protests occurred in September 2021 against discriminatory voting rules implemented in the October elections; several demonstrators were arrested by security forces.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 0 / 4

All nongovernmental organizations need state permission to operate, and the government closely monitors their activities. There are no independent human rights organizations, though a government-appointed National Human Rights Committee investigates alleged abuses. Independent activists are subject to state harassment. Human rights lawyer Najeeb al-Nuaimi remained under a travel ban imposed by the attorney general in 2017.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 1 / 4

A 2005 labor law expanded worker protections, but the rights to form unions and to strike remain restricted. The only trade union allowed to operate is the General Union of Workers of Qatar, and the law prohibits union membership for noncitizens, government employees, and household workers.

F. RULE OF LAW: 5 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 1 / 4

Despite constitutional guarantees, the judiciary is not independent in practice. Many judges are foreign nationals serving under temporary contracts that are renewed annually. The Supreme Council of the Judiciary, composed of senior judges, administers the courts and plays a role in nominating judges for appointment by the emir.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 1 / 4

Certain laws allow lengthy detentions without charge or access to a lawyer for suspects in cases involving national security or terrorism. Even under normal criminal procedure, judges can extend pretrial detention for up to half of the maximum prison term allowed for the alleged crime. Many laws contain ill-defined offenses and other language that gives prosecutors and judges broad discretion to determine guilt.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 3 / 4

Violent crime is rare in Qatar, and prison conditions reportedly meet international standards. Legal bans on torture and other mistreatment of detainees have generally been respected in recent years, though international experts have called for further legislative and other improvements. Corporal punishment in the form of flogging, which can be imposed on Muslim defendants for certain offenses under Sharia (Islamic law), is not commonly implemented in practice. The death penalty is permitted, including for crimes other than murder. In April 2020, a migrant worker from Nepal who had been convicted of murder was reportedly executed, the first since 2003.

Noncitizens reportedly face discrimination in the courts and from police. Though the constitution bars gender-based discrimination, women are not legally guaranteed equal treatment, and their testimony is worth less than that of men in certain cases. LGBT+ people are subject to legal and societal discrimination; vague wording in the penal code can be interpreted to criminalize same-sex sexual activity, and Sharia prohibits any sexual acts outside of heterosexual marriage. Same-sex relationships must be hidden in practice.

Though the government provides them some protections and support, asylum seekers and recognized refugees are barred from engaging in political activity and need government approval to change their place of residence. An asylum committee began receiving applications in 2019, though some asylum seekers reportedly continued to be threatened with deportation, casting doubt on the implementation of the law.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 4 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 1 / 4

Qataris face no major restrictions on freedom of movement within the country or on type or place of employment. Such freedoms, however, are not extended to noncitizens and foreign workers, who continue to face a variety of constraints. In 2020, the government expanded migrant workers' ability to leave the country without the permission of their employers, extending the right to sectors previously excluded. That August, the emir also signed legislation allowing migrant workers to change employers before the end of their contract without their existing employer's permission, so long as they provide written notice. However, Amnesty International noted that employers would still manage workers' residence permits and could still file criminal "absconding" charges against workers who leave their jobs without following the proper procedures.

Each year, up to 100 children and foreign spouses of Qatari women, as well as individuals who provide exceptional skills or services to the country, can receive permanent residency, giving them access to state education and health benefits and greater rights to own property and run businesses in Qatar.

Qataris are permitted to own property and start private businesses, although the process of obtaining necessary commercial permits can be cumbersome. With some exceptions, noncitizens are generally barred from owning property and require Qatari partners to own and operate businesses. Women do not have rights equal to those of men under inheritance laws.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 1 / 4

There are several legal constraints on marriage, and women are typically at a disadvantage to men under laws on personal status matters. Marriage contracts require the consent of the woman's male guardian, and citizens must obtain government permission to marry foreigners. The foreign wives of Qatari men can obtain citizenship, but foreign husbands of Qatari women are eligible only for residency. Domestic violence and spousal rape are not specifically criminalized. Extramarital sex is illegal.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 1 / 4

Many foreign nationals face economic abuses including the withholding of wages, contract manipulation, poor living conditions, and excessive working hours. However, fear of job loss and deportation often prevents them from asserting their limited rights. Women household workers are particularly vulnerable to abuse and exploitation.

International organizations have drawn attention to the harsh working conditions of migrants building the infrastructure for the 2022 FIFA World Cup. In February 2021, a report from The Guardian estimated that more than 6,500 migrant worker deaths had been recorded in the 10 years since Qatar was awarded World Cup hosting rights. Three Norwegian journalists investigating migrant worker conditions in Qatar were arrested and briefly detained by the authorities in November 2021.

The government has undertaken some reforms to mitigate these problems. A 2017 law guarantees household workers a maximum 10-hour working day, one rest day a week, three weeks of annual leave, and an end-of-service payment, among other provisions. However, the government lacks enforcement mechanisms to ensure compliance, and the 2017 law's standards are weaker than those in the main labor law. A 2020 reform established a monthly minimum wage of 1,000 riyals ($275) for all workers, regardless of sector or nationality. Authorities introduced a nondiscriminatory minimum wage in March 2021 (the first in the region), benefiting an estimated 400,000 workers, equivalent to 20 percent of the private sector workforce. In May 2021, a ministerial decision expanded the hours during which outside work is prohibited between June 1 and September 15 to mitigate the effects of heat stress during the summer months.

Romania

Population: 19,200,000

Capital: Bucharest

Freedom Status: Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Romania's multiparty system has ensured regular rotations of power through competitive elections. Civil liberties are generally respected but have come under growing pressure as entrenched political interests push back against civic and institutional anticorruption efforts. Discrimination against minorities and other vulnerable groups is a long-standing problem, as is control of key media outlets by businessmen with political interests.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- In October, the governing coalition led by Florin Cîțu of the National Liberal Party (PNL) lost a no-confidence vote. In November, Nicolae Ciucă of the PNL formed a new government with the Social Democratic Party (PSD) and the Democratic Union of Hungarians in Romania (UDMR).

- In July, the nationalist Alliance for the Union of Romanians (AUR) announced that it was drafting a bill to restrict the discussion of sexual orientation or identity in educational settings. The AUR and the UDMR committed to introducing such a bill later in the year.
- Romania, which saw a relatively low COVID-19 vaccine uptake, faced a new wave of infections in October, prompting the government to restrict access to nonessential medical treatment. Authorities reported 1.1 million cases and 43,000 deaths to the World Health Organization for the year.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 35 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 12 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The president, who holds some significant powers in Romania's semipresidential system, is directly elected for up to two five-year terms. The president appoints the prime minister in consultation with the parliamentary majority, and the prime minister's government requires the confidence of Parliament. Presidential and parliamentary elections held since 1991 have been generally free and fair. Klaus Iohannis, a centrist who had belonged to the PNL, was reelected in November 2019, winning 66.1 percent of the vote in a runoff. Viorica Dăncilă of the PSD won 33.9 percent.

Florin Cîțu of the PNL became prime minister in December 2020. His government, which was originally supported by the Save Romania Union (USR) and the UDMR, lost a no-confidence vote in October 2021; the USR had withdrawn its support in September. Nicolae Ciucă of the PNL became prime minister in November, after he formed a coalition with the PSD and UDMR.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

Members of the bicameral Parliament, consisting of a 136-seat Senate and a 330-seat Chamber of Deputies, are elected to four-year terms in a closed party-list proportional system.

Elections for both houses were held in December 2020, though electoral campaigns were affected by COVID-19-related restrictions. Turnout for the Chamber of Deputies contests stood at a record-low 33.3 percent. The PSD won 28.9 percent of the vote and 110 seats, while the PNL won 25.2 percent and 93 seats. The 2020 USR-PLUS Alliance—which consisted of the USR and the Party of Liberty, Unity, and Solidarity before their merger was officially recognized in April 2021—won 15.4 percent and 55 seats. The UDMR won 5.7 percent and 21 seats. The AUR entered Parliament for the first time, winning 9.1 percent and 33 seats.

In the concurrent Senate elections, the PSD won 29.3 percent of the vote and 47 seats, while the PNL won 25.6 percent and 41 seats. The 2020 USR-PLUS Alliance won 15.9 percent and 25 seats, the AUR won 9.2 percent and 14 seats, and the UDMR won 5.9 percent and 9 seats. Turnout for the Senate elections stood at 31.9 percent.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 4 / 4

The legal framework generally provides for fair and competitive elections. The Romanian electoral framework relies on a Central Election Bureau, which includes judges and political representatives, and a Permanent Electoral Authority, which manages voter registration, campaign finance, and logistics.

Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE) observers who monitored the December 2020 parliamentary elections noted the complexity of the legal electoral framework. Observers criticized parliamentarians' fast-tracking of electoral-law amendments that September, limiting public debate. OSCE observers also voiced concerns over the electoral authorities' training efforts, which were affected by the pandemic.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 14 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 4 / 4

Romania's multiparty system features active competition between rival political parties. Under the 2015 electoral law, the number of signatures needed to create a new party decreased dramatically, leading to the registration of many new parties. Some 217 parties and alliances competed in the September 2020 local elections; 24 parties and individual candidates competed for Senate seats that December, while 82 groups and candidates, including ethnic minority groups, competed for lower-house seats.

Critics have argued that signature thresholds to register candidates for local and parliamentary elections place new and smaller parties at a disadvantage. COVID-19-related legislation reduced the signature requirements for local candidates by half.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 4 / 4

Romania has established a record of peaceful transfers of power between rival parties. Since 1996, the PSD and PNL, the country's two largest parties, have regularly alternated in government. However, no party has yet governed for two full consecutive terms. Governments often fall in no-confidence votes; the Cițu government successfully survived a no-confidence effort in June. A September motion was carried in October, however, prompting its fall.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 3 / 4

People are generally free to make political choices without undue pressure from unaccountable actors. However, clientelism in politics remains a problem in local and legislative elections and among ruling and opposition parties. In small towns and villages, mayors retain significant leverage over voters. Local mayors are known to switch parties to secure funding or other resources.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 3 / 4

Ethnic, religious, and other minority groups enjoy full political rights under the law. The constitution grants one lower-house seat to each national minority whose representative party or organization wins no seats otherwise, with a maximum of 18 seats allotted in this fashion. President Iohannis, an ethnic German and a Lutheran, is the country's first president from either minority group. The UDMR, which represents the Hungarian minority, participated in the coalitions formed in 2020 and 2021.

Roma, who make up over 3 percent of the population, are underrepresented in politics. Social discrimination against LGBT+ people discourages political advocacy for their rights.

Data collection on gender representation is lacking, as is a policy to encourage female political participation. Women held 19 percent of Chamber of Deputies seats and 18.4 percent of Senate seats as of December 2021.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 9 / 12C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 4 / 4

Elected officials are generally able to craft and implement government policy without outside interference.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 2 / 4

High levels of corruption, bribery, and abuse of power persist. Romania maintains a comprehensive anticorruption action plan, though the European Anti-Fraud Office noted that anticorruption bodies face pressure when pursuing high-level cases in a 2020 report.

The National Anticorruption Directorate (DNA) previously won international praise for fairly investigating corruption and securing convictions of powerful figures. However, the 2018 dismissal of DNA chief Laura Codruța Kövesi was seen as a blow to its independence. Kövesi, who currently heads the European Public Prosecutor's Office, won a European Court of Human Rights judgment over her dismissal in 2020.

The Fight against Fraud Department called on an investigation against then deputy premier Dan Barna of the USR over the alleged misuse of EU funds. In June 2021, the DNA elected not to pursue the matter for lack of evidence.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 3 / 4

Citizens have the legal right to obtain public information and can petition government agencies for it. However, processes for soliciting participation and input from various stakeholders and civil society experts are poorly defined, and the government widely utilizes emergency ordinances for legislating. COVID-19-related information was sometimes withheld, or was otherwise disseminated slowly, by authorities.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 48 / 60D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 13 / 16*D1. Are there free and independent media? 3 / 4

Although the media environment is relatively free and pluralistic, key outlets remain controlled by businessmen with political interests, and coverage is highly distorted by their owners' priorities. Media outlets increasingly rely on publicly funded advertising and subsidies.

The government provided funding to media outlets for the purposes of a pandemic-related public campaign. In a June 2021 report, Expert Forum noted that some of the funding was not provided to outlets and that the initiative was impacted by clientelism and electoral concerns.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 3 / 4

Religious freedom is generally respected. While the Romanian Orthodox Church (BOR) remains dominant and politically powerful, the government formally recognizes 18 religions, each of which is eligible for proportional state support. Others can register as religious associations. There have been reports of discrimination and harassment against religious minorities, including vandalism in Jewish cemeteries and media articles referring to Islam and Muslim migrants as threats to Romania. The promotion of antisemitism was banned by legislation adopted in 2018.

Some religious ceremonies were impacted by COVID-19-related measures. In the first half of 2021, the BOR criticized the government's decision to restrict or cancel major pilgrimages. Larger religious ceremonies were allowed to proceed after the government eased some pandemic restrictions in June.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 3 / 4

The government generally does not restrict academic freedom, but the education system is weakened by widespread corruption and politically influenced appointments and financing, including at the local level.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 4 / 4

People are generally free to express their opinions without fear of retribution, though social media users have received fines after being accused of insulting police.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 11 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

Romania's constitution guarantees freedom of assembly. Public gatherings were restricted under pandemic-related measures in March 2020, though restrictions were loosened that September. Restrictions on assemblies were again loosened beginning in May 2021, though authorities imposed curfews depending on COVID-19 transmission rates.

In October 2021, several thousand people participated in an AUR-organized protest after the government introduced new restrictions on unvaccinated individuals. In a December protest, demonstrators opposing the imposition of pandemic pass tried to enter the Parliament building in Bucharest. Security officers blocked doorways but did not respond with force.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 4 / 4

Nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) operate without major formal restrictions. Nevertheless, many human rights and governance groups face funding shortages as well as hostility from politicians and other actors.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 3 / 4

Workers have the right to form unions, have a limited right to strike, and can bargain collectively, though laws against the violation of these rights are not well enforced. There are legal constraints on the ability of unions to participate in political activity.

F. RULE OF LAW: 12 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 3 / 4

The judiciary is generally independent but faces pressure from the executive and legislative branches. A special prosecution unit focusing on magistrates has been criticized by magistrates' associations and supranational bodies, who feared it would allow for the intimidation of magistrates and other abuses. The unit remained active in 2021, though the Ciucă government vowed to abolish it by March 2022.

The European Commission has more broadly criticized 2017–19 amendments to laws related to the judiciary branch, warning that the amendments have affected the branch's effectiveness and independence. In September 2020, the Justice Ministry introduced proposed amendments to those laws, prompting a six-month public consultation period. In March 2021, the Justice Ministry submitted new draft amendments to the Superior Council of Magistracy.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 3 / 4

The law provides safeguards against arbitrary arrest and detention, which are generally respected. However, the right to a fair and timely trial is often undermined by institutional problems including corruption, political influence, staffing shortages, and inefficient resource allocation. Many government officials and lawmakers have retained their positions despite criminal indictments or convictions by exploiting such systemic weaknesses. The hearing of noncriminal matters was slowed down for part of 2021 due to pandemic-related restrictions.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 3 / 4

The population faces no major threats to physical security, but prisons and detention centers feature harsh conditions, and the abuse of detainees by police and fellow prisoners remains a problem.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 3 / 4

The law provides broad protections against discrimination based on gender, race, ethnicity, sexual orientation, and other categories. However, people with disabilities, LGBT+ people, Roma, and HIV-positive children and adults face discrimination in education, employment, medical-service provision, and other areas. In July 2021, the AUR announced that it was drafting a bill that would restrict the discussion of sexual orientation or identity in educational settings; it and the UDMR later committed to introducing such a bill.

The constitution guarantees women equal rights, but gender discrimination remains a problem in many aspects of life.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 12 / 16G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

Citizens generally face no significant restrictions on freedom of movement, whether for internal or external travel, and can freely change their place of employment or education. Romanians returning to the country were sometimes subject to quarantine or isolation rules which loosened as 2021 progressed.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 2 / 4

Property rights are protected by law, but despite significant progress, the country has struggled to adjudicate restitution claims for property confiscated during the communist era. Bureaucratic barriers, corruption, and broader weaknesses in the rule of law hamper private business activity.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 3 / 4

While personal social freedoms are generally protected, domestic violence remains a serious problem, and laws meant to combat it are poorly enforced. Same-sex marriages are not permitted under Romanian law. However, in 2018, the Constitutional Court recognized the residency rights of same-sex couples married elsewhere, provided that one spouse is an EU citizen.

Some political actors employ antigay rhetoric to galvanize conservative parts of society against political adversaries. The AUR, which entered Parliament in 2020, engages in anti-LGBT+ rhetoric.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 3 / 4

The law provides basic protections against exploitative working conditions, though they are unevenly enforced, particularly in the large informal economy. Economic opportunity varies widely between urban and rural areas, and such disparities limit social mobility for some. Human trafficking for the purpose of forced labor and prostitution remains a serious problem. Women and Roma children are especially vulnerable to forced begging.

Russia

Population: 145,800,000

Capital: Moscow

Freedom Status: Not Free

Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: Power in Russia's authoritarian political system is concentrated in the hands of President Vladimir Putin. With loyalist security forces, a subservient judiciary, a controlled media environment, and a legislature consisting of a ruling party and pliable opposition factions, the Kremlin is able to manipulate elections and suppress genuine dissent. Rampant corruption facilitates shifting links among state officials and organized crime groups.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- The arrest and detention of leading opposition figure Aleksey Navalny in January resulted in some of the largest protests in a decade. Authorities used excessive force against the demonstrators, and more than 11,500 people were detained.
- The September elections for the Duma, the lower house of parliament, were marked by extensive irregularities, according to election observers and independent media. The official results left the ruling United Russia party with a substantial supermajority.
- Authorities significantly expanded existing legal restrictions on "undesirable" and "extremist" organizations as well as "foreign agents," contributing to an increase in censorship of the internet and social media and culminating in the forced closure of the respected human rights organization Memorial International.
- Russia continued to experience a severe outbreak of COVID-19, with more than 10 million confirmed cases and 300,000 deaths, according to official statistics; independent experts argued that those figures were artificially low. Low vaccination rates in the country were attributed in part to lack of trust in the government.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 5 / 40A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 0 / 12*A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

The constitution establishes a strong presidency with the power to dismiss and appoint, pending parliamentary confirmation, the prime minister. The president is elected for as many as two consecutive six-year terms. Constitutional amendments approved in 2020 allow Putin, but not future presidents, to run for an additional two consecutive terms as president, potentially extending his rule to 2036.

As with past elections, President Putin's 2018 reelection campaign benefited from advantages including preferential media treatment, numerous abuses of incumbency, and procedural irregularities during the vote count. His most influential rival, Aleksey Navalny, was disqualified before the campaign began due to a politically motivated criminal conviction, creating what the Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE) called "a lack of genuine competition." The funding sources for Putin's campaign were also notably opaque.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

The Federal Assembly consists of the 450-seat State Duma and an upper chamber, the Federation Council. The 2020 constitutional amendments altered the makeup of the Federation Council to include: two representatives from each of Russia's 85 regions (including two regions in the Russian-occupied Ukrainian territory of Crimea), with half appointed by governors and half by the regional legislatures, usually with strong federal input; former presidents, who are lifetime members; and no more than 30 "representatives of the Russian Federation," appointed by the president, of whom no more than seven can be appointed for life. The rest of the Federation Council's members are appointed for six-year terms.

Half of Duma members are elected by nationwide proportional representation, and the other half are elected in single-member districts, with all serving five-year terms. Electoral rules are designed to benefit the ruling party, United Russia.

In the 2021 Duma elections, United Russia won 324 seats, maintaining its supermajority. The main Kremlin-approved opposition parties—the Communist Party, A Just Russia, the Liberal Democratic Party of Russia (LDPR), and the New People party—won the bulk of the remainder, totaling 118 seats. Three smaller parties and five independents garnered 8 seats. The Central Election Commission reported a voter turnout of 52 percent, up from 48 percent in 2016. The election took place over three days, and Russians were permitted to use an opaque online voting system for the first time.

The OSCE was unable to send an observation mission due to new government-imposed restrictions on the number of observers. The Russian election-monitoring group Golos and independent media reported numerous violations, including vote buying, pressure on voters, "clone" candidates, and ballot stuffing. Under pressure from the authorities, Apple and Google removed the Navalny-backed Smart Voting mobile application from their online stores; the app was designed to inform citizens on how to avoid splitting the opposition vote in their respective districts. Some opposition candidates were not permitted to register, including associates of Navalny's organization. In Moscow, early results showed challengers to United Russia leading in several districts, but pro-Kremlin candidates were later declared the victors in each of these districts after delayed online-voting results were released, prompting further accusations of fraud.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 0 / 4

Russia's electoral system is designed to maintain the dominance of United Russia. The authorities make frequent changes to electoral laws and the timing of elections in order to secure advantages for their preferred candidates. Opposition candidates have little chance of success in appealing these decisions, or in securing a level playing field.

In 2020, Putin signed a law permitting the use of electronic voting across Russia, raising concerns about the security and secrecy of ballots in the 2021 Duma polls and other future elections. Also that year, the president signed a law allowing a three-day voting period in future elections; critics argued that the expanded timeframe increased officials' ability to manipulate electoral outcomes.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 3 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 1 / 4

The multiparty system is carefully managed by the Kremlin, which tolerates only superficial competition against the ruling party. A 2012 law liberalized party registration rules, allowing the creation of hundreds of new parties. However, none posed a significant political threat to the authorities, and many seemed designed to encourage division and confusion among the opposition. The Justice Ministry has repeatedly refused to register Navalny's political party. In June 2021, Navalny's Anti-Corruption Foundation (FBK) was declared an extremist organization, effectively preventing anyone associated with it from running for office.

Three new parties met a voting threshold in the 2020 local elections that would allow them to qualify for the 2021 Duma elections: New People, For Truth, and Green Alternative. In practice, each has links to the ruling party, allowing Kremlin-friendly political figures to distance themselves from the increasingly unpopular United Russia and siphon off voters who might otherwise support genuine opposition parties.

Russia has never experienced a democratic transfer of power between rival groups. Putin, then the prime minister, initially received the presidency on an acting basis from the retiring Boris Yeltsin at the end of 1999. He served two four-year presidential terms from 2000 to 2008, then remained the de facto paramount leader while working as prime minister until he returned to the presidency in 2012, violating the spirit if not the letter of the constitution's two-term limit. A 2008 constitutional amendment extended presidential terms to six years, and a 2020 amendment allowed Putin to run for an additional two terms, meaning he could remain in office until 2036.

Opposition politicians and activists are frequently targeted with fabricated criminal cases and other forms of administrative harassment designed to prevent their participation in the political process. Navalny was poisoned with a toxic nerve agent in August 2020 while he was investigating corruption and campaigning in Siberia, with evidence later emerging that the attack was carried out by the Federal Security Service (FSB). He had to be evacuated to Germany to prevent the authorities from interfering with his treatment, and he was arrested upon his return in January 2021 for violating probation, receiving a prison term in February.

Legislation enacted in June 2021 banned individuals associated with extremist organizations from running for election. The Central Election Commission subsequently disqualified a number of candidates who were accused of extremism or association with undesirable organizations. Other opposition activists were sentenced to prison or fled the country due to charges they said were politically motivated. Among other new restrictions, Russian citizens who hold a second citizenship or a foreign residence permit, and people who have been found guilty of one of 400 criminal and administrative offenses, were unable to run for office as of 2021. In June, Golos reported that around nine million Russians, or nearly one in 10 adults, had effectively been denied the right to run for any public office.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 1 / 4

Russia's numerous security agencies work to maintain tight control over society and prevent any political challenges to the incumbent regime. The country's leadership is also closely intertwined with powerful business magnates who benefit from government patronage in exchange for political loyalty and various forms of service. The Russian Orthodox Church similarly works to support the status quo, receiving financial support and a privileged status in return. Recent reports from the Riga-based online news outlet Meduza, echoing other research, have shown that many employers—particularly in the public sector—pressure their employees to vote, partly to deliver the government's desired level of voter turnout.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 1 / 4

The formation of parties based on ethnicity or religion is not permitted by law. In practice, many regions inhabited by distinct ethnic groups are carefully monitored and controlled by federal authorities. Most republics in the restive North Caucasus area and some autonomous districts in energy-rich western Siberia have opted out of direct gubernatorial elections; instead, their legislatures choose a governor from candidates proposed by the president.

Women are underrepresented in politics and government. As of 2021, they held less than a fifth of the seats in the State Duma and the Federation Council. Only about a tenth of cabinet members are women, and many issues of importance to women are not prominent in Russian politics.

Constitutional amendments that were approved in the 2020 referendum and enacted in April 2021 formally defined marriage as a union between a man and a woman, both reflecting and deepening the systemic challenges LGBT+ people face in pursuing their political interests.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 2 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 0 / 4

Russia's authoritarian president dominates the political system, along with powerful allies in the security services and the business sector. These groups effectively control the output of the parliament, which is not freely elected. The 2020 constitutional amendments formalized the power of the president over the legislature and allow Putin to retain the presidency until 2036, demonstrating his ability to manipulate the system. In 2021, the parliament passed a series of bills designed to increase political centralization at the expense of regional autonomy. However, the federal authorities have limited ability to impose policy decisions in Chechnya, where Chechen leader Ramzan Kadyrov has been granted unchecked power in exchange for violently suppressing dissent and keeping the republic within the Russian Federation.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 1 / 4

Corruption in the government and the business world is pervasive, and a growing lack of accountability enables officials to engage in malfeasance with impunity. Many analysts have argued that the political system is essentially a kleptocracy, a regime whose defining characteristic is the plunder of public wealth by ruling elites. Some of these elites openly work to fulfill President Putin's policy aims and receive government contracts and protection from prosecution in return for their loyalty.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 1 / 4

There is little transparency and accountability in the day-to-day workings of the government. Decisions are adopted behind closed doors by a small group of individuals whose identities are often unclear to the public, and are announced to the population after the fact.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 14 / 60 (-1)

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 3 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 0 / 4

Although the constitution provides for freedom of speech, vague laws on extremism grant the authorities great discretion to crack down on any speech, organization, or activity that lacks official support. The government controls, directly or through state-owned companies and friendly business magnates, all of the national television networks and many radio and print outlets, as well as most of the media advertising market. A handful of independent outlets still operate, most of them online and some headquartered abroad. The few still based in the country struggle to maintain their independence from state interests. Television remains the most popular source of news, but its influence is declining, particularly among young people who rely more on social media.

Laws on extremism, foreign agents, and undesirable organizations have been used to harass media outlets, curtailing their access to funding and forcing many to cease operations in Russia. In late 2020, legislators expanded the foreign agents law to apply to individuals and informal organizations. Authorities cracked down on journalists who reported on protest events in 2021, for example by arresting editors at the student-led newspaper Doxa. Also during the year, a number of prominent independent media outlets were declared foreign agents, including Meduza, VTimes, Dozhd, OVD-Info, Mediazona, and iStories. Roskomnadzor, the federal media and telecommunications agency, required several media outlets to delete reports by the investigative news outlet Proekt, which was declared an undesirable organization in July.

A series of new laws that have gone into effect since 2020 require social media networks to take down "illegal" content, fine websites that fail to block illegal content, and enforce prison sentences for online "libel," among other provisions. In the weeks following the introduction of these laws, Roskomnadzor issued warnings and fines to TikTok, VKontakte, Odnoklassniki, YouTube, Twitter, Facebook, and Instagram for failing to block posts that allegedly encouraged minors to participate in protests. In December, a court fined Google $100 million for failure to delete banned content. Activists have also been fined and jailed for allegedly promoting extremist content on social media.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 1 / 4

Freedom of religion is upheld unevenly. A 1997 law on religion gives the state extensive control and makes it difficult for new or independent groups to operate. The Russian Orthodox Church has a privileged position, working closely with the government on foreign and domestic policy priorities. Antiterrorism legislation approved in 2016 grants authorities the power to suppress religious groups that are deemed extremist.

The Jehovah's Witnesses were declared an extremist organization in 2017, leading to a protracted campaign against worshippers marked by surveillance, property seizures, arrests, and torture. Since the ban, more than 500 Jehovah's Witnesses have been charged with or convicted of extremism. In October 2021, however, the Supreme Court ruled that authorities could not prosecute adherents merely for individual or collective worship, requiring additional evidence of extremist activity.

Many Muslims have been detained in recent years for alleged membership in banned Islamist groups, including Hizb ut-Tahrir.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 1 / 4

The higher education system and the government-controlled Academy of Sciences are hampered by bureaucratic interference, state-imposed international isolation, and increasing pressure to toe the Kremlin line on politically sensitive topics, though some academics still express dissenting views. A number of universities have banned student and faculty participation in antigovernment rallies or threatened students with expulsion should they participate. Educators have also been fired for attending or sharing information about protests on social media.

A law enacted in April 2021 requires educators and academics to receive permission from authorities for public "educational activities" and partnerships involving foreign scholars. In July, US-based Bard College became the first foreign institution of higher education to be designated as an undesirable organization in Russia. In October, the FSB announced that individuals who work on military technology and related issues and share even nonsecret information with foreigners could be named as foreign agents.

Pervasive, hyperpatriotic propaganda and political repression—particularly since Russian forces' invasion of Ukraine in 2014—have had a cumulative impact on open and free private discussion, and the chilling effect is exacerbated by growing state efforts to control expression on the internet.

In recent years, authorities have adopted a series of laws that impose fines or prison sentences for insulting the state, spreading false news, committing libel, and using social media to discuss the personal information of judges and law enforcement officials or to share information on corruption. These and other laws are actively enforced to punish and deter expressions of dissent.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 2 / 12 (-1)

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 0 / 4 (-1)

The government restricts freedom of assembly. Overwhelming police responses, the excessive use of force, routine arrests, and harsh fines and prison sentences have discouraged unsanctioned protests, while pro-Kremlin groups are able to demonstrate freely. Despite the risks, thousands of people have turned out for a series of antigovernment demonstrations in recent years.

It is extremely difficult for groups opposing the Kremlin to obtain permission to hold a protest or rally. At the regional level, extensive location-based restrictions prohibit assemblies in as much as 70 percent of public space. While some of these restrictions have been invalidated over the years, authorities can ban rallies on vaguely defined "public interest" grounds. Since 2014, nine major legislative amendments have been introduced to curtail freedom of assembly. Some protesters have resorted to single-person pickets to circumvent limits on mass gatherings, but authorities have used a variety of laws and tactics to crack down on the practice in recent years.

The government has invoked public health concerns to tighten restrictions on assembly during the COVID-19 pandemic, but the rules are selectively applied to target critics of the regime.

In early 2021, mass demonstrations in response to the arrest and imprisonment of Aleksey Navalny were met with excessive force by state security personnel. At least 11,500 people were detained, more than 130 criminal investigations were opened, and multiple protesters and journalists were injured, with many reporting beatings and other abuse in custody. Some of those convicted over the subsequent months received multiyear prison sentences. Facial-recognition technology installed in Moscow and several other cities was reportedly used to identify and arrest participants in the protests.

Score Change: The score declined from 1 to 0 because authorities pursued a campaign of retaliation against opposition protesters, arresting thousands of participants, engaging in physical abuse during arrests and in detention, and imposing criminal penalties.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 0 / 4

The government has relentlessly persecuted NGOs, particularly those that work on human rights and governance issues. Civic activists are frequently arrested on politically motivated charges.

Authorities impede and block NGO work by requiring groups that receive foreign support and are deemed to engage in broadly defined “political activity” to register as “foreign agents.” This designation, which is interpreted by much of the Russian public as denoting a foreign spying operation, entails onerous registration requirements, obliges groups to tag their materials with a “foreign agent” label, and generally makes it extremely difficult for them to pursue their objectives. Under amendments adopted in late 2020, authorities can designate individuals and informal organizations as foreign agents. Those who fail to comply with the law risk fines or prison time.

In June 2021, the president signed laws that made it easier to open criminal cases for alleged affiliation with “undesirable” organizations and banned individuals affiliated with “extremist” organizations from seeking public office. As of December 2021, the Ministry of Justice had listed 86 NGOs and public associations, 36 media outlets, and 75 individuals as foreign agents. Separately, a total of 48 organizations had been deemed “undesirable.” That month, Russia’s Supreme Court ordered the closure of Memorial International, one of Russia’s most well-respected human rights organizations, on the grounds that it had repeatedly failed to meet the requirements of the foreign agents legislation.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 2 / 4

While trade union rights are legally protected, they are limited in practice. Strikes and worker protests have occurred in prominent industries, including automobile manufacturing, but antiunion discrimination and reprisals are common. Employers often ignore collective bargaining rights. The largest labor federation works in close cooperation with the Kremlin, though independent unions are active in some industrial sectors and regions.

F. RULE OF LAW: 2 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 1 / 4

The judiciary lacks independence from the executive branch, and judges’ career advancement is effectively tied to compliance with Kremlin preferences. The Presidential Personnel Commission and court chairpersons control the appointment of the country’s judges, who tend to be promoted from inside the judicial system rather than gaining independent experience as lawyers. The 2020 constitutional amendments empowered the president to remove judges from the Constitutional Court and the Supreme Court, with the support of the Federation Council, further damaging the judiciary's already negligible autonomy.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 1 / 4

Safeguards against arbitrary arrest and other due process guarantees are regularly violated, particularly for individuals who oppose or are perceived as threatening to the interests of the political leadership and its allies. Many Russians have consequently sought justice from international courts, but a 2015 law authorizes the Russian judiciary to overrule the decisions of such bodies, and it has since done so on a number of occasions. In December 2021, the president signed legislation that granted police broader authority to break into homes and vehicles and search personal belongings without a warrant. While arbitrary arrests are rarely punished, a court in May sentenced five former police officers to prison terms for the 2019 arrest of journalist Ivan Golunov on fabricated drug charges.

Memorial Human Rights Center counted 410 people as political prisoners as of August 2021, with 329 of them held in connection with the exercise of religious freedom. Those counted included opposition leader Aleksey Navalny along with several of his supporters, journalists, and potential opposition candidates for the 2021 parliamentary elections.

Use of excessive force by police is widespread, and rights groups have reported that law enforcement agents who carry out such abuses have deliberately employed electric shocks, suffocation, and the stretching of a detainee's body so as to avoid leaving visible injuries. Prisons are overcrowded and unsanitary; inmates lack access to health care and are subject to abuse by guards. In 2021, lawyers for Navalny reported that he had been subjected to sleep deprivation and denied medical treatment while in prison.

Parts of the country, especially the North Caucasus, suffer from high levels of violence; targets include officials, Islamist insurgents, and civilians. Chechen leader Ramzan Kadyrov has been accused of using abductions, torture, extrajudicial killings, and other forms of violence to maintain control. This activity sometimes extends to other parts of Russia and foreign countries, where Kadyrov is suspected of arranging the assassination of asylum seekers and political opponents living in exile.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 0 / 4

Immigrants and ethnic minorities—particularly those who appear to be from the Caucasus or Central Asia—face governmental and societal discrimination and harassment. Constitutional amendments establish the primacy of the Russian language within the state, favoring ethnic Russians by implication.

LGBT+ people are also subject to considerable discrimination. A federal law banning the dissemination of information on “nontraditional sexual relationships” has been in force since 2013, making public discussion of homosexuality illegal.

Chechnya remains particularly dangerous for LGBT+ people, with authorities launching a crackdown in 2019 that ensnared nearly 40 people; two of the detainees reportedly died after they were tortured by police. In 2021, police arrested and forcibly returned to Chechnya individuals who were associated with LGBT+ organizations.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 7 / 16G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 2 / 4

The government places some restrictions on freedoms of movement and residence. Adults must carry internal passports while traveling and to obtain many government services. Some regional authorities impose registration rules that limit the right of citizens to choose their place of residence, typically targeting members of ethnic minorities and migrants from the Caucasus and Central Asia. Most Russians are free to travel abroad, but more than four million employees tied to the military and security services were banned from foreign travel under rules issued in 2014.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 1 / 4

State power and private property are intimately connected, with senior officials often using their government positions to amass vast property holdings. State takeovers of key industries and large tax penalties imposed on select companies after dubious legal proceedings have illustrated the precarious nature of property rights under Putin's rule, especially when political interests are involved. Private businesses more broadly are routinely targeted for extortion or expropriation by law enforcement officials and organized criminal groups.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 2 / 4

Constitutional amendments approved in 2020 define marriage as a union between a man and a woman; the changes were formally adopted in April 2021, effectively barring any future law recognizing same-sex marriage.

Domestic violence receives little attention from the authorities. Instead, survivors who kill their abusers in self-defense are commonly imprisoned; as many as 80 percent of women imprisoned in Russia may fall under this category. A 2017 law decriminalized acts of domestic violence that do not result in permanent physical harm. The measure also relieved police of the obligation to initiate cases, transferring that burden to survivors. During Russia's COVID-19 lockdown in 2020, Russian NGOs reported a doubling of domestic violence cases, while official police statistics reported a decrease. In December 2020, the Justice Ministry listed the NGO Nasiliu.net, which fights gender-based violence, as a "foreign agent." In April 2021, the Constitutional Court called on lawmakers to strengthen victim protections as well as penalties for repeat offenders.

Residents of certain regions, particularly in the North Caucasus, face tighter societal restrictions on personal appearance and relationships, and some so-called honor killings have been reported. In Chechnya, Kadyrov has spoken in favor of polygamy and sought to compel divorced couples to remarry.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 2 / 4

Legal protections against labor exploitation are poorly enforced. Migrant workers are often exposed to unsafe or exploitative working conditions. Both Russians facing economic hardship and migrants to Russia from other countries are vulnerable to sex and labor trafficking. The US State Department's 2021 Trafficking in Persons Report criticized the government's lack of significant efforts to address trafficking. While it acknowledged the government's extension of work and residence permits for foreign workers in response to the COVID-19 pandemic, its identification of some victims, and other positive steps, the report found that the government records a far lower number of trafficking victims than the estimated scope of the problem would suggest, and that the state is actively complicit in the forced labor of North Korean workers. Trafficking victims are routinely detained, deported, and prosecuted for activity they were forced to participate in.

Rwanda

Population: 13,300,000

Capital: Kigali

Freedom Status: Not Free

Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: The Rwandan Patriotic Front (RPF), led by President Paul Kagame, has ruled the country since 1994, when it ousted forces responsible for that year's genocide and ended a civil war. While the regime has maintained stability and economic growth, it has also suppressed political dissent through pervasive surveillance, intimidation, torture, and renditions or suspected assassinations of exiled dissidents.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- Political opposition figure Paul Rusesabagina, who had lived abroad until he was forcibly repatriated by Rwandan authorities in 2020, was sentenced to 25 years in prison on terrorism and other charges in September after a trial that lacked due process.
- Draconian lockdowns related to the COVID-19 pandemic were generally eased during the year, though some restrictions remained in place or were reimposed by December.
- The Kagame regime continued its attempts to silence political opponents, with suspicious murders or disappearances reported abroad and further detentions of and threats against journalists, bloggers, and artists occurring within the country.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 8 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 2 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

Rwanda's 2003 constitution grants broad powers to the president, who has the authority to appoint the prime minister and dissolve the bicameral Parliament. Amendments passed in 2015 retained a two-term limit for the presidency and shortened terms from seven to five years. The changes also explicitly stated, however, that incumbent Paul Kagame was eligible for an additional seven-year term, after which he could run for two of the new five-year terms. This would extend Kagame's rule until 2034.

Kagame easily won the 2017 presidential election, taking 98.8 percent of the vote, according to official results. Frank Habineza of the Democratic Green Party of Rwanda (DGPR) and independent Philippe Mpayimana split the remainder. The electoral process was marred by numerous irregularities, including political intimidation, unfair registration practices, and alleged fraud during the balloting itself.

The National Electoral Commission (NEC) blocked the candidacies of other would-be challengers, including independent and Kagame critic Diane Rwigara, who was barred from running on the grounds that some of the required signatures she had collected were invalid. She claimed that her followers were harassed and jailed as they attempted to gather signatures. The government also orchestrated a campaign of media smears and intimidation against Rwigara, who was subsequently arrested along with her mother and sister.

Local authorities impeded the electoral campaigns of opposition presidential candidates, and some citizens were coerced into joining RPF rallies and voting for Kagame. Rwandans were also made to attend camps and listen to RPF propaganda, while local authorities tasked traditional leaders with persuading their communities to vote for Kagame. Access to the media and the content of electoral coverage were both skewed in favor of the RPF.

On election day, observers reported ballot stuffing, poll workers showing favoritism toward the RPF, and denial of access to the vote-counting process, among other violations. Ballot secrecy was not always respected.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 1 / 4

The 26-seat Senate, the upper house of Parliament, consists of 12 members elected by regional councils; 8 appointed by the president; 4 chosen by the National Consultative Forum for Political Organizations (NCFPO), a public body meant to promote political consensus; and 2 elected by faculty at universities. Senators' terms were shortened from eight to five years as part of the 2015 constitutional reform. The 80-seat Chamber of Deputies, the lower house, includes 53 directly elected members, 24 women chosen by local councils, 2 members from the National Youth Council, and 1 member from the Federation of Associations of the Disabled, all serving five-year terms.

Six incumbent senators who had served eight-year terms were replaced in 2020; four were appointed by Kagame, and two were selected by the NCFPO.

The RPF dominated the Chamber of Deputies elections held in 2018, capturing 40 of the 53 elected seats. The DGPR gained 2 seats, marking the first time a genuine opposition party had won representation in Parliament. Three other parties allied with the RPF—the Social Democratic Party, the Liberal Party, and the Social Party—won 5, 4, and 2 seats respectively. As with other elections in recent years, the government's repression of legitimate opposition parties and strict control of the media helped to ensure an overwhelming victory for the RPF.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 1 / 4

The electoral laws are not impartially implemented by the NEC, whose members are proposed by the government and appointed by the RPF-dominated Senate. Rwandan elections routinely feature unfair barriers to registration, campaigning, poll monitoring, and media access for opposition parties and candidates, among other problems.

The 2015 constitutional amendments were adopted through a flawed petition and referendum process. Rights groups and news organizations cited reports that some signatures on the petition were not given voluntarily. The details of the amendments were not widely distributed or discussed ahead of the referendum, in which 98 percent of voters signaled their approval, according to the NEC. The government limited the political activities of groups opposed to the amendments, and the referendum was not monitored by any independent international observer groups.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 2 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 1 / 4

The government-controlled Rwanda Governance Board (RGB) is responsible for registering political parties. In practice it can deny registration at its discretion without proper justification.

The government has a long history of repressing its political opponents, and members of opposition parties face the threat of disappearance, arbitrary arrest and detention, and assassination. Diane Rwigara, who sought to contest the 2017 presidential election, was arrested and imprisoned that year, along with her mother and sister, on multiple charges. The charges against her sister were dropped; Rwigara and her mother were released on bail in 2018 and acquitted later that year. Separately, several members of the Dafa-Umurinzi party, led by 2010 presidential candidate Victoire Ingabire, were convicted in 2020 of involvement with an “irregular armed force” and “offenses against the state,” receiving prison terms ranging from 7 to 10 years. One defendant who was acquitted, Venant Abayisenga, was reported missing later that year and was believed to have been forcibly disappeared or killed.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 0 / 4

The RPF has ruled Rwanda without interruption since 1994, banning and repressing any opposition group that could mount a serious challenge to its leadership. All registered parties currently belong to the NCFPO. While the DGPR won two parliamentary seats in 2018, current conditions generally prevent it from gaining further positions of authority or increasing its support to the point where it can viably compete with the RPF.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 0 / 4

Both voters and candidates face significant intimidation aimed at controlling their political choices. Rwandans living outside the country have been threatened, attacked, forcibly disappeared, or killed, apparently in retaliation for their public or suspected opposition to the regime.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 1 / 4

The constitution calls on the president to ensure “representation of historically marginalized communities” in the Senate through his appointees. However, asserting one’s ethnic identity in politics is banned, meaning the level of representation is unclear. The prohibition on discussion of ethnicity makes it nearly impossible for disadvantaged groups—including the Twa, an Indigenous group—to organize independently and advocate for their interests.

The constitution requires women to occupy at least 30 percent of the seats in each chamber of Parliament. While women currently hold more than 38 percent of Senate seats and about 61 percent of the lower house seats, they have little practical ability to engage in politics outside the RPF structure. The promotion of gender equity disproportionately privileges English-speaking Tutsis over French-speaking Hutus and rural Tutsis. Societal discrimination, as well as the regime’s general repression of dissent, prevents LGBT+ Rwandans from freely pursuing their communities’ political interests.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 4 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 1 / 4

Government policy is largely set and implemented by the executive branch, with the security and intelligence services playing a powerful role, and the president is not freely elected. Parliament, which generally lacks the independence to serve as a check on executive authority, tends to merely endorse presidential initiatives.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 2 / 4

The government takes measures to limit corruption, including regular dismissals and prosecutions of low-level officials who are suspected of malfeasance. In 2018, Parliament passed penal code revisions that expanded the list of corruption-related crimes and increased penalties for those convicted. In 2019, several mayors and other local officials resigned or were dismissed for alleged corruption and other misconduct, though the lack of transparency surrounding the cases made it difficult to assess whether any of them were politically motivated. In 2021, Rwanda's Office of the Ombudsman launched investigations following a civil society report that found corruption in the public procurement and infrastructure sectors.

Despite these actions, graft remains a problem, and only a few independent organizations or media outlets are able to investigate or report on corruption issues due to the risk of government reprisals.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 1 / 4

While a 2013 law provides for public access to government information, implementation has been weak. Data published on Sobanukirwa, a website created by the government to ease the process of requesting access to documents, suggest that only a small fraction of requests result in positive and timely responses. Given the government's active repression of any dissent in recent years, citizens do not have the ability in practice to obtain information about state operations, nor do they have a meaningful opportunity to comment on policy without the threat of punishment.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 14 / 60 (+1)

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 3 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 0 / 4

While the constitution nominally protects freedom of the press, the government imposes legal restrictions and informal controls on the media, and most outlets practice self-censorship. The few journalists in the country who engage in independent reporting are subject to criminal charges and intimidation. The penal code revisions passed in 2018 criminalized cartoons and writings that "humiliate" Rwandan leaders, but also decriminalized defamation, which the Rwanda Journalists Association considered an improvement to the highly restrictive legal framework.

Many Rwandan journalists have fled the country and work in exile. Due in part to this phenomenon, the government has increasingly blocked access to news services and websites based abroad. The British Broadcasting Corporation's Kinyarwanda-language service has been suspended in the country since 2014.

Authorities continued to target journalists and bloggers—particularly those broadcasting via the online video platform YouTube—for intimidation, arrest, or prosecution during 2021, using a broad interpretation of media laws that allow them to restrict content that is deemed offensive, false, or contrary to public safety and public morals.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 2 / 4

Religious freedom has historically been respected, but the government has recently taken steps to assert greater control over religious institutions. Over the past several years, authorities have shut down Pentecostal churches and some mosques, banned mosques in Kigali from broadcasting the call to prayer, passed a law requiring religious leaders to obtain a theology degree before establishing churches, mandated that religious organizations report grants to the RGB, and required that donations to faith-based groups be deposited in Rwandan banks. Jehovah's Witnesses face arrest for refusing to participate in security duties or oath-taking involving the national flag.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 1 / 4

The government restricts academic freedom by enforcing official views on the genocide and other sensitive topics. Any critical discussion of the RPF's actions during the war or its politicization of memorialization projects is heavily policed. Scholars and students are subject to suspension for "divisionism" and engage in self-censorship to avoid such penalties.

In 2019, the government announced that primary schools would conduct lessons in English, even though most of the population speaks Kinyarwanda. French-speaking students and educators could also be disadvantaged by the decision. School closures related to the COVID-19 pandemic delayed enforcement of the new policy during 2020, but implementation began in early 2021 as schools reopened.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 0 / 4

The space for free private discussion is limited in part by indications that the government monitors personal communications. Social media are heavily monitored, and the law allows for government hacking of telecommunications networks. In 2019, WhatsApp disclosed that its messaging service had been exploited to target Rwandan dissidents with Pegasus, a suite of surveillance software. Rwandan authorities have also used mobile data and geolocation tools as part of their response to COVID-19.

In addition to electronic surveillance, the authorities reportedly use informants to infiltrate civil society, further discouraging citizens from voicing dissent. Individuals have been forcibly disappeared, arrested, detained, and assassinated for expressing their views. Innocent Bahati, a poet known for reciting his social commentary on YouTube, went missing in February 2021; his location and condition remained unknown at year's end.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 2 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 0 / 4

Although the constitution guarantees freedom of assembly, this right is strictly limited in practice. Fear of arrest or police violence serves as a deterrent to protests, and gatherings are sometimes disrupted even when organizers obtain official authorization. Public gatherings have been restricted to varying degrees during the COVID-19 pandemic, with those deemed to be in violation of the rules facing arrest and possible mistreatment in custody. Nevertheless, some officially sanctioned events proceeded peacefully during 2021. LGBT+ activists organized Rwanda's first pride celebrations in June.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 1 / 4

Registration and reporting requirements for both domestic and foreign nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) are onerous, and activities that the government defines as divisive are prohibited. Many organizations receive funds from the RGB, which challenges their independence. Several NGOs have been banned in recent years, leading others to self-censor. The government has been accused of employing infiltration tactics against human rights organizations.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 1 / 4

The constitution provides for the rights to form trade unions, engage in collective bargaining, and strike, but free collective bargaining and strikes are limited by binding arbitration rules and rare in practice. Public-sector workers and employees in broadly defined “essential services” are generally not allowed to strike. Enforcement of rules against antiunion discrimination is weak. The country’s largest union confederation has close ties to the RPF, and the government allegedly interferes in union elections.

F. RULE OF LAW: 2 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 0 / 4

The Rwandan judiciary lacks independence from the executive. Top judicial officials are appointed by the president and confirmed by the RPF-dominated Senate. Judges rarely rule against the government in politically sensitive cases.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 1 / 4

The police and military regularly engage in arbitrary arrests and detentions, targeting opposition figures and dissidents as well as homeless people, street vendors, and suspected petty criminals. A 2017 Human Rights Watch (HRW) report detailed a system of secret unlawful detention at military facilities for suspected members of armed rebel groups or exiled opposition factions. Such detainees are allegedly denied basic due-process rights, and many who are later brought to trial are convicted based on coerced confessions.

Children facing homelessness, gay and transgender people, and sex workers in Kigali were arbitrarily detained and held in poor conditions in the months before the city was scheduled to host a high-profile international conference in June 2021.

The government is known to pursue arbitrary detentions of political opponents living in exile. In August 2020, Rwandan authorities effectively abducted Paul Rusesabagina—a Belgian citizen, US resident, and regime critic known for sheltering hundreds of people during the genocide—while he was visiting the United Arab Emirates. Upon arrival in Rwanda, he was immediately arrested and charged with supporting terrorism due to his leadership role in the opposition Rwanda Movement for Democratic Change (MRCD) and alleged links to the group’s armed wing. In September 2021, Rusesabagina was found guilty and sentenced to 25 years in prison after a trial that lacked due process. Among other violations, the authorities reportedly intercepted privileged correspondence between Rusesabagina and his lawyers.

Both ordinary criminal suspects and political detainees are routinely subjected to torture and other ill-treatment in custody. Extrajudicial executions of suspected criminals by security personnel still occur with some frequency. Disappearances, physical assaults, arbitrary detention, and assassinations targeting journalists, opposition members, and other regime critics are commonly reported. In 2021, at least three regime critics were assassinated or forcibly disappeared abroad.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 1 / 4

Equal treatment for all citizens under the law is guaranteed, and there are legal protections against discrimination. However, the Tutsi minority group is often accused of receiving preferential treatment for high-ranking jobs and university scholarships under the pretext of an affirmative action program for “genocide survivors.” English-speaking Tutsis are overrepresented in government. Members of the Hutu majority, who represent 85 percent of the population, face unofficial discrimination when seeking public employment or scholarships. The Twa, meanwhile, continue to suffer from de facto disadvantages in education, employment, and health care.

While women enjoy broad legal equality and have a significant presence in the economy as workers and business owners, gender-based discrimination persists, and gender-equality efforts have largely favored English-speaking Tutsis.

Same-sex activity is not criminalized in Rwanda, though LGBT+ people face strong social stigma. No laws specifically provide protection against discrimination based on sexual orientation or gender identity, and police can arrest individuals using public morality laws.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 7 / 16 (+1)

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 2 / 4 (+1)

An easily obtainable national identity card is required to move within the country. However, all government officials must receive approval from the president or prime minister’s office before traveling for personal or professional reasons; some current and former security officials have been arrested for unauthorized travel. Members of opposition groups have also reported restrictions on foreign travel or reentry to Rwanda.

Rwandan authorities introduced COVID-19-related lockdowns and travel restrictions in 2020, and these were abusively enforced, in part through mass arrests affecting tens of thousands of people. Individuals accused of violating mask mandates and curfews, along with those performing essential errands during lockdowns, were routinely detained in stadiums and sometimes forced to attend overnight lectures before being released. Some detainees were denied food, water, and protection from the elements. Conditions improved in 2021, with lockdowns rolled back and schools reopening in February. Some 35,000 people were reportedly arrested in June as restrictions were temporarily reimposed to curb a rise in cases, but the rules were eased again beginning in July. When a new coronavirus variant emerged in December, authorities applied certain limited social-distancing measures only to unvaccinated people.

Score Change: The score improved from 1 to 2 due to an easing of the previous year’s disproportionate and abusively enforced COVID-19 restrictions.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 2 / 4

While the government is generally supportive of economic growth through private business activity, it has been criticized for seizing land for infrastructure and development projects without proper compensation, and for imposing agricultural and land-consolidation policies without adequate input from farmers.

The law grants the same property and inheritance rights to men and women, though women are not always able to assert their rights in practice.

The law generally grants equal rights to men and women regarding marriage and divorce, but informal marriages under customary law, including polygamous unions, lack such protections. Only marriages between a man and a woman are recognized under the country's constitution. The penalties for spousal rape are much lighter than for other forms of rape. Domestic violence remains widespread and seldom reported despite government programs to combat it.

Abortion is a criminal offense unless the pregnancy is the result of rape, incest, or forced marriage, or it poses a health risk. Abortion convictions can lead to significant prison terms. The 2018 penal code revisions removed language requiring all abortions to be approved by a judge, leaving the final decision in the hands of the patient and doctor. In May 2020, 50 women who were jailed for having abortions—six of whom were serving life sentences—were released after receiving presidential pardons. Human rights advocates welcomed the pardons but maintained calls for a liberalization of abortion laws.

Regulations governing wage levels and conditions of work in the formal sector are poorly enforced. Children are trafficked internally for domestic service under abusive conditions, or for commercial sex work, and little effort is made to hold internal traffickers to account. Many children work informally in the agricultural sector. Young Congolese and Burundian refugees are vulnerable to sexual exploitation and coerced recruitment into armed groups linked to Rwandan security forces. While Rwanda has increased prosecutions for transnational trafficking in recent years, the number of investigations and convictions remains low, and victim and witness support programs are lacking.

Samoa

Population: 200,000

Capital: Apia

Freedom Status: Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Samoa has a democratic political system with regular elections, though the same political party had been in government for decades until 2021, and only traditional heads of families are eligible to run as candidates. The judiciary is independent, and civil liberties are generally respected.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- The April parliamentary elections resulted in a tie between the long-ruling Human Rights Protection Party (HRPP) and the opposition Fa'atuatua i le Atua Samoa ua Tasi (FAST) party, with the outcome decided by a single independent who opted to support FAST.
 - After the elections, the Office of the Electoral Commissioner sought to add an extra seat for the HRPP through its interpretation of the country's gender quota, and the head of state attempted to call fresh elections on the grounds that neither side had a majority, but both moves were struck down by the Supreme Court in May.
 - Although the outgoing government still refused to concede and challenged the legality of the FAST government's swearing-in ceremony, the courts eventually cleared the way for the new government to begin work in July.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 32 / 40 (+2)A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 9 / 12*A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 3 / 4

The parliament elects a largely ceremonial head of state every five years; a limit of two terms was adopted through a 2019 constitutional amendment. By custom rather than constitutional requirement, the position is given to one of the country's four paramount chiefs. In 2017, the parliament elected Tuimaleali'ifano Va'aletoa Sualauvi II as head of state.

The head of government is the prime minister, who must have the parliament's support. In the wake of the April 2021 parliamentary elections, Fiamē Naomi Mata'afa of FAST began work as prime minister in July after the courts resolved a lengthy dispute over the legality of her swearing-in ceremony outside the parliament in May.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 3 / 4

Under rules that took effect in 2021, the Legislative Assembly consists of 51 members elected in single-member constituencies. If less than 10 percent of the members elected by ordinary means are women, the highest-polling female candidates are declared elected until the required quota is reached. Elections are held every five years.

In the April 2021 elections, the ruling HRPP captured 25 seats, as did the newly formed opposition FAST party. The remaining seat was won by an independent, Tuala Iosefo Ponifasio, who decided to support FAST. However, the Office of the Electoral Commissioner announced an extra seat for the HRPP on the grounds that the five women elected constituted 9.8 percent of the 51 members, short of the required 10 percent. This would give each side 26 seats. Citing the supposed tie, the head of state called for fresh elections.

Both the electoral commissioner's interpretation of the gender quota and the head of state's effort to call snap elections were struck down by the Supreme Court in May. The new parliament was ordered to sit by May 24 to select a new government. The head of state issued the required proclamation, but withdrew it for reasons he did not explain. The Supreme Court then upheld the initial proclamation and declared its withdrawal unlawful. With the incumbent leadership still refusing to concede, the outgoing speaker prevailed upon the parliamentary clerk to lock the doors of the legislature, prompting FAST lawmakers to gather outside the building and participate in Mata'afa's impromptu swearing-in ceremony, which was eventually upheld by the courts in July.

In September, the new FAST government at first refused to swear in the HRPP's members of parliament, on the grounds that they rejected the election outcome and the authority of the new speaker. The Supreme Court stepped in yet again to require the HRPP lawmakers to be sworn into office, and the lengthy constitutional crisis subsequently eased. FAST made further gains in November by-elections, solidifying its governing majority.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 3 / 4

The constitutional and legal framework for elections is largely democratic and fairly implemented. However, only matai (family heads who hold honorific customary titles) are allowed to stand as candidates. There are currently at least 60,000 matai titles recognized by the Land and Titles Court, though individuals often hold multiple titles. Only about 11 percent of matai titleholders are women. Candidates are also subject to residency and traditional village service requirements. A 1990 reform, supported by a referendum based on universal suffrage, granted all adult citizens over 21 years of age the right to vote in elections, which had previously been limited to matai.

Legislation adopted in September 2021 allowed absentee voting within Samoa, meaning voters in the imminent by-elections would not have to travel to their home constituencies to cast ballots.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 14 / 16 (+2)

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 4 / 4 (+1)

There are no major constraints on the formation and operation of political parties, but parties must win a minimum of eight seats to qualify for formal recognition within the legislature. The opposition Tautua Samoa Party fell from 13 seats to two after the 2016 elections, leaving the parliament with just one recognized party. However, several other parties registered in the years leading up to the April 2021 elections, including FAST in 2020, and the elections themselves confirmed that there were no significant obstacles to party formation and competition.

Score Change: The score improved from 3 to 4 because several political parties, including the current ruling party, have formed and competed for power in recent years.

There are no obvious obstacles that prevent the opposition from increasing its support and gaining power through elections. The former HRPP government, having been in power since the 1980s, developed an effective campaign machinery during its incumbency, but it harmed its own interests in the 2021 elections by allowing multiple candidates to run in single districts, splitting its vote and facilitating opposition victories.

In 2020, two smaller opposition parties—Tumua ma Puleono and the Samoa National Democratic Party—had announced that they would contest the 2021 elections as an alliance under the FAST banner. The opposition benefited from a number of preelection defections from the HRPP, including that of Fiamē Naomi Mata’afa herself, who had served as a deputy prime minister until September 2020.

Although the HRPP incumbents contested the FAST victory in 2021, the courts ultimately ensured a democratic transfer of power. November 2021 by-elections strengthened the new FAST government, leaving it with 31 seats and the HRPP with 22, including two additional seats granted to HRPP women candidates under the gender quota.

Score Change: The score improved from 3 to 4 because a new political coalition entered government after parliamentary elections, defeating a party that had been in power for decades.

B3. Are the people’s political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 3 / 4

While voters and candidates are largely free from undue interference with their political choices, traditional village councils consisting of local leaders with matai titles exercise considerable influence through candidate endorsements. Those who use the electoral laws to challenge the councils’ preferred candidates in court have sometimes faced customary penalties such as banishment.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 3 / 4

While women and members of ethnic minority groups have full voting rights, individuals must hold a matai title in order to qualify as electoral candidates, meaning fewer women are eligible in practice. A sizeable minority of villages still do not allow women to hold matai titles, and few women participate in village council meetings. Members of the fa'afafine community—Samoans who are assigned male gender at birth but have a fluid or feminine gender identity—can also be matai, though they have generally not run as candidates in elections to date.

The 2016 elections marked the first application of the gender quota ensuring that at least 10 percent of parliamentary seats are held by women. If fewer than that number are elected in normal constituency contests, the unsuccessful female candidates with the most votes are awarded additional seats. One extra seat was consequently added to the 2016 parliament, and two were added after the 2021 by-elections.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 9 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 3 / 4

The prime minister and cabinet determine and implement government policies without improper interference by outside groups, though the restrictive features of the electoral system weaken the democratic credentials of elected officials to some extent, and the reluctance of the new FAST government to swear in opposition members of parliament in the wake of the postelection crisis in 2021 suggested ongoing political dysfunction.

The FAST government encountered considerable resistance from within the senior echelons of the public service, which had long worked closely with the HRPP. The clerk of the Legislative Assembly and the attorney general, both of whom were involved in constitutional crisis, were dismissed in September, as was a top official at the Finance Ministry in August. An August “open letter” from “affected and concerned public servants” criticized their treatment by the new government and was referred to the Public Service Commission.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 3 / 4

Independent entities including the Office of the Ombudsman, the Public Service Commission, and law enforcement agencies pursue allegations of corruption by public officials. However, corruption remains a problem and a cause of public discontent, and the government has at times resisted calls for a stronger response.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 3 / 4

While the government generally operates with transparency, the effectiveness of the state auditing system remains the subject of public debate, and the country lacks a freedom of information law.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 51 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 14 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 3 / 4

Several public and privately owned print and broadcast news outlets operate in Samoa, and internet access has expanded rapidly in recent years. While press freedom is generally respected, politicians and other powerful actors have used libel or defamation suits to respond to critical remarks or stories about them. In 2017, the parliament passed legislation that reintroduced criminal libel, which had been abolished in 2013. Artistic works are also subject to government restrictions; in 2019, the feature film Rocketman was banned for depicting same-sex sexual activity, which is illegal in Samoa.

In March 2021, the attorney general threatened an investigation of the Samoa Observer in response to its reporting on a possible conflict of interest involving her husband's law firm.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 3 / 4

Freedom of religion is constitutionally guaranteed and mostly respected in practice. However, a 2017 constitutional amendment shifted references to Samoa being a Christian nation from the constitution's preamble to its body text, meaning it can potentially be used in legal action. There is strong societal pressure at the village level—including from village councils—to participate in the activities of the main local church.

In April and May 2020, the Samoan Law Society and the country's ombudsman expressed concerns that provisions in three government-backed bills—the Constitution Amendment Bill 2020, the Lands and Titles Court Bill 2020, and the Judicature Amendment Bill 2020—could limit religious freedom by removing the Land and Titles Court from the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, meaning the latter could no longer review decisions on village customary matters that violated individual rights. The bills were subsequently passed in December 2020 and received the head of state's assent in January 2021.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

There are no significant restrictions on academic freedom.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 4 / 4

Most Samoans face no serious practical constraints on private discussion or the expression of personal views, though the threat of criminal defamation charges remains a problem for some prominent critics of the government or of powerful individuals.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 11 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

Freedom of assembly is protected by law and respected in practice. Beginning in March 2020, the government imposed restrictions on public gatherings in response to the COVID-19 pandemic. Demonstrators nevertheless continued to engage in protests, avoiding the health restrictions in part by organizing processions of vehicles. Among other demonstrations held during 2021, HRPP supporters repeatedly protested unfavorable court rulings during the postelection crisis.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights—and governance-related work? 3 / 4

Nongovernmental organizations (NGOs), including human rights groups, operate freely, though the civil society sector in Samoa remains relatively small and underfunded. For example, the country's only NGO focused on sexual orientation and gender identity issues reported in 2021 that it received no direct government funding and had just one paid staff member.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 4 / 4

Workers have the right to form and join trade unions, bargain collectively, and strike. Multiple unions exist, representing both public- and private-sector employees; these are often called “associations.” The Samoa Workers Congress (SWC) is an umbrella body for all workers’ unions.

Union members’ rights are governed by the constitution and the 2013 Labour and Employment Relations Act; the latter recognizes unions and employees’ roles and rights, the right to collective bargaining, and rights to maternity and paternity leave, and mandates the establishment of a National Tripartite Forum, which provides for workers’ benefits and consults on employment policies and conditions. However, some cultural factors hinder the ability of workers and unions to pursue their rights.

Samoa has ratified the International Labour Organization’s eight fundamental conventions.

F. RULE OF LAW: 14 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 4 / 4

The judiciary is independent, as demonstrated by its rulings during the postelection crisis in 2021. The head of state, on the recommendation of the prime minister, appoints the chief justice. Other Supreme Court judges are appointed by the head of state on the advice of the Judicial Service Commission, which is chaired by the chief justice and includes the attorney general and a Justice Ministry appointee. Judges typically serve until they reach retirement age and cannot be removed arbitrarily.

The three reform bills adopted in December 2020 featured a number of provisions that could undermine judicial independence and the rule of law. One component would allow the head of state, on the advice of the Judicial Service Commission, to dismiss Supreme Court judges; this had previously required a two-thirds vote in the parliament, which is still required to remove the chief justice. The legislation also separates the judicial system into two distinct and potentially conflicting structures, with one, headed by the Supreme Court, handling civil and criminal matters and the other, the Land and Titles Court, overseeing customary matters including communal land. The Land and Titles Court would have its own appellate body, and individuals would no longer be able to appeal its decisions to the Supreme Court.

In December 2021, the head of the Land and Titles Court appointed Faimalomatumua Mathew Lemisio, who had recently resigned as electoral commissioner, to serve as deputy president of the court. The justice minister challenged the legality of the appointment, citing ambiguities in the new 2020 law governing the court, and the matter remained unresolved at year’s end.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 3 / 4

The authorities generally observe due process safeguards against arbitrary arrest and detention, and the courts provide defendants with the conditions necessary for a fair trial. However, village councils settle many disputes, and their adherence to due process standards varies; they have the authority to impose penalties including fines and banishment. The December 2020 legal reforms appeared to eliminate individuals’ ability to appeal village council decisions to the Supreme Court, raising doubts about how conflicts between customary communal authority and the constitutional rights of individuals would be resolved.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 4 / 4

Violent crime rates are relatively low. Police officers are occasionally accused of physical abuse. Prisons lack adequate resources, resulting in poor conditions including overcrowding, as well as breakdowns in security.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 3 / 4

The constitution prohibits discrimination based on descent, sex, religion, and other categories. The Labour and Employment Relations Act also prohibits discrimination against employees on such grounds as ethnicity, race, color, sex, gender, religion, political opinion, sexual orientation, social origin, marital status, pregnancy, HIV status, and disability. However, these protections are enforced unevenly. In practice women face some discrimination in employment and other aspects of life, and same-sex sexual activity remains a criminal offense for men. Ethnic Chinese residents at times encounter societal bias and restrictions on the location of their businesses.

Fa'afafine were previously subject to a rarely enforced criminal code provision that prohibited the "impersonation" of a woman. A 2013 amendment removed that provision, but fa'afafine and other gender-diverse Samoans continue to face a degree of societal discrimination in practice.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 12 / 16G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 3 / 4

While there are few constraints on freedom of movement, village councils still occasionally banish individuals from their communities as a penalty for serious violations of their bylaws.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 3 / 4

Private business activity is encouraged, and property rights are generally protected, though roughly 80 percent of the country's land is communally owned, meaning it is overseen by matai titleholders and other village leaders. The rest consists of freehold and state-owned land.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 3 / 4

While personal social freedoms are generally not restricted by law, domestic violence against women and children is a serious problem. The Crimes Act of 2013 made spousal rape a crime, and the Family Safety Act of 2013 empowers the police, public health officials, and educators to assist victims of domestic violence. Nevertheless, many victims do not report abuse due to strong social biases and fear of reprisal.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 3 / 4

Individuals generally enjoy equality of opportunity and fair working conditions. However, most adults engage in subsistence agriculture, and local custom obliges residents to perform some labor on behalf of the community; those who fail to do so can be compelled.

San Marino

Population: 30,000

Capital: San Marino

Freedom Status: Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: San Marino is a parliamentary democracy in which political rights and civil liberties are generally upheld. Corruption is a problem, and while investigative journalists are active, the risk of heavy fines for defamation can encourage self-censorship. The country's judicial system is not sufficiently independent and professional. Women are underrepresented in politics.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- In a September referendum, over 75 percent of voters approved a proposal to legalize abortion up to the 12th week of pregnancy, and in cases that pose a threat to the life or health of the mother. Legislation implementing the referendum results is expected to be enacted in 2022.
- Appellate hearings in the so-called Conto Mazzini corruption case, which first began in 2019, resumed in September. The case involves 17 high-ranking Sammarinese officials, who were convicted of bribery, corruption, money laundering, and vote buying in 2017.
- In December, the parliament approved a number of draft legal amendments intended to strengthen the independence of the judiciary. Legislation enacting the reforms had not been passed at year's end.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 38 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 12 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

Executive power rests with the 10-member State Congress (cabinet), which is accountable to the parliament and is headed by two captains regent. As the joint heads of state with largely ceremonial roles, the captains are elected every six months by the legislature from among its own members. Although there is no official prime minister, the secretary of state for foreign and political affairs is regarded as the head of government. Following the December 2019 elections, Luca Beccari of the Sammarinese Christian Democratic Party (PDCS) was elected to the post in January 2020.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The 60 members of the unicameral Great and General Council are elected for five-year terms. The 2019 elections, called about a year early, were considered credible and free, and their results were accepted by stakeholders and the public. The elections were won by the opposition PDCS, which obtained 21 seats. The left-wing Tomorrow in Motion (DML) coalition came in second with 15 seats, followed by Libera San Marino with 10 seats, We for the Republic (NpIR) with 8 seats, and Future Republic (RF) with 6 seats. After the elections, the Christian Democrats formed a governing coalition with Tomorrow in Motion and We for the Republic.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 4 / 4

The electoral laws provide a sound basis for the organization of free and fair elections. In its 2018 compliance report, published in 2019, the Council of Europe's (CoE's) Group of States against Corruption (GRECO) indicated that San Marino had enacted adequate legislation to regulate the financing of political parties.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 15 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 4 / 4

Parties are free to form and operate in San Marino, and a great number of them contest elections. Many parties participate in larger electoral coalitions, as the electoral law gives the largest political grouping the right to take the initiative in government formation.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 4 / 4

There are no restrictions preventing the opposition from increasing support through elections, and the country has undergone transfers of power between rival party groupings in recent years. In the 2019 elections, opposition parties defeated the incumbent government and formed a new government. Multiple opposition groups are currently represented in the Great and General Council.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 4 / 4

The political choices of voters and candidates are free from undue pressure by unaccountable groups.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 3 / 4

While citizens generally enjoy full political rights, women are underrepresented in the Great and General Council, where they held 19 seats after the 2019 elections, and in politics generally. An assessment mission from the Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE) that was deployed ahead of the 2019 polls noted that gender quotas on candidate lists were undercut by the preferential voting system. Women are better represented in the country's Electoral Council and in polling administration.

About 16 percent of the population consists of noncitizens who do not have political rights in the country; most are Italian nationals. Under San Marino's strict naturalization criteria, individuals without a citizen spouse, parent, or grandparent generally must live in the country for over 30 years to be eligible for citizenship.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 11 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 4 / 4

The government and legislature exercise their powers without improper interference from unelected entities.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 3 / 4

In response to scandals involving high-ranking officials, San Marino has launched a series of programs to combat corruption and money laundering. In a 2018 report, GRECO found that progress had been made in closing key gaps in the legal framework, but that further improvements were required. GRECO's 2020 report called for structural changes to San Marino's judicial sector in order to prevent unwarranted political influence and to strengthen the country's anticorruption framework. The report also highlighted the need to adopt a code of conduct for members of Parliament, which would require them to declare both conflicts of interest and assets. In response, the parliament approved a draft reform package in December 2021 aimed at strengthening the independence of the judiciary; related reforms amending the Code of Criminal Procedure remained awaiting approval at year's end. Legislation enacting the reforms had not been passed at the end of 2021.

In 2017, several former officials were convicted of bribery, corruption, money laundering, and vote buying for their involvement in the so-called Conto Mazzini case. Multiple former captains regent and ministers received prison sentences ranging from two to eight years. Appellate hearings in the Conto Mazzini case, which first began in 2019, continued in September 2021.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 4 / 4

Laws providing for the accessibility of government information are in place, and the government generally respects those laws. Public officials are not required to disclose their assets, though political candidates must report their income from the previous year as well as assets or investments.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 55 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 15 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 3 / 4

Freedom of the press is generally upheld. Local media are pluralistic, and journalists investigate important topics, including financial crimes. However, the risk of heavy fines or civil damages under San Marino's strict defamation laws can prompt self-censorship among journalists. News consumers also have access to Italian media, and internet access is not restricted.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 4 / 4

Religious freedom is broadly upheld in San Marino. Religious discrimination is prohibited by law. There is no state religion, although Roman Catholicism is dominant. Catholic religious instruction is offered in schools but is not mandatory.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

Academic freedom is generally respected.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 4 / 4

Freedom of expression is legally safeguarded, and people are generally free to discuss their views on politics and other sensitive topics, though the law prohibits hate speech based on various characteristics.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 12 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

Freedom of assembly is upheld in practice. Demonstrations routinely proceed without incident.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 4 / 4

Nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) may operate without undue restrictions, and a number of human rights groups are active in the country.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 4 / 4

Workers are free to strike, organize in trade unions, and bargain collectively, unless they work in military occupations. Approximately half of the workforce is unionized. The law prohibits antiunion discrimination and provides avenues for recourse for workers penalized for union activity.

F. RULE OF LAW: 13 / 16F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 3 / 4

Judicial affairs are managed by a Judicial Council made up of first instance and appellate judges as well as members of Parliament. In 2020, various controversies relating to political interference in the judiciary unfolded, culminating in the removal of the three judges who had been investigating the so-called Conto Mazzini case, in which 17 high-ranking Sammarinese officials were sentenced in 2017 for their involvement in money laundering and other corrupt activities.

In response, a September 2020 report from GRECO called for structural changes to San Marino's judiciary in order to limit political influence. The report also called for greater transparency and accountability in the country's judicial sector, and for changes in the configuration of the Judicial Council and the appointment of judges. The report was accompanied by a letter from the CoE's human rights commissioner imploring the government to safeguard the independence of the judiciary. In December 2021, the parliament introduced draft legal reforms aimed at strengthening judicial independence. Among other things, the proposed amendments include provisions that would require that politicians be removed from the Judicial Council.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 3 / 4

Due process rights surrounding charges and trials are generally upheld in practice. The authorities respect legal safeguards against arbitrary arrest and detention. However, the 2020 GRECO report on San Marino's judiciary expressed concerns about the lack of professionalism and transparency in San Marino's judicial system, and called for a more consistent, objective, and transparent allocation of cases. In addition, the report expressed a need to increase the accessibility to the public on judicial activity. The government's removal and reassignment of the three judges presiding over the Conto Mazzini case raised questions as to the maintenance of due process in cases of corruption. In December 2021, the parliament proposed amendments to the Code of Criminal Procedure that would enhance existing due process guarantees in the country if adopted.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 4 / 4

The population does not face any major threats to physical security. There is one prison in San Marino, and the inmate population is small, with no reports of serious mistreatment. Law enforcement officers generally operate with professionalism.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 3 / 4

San Marino law criminalizes the dissemination of ideas related to racial or ethnic superiority; acts of violence or discrimination on various grounds, including sexual orientation and gender identity; and incitement to such acts. However, discrimination based on skin color and language are not covered by these provisions. While San Marino lacks legislation guaranteeing equality and freedom from employment or other discrimination for LGBT+ people, in June 2019 referendum voters approved a constitutional amendment banning all forms of discrimination based on sexual orientation.

A 2018 report from the European Commission against Racism and Intolerance (ECRI) reiterated concerns about the absence of a strong and comprehensive antidiscrimination framework in the country. The Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights (OHCHR) has also urged San Marino to strengthen its laws against discrimination, in particular gender discrimination. Women face societal prejudices that affect their access to employment and economic opportunity.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 15 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

There are no restrictions on freedom of movement, and individuals in San Marino may freely change their place of residence, employment, and education.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 4 / 4

The rights to own property and operate private businesses are upheld.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 3 / 4

Personal social freedoms are generally safeguarded in San Marino. A law allowing civil unions for same-sex couples was adopted by the Great and General Council in November 2018 and came into force in February 2019. However, same-sex marriage is not recognized, and same-sex couples do not have the right to adopt children together. In a September 2021 referendum, over 75 percent of participants voted in favor of legalizing abortion up to the 12th week of pregnancy or if the pregnancy poses a danger to the life or health of the mother. Legislation implementing the referendum results is expected to be enacted in 2022. Reports of domestic violence, which is prohibited by law, are rare.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 4 / 4

The government generally upholds labor protections for workers and provides assistance to low-income individuals. The CoE's commissioner for human rights in 2015 called on San Marino to continue with efforts to better protect foreign women employed as caregivers or household workers; the ECRI renewed this advice in 2018.

São Tomé and Príncipe

Population: 200,000

Capital: São Tomé

Freedom Status: Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: São Tomé and Príncipe holds regular, competitive national elections and has undergone multiple transfers of power between rival parties. Civil liberties are generally respected, but poverty and corruption have weakened some institutions and contributed to dysfunction in the justice system. Threats to judicial independence have been a growing concern in recent years.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- The first round of the country's presidential elections was held in July; the first-round vote was marred by allegations of improper vote counting, which delayed the second-round polls while the Constitutional Court deliberated a candidate's request for a recount. The court ultimately denied the request, and Carlos Vila Nova of the Independent Democratic Action (ADI) party was elected president in September with 57.5 percent of the second-round vote, which both domestic and international observers deemed free and fair.
- In August, the president removed then defense minister Óscar Sousa from his post after he was accused of ordering the arrest of both the president and the prime minister in an alleged "attempt to subvert the constitutional order." An official inquiry into the matter began later that month.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 35 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 11 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The president is directly elected for up to two consecutive five-year terms. The prime minister, who holds most day-to-day executive authority, is appointed by the president based on the results of legislative elections. Executive elections are typically considered free and fair.

Carlos Vila Nova, of the opposition ADI, was elected president in September 2021, winning 57.5 percent of the second-round vote. The electoral process was marred by a number of irregularities, including allegations of vote-counting errors after the first round of voting in July. The allegations prompted third-place candidate Delfim Neves to request that the Constitutional Court order a recount. The request "paralyzed the court," which issued three separate rulings on the matter before declining to order a recount. The dispute delayed the second-round polls, and voting did not take place before the mandate of incumbent president Evaristo Carvalho had expired in early September. Allegations of fraud were not repeated during the second-round vote, and both domestic and international observers ultimately assessed the elections as largely free and fair.

Jorge Bom Jesus has served as prime minister since 2018, when he was appointed following the formation of a coalition government—comprised by the Movement for the Liberation of São Tomé and Príncipe–Social Democratic Party (MLSTP-PSD) and a bloc consisting of the Democratic Convergence Party, the Union of Democrats for Citizenship and Development, and the Force for Democratic Change Movement (PCD-UDD-MDFM)—after that year's legislative elections.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

Members of the unicameral, 55-seat National Assembly are elected by popular vote to four-year terms. In the October 2018 legislative elections, the ADI secured 25 seats, followed by the MLSTP-PSD with 23, the PCD-UDD-MDFM with 5, and the Movement of Independent Citizens with 2.

Following the elections, in a bid to secure an absolute majority, then prime minister Patrice Trovoadá requested that the Constitutional Court order a recount of ballots that had been ruled invalid, which the court agreed to. The opposition condemned the court's decision as biased in favor of the ADI. Demonstrations held outside the site of the recount were violently dispersed by security forces, who fired tear gas into the crowd. Later that month, the Constitutional Court certified the initial election results, and the ADI did not gain any seats. Despite the controversy, international observers deemed the elections largely credible. New allegations of fraud in the October 2018 legislative elections emerged in September 2021, prompting ADI leaders to request an official investigation into the claims.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 3 / 4

The electoral laws and framework are generally fair, but implementation suffers from lack of resources and staff.

In November 2020, the National Assembly approved a law preventing citizens born and living abroad to run for president. The ADI criticized the legislation, claiming it was designed to keep Trovoada—who was named party leader the month before and was born in Gabon—from running for president. In January 2021, President Carvalho vetoed the law, saying it limited civil and political rights. The president enacted the legislation the following month, after changes were made to remove provisions curtailing the political activities of citizens born and living abroad and to add an article allowing groups of citizens to run for legislative elections.

Despite flaws in the administration of the 2021 presidential elections, international election observers praised the conduct of the CEN, which the African Union (AU) observation mission reported was generally well-organized and able to efficiently manage challenges posed by electoral disputes. However, the AU election observation report criticized both the repeated postponement of the second round of voting and the “ad hoc nature” of the CEN, recommending that the CEN be made a permanent body.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 15 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 4 / 4

The multiparty system features free and vigorous competition among the ADI, ML-STP-PSD, PCD-UDD-MDFM, and a variety of other parties. Parties are known to fracture, however.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 4 / 4

Manuel Pinto da Costa and the MLSTP-PSD ruled São Tomé and Príncipe as a one-party state from independence in 1975 until 1991. Since then, there have been multiple democratic transfers of power between rival parties. Individual governments have tended to be short-lived, partly due to the country's system of proportional representation, which encourages coalition or minority governments.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 3 / 4

Voters and politicians are generally free from undue interference with their decisions. The practice of vote buying by political parties and candidates remains a problem. While the country experienced military coups in 1995 and 2003, normal civilian rule was swiftly restored in both cases.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 4 / 4

Women and minority groups enjoy full political rights. While women have made advances in the political sphere, societal discrimination and disparities in access to education inhibit women's participation. Women hold 24 percent of the parliament's seats, and 3 women candidates contested the first round of the presidential election in July 2021. In October 2021, Celiza Deus Lima became the first woman to be appointed to the Council of State.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 9 / 12C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 4 / 4

The prime minister and cabinet determine the government policy under the supervision of the National Assembly and the president. They implement laws and policies without improper interference from unelected entities.

In August 2021, the president dismissed defense minister Óscar Sousa at the request of prime minister Jorge Bom Jesus; Sousa's dismissal came after the ADI accused him of ordering the arrest of both the president and the prime minister in an alleged "attempt to subvert the constitutional order." The government opened an inquiry into the allegations later that month.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 2 / 4

Corruption is a major problem. Oversight mechanisms, the opposition, and the media have repeatedly uncovered evidence of official malfeasance, sometimes resulting in dismissals and other repercussions, but anticorruption laws are poorly enforced. In September 2020, the cabinet sought to "withdraw its confidence" in Attorney General Kelve Nobre de Carvalho over issues including the disappearance of drugs from Judicial Police premises; he remained in his post through 2021.

Other allegations of government corruption surfaced in the media in December 2021, when it was reported that a government contract for the sale of rice donated by Japan had been awarded to a company owned by representatives of the MLSTP and the PCD-UDD-MDFM. The government, which had suspended its contract with the company prior to the 2021 presidential elections, denied any wrongdoing.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 3 / 4

The government generally does not restrict access to information about its operations. However, there is no specific law guaranteeing public access to government information. Officials rarely disclose their assets and income. In August 2020, the Court of Auditors warned of irregularities in the government's 2017 accounts, noting their inability to verify figures related to government debt, among other concerns.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 49 / 60D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 15 / 16*D1. Are there free and independent media? 3 / 4

Freedom of the press is constitutionally guaranteed and largely respected in practice. Public media convey opposition views and grant some access to opposition leaders, but only a handful of private media outlets are available, and a degree of self-censorship is reported at both public and private outlets. There are no restrictions on online media, though the sector is poorly developed. Some 30 percent of the population has internet access, and the government is working to expand the country's internet coverage.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 4 / 4

The constitution provides for freedom of religion. Religious groups are required to register with the Justice Ministry and can face penalties for failing to do so, but the process is not reported to be biased or restrictive.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

The constitution prohibits political indoctrination in education, and academic freedom is generally respected in practice. However, the quality of education is considered poor, and inequality in access to education is a persistent problem.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 4 / 4

There are no restrictions on freedom of expression, which is constitutionally guaranteed. The government is not known to engage in improper surveillance of personal communications or monitoring of online content. Social media is used to express private and political opinions.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 11 / 12E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

The constitution protects freedom of assembly, which the government generally observes in practice. However, organizers are obliged to give authorities two days' notice before public gatherings. In June 2021, women activists in the city of São Tomé organized a large protest against gender-based violence (GBV). The government responded to the protest with a statement acknowledging an increase in GBV and condemning the murder of Maria de Lurdes Pereira, who was killed by her former husband earlier that month.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 4 / 4

Nongovernmental organizations (NGOs), including those focusing on human rights and governance issues, are free to operate. The government has not placed any significant restrictions on NGOs in recent years, but a lack of funding limits their activities.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 3 / 4

Workers have the legal rights to organize, strike, and bargain collectively. These are mostly respected, though there are no provisions to regulate bargaining or punish antiunion practices by employers. Most union negotiations are conducted with the government, which remains the country's dominant formal-sector employer.

F. RULE OF LAW: 12 / 16F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 3 / 4

The constitution provides for an independent judiciary, and the courts are relatively autonomous in practice, but they are susceptible to political influence and corruption. The current and previous governments embarked on a series of politically charged judicial appointments and dismissals.

In December 2020, the government launched a three-year modernization program of the justice system designed, in part, to bolster judicial and prosecutorial independence. The government initiated several projects in line with the program's goals in 2021, including beginning the construction of a regional court in the district of Caué and acquiring new technology to facilitate the continued digitalization of the judicial system.

Several judges, with the support of the country's judges' union, issued a statement in November 2021 accusing the Superior Council of Judicial Magistrates (CMSJ) of using "discriminatory" criteria, including a seniority requirement, to select candidates for two vacancies on the Supreme Court (STJ). Though the CMSJ later revised the selection process, the judges' union alleged that it remained marred by "irregularities and illegalities"; no STJ selections were made before year's end.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 3 / 4

Law enforcement authorities generally observe legal safeguards against arbitrary arrest and detention as well as guarantees for a fair trial, but police corruption is a problem, and indigent defendants are sometimes denied access to a lawyer. Nearly a third of prisoners are in pretrial detention, which can be lengthy in some cases.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 3 / 4

Police are sometimes accused of physically attacking suspects during arrest. In March 2021, a prisoner died of injuries sustained while in police custody; three police officers allegedly involved in the incident were detained the following month, and both the director of prison services and the director of the Judicial Police were dismissed. Prisons suffer from overcrowding and other harsh conditions.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 3 / 4

Equal treatment is legally guaranteed, but a degree of societal discrimination against women persists, hampering their access to economic and educational opportunities. Although same-sex sexual activity is not criminalized, discrimination against LGBT+ people is sometimes reported, and the law does not specifically address such bias.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 11 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

The constitution establishes the freedom of internal movement, foreign travel, emigration, and repatriation. The government generally respects these rights.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 3 / 4

The legal framework and government policies are generally supportive of property rights and private business activity, though bureaucratic obstacles and corruption pose challenges in practice.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 2 / 4

There are few formal restrictions on personal social freedoms. However, domestic violence is reportedly common and rarely prosecuted, and femicide remains a concern. In November 2021, the government presented its second national strategy for combating GBV.

The minimum age for marriage with parental consent is 14 for girls and 16 for boys, as opposed to 18 without parental consent for both. Roughly a third of girls marry before age

18. Child sexual abuse is prevalent. In June 2021, the government began training medical and law enforcement personnel on appropriately investigating child sexual abuse.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 2 / 4

Forced labor is prohibited and child labor is restricted by law. There are also basic legal protections against exploitative or dangerous working conditions. However, the government lacks the capacity to enforce these rules effectively, particularly in the informal agricultural sector. The economy is heavily reliant on foreign aid.

Saudi Arabia

Population: 35,900,000

Capital: Riyadh

Freedom Status: Not Free

Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: Saudi Arabia's absolute monarchy restricts almost all political rights and civil liberties. No officials at the national level are elected. The regime relies on pervasive surveillance, the criminalization of dissent, appeals to sectarianism and ethnicity, and public spending supported by oil revenues to maintain power. Women and religious minorities face extensive discrimination in law and in practice. Working conditions for the large expatriate labor force are often exploitative.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- In February, women's rights activist Loujain al-Hathloul was released on probation after serving nearly three years in prison on counterterrorism charges relating to her peaceful activism for women to have the right to drive. She remains banned from travelling for five years and is forbidden from talking to the media. Her release was widely seen as a gesture by the authorities to the new US administration.
- In March, changes to the kafala visa-sponsorship system for foreign workers ended the requirement that they obtain their employer's permission to leave the country or to take another job, a practice that had been criticized for enabling forced labor. However, foreign workers do need to obtain permission from the government to take those actions. Moreover, the changes do not apply to the nearly 3.6 million people who work as domestic workers, personal security guards, or chauffeurs.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 1 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 0 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

Saudi Arabia's king is chosen by his predecessor from among male descendants of the country's founder, though the choice must be approved by a council of senior princes, the Allegiance Council. The king rules for life. King Salman bin Abdulaziz al-Saud appointed son Mohammed bin Salman as crown prince in 2017, displacing the prince's older cousin, Mohammed bin Nayef, who was stripped of all official positions. Bin Nayef was detained along with a sibling of King Salman in 2020 on charges of treason over an alleged plot to overthrow both the king and the crown prince.

The cabinet, which is appointed by the king, passes legislation that becomes law once ratified by royal decree. King Salman also serves as prime minister, and Mohammed bin Salman serves as deputy prime minister and minister of defense.

The king appoints the 150 members of the Majlis al-Shura (Consultative Council), who serve in an advisory capacity and wield no legislative authority, for four-year terms. King Salman appointed new members in October 2020.

Limited nonpartisan elections for advisory councils at the municipal level were introduced in 2005. In the 2015 elections, two-thirds of the seats on the 284 councils were open to voting, while the rest were filled through appointment by the minister of municipal and rural affairs. Women were allowed to vote and run as candidates for the first time, and a small number won seats. Elections due in 2019 were postponed indefinitely without any clear official explanation.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 0 / 4

The electoral framework lacks constitutional protections, and the 2015 municipal elections were subject to onerous restrictions. The kingdom's rules on gender segregation were applied to campaigns, meaning no candidates could produce posters showing their faces or meet in person with voters of the opposite sex. Candidates were also barred from giving media interviews, leading many to campaign via social media. Several candidates were disqualified for unclear reasons, though some were reinstated after appeals. Ultimately, a small fraction of the citizen population participated in the elections, reflecting doubts about the effectiveness of the advisory councils.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 0 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 0 / 4

Political parties are forbidden, and political dissent is effectively criminalized. Some of the country's most prominent political rights organizations and activists, including founding members of the banned Saudi Civil and Political Rights Association (ACPRA), have been arrested and sentenced to prison in recent years; one founder, Abdullah al-Hamid, died in custody in April 2020. Many other political activists continue to serve lengthy prison sentences. A new political party, the National Assembly party, was established by Saudi exiles living abroad in 2020.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 0 / 4

The Saudi rulers are explicitly opposed to democracy in their country. Opposition movements are banned, and the government is increasingly intolerant even of moderate critics. The Muslim Brotherhood, a Sunni Islamist political organization, is believed to have the sympathy of a substantial minority of Saudis but has been designated a terrorist group since 2014.

Other groups and individuals that criticize the regime or call for political reform—whether Sunni or Shiite, Islamist or secularist—are subject to arbitrary detention. Prominent reformist clerics Salman al-Awdah, Awad al-Qarni, and Ali al-Omari were arrested in 2017 for “plotting against the state,” seemingly because they were perceived as sympathetic to Qatar and the Muslim Brotherhood. All three remain detained at the end of 2021, pending trials that have been repeatedly and arbitrarily delayed, and they potentially face the death penalty.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 0 / 4

The monarchy generally excludes the public from any meaningful political participation. In the absence of political parties, voters in Saudi Arabia's limited municipal elections have been heavily influenced by tribal and religious leaders, many of whom benefit from close ties to the ruling establishment.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 0 / 4

Although political rights are curtailed for all Saudi citizens, women, religious minorities, and LGBT+ people face additional obstacles to participation given the kingdom's strict laws and customs on matters including gender segregation and sexual activity, and its intolerance of religious groups that deviate from the state-sanctioned interpretation of Sunni Islam. Women make up 30 of the 150 members of the appointed Majlis al-Shura (advisory council). Members of religious minorities and women are largely excluded from leadership positions, though a woman was appointed as deputy speaker in October 2020. Women secured about 1 percent of the seats in the 2015 municipal council elections. Shiites reportedly hold a small number of advisory council seats and many municipal council seats in Shiite-majority areas.

Tribes that have close kinship ties with King Salman, especially from the Najd region, have historically held privileged positions in government. The Shura Council includes members of prominent tribal councils such as the al-Mutairi, al-Murrah, or al-Harbi, and the National Guard, one of the country's military forces, has relied on tribal loyalties. However, the political influence of tribal networks has ostensibly waned, as the king and the crown prince seek to modernize the state, curb the influence of potentially autonomous social forces, and consolidate a politically loyal elite, one independent of social identity.

Noncitizens, who make up roughly a third of the population in Saudi Arabia, have no political rights, and citizenship can only be directly transmitted by a citizen father whose marriage is recognized by the state.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 1 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 0 / 4

The kingdom's only elected officials serve on local advisory councils and have little or no influence over national laws and policies.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 1 / 4

Corruption remains a significant problem. Although the government generates massive revenue from the sale of oil, which it redistributes through social welfare programs and as patronage, little is known about state accounting or the various direct ways in which public wealth becomes a source of private privilege for the royal family and its clients.

The government has taken some steps to combat corruption and recover misappropriated assets, but its opaque methods have raised serious concerns about politicization and lack of due process. The crown prince heads an anticorruption committee, which in 2017 ordered the detention of more than 300 people, many of whom were coerced into turning over billions of dollars in assets to the state in out-of-court settlements. Mohammed bin Salman's campaign has targeted potential rivals within the royal family, leading observers to suggest these crackdowns are meant to consolidate his political and economic control.

Since 2020, the government's ostensible anticorruption campaign has shifted its focus to lower-level officials. In 2021, the national anticorruption body, Nazaha, announced that several hundred people were arrested from a wide range of government ministries for corruption or abuse of power.

Nontribal nepotism in government is also a challenge.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 0 / 4

The functioning of government is largely opaque. The availability of some economic data is improving, including data on the government budget, but overall, whether or how state funds are disbursed and the internal decision-making process that allocates them are unclear; there is no public mechanism for holding senior officials accountable for their decisions. The defense budget is especially shielded from public scrutiny. The sovereign wealth fund, called the Public Investment Fund, is largely opaque.

The state's oil revenues make up most of its financial resources. In 2019, the state oil company, Saudi Aramco, listed shares on the domestic stock exchange, which requires little transparency, after questions about the company's relationship with the royal family deterred them from a public offering on a major international exchange.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 6 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 2 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 0 / 4

The government controls domestic media content and heavily influences regional print and satellite-television coverage. Journalists can be imprisoned for a variety of vaguely defined crimes. The Committee to Protect Journalists reported that 14 journalists were imprisoned in Saudi Arabia in 2021.

A 2011 royal decree amended the press law to criminalize, among other things, any criticism of the country's grand mufti, the Council of Senior Religious Scholars, or government officials; violations can result in fines and forced closure of media outlets. All blogs and websites must have a Ministry of Information license or face fines and possible closure.

Saudi officials blamed the 2018 killing in Istanbul of Jamal Khashoggi, one of the country's most prominent journalists who was self-exiled in the US and working for the Washington Post, on rogue Saudi intelligence agents. A handful of agents were sentenced to prison, but no senior officials were held accountable despite evidence that the killing was coordinated by the then deputy head of the general intelligence presidency and by a senior advisor to the crown prince. The crown prince's senior advisor was sanctioned by the US government in February 2021.

The government maintains an extensive system of social media surveillance and regulation and invests considerable resources in automated "bot" and other accounts that influence and distort the social media environment and target prominent users. In 2020, internet activist Amani al-Zain was reportedly arrested after a video of her criticizing the crown prince—and making a reference to Khashoggi's murder—surfaced.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 0 / 4

The 1992 Basic Law declares that the Quran and the Sunna are the country's constitution. Islam is the official religion, and all Saudis are required by law to be Muslims. A 2014 royal decree punishes atheism with up to 20 years in prison. The government prohibits the public practice of any religion other than Islam and restricts the religious practices of Shiites and of those who practice Sufism. The construction of Shiite mosques is constrained through licensing rules and prohibited outside of Eastern Province, where most Shiites live. Although the government recognizes the right of non-Muslims to worship in private, it does not always respect this right in practice.

The government exercises significant influence over Muslim clerics—both officially appointed figures who depend on government patronage and independent religious scholars who need a measure of official goodwill to function openly, appear on television, and avoid penalties.

Online commentary that touches on religion can be harshly punished.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 1 / 4

Academic freedom is restricted, and informers monitor classrooms for compliance with curriculum rules, including a ban on teaching secular philosophy and religions other than Islam. Despite changes to textbooks in recent years, intolerance in the classroom remains a significant problem, as some educators continue to espouse discriminatory and hateful views of non-Muslims and Muslim minority sects.

Academics and researchers have faced punishment for being perceived as criticizing government policies.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 1 / 4

Saudis can engage in some degree of private discussion on political and other topics, including criticism of certain aspects of government performance, but the climate for free expression has deteriorated sharply since the 2018 assassination of Jamal Khashoggi and the arrests of many prominent writers and activists, which served as warnings to ordinary Saudis to avoid dissent. Self-censorship is virtually ubiquitous.

There are severe criminal penalties for criticism of the regime and free discussion on topics like religion or the royal family. Laws are often vaguely worded, giving the state considerable discretion to determine what constitutes illegal expression.

Surveillance is extensive within Saudi Arabia, and Saudis living and traveling abroad are also subject to spying and intimidation. Saudi Arabia is one of at least 10 governments that has had contracts with the Israeli NSO Group for Pegasus spyware, which allows users to secretly hack into a subject's phone and spy on their whereabouts and communications in real time. Investigations in 2021 by journalists and tech researchers, including from the Canadian privacy rights group Citizen Lab, uncovered a new form of surveillance tool used by the Saudi government that needed no interaction with the user to access personal devices.

In November 2019, US prosecutors accused two former Twitter employees of providing information on users, including perceived government critics, to Saudi authorities. In October 2021, a court upheld a 20-year prison sentence against Abdulrahman al-Sadhan for criticizing the government through an anonymous Twitter account. The number of people detained for criticizing the government is not published, and not all cases are reported as family members fear retribution should theirs be made public.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 0 / 12E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 0 / 4

Freedom of assembly is not respected, and the government has imposed harsh punishments—including at times the death penalty—on those who lead or participate in public protests.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 0 / 4

Nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) must obtain a government license to operate. Until the adoption of an NGO law in 2015, officials had approved licenses only for charitable groups; authorities have expressed a desire to encourage the growth of civil society but discourage independent work on human rights and governance issues. Reformist organizations have been denied licenses in practice, in some cases through arbitrary delays.

Human rights activists and other civil society representatives face regular harassment and detention. In February 2021, women's rights activist Loujain al-Hathloul was released on probation after serving nearly three years in prison on counterterrorism charges relating to her peaceful activism for women to have the right to drive. She remains banned from travelling for five years and is forbidden from talking to the media. Her release was widely seen as a gesture by the authorities to the new US administration.

No domestic NGO openly advocates for LGBT+ rights in the country.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 0 / 4

No laws protect the rights to form independent labor unions, bargain collectively, or engage in strikes. Workers who engage in union activity are subject to dismissal or detention. A May 2020 COVID-19-related directive banned "gatherings of workers" to five people, while limits on other gatherings were set at 50.

F. RULE OF LAW: 2 / 16F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 1 / 4

The judiciary has very little independence in practice. Judges are appointed by the king and overseen by the Supreme Judicial Council, whose chairman is also the justice minister. A special commission of judicial experts issues opinions that serve as guidelines for judges on the interpretation of Sharia (Islamic law), which forms the basis of Saudi law. Judges have significant discretion in how they interpret Sharia and do not have to publish an explanation of their judgments.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 1 / 4

Defendants' rights are poorly protected by law. Detainees are often denied access to legal counsel during interrogation, and lengthy pretrial detention and detention without charge are common. Due process is notably lacking in death penalty cases. Statistics and other information on prisoners, sometimes including their whereabouts or reason for arrest, are lacking. The number of political prisoners is difficult to assess, with some cases never reported due to fears that publicity will incur retribution from the authorities. Conditional releases sometimes require prisoners not to speak about their experiences.

A 2014 antiterrorism law includes lengthy prison sentences for criticizing the monarchy or the government. Among other provisions, it expanded the power of police to conduct raids targeting suspected antigovernment activity without judicial approval. Several Palestinians and Jordanians were sentenced on terrorism charges in August 2021.

The hundreds of people arrested in the 2017 anticorruption crackdown did not pass through the judicial system but were instead compelled to hand over assets to the government in return for their release. Government supporters claimed that the judicial process would have taken several years due to a lack of capacity.

Allegations of torture by police and prison officials are common, and access to prisoners by independent human rights and legal organizations is extremely limited. In 2019, international media published leaked prison medical records indicating that many political prisoners suffered from cuts, bruises, burns, and malnutrition. Detained women's rights activists were reportedly given electric shocks, whipped, beaten, sexually abused, and threatened with rape. Conditions in migrant detention centers are notoriously poor.

Corporal punishment, most often lashing, is common in criminal sentencing, though the government ended the use of flogging for some crimes in April 2020.

Capital punishment is applied to a wide range of crimes beyond murder, including drug and protest-related offenses. Defendants facing the death penalty are known to confess under torture, but courts do not consistently investigate subsequent retractions. The number of executions rose to at least 40 in January–July 2021, according to Amnesty International, after falling sharply to 27 executions during the entirety of 2020, when Saudi Arabia hosted the G20 summit. Meanwhile, three soldiers were executed in April 2021 for alleged treason; no details about their actions were publicized.

Saudi Arabia has faced cross-border military attacks from Yemen since 2015, when it entered a war against that country's Shiite-led and Iranian-backed Houthi (Ansarallah) movement. These include drone attacks, such as an attack on Abha airport in August 2021, which wounded eight people. The country has also experienced waves of domestic terrorism from Al Qaeda in the past.

Saudi authorities were accused of firing on, and later detaining, Ethiopian migrants living in Yemen when Houthi forces expelled several thousand of them to the Saudi border in 2020.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 0 / 4

The courts engage in routine discrimination against various groups, citing their interpretations of Sharia. A woman's testimony is generally given half the weight of a man's testimony, and the testimony of anyone other than observant Sunni Muslims can be disregarded by judges.

Shiites, who make up 10 to 15 percent of the population, face socioeconomic disadvantages, discrimination in employment, and underrepresentation in government positions and the security forces.

Education and economic rights for Saudi women have improved significantly in recent years, but women are still subject to extensive legal and societal discrimination, most notably through the guardianship system, in which women must rely on a close male relative to approve many basic activities. Although legal reforms have recently reduced the scope of the guardianship system, it remains deeply entrenched in societal practices and customs, and an individual woman's degree of freedom depends to a large extent on the attitudes of her family. Reforms announced in 2019 included a ban on gender discrimination in employment.

Same-sex sexual activity is generally understood to be prohibited under Sharia, and LGBT+ people are at risk of harassment, discrimination, criminal punishment, and violence.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 2 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 0 / 4

The government punishes activists and critics by limiting their ability to travel outside the country, and reform advocates are routinely stripped of their passports. Family members of activists can also be banned from travel or imprisoned. For instance, in 2020, authorities jailed two of the children of Saad al-Jabri, who was formerly the most trusted counterterrorism advisor to the previous crown prince and is now in exile in Canada; Jabri alleged that the Saudi government had sent a hit squad to try to kill him in 2018.

Gender segregation restricts freedom of movement for both men and women, but male guardianship and other factors have historically imposed onerous constraints on women. The long-standing ban on women driving was lifted in 2018, and since 2019 adult women have been able to apply for a passport independently. Gender-segregation norms are easing in some places but unevenly and informally.

In March 2021, the kafala visa-sponsorship system was modified so that certain foreign workers no longer need their employer's permission to leave their job, take a new job, or leave the country; they instead need to seek permission from the Saudi government.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 1 / 4

While a great deal of business activity in the kingdom is dominated by or connected to members of the government, the ruling family, or other elite families, officials have given assurances that special industrial and commercial zones are free from interference by the royal family.

Women face legal discrimination regarding property rights, with daughters typically receiving half the inheritance awarded to sons. Women are no longer legally required to obtain permission from a male guardian to obtain business licenses.

There are several official restrictions on marriage: Muslim women may not marry non-Muslims, citizens require the interior ministry's permission to marry noncitizens, and men are barred from marrying women from certain countries. All sexual activity outside of marriage is criminalized, and the death penalty can be applied in certain circumstances. Women face legal disadvantages in divorce and custody proceedings and cannot marry without a male guardian's permission. Under reforms announced in 2019, women can register children's births and oversee children's travel.

A 2013 law broadly defined and criminalized domestic abuse, prescribing fines and up to a year in prison for perpetrators. However, enforcement remains problematic, with some officials prioritizing privacy and family integrity over safety and justice for victims. Prosecutions are extremely rare. Women's practical ability to leave abusive relationships is severely limited. While women are no longer legally required to live with their husbands under the 2019 reforms to the guardianship system, social taboos and other obstacles often deter them from leaving their family home. There are a limited number of shelters for women escaping abuse, but women are not allowed to leave them without their guardians' permission.

The religious police's authority to enforce gender-segregation and personal-attire rules was sharply curtailed in law and practice in 2016. Women's dress is now less tightly controlled, though some Saudis have faced penalties for breaching norms of perceived "modesty" on social media.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 1 / 4

Foreign workers—who make up more than half of the active labor force—enjoy limited legal protections and remain vulnerable to trafficking and forced labor, primarily through employers' exploitation of the kafala system. They also lack pathways to become citizens and face discrimination, including lower wages. However, March 2021 changes to the kafala system ended the requirement that foreign workers obtain their employer's permission to leave the country or to take another job, a practice that had been criticized for enabling forced labor. However, foreign workers do need to obtain permission from the government to take those actions. Moreover, the changes do not apply to the nearly 3.6 million people who work as domestic workers, personal security guards, or chauffeurs who are governed by separate regulations that provide fewer safeguards against exploitative working conditions.

Government programs give preferential treatment to companies that hire certain percentages of Saudi citizens and penalize those that fail to meet such targets.

Human trafficking remains a problem. In November 2021, UN experts called on the Saudi and Vietnamese authorities to combat the trafficking of women and girls from Vietnam to Saudi Arabia, noting one example in which a 15-year-old Vietnamese girl died after her employer beat her and denied her food; her family was unable to recover her body because her immigration documents had been forged by traffickers.

Senegal

Population: 17,200,000

Capital: Dakar

Freedom Status: Partly Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Senegal is one of Africa's most stable electoral democracies and has undergone peaceful transfers of power between rival parties since 2000. However, politically motivated prosecutions of opposition leaders and changes to the electoral laws have reduced the competitiveness of the opposition in recent years. The country is known for its relatively independent media and free expression, though defamation laws continue to constrain press freedom. Other ongoing challenges include corruption in government, weak rule of law, and inadequate protections for the rights of women and LGBT+ people.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- Widespread protests erupted in March following the arrest of prominent opposition leader Ousmane Sonko on charges of rape; Sonko denied the allegations, calling his arrest politically motivated. An estimated 14 people were killed and approximately 590 injured during the demonstrations, which were characterized by high levels of violence against protesters by security forces.
 - Over the course of the year, hundreds of protesters rallied to protest against LGBT+ rights, demanding that the government increase criminal penalties for same-sex sexual activity. Draft legislation that would lengthen prison sentences for people convicted of same-sex sexual activity and impose criminal penalties on those who finance or publicly support “any activity relating to the LGBT+ agenda” was introduced in December.

- In June, the National Assembly revised several laws, allegedly to combat terrorism. Local and international rights groups condemned the legislation, saying that the amendments are overly broad, and could be used to silence dissent and expand police surveillance powers.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 29 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 9 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 3 / 4

The president is chief of state and head of government, and is directly elected to a maximum of two consecutive terms. In 2016, the presidential term was reduced via referendum from seven years to five, effective after the end of President Macky Sall’s term in 2019.

In the February 2019 presidential election, Sall, of the Alliance for the Republic (APR), defeated four challengers including former prime minister Idrissa Seck of the Rewmi Party and Ousmane Sonko of the Patriots of Senegal for Ethics, Work, and Fraternity (PASTEF) party.

While international observers declared the election credible, it was marred by the exclusion of two prominent opposition politicians, Khalifa Sall and Karim Wade, who might have seriously challenged President Sall. In January 2019, just weeks before the polls, the Constitutional Council ruled they were both ineligible to run for president because they had been convicted in separate, politically fraught corruption cases.

In November 2021, the Council of Ministers adopted a draft revision of the Constitution that would reintroduce the position of prime minister, which had been abolished in May 2019. Further draft amendments reintroduced the accountability of the government to the National Assembly—a provision that had also been removed in 2019—and restored the president’s power to dissolve the legislative body. Though the National Assembly voted to adopt the revisions in December, they had not come into force by year’s end.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 3 / 4

Members of Senegal’s 165-seat National Assembly are elected to five-year terms, with 105 elected in single-member districts, and 60 by proportional representation. In the July 2017 parliamentary elections, the ruling United in Hope (BBY) coalition won 125 seats, followed by Abdoulaye Wade’s Winning Coalition–Wattu Senegaal with 19. Khalifa Sall’s Mankoo Taxawu Senegaal coalition took 7, and 11 groups divided the remainder. International observers deemed the elections credible despite significant procedural errors and logistical challenges.

New biometric voting cards were distributed to only 70 percent of eligible voters before the 2017 elections. Some voters were allegedly disenfranchised because of difficulties related to securing alternative identification measures, which were approved just four days before the elections.

Local elections have been repeatedly delayed since 2019, and were again postponed in March 2021, when the National Assembly voted to reschedule the polls for January 2022.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 3 / 4

The National Autonomous Electoral Commission (CENA) administers elections. Although the CENA is nominally independent, its members are appointed by the president. The opposition criticized the government for making important changes ahead of the 2017 legislative balloting, including the introduction of the new biometric voting system, without engaging in dialogue or building political consensus.

A new electoral law passed in 2018 requires all aspiring presidential candidates to collect signatures from at least 0.8 percent of the overall electorate before their names could appear on the ballot, and all groups presenting National Assembly lists to obtain signatures from 0.5 percent of voters in at least seven regions. Of the 27 candidates who submitted the required signatures prior to the 2019 presidential election, only 5 were approved by the Constitutional Council. That June, a European Union (EU) election observation mission said the controversial requirement could pose “serious political and organizational problems” in upcoming local elections. In April 2021, the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS) Court of Justice found that the provision violated the right to free participation in elections and ordered Senegal to “remove all obstacles” within six months. Despite the ruling, the government had not removed the electoral sponsorship requirement by year’s end.

In May 2019, opposition parties and the Sall administration entered talks aimed at resolving voter-roll concerns and reviewing the overarching voting process. However, neither of these goals were reached by the end of 2021, due in part to boycotts from opposition participants.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 12 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 3 / 4

Registration requirements for new political parties are not onerous, and registered parties can organize and operate without government interference. However, opposition candidates still face major financial inequities when competing with incumbents. There is no public financing for political parties, but the ruling party deploys a vast set of state resources to garner support, whereas opposition leaders are often forced to rely on personal wealth to finance party operations or on political alliances to access power. In January 2021, the Minister of the Interior threatened to dissolve PASTEF, which had succeeded in raising about 125 million CFA francs ($206,400) within a few days to finance its political activities.

The opposition can increase its support or gain power through elections. However, the 2018 electoral law was criticized by opposition leaders for making it more difficult for candidates to appear on the ballot, and was widely seen as a move to clear the field and ensure President Sall’s reelection in 2019.

The prosecutions of some of President Sall’s most prominent political opponents in recent years has also reduced the competitiveness of the opposition. In January 2019, the Constitutional Council ruled that Khalifa Sall, a former mayor of Dakar, and Karim Wade, the son of former president Abdoulaye Wade, were both ineligible to run in the 2019 presidential election because both had previously been sentenced to prison terms for corruption.

In March 2021, prominent opposition leader Ousmane Sonko was arrested on charges of rape, leading to widespread protests. Sonko repeatedly denied the allegations, saying that the charge was a politically motivated attempt to exclude him from the 2024 presidential race. Sonko remained under judicial supervision throughout the year, and has been denied permission to leave the country.

The opposition's ability to compete with President Sall was also lessened by the president's decision to appoint opposition figures to government posts in November 2020, when he appointed several Rewmi Party members to his cabinet.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 3 / 4

People's political choices are largely free from domination by groups that are not democratically accountable. Despite the constitutional separation of religion and state, Sufi Muslim marabouts exercise some influence on voters and politicians, particularly on subjects like homosexuality, marriage, and abortion rights.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 3 / 4

Female representation in the cabinet is relatively poor. Women are better represented in the National Assembly, holding 70 seats and representing almost 43 percent of the body. This is partially due to a 2010 law requiring gender parity on candidate lists. Women's overall rate of participation in politics, such as voting and engaging in local political activities, is nevertheless lower than men's.

Due to high levels of discrimination and social stigma, LGBT+ people have no meaningful political representation.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 8 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 3 / 4

President Sall, his cabinet, and national legislators determine government policies. However, power is concentrated in the executive branch, and the National Assembly is limited in its ability to check the president. The executive has blocked certain parliamentary inquiries into its activities. In May 2019, lawmakers approved a controversial measure to abolish the post of prime minister, which Sall promptly signed. In late 2021, the National Assembly voted to reinstate the position of prime minister, though it had not been restored by year's end.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 2 / 4

Corruption remains a serious problem, and high-level officials often act with impunity. Anticorruption laws are unevenly enforced and enforcement actions are sometimes viewed as politically motivated. The corruption case against Khalifa Sall, for example, was widely perceived as an effort to neutralize one of the president's most powerful opponents.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 3 / 4

The government generally operates with openness. However, authorities frequently award contracts without any formal tender process, and do not always publicly release contracts or bilateral agreements before they are signed.

Some COVID-19-related decisions were also made opaquely. The National Office for the Fight against Fraud and Corruption (OFNAC), an anticorruption watchdog, received complaints over the nontransparent process for distributing pandemic-related food aid but then community development minister Mansour Faye, who was accused of mismanagement, vowed to refuse any OFNAC summons. Despite these concerns, Faye was appointed infrastructure minister in November 2020, and later became minister for water and sanitation.

A 2014 law requires confidential asset disclosures by cabinet members, top National Assembly officials, and the managers of large public funds; the president's asset disclosures are made public.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 39 / 60 (-3)

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 13 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 2 / 4

The constitution guarantees freedom of speech, and Senegal is home to many independent television and radio stations and print outlets. Although the overall media situation has improved considerably since President Sall was elected in 2012, several subsequent developments have constrained press freedom. A controversial law enacted in January 2021 allows for prison terms of up to two years for defamation and three years for publishing "fake news" likely to "discredit public institutions" or "prejudice public decency."

In March, internet service was disrupted and major social media outlets such as WhatsApp and YouTube were partially blocked for a few days as clashes between protesters and riot police intensified following the arrest of opposition leader Ousmane Sonko. The Audiovisual Regulatory Council (CNRA) also briefly suspended two television stations for their coverage of the protests, saying that such coverage "could threaten national stability or social cohesion."

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 4 / 4

There is no state religion, and freedom of worship is constitutionally protected and respected in practice. Muslims constitute 96 percent of the population.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

Academic freedom is guaranteed by the constitution and generally respected in practice.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 3 / 4

Private discussion is generally open and free. However, individuals have occasionally been arrested for social media posts deemed offensive by the government.

In 2018, the National Assembly passed an electronic-communications bill, which included a vaguely worded provision expanding the regulatory power of the government over social media companies. Rights activists expressed concern that the law could be used to shut down, tax, or surveil communications on popular social media platforms.

In June 2021, the National Assembly amended the penal code and the code of criminal procedure, allegedly to combat terrorism. Opposition parties and civil society groups protested against the laws, saying they were too broad and could be used to silence dissent and expand police surveillance powers.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 7 / 12 (-2)

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 1 / 4 (-1)

The constitution guarantees freedom of assembly and peaceful demonstrations, but the Ministry of the Interior must approve protests in advance. The government has often cracked down on assembly rights by banning protests around tense political moments and violently dispersing some demonstrations.

The government also reserved the right to limit assemblies under a COVID-19-related state of emergency issued in March 2020. While the state of emergency expired that July, some assembly restrictions were reintroduced in August and remained in force through year's end. Though most COVID-19-related assembly restrictions were lifted by March 2021, some remained in place; the government continued to ban demonstrations throughout the year, citing the possible spread of COVID-19. In September, civil society group Noo Lank defied the ban to hold a protest against Dakar's high cost of living, resulting in the arrest of several protesters.

The March arrest of opposition leader Ousmane Sonko sparked large protests across the country. The demonstrations, which lasted several days, were marked by violent clashes between protesters and security forces. Numerous human rights violations were committed by security forces during the demonstrations, with an estimated 14 people killed and approximately 590 injured.

Assembly rights of LGBT+ groups and nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) that support people living with HIV and AIDS are limited.

Score Change: The score declined from 2 to 1 because authorities used lethal force in response to opposition protests in March and cited the pandemic to selectively suppress other demonstrations during the year.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 3 / 4 (-1)

NGOs generally operate without interference from state or nonstate actors, though the ability of LGBT+ groups to function is impeded by assembly restrictions. Draft legislation introduced in December 2021 seeks to impose criminal penalties on those who finance or publicly support "any activity relating to the LGBT+ agenda," proposing prison sentences of up to five years for those convicted. If approved, the draft law would effectively criminalize the operation of LGBT+ rights NGOs in the country altogether.

In June, the National Assembly passed revisions to the penal code and code of criminal procedure—ostensibly intended to strengthen Senegal's antiterrorism laws—that include provisions allowing NGO leaders to be criminally charged for alleged offenses committed by their organizations. Local and international rights groups have also condemned the legislation, saying that the amendments are overly broad and could lead NGOs and their employees to self-censor in fear of being targeted for their work.

Score Change: The score declined from 4 to 3 because a broad new antiterrorism law imposes criminal liability on NGO leaders for alleged offenses by their organizations and because of official pressure on NGOs that advocate for the rights of LGBT+ people.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 3 / 4

Workers, apart from security employees, have rights to organize, bargain collectively, and strike, though the right to strike is impinged by legal provisions that ban pickets and sit-down strikes, among other activities. Trade unions must be authorized by the Ministry of the Interior, and unions lack legal recourse if registration is denied.

F. RULE OF LAW: 8 / 16 (-1)

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 2 / 4

The judiciary is formally independent and enjoys a relatively good reputation, but the president controls appointments to the Constitutional Council, the Court of Appeal, and the Council of State. Judges are prone to pressure from the government on matters involving high-level officials. The Higher Council of the Judiciary, which recommends judicial appointments to the executive branch, is headed by the president and minister of justice, which critics argue compromises its independence.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 2 / 4

The law guarantees fair public trials and defendants' rights, but arbitrary arrest and extended detention remains a concern. Though the government is obligated to supply attorneys to felony defendants who cannot afford them, this representation is inconsistent in practice. Lengthy pretrial detention remains a problem. The judicial system's reach does not consistently extend to rural areas, which more often rely on traditional methods of conflict resolution.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 2 / 4 (-1)

Individuals are generally protected from the illegitimate use of physical force. However, Senegalese prisons are overcrowded, and human rights groups have documented incidents of excessive force and cruel treatment by prison authorities. In an effort to limit the spread of COVID-19 through the prison system, President Sall pardoned over 2,000 prisoners—a fifth of the prison population—in April 2020.

A low-level separatist conflict in the Casamance region is ongoing, though attacks by the Movement of Democratic Forces of Casamance (MFDC) have lessened since a de facto cease-fire was reached in 2012.

The protests that erupted in March 2021 following the arrest of opposition leader Ousmane Sonko were characterized by high levels of violence, much of which was directed at protesters by Senegalese security forces using disproportionate force; an estimated 14 people were killed and nearly 600 were injured during the demonstrations. Officers accused of using excessive force had not been held accountable for their actions by year's end.

Score Change: The score declined from 3 to 2 because the March protests entailed widespread violence that affected public security, and officers accused of using excessive force were not held accountable for their actions.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 2 / 4

The caste system is still prevalent among many of Senegal's ethnic groups. Individuals of lower castes are subject to discrimination in employment. Women face persistent inequities in employment, health care, and education.

Same-sex sexual activity remains criminalized. While these laws are rarely enforced, LGBT+ people risk violence, threats, and mob attacks, as well as discrimination in housing, employment, and health care. During 2021, demonstrators rallied multiple times in support of a draft law that proposed increasing prison sentences for those found guilty of same-sex sexual activity and introducing criminal penalties for those who contribute to "any activity relating to the LGBT+ agenda."

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 11 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 3 / 4

Citizens generally enjoy freedom of movement and can change their residence, employment, and educational institution without serious restrictions, though the threat of land mines and rebel activity has hindered travel through parts of the Casamance region.

Movement was restricted by a COVID-19-related state of emergency, which was introduced in March 2020. The state of emergency expired that July, though some measures were reintroduced in August and remained in effect through year's end. In January 2021, movement was restricted when the government declared a COVID-19-related state of health disaster in the regions of Dakar and Thiès. The state of health disaster ended in March following several days of antilockdown demonstrations, during which at least 10 people died.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 3 / 4

The civil code facilitates ownership of private property, and property rights are generally respected. Commercial dispute-resolution processes can be drawn out. Property title and land-registration protocols are inconsistently applied, though the government has worked to ease property acquisition and registration. Husbands are legally regarded as heads of households. Traditional customs limit women's ability to purchase property, and local rules on inheritance make it difficult for women to become beneficiaries.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 3 / 4

Rates of female genital mutilation (FGM) have declined due in part to campaigns to discourage the practice, but it remains a problem. The government launched a plan to reduce early marriage in 2016, given that almost one in three Senegalese girls married before age 18.

Rape was considered a misdemeanor before President Sall signed into law a measure criminalizing rape in January 2020; this followed 2019 demonstrations which were prompted by the murder of a 23-year-old woman during an attempted rape.

The law allows abortion only to save a woman's life, and abortions for medical reasons are difficult to obtain in practice. Throughout 2021, a number of groups that consider abortion contrary to national values, including religious organizations, campaigned against legalizing abortion in cases of rape and incest.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 2 / 4

Child labor remains a problem, particularly in the informal economy, and laws restricting the practice are inadequately enforced. Forced begging by students at religious schools is common, and teachers suspected of abuse are rarely prosecuted.

According to the 2021 edition of the US State Department's Trafficking in Persons Report, the Senegalese government has engaged in ongoing efforts to implement a trafficking database and provide support for vulnerable children facing homelessness. However, the report also noted that the authorities inconsistently applied penalties to alleged traffickers and did not investigate or prosecute traffickers who orchestrate forced begging.

Serbia

Population: 6,800,000

Capital: Belgrade

Freedom Status: Partly Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Serbia is a parliamentary democracy with competitive multiparty elections, but in recent years the ruling Serbian Progressive Party (SNS) has steadily eroded political rights and civil liberties, putting pressure on independent media, the political opposition, and civil society organizations.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- Over the course of the year, members of European Parliament facilitated several rounds of interparty dialogue between the SNS and opposition parties to address poor electoral conditions in the run-up to the 2022 general elections, including systemic progovernment media bias, a lack of campaign finance oversight, and the absence of sanctions for electoral violations. Some opposition leaders have criticized the mediation process as hollow, saying that the ruling party would not accept any measures that would meaningfully improve the integrity of the electoral process.
- By March, all independent media and journalists' associations had withdrawn from the government's Working Group on Security and Protection of Journalists in protest of deteriorating media freedom and safety conditions. Independent journalists have increasingly experienced pressure, threats, and physical attacks, often at the hands of SNS-affiliated groups and individuals, with little response from the government.
- In October, the government resolved to form a temporary supervisory body to monitor media during the 2022 election cycle. Opposition groups have rejected this measure as ineffective, citing the continued persistence of widespread pro-SNS media bias.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 21 / 40 (-1)

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 7 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 3 / 4

The president is directly elected for up to two five-year terms. In 2017, then prime minister Aleksandar Vučić won the election with 55 percent of the vote in a field of 11 candidates. The campaign was characterized by media bias and allegations of misuse of public resources and vote buying. Vučić remained prime minister throughout that election period, blurring the line between official and electoral activities.

The prime minister is elected by the parliament. Vučić named Ana Brnabić, then the local government minister, to succeed him as prime minister following the 2017 presidential election. In October 2020, Brnabić was again confirmed to the post, after the SNS retained power in the June parliamentary elections.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 2 / 4

The National Assembly is a unicameral, 250-seat legislature whose deputies are elected to four-year terms under a system of proportional representation with a single nationwide constituency. Parliamentary elections were held in Serbia, together with elections in the Autonomous Province of Vojvodina and several municipalities, in June 2020. Initially scheduled for April, they were postponed by a state of emergency put in place due to the COVID-19 pandemic.

The Aleksandar Vučić–For Our Children electoral list, led by the SNS, won 60.7 percent of the vote and 188 seats. The allied Socialist Party and its electoral-list partner, United Serbia, won a combined 32, while the Serbian Patriotic Alliance won 11. Ethnic minority lists, which did not have to surpass the parliamentary threshold to attain representation, won the remaining seats.

Opposition groups that held seats in the previous parliament largely boycotted the June poll, saying the electoral environment was neither free nor fair. Several weeks before the poll was originally scheduled, the parliament reduced the voting threshold to win seats from five percent to three, in what was considered an effort to reduce the effectiveness of the opposition boycott. Turnout was 48.9 percent, the lowest since the introduction of multiparty elections in 1990.

Observers reported numerous irregularities during the campaign and on election day. The Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe's (OSCE) Office for Democratic Institutions and Human Rights (ODIHR) noted that President Vučić's "continued engagement" as head of state and SNS leader "afforded him unparalleled public exposure, without clear differentiation of his roles." Progovernment parties benefited from a preponderance of television coverage, while voters—especially public-sector workers—were pressured to support the government, according to citizen observers. Parallel voter lists were used to track voters during the poll, while vote buying and the casting of multiple ballots by voters were also reported.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 2 / 4

Electoral laws largely correspond to international standards, but aspects of the electoral process are poorly regulated, and implementation of existing rules is flawed in some respects. In its report on the June 2020 elections, ODIHR noted long-running concerns over electoral administration, dispute resolution, and the handling of electoral violations.

Electoral management is often nontransparent; laws, mechanisms, and regulations regarding voter-roll management, campaign finance, compliance with related financial restrictions, candidates' use of their own funds, and the public hearing of electoral challenges are either opaque or lacking.

In February 2020, the parliament enacted electoral amendments that reduced the threshold to win seats from five percent to three and introduced a 40 percent gender quota for party lists. The parliament's decision to lower the threshold weeks before the parliamentary elections were originally scheduled was regarded as an attempt to weaken an opposition boycott.

In 2021, members of European Parliament mediated several rounds of interparty dialogue on electoral conditions. The mediation resulted in the proposal of 16 measures intended to address existing deficits in political competition and increase confidence in the electoral process. Several opposition parties have rejected the proposal, believing it does not do enough to ensure fair electoral conditions ahead of the 2022 general, parliamentary, and Belgrade local elections.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 9 / 16 (-1)

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 3 / 4

Political parties may be established freely and can typically operate without encountering formal restrictions. However, campaign finance regulations are weakly enforced and place no overall cap on the private funds raised and spent by parties and candidates. Following the 2017 presidential election, the OSCE reported that the Anti-Corruption Agency (ACA) had decreased the resources dedicated to proactively monitoring campaign funds and did not thoroughly investigate dubious donations. The Balkan Investigative Reporting

Network (BIRN) found that the SNS had orchestrated the use of thousands of proxy donors to bypass legal limits on individual donations and disguise the true source of funding.

There have been peaceful transfers of power between rival parties over the past two decades, and the political system remains somewhat competitive. However, the SNS has used various tactics to unfairly reduce the opposition's electoral prospects. These include manipulating the timing of snap elections, exerting pressure on independent state institutions, and mobilizing public resources to support its campaigns.

The SNS has expanded its influence over the media through both state-owned enterprises and an array of private outlets that are dependent on government funding, and has harnessed this influence to strengthen its political position and discredit its rivals, further reducing opposition parties' competitiveness. In 2021, the European Parliament released a report highlighting the prevalence of state-sponsored disinformation campaigns, noting the undue constraints such activity places on the opposition. Opposition figures have also faced escalating harassment and violence in recent years.

Pervasive harassment, intimidation, and manipulation has resulted in suppressed political representation of opposition parties at any level. The SNS has established nearly complete dominance over state governance, and has gained local-level control of all but seven of 168 towns and municipalities.

Score Change: The score declined from 2 to 1 because opposition parties and leaders have faced continued harassment and intimidation, and because opposition parties hold no meaningful local positions.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 2 / 4

Voters enjoy a significant degree of freedom to make political decisions without undue interference, though the ruling party and allied private businesses allegedly use patronage networks to influence political outcomes.

Various incentives have also been employed in recent years to convince hundreds of local elected officials to form alliances with the SNS or change their party affiliation after elections. SNS electoral campaigns have allegedly benefited from the misuse of public resources, such as use of public buses to transport loyalists to rallies. Local observers reported that workers at state-owned enterprises were pressured to support the ruling SNS during the June 2020 elections. SNS operatives have also been known to intimidate voters directly, by appearing at their homes and pressuring them to support the party.

Separately, Russia has been accused of attempting to influence Serbian politics through its state-owned media and an array of small pro-Russian parties, media outlets, and civil society groups in Serbia.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 3 / 4

The country's electoral threshold for parliamentary representation does not apply to parties representing ethnic minorities. Groups centered on the ethnic Albanian, Bosniak, and Hungarian communities won 19 parliamentary seats in the June 2020 elections. Nevertheless, ethnic minorities have a muted voice in Serbian politics in practice.

Women enjoy equal political rights and benefit from a party-list gender quota. Women won 38.8 percent of parliamentary seats in the June 2020 elections. Ana Brnabić became Serbia's first woman and first gay prime minister in 2017, but critics argued that her appointment was a superficial bid to showcase claims of openness toward the LGBT+ community without systematic engagement on issues important to LGBT+ people.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 5 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 2 / 4

Vučić's move to the presidency in 2017 raised new concerns about the personalization of governance and politicization of state institutions. Vučić has remained the dominant figure in government despite the presidency's limited executive powers under the constitution, creating a de facto presidential system. In October 2020, before a new government was finalized, Vučić announced that early parliamentary elections would be held in April 2022.

Moreover, the executive largely controls the legislative process, and opposition lawmakers are sidelined through the disproportionate use of disciplinary measures, frequent use of accelerated legislative procedures, and late changes to the legislative agenda, among other tactics.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 1 / 4

Although the number of arrests and prosecutions for corruption has risen in recent years, high-profile convictions are very rare. Critics have credibly accused Vučić and the SNS government of having ties to organized crime, and cronyism—in the form of jobs provided to allies of the president and the ruling party—is reportedly common. The responsibility for prosecuting corruption cases has been passed among different public prosecutors, who typically fault the police for supplying insufficient evidence in cases against government ministers. The work of the ACA is also undermined in part by the ambiguous division of responsibilities among other entities tasked with combating corruption.

Notable cases that came to light in recent years without being resolved include those of Nenad Popović, a minister without portfolio who was implicated in a questionable privatization that caused an electrical transformer manufacturer to declare bankruptcy; Finance Minister Siniša Mali, whom anticorruption agencies have investigated for suspected money laundering; and Health Minister Zlatibor Lončar, who allegedly has links to an organized crime group.

Senior officials' close relatives and associates have also faced corruption allegations. For example, a series of reports and leaked documents since 2018 tied the father of then interior minister—now Defense Minister—Nebojša Stefanović to an arms-trading scheme and other malfeasance. Aleksandar Obradović, a whistleblower who implicated Stefanović's father in the purchase of arms from the state at reduced rates, was arrested in September 2019, potentially deterring others with knowledge of corruption from coming forward.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 2 / 4

The government has received sustained criticism for a lack of transparency in large-scale infrastructure projects and for secrecy surrounding public tenders. For example, details about the state-funded Belgrade Waterfront project, which includes the construction of hotels and luxury apartments and has been beset by controversy since its announcement in 2012, have not been made available to the public. Serbian defense spending is also opaque. In August 2020, the International Monetary Fund (IMF) warned that government aid to the publicly owned Air Serbia was not sufficiently transparent in a regular report on IMF activity in the country.

Legislators do not have adequate opportunities to ask questions about government activities and legislation, and the vast majority of parliamentary questions go unanswered by the government.

Public officials are subject to asset disclosure rules overseen by the ACA, but penalties for violations are uncommon. While a 2004 freedom-of-information law empowers citizens and journalists to obtain information of public importance, authorities frequently obstruct requests in practice.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 41 / 60 (-1)D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 12 / 16*D1. Are there free and independent media? 2 / 4

Despite a constitution that guarantees freedom of the press and a penal code that does not treat libel as a criminal offense, media freedom is undermined by the threat of lawsuits or criminal charges against journalists for other offenses, lack of transparency in media ownership, editorial pressure from politicians and politically connected media owners, direct pressure and threats against journalists, and high rates of self-censorship. The Regulatory Body for Electronic Media (REM) has been criticized for a lack of independence. The incumbent political parties generally receive the majority of media coverage from public broadcasters.

The state and ruling party exercise influence over private media in part through advertising contracts and other indirect subsidies. Many private outlets are owned by SNS supporters. Some privately owned national broadcasters and popular tabloids regularly participate in smear campaigns against the political opposition and other perceived government opponents.

Independent investigative groups have been increasingly subjected to harassment, intimidation, and violence by authorities and progovernment groups. Several members of the ruling party have openly threatened journalists, and Vučić regularly and publicly disparages independent media outlets. Journalists have faced physical attacks, smear campaigns, and punitive tax inspections.

In March 2021, a journalist with the Crime and Corruption Reporting Network (KRIK), an independent investigative outlet, asked Vučić about the government's alleged connections to organized crime during a press conference; following that press conference, KRIK became the subject of a smear campaign by progovernment media and SNS-affiliated figures in a clear attempt to discredit the outlet's work. KRIK journalists have received death threats, and the organization has been targeted by numerous lawsuits that media watchdog groups claim are part of a strategic attempt to suppress KRIK's operational ability. International NGOs have condemned the systematic targeting of KRIK and have called on the authorities to put an end to the smear campaign.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 4 / 4

The constitution guarantees freedom of religion, which is generally respected in practice.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 3 / 4

Academic freedom has largely been upheld, though recent practice and legal changes have raised concerns about political influence. The Law on Higher Education, adopted by the National Assembly in 2017, increased the presence of state-appointed members on the National Council for Higher Education and a national accreditation body; another education law, also adopted in 2017, gave the education minister centralized control over the appointment of school principals.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 3 / 4

Private discussion is generally free and vibrant, but a pattern of retribution against high-profile critics of the government has contributed to an increasingly hostile environment for free expression and open debate. Perceived government opponents, including journalists, university professors, civil society leaders, celebrities, and ordinary citizens, have faced smear campaigns in progovernment media outlets, criminal investigations, and other retaliatory measures in recent years. In some cases, the government's highest-ranking officials took part in discrediting nonpolitical figures based on their public criticism of government policies.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 8 / 12 (-1)E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 3 / 4

Citizens are generally able to exercise freedom of assembly, though over 30 ongoing prosecutions were launched against activists associated with the protest movement Ne damo Beograd (Don't Drown Belgrade), which had organized demonstrations against the contentious development project on Belgrade's waterfront, in the recent past.

After the Vučić administration instituted a COVID-19-related lockdown in Belgrade in July 2020, thousands of demonstrators rallied against the announcement, the government's overall pandemic response, and Vučić's conduct as president. Riot police in Belgrade responded forcefully, targeting participants, bystanders, and journalists with physical attacks, chases, and tear gas. Protests, which were also held in several other cities, continued for several days after the government reversed its decision to initiate the lockdown.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 2 / 4 (-1)

Foreign and domestic nongovernmental organizations generally operate freely, but those that take openly critical stances toward the government or address sensitive or controversial topics have faced threats and harassment in recent years.

In November 2020, UN human rights experts warned that Serbian authorities had misused money-laundering laws and antiterrorism-financing mechanisms in order to obtain the banking information of more than 50 NGOs and their employees. Those targeted include NGOs engaged in monitoring of the government's work, human rights promotion, and investigative journalism.

Score Change: The score declined from 3 to 2 due to the revelation that the government misused money-laundering and terrorism-financing laws to obtain financial information on NGOs and NGO workers.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 3 / 4

Workers may legally join unions, engage in collective bargaining, and strike, but the International Trade Union Confederation has reported that organizing efforts and strikes are often restricted in practice, with employers allegedly retaliating against workers and union activists.

F. RULE OF LAW: 9 / 16F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 2 / 4

The independence of the judiciary is compromised by political influence over judicial appointments, and many judges have reported facing external pressure regarding their rulings. Politicians regularly comment on judicial matters, including by discussing ongoing cases or investigations with the media.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 2 / 4

Due process guarantees are upheld in some cases, but corruption, lack of capacity, and political influence often undermine these protections. Among other problems, rules on the random assignment of cases to judges and prosecutors are not consistently observed, and mechanisms for obtaining restitution in civil matters are ineffective. High-profile, politically sensitive cases are especially vulnerable to interference.

In July 2020, an appeals court overturned the convictions of four security officials for the 1999 killing of journalist Slavko Ćuruvija, after the court found that the 2019 verdicts violated criminal procedure. In a December 2021 retrial, the Higher Court in Belgrade convicted the four former state security officers of Ćuruvija's murder.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 3 / 4

The population is generally free from major threats to physical security, though some prison facilities suffer from overcrowding, abuse, and inadequate health care. Radical right-wing organizations and violent sports fans who target ethnic minorities and other perceived enemies also remain a concern.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 2 / 4

Legal safeguards for socially vulnerable groups are poorly enforced. For example, women are legally entitled to equal pay for equal work, but this rule is not widely respected. The Romany minority is especially disadvantaged by discrimination in employment, housing, and education. LGBT+ people continue to face hate speech, threats, and even physical violence, and perpetrators are rarely punished despite laws addressing hate crimes and discrimination. The government has made some gestures of support for the rights of LGBT+ people, for example by sending representatives to pride events and ensuring adequate police protection for parades.

Individuals living with disabilities are among those who live in social care institutions, and have faced protracted periods of isolation as the COVID-19 pandemic progressed. Disability rights groups have warned this situation violates the Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities, to which Serbia is a signatory.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 12 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

There are no formal restrictions on freedom of movement. Serbians are free to change their place of employment and education, and have the right to travel.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 3 / 4

In general, property rights are respected, but adjudication of disputes is slow, and problems such as illegal construction and fraud persist. An estimated two million buildings in Serbia are not registered. Romany residents are often subject to forced evictions, and those evicted are generally not offered alternative housing or access to legal remedies to challenge eviction notices.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 3 / 4

Personal social freedoms are generally respected, and men and women have equal legal rights on personal status matters like marriage and divorce. A new law aimed at preventing domestic violence took effect in 2017, but such violence remains a problem.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 2 / 4

Residents generally have access to economic opportunity, but factors such as weak macroeconomic growth and a relatively high rate of unemployment contribute to labor exploitation in some industries. Several reports in recent years have described worsening conditions in factories, particularly those that produce shoes and garments, including low wages, unpaid overtime, and hazardous work environments. Legal protections designed to prevent such abuses are not well enforced. Serbian and international NGOs have also issued reports regarding persistent human rights violations of migrant workers across the country, which often go unaddressed by authorities.

Seychelles

Population: 100,000

Capital: Victoria

Freedom Status: Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Seychelles has seen an increase in political pluralism in recent years, with an opposition coalition winning a parliamentary majority in 2016 and an opposition presidential candidate winning in 2020. However, government corruption remains a problem, as does lengthy pretrial detention. Migrant workers remain vulnerable to abuse.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- In October, the National Assembly decriminalized defamation by striking two sections of the penal code.
- Also in October, finance ministers of European Union (EU) member states agreed to remove Seychelles from the bloc's list of foreign tax havens. Observers criticized the decision, noting the involvement of Seychellois firms in the transfer of offshore wealth.
- In November, Seychellois authorities arrested businessman Mukesh Valabhji and his wife on suspicion of embezzling funds donated by the United Arab Emirates (UAE) in 2002. Authorities also accused Sarah Zarqani-René, the widow of late president France-Albert René, along with a military officer and two former government officials of involvement. The case was ongoing at year's end.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 34 / 40A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 12 / 12*A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The president is chief of state and head of government; the winning candidate is directly elected for up to two five-year terms. The president nominates cabinet ministers and a vice president, all of whom require approval from the National Assembly.

Then vice president Danny Faure became president when James Michel of the People's Party (PL) resigned as president in 2016. Michel had been narrowly reelected in 2015 in a contest marred by vote-buying allegations. In late 2019, Faure was endorsed by the PL, renamed United Seychelles (US), to contest the October 2020 presidential election. Faure lost to Seychelles Democratic Alliance (LDS) candidate Wavel Ramkalawan, who received 54.9 percent of the vote. The election marked the first opposition victory in a presidential contest in Seychellois history.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

Members of the unicameral National Assembly are directly elected in 26 constituencies, while up to 9 additional seats are assigned by parties according to a proportional calculation of the vote.

The LDS won 25 seats in the October 2020 elections, which were held concurrently with the presidential contest. US won the remaining 10. Observers called the elections free and fair, though they did receive reports alleging misuse of state resources.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 4 / 4

The Electoral Commission (EC) has faced criticism from opposition parties and others for enforcing its mandates inconsistently. The 2016 African Union election monitoring mission called for more transparency, better voter-roll scrutiny, and an improved process to inform the public about voter registration. In 2018, then president Faure approved an Elections Act amendment establishing a permanent chief electoral officer. The amendment was intended to alleviate concerns about the efficiency of the previous system, in which a chief electoral officer was appointed a few months before an election.

Electoral-law amendments that, among other things, provide a clearer definition of what is considered a spoiled ballot, were approved in 2020.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 13 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 4 / 4

There are no restrictions on the right to organize political parties or other competitive political groupings. However, during the 2015 presidential election, several opposition parties claimed the government was engaged in systematic harassment and intimidation of candidates.

Political party One Seychelles, which was founded in 2019, fielded presidential and legislative candidates in the 2020 elections.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 4 / 4

The LDS, an alliance of opposition parties, became the first political group to defeat the PL and gain a legislative majority in 2016, reflecting increasing political pluralism in Seychelles. Ramkalawan became the first non-US candidate to win a presidential election in October 2020.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 3 / 4

Political choices are generally free from domination by powerful groups that are not democratically accountable. However, vote buying and voter intimidation by political parties have been reported.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 2 / 4

The constitution mandates equal suffrage for adult citizens. Early voting procedures are designed to encourage the participation of some groups, including pregnant people, the elderly, and those with disabilities.

There are still no mechanisms to allow citizens living abroad to vote. Few women hold senior political office because of factors including longstanding traditional beliefs about the role of women and a lack of commitment on the part of political parties to nominate women for office. US is the only party that typically includes high numbers of women among its candidates. Women hold 22.9 percent of National Assembly seats. Political life is dominated by people of European and South Asian origin.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 9 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 4 / 4

The head of government and national legislative representatives are generally able to determine policy, though widespread corruption can influence policymaking. Executive and legislative officials were elected under freer and fairer circumstances in 2020, bolstering the democratic legitimacy of their decisions.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 3 / 4

Concerns about government corruption persist, but there has been significant improvement. In 2016, the National Assembly passed an anticorruption law that established the country's first independent Anti-Corruption Commission (ACC) and strengthened Seychelles's legal anticorruption framework. In 2019, the National Assembly amended the anti-corruption law to increase the number of ACC commissioners, clarify its strength, explicitly give it investigative powers, and enhance its law enforcement provisions.

Seychelles was previously included in an EU list of foreign tax havens. EU finance ministers removed Seychelles from the list in October 2021, citing progress regarding its taxation regime. Observers criticized the decision, citing that month's revelation that Seychellois firms facilitated the transfer of offshore wealth per the Pandora Papers, an investigation by the International Consortium of Investigative Journalists that revealed the improper financial system and connections of rich and powerful actors around the world.

In November 2021, Seychellois authorities arrested businessman Mukesh Valabhji and his wife on suspicion of embezzling a $50-million donation provided by the UAE in 2002. Authorities also accused Sarah Zargani-René, along with a military officer and two former government officials, of involvement. The case was ongoing at year's end.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 2 / 4

Laws allowing public access to government information are inconsistently followed. Some government officials are required to declare assets, but they do not always comply. Declarations are not made public unless a legal challenge forces their release. The Access to Information Act of 2018 seeks to increase openness and transparency of government; Article 54 created an Information Commission, established in 2019, to provide government information and resources to citizens for particular disclosures. It can impose fines when citizens are not provided information in a given time frame.

Concerns about corruption often focus on a lack of transparency in the privatization and allocation of government-owned land, as well as in Seychelles's facilitation of international finance.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 45 / 60 (+2)

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 14 / 16 (+2)

D1. Are there free and independent media? 3 / 4 (+1)

The Seychelles Media Commission Act of 2010 establishes relatively strict guidelines for journalists. Several newspapers exist besides the state-owned daily, the Seychelles Nation. A publicly owned broadcaster provides television and radio programming alongside a private television station and two private radio stations. The law prohibits political parties and religious organizations from operating public radio broadcasts.

In the past, media workers practiced a degree of self-censorship to protect their advertising earnings and to avoid the application of strict—but rarely enforced—defamation laws. In addition, since Victoria seeks to maintain Seychelles's image as ideal for tourism, many outlets would temper their commentary on sensitive national issues. However, self-censorship has declined in recent years. In October 2021, the National Assembly decriminalized defamation when it struck two sections of the penal code.

Score Change: The score improved from 2 to 3 due to the parliament's decriminalization of defamation and a gradual reduction in self-censorship and political pressure among the media in recent years.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 4 / 4

Religious freedom is generally respected. The government grants larger religious groups programming time on state radio, subject in most cases to advance review and approval. Smaller religious groups do not have access to dedicated broadcast time. Non-Catholic students in public schools providing Catholic instruction have no access to alternative activities during those classes.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4 (+1)

The charter of the University of Seychelles enshrines academic freedom, while the constitution indirectly references academic freedom. A 2016 study from the International Labour Organization (ILO) and the United Nations Education, Scientific, and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) recognized Seychelles as having high compliance in institutional autonomy, tenure, individual rights, and democratic structure in the country's two universities.

In the past, some activists have claimed that educators have had to demonstrate at least nominal loyalty to the PL, which previously controlled the executive and legislative branches, to reach senior bureaucratic positions. Since the 2020 transition of power, no reports of such behavior have surfaced.

Score Change: The score improved from 3 to 4 because there were no reports that educators' career advancement depended on political loyalty, as was alleged during the PL's decades in government prior to 2020.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 3 / 4

As the government seeks to protect the tourism sector, many sensitive subjects are considered off limits. Individuals who criticize the government publicly or privately sometimes suffer reprisals, such as harassment by police or the loss of jobs or contracts.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 9 / 12E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 3 / 4

The government passed a revised public-assembly law in 2015, which several observers credited with permitting a more open and free political environment. However, the law still contains some restrictive provisions, including the need to give five days' notice to the police for assemblies. It also empowers the head of police to disperse public meetings on grounds of preserving public health, morality, and safety, and sets conditions on the timing and location of large gatherings. In 2019, the government established a "Speaker's Corner" in Victoria, where individuals are allowed to make public comments at will.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 3 / 4

Human rights groups and other nongovernmental organizations operate without restriction. However, some groups lack the resources necessary to operate and advocate effectively.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 3 / 4

Unions are permitted, but only about 15 percent of the workforce is unionized, and collective bargaining is relatively rare. Workers have the right to strike, but only if all other arbitration procedures have been exhausted.

F. RULE OF LAW: 11 / 16F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 2 / 4

Judges sometimes face interference in cases involving major commercial or political interests. Seychelles, which has few legal professionals, relies on expatriate judges who serve fixed-term contracts on the Supreme Court. The government controls the negotiations and renewal of expatriate contracts, potentially allowing officials to compromise the impartiality of the non-Seychellois magistrates. The judiciary also lacks budgetary independence from the executive and can be subject to external influence. The Supreme Court remains a target of political threats and intimidation.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 3 / 4

While constitutional rights to due process are generally respected, prolonged pretrial detention is common. The courts introduced new systems in 2016 to expedite the processing of cases, but their effect has been limited.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 3 / 4

Security forces have occasionally been accused of using excessive force, and impunity for such offenses remains a problem. Police corruption continues, particularly the solicitation of bribes. Prisons remain overcrowded.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 3 / 4

Same-sex sexual activity was decriminalized in 2016, though societal discrimination against LGBT+ activists remains a problem. Prejudice against foreign workers has been reported.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 11 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 3 / 4

The government does not restrict domestic travel but may deny passports for arbitrary reasons based on “national interest.”

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 3 / 4

Individuals may generally exercise the right to own property and establish private business without undue interference from state or nonstate actors. An underdeveloped legal framework can hamper business activities, as can corruption.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 2 / 4

Inheritance laws do not discriminate against women, and the government does not impose explicit restrictions on personal social freedoms. However, domestic violence against women remains a problem.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 3 / 4

Economic life is dominated by people of European and South Asian origin. The government has made only some progress in preventing or prosecuting instances of human trafficking and labor exploitation. Worker rights in the Seychelles International Trade Zone are different from the rest of the islands, and migrant laborers are vulnerable to abuse there. There were some reports of employers seizing migrant workers’ passports upon arrival, a practice that is not currently illegal under Seychellois law.

Bangladeshi workers have faced human-trafficking abuses like the seizure of travel documents, unpaid work, and extreme labor exploitation. In 2019, the Seychellois and Bangladeshi governments signed an agreement to regulate the recruitment of Bangladeshi workers. Under its terms, designated organizations will assess employment contracts and the language skills of prospective workers.

In its Trafficking in Persons Report 2021, the US State Department noted that Seychellois authorities secured their first sex-trafficking conviction under a 2014 antitrafficking law. The State Department also noted an increase in resources for survivors, though Seychelles still lacks shelters that provide comprehensive services.

Sierra Leone

Population: 8,100,000

Capital: Freetown

Freedom Status: Partly Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Sierra Leone has held regular multiparty elections since the end of its civil war in 2002. However, opposition parties have faced police violence and restrictions on assembly.

Civic groups are constrained by onerous regulations and government corruption remains pervasive. Other long-standing concerns include gender-based violence and female genital mutilation (FGM).

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- In November, the government of President Julius Maada Bio suspended Auditor General Lara Taylor-Pearce. Taylor-Pearce reported that no specific reason for her suspension was given, while civil society groups criticized the Bio administration's move. Taylor-Pearce remained suspended as of year's end.
- Parliament voted to abolish the death penalty in July and President Bio signed the subsequent law banning the practice in October. Some 99 people facing the death penalty as of July reportedly benefited from the change.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 28 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 10 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 3 / 4

The president is elected by popular vote for up to two five-year terms. In the March 2018 presidential election, Julius Maada Bio of the Sierra Leone People's Party (SLPP) defeated Samura Kamara of the incumbent All People's Congress (APC) and succeeded term-limited predecessor Ernest Bai Koroma. Bio won nearly 52 percent of the vote in the second round. Allegations of violence and voter intimidation marred the campaign period. Nevertheless, international observers determined that the election was credible, praising the National Election Commission (NEC) for effectively fulfilling its duties despite budget constraints, logistical challenges, and pressure from the government, which disbursed election funds late and occasionally threatened to withhold resources.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 3 / 4

In the unicameral Parliament, 132 members are popularly elected and 14 seats are reserved for indirectly elected paramount chiefs. Parliamentary elections are held every five years, concurrently with presidential elections. During the 2018 polls, the APC retained its majority, winning 68 seats, while the SLPP increased its share to 49 seats. The remaining 15 seats were won by smaller parties and independents. Despite some procedural errors, international observers considered the elections credible.

In April 2018, APC members of Parliament (MPs) staged a walkout over the SLPP's efforts to prevent a group of APC lawmakers from attending the body's first postelectoral session. In May 2019, the High Court ruled in favor of an SLPP petition alleging APC electoral fraud in the 2018 vote. Ten MPs were removed from office and nine seats were immediately given to SLPP runners-up, giving that party a slender effective majority.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 4 / 4

The electoral laws and framework are generally deemed to be fair. NEC commissioners are selected by the president, though the parliament must approve appointments. European Union electoral observers reported that the NEC was "competent and impartial" in administering the 2018 elections. In November 2021, however, the APC criticized the NEC's handling of a local contest held in Koinadugu the month before; it alleged that NEC staff engaged in fraud that benefited the SLPP.

During the 2018 campaign period, the major political parties interpreted a constitutional citizenship provision to exclude people with dual citizenship from standing for office. However, a September 2021 Supreme Court ruling declared that dual citizens can vote and seek office.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 11 / 16B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 2 / 4

Although people have the right to organize in different political parties, opposition parties and leaders have faced intimidation and harassment from APC and SLPP governments. In December 2021, Unity Party chairwoman Femi Claudius-Cole was detained over comments she made regarding the midterm census, though she was released after several days. APC politician Diana Konomanyi was also detained, though she was more quickly released without charge.

The APC and SLPP are the country's main political parties. Seventeen parties officially registered for the 2018 elections but only four won parliamentary seats. In 2017, several high-profile figures left the SLPP to form the National Grand Coalition.

While candidate nomination fees are subsidized, the costs of running for office and a rule requiring public-sector personnel to resign 12 months ahead of an election serve as barriers to entry for many candidates, giving an advantage to larger parties and those with greater resources.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 3 / 4

The SLPP's presidential victory in 2018, despite the APC's continued use of public resources during the campaign, marked the second peaceful transfer of power between rival parties since the end of the civil war in 2002. The APC had won the 2007 and 2012 presidential elections.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 3 / 4

Sierra Leoneans generally enjoy freedom in their political choices, although traditional chiefs and religious leaders exercise influence on voters. Local elites from both major parties often control the selection of candidates for Parliament.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 3 / 4

Ethnic and religious minorities typically enjoy full political rights and electoral opportunities. Societal impediments to women's political participation remain a challenge, with only 18 of 146 Parliament seats held by women in 2021.

Sierra Leoneans who are not of African descent do not have birthright citizenship and must be naturalized to be able to vote.

The SLPP and APC have accused each other of engaging in ethnic discrimination when appointing employees to government agencies.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 7 / 12C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 3 / 4

The elected president and Parliament generally determine government policy, but most power lies with the executive.

The country relies on Chinese and Turkish support for large-scale infrastructure projects. In 2020, President Bio announced an airport expansion project that would be completed by a Turkish firm. In December 2021, Bio said Turkish firms would be “favorably considered” for investment opportunities during a summit hosted by Turkish president Recep Tayyip Erdoğan.

Beijing cultivated a close relationship with the Koroma administration, which led civil society leaders to claim that Beijing had an undue influence on policymaking. The Bio administration’s relationship is relatively distant; in 2018, it cancelled a Koroma-era plan to build an airport that would have been funded with a Chinese loan. In May 2021, however, the government approved a plan to build an industrial harbor with Chinese backing.

International organizations have also influenced policymaking. For example, the International Monetary Fund (IMF) provided the country a support package in 2018; under its terms, Freetown was to end fuel subsidies.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 1 / 4

Corruption remains pervasive at every level of government. Rates of bribery remain high among ordinary citizens seeking basic services.

The Bio administration has made efforts to tackle systemic corruption and hold perpetrators from the previous government accountable. However, the Anti-Corruption Commission’s (ACC) efforts have largely focused on recouping stolen wealth over securing convictions. The ACC has recovered 31 billion leones ($3 million) since 2018.

In November 2021, the government suspended Auditor General Lara Taylor-Pearce and committed to form a tribunal over her performance, though Taylor-Pearce reported she was not informed of a specific allegation. The Sierra Leone Association of Journalists and the Institute of Governance Reform criticized the government over the suspension, which remained in effect at year’s end. The auditor general’s office noted financial inconsistencies in several government agencies, including the president’s office, when it released its annual report in December.

Commissions of Inquiry (CoI) into Koroma-era corruption, which investigated 127 former officials, presented significant evidence of malfeasance to President Bio in 2020. In January 2021, the attorney general’s office reported that 85 individuals had appealed the CoI’s findings. Many appeals were successful; in April, former lands and country planning minister Alhaji Musa Tarawally won an appeal, while former local government minister Diana Konomanyi won her appeal in June. Former health minister Miatta Kargbo lost her appeal in July, however. Appeals of the CoI’s findings were still being considered at year’s end.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 3 / 4

Sierra Leone has an uneven record on transparency. The Right to Access Information Commission was created in 2013 to facilitate transparency and openness in government, but its effectiveness has been hampered by lack of funding and limited public outreach. Transparency in public procurement processes was raised as a concern in the Audit Service Sierra Leone’s December 2021 report.

The government continues to review and make public all mining and lease agreements, retaining its Extractive Industries Transparency Initiative (EITI) compliance designation. Its 2019 compliance report assessed it as having made meaningful but not satisfactory progress on all requirements. EITI will next validate the government’s compliance in April 2022.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 37 / 60D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 12 / 16*D1. Are there free and independent media? 2 / 4

Numerous independent newspapers circulate freely, and there are dozens of public and private radio and television outlets. However, public officials have previously employed libel and sedition laws to target journalists, particularly those reporting on elections and high-level corruption.

Part V of the 1965 Public Order Act, which criminalized libel and sedition, was repealed in 2020 and was replaced by Independent Media Commission (IMC) Act, which was gazetted that August. The IMC Act was criticized by some observers who warned that it would no longer allow the registration of newspapers as sole proprietorships.

In December 2021, a camera operator working for AYV Media was physically attacked and detained by police officers in Freetown when he solicited a comment on a police pursuit earlier in the day.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 4 / 4

Freedom of religion is constitutionally protected and respected in practice.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 3 / 4

Academic freedom is generally upheld, but strained resources within the university system have led to strikes by professors. Student protests have been violently dispersed by security forces in recent years.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 3 / 4

Private discussion remains largely open, though freedom of personal expression may be affected by the threat of violence from powerful interests. While authorities reportedly monitor discussions on social media platforms, including WhatsApp, few arrests have been made for online discussions or comments.

Journalists voiced concerns over the breadth of a draft cybercrime bill that was considered in 2020. Parliament passed an amended cybercrime bill that addressed some of the media sector's concerns in June 2021 and President Bio gave his assent in November.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 6 / 12E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 2 / 4

While freedom of assembly is constitutionally guaranteed, the police have repeatedly refused to grant permission to organizers planning protests, and peaceful demonstrations have been violently dispersed in recent years. In April 2021, motorbike taxi drivers in Freetown protested against ongoing restrictions and allegedly corrupt behavior from police officers. While officers responded violently, no casualties were recorded.

Assemblies were affected by the COVID-19 pandemic, though the related state of emergency was lifted in March 2021. Public gatherings were limited to 50 participants in June and an overnight curfew went into effect nationwide in July as cases rose. These restrictions ended in September.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 2 / 4

A variety of nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) and civic groups operate in the country. However, stricter regulations took effect in 2018, requiring annual renewal of registrations and ministerial approval for projects. The SLPP government upheld the policy after a 2018 review. Many NGOs expressed dissatisfaction with the review's lack of transparency and inclusivity, and concern over the narrowing of space for civil society.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 2 / 4

While workers have the right to join independent trade unions, there are no laws preventing discrimination against union members or prohibiting employers from interfering with the formation of unions.

F. RULE OF LAW: 9 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 2 / 4

While the constitution provides for an independent judiciary, the courts are prone to executive interference, particularly in corruption cases. A lack of clear procedures for appointing and dismissing judges leaves those processes vulnerable to abuse. Judicial corruption, poor salaries, and inadequate resources also undermine judicial autonomy.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 2 / 4

Resource constraints and a shortage of lawyers hinder access to legal counsel. Although the constitution guarantees a fair trial, this right is sometimes limited in practice, largely due to corruption. Pretrial and remand prisoners spend between three and five years behind bars on average before their cases are adjudicated. Police can hold criminal suspects for several days without charge and sometimes engage in arbitrary arrests.

The 1991 constitution allowed for capital punishment, but Parliament voted to abolish the death penalty in July 2021. President Bio signed the law banning the practice in October. Some 99 people were facing the death penalty as of July and reportedly benefited from the change.

Detention facilities are under strain. Prisons fail to meet basic health-and-hygiene standards, and infectious disease is prevalent.

Police, who are poorly paid and minimally trained, are rarely held accountable for their actions, even when they turn to violence. Civilians can report ill-treatment to the Police Complaints, Discipline, and Internal Investigations Department or the Independent Police Complaints Board, though these agencies have limited capacity and efficacy.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 2 / 4

LGBT+ people face discrimination in employment and health-care access and are vulnerable to violence. Sex between men is criminalized under a colonial-era law, and anti-LGBT+ discrimination is not explicitly prohibited by the constitution. Women experience discrimination in employment, education, and access to credit.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 10 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 3 / 4

Sierra Leoneans generally enjoy freedom of movement, though this was affected by the ongoing COVID-19 pandemic. The government loosened cross-border travel restrictions early in 2021 but imposed a nighttime curfew between July and September.

Petty corruption is common, and parents often must pay bribes to register their children in primary and secondary school.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 3 / 4

The government has sought to reduce regulatory barriers to private business in recent years. Property rights are constitutionally guaranteed, though the laws do not effectively protect those rights. There is no land titling system. Outside of Freetown, land falls under customary law, and its use is determined by chiefs. The government often fails to regulate the activities of international investors, exacerbating threats to property rights.

Laws passed in 2007 grant women the right to inherit property, but many women have little power to contest land issues within the customary legal system.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 2 / 4

Reports of rape and domestic violence rarely result in conviction, and the police unit responsible for investigating and prosecuting these crimes remains underfunded and understaffed. In 2019, Parliament passed the Sexual Offences Amendment Act, which allows life sentences for those convicted of raping a child.

FGM is not prohibited by law, and the practice remains widespread. A 21-year-old woman died of suspected complications from the practice in December 2021.

Child marriage has consistently been a problem, with a reported 39 percent of women aged 20–24 having been married by age 18 according to a report published by the Office of the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights in 2017. In 2020, the International Rescue Committee published the results of a survey of women in 15 African countries, including Sierra Leone; that survey recorded a rise in sexual violence and in early or forced marriages when COVID-19 restrictions were imposed.

Women experience discrimination on personal status matters such as marriage and divorce. Customary law governs many of these issues, making it difficult for women to seek legal recourse.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 2 / 4

Reports of economic exploitation among workers in the natural-resource sector are common. Human trafficking remains a problem, though US State Department's Trafficking in Persons Report 2021 noted that authorities were doing more to investigate trafficking and prosecute suspects through the adoption of an antitrafficking action plan. The first trafficking convictions in 15 years were secured in 2020, but only one conviction has followed as of June 2021.

Singapore

Population: 5,700,000

Capital: Singapore

Freedom Status: Partly Free

Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: Singapore's parliamentary political system has been dominated by the ruling People's Action Party (PAP) and the family of current prime minister Lee Hsien Loong since 1959. The electoral and legal framework that the PAP has constructed allows for some political pluralism, but it constrains the growth of opposition parties and limits freedoms of expression, assembly, and association.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- The government placed legal pressure on independent news sites during the year. In September, the police issued a “stern warning” against New Naratif and its managing editor, Thum Ping Tjin, over its publication of unauthorized electoral advertisements in 2020. In October, the country’s media regulator cancelled the Online Citizen’s license after that outlet allegedly refused to report on its funding.
- In October, Parliament passed the wide-ranging Foreign Interference (Counter-measures) Act (FICA). FICA allows the home affairs minister to order the removal of online content, while internet service providers (ISPs) and social media operators can be compelled to provide information on their users.
- Residents of workers’ dormitories were subjected to heightened COVID-19-related movement restrictions for much of the year. In September, the government allowed dormitory residents to visit preapproved public locations and further loosened restrictions in October and December.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 19 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 4 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 1 / 4

The government is led by a prime minister and cabinet formed by the party that controls Parliament. Prime Minister Lee Hsien Loong has been in power since 2004. While polling-day procedures are generally free of irregularities, numerous structural factors impeded the development of viable electoral competition.

The president, whose role is largely ceremonial, is elected by popular vote for six-year terms, and a special committee is empowered to vet candidates. Under 2016 constitutional amendments on eligibility, none of Singapore’s three main ethnic groupings (Chinese, Malays, and Indians or others) may be excluded from the presidency for more than five consecutive terms, and presidential candidates from the private sector, as opposed to senior officials with at least three years of service, must have experience leading a company with at least S$500 million (US$372 million) in shareholder equity. PAP-backed Halimah Yacob was the only eligible candidate in the 2017 presidential election, making her the winner by default.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 2 / 4

Following a March 2020 recommendation by the Electoral Boundaries Review Committee (EBRC), the number of directly elected seats in the unicameral Parliament was increased from 89 to 93. The Parliament elected that July consequently included 14 members from single-member constituencies and 79 members from Group Representation Constituencies (GRCs). The top-polling party in each GRC wins all of its four to five seats, which has historically bolstered the PAP’s majority. As many as nine additional, nonpartisan members can be appointed by the president, and a maximum of another 12 can come from a national compensatory list meant to ensure a minimum of opposition representation. Members serve five-year terms, with the exception of appointed members, who serve for two and a half years.

In the 2020 elections, the PAP secured 61.2 percent of the popular vote and 83 of the 93 directly elected seats. The largest opposition group, the Workers' Party, retained the 6 elected seats it had won in 2015 and gained an additional 4, for a total of 10. The opposition also received 2 compensatory seats to achieve the minimum of 12.

Elections are largely free of fraud or other irregularities, but are unfair due to the advantages enjoyed by the PAP, including a progovernment media sector, the GRC system, high financial barriers to electoral candidacy, and legal restrictions on free speech.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 1 / 4

Singapore lacks an independent election commission; the country's Elections Department (ED) is a government body attached to the Prime Minister's Office. The secretary to the prime minister is the head of the EBRC, which reviews and redraws constituency boundaries. In the past, the PAP-controlled boundaries process has ensured an advantage for the party. The new electoral districts for the 2020 elections were announced just four months before the polls were held. The electoral framework suffers from other features—including the GRC system and the onerous eligibility rules for presidential candidates—that favor the PAP-dominated political establishment.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 8 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 2 / 4

Singapore has a multiparty political system, and 11 parties contested the 2020 parliamentary elections. However, a variety of factors have helped to ensure the PAP's dominant position, including an electoral framework that favors incumbents, restrictions on political films and television programs, the threat of defamation suits, the PAP's vastly superior financial resources, and its influence over the mass media and the courts.

The Protection from Online Falsehoods and Manipulation Act (POFMA)—which allows any government minister to order correction notices or restrict access to content they deem false or contrary to the public interest—was repeatedly invoked to require corrections regarding comments by opposition candidates during the 2020 campaign period. Separately, the ED banned large public rallies during that period, citing the COVID-19 pandemic.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 2 / 4

The PAP has governed without interruption since 1959; changes in the country's leadership can be prompted by shifts within the ruling party. In April 2021, Deputy Prime Minister Heng Swee Keat resigned as finance minister and as head of the PAP's "fourth-generation" leadership team, ruling himself out as a successor to Lee.

The opposition mounts stronger election campaigns than in the past. Opposition factions collectively put forward candidates for all directly elected Parliament seats in 2020, having done so for the first time in 2015, and ultimately gained four.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 2 / 4

The corporatist structure of the economy creates dense ties between business and political elites that have been criticized as oligarchic in nature. These networks contribute to the PAP's political dominance.

Many senior government officials formerly served as military officers, and the military has a close relationship with the PAP, but it does not directly engage in politics.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 2 / 4

Ethnic Chinese Singaporeans make up a majority of the population. Members of minority groups, including Malays and people of Indian descent, have full voting rights, but critics—including academics and nongovernmental organizations (NGOs)—have questioned whether the GRC system achieves its stated aim of ensuring minority representation. Separately, the rules for presidential candidacy have been criticized for excluding non-Malays from the 2017 election. Malays are generally underrepresented in leadership positions.

Women remain underrepresented in senior government and political positions, though women candidates won 27 of the 93 directly elected Parliament seats in 2020, up from 21 out of 89 in 2015, and the president who took office in 2017 is a woman. The cabinet that took office after the May 2021 reshuffle included three female ministers.

LGBT+ interest groups operate and are generally tolerated, but they have no vocal parliamentary representation; open LGBT+ identity can be a barrier to election in practice, in part because sex between men remains a criminal offense.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 7 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 2 / 4

Elected officials determine the government's policies, but the PAP's political and institutional dominance ensures its victory at the polls, and the party leadership maintains discipline among its members. The constitution stipulates that lawmakers lose their seats if they resign or are expelled from the party for which they stood in elections, inhibiting Parliament's ability to serve as an effective check on the executive.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 3 / 4

Singapore has been lauded for its lack of bribery and corruption. However, its corporatist economic structure entails close collaboration between the public and private sectors that may produce conflicts of interest. Lawmakers often serve on the boards of private companies, for example. Ho Ching, Prime Minister Lee's wife, served as chief executive of Temasek Holdings, a government-linked corporation and sovereign wealth fund, for 17 years; the relationship prompted accusations of nepotism and cronyism. In February 2021, Ho announced she would leave that role in October; Ho joined the board of the Temasek Trust, the corporation's philanthropic arm, the day she left.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 2 / 4

The government provides limited transparency on its operations. The Singapore Public Sector Outcomes Review is published every two years and includes metrics on the functioning of the bureaucracy; regular audits of public-sector financial processes are also made accessible to the public. However, other data, including key information on the status of the national reserves, are not made publicly available, and there is no freedom of information law giving citizens the right to obtain government records.

A lack of transparency surrounded the activities and salary of Ho Ching in her role at Temasek Holdings.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 28 / 60 (-1)

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 7 / 16 (-1)D1. Are there free and independent media? 1 / 4 (-1)

All domestic newspapers, radio stations, and television channels are owned by government-linked companies. Editorials and news coverage generally support state policies, and self-censorship is common, though newspapers occasionally publish critical content. The government uses racial or religious tensions and the threat of terrorism to justify restrictions on freedom of speech. Media outlets, bloggers, and public figures have been subjected to harsh civil and criminal penalties for speech deemed to be seditious, defamatory, or injurious to religious sensitivities. Major online news sites must obtain licenses and respond to regulators' requests to remove prohibited content. However, foreign media and a growing array of online domestic outlets—including news sites and blogs—are widely consumed and offer alternative views.

The government placed continued legal pressure on online outlets during 2021. In March, New Naratif managing director Thum Ping Tjin was interrogated by police; he had previously been interrogated in 2020 after New Naratif ran unauthorized election advertisements. The government declined to prosecute either Thum or Observatory Southeast Asia, the site's publisher, instead issuing a "stern warning" in September 2021. In May, the government invoked POFMA against the Online Citizen after it reported on police officers' apparent mistreatment of a woman who was not wearing a face mask. In September, the Infocomm Media Development Authority (IMDA), the country's media regulator, suspended the site's license over its alleged refusal to report on its funding sources and cancelled its license altogether in October.

Staff members of the Online Citizen also faced legal action during 2021; in September, the High Court issued S$210,000 (US$156,000) in combined damages against chief editor Terry Xu Yuanchen and staff member Rubaashini Shunmuganathan over a 2019 article reporting on Prime Minister Lee's relationship with his siblings. In November, Xu was convicted of criminal defamation for publishing a letter that alleged official corruption in 2018.

Score Change: The score declined from 2 to 1 because the authorities increased legal pressure on independent online media, in part by suspending the license of and forcing the closure of one prominent outlet.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 3 / 4

The constitution guarantees freedom of religion as long as its practice does not violate any other regulations, and most groups worship freely. However, religious actions perceived as threats to racial or religious harmony are not tolerated, and the Jehovah's Witnesses and the Unification Church are banned. Religious groups are required to register with the government under the 1966 Societies Act.

Muslim religious teachers must be certified by the Asatizah Recognition Board, a body of religious scholars under the purview of the state's Islamic Religious Council of Singapore. The system is seen as an effort to ensure that only state-approved forms of Islam are taught.

In August 2021, Prime Minister Lee announced that the government would allow public-sector Muslim nurses to wear the tudung (headscarf) while on duty.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 1 / 4

Public schools include a national education component that has been criticized for presenting a history of Singapore that focuses excessively on the role of the PAP. All public universities and political research institutions have direct government links that enable political influence and interference in hiring and firing; recent faculty turnover at two major universities has increased concerns about political pressure. Self-censorship on Singapore-related topics is common among academics, who can face legal and career consequences for critical speech.

A study by AcademiaSG, a network of Singaporean academics, published in August 2021 found that 16 percent of respondents did not feel free to select their preferred research area. In addition, more female respondents said they were unable to pursue certain projects than their male counterparts.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 2 / 4

While there is some space for personal expression and private discussion, legal restrictions on topics that involve race and religion constrain dialogue. The threat of defamation suits and related charges are also deterrents to free speech, including on social media. A 2019 ruling effectively allowed defamation charges for criticism of the government in general.

POFMA provides for criminal penalties including fines and up to a year in prison for failure to comply with removal or correction orders. POFMA has been invoked against opposition figures, activists, and social media users.

Online expression is also affected by FICA, which Parliament passed in October 2021. FICA allows the home affairs minister to remove online content, while ISPs and social media operators can be compelled to provide information on their users. Access to applications can also be restricted under FICA.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 3 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 1 / 4

Public assemblies are subject to extensive restrictions. Police permits are required for assemblies that occur outdoors; limited restrictions apply to indoor gatherings. Speakers' Corner at Hong Lim Park is the designated site for open assembly, though events there can likewise be restricted if they are deemed disruptive. Non-Singaporeans are generally prohibited from participating in or attending public assemblies that are considered political or sensitive. A 2017 amendment to the Public Order Act (POA) increased the authorities' discretion to ban public meetings and barred foreign nationals from organizing, funding, or observing gatherings that could be used for a political purpose.

The Public Order and Safety (Special Powers) Act of 2018 granted the home affairs minister and police enhanced authority in the context of a vaguely defined "serious incident," which could include scenarios ranging from terrorist attacks to peaceful protests. Officials would be permitted to potentially use lethal force and to halt newsgathering and online communications in the affected area. The special powers could be invoked in advance of a likely or threatened incident.

Authorities punish activists for holding unauthorized events, including even the smallest possible "assemblies." In January 2021, three protesters who picketed in front of the Ministry of Education over the treatment of transgender students were arrested under the POA. In February, activist Jolovan Wham was convicted for holding two illegal public assemblies in 2017.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 1 / 4

The Societies Act requires most organizations of more than 10 people to register with the government; the government enjoys full discretion to register or dissolve such groups.

Only registered parties and associations may participate in organized political activity. Despite these restrictions, some NGOs engage in human rights– and governance-related work, advocating policy improvements and addressing the interests of constituencies including migrant workers and women. Prominent activists are subject to police questioning, criminal charges, civil lawsuits, and other forms of harassment in reprisal for their work. Under FICA, organizations that are designated “politically significant” are obligated to disclose foreign funding.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 1 / 4

Unions are granted some rights under the Trade Unions Act, though restrictions include a ban on government employees joining unions. Union members are prohibited from voting on collective agreements negotiated by union representatives and employers. Strikes must be approved by a majority of members, as opposed to the internationally accepted standard of at least 50 percent of the members who vote. Workers in essential services are required to give 14 days’ notice to an employer before striking. In practice, many restrictions are not applied. Nearly all unions are affiliated with the National Trade Union Congress, which is openly allied with the PAP.

F. RULE OF LAW: 7 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 1 / 4

The country’s top judges are appointed by the president on the advice of the prime minister. The government’s consistent success in court cases that have direct implications for its agenda has cast serious doubt on judicial independence. The problem is particularly evident in defamation cases and lawsuits against government opponents. While judgments against the government are rare, the judiciary is perceived to act more professionally and impartially in business-related cases, which has helped to make the country an attractive venue for investment and commerce.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 2 / 4

Defendants in criminal cases enjoy most due process rights; political interference does not occur in a large majority of cases. However, the colonial-era Internal Security Act (ISA) allows warrantless searches and arrests to preserve national security. ISA detainees can be held without charge or trial for two-year periods that can be renewed indefinitely. In recent years it has primarily been used against suspected Islamist militants. The Criminal Law Act, which is mainly used against suspected members of organized crime groups, similarly allows warrantless arrest and preventive detention for renewable one-year periods. The Misuse of Drugs Act empowers authorities to commit suspected drug users, without trial, to rehabilitation centers for up to three years.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 2 / 4

Singaporeans are largely protected against the illegitimate use of force and are not directly exposed to war or insurgencies. Prisons generally meet international standards. However, the penal code mandates corporal punishment in the form of caning, in addition to imprisonment, for about 30 offenses, and it can also be used as a disciplinary measure in prisons.

Singapore continues to impose the death penalty for crimes including drug trafficking; 13 people were executed 2018 and 4 were executed during 2019. Executions were halted in 2020 due to the COVID-19 pandemic, and none took place in 2020 or 2021.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 2 / 4

The law forbids ethnic discrimination, though members of minority groups may face discrimination in private- or public-sector employment in some instances. Women enjoy the same legal rights as men on most issues, and many are well-educated professionals, but there is no legal ban on gender-based discrimination in employment.

The LGBT+ community faces significant legal obstacles. The penal code criminalizes consensual sex between adult men, setting a penalty of up to two years in prison. The law is not actively enforced, but the courts have upheld its constitutionality in recent years. The annual Pink Dot parade, held in support of LGBT+ rights since 2009, drew a large turnout in 2019 despite the legal ban on foreign funding and participation. The 2020 parade was cancelled due to the COVID-19 pandemic, while the 2021 event was held digitally.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 11 / 16G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 2 / 4

Citizens enjoy freedom of movement and the ability to change their place of employment. Policies aimed at fostering ethnic balance in subsidized public housing, in which a majority of Singaporeans live, entail some restrictions on place of residence, but these do not apply to open-market housing.

There are practical limits on freedom of movement for foreign migrant workers. In April 2020, the government imposed a lockdown on worker dormitories, restricting the movement of hundreds of thousands of people and keeping them in overcrowded, dangerous conditions. The government allowed groups of dormitory residents to visit preapproved public locations in September 2021 and further loosened restrictions in October and December.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 3 / 4

Individuals face no extensive restrictions on property ownership, though public housing units are technically issued on 99-year leases rather than owned outright. While the state is heavily involved in the economy through its investment funds and other assets, private business activity is generally facilitated by a supportive legal framework.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 3 / 4

Men and women generally have equal rights on personal status matters such as marriage and divorce, though same-sex marriage and civil unions are not recognized. Social pressures deter some interreligious marriages and exert influence on personal appearance. The government allowed public-sector Muslim nurses to wear headscarves in August 2021. President Yacob herself wears a headscarf. Spousal immunity from rape charges was eliminated through a 2019 penal code amendment.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 3 / 4

Singapore's inhabitants generally benefit from considerable economic opportunity, but some workers face disadvantages. The country's roughly 246,000 household workers are excluded from the Employment Act and are regularly exploited. Several high-profile trials of employers have drawn public attention to the physical abuse of such workers. Laws and regulations governing their working conditions have modestly improved formal protections over the past decade, but guarantees remain inadequate. In 2018, the Ministry of Manpower issued a new work-permit condition that banned employers from holding the paid wages and other money of foreign household workers for safekeeping. Existing laws, like the Foreign Worker Dormitories Act of 2015, are intended to ensure the food and shelter needs of foreign workers. However, illegal practices such as passport confiscation by employers remain common methods of coercion, and foreign workers are vulnerable to exploitation and debt bondage in the sex trade or industries including construction and manufacturing.

Slovakia

Population: 5,500,000

Capital: Bratislava

Freedom Status: Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Slovakia's parliamentary system features regular multiparty elections and peaceful transfers of power between rival parties. While civil liberties are generally protected, democratic institutions are hampered by entrenched discrimination against Roma and growing political hostility toward migrants and refugees. Political corruption remains a problem.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- In March, Prime Minister Igor Matovič stepped down in response to criticism from his party's coalition partners about a secret deal he made to acquire 2 million doses of Russia's Sputnik V COVID-19 vaccine, which had not been approved for use in the EU. Finance minister Eduard Heger was then appointed prime minister, and the coalition government remained intact under his leadership.
- Following the introduction of a national state of emergency in October, the Constitutional Court ruled that the country's COVID-19-related lockdown measures and restrictions were legally permitted, and did not violate the fundamental rights of Slovakian citizens. New lockdown measures were introduced in November, before being partially lifted in early December, but the state of emergency remained in place through the end of the year.
- Despite COVID-19-related restrictions on public gatherings, a number of antigovernment and antilockdown demonstrations took place throughout the year. Several such protests became violent, and were forcibly dispersed by police.
- Dozens of state officials were charged with corruption, bribery, and misuse of power throughout the year, including the head of the National Bank of Slovakia (NBS), former finance minister Peter Kažimír. In September, former special prosecutor Dušan Kováčik was sentenced to 14 years in prison for accepting bribes and colluding with organized crime groups while in office.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 37 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 12 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

Slovakia is a parliamentary republic whose prime minister leads the government. There is also a directly elected president with important but limited executive powers. In March 2019, an environmental activist and leader of the newly formed Progressive Slovakia party, Zuzana Čaputová, became the first woman elected as president.

Following the general elections held in February 2020, a new four-party coalition government was formed, headed by Prime Minister Igor Matovič of the Ordinary People and Independent Personalities (OL'aNO) party. In March 2021, Matovič was forced to resign after his coalition partners discovered that he had made a secret deal to purchase Russia's Sputnik V COVID-19 vaccine, which had not been approved for use in the EU. After Matovič resigned, the president appointed then finance minister Eduard Heger of OL'aNO as prime minister, ending the month-long political crisis and allowing the four-party coalition to continue governing.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The 150 members of the unicameral parliament, the National Council, are directly elected to four-year terms in a single national constituency by proportional representation. In the February 2020 parliamentary elections, the liberal-conservative OL'aNO party received a plurality of votes (25 percent), defeating the previously dominant incumbent Slovak Social Democracy Party (Smer-SD). OL'aNO entered a coalition government with three other parties that control a three-fifths majority in Parliament (enough to pass constitutional amendments): the conservative We Are Family party, the liberal Freedom and Solidarity, and the newly formed For the People Formation. The vote took place peacefully, and its results were accepted by stakeholders and certified by the state's election management body, the State Commission for Elections and the Control of Funding for Political Parties (known as the State Commission). Voter turnout was 65 percent.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 4 / 4

The legal framework for elections is generally fair, and 2014 legislation that addressed some gaps and inconsistencies in electoral laws was praised by a 2020 Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE) election monitoring mission. However, electoral legislation does not clarify whether meetings of the State Commission—which is tasked with oversight of party funding, vote tabulation, and electoral preparations—should be open to the public. The parliament in 2019 passed a law that would ban publicizing the result of opinion polls within 50 days of elections. The Constitutional Court suspended the law before the 2020 elections, and in May 2021, found it to be unconstitutional.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 15 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 4 / 4

Citizens can freely organize in political parties and movements. In 2020, 24 parties competed in the year's elections and 6 of them entered the parliament.

There have been regular transfers of power between parties in the last two decades. In February 2020, the three governing parties were defeated in the parliamentary elections and the four previous opposition parties formed a coalition government.

In May 2021, Smer-SD and two other opposition parties—the Slovak People’s Party (SNS) and the Voice-Social Democracy (Hlas–SD) party—presented a petition to the president, asking her to hold a referendum on calling early parliamentary elections. The Constitutional Court dismissed the petition in July, ruling that such a referendum would be unconstitutional.

B3. Are the people’s political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 4 / 4

The citizens of Slovakia are generally able to make political choices free from external pressures.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 3 / 4

Nearly all political parties in Parliament have expressed bias against LGBT+ people, who are poorly represented in politics. Roma are also poorly represented, and there have been reports of vote-buying in Romany settlements for local and regional elections.

Women hold 32 of 150 elected seats and are underrepresented in politics generally. The government has worked to implement action plans aimed at increasing parliamentary gender parity, but no significant change has been achieved.

In October 2020, the leader of the far-right Peoples’ Party Our Slovakia (ĽSNS), Marian Kotleba, was sentenced to four years and four months in prison for promoting an ideology that aims to suppress democratic rights and freedoms. Kotleba appealed the verdict to the Supreme Court, but had not received a decision by the end of 2021. If his conviction is upheld, he would serve his prison sentence, lose his parliamentary seat, and be banned from running for future office.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 10 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 4 / 4

Democratically elected politicians determine public policy.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 3 / 4

Though corruption has long riddled Slovakian institutions, the government has made a significant effort to address the problem in recent years, including conducting a series of anticorruption police raids in 2020 and 2021.

Since 2020, dozens of state officials have been arrested and charged with corruption, bribery, and misuse of power; though many deny the charges against them, several have pled guilty. Further corruption charges were brought against high-profile officials throughout 2021, including against the head of the National Bank of Slovakia (NBS), former finance minister Peter Kažimír, who was charged with bribery in October. In September, former special prosecutor Dušan Kováčik was sentenced to 14 years in prison for accepting bribes and colluding with organized crime groups while in office.

The head of the Slovak Information Service (SIS), Vladimír Pčolinský, resigned in March after he was detained on corruption and bribery charges. He was released and all charges against him were dropped in August, after the General Prosecutor’s Office intervened in the investigation. Later that month, Slovakia’s top police official Peter Kovařík resigned after being charged with abusing his power and obstructing justice; Kovařík had allegedly attempted to prevent the arrest of several suspects in a high-profile corruption case.

In February, the parliament elected former interior minister Daniel Lipšic as special prosecutor; he was the only non-prosecutor considered for the position. The opposition criticized Lipšic's appointment to the role, citing concerns about his ability to act impartially.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 3 / 4

Slovak law obliges mandatory publication of all contracts in which a state or public institution is a party, but enforcement is inconsistent. Many business leaders believe that corruption was the main reason behind their failure to secure public tenders.

The Freedom of Information Act, adopted in 2006, allows citizens to request information from state and public institutions. In February 2021, the Supreme Court ruled that because state-owned companies are publicly funded, they must disclose their management of such funds—including the salaries of their executive staff—upon request.

In March, then prime minister Igor Matovič resigned after his coalition partners discovered that he had secretly made an unauthorized deal to purchase Russia's Sputnik V COVID-19 vaccine, which had not been approved for use in the EU.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 53 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 15 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 3 / 4

The February 2018 murder of Ján Kuciak, an investigative reporter who was working on corruption and tax fraud cases, represented the worst attack on media freedom in recent Slovak history. In September 2020, the court convicted and sentenced two men for carrying out the murder, but acquitted well-known businessman Marian Kočner and his associate, who had been charged with ordering Kuciak's killing. In June 2021, the Supreme Court overturned the acquittal and ordered a retrial.

In 2021, the government "embarked on a major overhaul of media legislation," introducing new laws that would impose severe penalties for disseminating "false information." International media rights groups have criticized the proposed legislation, expressing fears that it could be used to restrict media independence and curtail press freedom. The legislation remained under consideration in parliament at year's end.

Media ownership is concentrated in the hands of a few business groups and individuals. Since 2020, the government has repeatedly postponed legislation that would protect the independence of journalists at the public broadcaster Radio and Television of Slovakia (RTVS). In April 2021, an RTVS journalist was fired for "professional misconduct" after raising concerns about the quality of the outlet's reporting on the COVID-19 pandemic.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 4 / 4

Religious freedom is guaranteed by the constitution and generally upheld by state institutions. Registered churches and religious societies are eligible for tax exemptions and government subsidies.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

Academic freedom is guaranteed by the constitution and upheld by authorities.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 4 / 4

People may discuss sensitive or political topics without fear of retribution or surveillance. Hate speech laws prohibit the incitement of racial hatred or violence and have been used in recent years to remove a parliamentarian after he made racist remarks toward Roma.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 12 / 12E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

Freedom of assembly is constitutionally guaranteed and upheld by state authorities, and peaceful demonstrations are common. The government imposed periodic lockdowns—which included temporary restrictions on the right to public assembly—in 2020 and 2021 to prevent the spread of the coronavirus.

A national state of emergency was declared in October 2021, allowing the state to regulate public gatherings due to “a threat to the lives and health of people” in Slovakia. The same month, the Constitutional Court ruled that such restrictions were permitted by constitutional law. Lockdown measures were partially lifted in early December, but the state of emergency was extended through the end of the year.

A number of antigovernment and antilockdown demonstrations took place in 2021, often initiated or attended by prominent opposition politicians. Several demonstrations featured violent clashes between protesters and police forces; in July, antivaccine protesters attempted to break into the National Parliament and were forcibly dispersed by police.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 4 / 4

Nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) are free to operate and criticize state authorities. During former prime minister Robert Fico’s tenure, NGOs were accused of seeking to overthrow the legitimate government after some organizations supported and worked for the “For a Decent Slovakia” protests. The far-right ĽSNS repeatedly attempted to pass a law that would apply a “foreign agent” label onto any NGO accepting donations from abroad.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 4 / 4

Trade unions in Slovakia are pluralistic and operate freely.

F. RULE OF LAW: 12 / 16F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 3 / 4

The constitution provides for an independent judiciary. However, there is a widespread perception of a lack of transparency and an abundance of corruption in the functioning of the judicial system. In February 2021, the Council of Europe’s Group of States against Corruption (GRECO) criticized the government’s slow progress in introducing measures to prevent corruption in Slovakia’s judiciary and prosecutorial systems.

Since 2015, Slovakian authorities have introduced a number of measures to increase the specialization of the district courts, which is intended to enhance the quality of judicial decisions and to strengthen the judiciary’s efficiency. In line with these plans, a new specialized court—the Supreme Administrative Court—came into existence in August 2021. In addition to hearing cases on matters of administrative law, the newly established court will carry out disciplinary proceedings against judges and prosecutors.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 3 / 4

Due process usually prevails in civil and criminal matters. However, there have been reports of warrantless detentions or detentions otherwise carried out without other appropriate authorization.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 3 / 4

While Slovakia is free from war, insurgencies, and high rates of violent crime, police abuse of suspects is a persistent problem. Reports of police violence against Roma people emerge frequently.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 3 / 4

Roma face persistent discrimination in many forms, including from public officials and in employment. Romany children in primary schools are regularly segregated into Roma-only classes, and many are educated in schools meant to serve children with mental disabilities. In September 2020, the European Court for Human Rights ruled that two Romany citizens who were beaten in a police raid in a town in eastern Slovakia in 2013 experienced inhumane treatment, and their right to judicial recourse was violated. In June 2021, the Slovakian government apologized for the 2013 police raid; six Romany men and women, who had been charged with making false accusations for reporting police brutality during the raid, were acquitted of all charges by a Slovakian court by year's end.

Women are underrepresented in senior-level business and government positions. The 2020 Gender Equality Index issued by the European Institute for Gender Equality indicates that in Slovakia, the gender pay gap and the percentage of women in top posts in the private sector are among the worst in the European Union.

Though there are antidiscrimination laws in place, discrimination against minority groups often goes unreported. Police do not always investigate or take action in cases of discrimination on the basis of gender identity or sexual orientation. A 2020 survey by the EU Agency for Fundamental Rights (FRA) found that more than 50 percent of LGBT+ couples avoid holding hands in public, fearing verbal and physical attacks.

Slovakia receives very few asylum applications, and primarily functions as a transit country for asylum seekers. However, Slovak authorities apply asylum protections very restrictively; just 29 of 370 applicants were granted asylum in 2021.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 14 / 16G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

The government respects the freedom of movement and the right of citizens to freely change their place of residence, employment, and education.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 4 / 4

In general, the government does not arbitrarily interfere with citizens' rights to own property and to establish private businesses.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 3 / 4

Personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, are guaranteed and upheld by the state authorities, but a 2014 constitutional amendment defines marriage as a "unique bond" between one man and one woman. Laws neither allow nor recognize same-sex marriages or civil unions. Public opinion has remained against granting couples in same-sex partnerships the same rights granted to unions between a man and a woman.

Slovakia permits abortions, although conservative and far-right groups in parliament have repeatedly proposed restrictions.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 3 / 4

Severe marginalization of Roma harms their opportunities for social mobility. Human trafficking is a problem, and mainly involves the transport of victims to countries in Western and Central Europe, where they are engaged in forced labor, sex work, and begging. The government has significantly increased antitrafficking efforts—including prosecutions and convictions—though victim identification and support services remain inadequate.

Slovenia

Population: 2,100,000

Capital: Ljubljana

Freedom Status: Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Slovenia is a parliamentary republic with a freely elected government. While political rights and civil liberties are generally respected, the current right-wing government has continued attempts to undermine the rule of law and democratic institutions, including the media and judiciary; this prompted pushback from civil society. Corruption remains an issue, though media are proactive in exposing it. The judiciary has established a record of independent rulings.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- In June, the Constitutional Court declared that key provisions of the Communicable Diseases Act, which enabled the government to restrict movement and assembly during the COVID-19 pandemic, were unconstitutional. The government amended the law in July to pass other coronavirus-related public health restrictions by decree, without public consultation.
- For most of the year, the government withheld public funds from the Slovenian Press Agency (STA), despite two separate laws that provide for its financial support. The Office of the Government of the Republic of Slovenia for Communication (Ukom) initiated a contract dispute intended to compel the agency to submit to greater government control. Critics speculated that Ukom deliberately dragged out the dispute to drain the STA of funds, so as to weaken their negotiating position.
- In October, police used water cannon and tear gas to disperse thousands of antigovernment protesters in Ljubljana. Interior Minister Aleš Hojs criticized police for dispersing a simultaneous far-right demonstration intended to disrupt the antigovernment protest; the officers involved received disciplinary actions.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 38 / 40 (-1)

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 12 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The prime minister heads the executive branch and is appointed by the National Assembly (Državni Zbor) for a four-year term. The president, currently Borut Pahor, holds the ceremonial position of head of state and is directly elected for up to two five-year terms.

After Marjan Šarec, leader of List of Marjan Šarec (LMŠ), resigned as prime minister in late January 2020, Janez Janša, leader of the right-wing Slovenian Democratic Party (SDS), became prime minister and formed a majority government. His government lost majority support and became a minority government in mid-December of that year, though Janša remained in power.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The legislature is composed of the 40-seat National Council (Državni Svet) elected indirectly, and a 90-seat National Assembly. Of the 90 National Assembly members elected to four-year terms, 88 are elected by a system of proportional representation. Two additional seats are reserved for lawmakers representing Hungarian and Italian minorities.

Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE) monitors deemed the June 2018 National Assembly elections free and fair. The SDS currently leads the parliament with a minority government.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 4 / 4

The National Election Commission is an independent and impartial body that supervises free and fair elections and ensures electoral laws are properly implemented.

Supporters of a July 2021 referendum on the Waters Act accused the government of using voter suppression tactics to affect the outcome of the poll. Vote-by-mail request forms were sent to nursing homes only 12 hours before the application deadline; the Commission failed to sufficiently staff voting centers (which were poorly marked and had long lines); and there were unusual changes in voters' polling stations.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 16 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 4 / 4

The constitutional right to organize in different political parties is upheld in practice. Parties need to pass a 4 percent threshold to win a seat in the parliament. Parties winning more than 1 percent of the vote are eligible for a proportional share of funds from the national budget.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 4 / 4

Political power frequently rotates between parties.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 4 / 4

People's political choices are free from domination by powerful groups that are not democratically accountable.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 4 / 4

Citizens enjoy full political rights and electoral opportunities. Hungarian and Italian minorities each elect their own lawmaker to the National Assembly. Roma councilors sit on 20 municipal councils.

A 35 percent gender quota is mandated by law, and parties that fail to adhere to it have had their lists rejected. However, gender quotas are enforced on the precinct level, and nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) have long complained that women candidates are allotted precincts with lower chances of being elected. Only 24 percent of lawmakers elected in 2018 were women, a decline from the last term.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 10 / 12 (-1)

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 4 / 4

Elected officials are free to set and implement government policy without undue interference.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 3 / 4

Corruption in Slovenia primarily takes the form of conflicts of interest between government officials and private businesses. Public anticorruption institutions experience pressure through coordinated social media campaigns to influence their decision-making. The Janša government has failed to appoint at least 12 public prosecutors, diminishing the institutional capacity of anticorruption efforts. Journalists continue to be proactive in exposing corruption allegations. In June 2020, the National Assembly, after years of failed attempts, passed its ethics code.

The Commission for the Prevention of Corruption (KPK), led by Robert Šumi and mired in controversy in recent years, has taken up several notable cases of alleged corruption; including cases related to the procurement of personal protective equipment (PPE) and medical ventilators during the first wave of the COVID-19 pandemic in 2020.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 3 / 4 (-1)

While the government generally operates with openness, several challenges to government transparency emerged in 2021. In June, the Constitutional Court declared that key provisions of the Communicable Diseases Act, which enabled the government to restrict movement and assembly during the COVID-19 pandemic, were unconstitutional. The Janša government amended the law in July to pass other coronavirus-related public health restrictions by decree, without public consultation. These decrees were also subject to review by the Constitutional Court.

Also in July, the National Assembly amended public procurement rules as a part of a vaguely worded omnibus bill, ostensibly to reduce bureaucracy. However, critics—including the chairman of the National Audit Commission for the Audit of Public Procurement Procedures (DKOM)—expressed concerns that the amended rules would reduce the transparency of public tenders.

Score Change: The score declined from 4 to 3 because the government has relied on decrees and an opaquely authored omnibus bill to change policies and regulations.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 52 / 60 (-4)

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 14 / 16 (-1)

D1. Are there free and independent media? 2 / 4 (-1)

Freedom of the press is constitutionally guaranteed, but defamation remains a criminal offense. State-owned enterprises continue to hold a stake in several media outlets, leaving them vulnerable to government intervention. Media ownership is sometimes opaque, and local outlets have been abused as propaganda tools favoring incumbent mayors. Journalists are subject to pressure from powerful business interests and occasional harassment due to their coverage.

For most of 2021, the Janša government withheld public funds from the STA, despite two separate laws that provide for its financial support. Ukom instead initiated a contract dispute intended to compel the agency to submit to greater government control. National and international media organizations, President Pahor, and the European Commission (EC), among others, protested the government's actions. Critics speculated that Ukom deliberately dragged out the dispute to drain the STA of funds, so as to weaken their negotiating position. The STA was forced to downsize 10 percent of its journalists, who either switched to different outlets or left journalism altogether. The STA director resigned in protest in September. In November, the two sides agreed on financing terms for 2021, though 2022 financing remained unresolved.

International media advocacy groups have noted an increasingly hostile environment toward the media and a worrying increase in violence against journalists. A retrial of a criminal case against Prime Minister Janša, accused of defamation by two female journalists, began in June 2021. One of the journalists received threatening letters containing unknown substance in June and September. The substance in both cases turned out to be nontoxic. In April, National Security Secretary Žan Mahnič posted threatening messages on Twitter toward Peter Žerjavič, the Brussels correspondent for Delo Daily, which was condemned by the main Slovenian media organization, Delo Journalists' Association (DNS).

In September 2021, a group of antivaccination protesters forced their way into a Radio-Television Slovenia (RTVSLO) studio, demanding to have their COVID-19 conspiracy theories broadcast. The group was eventually removed from the premises by the police.

Score Change: The score declined from 3 to 2 because the government withheld legally mandated funds meant for the country's public broadcaster for much of the year.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 4 / 4

The Slovenian constitution guarantees religious freedom and contains provisions prohibiting incitement of religious intolerance or discrimination. However, there are occasional instances of vandalism of religious buildings, and of hate speech by high-profile figures. In Domžale in May 2021, reports emerged that headstones in a Muslim cemetery had been vandalized.

In June 2021, the government disbanded its Office for Religious Communities. Several religious leaders claimed this left a void of support from the government, especially regarding religious practice during the coronavirus pandemic. The government established a separate council tasked with resolving open questions specific to the Roman Catholic Church, but no other religious community.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

Academic freedom is generally respected, though at times the Janša government has attempted to influence appointments to academic institutions; the government continued to refuse to appoint Igor Žagar as head of the Education Research Institute.

In December 2021, the parliament adopted changes to the Education Financing and Organization Act, which increases the political influence in kindergarten board member appointments. Experts and labor union leaders strongly criticized the change.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 4 / 4

Individuals are generally free to express their personal beliefs without fear of reprisal. Defamation remains a criminal offense, though officials may no longer press charges through the state prosecutor.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 10 / 12 (-2)

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 3 / 4 (-1)

Assembly and association rights are guaranteed by the constitution and generally respected in practice. Assemblies must be registered with the authorities in advance and sometimes require permits.

In 2021, the government used the Communicable Diseases Act, passed in 2020, to limit and at times completely ban mass gatherings, citing the COVID-19 pandemic. Though the Constitutional Court declared parts of the law preventing assembly unconstitutional, the government tightened restrictions by means of parliamentary decrees. Police issued harsh fines for activities that were newly considered offenses by the government's new policies. Senior government representatives repeatedly accused protesters of spreading COVID-19 without evidence. In March, underage students were prosecuted for violating assembly bans when protesting the closure of schools.

In October 2021, police used water cannon and tear gas to disperse thousands of anti-government protesters in Ljubljana. Interior Minister Hojs criticized police for dispersing a simultaneous far-right demonstration intended to disrupt the antigovernment protest; the officers involved received disciplinary actions.

Score Change: The score declined from 4 to 3 because authorities forcefully disrupted anti-government protests and attempted to restrict assembly rights through unconstitutional means.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 3 / 4 (-1)

Numerous NGOs operate freely and play a role in policymaking.

However, the Janša government created an increasingly hostile environment for civil society in 2021. Senior officials, including Janša himself, made spurious and unsubstantiated claims about organizations' activity and funding throughout the year. The Ministry of Culture unsuccessfully attempted to evict several NGOs from an old office building. Similarly, the government attempted but failed to change public tender rules for NGOs applying for grants from donor countries in the European Economic Area (EEA), including Norway, Iceland, and Liechtenstein.

Prime Minister Janša routinely equates NGOs with business lobbying interests, often calling into question the legitimacy of organizations that criticize him. Other officials have followed suit.

Score Change: The score declined from 4 to 3 because the government attempted to restrict NGO funding and senior officials created a hostile environment for civil society groups.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 4 / 4

Workers may establish and join trade unions, strike, and bargain collectively. Unions were openly critical of the Janša government's actions in 2021.

F. RULE OF LAW: 14 / 16 (-1)F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 3 / 4 (-1)

The constitution provides for an independent judiciary, and judicial efficiency has increased in recent years. A significant portion of the public still has a negative perception of the courts, although this too has improved somewhat.

Prime Minister Janša continued to criticize and disparage the judiciary throughout 2021. He repeatedly claimed, without evidence, that the Constitutional Court was responsible for deaths caused by the COVID-19 pandemic after the court ruled against the Communicable Diseases Act in July. The government also ignored several judicial rulings, including one that compelled them to fund the STA, and legal obligations throughout the year.

Score Change: The score declined from 4 to 3 because the government delayed its compliance with judicial rulings, including a ruling to restore funding to the country's public broadcaster.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 4 / 4

The rule of law is respected in civil and criminal matters. Programs aimed at reducing court backlogs have seen some success, though the COVID-19 pandemic has somewhat reversed this trend.

The government significantly delayed the appointment of two prosecutors to the European Public Prosecutor's Office (EPPO) and proposed legal changes that would give them more power than the Public Prosecutors' Council to choose appointees in the future.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 4 / 4

People in Slovenia are generally free from threats of physical force. Prison conditions meet international standards, though overcrowding has been reported.

Paramilitary groups became more active in 2020, claiming that their patrols would protect the Slovenian border from migrants. After striking down a bill to outlaw these groups in March 2020, Parliament approved a similar measure in September.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 3 / 4

Some deficiencies impede the protection of equal rights in Slovenia. Roma face widespread poverty, are socially marginalized, and lack access to early and secondary education, legal housing, and basic utilities.

In July 2020, reports emerged that police were restricting the movements of asylum seekers, denying them legal aid, and intentionally conflating their statuses with those of illegal immigrants. Amendments to the Aliens Act enacted in April 2021 allow for stricter asylum measures in cases of sudden increases in the number of migrants attempting to enter the country. Advocacy groups said that the amended law would effectively prevent refugees from applying for international protection and would formalize mass deportations. In September 2021, the Human Rights Ombudsman petitioned the Constitutional Court to decide on the legality of a Slovenia-Croatia agreement of returning migrants en masse.

Discrimination based on religion, ethnicity, and other identities remains a pressing challenge. In May 2021, several NGOs accused the police of racial profiling during a pro-Palestinian protest. Prime Minister Janša claimed on Twitter that the Quran had caused the most pain and suffering in human history, which the Islamic Community in the Republic of Slovenia, a local religious organization, worried could induce vandalism and hate crimes.

Progovernment propaganda outlets regularly publish pieces, both in Slovenian and English, vilifying George Soros, placing him at the center of antisemitic conspiracy theories.

Although there are legal protections against discrimination based on sexual orientation, discrimination against LGBT+ people remains a challenge. In June 2021, the Janša government lauded the Hungarian government's passage of controversial anti-LGBT+ legislation.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 14 / 16G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

Citizens enjoy the right to change their residence, employment, and place of education.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 4 / 4

Individuals may exercise the right to own property and establish private business in practice.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 3 / 4

Individuals generally enjoy personal social freedoms. People entering same-sex partnerships enjoy most of the rights conferred by marriage but cannot adopt children or undergo in-vitro fertilization procedures. Marriage is still legally defined as a union between a man and a woman.

Cases of gender-based violence continued to rise in 2021; the number of domestic murders reached the prepandemic average by the end of March.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 3 / 4

Authorities actively prosecute suspected human traffickers and work to identify victims.

According to a survey by the trade union Mladi Plus, the average length of unemployment for young people increased in 2021, while those who remained employed saw their salaries reduced. Many people at the beginning of their careers or nearing retirement are employed under precarious conditions.

Solomon Islands

Population: 700,000

Capital: Honiara

Freedom Status: Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Political rights and civil liberties are generally respected in the Solomon Islands. There are weaknesses in the rule of law, unrest occasionally arises in the capital, Honiara, and corruption remains a serious concern, but recent governments have taken steps to address it. Violence against women is also a significant problem.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- Antigovernment protesters in Honiara rioted over a three-day period in November, damaging buildings in the city's eastern areas and largely destroying its Chinatown.

Four people were killed before the riots subsided with the arrival of peacekeepers from Australia, New Zealand, and Papua New Guinea (PNG).

- In December, Prime Minister Manasseh Sogavare survived a no-confidence vote lodged after the previous month's riots.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 30 / 40A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 9 / 12*A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 3 / 4

The prime minister, who serves as the head of government, is elected by the National Parliament. Irregularities are frequent in the run-up to prime ministerial elections, known as "second elections." Leading contenders usually separate into camps in Honiara's major hotels and seek the support of other members of Parliament (MPs) with promises of cash or ministerial portfolios.

Following April 2019 elections, Manasseh Sogavare won a fourth nonconsecutive term as prime minister. Solomon Islands Democratic Party (SIDP) leader Matthew Wale attempted to stop Sogavare's selection, saying that Sogavare relaunched the Ownership, Unity, and Responsibility Party (Our Party) too late to abide by a law requiring prime ministerial candidates to maintain party membership; Sogavare was previously aligned with the SIDP before moving to Our Party after the election was held. Sogavare was ruled eligible that April, while the High Court rejected Wale's legal petition against Sogavare that May.

The National Parliament selects a governor general to represent the British monarch as head of state for five-year terms. The governor general appoints cabinet members on the advice of the prime minister. David Vunagi, a retired Anglican bishop, began his term in July 2019.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 3 / 4

The National Parliament's 50 members are directly elected in single-seat constituencies by a simple majority vote to serve four-year terms.

In the April 2019 elections, the SIDP and the Kadere Party each won 8 seats, while independents won another 21. Another six parties won the remainder. Days after the polls, support among MPs shifted to Our Party, which formed a governing coalition with Kadere, the Democratic Alliance, and the Solomon Islands People First Party. Commonwealth observers commended the poll's overall conduct but called for voter-registration improvements and expanded early-voting options.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 3 / 4

The legal framework generally provides for democratic elections. The Solomon Islands Electoral Commission (SIEC) had fallen under the jurisdiction of the Home Affairs Ministry but was placed under the prime minister's office in 2020.

The electoral rolls have been improved since the 2013 introduction of a biometric voter registration system. Nevertheless, the SIEC found 4,000 instances of multiple voter registration during the 2018–19 registration period.

In April 2021, a document showing that the government was considering a one-year extension of the parliament's term via a constitutional amendment was leaked to the public. Opposition MPs and members of the public criticized the proposal, which remained under consideration at year's end.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 14 / 16B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 4 / 4

There are no restrictions on the right to organize political parties, but political alliances are driven more by personal ties and local allegiances than formal policy positions or ideology. Party affiliations shift frequently, often as part of efforts to dislodge incumbent governments. MPs shifted to Our Party days after the April 2019 polls were held. By June 2020, the party had 32 MPs.

The 2014 Political Parties Integrity Act was meant to encourage a stronger party system through more formalized registration mechanisms. Many formerly party-aligned legislators stood as independents in the 2014 and 2019 elections, calculating that doing so left them with greater flexibility under the legislation. Of the 333 candidates who took part in the April 2019 elections, 170 ran as party candidates, while another 163 ran as independents.

Opposition parties and candidates may campaign freely, and power shifts frequently between rival groups. Since 1978, three governments have been ousted in opposition-led no-confidence votes, and prime ministers have resigned to fend off no-confidence challenges on two occasions. Sogavare survived a no-confidence vote in December 2021; Matthew Wale lodged that motion after riots took place in Honiara in late November.

No incumbent premier has been able to win reelection, although both Sogavare and former prime minister Solomon Mamaloni were repeatedly able to return to power after a period in opposition.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 3 / 4

People's political choices are generally unconstrained, though church and tribal leaders exert strong influence in some areas. On the island of New Georgia, the Christian Fellowship Church regularly secured the reelection of its candidate, Job Dudley Tausinga, between 1984 and 2014.

China has sought to deepen ties with the Solomon Islands and won Honiara's diplomatic recognition in 2019. Malaita Province premier Daniel Suidani, who has denounced Honiara's relations with Beijing, aims to hold an independence referendum in 2022, though Honiara called the plan illegal in 2020. In May 2021, Suidani traveled to Taiwan for medical treatment, which the Chinese embassy in Honiara voiced concern over. Malaita politicians who were reportedly backed by Beijing unsuccessfully sought to remove Suidani from the provincial premiership in October.

Beijing provides financial backing for the Rural Constituency Development Fund (RCDF), which is dispersed by Solomon Islands MPs; in April 2021, the Island Sun reported that MPs were required to devote some RCDF funding to water and sanitation projects under a condition imposed by Beijing.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 3 / 4

Women and ethnic minorities enjoy full political rights under the law, but discrimination limits political opportunities for women in practice. Only four women held parliamentary seats in 2021.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 7 / 12C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 3 / 4

Solomon Islands governments have generally been able to determine national policy without outside interference, but the country's fractious politics hamper efficient policymaking. Prime ministers have struggled to sustain legislative majorities, and cabinet splits are frequent.

Prime ministers can consequently face significant difficulty when enacting policy choices, with decisions prompting fights for political survival. Sogavare's decision to switch diplomatic recognition from Taipei to Beijing in 2019 temporarily destabilized his government, with a group of pro-Taiwan MPs—including planning minister and former prime minister Rick "Hou" Houenipwela—being dismissed from the cabinet after they abstained from a vote on the matter.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 3 / 4

Corruption and abuse of office are serious problems. The previous Sogavare government struggled to win support for anticorruption legislation in 2016 and 2017, largely due to resistance from within the cabinet. In 2018, the Hou government secured passage of the Anti-Corruption Act, which establishes an independent anticorruption commission, and the Whistleblowers Protection Act. Some opposition MPs considered the laws, which allowed the use of local custom as a defense in corruption cases and restricted retroactive application, watered down.

Under both the Sogavare and Hou governments, a number of senior officials were investigated or arrested on corruption charges due to the efforts of Task Force Janus, a joint anticorruption initiative between the police force and the Finance Ministry. However, prosecutors have had difficulty winning convictions against politicians accused of corruption. Task Force Janus operations slowed in 2020 and 2021. In January 2021, Police Commissioner Mostyn Mangau promised that Task Force Janus remained active, citing COVID-19-related police deployments as a reason for its slowed activity.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 1 / 4

Successive governments have not operated transparently. State dealings with foreign logging companies and mining companies are not open to scrutiny. There is no law stipulating a formal process by which the public may request official information.

Commonwealth observers who monitored the April 2019 elections voiced concern over the possible misuse of the RCDF ahead of the campaign. In early 2021, the Guadalcanal and Malaita provincial premiers threatened to sue the national government over the RCDF's legality.

In September 2021, opposition leader Wale criticized the Sogavare government over the opaque, Beijing-funded National Development Fund (NDF), which dispersed monies to progovernment MPs; the NDF was previously supported by Taiwan.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 49 / 60D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 16 / 16*D1. Are there free and independent media? 4 / 4

Press freedom is usually respected. While politicians and elites sometimes use legal and extralegal means to intimidate journalists, such incidents have been relatively rare in recent years. There are several print newspapers. The government operates a national radio station, and subnational and private radio stations are also available. Subscription television services offer some local content in addition to foreign broadcasts.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 4 / 4

Freedom of religion is generally respected. Registration requirements for religious groups are not onerous, and religious education is not mandatory.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

Academic freedom is generally respected.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 4 / 4

While social taboos persist regarding the open discussion of topics including domestic violence, rape, and child abuse, individuals have historically been free to express their views on politics and other sensitive matters. A ban on Facebook was considered in 2020 but was shelved in January 2021.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 10 / 12E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 3 / 4

Freedom of assembly is constitutionally guaranteed and generally upheld. However, peaceful demonstrations can give way to civil unrest, particularly during contentious parliamentary debates, elections, or large-scale labor actions.

In August 2021, protesters in Honiara called for Prime Minister Sogavare's resignation; businesses in the city, including in its Chinatown, shuttered during the protest. Riots took place in Honiara over three days in November, reportedly after Sogavare declined to meet with anti-government demonstrators. Rioters damaged buildings in the city's eastern areas and in Chinatown, which was largely destroyed. Four people were killed during the unrest, which subsided after peacekeepers were sent by Australia, New Zealand, and PNG at Sogavare's request.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 4 / 4

Nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) often operate informally and the government is not always receptive to the viewpoints of governance-focused groups. Locally based NGOs often lack resources and reportedly grow dependent on the funds and priorities of international donors. Nevertheless, there are no major constraints on NGO activities in the Solomon Islands.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 3 / 4

Workers are free to organize, and strikes are permitted with certain restrictions. Laws against antiunion discrimination by employers are reportedly ineffective. The country's main labor union, the Solomon Islands National Union of Workers, was disbanded by court order in 2013 after lengthy litigation over an illegal strike by plantation workers. However, labor activists registered a new entity, the Workers Union of Solomon Islands, in 2014.

F. RULE OF LAW: 11 / 16F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 4 / 4

The judiciary has a reputation for independence, though a severe lack of resources has contributed to case backlogs. Judges are appointed by the governor general on the advice of an impartial Judicial and Legal Service Commission. The Court of Appeal is mainly reliant on foreign judges.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 2 / 4

Limited resources and capacity restraints are responsible for somewhat common due-process deficiencies. Half of the country's prison inmates are on remand awaiting trial due to case backlogs.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 3 / 4

There are few major threats to physical security, though crime remains a problem in some areas. While the country has a history of internal conflict, the threat has subsided over the past two decades, thanks in large part to security aid from international partners.

Rebuilding the police force, which was disarmed in 2003, was the major focus of the Australian-led Regional Assistance Mission to the Solomon Islands (RAMSI), which launched that year. Nearly all Royal Solomon Islands Police Force officers subsequently resigned, retired, or were dismissed. An extensive training program has since created a force with younger members and with better geographic and gender balance. In 2016, RAMSI undertook a limited rearmament of the police force. RAMSI concluded in 2017, but a residual Australian advisory program continues, while Australia and New Zealand have bilaterally extended RAMSI programs. Mostyn Mangau became the first locally appointed police commissioner in 19 years when he took the post in 2020.

In December 2021, Prime Minister Sogavare announced that the government would accept capacity-building support for the police force from Beijing.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 2 / 4

The constitution prohibits discrimination based on race, place of origin, sex, and some other categories, but the legal framework does not provide robust protections. De facto discrimination limits economic opportunities for women. Same-sex sexual activity can be punished with up to 14 years' imprisonment. While cases are reportedly rare, the government has resisted international pressure to decriminalize such activity.

Discrimination based on regional differences also remains a factor. The Guadalcanal Plains Palm Oil Ltd. (GPPOL) operation on northern Guadalcanal, one of the country's biggest employers, avoids employing laborers from Malaita, even on a casual basis, for fear of antagonizing local communities.

Ethnic Chinese residents also face discrimination. Businesses and buildings owned or operated by ethnic Chinese were targeted during the unrest following Sogavare's appointment in 2019, while Honiara's Chinatown was largely destroyed during the November 2021 riots.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 12 / 16G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 3 / 4

Residents generally enjoy freedom of movement, but some impediments exist, particularly in parts of rural Guadalcanal where people from Malaita were expelled during unrest in 1999–2000. Hostility to Malaitan settlement persists in parts of Western Province.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 3 / 4

The legal and regulatory framework largely supports property ownership and private business activity. However, property rights are frequently contested. GPPOL administrative buildings have been attacked in the past. Logging concessions have been disputed by local groups, as have tourism operations.

In 2020, Prime Minister Sogavare voiced his intention to restrict the sale of land to foreign buyers and bolster Indigenous land rights via constitutional amendments.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 3 / 4

Individual freedoms on personal status issues such as marriage and divorce are generally protected. However, the legal age of marriage is 15, and about a fifth of women are married by age 18. Despite the 2014 Family Protection Act, which formally criminalized domestic violence and enabled victims to apply for protection orders, domestic violence and rape are serious and underreported problems. Victims are reluctant to take their cases to court.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 3 / 4

Legal protections against exploitative working conditions are not consistently enforced, though authorities have made efforts to update and implement laws against human trafficking in recent years. Local and foreign women and children are vulnerable to sex trafficking and domestic servitude, including through forced marriages or “adoptions” to pay off debts. Migrant workers sometimes face forced labor in the mining, logging, and fishing industries.

Somalia

Population: 16,400,000

Capital: Mogadishu

Freedom Status: Not Free

Electoral Democracy: No

Note: The numerical scores and status listed above do not reflect conditions in Somaliland, which is examined in a separate report. Freedom in the World reports assess the level of political rights and civil liberties in a given geographical area, regardless of whether they are affected by the state, nonstate actors, or foreign powers. Disputed territories are sometimes assessed separately if they meet certain criteria, including boundaries that are sufficiently stable to allow year-on-year comparisons. For more information, see the report methodology and FAQ.

Overview: Somalia has struggled to reestablish a functioning state since the collapse of an authoritarian regime in 1991. Limited, indirect elections brought a federal government to power in 2012. By 2016, it had established five federal member states, though these semiautonomous regions are often at odds with the central government. The government’s territorial control is also contested by a separatist government in Somaliland and by the Shabaab, an Islamist militant group. No direct national elections have been held to date, and political affairs remain dominated by clan divisions. Amid ongoing insecurity, human rights abuses by both state and nonstate actors occur regularly.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- In April, Parliament voted to extend the term of President Mohamed Abdullahi Mohamed (known as Farmaajo) for two years, ostensibly to let the country prepare for direct elections. International pressure moved Parliament to reverse this decision a month later. Farmaajo repeatedly postponed the presidential election, and the government prevented opposition demonstrations and violently repressed the protests that were held, some of which featured clashes between supporters of Farmaajo and the opposition.

- Indirect, clan-based elections for the lower house of Parliament began in November and were ongoing at year's end. State assemblies' selection of federal lawmakers to serve in the upper chamber took place between July and November.
- In December, Farmaajo attempted to suspend Prime Minister Mohamed Hussein Roble, accusing him of interfering with a land-grabbing investigation and of corruption. Roble accused Farmaajo of attempting a coup, disregarded the president's actions, and attempted to seize control of the military. Roble also claimed that Farmaajo was scheming to prevent a presidential election.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 1 / 40A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 0 / 12*A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

Under the 2012 provisional constitution, the president is elected by a two-thirds vote in the Federal Parliament to serve a four-year term. The president shares executive power with a prime minister, who must have the support of Parliament.

In February 2017, legislators, who were not freely elected themselves, chose Farmaajo as president. Farmaajo's term expired in February 2021, and the presidential election was repeatedly postponed during the year. In April, Parliament voted to extend Farmaajo's term for two years, ostensibly to let the country prepare for direct elections, but it reversed this decision a month later after the move was condemned internationally.

In December 2021, President Farmaajo attempted to suspend Prime Minister Roble, accusing him of interfering with a land-grabbing investigation and of corruption. Roble accused Farmaajo of attempting a coup, disregarded the president's actions, and attempted to seize control of the military. Roble also claimed that Farmaajo was scheming to prevent a presidential election.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

Somalia has not held direct legislative elections since 1969. Members of the 54-seat Upper House are elected by state assemblies. The lower house, the House of the People, is elected under a system in which clan elders choose delegates, who in turn select lawmakers. Upper House elections were begun in July 2021 and completed in November after months of political disputes. Elections for the lower house started in November and were ongoing at year's end. Opposition groups and observers criticized both sets of elections, alleging political manipulation, improper interference, and vote buying.

Federal member states similarly employ clan-based power-sharing systems rather than direct popular elections to form their legislatures.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 0 / 4

The electoral framework does not provide for universal suffrage. Balloting is the result of an ad-hoc process based on lengthy negotiations among the country's main clans.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 1 / 16B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 1 / 4

Legislation enacted in 2016 allowed the first formal registration of political parties since 1969. The National Independent Electoral Commission (NIEC) has since registered more than 100 parties. However, because the 2021 parliamentary elections maintained a clan-based system and plans for direct voting were further postponed, the significance and role of political parties remains unclear.

The lack of direct elections prevents any group from gaining power through democratic means. The parliamentary elections that began in 2021 were dominated by clan leaders who control the appointment of delegates. Federal states and legislatures provide platforms for some competing forces to exercise influence and authority.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 0 / 4

Ordinary citizens are largely unable to participate in the political process as voters.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 0 / 4

Presidential candidates are required to be Muslim, according to the provisional constitution.

The current political system is designed to ensure some representation for the country's many clans, but the prevailing "4.5" formula gives the four largest groups—the Hawiye, Darod, Dir, and Rahanweyn—eight out of every nine positions, marginalizing all other clans. The system is also affected by intraclan rivalries and dominated by clan leaders, who do not necessarily represent the interests of their respective groups.

Women's political participation is limited by discriminatory attitudes and hostility from incumbent elites, and the interests of women are poorly represented in practice. The parliamentary framework mandates a 30 percent quota for women's representation; at the end of 2021, amid ongoing parliamentary elections, 25 percent of filled seats in the two chambers were held by women.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 0 / 12C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 0 / 4

The government, which is not democratically elected, has little practical ability to implement its laws and policies even in parts of the country it controls. Its basic operations are heavily dependent on international bodies and donor governments. Relations between the federal government and the administrations of the federal member states remain poor.

Critics and rivals have accused President Farmaajo of seeking to centralize power. In August and September 2021, tensions between Farmaajo and Prime Minister Roble increased amid a dispute over the leadership of the National Intelligence and Security Agency (NISA). Tensions escalated again at the end of December when Farmaajo attempted to suspend Roble, with each accusing the other of wrongdoing.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 0 / 4

Corruption is rampant in Somalia, and state agencies tasked with combating it do not function effectively. Impunity is the norm for public officials accused of malfeasance.

A 2019 law called for the creation of state and national anticorruption commissions; the members of the national commission were appointed in April 2021. The government ratified the African Union (AU) Convention on Preventing and Combating Corruption in 2020. However, these steps have yet to result in tangible progress toward accountability and deterrence.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 0 / 4

Government transparency is limited. Officials are not required to make public declarations of their income and assets, and oversight procedures for public contracts are not well enforced. There is no law guaranteeing public access to government information.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 6 / 60D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 3 / 16*D1. Are there free and independent media? 1 / 4

While the provisional constitution calls for freedom of the press, journalists regularly face harassment, arbitrary detention, suspension, fines, and violence from both state and nonstate actors. In 2020, the president signed amendments to the media law that included ostensible protections for journalists' rights but also featured vaguely worded provisions criminalizing the dissemination of "false information," reports that conflict with the "national interest," and incitement to violence and clan divisions. The law grants the Ministry of Information broad powers to regulate the media.

The Committee to Protect Journalists (CPJ) reported that the Shabaab killed two journalists in 2021, and the United Nations (UN) recorded the detention of multiple journalists throughout the year. The CPJ and the Somali Journalists Syndicate noted that many of those arrested and harassed were targeted because of their reporting on political tensions around the postponed presidential election.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 0 / 4

Nearly all Somalis are Sunni Muslims, though there is a very small Christian community whose members generally do not practice their religion in public. Conversion from Islam is illegal in some areas, and suspicions of conversion can draw societal harassment throughout the country. Despite containing clauses that promote religious freedom and outlaw religious discrimination, the provisional constitution recognizes Islam as the state religion and forbids the promotion of any other faith.

In areas under their control, the Shabaab use violence to enforce their interpretation of Islam, including execution as a penalty for alleged apostasy.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 1 / 4

Despite limited funding and infrastructure, as well as other challenges, universities operate in major cities. Academics reportedly practice self-censorship on sensitive topics. Islamic instruction is required in all schools except those operated by non-Muslim minority groups. Schools under Shabaab control integrate radical interpretations of Islam into the curriculum.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 1 / 4

Individuals enjoy some freedom of expression in more secure areas of the country, but criticism of powerful figures in the state and society can draw reprisals, and social media posts that touch on sensitive political or religious topics are subject to criminal punishment. Open debate is severely restricted in areas controlled or threatened by the Shabaab.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 3 / 12E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 1 / 4

Although the provisional constitution guarantees freedom of assembly, security officials require approval for demonstrations and have used violence to suppress unauthorized protests. Some demonstrations proceeded peacefully during 2021, including those in January by mothers who protested in response to reports that Somali soldiers trained in Eritrea had been sent to fight in Ethiopia's civil conflict. However, in February the government banned demonstrations, and police used live ammunition that month to disperse opposition protests against the postponement of the presidential election. Some protests featured violent clashes between supporters of Farmaajo and the opposition.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 1 / 4

Local civil society groups, international nongovernmental organizations (NGOs), and UN agencies have been able to conduct a wide range of activities in some parts of the country, but they face difficult and often dangerous working conditions. Regional authorities and security forces have reportedly harassed, extorted, obstructed, and attempted to control NGOs and aid groups, and the Shabaab generally do not allow such organizations to operate in their territory.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 1 / 4

Independent labor unions are active in Somalia and have worked to expand their operations and capacity. However, constitutional and legal protections for union activity are not always respected. The Federation of Somali Trade Unions has reported threats, dismissals, attempts at co-optation, and other forms of repression and interference from both government officials and private employers.

F. RULE OF LAW: 0 / 16F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 0 / 4

The judicial system in Somalia is fractured, understaffed, and rife with corruption. Its authority is not widely respected, with state officials ignoring court rulings and citizens often turning to Islamic or customary law as alternatives.

In July 2020, the cabinet approved the appointment of five members to the Judicial Service Commission, a constitutionally required body tasked with overseeing the federal courts. Political opposition and civil society groups argued that the appointments were made without proper authority or consideration of the candidates' qualifications and independence.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 0 / 4

The country's police, intelligence, and military services do not observe safeguards against arbitrary arrest and detention, and their work is undermined by corruption. Clan politics and other external factors often play a role in the outcome of court cases. Military courts routinely try civilians, including for terrorism-related offenses, and do not respect basic international standards for due process.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 0 / 4

The ongoing armed conflict with the Shabaab has featured numerous terrorist attacks on government, international, and civilian targets, as well as indiscriminate lethal violence and excessive force against civilians by government security services, international troops, and various local militias. UN officials documented the killing of hundreds of civilians in 2021, including suicide bombings with civilian targets, clashes between Shabaab militants and villagers, and assassinations. The Shabaab also engage in public executions of those they suspect of working with the government or international forces.

Tensions increased in Galmudug State in October and November 2021 following fighting between the Ahlu Sunna Wal Jama (ASWJ) militia and state and federal security forces. Negotiations to resolve the ASWJ's political status within the Galmudug administration continued at year's end.

The unexplained June 2021 disappearance of an intelligence officer, Ikran Tahlil Farah, contributed to the political conflict between Farmaajo and Robles, with the prime minister attempting to suspend the NISA's leader, a Farmaajo ally, over the case. Tahlil's family alleged that NISA officers were involved in her disappearance, while in early September the agency stated that she had been killed by the Shabaab.

Authorities carry out executions ordered by military courts after flawed proceedings. Detainees are at risk of torture in custody, and perpetrators generally enjoy impunity.

While the provisional constitution and legal system offer some formal protections against discrimination based on sex, clan, and other categories, they have little force in practice. Women face widespread disadvantages in areas including housing, education, and employment, and members of marginalized clans and some non-Somali ethnic groups suffer disproportionately from economic exclusion and violence.

LGBT+ people generally do not make their identity public. Same-sex sexual activity can be punished with up to three years in prison under the penal code, and individuals accused of engaging in such activity are subject to execution in Shabaab-controlled areas.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 0 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 0 / 4

Travel throughout Somalia is dangerous due to periodic combat, attacks on civilians, and the presence of checkpoints controlled by security forces, militias, the Shabaab, and other armed groups that commonly extract arbitrary fees and bribes from travelers.

Approximately 2.9 million people were internally displaced in Somalia at the end of 2021, having been forced to move due to conflict and insecurity as well as flooding and other disasters.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 0 / 4

The provisional constitution guarantees property rights, but securing ownership is complicated by a mixture of formal and informal or traditional systems governing land rights. Procedures for registering property and businesses are impeded by corruption and other barriers, and disputes can lead to intimidation and violence. The Shabaab and other extremist groups manage elaborate extortion and “taxation” schemes, placing tremendous pressure on business owners.

Women do not enjoy equal rights to inherit property and are often denied the assets to which they are legally entitled due to discriminatory social norms.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 0 / 4

Forced and child marriages are widespread, and the Shabaab impose forced marriages with their fighters. Individuals can face strong societal pressure to marry or not marry within certain clans. Female genital mutilation (FGM) is extremely common despite a formal ban.

Sexual violence remains a major problem, especially for displaced persons. Perpetrators include government troops and militia members. The UN documented an almost 80 percent increase in rape and other forms of sexual assault from 2019 to 2020.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 0 / 4

Child labor and trafficking in persons for the purposes of sexual exploitation or forced labor are common. Refugees and internally displaced people are particularly vulnerable to exploitation. Children are abducted or recruited to serve as fighters by the Shabaab and to a lesser extent by government and militia forces.

South Africa

Population: 60,100,000

Capital: Pretoria

Freedom Status: Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: South Africa is a constitutional democracy. Since the end of apartheid in 1994, it has been regarded globally as a proponent of human rights and a leader on the African continent. However, reports of corruption among government officials often emerge, and in recent years, the ruling African National Congress (ANC) has been accused of undermining state institutions to protect corrupt officials and preserve its power as its support base has begun to wane. Gender-based violence is a severe challenge.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- In July, former president Jacob Zuma was arrested on contempt charges and given a 15-month prison sentence, after he refused to present himself before a corruption inquiry hearing. He was released in September on medical parole after an undisclosed medical procedure, and a judge in December allowed him to remain on medical parole while he appealed his initial arrest.
 - Also in July, riots and looting broke out in KwaZulu-Natal and Gauteng provinces, sparked by the jailing of former president Zuma. Though security forces were largely restrained in their actions, more than 350 people were killed in the violence.
 - In February, the Constitutional Court declared that provisions of the Regulation of Interception of Communications Act (RICA) regarding the bulk interception of data for surveillance purposes are unlawful and invalid. The court challenge was originally launched by the amaBhungane Centre in 2017, and in September 2019, the Gauteng High Court had ruled that several sections of the act were unconstitutional.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 33 / 40A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 12 / 12*A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The National Assembly, the main legislative house of South Africa's bicameral Parliament, elects the president to serve concurrently with its five-year terms, and can vote to replace him or her at any time. Presidents can serve a maximum of two terms of five years each.

In 2018, the National Assembly selected Cyril Ramaphosa, who had replaced former president Zuma as head of the ANC, to serve as acting president. In the most recent national elections, held in May 2019, the ANC won 57.5 percent of the vote, and the National Assembly selected Ramaphosa to serve a full term as president later that month.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The 400-seat National Assembly is elected by party-list proportional representation. The 90 members of the upper chamber, the National Council of Provinces, are selected by provincial legislatures. Parliamentary and provincial elections were concurrently held in May 2019. The ANC won 230 National Assembly seats with 57.5 percent of the vote. The opposition Democratic Alliance (DA) won 84 seats with 20.8 percent of the vote and maintained control over Western Cape Province. The Economic Freedom Fighters (EFF) won 44 seats, the Inkatha Freedom Party (IFP) won 14, Freedom Front Plus (FF+) won 10, and smaller parties won the remaining 18 seats.

Municipal elections are held separately from the national and provincial elections. The November 2021 municipal elections were declared credible by independent observer missions. The ANC recorded its worst outcome since the end of apartheid, taking only 46 percent of the vote.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 4 / 4

The Independent Electoral Commission (IEC) is largely considered independent, and the electoral framework is considered fair. Long-term problems with missing addresses of registered voters were resolved in 2019.

In recent years concerns have been raised around the integrity of the IEC's leadership and internal biases. Due to the COVID-19 pandemic, the IEC proposed that the November 2021 municipal elections be postponed to 2022. The ruling ANC agreed to the postponement, as they had not yet submitted their list of candidates. However, the Constitutional Court upheld a court challenge by the opposition requiring the elections to be held by the originally scheduled date. The DA also initiated an unsuccessful court challenge to prevent the ANC from fielding candidates after the deadline, which they claimed was only allowed because of bias within the IEC.

The IEC was entangled in another court case initiated by a new far-right political party, ActionSA, which complained about its name being omitted from the ballot paper prepared for the municipal elections.

In September 2021, individual donations of 100,000 rand (nearly $7,000) or more were made public for the first time under the Political Party Funding Act. In addition to disclosure of private funding, the law, enacted in April, requires registered political parties to submit audited financial statements to the IEC by the end of each fiscal year.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 13 / 16B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 3 / 4

The ANC, which is part of a tripartite governing alliance with the Congress of South African Trade Unions (COSATU) and the South African Communist Party (SACP), has won every national election since 1994. Nevertheless, the political environment is generally free from formal constraints, and opposition parties, including newer political groups, have gained ground in recent elections.

Violent incidents in some parts of the country affected the process of choosing candidates for the ANC list in the 2021 municipal elections. In September, an ANC incumbent candidate in Pretoria, Tshepo Motaung, was shot and killed by unknown gunmen suspected to be linked to a rival faction. Three ANC supporters were shot and killed during a meeting to nominate candidates in KwaZulu-Natal. Previous killings have been linked to corruption and intraparty factional battles to access state contracts. There are strong indications that the August 2021 murder of whistleblowing civil servant Babita Deokoran was linked to corruption within the party.

In June 2020, the Constitutional Court ruled that individuals are entitled to contest national and provincial elections. Parliament was given until June 2022 to enact electoral reforms that would enable individuals to contest seats in the National Assembly. Such legislation fulfilling this obligation has yet to be passed.

Though the ANC has won every national election since 1994, it recorded its poorest performances since the end of apartheid in the May 2019 national elections and the November 2021 municipal elections.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 3 / 4

People's political choices in South Africa are largely free from domination from external actors, and the military generally stays out of politics. However, there is widespread corruption within the ANC; party officials have been accused of buying delegates' votes to the party conference and paying bribes to influence political appointments. There have also been reports of individuals buying party membership cards in bulk to hold full control of specific branches of the party.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 4 / 4

The constitution prohibits discrimination and provides full political rights for all adult citizens. Women are well represented in government, holding 47 percent of seats in the National Assembly and 2 of 9 provincial premierships. South Africa has one of the world's most liberal legal environments for LGBT+ people. However, discrimination and the threat of violence can discourage LGBT+ people from political participation in practice.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 8 / 12C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 3 / 4

Pervasive corruption and apparent interference by nonelected actors have hampered the proper functioning of government, particularly during the Zuma administration, which the Gupta family heavily influenced. In 2018, Zuma was forced by the High Court to appoint a Judicial Commission of Inquiry into state capture (external influence held over an administration)—namely by the Gupta family. When he came into power, President Ramaphosa amended the terms of the state capture inquiry to enable the evidence gathered by the Commission to be used in prosecutions. Zuma has since been waging a legal fight to fend off the Commission's demands after he had been implicated by over 30 witnesses in several instances of wrongdoing. Zuma was arrested in July 2021 for failing to appear before Commission meetings.

President Ramaphosa testified twice at the Judicial Commission of Inquiry, first in his capacity as ANC president and secondly as president and former deputy president of the republic. He admitted in his testimony that there had been significant state capture during Zuma's presidency.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 2 / 4

Comprehensive anticorruption laws and several agencies tasked with combating corruption exist, but enforcement has historically been inadequate. Several former and current government officials accused of corruption have not been prosecuted. The Auditor General has outlined in past annual reports that accountability failures have not been addressed. The August 2021 murder of Babita Deokoran, a whistleblower who tipped off the Special Investigations Unit (SIU) to corruption in the Gauteng health department, suggests that protection measures for whistleblowers are weak.

The National Prosecuting Authority (NPA) was hobbled by political interference during the Zuma administration. In November 2020, Zuma walked out of a Judicial Commission of Inquiry meeting into state capture and corruption to which he had been summoned. The next month the Constitutional Court heard an application to compel Zuma to appear. In July 2021, Zuma was arrested on contempt charges and given a 15-month prison sentence for refusing to present himself. He was released in September on medical parole after an undisclosed medical procedure, and a judge in December allowed him to remain on medical parole while he appealed his initial arrest.

In August 2020, allegations of corruption were brought against high-ranking officials, including some affiliated with the ANC and in the Ramaphosa government, for purchases that were a part of the $26 billion coronavirus pandemic relief package. Private companies charged the government in some cases more than five times the price the national treasury had advised for personal protective equipment. Provincial governments were also implicated in a report from the auditor general flagging over 30,000 relief grants that required investigation. That month, President Ramaphosa commissioned a series of investigations by the SIU into corruption involving the pandemic relief package. In September 2021, Minister of Health Zweli Mkhize was forced to step down after the SIU found evidence that the ministry had awarded his associates with a 150-million-rand ($10.4 million) COVID-19 communications contract, money which in part went to members of Mkhize's family.

However, the ANC has used its majority in Parliament to block crucial legislative oversight investigations, shielding its representatives from corruption inquiries. For example, in April 2021, ANC members of Parliament rejected a proposal to investigate a potentially irregular contract for a multi-billion-rand program with the Portfolio Committee on Mineral Resources and Energy that would expedite the building of new power production plants.

The ANC in May 2021 suspended its secretary-general, Ace Magashule, who was charged with 21 counts of corruption linked to his nearly decade-long tenure as head of the Free State provincial government. His attempt to appeal the suspension in court failed in September.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 3 / 4

Section 32(1) of the South African constitution states that everyone has the right to access “any information held by the state” and requires that private bodies release information necessary for the exercise and protection of rights. The 2000 Promotion of Access to Information Act created a framework for access to information procedures in both public and private entities. However, in practice the procedure of accessing information is laborious and bureaucratic. A lack of transparency and a lack of competitive bidding have affected the awarding of government contracts.

In August 2020, the Ramaphosa administration promised to overhaul the government’s procurement system after evidence of wide-scale corruption in the allotment of the $26 billion coronavirus pandemic relief package.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 46 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 15 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 3 / 4

Freedoms of expression and the press are constitutionally protected and generally respected in practice. South Africa features a vibrant and adversarial media landscape, including independent civic groups that help expose government malpractice and efforts to encroach on freedom of expression.

However, journalists face harassment for critical reporting and occasional attacks, with ruling and opposition parties exerting pressure on both state-run and independent outlets. In March 2020, the government passed new regulations under the 2002 Disaster Management Act, including some that criminalized disinformation about the COVID-19 pandemic. The Committee to Protect Journalists (CPJ), an independent press freedom watchdog, warned that the regulations could be used to further censor legitimate media outlets. In May 2020, police harassed, assaulted, and detained journalist Paul Nthoba, editor of the weekly Mohokare News, who photographed four officers while on patrol enforcing coronavirus lockdown measures. Nthoba was charged under a COVID-19 regulation of the Disaster Management Act.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 4 / 4

Freedom of religion is constitutionally guaranteed and actively protected by the government. Religious leaders are largely free to engage in discussions of a political nature without fear of adverse consequences.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

Academic freedom in South Africa is constitutionally guaranteed and actively protected by the government.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 4 / 4

South Africans are generally free to engage in private conversations of a political nature without harassment. In September 2019, the High Court found that parts of RICA, the law governing surveillance, were unconstitutional because it did not, among other things, have sufficient safeguards against state organs abusing intercepted private communication between citizens. The National Assembly was given two years to rectify the defects. In February 2021, the Constitutional Court declared that the provisions of RICA regarding the bulk interception of data for surveillance purposes are unlawful and invalid.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 12 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

Freedom of assembly is constitutionally guaranteed and generally respected. South Africa has a vibrant protest culture. Demonstrators must notify police of events ahead of time, but are rarely prohibited from gathering; in 2018, the Constitutional Court ruled that a failure to notify authorities of intent to protest could not be classified as a crime. Protests over the government's shortcomings in the provision of public services are common in South Africa, though they sometimes turn violent. Police have faced accusations of provoking some protest violence.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 4 / 4

South Africa hosts a vibrant civil society. Nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) can register and operate freely, and lawmakers regularly accept input from NGOs on pending legislation.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 4 / 4

South African workers are generally free to form, join, and participate in independent trade unions, and the country's labor laws offer unionized workers a litany of protections. Contract workers and those in the informal sector enjoy fewer safeguards. Strike activity is very common, and unionized workers often secure above-inflation wage increases. Union rivalries, especially in mining, sometimes result in the use of violent tactics to recruit and retain members and to attack opponents.

F. RULE OF LAW: 9 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 3 / 4

The constitution guarantees judicial independence, and courts operate with substantial autonomy in practice. Courts have ruled against the government in several high-profile cases, including in 2019 and again in 2021, when parts of RICA were declared unconstitutional.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 2 / 4

Prosecutorial independence in South Africa has been undermined in recent years, with the National Prosecuting Authority (NPA) experiencing a string of politically motivated appointments and ousters.

However, President Ramaphosa appointed a new NPA head in 2018, who has worked to reform the institution. In October 2019, the NPA further bolstered its capacity when it hired several private lawyers to prosecute state capture cases.

Shortages of judicial staff and a lack of financial resources undermine defendants' due process rights, including the right to a timely trial and state-funded legal counsel. Many detainees wait months for their trials to begin, and some are held beyond the legal maximum of two years.

During the COVID-19 lockdown in 2020, security forces were responsible for the death of at least 10 Black South Africans. In one high-profile case in April, Collins Khosa died following an altercation in his yard with security forces. Soldiers and police beat Khosa, and a medical examination found blunt force head injury to have caused his death. A leaked report on the matter by a military board of inquiry of the South African National Defense Force (SANDF) claimed the soldiers involved in the incident were not liable for Khosa's death; Khosa's family subsequently sued the government. In May 2020, a North Gauteng High Court judge ruled the soldiers should be suspended.

Despite constitutional prohibitions, police torture and use excessive force during arrest, interrogation, and detention are commonly reported. The Independent Police Investigative Directorate (IPID) is legally required to investigate allegations of police offenses or misconduct. In its report for 2020–21, the IPID reported 570 cases of death either in police custody or as a result of police action, 80 cases of rape by police officers, 256 incidents of torture, and 4,228 cases of assault. Official statistics released in 2020 continued to show a high rate of violent crimes in some parts of the country.

In July 2021, riots and looting broke out in KwaZulu-Natal and Gauteng provinces, sparked by the jailing of former president Zuma. Though security forces were largely restrained in their response, more than 350 people were killed in the violence.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 2 / 4

The constitution prohibits discrimination based on a range of categories, including race, sexual orientation, and culture. State bodies such as the South African Human Rights Commission (SAHRC) and the Office of the Public Protector are empowered to investigate and prosecute discrimination cases. Affirmative-action legislation has benefited previously disadvantaged racial groups in public and private employment and in education, but racial imbalances in the workforce persist. White people, constituting a small minority, still own a majority of the country's business assets. The Khoikhoi and Khomani San peoples suffer from social and legal discrimination.

The constitution guarantees equal rights for women, which are actively promoted by the Commission on Gender Equality. Nevertheless, women are subject to wage discrimination in the workplace and are poorly represented in top management positions.

Xenophobic violence against immigrants from other African countries has broken out in recent years. The government's 2019 National Action Plan to Combat Racism, Racial Discrimination, Xenophobia, and Related Intolerance (NAP) has largely failed to improve accountability for perpetrators of xenophobic abuse and provide justice for their victims. Political leadership on countering xenophobic violence has been lacking, and in some cases political leaders have blamed foreign nationals for their own failure to deliver on political promises. State Security Minister Ayanda Dlodlo announced in July 2021 that authorities were investigating attacks on foreign nationals during the violence in Gauteng and KwaZulu-Natal that month.

South Africa's asylum system is hampered by delays and administrative errors, leading to a backlog of hundreds of thousands of applications. Asylum seekers living in the country often lack official documentation that guarantees access to local services, and asylum applications are almost always rejected when they are processed.

Services and accommodations for disabled people remain generally inadequate, especially in the education sector. Human Rights Watch (HRW) reported that disabled schoolchildren are often excluded from the mainstream education system and are instead enrolled in special schools that do not consistently support their developmental needs.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 10 / 16G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 3 / 4

While there are no official restrictions on housing, employment, or freedom of movement for most South Africans, travel and some other personal freedoms are inhibited by the country's high crime rate. For many foreigners, the threat of xenophobic violence impedes freedom of movement as well. The legacy of apartheid continues to segregate the population and restrict nonwhite opportunity for employment and education. Rising crime rates compromise citizen's safety when traveling.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 3 / 4

The state generally protects citizens from arbitrary deprivation of property. However, the incidents of looting in July 2021 suggests that authorities lack the capacity to protect private property from violent responses to tense political moments. However, the vast majority of farmland remains in the hands of white South Africans, who make up some 9 percent of the population. Illegal squatting on white-owned farms is common, as are attacks on white farm-owners.

In a 2017 party conference, the ANC resolved there was a need to expropriate land without compensation for redistribution purposes, on the condition that such expropriation should not negatively affect the economy or compromise food security. Since then, there has been intense public debate about the best way to effect meaningful land reform to address apartheid-era inequalities in property ownership. A proposed constitutional amendment to address these issues failed to pass Parliament in December 2021.

Despite a robust legal framework criminalizing domestic violence and rape, gender-based violence remains a grave challenge in South Africa. The South Africa Police Service (SAPS) reported 36,330 rapes during the agency's 2020–21 reporting period. There are frequent reports of physical attacks against LGBT+ people, including instances of so-called corrective rape, in which men rape lesbians, claiming that the action can change the victim's sexual orientation. Sexual harassment is common, and reports of forced marriages persist.

Femicide is also a severe problem, with nearly 2,700 women being murdered during the government's 2019–20 reporting period; many were raped or sexually assaulted before their deaths. In April 2020, police minister Bheki Cele reported that the police had received more than 2,300 complaints of gender-based violence in the first week that COVID-19 restrictions were implemented. Several high-profile acts of violence against women occurred in 2020, including the murder of Tshegofatso Pule in June in a Johannesburg suburb. Pule was eight months pregnant at the time, and her murder sparked nationwide protests. President Ramaphosa has pledged to review legislation on sexual offenses, publish a national sexual offenders list, and launch a public education program on gender-based violence; in September 2020, Ramaphosa introduced three bills to the National Assembly to fight gender-based violence.

Same-sex couples have the same adoption rights as heterosexual married couples, and same-sex marriage is legal.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 2 / 4

South Africa's deteriorating economic position has triggered some politicians to consider limiting the involvement of foreigners in some business sectors. In September 2020, the country's wealthiest province of Gauteng published a draft provincial ordinance, the Gauteng Township Economic Development Bill, to curtail foreigners from establishing certain types of businesses that locals can establish. The bill has triggered intense public debate and had not been passed into law by the end of 2021.

Inequality levels in South Africa are among the highest in the world. Only a small percentage of the population benefits from large state industries, and the economy is controlled by a relatively small number of people belonging to the political and business elite.

South Africans predominantly from rural regions, as well as foreign migrants, are vulnerable to sex trafficking and forced labor. Organized criminal syndicates are responsible for the bulk of trafficking. According to the US State Department's Trafficking in Persons Report 2021, the government has made significant efforts to combat this issue, though it had not increased its efforts during the COVID-19 pandemic, which has impacted its capacity to fight the issue.

South Korea

Population: 51,800,000

Capital: Seoul

Freedom Status: Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: South Korea's democratic system features regular rotations of power and robust political pluralism, with the largest parties representing conservative and liberal views. Civil liberties are generally respected, though the country struggles with minority rights and social integration. Legal bans on pro-North Korean activity affect legitimate political expression, and members of the press can face pressure from the government over their coverage of or commentary on inter-Korean relations. Corruption is also a persistent problem, with scandals implicating successive governments and executives from the country's largest companies in recent years.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- COVID-19 transmission in South Korea persisted, with a series of spikes in case numbers in July, September, and December, and preventative measures were adjusted accordingly. The government was criticized for its relatively slow acquisition of vaccines, but about 81 percent of the population was vaccinated by mid-December.
 - Despite numerous efforts, President Moon Jae-in was largely unsuccessful in reviving inter-Korean relations during the year. Communication hotlines that had been severed in 2020 were restored in July, but the North Korean government was unresponsive for a period after its demands to cancel planned US-South Korean military exercises in August were ignored. Communications were restored again in October.
 - In August, South Korean forces evacuated 391 Afghans from Kabul as part of the larger US-led military withdrawal. South Korean authorities accepted Afghans who had worked for the country's embassy and other state agencies, but instead of receiving refugee status, they were designated as "special contributors." While the decision was explained as an attempt to avoid the discrimination and resistance South Koreans often harbor toward refugees, it raised questions about the Afghans' access to the government assistance and permanent residency normally afforded to refugees.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 33 / 40A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 11 / 12*A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The 1988 constitution vests executive power in a directly elected president, who is limited to a single five-year term. Executive elections in South Korea are largely free and fair. Moon Jae-in of the liberal Democratic Party (DP), also known as the Minjoo Party, won a 2017 snap presidential election following the impeachment of former president Park Geun-hye. Moon took 41 percent of the vote, followed by Hong Jun-pyo of the conservative Liberty Korea Party (LKP) with 24 percent and Ahn Cheol-soo of the centrist People's Party with 21 percent. About 77 percent of registered voters turned out for the election.

While voters were not unduly pressured by electoral authorities, Kim Kyoung-soo, the governor of South Kyōngsang Province, collaborated with blogger Kim Dong-won to manipulate the dissemination of 80,000 news articles so that social media platforms would portray Moon more positively. Governor Kim was convicted and sentenced to two years in prison for the scheme in January 2019; the sentence was upheld in July 2021, and he was eventually forced to leave office.

In October 2021, DP presidential candidate Lee Nak-yeon appealed the results of the DP's primary election, which Lee Jae-myung won with 50.29 percent of the vote. Ballots for candidates who dropped out during the primary were not counted in that total; doing so would have reduced Lee Jae-myung's share to under 50 percent and forced a runoff vote. Lee Nak-yeon's appeal was rejected, and Lee Jae-myung was set to face the conservative People Power Party (PPP) nominee, Yoon Seok-youl, in the March 2022 general election. The two presidential candidates made corruption allegations against each other and threatened to pursue charges if elected.

In April 2021 subnational by-elections, two metropolitan mayoralties and two municipal mayoralties were among the 21 positions contested. The PPP won both metropolitan mayoralties, along with 13 of the 19 other positions. In October, Busan mayor Park Heong-joon was indicted on charges of making false statements during his campaign in April. Also that month, prosecutors declined to indict Seoul mayor Oh Se-hoon on the same charges, saying that statements he had made while campaigning did not violate election law.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The unicameral National Assembly has 300 members serving four-year terms, with 253 elected in single-member constituencies and 47 through national party lists. In the April 2020 legislative elections, the DP won 180 seats, while the PPP won 103. Smaller parties and independents captured the remainder. Voter turnout was expected to drop due to the pandemic, but special safety measures were implemented, leading to a turnout of 66.2 percent, the highest in 28 years.

Allegations of voter disenfranchisement, election fraud, and Chinese interference surfaced after the 2020 elections but were dismissed for lack of evidence. Pandemic-related shutdowns of embassies and consulates around the world prevented more than 87,000 citizens living overseas from voting.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 3 / 4

Elections are managed by the National Election Commission, an independent nine-member body appointed for six-year terms. Three members are chosen by the president, three by the National Assembly, and three by the Supreme Court. While elections are generally considered free and fair, malapportionment has historically affected National Assembly constituencies, giving outsized voting power to thinly populated rural areas. A revised map adopted for the 2016 elections mitigated the problem, in keeping with a 2014 Constitutional Court ruling.

A law that took effect in April 2020 altered the formula for allocating the 47 proportional seats in the National Assembly, allowing the legislature to better reflect the national vote and giving smaller parties a better chance of winning seats.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 13 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 3 / 4

Political pluralism is robust, with multiple parties competing for power, though party structures and coalitions are very fluid. In addition to the two main parties, several smaller groups are represented in the National Assembly, as are a handful of unaffiliated members.

The National Security Law (NSL) bans pro-North Korean activities, and in one case—that of the United Progressive Party in 2014—the Constitutional Court dissolved a political party for violating the NSL.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 4 / 4

There have been multiple transfers of power between rival conservative and liberal parties since the early 1990s, and the orderly election and inauguration of President Moon in 2017 after the impeachment of former conservative president Park Geun-hye reinforced this democratic pattern.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 3 / 4

Family-controlled business empires known as chaebol dominate the country's economy and have amassed significant political influence, which has historically protected their interests despite calls for reform. Corruption scandals involving chaebol bribery have affected almost all of South Korea's former presidents. President Moon came to power promising to reform these large firms, but instead relied on chaebol to bolster the country's domestic supply chains as it faced the continued economic consequences of a trade war with Japan and COVID-19.

The National Intelligence Service (NIS) has been implicated in a series of scandals in recent years, including allegations that it sought to influence the 2012 presidential election and later conducted illegal surveillance targeting President Park's opponents. In December 2020, the legislature passed a reform bill that limited the NIS's mandate to collecting information related to North Korea and overseas interests and prohibited the agency from conducting domestic surveillance operations; responsibility for investigating pro-Pyongyang activities in South Korea was set to be transferred to the police by the end of 2023. Despite pressure from organizations like Human Rights Watch, the new law did not reform or repeal the NSL.

Although the country's few citizens of non-Korean ethnicity enjoy full political rights under the law, they rarely win political representation. Residents who are not ethnic Koreans face extreme difficulties obtaining citizenship, which is based on parentage. North Korean defectors are eligible for citizenship, and Thae Yong-ho became the first to win a constituency seat in the National Assembly in 2020; another defector, Ji Seong-ho, won a seat through proportional representation.

Women enjoy legal equality but remained underrepresented in politics in 2021, holding 19 percent of the seats in the National Assembly and six seats in President Moon's cabinet. A group of women lawmakers introduced a reform bill in 2019 that would reserve half of the legislature's seats for women and require gender parity in parties' candidate lists in future races. However, the bill made no progress in 2021.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 9 / 12C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 4 / 4

Elected officials generally determine and implement state policy without undue interference from unelected entities and interests.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 3 / 4

Despite government efforts to prevent corruption, practices such as bribery, influence peddling, and extortion persist in politics, business, and everyday life, though investigations into and prosecutions of such acts are robust. The 2016 Kim Young-ran Act, or Improper Solicitation and Graft Act, establishes stiff punishments for those convicted of accepting bribes and applies to government officials as well as their spouses, journalists, and educators. In January 2021, the Corruption Investigation Office for High-Ranking Officials (CIO) was established to investigate corruption allegations against public officials including legislators, prosecutors, judges, and the president, with the authority to unilaterally indict police officers, prosecutors, and judges.

Ongoing investigations have examined allegations that public officials and employees related to the Korea Land and Housing Corporation (LH) engaged in speculative land purchases based on insider information, with the first warrant issued in March 2021. The suspects at year's end numbered in the hundreds, including three National Assembly members. In October, a similar investigation was launched into the role played by an aide to Lee Jae-myung, the presidential candidate and outgoing governor of Gyeonggi Province, in a land development project in Seongnam. Amid growing anger over real-estate scandals, President Moon called for new legislation to combat conflicts of interest among public servants.

Samsung vice-chairman Lee Jae-yong was sentenced to five years in prison in 2017 for bribery related to former president Park's administration; after a retrial, he was sentenced to 30 months in prison in January 2021, then released on parole in August after serving 18 months in total.

In 2020, a former aide to President Moon was arrested for allegedly accepting bribes and leaking information about a state inspection of a troubled hedge fund during his time in the Blue House. Justice Minister Choo Mi-ae ordered Prosecutor General Yoon Seok-youl to recuse himself from the matter, claiming that he had failed to conduct fair, thorough investigations into opposition politicians and prosecutors implicated in the case. The intervention was unusual and criticized as an abuse of power amid a wider dispute between Choo and Yoon that eventually led both to resign, in December 2020 and March 2021, respectively;

Yoon went on to run for president on behalf of the PPP. In September 2021, the CIO opened an investigation into charges that Yoon had abused his power and meddled in politics while in office as prosecutor general.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 2 / 4

The 1998 Act on Disclosure of Information by Public Agencies allows citizens and resident foreigners to request access to the records of public agencies, except those related to national security. Access to some documents, such as those pertaining to the 2014 Sewol ferry disaster, has been denied despite lawsuits seeking their disclosure.

President Moon pledged to fight corruption and improve transparency in the wake of his predecessor's impeachment, but his administration suffered from a series of scandals involving the transparency of funding decisions, official statistics, and other matters.

In response to the COVID-19 pandemic that began in early 2020, the government acted with openness and transparency, promoting nationwide testing and contact tracing to contain the virus. The Korea Disease Control and Prevention Agency (KCDA) provided public health guidelines and daily updates about COVID-19 cases, tests performed, and deaths. Spending decisions were also made transparently, as the National Assembly approved supplementary budgets to curb outbreaks.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 50 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 14 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 3 / 4

The news media are generally free and competitive, reporting aggressively on government policies and allegations of official and corporate wrongdoing. However, a defamation law authorizes sentences of up to seven years in prison or fines of up to 50 million won ($44,000), encouraging a certain degree of self-censorship, and journalists have faced political interference from managers and government officials.

News coverage or commentary deemed to favor North Korea can be censored and lead to prosecution under the NSL, and access to North Korean media is banned. In addition, the Korea Communications Standards Commission evaluates online content found by its staff or referred to it by other government agencies, and blocks or deletes the material according to vaguely defined standards, though most of the affected content is reportedly related to illegal sex work, pornography, gambling, promotion of illegitimate food and medicine, or other criminal activity.

In April 2021, new sales of founding North Korean leader Kim Il-sung's memoir in South Korean bookstores raised controversy. The Unification Ministry evidently did not grant permission for the memoir to be available for public consumption, and the South Korean publisher, Kim Seung-kyun, faced possible prison time if he was found to have violated the NSL.

In July 2021, the DP proposed revisions to the country's Act on Press Arbitration and Remedies, etc. for Damage Caused by Press Reports that would increase media responsibility for fake news. In August and September, both Human Rights Watch and Reporters Without Borders criticized the draft amendments for being too broadly written and threatening freedoms of the press and expression.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 4 / 4

Freedom of religion is guaranteed by the constitution and generally respected in practice. In October 2021, however, the National Human Rights Commission of Korea stated that the suspension of a mosque construction project in Daegu was due to discrimination and prejudice.

Until recently, the military conscription system did not permit conscientious objection, and hundreds of men—nearly all of them Jehovah’s Witnesses—were imprisoned each year for refusing military service. A 2018 Constitutional Court ruling found that the government had to provide alternative forms of service for conscientious objectors, and as of June 2021, 1,419 of 2,173 objectors had gained approval to perform alternative service.

Coronavirus cluster cases that were traced back to churches led to restrictions on gatherings of large groups of worshippers through most of 2020 and 2021. The Shincheonji Church of Jesus was linked to more than 5,000 cases associated with the country’s initial outbreak and was sued by the city of Daegu for ignoring quarantine efforts. Its leader, Lee Man-hee, was arrested and indicted in August 2020, but in January 2021 he was acquitted of breaking public health laws.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 3 / 4

Academic freedom is mostly unrestricted, though the NSL limits statements supporting the North Korean regime and restricts access to material related to North Korea. Separately, the 2016 anticorruption law subjects teachers and administrators to the same tight restrictions as public officials. Certain portrayals of sensitive historical issues—such as imperial Japan’s wartime sexual enslavement of Korean women—can be subject to government censorship or prosecution under the country’s defamation laws and other statutes.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 4 / 4

Private discussion is typically free and open, and the government generally respects citizens’ right to privacy. However, the government’s capacity for surveillance remains robust. An antiterrorism law grants the NIS expansive authority to monitor private communications. The NIS, police, prosecutors, and investigative agencies can also access metadata without a warrant; this includes internet users’ national identification numbers, postal addresses, and telephone numbers.

The NSL restricts speech that is considered pro-North Korean. As of 2021, the Constitutional Court was reviewing the constitutionality of the law’s Article 7, which punishes those who praise North Korea’s regime or produce, carry, or distribute pro-North Korean materials, but the article has repeatedly been upheld in past cases. A proposal to repeal the law was introduced in the National Assembly in May. A number of South Korean citizens were charged with violating the NSL during 2021, though they were accused of offenses such as plotting to escape to the North, meeting and communicating with a North Korean agent, or receiving money and following orders from North Korean operatives.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 11 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

The government generally respects freedom of assembly, which is protected under the constitution. However, several legal provisions conflict with this guarantee, sometimes creating tension between the police and protesters over the application of the law. Bans on large public gatherings fluctuated throughout 2021 in response to the evolving threat from COVID-19.

Despite these restrictions, union rallies and antigovernment protests were held during the year, including large demonstrations in July and mid-August. Numerous police and bus barricades were set up along streets and squares in central Seoul, along with some checkpoints to deter protesters.

LGBT+ pride events have sometimes been disrupted by counterprotesters. Due to COVID-19 containment measures, the 2021 Seoul Queer Culture Festival was held online.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 3 / 4

Human rights groups and other nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) are active and generally operate freely, despite the risk of political pressure when they criticize the government or other powerful interests. Many South Korean NGOs rely on government grants even as they pursue independent agendas.

NGOs focusing on human rights in North Korea and on support for defectors came under intense scrutiny and pressure during the tenure of President Moon, who prioritized improving inter-Korean relations. The North Korea Human Rights Foundation (NKHHRF), which was established by a 2016 law and was meant to provide financial support to human rights activists and organizations, has been largely inactive since its funding was cut by 93 percent in 2018. The Moon administration ordered a crackdown in 2020 on human rights activists who send balloons carrying leaflets across the Demilitarized Zone (DMZ), after North Korean authorities denounced the practice, and officials revoked the licenses of two organizations engaged in such activities; authorities raided the office of a balloon activist in May 2021. Lawmakers adopted legislation banning the transfer of information, goods, and money to North Korea without government approval in 2020, prompting nearly 30 human rights groups to file a constitutional complaint. In February 2021, four North Korean defectors announced their intention to sue Unification Minister Lee In-young for defamation, claiming that he had deemed defector testimonies to be “untrustworthy lies.”

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 4 / 4

Workers have the right to form independent unions and engage in strikes and collective bargaining. The country’s independent labor unions advocate for workers’ interests in practice, organizing high-profile strikes and demonstrations that sometimes lead to arrests. However, labor unions have diminished in strength over time, as a growing number of South Koreans work on a temporary or part-time basis. Workplaces with fewer than 30 employees are not obligated to establish or operate collective agreements, and major employers are known to engage in antiunion activity.

F. RULE OF LAW: 12 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 3 / 4

The chief justice and justices of the Supreme Court are appointed by the president with the consent of the National Assembly. Appointments are made based on recommendations from the chief justice, who is assisted by an expert advisory committee. The chief justice is also responsible for appointments to the lower courts, with the consent of the other Supreme Court justices. The president, the National Assembly, and the chief justice each nominate three members of the Constitutional Court. The judiciary is generally considered to be independent, but senior judges have been ensnared in corruption scandals in recent years.

Yang Sung-tae, who served as chief justice from 2011 to 2017, faced ongoing legal proceedings during 2021 after being accused in 2019 of manipulating high-profile cases in 47 instances to serve the interests of the administration and major businesses. Trials for several other judges who had been indicted for misconduct in 2019 have also moved forward, with at least three acquitted and two receiving suspended sentences.

In early February 2021, Lim Seong-geun, a senior judge at the Busan High Court, was impeached by the National Assembly for his involvement in a judicial scandal under the Park administration, becoming the first sitting judge to be impeached in the country's modern history. However, the Constitutional Court, which reviews impeachments, rejected the move in October, as Lim had retired at the end of his term in late February.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 3 / 4

Judges render verdicts in all cases. While there is no trial by jury, an advisory jury system has been in place since 2008, and judges largely respect juries' decisions. Ordinary legal proceedings are generally considered fair, but the courts have sometimes been accused of denying due process and impartiality to defendants in NSL cases.

Former DP chair Choo Mi-ae was appointed as justice minister in 2020 after her predecessor was forced out over ethics violations. Choo repeatedly clashed with Prosecutor General Yoon Seok-youl over the management of cases, especially those involving former or current officials close to President Moon. Choo and Yoon resigned in December 2020 and January 2021, respectively, and a revised law preventing justice ministers from abusing their power over prosecutors concerning disciplinary measures took effect in January 2021. Lee Sung-yoon, chief of the Seoul Central District Prosecutors' Office, was indicted in May 2021 for allegedly abusing his power in 2019 to block an investigation into a potentially illegal exit ban imposed on a senior official.

Reports of abuse by guards in South Korea's prisons are infrequent, and prison conditions generally meet international standards. In September 2021, civic groups accused immigration authorities of using excessive force against an asylum seeker in an immigration detention center.

Violent crime is relatively rare, but the country remains at war with North Korea, resulting in a heavy military presence in some areas and the constant threat of renewed combat. Minor incidents of violence near the de facto border are not uncommon. In May 2020, for example, North Korean guards reportedly fired at a South Korean guard post at the DMZ.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 3 / 4

South Korea lacks a comprehensive antidiscrimination law. Members of the country's small non-Korean population face legal and societal discrimination, especially in the workforce. Children of foreign-born residents are systematically excluded from education and medical systems, though in April 2021 the government began granting temporary stay permits and related benefits to children of undocumented migrants who were born in the country. Separately, a mandatory COVID-19 testing requirement for foreign workers in Seoul was withdrawn in March amid concerns about discrimination.

Approximately 33,800 North Korean defectors have entered South Korea since 1998. While the government aims to integrate this group into society, defectors can face months of detention and questioning upon arrival. Some defectors have also reported abuse in custody and societal discrimination.

North Korean defectors do not need to apply for asylum using the same process as other applicants. Those from other countries are far more likely to have their claims rejected or mishandled by immigration officials. In 2021, only 3.3 percent of applicants were granted refugee status or humanitarian protection. A group of 391 Afghans who were evacuated to South Korea as part of the US-led troop withdrawal from Afghanistan in August were only granted “special contributor” status, having worked for the South Korean embassy or other state agencies. While the decision was explained as an attempt to avoid the discrimination and resistance South Koreans often harbor toward refugees, it raised questions about the Afghans’ access to the government assistance and permanent residency normally afforded to refugees.

Women generally enjoy legal equality but face significant social and employment discrimination. Women currently hold 5.2 percent of executive positions at publicly listed companies. They earned 35.9 percent less income than men in 2020, a larger gender wage gap than in any other member state of the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD); the gap has reportedly worsened during the pandemic. President Moon pledged in March 2021 to reduce “career interruptions” for women, though no legislation has been passed to support such efforts.

Sexual harassment of women in the workplace is common, and a number of political figures have been accused as part of the #MeToo movement. The newly elected mayor of Seoul, Oh Se-hoon, vowed to address sexual harassment in the government, announcing a zero-tolerance policy in April 2021. In October, 15 military officials were indicted on charges related to an attempted cover-up in the case of an Air Force officer who died by suicide in May, months after she alleged that a colleague had sexually assaulted her.

Same-sex sexual relations are not restricted for the general population, but soldiers who engage in such activity are subject to a “disgraceful conduct” provision of the Military Criminal Act and face two-year prison terms. While existing human rights legislation bars discrimination based on sexual orientation, it does not offer specific penalties for violations, and transgender people are not explicitly protected. In 2020, a transgender soldier, Byun Hee-soo, was forcibly discharged following her gender confirmation surgery. Byun filed a lawsuit, but died by suicide in March 2021; a court then ruled in October that her discharge should be reversed. A watchdog organization found that 65.3 percent of 588 transgender survey respondents had experienced discrimination in the previous year.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 13 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

Movement within South Korea and travel abroad are typically unrestricted, except for travel to North Korea, which requires government approval.

The government maintained some controls on movement in response to the COVID-19 pandemic during 2021. Travelers arriving from abroad were required to undergo a 14-day quarantine and install smartphone applications to monitor their health status, and visitors from “high-risk” countries had to submit a negative COVID-19 test result to enter; foreigners who broke the rules faced denial of entry or deportation, and citizens who defied the rules faced fines and arrest. These measures were generally seen as legitimate and proportional to the public health threat.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 3 / 4

South Korea fully recognizes property rights and has a well-developed body of laws governing the establishment of commercial enterprises. However, the economy remains dominated by chaebol that have colluded with political figures to pursue their own interests, and property ownership for individuals has become especially difficult due to soaring housing prices and restrictions on the construction of new homes.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 3 / 4

Personal social freedoms are largely respected, and women and men generally have equal rights in divorce and custody matters, though same-sex marriage is not legal in South Korea. The country's health system does not allow same-sex couples to register for health insurance as spouses, leading to a lawsuit in February 2021.

In keeping with a 2019 Constitutional Court ruling, abortion was officially decriminalized on January 1, 2021; it had previously been legal only in cases of rape, incest, threats to the pregnant person's health, or designated disorders or diseases.

Domestic violence is common, despite laws designed to prevent such crimes. Legislation that would ban men with records of domestic violence or sexual crimes against children from inviting foreign women to immigrate for the purposes of marriage took effect in 2020, but many sexual offenses against children carry weak penalties. Also in 2020, lawmakers adopted a set of bills that strengthened punishments for online sex crimes, which have reportedly been on the rise.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 3 / 4

Protections against exploitative working conditions are enforced by the authorities. Nevertheless, foreign migrant workers remain vulnerable to illegal debt bondage and forced labor, including sex trafficking. Migrant workers' groups have denounced the employment permit system and legislation that makes it difficult for individuals to change their place of employment, which can expose workers to abuses such as reduced pay and long hours without adequate rest periods.

Civic, religious, and health groups have called for action to address the deaths of couriers from overwork—a problem that has been exacerbated by an increase in online shopping during the pandemic. Couriers typically lack the labor protections of full-time employees.

Women in South Korea are vulnerable to recruitment by international marriage brokers and sex traffickers. Although the government actively prosecutes human trafficking cases, those convicted often receive light punishments.

South Sudan

Population: 11,400,000

Capital: Juba

Freedom Status: Not Free

Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: South Sudan, which gained independence from Sudan in 2011, entered a civil war in 2013, when a rift between President Salva Kiir Mayardit and the vice president he dismissed, Riek Machar, triggered fighting among their supporters and divided the country along ethnic lines. A 2018 peace agreement further delayed overdue national elections, instituting an uneasy power-sharing arrangement among political elites who have presided over rampant corruption, economic collapse, and atrocities against civilians, journalists, and aid workers.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- In May, President Kiir dissolved and reconstituted the National Legislature under the terms of the 2018 peace agreement. Both houses were enlarged in the new legislature.

- The Sudan People's Liberation Movement/Army in Opposition (SPLM/A-IO) of First Vice President Machar split in August when First Lieutenant General Simon Gatwech Dual declared himself interim chairman. Forces loyal to Machar and Gatwech fought as the year progressed, though Machar's forces were unsuccessful in breaking Gatwech's faction.
- Authorities launched a crackdown ahead of nationwide protests planned for August 30 by the People's Coalition for Civil Action (PCCA). Activists were arrested ahead of the protests. Internet access in and around Juba was restricted and security forces maintained a heavy presence in the capital on August 30.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: -3 / 40 (-1)

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 0 / 12 (-1)

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

Salva Kiir Mayardit was elected president of the semiautonomous region of Southern Sudan in 2010 and remained president when South Sudan gained independence in 2011. A revised version of Southern Sudan's 2005 interim constitution, adopted at independence, gives sweeping powers to the chief executive. The president cannot be impeached and has the authority to fire state governors and dissolve the legislature and state assemblies. A permanent constitution has not been published.

Elections due in 2015 were postponed due to the civil war. A peace agreement reached that year extended Kiir's mandate until April 2018. That July, the legislature voted to further extend Kiir's term to 2021, along with the mandates of his vice presidents, state legislators, and governors.

In 2020, parties to the 2018 Revitalized Agreement on the Resolution of the Conflict in South Sudan (R-ARCSS) implemented its power-sharing arrangements, with Kiir serving as president of the Revitalized Transitional Government of National Unity (RTGoNU) and Machar as first vice president. In February 2020, Kiir appointed South Sudan's vice presidents, including Machar, to three-year terms. In March 2020, ministerial posts were allocated among the previous government, the SPLM/A-IO, the Sudan People's Liberation Movement–Former Detainees (SPLM-FD), the South Sudan Opposition Alliance (SSOA), and the Other Political Parties coalition (OPP). Kiir and Machar both remained in their executive posts at the end of 2021.

South Sudan has not held elections for its bicameral National Legislature since 2010. Its original mandate expired in 2015; that year's peace agreement extended it to 2018. The R-ARCSS then extended the mandate until May 2022.

President Kiir dissolved and reconstituted the National Legislature in May 2021. The lower house, the Transitional National Legislative Assembly (TNLA), was expanded to hold 550 seats. Some 332 people were nominated by the Kiir administration along with 128 from the SPLM/A-IO, 50 from the SSOA, 30 from the OPP, and 10 from the SPLM-FD. The upper house, the Council of States, was also reconstituted, expanding from 50 seats to 100.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 0 / 4 (-1)

The R-ARCSS called for a new, impartial National Elections Commission to be established by the end of the first year of the transition. It also mandated changes to the 2012 Electoral Act to bring it in line with international standards; that legislation was updated by 2019.

The government did not make significant progress in finalizing the constitutional and electoral framework in 2021, however. The 2012 Political Parties Act (PPA) was not enacted by the legislature as of November 2021. Neither a census nor a constitution, which are also required to facilitate polling, were finalized as of December. While President Kiir vowed that elections would be held by 2023, Machar voiced doubt on that timeline in November, citing insecurity.

Score Change: The score declined from 1 to 0 because the transitional government has not fulfilled milestones, including the completion of a census and the finalization of a constitution, needed for elections to be held according to the country's peace agreement.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 1 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 1 / 4

The SPLM dominates the political landscape, and most competition takes place within the movement, which splintered at the outbreak of the civil war. Kiir's hostility toward dissent within the SPLM contributed to the conflict.

The R-ARCSS granted non-SPLM parties legislative representation, but they have neither the resources to operate effectively nor the experience to formulate policy and set party platforms. The agreement tasked a National Constitutional Amendment Committee with reviewing the PPA to ensure that it meets international best practices. The committee's work was completed by 2019.

South Sudanese politics was affected by conflict within the SPLM/A-IO in 2021. In August, Simon Gatwech Dual declared himself its interim chairman after ousting Machar from that post. Machar and Gatwech had feuded earlier in the year; Gatwech dismissed a Machar ally from an intelligence post in May and ignored Machar's subsequent effort to dismiss him as his military chief of staff.

If fully implemented, the R-ARCSS would eventually provide an opportunity for opposition groups to contest long-overdue elections. However, the 2010 elections featured violence and intimidation against opposition parties and SPLM members whose loyalty to Kiir was in doubt.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 0 / 4

The South Sudan People's Defence Forces exercises an overbearing influence on political affairs and public life. The autonomous National Security Service (NSS) also maintains a strong hold over South Sudanese politics. The activities of other armed groups tied to partisan and ethnic factions have created an inhospitable climate for political participation by civilians.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 0 / 4

Women are underrepresented in South Sudanese politics. Only 32.4 percent of TNLA seats and 32.1 percent of Council of States seats were held by women after the legislature was reconstituted in 2021. In September, President Kiir dismissed Foreign Minister Beatrice Khamisa Wani; Khamisa was succeeded by Mayiik Ayi Deng, a male former minister.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 0 / 12C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 0 / 4

The government and legislature, which lack electoral legitimacy, are unable to exercise control over the country's territory.

A clique of Dinka leaders and close allies surround Kiir and exert undue influence on decision-making.

The Sudanese and Ugandan governments helped broker the 2018 peace deal but supported opposing sides during the civil war and have maintained subsequent involvement in South Sudanese affairs.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 0 / 4

State resources, including oil revenues, are concentrated among elites associated with the president. Military commanders have gained enormous wealth through corrupt procurement deals. President Kiir has facilitated corruption by appointing officials who were previously accused of embezzlement.

In October 2021, the Sentry, a US-based outlet, reported that South Sudanese businessmen Kur Ajing Ater and Benjamin Bol Mel Kuol, who are both affiliated with President Kiir, were likely avoiding US sanctions and benefited from uncompetitive contracts in South Sudan.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 0 / 4

Under the interim constitution, citizens have the right to access public information and records held by state entities. These rights are not respected in practice by the government, which is hostile to scrutiny and lacks functional capacity. This is notably true for oil revenue, which accounts for a majority of the government's receipts. A 2020 UN report stated that natural resources were illicitly extracted due to nontransparent management.

ADDITIONAL DISCRETIONARY POLITICAL RIGHTS QUESTIONIs the government or occupying power deliberately changing the ethnic composition of a country or territory so as to destroy a culture or tip the political balance in favor of another group? -4 / 0

Both sides in the civil war have committed atrocities against civilians from rival ethnic groups, but government-aligned forces have been responsible for the worst attacks. The UN and the African Union (AU) have documented numerous incidents of murder, torture, rape, looting, ethnic displacement, and forced starvation. Both organizations have accused Kiir's leadership of planning and coordinating such attacks. UN observers have noted the use of hate speech by senior officials including Kiir.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 4 / 60D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 2 / 16*D1. Are there free and independent media? 0 / 4

The transitional constitution guarantees freedom of the press, but this right is not respected in practice. The government censors, harasses, and arrests journalists, especially those who criticize it or report on corruption or sanctions. According to the Committee to Protect Journalists (CPJ), at least six have been killed in the course of their work since 2015, though none were killed in 2021.

In August 2021, the NSS shuttered Radio Jonglei and briefly detained some of its journalists after one of its staff members interviewed a PCCA organizer. The station was allowed to reopen in September after apologizing to authorities.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 1 / 4

The interim constitution guarantees religious freedom, but houses of worship—used as places of refuge for civilians—have been attacked by gunmen seeking members of rival ethnic groups. In July 2021, police arrested Prophet Abraham Chol Maketh of the Kush International Church for saying that Kiir and Machar would be deposed. In September, Kalisto Lado Faustino, then the mayor of Juba, launched a crackdown on witch doctors.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 1 / 4

The education system was seriously disrupted by the civil war, with many schools closed or commandeered for military use. Some schools have reopened in recent years, but some teachers have not returned due to poor pay or delays in receiving pay. Planned activities on campuses require NSS permission, and the agency is known to send undercover agents to universities. As a result, self-censorship occurs in educational institutions.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 0 / 4

The NSS has extensive, unchecked powers to conduct surveillance, monitor communications, and infiltrate nongovernmental organizations (NGOs). According to the United Nations, agents have used these powers to intimidate, detain, and murder journalists, opposition activists, civil society representatives, and members of faith-based organizations, forcing many to flee the country.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 2 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 1 / 4

The government restricts freedom of assembly, despite commitments made in the interim constitution. In practice, organizers must seek NSS permission to hold public meetings. The authorities banned public gatherings as part of their COVID-19 response but eased these restrictions somewhat in 2021.

The PCCA, which included supporters in civil society, academia, and the legal profession, called for antigovernment protests and strikes to take place on August 30. Authorities launched a crackdown ahead of the scheduled protests, arresting activists. For example, former state governor and PCCA supporter Kuel Aguer Kuel was arrested in July after signing the group's declaration; Aguer remained imprisoned at year's end. Internet access was restricted in Juba and surrounding areas on the day of the scheduled protest, while security forces were deployed in the capital to prevent demonstrations.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 0 / 4

The government is hostile toward NGOs. A 2016 law requires NGOs to get written permission from the authorities to conduct activities and hold a bank account in South Sudan, and at least 80 percent of staff must be South Sudanese.

Aid organizations have been criticized for hiring too few local residents. In April 2021, the Monyiemiji Forum, a group that advocates for the interests of young people in the state of Eastern Equatoria, called on NGOs and aid agencies to employ more local youths. In June, the group issued an ultimatum for aid groups to leave the town of Torit, but it rescinded that demand after the NSS arrested over 20 members in early July.

In October 2021, the central bank instructed financial institutions to freeze the accounts of several PCCA-affiliated organizations and activists.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 1 / 4

A 2018 labor law provides for the right to participate in trade unions, bargain collectively, and strike under certain conditions. However, the law has not been effectively implemented, and legal protections for workers are poorly enforced in practice. The country's limited union activity has historically been concentrated in the public sector.

F. RULE OF LAW: 0 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 0 / 4

Judicial independence exists in theory but not in practice. There is a severe shortage of judges, partly due to poor pay and working conditions.

In 2020, the East African Court of Justice ruled that Kiir's 2017 dismissal of judges by decree was unlawful. Kiir invited the 14 affected judges to apply for reinstatement later in 2020.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 0 / 4

Under the National Security Service Law, the NSS has almost unlimited powers to detain and interrogate suspects. They extrajudicially operate detention facilities known for holding detainees arbitrarily and incommunicado. Authorities arbitrarily arrest individuals suspected of affiliating with armed organizations that oppose the peace deal.

Under the peace agreement, all political prisoners are to be released; some were in 2018, while others remain in custody.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 0 / 4

An estimated 400,000 people have died during the civil war. A 2020 cease-fire was not respected, though factions agreed to another cease-fire that October.

Fighting within the SPLM/A-IO began in August 2021, as supporters of Machar and Simon Gatwech Dual clashed. Forces controlled by Machar engaged in heavy fighting with Gatwech's faction in December but were reportedly unsuccessful in breaking the opposition.

South Sudanese face intercommunal violence. In 2020, a UN official warned that such incidents were increasingly prevalent and were increasingly militarized in nature.

Physical mistreatment and abuse are widespread within the criminal justice system. Detainees often face torture or sexual assault in custody. Authorities conduct regular executions, including of people who were children when convicted.

South Sudanese are also subjected to forced disappearance. In 2020, the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) reported that it was searching for over 5,000 disappeared people in the country.

There is near-total impunity for perpetrators of wartime violence and sexual abuse. The 2015 and 2018 peace agreements mandated the establishment of an AU-led hybrid court to prosecute these offenses. Little progress has been made on establishing the court.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 0 / 4

International monitors have documented repeated, deliberate attacks by government forces against members of non-Dinka ethnic groups, most of them civilians. The perpetrators have not been brought to justice.

While the interim constitution includes gender-equality guarantees, women are routinely exposed to discriminatory customary practices and gender-based violence. A 2020 UN report noted that women, as well as people living with disabilities, were disproportionately affected by COVID-19 mitigation efforts.

While same-sex sexual conduct is not explicitly illegal in South Sudan, “carnal intercourse against the order of nature” is punishable by up to 10 years’ imprisonment. LGBT+ people face widespread discrimination and social stigma, including harassment and abuse by security forces.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 0 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 0 / 4

The interim constitution enshrines free movement and residence, as well as the right to an education. In reality, civil war, multiple local conflicts, and poor-to-nonexistent service delivery have made it impossible for many people to exercise these rights.

The UN Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs (OCHA) counted 2 million internally displaced people in South Sudan as of December 2021.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 0 / 4

Disputes over land use and ownership are frequent causes of conflict, and the return of refugees has exacerbated the problem. Property rights are weak and not respected in practice. Customary practices often deny women their legal rights to property and inheritance.

Armed groups and influential politicians prosper through corrupt business deals and activities, including the illicit extraction of natural resources like gold and timber.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 0 / 4

Rape and other forms of sexual violence have been used extensively as weapons of war against both men and women, without legal consequence for perpetrators.

Domestic violence is not legally addressed. A 2017 International Rescue Committee (IRC) study found that 65 percent of the women and girls surveyed experienced physical or sexual violence, with 33 percent suffering sexual violence by a nonpartner.

Customary law puts women at a disadvantage in matters of divorce and child custody. Forced and early marriages are common, with about half of girls marrying by age 18. Spousal rape is not a crime.

In April 2021, cabinet minister Peter Mayen Majongdit disrupted a soccer game to stop his wife, Aluel Garang, from participating in a match. In August, Mayen physically attacked Garang. An OPP member party removed Mayen from its membership.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 0 / 4

Economic collapse has led to rampant inflation that puts the prices of essential goods out of reach for ordinary people.

Trafficking in persons for forced labor and sexual exploitation is widespread, with rural women and girls, the internally displaced, and migrants from neighboring countries among the most vulnerable to mistreatment. The use of child soldiers is also a serious problem. In 2019, the UN warned that child recruitment was increasing, and that more girls were forced to provide labor, including sex work.

Spain

Population: 47,600,000

Capital: Madrid

Freedom Status: Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Spain's parliamentary system features competitive multiparty elections and peaceful transfers of power between rival parties. The rule of law prevails, and civil liberties are generally respected. Although political corruption remains a concern, high-ranking politicians and other powerful figures have been successfully prosecuted. Restrictive legislation adopted or enforced in recent years poses a threat to otherwise robust freedoms of expression and assembly. A persistent separatist movement in Catalonia represents the leading challenge to the country's constitutional system and territorial integrity.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- Regional elections were held in Catalonia and Madrid, in February and May respectively, amid strict health precautions due to the COVID-19 pandemic. In Catalonia, the leader of the separatist Republican Left of Catalonia–Sovereignists (ERC–Sobiranistes) was elected president of the region's autonomous legislature; in Madrid, incumbent president Isabel Díaz Ayuso of the conservative Popular Party (PP) won a second consecutive term.
- In June, all nine Catalan officials sentenced for their roles in the region's illegal 2017 independence referendum were granted a conditional pardon by the government. The pardon can be revoked if they commit any other crime within a certain period of time, and the officials remained banned from holding public office.
- A second national state of alarm, imposed in November 2020 with the approval of parliament, ended in May. In July, the Constitutional Court declared the first state of alarm in 2020 to have been partially illegal, ruling that the strict lockdown measures imposed during the state of alarm should have only been instituted under a state of emergency; the court issued a similar ruling regarding the legality of the second national state of alarm in October.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 37 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 12 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

Following legislative elections, the monarch selects a candidate for prime minister, generally the leader of the party or coalition with a majority in the lower house. The parliament then votes on the selected candidate.

Prime Minister Pedro Sánchez's center-left minority government, which had taken power through a no-confidence vote in the parliament in 2018, failed to win passage for a budget bill in February 2019, and snap elections were scheduled for April. The ruling Spanish Socialist Workers' Party (PSOE) won a plurality of seats but could not secure the majority needed for a new government, triggering repeat elections in November of that year. The PSOE again fell short of a majority, but after reaching a coalition deal with the left-wing party Unidas Podemos and securing the abstentions of Basque and Catalan nationalist lawmakers, Sánchez narrowly won confirmation for a new government in January 2020.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The lower house of Spain's bicameral parliament, the Congress of Deputies, is composed of 350 members elected in multimember constituencies for each of Spain's provinces, with the exception of the North African enclaves of Ceuta and Melilla, each of which has one single-member constituency. The Senate has 266 members, 208 of whom are elected directly, and 58 of whom are chosen by regional legislatures. Members of both chambers serve four-year terms.

Spain's legislative elections are generally considered free and fair. In the November 2019 balloting, the PSOE secured 120 seats, followed by the conservative PP with 88, the far-right nationalist party Vox with 52, Unidas Podemos with 35, and the center-right Ciudadanos with 10. Among several other parties, the Basque Nationalist Party (PNV) and the ERC-Sobiranistes won 7 and 13 seats, respectively. In the Senate, the PSOE took 92 seats and the PP won 84.

The regions of Catalonia and Madrid held elections for their autonomous legislatures in February and May respectively, amid strict health precautions due to the COVID-19 pandemic. In Catalonia, the leader of the ERC-Sobiranistes was elected president of the region with the support of Together for Catalonia (JxCat), another separatist party. Madrid's elections were originally scheduled to take place in 2022, but in March 2021, incumbent president Isabel Díaz Ayuso of the PP called snap elections for May in order to avoid a vote of confidence. Despite criticism from the opposition, the May elections went ahead, and Díaz Ayuso won a second consecutive presidential term after the PP was able to form a single-party government with the electoral support of Vox.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 4 / 4

Spain's constitution and electoral laws provide the legal framework for democratic elections, and they are generally implemented fairly.

The initiation and conduct of the October 2017 independence referendum in Catalonia featured a number of fundamental flaws. The exercise was prohibited by the courts on constitutional grounds, and the actions of both regional authorities and the PP-led central government at the time contributed to a chaotic environment that did not allow for fair and transparent balloting.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 16 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 4 / 4

Citizens are free to organize political parties, which are able to function without interference in practice. While the PP and the PSOE once dominated the political system, corruption scandals, persistent economic woes, and the dispute over Catalonia have aided the rise of new alternatives in recent years, including Unidas Podemos on the left and Ciudadanos and Vox on the right.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 4 / 4

There have been multiple democratic transfers of power between rival parties since Spain returned to democracy in the late 1970s. By forming a ruling coalition with the PSOE in January 2020, Unidas Podemos became the first party other than the PSOE and the PP to enter national government during the democratic era.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 4 / 4

Voting and political affairs in general are largely free from undue interference by unelected or external forces. However, disinformation and other such manipulation in elections is a growing concern. In January 2021, the Freedom of Information Defense Platform (PDLI), a Spanish information rights organization, criticized social media companies for enforcing content moderation policies that allow the official accounts of political parties to be suspended or restricted during election campaigns, saying that such policies could unduly influence election outcomes.

In September, the New York Times reported that some Catalan separatist leaders had allegedly developed political ties with the Russian government in an attempt to obtain Russia's support for the separatist movement's aims; those involved deny the allegations.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 4 / 4

Women and minority groups enjoy full political rights. Women are free to advocate for their political interests, and they are relatively well represented in practice, holding 43 and 38 percent of the seats in the Chamber of Deputies and the Senate, respectively.

Spain's system of regional autonomy grants significant powers of self-governance to the country's traditional national minorities, including Catalans and Basques.

Nine Catalan officials were sentenced to prison on sedition charges in October 2019 for their roles in the illegal 2017 independence referendum. One of them, Oriol Junqueras, was elected to the European Parliament in May 2019 while in pretrial detention; though the Court of Justice of the European Union (CJEU) ruled that his parliamentary immunity had been violated as a result of the continued pretrial detention, the Spanish Supreme Court found that Junqueras's conviction disqualified him from taking his seat. The European Parliament then declared the seat vacant. Junqueras was released from prison in June 2021, after all nine officials were granted a conditional pardon by the government; the pardon can be revoked if they commit any other crime within a certain period of time. The officials remain banned from holding public office.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 9 / 12C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 3 / 4

Elected officials are generally free to make and implement laws and policies without undue interference. However, the political system has failed to produce a stable governing majority in the parliament since 2015, resulting in frequent and inconclusive elections, a sharp decline in the passage of legislation, and an increased use of mechanisms like executive decrees to advance the government's agenda without the approval of lawmakers. The instability has hampered the national government's capacity to address major challenges such as the separatist movement in Catalonia and the COVID-19 pandemic.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 3 / 4

Concerns about official corruption often center on party financing. Though most party expenses are funded by the state, a 2007 law allowed political parties to use commercial bank loans. In 2012, Spain strengthened rules on political financing by restricting access to loans, increasing transparency, and establishing an audit framework. In 2015, new legislation prohibited banks from forgiving debt owed by political parties. In the past several years, lawmakers have also strengthened rules on asset disclosure and conflicts of interest for high-ranking officials and enacted more severe penalties for corruption-related crimes.

Although the courts have a solid record of investigating and prosecuting corruption cases, the system is often overburdened, and cases move slowly. Among other high-profile proceedings during 2021, in October, the National Court judged the PP to be responsible for more than €120,000 ($130,000) in unpaid taxes related to earlier renovations to the party's headquarters in Madrid, and sentenced former party official Luis Bárcenas to two years in prison for using "over €1 million ($1.1 million) in undeclared funds" to pay for the renovation work.

Former king Juan Carlos I left the country in 2020 for the United Arab Emirates (UAE) amid an ongoing investigation into possible tax evasion and money laundering.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 3 / 4

Legal safeguards to ensure government transparency include asset-disclosure rules for public officials and laws governing conflicts of interest. The Transparency Act, which took effect in 2014, is meant to facilitate public access to government records, though freedom of information activists have reported onerous procedures and called for improvements to the law, as well as mechanisms to access more judicial and parliamentary documents.

The Council of Europe's (CoE) Group of States against Corruption (GRECO) has noted that the Council of Transparency and Good Governance (CTBG), the body tasked with monitoring compliance with transparency obligations, lacks adequate training and financial and human resources. Moreover, civil society organizations continue to report that the Sánchez government frequently resists complying with requests or orders to disclose information in practice. In January 2021, the president of the CTBG, appointed by Sánchez in October 2020, dismissed Esperanza Zambrano, the CTBG's director of appeals, after she "issued resolutions contrary" to the government's position. Civil society groups and members of the opposition have expressed concern that Zambrano's dismissal represents an attack on the independence of the CTBG.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 53 / 60D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 14 / 16*D1. Are there free and independent media? 3 / 4

Spain has a free press that covers a wide range of perspectives and actively investigates high-level corruption. However, consolidation of private ownership poses a threat to media independence, and ownership in the print and online media sectors is less transparent than in broadcast media.

After a years-long process, in April 2021, a new board of directors was elected to govern the public broadcaster, the Spanish Radio and Television Corporation (RTVE). The new elections were intended to strengthen RTVE's independence; however, several Spanish information rights organizations have criticized the renewal process, saying that most of the board members were selected "based on political agreement" rather than on merit.

Journalists have sometimes faced harassment and physical assaults from protesters and the police while covering demonstrations in recent years, and many claim that the authorities regularly attempt to prevent journalists from fully reporting on "sensitive issues," such as the arrival of migrants to the country. Media freedom organizations have also criticized the government, saying the PP has attempted to use the judicial system in order to obstruct journalistic investigations.

A controversial public safety law that took effect in 2015, nicknamed the “gag law” by its critics, established large fines for offenses including spreading images that could endanger police officers or protected facilities. Journalists have faced penalties for alleged violations of the law while reporting on police actions.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 4 / 4

Religious freedom is guaranteed in the constitution and respected in practice. As the country’s dominant religion, Roman Catholicism enjoys benefits not afforded to others, such as financing through the tax system. However, the religious organizations of Jews, Muslims, and Protestants also have certain privileges through agreements with the state, including tax exemptions and permission to station chaplains in hospitals and other institutions. Other groups that choose to register can obtain a legal identity and the right to own or rent property. The penal code contains a provision to punish blasphemy, but prosecutions are rare in practice.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

The government does not restrict academic freedom in law or in practice.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 3 / 4

Private discussion remains open and vibrant, but more aggressive enforcement of laws banning the glorification of terrorism has begun to threaten free speech, with dozens of people—including social media users and several performers—found guilty in recent years for what often amounts to satire, artistic expression, or political commentary. In 2017, the Supreme Court ruled that a person could violate the law even if there was no intention to “glorify” a terrorist group or “humiliate” its victims. Individuals have also been prosecuted for insulting the monarchy, the flag, and other state institutions.

In February 2021, rapper Pablo Hasél—convicted of “glorifying terrorism” and insulting the crown in 2018—was arrested after failing to turn himself in to begin his 9-month sentence. Hasél’s arrest prompted criticism from international and domestic human rights organizations and led to widespread protests across Spain. Another rapper, Valtònyc, fled the country in 2018 after being convicted of similar charges; in December, a Belgian court rejected Spain’s request that he be extradited in order to serve out his sentence.

In March, the European Court of Human Rights (ECHR) ruled that the right to freedom of expression of two board members of a local nonprofit organization had been violated when, in 2015, they were convicted of libel for publishing an open letter “complaining of the conduct of a judge in proceedings affecting them;” the ECHR ordered Spain to pay damages to both men. The same month, the CoE called on Spanish authorities to strengthen legal guarantees of the right to freedom of expression.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 11 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 3 / 4

The constitution provides for freedom of assembly, and the authorities typically respect this right. However, the public safety act that took effect in 2015 imposed a number of restrictions, including fines of up to €600,000 ($670,000) for participating in unauthorized protests near key buildings or infrastructure. Participants in protests on a variety of local concerns have faced smaller but still substantial fines under the law in practice. In March 2021, the CoE recommended that the government should reform this law due to its “repressive potential.”

Human rights nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) have reported an escalation in police violence during demonstrations in recent years, and in March, the ECHR condemned Spain for failing to investigate allegations of police brutality during a 2012 protest.

Two of the Catalan independence leaders convicted of sedition in 2019, Jordi Cuixart and Jordi Sánchez, were prosecuted for leading protests aimed at preventing police from halting the banned 2017 referendum. Human rights groups have argued that the 2019 prison sentences were excessive and set a harmful example regarding freedom of assembly. They were released from prison under the conditions of the partial pardon issued to the group in June 2021.

A number of protests took place throughout Spain in 2021, including demonstrations by human rights activists, Catalan independence groups, workers’ rights organizations, and antivaccine protesters. A COVID-19-related ban on public gatherings in Madrid prevented planned marches for International Women’s Day from taking place in March, prompting criticism from human rights NGOs. The ban was lifted in May, when the national state of alarm ended.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 4 / 4

Domestic and international nongovernmental organizations operate without significant government restrictions.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 4 / 4

With the exception of members of the military and national police, workers are free to organize in unions of their choice, engage in collective bargaining, and mount legal strikes. In April 2021, the parliament repealed provisions of the penal code that had allowed sentences of up to three years in prison to be given to workers found to have “coerced” others to support a strike.

F. RULE OF LAW: 13 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 3 / 4

The constitution provides for an independent judiciary, and the courts operate autonomously in practice. However, the CoE has criticized the fact that under current law, the 12 judges who sit on the 20-member General Council of the Judiciary—which oversees the courts and is responsible for appointing, transferring, and promoting judges—are not directly elected by their peers, but appointed through a three-fifths vote in the parliament, as with the other eight members who are not judges. This arrangement has exposed the body to political disruptions. The council’s membership was due to be renewed in late 2018, but the opposition PP denied the governing parties the necessary supermajority; the incumbent council continued to operate on an interim basis during 2021, raising concerns about the legitimacy of its judicial appointments and other decisions.

A November 2021 Supreme Court ruling upheld the 2019 conviction of Judge Salvador Alba on charges of judicial malpractice and bribery for conspiring to force fellow judge and Podemos lawmaker Victoria Rosell out of office on false grounds.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 3 / 4

The authorities generally observe legal safeguards against arbitrary arrest and detention, though judges can authorize special restrictions on communication and delayed arraignment for detainees held in connection with acts of terrorism. Defendants typically enjoy full due process rights during trial. However, high-profile cases related to Basque and Catalan nationalism in recent years have featured flaws—including disproportionate charges and penalties as well as unjustified pretrial detention—that drew criticism from international organizations.

In December 2020, the Supreme Court unanimously ruled that Arnaldo Otegi—leader of the Basque separatist party Euskal Herria Bildu, which holds several seats in the parliament—would have to stand trial again on charges for which he had already served a prison sentence. The Constitutional Court temporarily suspended Otegi’s new trial in late 2021.

Since the beginning of the COVID-19 pandemic, civil society groups have reported that authorities arbitrarily enforce lockdown rules in a way that disproportionately affects racial minority groups and migrant workers. In May 2021, Spain’s ombudsman reported an increase in mistreatment allegations and raised concerns over the authorities’ use of the Law on Citizen Security to impose fines during the 2020 and 2021 states of alarm.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 4 / 4

The population faces no major threats to physical security. The potential for terrorist attacks by radical Islamist groups remains a concern, though Basque Fatherland and Freedom (ETA), a separatist group that carried out terrorist attacks for decades, formally dissolved in 2018.

Prison conditions generally meet international standards, but reception centers for irregular migrants suffer from overcrowding and other problems, which were compounded by health risks during the COVID-19 pandemic.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 3 / 4

Women, racial minorities, and LGBT+ people enjoy legal protections against discrimination and other mistreatment, though a degree of societal bias persists. In July 2021, a young man was killed by a group of people allegedly shouting homophobic slurs. A police investigation into the attack remained ongoing at year’s end. Some minority groups—including Roma—remain economically marginalized and are allegedly subject to police profiling.

Spain is a major point of entry to Europe for irregular migrants and refugees, with most making the crossing by sea; in 2021, some 39,000 people arrived in the country. International human rights groups have criticized the Spanish authorities, saying that migrants and asylum seekers are often housed in poor conditions, with many being held in improvised camps that allegedly violate human rights standards.

Separately, thousands of migrants and refugees regularly congregate at the land border between Morocco and the Spanish enclaves of Ceuta and Melilla. In February 2020, the grand chamber of the ECHR upheld the legality of a controversial practice in which Spanish authorities summarily return people who cross the enclaves’ borders unlawfully, for example by scaling fences. During 2021, several unaccompanied minors arrived to Ceuta from Morocco and were summarily returned; the ombudsman and dozens of human rights NGOs condemned the returns, saying that the government had failed to comply with the legal standards governing the practice, violating the rights of the minors.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 15 / 16G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

There are few significant restrictions on individuals' freedom to travel within the country or abroad, or to change their place of residence, employment, or education. However, the authorities have been criticized for failing to grant documented asylum seekers free movement within Spanish territory, despite multiple court rulings on the matter.

Freedom of movement within Spain was temporarily restricted in both 2020 and 2021 during the country's two COVID-19-related states of alarm. In July 2021, the Constitutional Court ruled that Spain's first state of alarm in 2020 had been partially illegal, and that such restrictions should have been imposed under a state of emergency. The court ruled in October that the second state of alarm, which ended in May 2021, had also been unconstitutional.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 4 / 4

The legal framework supports property rights, and there are no major restrictions on private business activity.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 4 / 4

Personal social freedoms are generally respected. Same-sex marriage has been legal in Spain since 2005, and same-sex couples may adopt children.

There are legal protections against domestic abuse and rape, including spousal rape; while both remain problems in practice, the government and civil society groups work actively to combat them. Abortion is legal, but can be difficult to access in practice: in 5 of Spain's 17 autonomous regions, no public hospital offers the procedure.

In March 2021, the parliament approved legislation to regulate voluntary euthanasia for people with "unbearable permanent conditions" and those who are terminally ill.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 3 / 4

Residents generally have access to economic opportunity and protection from exploitative working conditions. Despite strong antitrafficking efforts by law enforcement agencies, however, migrant workers remain vulnerable to debt bondage, forced labor, and sexual exploitation.

Since 2019, the country's minimum wage has risen 31 percent; it will continue to increase until it reaches 60 percent of the average salary in Spain as part of a government-led effort to reduce the level of income inequality in the country, which is among the worst in the EU.

Sri Lanka

Population: 22,100,000

Capital: Colombo

Freedom Status: Partly Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Sri Lanka experienced improvements in political rights and civil liberties after the 2015 election of President Maithripala Sirisena, which ended the more repressive rule of Mahinda Rajapaksa. However, the Sirisena administration was slow to implement transitional justice mechanisms needed to address the aftermath of a 26-year civil war between government forces and ethnic Tamil rebels, who were defeated in 2009. Gotabaya Rajapaksa's election as president in November 2019 and the Sri Lanka Podujana Peramuna's (SLPP) victory in the August 2020 parliamentary polls emboldened the Rajapaksa family, which has taken steps to empower the executive, roll back accountability mechanisms for civil war-era rights violations, and further militarize the island.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- Despite repeated promises to repeal the controversial Prevention of Terrorism Act (PTA), the government expanded its provisions in March to allow suspects to be detained for up to two years without trial. Critics accused the government of only making such promises to avoid international censure.
- In June, President Gotabaya Rajapaksa pardoned a close associate and former member of Parliament who had been sentenced to death in 2016 for killing a political rival. The United Nations (UN) human rights office condemned the pardon as "selective and arbitrary," saying Rajapaksa's actions had undermined the rule of law in the country.
- Parliament voted to impose a state of emergency in September, claiming the measure was necessary to control the price of essential commodities due to food shortages. Opposition figures criticized the decision, saying the state of emergency was unnecessary and could be used to suppress dissent.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 23 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 9 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 3 / 4

Under the constitution as amended in 2015, the president is directly elected for up to two five-year terms and must consult the prime minister on ministerial appointments. The prime minister and cabinet must maintain the confidence of Parliament.

In the November 2019 presidential election, Gotabaya Rajapaksa of the SLPP defeated his main opponent, Housing Minister Sajith Premadasa of the United National Party (UNP), 52 percent to 42 percent.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 3 / 4

The 225-member unicameral Parliament is elected for five-year terms, with 196 members elected through an open list system at the district level, and 29 members appointed via a national list. In the 2020 parliamentary elections, the SLPP won 145 seats, which when combined with the support of allies, ensured a supermajority. Samagi Jana Balawegaya (SJB) won 54 seats. The UNP, from which the SJB had split in early 2020, managed to acquire only one national-list seat. Sri Lanka's other major party, the Sri Lanka Freedom Party (SLFP), also secured just one seat, although the vast majority of its candidates contested as part of the SLPP, which allied with several parties for the poll.

While the parliamentary polls were mainly free and fair and saw lower levels of violence compared to previous elections, intimidation and harassment of women, Muslim, and Tamil voters prior to the polls were among the incidents reported.

Provincial council elections were repeatedly postponed due to disputes over the delimitation of voting districts. The last rounds were held in 2012–14, meaning the councils' five-year terms expired in 2017–19. Prominent nationalists, including leading members of the Buddhist clergy, want the councils abolished, pointing to how India superimposed the power-sharing system on Sri Lanka via the 13th Amendment, which was adopted as part of the 1987 peace accord that attempted to resolve the Sri Lankan civil war. They also point to the wasteful spending associated with the councils, in which only 25 percent of the budget is used for development purposes. Though the government promised to hold council elections by the end of 2021, no elections were held.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 3 / 4

The Election Commission (EC) of Sri Lanka, which administers and oversees all elections in the country, has built a reputation for independence. However, the new 20th Amendment, approved in October 2020, compromises the EC's independence by allowing the president sole power to appoint commissioners.

The government has been unable to complete the process for provincial council constituency delimitation required under a 2017 electoral law.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 10 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 3 / 4

A range of political parties operate freely and participate in elections. The success of the SLPP, founded in 2016 and led by Mahinda Rajapaksa, in the 2018 local elections, the 2019 presidential election, and 2020 parliamentary elections, demonstrates that new parties can form and compete without significant interference. However, political debates between parties sometimes involve an element of violence and intimidation.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 3 / 4

Opposition groupings are generally free to carry out peaceful political activities and are able to win power through elections. The opposition SLPP won control of 231 out of 340 local councils in the 2018 elections and took the presidency in 2019, leading to a peaceful transfer of executive power. The SLPP, which included many SLFP members that were in opposition, also won the 2020 parliamentary elections in a landslide. However, opposition figures and supporters sometimes face harassment or violence.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 2 / 4

Vote buying and political bribery persist as issues that distort the free choices of voters.

Many members of the military openly backed then president Mahinda Rajapaksa ahead of the 2015 election, and many among the armed forces recognized his abortive appointment as prime minister in 2018 despite protests that the move was unconstitutional. Former and current military officials supported the candidacy of Gotabaya Rajapaksa in the 2019 presidential election. Since the 2019 election, the government has undergone increasing militarization, strengthening Rajapaksa's hold on power and contributing to the political dominance of Sri Lanka's Buddhist majority.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 2 / 4

A number of parties explicitly represent the interests of ethnic and religious minority groups. Systemic discrimination, including via language laws and naturalization procedures, negatively affects Tamils' political participation. Since 2020, the government has prevented the national anthem from being sung in Tamil at the official Independence Day celebration, though the previous government had reintroduced the practice.

While a 25 percent quota at the local government level has resulted in an increase in female political candidates, women currently hold only 5.3 percent of seats in Parliament. When President Gotabaya Rajapaksa announced his 27-member cabinet following 2020 parliamentary elections, only one member was a woman. Of the other 26, one was a Muslim and one a Tamil (in a country where Muslims and Tamils amount to 25 percent of the population).

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 5 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 2 / 4

In practice, the president, prime minister, and finance minister—all Rajapaksa siblings—enjoy almost complete authority when making decisions. In certain instances, the cabinet has been left out of decision-making processes or not fully apprised about policies being instituted. Despite receiving significant criticism from the opposition, the government has been able to pass its budget and other legislation through parliament easily. In September 2020, the president said his verbal pronouncements were as good as government circulars, and instructed officials to obey them.

The military has played an increasing role in the government since Gotabaya Rajapaksa was elected president in 2019. In 2020, President Rajapaksa appointed a military commander to oversee the country's response to the COVID-19 pandemic, introducing military influence in areas of policy previously controlled by civilian authorities.

In May 2021, the SLPP used its parliamentary majority to pass a controversial bill creating a Special Economic Zone (SEZ) around Colombo Port City, a large development project largely funded by Chinese companies. Opposition politicians have criticized the bill, which would prevent parliamentary oversight of the SEZ and grant a 40-year tax exemption for foreign companies, saying it could potentially jeopardize Sri Lanka's sovereignty.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 1 / 4

There appears to be an understanding among major politicians that they ought not prosecute those in opposing parties on corruption allegations, lest they too be held accountable when out of power. Critics say that such reluctance to prosecute corruption among politicians has created a culture of impunity.

The media reported on several corruption scandals in 2021; one such scandal involved the state-owned Litro gas company altering the composition of gas tanks, which allegedly led to several explosions and numerous injuries, prompting some to accuse the company of profiteering. Though the government committed to investigating the corruption allegations, no charges had been filed by year's end.

In January 2020, Gotabaya Rajapaksa established the Presidential Commission of Inquiry to Investigate Allegations of Political Victimization, which opposition leaders and rights groups say is intended to help the Rajapaksa family and their associates evade criminal investigations and prosecution. In January 2021, local media reported that the commission had recommended that the government pursue legal action against those who investigated or brought cases against the Rajapaksas and their friends under the previous government.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 2 / 4

Individuals have used the 2017 Right to Information Act to access government records, but transparency is lacking in procurement and contracting decisions, including for large contracts with Chinese and other foreign companies. The auditor general in recent years has also noted major discrepancies in the government's assessments of public debt.

ADDITIONAL DISCRETIONARY POLITICAL RIGHTS QUESTION

Is the government or occupying power deliberately changing the ethnic composition of a country or territory so as to destroy a culture or tip the political balance in favor of another group? -1 / -4

Following the end of the civil war in 2009, the military presence in the Tamil-populated areas of the north and east increased. The election of Gotabaya Rajapaksa as president in 2019 and the creation of the Presidential Task Force for Archeological Heritage Management in the Eastern Province in June 2020 have led to concerns that the regime may employ the military to back claims pertaining to Buddhist heritage, to further change the region's demographics.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 32 / 60 (-1)D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 8 / 16*D1. Are there free and independent media? 2 / 4

Freedom of the press is guaranteed in the constitution, and respect for this right improved following Mahinda Rajapaksa's defeat in 2015. Since the return of the Rajapaksas, however, media and civil society organizations have been more cautious when expressing views that challenge the government—displaying a willingness to criticize policy issues, but largely muting coverage of corruption. Nevertheless, media outlets did highlight several cases of corruption in 2021, including scandals involving the state-owned gas company. Media criticism of the military is also rare. Journalists covering human rights violations against members of religious and ethnic minority groups often face harassment, including from the authorities.

In June, police arrested consumer rights activist Asela Sampath at his home, claiming that he was detained for spreading misleading information on social media.

While there were no major instances of interreligious violence in 2021, past anti-Muslim rioting has left many Muslims afraid that they may be targeted, and that any attackers may enjoy impunity. In March, the government discontinued its policy of mandatory cremation for those thought to have died from the coronavirus, which had prevented members of the country's Muslim minority from observing Islamic funeral practices.

Throughout 2021, members of the Roman Catholic clergy publicly criticized the government for perceived faults in the official investigation into the 2019 Easter terrorist bombings, which had targeted three Christian churches. In November, a Catholic priest was briefly detained for police questioning after he alleged that officials in the State Intelligence Service (SIS) had connections to the attackers.

In October, the president appointed Galagoda Aththe Gnanasara, a controversial Buddhist monk known for his Islamophobic and hardline nationalist views, to lead a government task force to draft legal reforms ostensibly intended to "prevent discrimination" against minorities. However, critics say that Gnanasara's appointment signals that the proposed legislation may entrench Buddhist nationalism by giving Buddhist institutions and practices legal "preeminence" and lead to further divisions between Sri Lanka's religious groups.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 2 / 4

Academic freedom is generally respected, but there are occasional reports of politicization at universities and intolerance of dissenting views among both professors and students. Faculty and students at the University of Colombo have criticized President Rajapaksa's November 2021 appointment of a leading Buddhist monk as the university's chancellor, saying the monk's "political affiliations" make him unsuitable for the role. However, most students and faculty feel pressure to avoid discussing sensitive topics, including alleged war crimes, human rights for marginalized groups, Islamophobia, or extremist activities by Buddhist clergy.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 2 / 4

The civil war remains a sensitive topic. Awareness of state officials' harassment of civil society activists working on human rights issues in the north and east has deterred open discussion of such subjects among ordinary citizens.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 9 / 12E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 3 / 4

Although authorities sometimes restrict freedom of assembly, assemblies occur regularly, though some demonstrations on sensitive topics like security laws and impunity for forced disappearances are suspected to be subject to surveillance. Dozens of people were arrested during peaceful protests throughout 2021. In September, the UN Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights (OHCHR) informed the UN Human Rights Council (UNHCR) that several peaceful protests during the year had been "met with excessive use of force."

In September, Parliament voted to approve a state of emergency, which the president claimed was needed to "control food prices and prevent hoarding"; opposition figures criticized the state of emergency, which included provisions allowing the government to curtail protests, saying it was unnecessary and could be used to stifle dissent.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights-and governance-related work? 3 / 4

Nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) are generally free to operate without interference, but some NGOs and activists—particularly those in the north and east that focus on sensitive topics such as military impunity—have been subjected to denial of registration, surveillance, harassment, and assaults. Intelligence personnel began attending civil society meetings and questioning some organizations about their personnel and funding sources soon after Gotabaya Rajapaksa became president.

Many NGOs cooperated with the government to distribute aid during COVID-19 lockdowns. Some analysts have expressed concern that the collaboration also provided intelligence officials information about NGO operations and personnel, which may assist authorities should they decide to crack down on those groups.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 3 / 4

Trade unions are legally allowed to organize and engage in collective bargaining. Except for civil servants, most workers can strike, though the 1989 Essential Services Act allows the president to declare any strike illegal. Harassment of labor activists and official intolerance of union activities, particularly in export processing zones, is regularly reported.

Larger unions are often affiliated with political parties. Food shortages and the high cost of living during the pandemic led to numerous trade unions protesting against the government throughout much of 2021.

F. RULE OF LAW: 7 / 16 (-1)F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 3 / 4

Political interference in and intimidation of the judiciary abated somewhat under the Sirisena administration, and the courts have asserted their independence amid political turbulence in recent years, including during the 2018 constitutional crisis.

In June 2021, the Appeals Court granted bail to Shani Abeysekara, a detective who had previously investigated members of the Rajapaksa family. Abeysekara had been detained since July 2020, when he was arrested for allegedly fabricating evidence in a 2013 murder case; he denied the charges, which the appellate court called “concocted stories.” In December, a Colombo High Court also ruled against the Attorney General to acquit Azath Salley, a former provincial governor who had been arrested in March for making comments that allegedly “aimed to create disharmony.”

Corruption and politicization remain rife in the lower courts.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 1 / 4 (-1)

Due process rights are undermined by the Prevention of Terrorism Act (PTA), which was expanded in March 2021 to allow suspects to be detained for up to two years without trial. The law has been used to hold perceived enemies of the government, particularly Tamils, and many detained under the PTA’s provisions have been kept in custody for longer than the law allows. Following the 2019 Easter Sunday bombings, hundreds of Muslim suspects were arrested under the antiterrorism legislation, while Sinhalese anti-Muslim rioters were charged under standard civilian statutes that allowed bail. During 2021, international rights groups demanded the release of human rights lawyer Hejaaz Hizbullah and poet Ahnaf Jazeem, two Muslims held for more than a year under the PTA. Though Jazeem was released on bail in December, Hizbullah remained in detention at year’s end. In January, the government promised to review the PTA, and later released a number of detainees; however, critics say that the government did so in order to avoid international censure, and does not plan to truly reform the PTA.

The police routinely treat government officials and those closely associated with them favorably. Military personnel accused of committing war crimes during the civil war have received prominent positions in the new government, while others remain in senior military posts. In February 2020, the United States government issued sanctions against Army Commander Shavendra Silva and his family, barring them from visiting the country, citing allegations of “gross human rights violations.”

Score Change: The score declined from 2 to 1 because the authorities continue to arrest, detain, and prosecute individuals—including members of the Tamil community—under an antiterrorism law.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 2 / 4

Police and security forces have engaged in extrajudicial executions, forced disappearances, custodial rape, and torture, all of which disproportionately affect Tamils. Due to backlogs and a lack of resources, independent commissions have been slow to investigate allegations of police and military misconduct. In September 2021, the minister of prisons allegedly demanded to see Tamil prisoners held under the PTA, then forced two men to kneel and threatened to shoot them; he resigned as minister of prisons, but remained in government at year's end.

In February 2020 the government withdrew cosponsorship of UNHRC Resolution 30/1, on promoting reconciliation, accountability, and human rights in Sri Lanka, a move interpreted by rights groups as a signal that authorities did not intend to hold members of the military accountable for rights violations. In March 2020, President Gotabaya Rajapaksa pardoned an army staff sergeant sentenced to death for murdering eight Tamils, including three children, in 2000. In June 2021, the president also pardoned a former member of Parliament who had been sentenced to death for killing a political rival. International human rights groups criticized the "selective and arbitrary" pardons, saying Rajapaksa had prevented accountability and undermined the rule of law in the country.

The April 2019 bombings and subsequent rioting underscored the threats posed to physical security by terrorism and communal violence.

Tamils report systematic discrimination in areas including government employment, university education, and access to justice. Ethnic and religious minorities are vulnerable to violence and mistreatment by security forces and Sinhalese Buddhist extremists.

LGBT+ people face societal discrimination, occasional instances of violence, and some official harassment. A rarely enforced article of the penal code prescribes up to 10 years in prison for same-sex sexual activity. Sexual harassment and employment discrimination against women is common, as are discriminatory legal provisions.

The government does not grant asylum or refugee status under its own laws, nor does it provide services or work permits to asylum seekers and refugees. These individuals rely instead on aid from NGOs, informal employment, and third-country resettlement by the Office of the UN High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR).

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 8 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 2 / 4

Free movement is still restricted by security checkpoints, restricted military areas, and military occupation of public and private land. Additional security checkpoints were erected in Northern Province soon after Gotabaya Rajapaksa was elected.

Women with children younger than five years old are not allowed to travel abroad for work. Access to educational institutions is impeded by corruption, with bribes often required to obtain primary school admission.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 2 / 4

Ongoing occupations and other forms of land grabbing remain serious problems, especially for Tamils in the northeast. Corruption sometimes hinders the effective enforcement of property rights in general. Some women face gender-based disadvantages regarding inheritance under the customary laws of their ethnic or religious group, and Muslims reportedly encounter discrimination in property transactions.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 2 / 4

Although women have equal rights under civil and criminal law, matters related to the family—including marriage, divorce, and child custody—are adjudicated under the customary laws of each ethnic or religious group, and the application of these laws sometimes entails discrimination against women. Rape of women and children and domestic violence remain serious problems, and perpetrators often act with impunity.

Some very young girls are forced into marriages under Islamic personal law, which the government is seeking to change by altering the Muslim Marriage and Divorce Act (MMDA). However, the government has been criticized for attempting to revise the MMDA without adequate input from the Muslim community.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 2 / 4

Although the government has increased penalties for employing minors, many children continue to work as household servants and face abuse from employers. Women and children in certain communities are vulnerable to forced sex work. The government has made some attempts to address human trafficking, but prosecutions and measures to identify and protect victims remain inadequate, and complicity among public officials is a serious problem. While most of the mainly Tamil workers on tea plantations are unionized, employers routinely violate their rights. Migrant workers recruited in Sri Lanka are often exposed to exploitative labor conditions abroad.

St. Kitts and Nevis

Population: 50,000

Capital: Basseterre

Freedom Status: Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: St. Kitts and Nevis has a history of competitive and credible elections, and civil liberties are generally upheld. There are some concerns about government corruption and transparency. Authorities in recent years have seen some success in addressing a high rate of violent crime. LGBT+ people face discrimination and are politically marginalized.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- In August, a protest against COVID-19 vaccine mandates for public sector employees was broken up by police, who arrested several people. Tear gas was allegedly used, and a handful of demonstrators were injured.
- In October, two men were gunned down on a beach bar by an unknown assailant. Police arrested three people a month later in connection with the killings. St. Kitts and Nevis had one of the highest per capita homicide rates in the world, reaching a high of 35 deaths in 2011. However, the government claims that violent crime has decreased over time, with only seven killings recorded by August of this year.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 35 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 10 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The prime minister, usually the leader of the largest party in the parliament, is head of government. Prime ministers are normally appointed after legislative elections by the governor general, who represents the British monarch as the largely ceremonial head of state.

After the 2020 elections, Timothy Harris of Team Unity—an umbrella organization of the People’s Action Movement (PAM) and the People’s Labour Party (PLP) in St. Kitts, and the Concerned Citizens Movement (CCM) in Nevis—was reappointed as prime minister.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 3 / 4

There are 14 seats in the unicameral National Assembly, comprising 8 representatives from St. Kitts, 3 from Nevis, and 3 for senators appointed by the governor general (2 on the advice of the prime minister and 1 on the advice of the opposition leader); all serve five-year terms.

Team Unity won the 2020 parliamentary elections with 9 of the 11 directly elected seats. The vote took place peacefully and was considered credible, though turnout was low at 58 percent, largely because of the COVID-19 pandemic. Several shortcomings, which had been raised previously, were not addressed, including an absence of campaign finance legislation.

Despite these shortcomings, the government and the opposition agreed that the state of emergency declared to prevent the spread of COVID-19 should be used consistently regarding campaign regulation. However, there was at least one occasion when Team Unity, with the support of the police, prevented a St. Kitts and Nevis Labour Party (SKNLP) campaign motorcade entering the capital, Basseterre. The state-owned ZIZ Broadcasting Corporation gave equal broadcasting time to the registered political parties and any nominated independent candidate.

Nevis has its own local legislature, with five elected and three appointed members. Elections in 2017 resulted in a win for the incumbent CCM, which took four elected seats, leaving the Nevis Reformation Party with one.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 3 / 4

Electoral laws are generally fair and usually implemented impartially by the Electoral Commission. However, the lead-up to the 2015 elections featured an eleventh-hour dispute over district delineations and concerns about the Electoral Commission’s independence. In the build up to the 2020 elections, electoral boundaries were again an issue of contention, but the St. Kitts and Nevis High Court threw out an attempt to revise them. One concern was a discrepancy in constituency size of several thousand voters between districts on Nevis.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 15 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 4 / 4

There are no major constraints on the right to organize in different political parties and to form new parties.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 4 / 4

Opposition candidates are generally able to campaign without restrictions or interference.

There are realistic opportunities for opposition parties to increase their support or gain power through elections. In 2015, the Team Unity coalition unseated the SKNLP, which had been in government since 1995.

In February 2019, former opposition leader Denzil Douglas won a legal case in which the government had attempted to remove him from Parliament. The High Court ruled that the attempted removal of Douglas, based on allegations of improper use of a Dominica diplomatic passport, had no standing.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 4 / 4

Candidates and voters can make political choices without undue interference. However, concerns have been raised about the lack of transparency of party and campaign financing, which could enable improper forms of political influence.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 3 / 4

All citizens are formally entitled to equal political rights and electoral opportunities. While women play an active role in political parties and as grassroots organizers, representation in the National Assembly is poor. The population of St. Kitts is primarily Afro-Caribbean and Anglican, but other ethnic and religious groups do engage in the political process.

In 2015 there was one woman elected as a representative; in 2020 there were none, and only one woman in the Nevis Island Assembly was appointed. Discrimination, sexist rhetoric, and intimidation toward women and their families discourage many from engaging in the political environment. LGBT+ people are marginalized and discriminated against, affecting their ability to engage in frontline politics.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 10 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 4 / 4

The elected prime minister, cabinet, and national legislative representatives freely determine the policies of the government.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 3 / 4

St. Kitts and Nevis's anticorruption laws are mostly implemented effectively. However, while the Integrity in Public Life Act was adopted in 2013, establishing a code of conduct for public officials and financial disclosure guidelines, its implementation rules were not issued until 2018 and have not yet taken root. For example, Lindsay Grant and Jonel Powell, both Team Unity members of the National Assembly, have been the center of a 2017 case alleging that both men misappropriated $460,000 from a client. In July 2020, the Eastern Caribbean Supreme Court upheld the St. Kitts High Court convictions of Powell and Grant. Both remained in the Cabinet.

In recent years, concerns have been raised about the country's Citizenship by Investment (CBI) and Residence by Investment Programs. The government has introduced reforms to address malpractice criticism, including expanded background checks and enacting stricter escrow-account rules. According to a 2021 report from a Financial Times subsidiary, St. Kitts has improved the regulation of their CBI program, reforming it into of the best in the world.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 3 / 4

The government generally operates with transparency, though it long lacked a freedom of information law, which was finally passed in 2018. The Freedom of Information Act has yet to be implemented due to inadequate resources. Also, the law offers exemptions protecting information related to national security, court proceedings, trade secrets, intellectual property rights, and international relations.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 54 / 60D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 16 / 16*D1. Are there free and independent media? 4 / 4

Freedom of expression is constitutionally guaranteed, and the government generally respects press freedom in practice. However, the state owns the sole local television station, and the opposition faces some restrictions on access to it. Defamation is a criminal offense that can potentially carry a prison sentence. Some journalists reportedly self-censor in order to avoid pressure from government officials. Radio news coverage is relatively vibrant and pluralistic.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 4 / 4

Freedom of religion is constitutionally protected and generally respected in practice.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

The government generally respects academic freedom.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 4 / 4

There are no significant constraints on individuals' ability to express their personal views regarding political or other sensitive topics.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 12 / 12E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

Freedom of assembly is constitutionally guaranteed and generally respected in practice. Demonstrations on various topics routinely proceed without incident. In August 2021, a protest against COVID-19 vaccine mandates for public sector employees was broken up by police, who arrested several people. Tear gas was allegedly used, and a handful of demonstrators were injured. Prior approval for the demonstration had not been given, and the assistant commissioner of the police warned that officers would disperse the crowd.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 4 / 4

NGOs generally operate without restrictions.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 4 / 4

While workers may legally form unions, employers are not bound to recognize them. A union can engage in collective bargaining only if more than 50 percent of the company's employees are members. Antiunion discrimination is prohibited, and the right to strike, while not protected by law, is generally respected in practice. However, employers, if found guilty of union-based discrimination, are not compelled to rehire employees that had been fired.

F. RULE OF LAW: 13 / 16F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 4 / 4

The judiciary is largely independent. The highest court is the Eastern Caribbean Supreme Court, but under certain circumstances there is a right of appeal to the Trinidad-based Caribbean Court of Justice and the Privy Council in London.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 3 / 4

Defendants are guaranteed a range of due process rights, which are mostly respected in practice; legal provisions for a fair trial are generally observed. Arbitrary arrests are prohibited, and security forces generally operate professionally. However, extended pretrial detention is a problem, with some detainees remaining in custody for more than two years before facing trial or having their cases dismissed.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 3 / 4

While the country is free of war and other such threats to physical security, the government in recent years has struggled to contain a high rate of violent crime, which is linked primarily to criminal groups fighting for territory and control of the domestic drug trade. In 2018, a total of 23 homicides were recorded—which, in a country of 50,000 people, gave St. Kitts and Nevis one of the world’s highest homicide rates per capita. The government has attempted to address the problem through various means, including a “Peace Initiative,” whereby members of criminal groups were encouraged to move out of crime and into legal activities. Police have employed stop-and-search methods extensively. However, the government claims that violent crime has been decreasing: there were 10 recorded homicides in 2020, down significantly from the 2011 high of 35. In October 2021, two men were gunned down on a beach bar by an unknown assailant, though police arrested three people a month later in connection with the killings. Prison conditions remain overcrowded.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 3 / 4

The law protects individuals against discrimination on various grounds, including race, sex, and religion, and these provisions are generally upheld. However, sexual orientation and gender identity are not similarly protected, and societal discrimination against LGBT+ people is pervasive. Under colonial-era laws, same-sex relations between men are illegal and punishable with imprisonment of up to 10 years. No law specifically prohibits workplace sexual harassment.

Rastafarians at times experience barriers to employment and other disadvantages due to discrimination.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 13 / 16G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

There are no significant restrictions on freedom of movement in St. Kitts and Nevis, and individuals freely change their place of residence, employment, and education. However, concerns were raised in 2020 about the multiple states of emergency the government enacted and the restrictions that came with them, which included a curfew. Some of these rules were significantly reduced in 2021.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 3 / 4

The legal framework generally supports private business activity, though there have been complaints about timely compensation for land confiscated through eminent domain laws, and the delays in registering property.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 3 / 4

There are few restrictions on individual freedoms pertaining to personal status issues, though same-sex marriage is not recognized. While domestic violence is criminalized, it remains a widespread problem in practice, and spousal rape is not specifically prohibited by law.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 3 / 4

The law provides safeguards against exploitative working conditions, though lack of resources reportedly affects enforcement. The US State Department Trafficking in Persons report from 2021 noted that St. Kitts and Nevis was a destination country, with people being trafficked arriving there through other Caribbean ports. Local human rights activists have alleged that human smugglers transit through the country regularly and had in the past brought in sex workers and laborers.

St. Lucia

Population: 200,000

Capital: Castries

Freedom Status: Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: St. Lucia is a parliamentary democracy that holds competitive elections and has long experienced peaceful transfers of power between rival parties. Persistent challenges include government corruption and inadequate transparency, police brutality and a perception of impunity for such abuses, and discrimination against LGBT+ people.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- In September, reports found that the government had attempted to procure 100,000 doses of the AstraZeneca vaccine from a St. Lucian-registered company that was in no position to purchase or provide the vaccines. The former health minister who would have been responsible denied having knowledge of the contract, but former prime minister Allen Chastanet confirmed the deal, which awarded the company approximately US$2.7 million of government funds.
 - The July elections for the House of Assembly were considered competitive and credible, and stakeholders accepted the results. The Saint Lucia Labour Party (SLP), formerly the opposition, secured 13 seats by winning over 50 percent of the vote, defeating the former governing party, the United Workers Party (UWP), which took 2 seats and 42 percent of the vote. The remaining seats were won by independents. Voter turnout reached 51 percent.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 38 / 40 (+1)A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 11 / 12*A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The prime minister, usually the leader of the majority party in Parliament, is appointed as head of government by the governor general, who represents the British monarch as the largely ceremonial head of state. Phillip Pierre was chosen as prime minister following the July 2021 legislative elections, which were considered free and fair.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The bicameral Parliament consists of the 18-seat House of Assembly, with 17 members directly elected to five-year terms and a speaker elected by the members, and the 11-seat Senate, whose members are appointed. The prime minister chooses 6 senators, the opposition leader selects 3, and 2 are chosen in consultation with civic and religious organizations.

The most recent House of Assembly elections took place in July 2021. The polls were considered competitive and credible, and stakeholders accepted the results. The SLP, formerly the opposition, secured 13 seats by winning over 50 percent of the vote, defeating the then-governing UWP, which took 2 seats and 42 percent of the vote. The remaining seats were won by independents. Voter turnout reached 51 percent.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 3 / 4

Electoral laws are generally fair and implemented impartially by the Electoral Commission. However, differences in the sizes of constituencies have resulted in unequal voting power among citizens. While the largest constituency (Gros Islet) has more than 24,000 registered voters, the smallest (Dennerly South) has only 5,400. Constituency boundaries were last redrawn in 2001. After the 2021 elections the Commonwealth Observer Group criticized the outdated voters' registry, noting that the Electoral Commission had not consistently removed deceased and ineligible people from the roll since 1979. Further, they noted that arrangements were not made for some groups of eligible voters to cast ballots, specifically those in quarantine or on remand. The Organization of American States (OAS) observer mission highlighted the absence of campaign finance laws and raised concerns that the lack of oversight and accountability in the financing of politics impacts the equity and transparency of elections.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 16 / 16B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 4 / 4

Political parties may organize and operate freely. Several small parties operate, though the UWP and SLP have dominated politics since the 1960s, aided in part by the country's first-past-the-post electoral system. Campaigns are financed entirely through private funds, which can also disadvantage new and small parties.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 4 / 4

The country has a long record of democratic transfers of power, with the UWP and SLP regularly alternating in government.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 4 / 4

Voters and candidates are generally free to make political choices without undue influence. However, there are few legal controls on the source of funds or on spending by candidates and parties, raising concerns about the potential for improper influence by unaccountable foreign and domestic interests.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 4 / 4

All citizens are formally entitled to equal political rights and electoral opportunities. Some 85 percent of the population is of African descent, while Afro-European, East Indian, and other minorities are present.

Women are underrepresented in politics; only two women won House of Assembly seats in 2021; a reduction of one compared to 2016. However, the number of women running for office slightly increased: 11 out of 45 (24 percent) candidates were women. More women have also recently assumed roles as electoral officials and within party structures. The LGBT+ community is marginalized, affecting its ability to engage fully in political processes.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 11 / 12 (+1)

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 4 / 4 (+1)

The elected prime minister, cabinet, and Parliament determine the policies of the government without improper interference from unelected entities.

Parliamentary oversight of COVID-19-related legislation was affected by the former UWP government's efforts to attain legislative approval via a curtailed parliamentary process. In September 2020, the UWP introduced the COVID-19 (Prevention and Control) Bill, aiming to pass it in one sitting. A group of opposition and independent senators did not attend a scheduled debate, denying the body a quorum and prompting the governor general to appoint two temporary members. The bill was passed in early October. However, no such legislative maneuvers occurred in 2021, and the new SLP government has also refrained from manipulating parliamentary procedure.

Score Change: The score improved from 3 to 4 because the previous year's passage of legislation through irregular parliamentary processes was not repeated.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 3 / 4

Several state institutions are responsible for combating corruption, including the parliamentary commissioner, the auditor general, and the Public Service Commission, but their effectiveness is limited somewhat by a lack of resources.

In 2018, an Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD) report criticized the operation of the country's Citizenship by Investment program. In response, St. Lucia has made efforts to improve transparency, the applicant verification process, and the administration of the program.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 4 / 4

The government generally operates transparently. Access to information is legally guaranteed, and government officials are legally required to declare their financial assets annually to the Integrity Commission. However, the commission lacks the enforcement powers necessary to ensure full compliance.

In September 2021, reports found that the former UWP government had attempted to procure 100,000 doses of the AstraZeneca vaccine from a St. Lucian-registered company that was in no position to purchase or provide the vaccines. The former health minister denied having knowledge of the contract, but former prime minister Allen Chastanet confirmed the deal, which awarded the company approximately US$2.7 million of government funds. The new SLP government ordered an investigation into the matter.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 54 / 60D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 15 / 16*D1. Are there free and independent media? 3 / 4

The constitution guarantees freedom of expression and communication, and press freedom is largely upheld in practice. A number of private and independent news outlets carry content on a range of issues.

Criminal libel laws remain on the books, with convictions potentially drawing heavy fines and a jail sentence of up to five years, though civil suits are more common.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 4 / 4

Freedom of religion is protected under the constitution and other laws, and these safeguards are largely upheld in practice. However, Rastafarians face some systemic disadvantages in practicing their beliefs, and Muslims have reported occasional harassment.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

Academic freedom is generally respected.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 4 / 4

There are no significant restrictions on individuals' ability to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 12 / 12E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

The government generally respects the constitutionally protected right to free assembly. Prior to the 2021 elections, both main political parties agreed that campaign rallies could still be held, but they decided to ban motorcades on advice of the health authorities to prevent the spread of COVID-19. In October, the government lifted a long-standing state of emergency linked to the pandemic, which had restricted people's assembly rights.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 4 / 4

Independent nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) are free to form and operate.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 4 / 4

Most workers have the right under the law to form and join independent unions, go on strike, and bargain collectively. Antiunion discrimination is prohibited.

F. RULE OF LAW: 13 / 16F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 4 / 4

The judicial system is independent and includes a high court under the Eastern Caribbean Supreme Court (ECSC). Judges are appointed through an impartial Judicial and Legal Services Commission. The London-based Privy Council is the final court of appeal.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 3 / 4

Detainees and defendants are guaranteed a range of legal rights, which are mostly respected in practice. However, police corruption is a concern, and court backlogs contribute to lengthy pretrial detention. Defendants charged with serious crimes may spend several years awaiting trial behind bars.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 3 / 4

While the population is mostly free from pervasive threats to physical security, violent crime rates remain relatively high on a per capita basis. The number of homicides was over 70 for 2021, an all-time high.

Police brutality has been seen as a significant problem in St. Lucia, and there is a perception that members of the Royal Saint Lucia Police Force (RSLPF) enjoy impunity for abusive behavior. In 2013, the United States cut aid to the RSLPF over allegations related to extrajudicial killings. While an international investigation into the matter was completed in 2014, and RSLPF members were considered culpable, prosecutors took no legal action. The United States consequently cut aid to the St. Lucian government, though this was restored in June 2021 when the US government renewed security cooperation and assistance to some RSLPF units.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 3 / 4

While discrimination on the basis of race, sex, religion, and other such grounds is generally prohibited, the law does not provide full protection to LGBT+ people. The labor code prohibits dismissal of employees based on sexual orientation. Under an ECSC directive, murders committed when sexual orientation is a motive can be punishable with a life sentence. However, same-sex relations can draw up to 10 years in prison, and LGBT+ people face significant societal prejudice.

Rastafarians face societal disadvantages due to their beliefs, and Muslims have reported harassment.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 14 / 16G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

There are no serious impediments to freedom of movement in St. Lucia, and individuals are generally free to change their place of residence, employment, or education.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 4 / 4

The legal and regulatory framework is supportive of property rights and private business activity. The government has actively encouraged both domestic and foreign investors to do business in the country.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 3 / 4

The law largely guarantees individual rights with respect to personal status issues like marriage and divorce, but the civil code distinguishes between “legitimate” and “illegitimate” children, which can lead to discrimination against unmarried women and their children in civil and family law cases. Domestic and gender-based violence (GBV) are serious concerns and often go unreported. The law only criminalizes spousal rape when a couple is separated or when a court has issued a protection order. In June 2021, United and Strong, a local NGO, called instances of domestic violence in the country a “growing epidemic.”

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 3 / 4

Safety rules and other protections against worker exploitation are typically upheld. While the government has made increased efforts to combat human trafficking, investigations and prosecutions are rare. Authorities in St. Lucia have never convicted anyone of trafficking.

St. Vincent and the Grenadines

Population: 100,000

Capital: Kingstown

Freedom Status: Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: St. Vincent and the Grenadines is a parliamentary democracy that holds regular elections and has seen numerous transfers of power between parties. While civil liberties are generally upheld, journalists face the possibility of criminal defamation charges, and same-sex relations remain illegal. Violent crime is a concern.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- In April, La Soufrière, a volcano in the north of St. Vincent, erupted, displacing over 13,300 people. By October, 1,500 people were still in need of housing, with some still living in communal shelters.
- Prime Minister Ralph Gonsalves was injured during an August protest in Kingstown. Gonsalves was hit by an object as he tried to enter the House of Assembly and later traveled to Barbados for medical testing.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 36 / 40A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 11 / 12*A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The prime minister, usually the leader of the majority party in the parliament, is appointed by the governor general, who represents the British monarch as the largely ceremonial head of state. Ralph Gonsalves remained prime minister following the victory of his incumbent Unity Labour Party (ULP) in the 2020 legislative elections, which were considered free and fair.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The constitution provides for the direct election of 15 representatives to the unicameral House of Assembly. In addition, the governor general appoints six senators to the chamber: four selected on the advice of the prime minister and two on the advice of the opposition leader. All serve five-year terms.

The ULP won its fifth consecutive electoral victory in November 2020, taking nine seats. Although the party increased its majority by one seat, it won around 500 votes less than the New Democratic Party (NDP), which won six seats. It was the first time since 1998 that the party winning the most votes did not win the most seats. Voter turnout was 67 percent.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 3 / 4

Electoral laws are generally fair and impartially implemented. Efforts to update voter lists were initiated in 2013. Ahead of the 2015 elections legislators passed, with bipartisan support, an election-law amendment that removed almost 24,000 names from the lists. That year's Organization of American States (OAS) election-monitoring mission welcomed the change but recommended continuous updating and verification processes, which have not yet been enacted. The mission also called for better standardization of voting procedures across polling sites. The 2020 elections were deemed free and fair.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 15 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 4 / 4

Political parties can organize freely. While there are a number of smaller political parties in the country, only the ULP and NDP have won parliamentary seats since 1998. The first-past-the-post electoral system has contributed to this pattern, but there are also concerns that unregulated private campaign financing puts smaller parties at a disadvantage. The limited state funding that is available goes only to parties represented in the previous parliament.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 4 / 4

The country has experienced multiple peaceful transfers of power between rival parties after elections, including two since it gained full independence in 1979. The ULP has been in government since 2001, but it has had only a narrow majority over the opposition NDP since 2010.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 4 / 4

The political choices of candidates and voters are generally free from interference by extrapolitical forces. However, the OAS raised concerns in 2015 about the lack of transparency regarding party and campaign financing, which could enable undue influence by private actors. Little has been done since to address these concerns.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 3 / 4

All citizens are formally entitled to full political rights and electoral opportunities, but women remain significantly underrepresented in the legislature and in politics generally. In its report on the 2015 elections, the OAS noted “pervasive reluctance” on the part of potential women candidates to participate in harsh political campaigns. No women were elected to the House of Assembly in the 2015 or 2020 elections. The ULP selected women to hold the legislative speakership and deputy speakership after the 2020 elections.

LGBT+ people are marginalized, and this affects their ability to engage fully in political processes. There are no openly LGBT+ House of Assembly members. The St. Vincent population is largely Afro-Caribbean and of mixed African-European descent, with the major religions being Protestantism and Catholicism. These segments of the population and others can engage in the political process. The small Rastafarian community does not engage fully with politics, although politicians canvas for their votes.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 10 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 4 / 4

The elected prime minister, cabinet, and House of Assembly members determine the policies of the government without improper interference from unelected entities.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 3 / 4

The independent judiciary and media provide checks on government corruption. However, there is no specialized national anticorruption agency, and claims of petty corruption continue to be reported.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 3 / 4

The government generally operates with openness and transparency. Nevertheless, freedom of information legislation that was passed in 2003 has yet to be implemented, and there is no active legislation requiring government officials to disclose assets, income, or gifts. In July 2021, the NDP claimed that audit reports were five years behind schedule.

The government has not released a 2018 poverty assessment report, which allegedly shows that poverty increased in the preceding decade.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 55 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 15 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 3 / 4

The constitution guarantees the freedoms of expression and communication, which are usually upheld in practice. The state owns the main local broadcaster, and concerns have been raised, most recently by the NDP in 2020, about the level of access to the broadcaster given to the political opposition. However, several private newspapers operate consistently, and news consumers also have access to foreign media and online outlets.

Journalists remain subject to criminal and civil defamation laws, and the 2016 Cyber-crime Act broadened the definition and scope of defamation to include online publications; violation of its often vaguely worded provisions can carry a fine of as much as EC$500,000 ($185,000) and up to seven years’ imprisonment. In August 2021, Prime Minister Gonsalves sued former House of Assembly speaker Jomo Thomas, accusing Thomas of libel for writing that Gonsalves engaged in “misbehaviour in public office” in a newspaper column. Gonsalves sought EC$450,000 ($167,000) in damages and legal fees.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 4 / 4

Freedom of religion is constitutionally protected and respected in practice.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

Academic freedom is generally upheld.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 4 / 4

There are no significant restrictions on individuals' ability to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics. However, the threat of defamation is used by politicians.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 12 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

Freedom of assembly is constitutionally protected and generally upheld in practice. However, some protests were met with forceful rhetoric or were violent in 2021. In July, an NDP legislator accused a senior police officer of ordering subordinates to shoot protesters if they removed a barricade during a Kingstown rally, though another senior officer told protesters the police would not open fire.

Protesters voiced their opposition to the government's COVID-19 policies at a rally in front of the House of Assembly in an August event. Prime Minister Gonsalves was struck by an object when attempting to enter the legislature and traveled to Barbados for follow-up medical tests. NDP official Tyrone James and another seven people were later accused of violating the Public Order Act and for failing to inform police of the intended July and August events. In December, the director of public prosecution elected not to prosecute.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 4 / 4

Nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) operate freely.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 4 / 4

The constitution protects the right to form or join trade unions and other such associations. Unions are permitted to strike and engage in collective bargaining. The law prohibits antiunion discrimination and dismissal for engaging in union activities. The right to collective bargaining is generally upheld, though public-sector unions have in the past criticized the government for failing to respect the bargaining process. The St. Vincent and the Grenadines Teachers' Union held strikes opposing a COVID-19 vaccine mandate in December 2021.

F. RULE OF LAW: 14 / 16

F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 4 / 4

The judiciary generally operates independently. Judges are appointed through an impartial Judicial and Legal Services Commission and cannot be dismissed arbitrarily. The country is subject to the Eastern Caribbean Supreme Court and recognizes the original jurisdiction of the Caribbean Court of Justice, though the London-based Privy Council remains the final court of appeal.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 3 / 4

There is due process in civil and criminal matters. Detainees and defendants are guaranteed a range of legal rights, which are mostly respected in practice. However, there is a significant case backlog, which leads to prolonged pretrial detention.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 4 / 4

The population is free from war and other acute threats to physical security. Some 28 homicides were recorded during 2021 through late September, a decline from higher rates seen over the past decade.

Prison conditions have improved since a new correctional facility was opened in 2012, but the old prison in Kingstown is still in use and features substandard conditions. Key problems with prison facilities include understaffing, overcrowding, and limited space to segregate noncompliant and juvenile prisoners.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 3 / 4

The constitution prohibits discrimination based on race, sex, religion, and other such categories, but sexual orientation and gender identity are not similarly protected. Same-sex relations is illegal and carries penalties of up to 10 years in prison. While the law is rarely enforced, societal discrimination against LGBT+ people persists. In 2019, two gay Vincentian men filed a legal challenge to the law; the government said it would oppose the challenge and received the backing of several Christian groups. No further updates on the case were reported during 2021.

Women reportedly face sexual harassment in the workplace, which is not specifically addressed by law.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 14 / 16G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

There are no significant restrictions on freedom of movement, and individuals can freely change their place of residence, employment, and education. The April 2021 La Soufrière eruption caused significant displacement, especially in the north. Over 13,300 people were displaced. In October, the International Federation of Red Cross and Red Crescent Societies (IFRC) reported that 1,500 people were still in need of housing, with some still living in communal shelters.

Public-sector employment was affected by a government mandate requiring some workers to receive COVID-19 vaccinations, which was announced in October 2021 and took effect in December. That same month, Prime Minister Gonsalves announced that 32 emergency personnel resigned or retired instead of comply with the mandate. Some 12 teachers were dismissed for noncompliance by December.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 4 / 4

Individuals are free to own property and to establish and operate businesses. The government has actively encouraged both domestic and foreign investors to do business in the country, though there are some regulatory difficulties with respect to registering property, obtaining credit, and resolving insolvency.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 3 / 4

Individual rights with respect to personal status matters like marriage and divorce are generally protected by law, though same-sex marriage is not recognized. The Domestic Violence Act of 2015, which went into effect in 2016 and provides for protective orders, offers some tools and resources to victims of domestic violence. However, such violence remains a serious and widespread problem, as does sexual assault.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 3 / 4

The law provides safety and other basic protections against labor exploitation, and these are typically upheld, though there are some reports of inadequate enforcement. The Prevention of Trafficking in Persons Act of 2011 criminalizes forced labor and sex trafficking, and the government has increased its efforts to investigate violations and improve prevention and victim protection, but it has yet to secure any trafficking convictions, the US State Department reported in 2021.

Sudan

Population: 44,900,000

Capital: Khartoum

Freedom Status: Not Free

Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: After military commanders and a prodemocracy protest movement ousted the repressive regime of longtime president Omar al-Bashir and his National Congress Party (NCP) in 2019, Sudan was ruled by a transitional government in which military and civilian leaders agreed to share power until national elections could be held. The government began to enact reforms, and space for the exercise of civil liberties slowly opened. However, the process was thrown into turmoil in late 2021 when the military leadership dissolved the transitional government in a coup and cracked down on the ensuing prodemocracy protests. Throughout the transition period, violence involving security forces, other armed groups, and rival ethnic communities has persisted in many parts of the country.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- In October, Lieutenant General Abdel Fattah al-Burhan, commander of the SAF and chairman of the Transitional Sovereign Council (TSC), declared a state of emergency and dissolved the transitional government that had been in place since the overthrow of Omar al-Bashir's regime in 2019. The SAF detained civilian prime minister Abdulla Hamdok and several other government ministers and advisors.
 - On November 21, Hamdok was reinstated as prime minister after signing an agreement with al-Burhan. The November 21 agreement provided for the release of political detainees, a new technocratic government, and the restructuring of a committee tasked with recovering public assets stolen by the former regime. The country's main civilian political coalition, the Forces of Freedom and Change (FFC), was excluded from both the new government and the TSC, of which al-Burhan remained the chairman.
 - Violence by the authorities against protesters increased from the October coup through the end of the year, with security forces killing 53 anticoup protesters and injuring hundreds more. Security forces also obstructed demonstrators' access to medical care by arresting doctors and patients, firing tear gas into hospitals, and blocking access to ambulances and health facilities. To prevent demonstrations, authorities shut down the internet, blocked bridges and roads in Khartoum, arrested organizers, and outlawed labor unions that played a leading role in the prodemocracy movement.

- Intercommunal ethnic violence, especially in the Darfur region, increased throughout the year. UN agencies reported that between January and August, hundreds of people were killed and nearly 500,000 people were newly displaced as a result of such violence. Displacement levels in Darfur in 2021 were eight times higher than those in the previous year.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 0 / 40 (-2)A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 0 / 12*A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

On October 25, 2021, Lieutenant General Abdel Fattah al-Burhan, commander of the SAF and chairman of the TSC, declared a state of emergency and dissolved the transitional government that had been in place since the overthrow of Omar al-Bashir's regime in 2019. The SAF detained civilian prime minister Abdulla Hamdok and several other government ministers and advisors. On November 11, al-Burhan reconstituted the Sovereign Council, with himself as chair, including old members, new members, and Juba Peace Agreement (JPA) signatories in the body. On November 21, Hamdok was reinstated as prime minister after signing an agreement with al-Burhan that provided for the release of political detainees, a new technocratic government, and the restructuring of the Empowerment Removal Committee (ERC). However, it also retains the Sovereign Council's "oversight" role in government and excluded the civilian political coalition, the Forces of Freedom and Change (FFC), from participating in the Sovereign Council. These provisions allow the military and al-Burhan to maintain significant control over the transitional government.

The FFC and Sudanese across the country rejected the November 21 agreement, protesting to demand a full civilian government. Additionally, 12 ministers resigned in protest.

Following the coup, General al-Burhan dismissed multiple government ministers, replacing them with caretaker deputy ministers. He also replaced multiple state governors. In December 2021, Prime Minister Hamdok issued decrees to replace many of those caretaker officials but could not garner the political consensus to appoint a full cabinet.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

The former parliament was dissolved as part of the 2019 revolution. The transitional constitution called for a 300-seat Transitional Legislative Council (TLC), which was to hold office until elections could be held. The TLC was not formed prior to the October 2021 coup and remained unformed at the end of the year.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 0 / 4

In September 2021, the Ministry of Justice presented and held public consultations on a draft electoral commission law. The draft law set forth the commission's powers, membership, and legal and administrative responsibilities, including the drafting of and consultations on electoral law. However, the draft law was not passed, and an electoral commission was not created prior to the October coup.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 2 / 16 (-2)B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 1 / 4

The transitional constitution guaranteed the right to form political parties, subject to legal regulation. Security forces arrested procivilian political party and FFC leaders and members following the October 2021 coup, including the heads of the Sudanese Congress Party and the Arab Socialist Ba'ath Party—Omar al-Diqir and Ali al-Rih al-Sanhoury—and a leader in the Umma Party, Siddiq al-Sadiq al-Mahdi. Released in December, some party leaders were held incommunicado and may have experienced torture. Also in December, unidentified assailants fired tear gas to break up an FFC public meeting to discuss plans to counter the coup.

In 2019 and 2020, transitional authorities arrested high-ranking NCP members associated with the former regime, disbanded the NCP, and established a committee to seize its assets. Following the 2021 coup, several former NCP leaders, Islamists, and al-Bashir allies were released from detention.

General al-Burhan dissolved the TSC and transitional government in the October 2021 coup, and security forces detained more than 100 government ministers and advisors and procivilian political party and FFC leaders. He later reconstituted the Sovereign Council with himself as chairman and extended its oversight authority. The November 21 agreement led to the release of opposition leaders from detention but excluded the civilian political coalition FFC from governing arrangements.

Score Change: The score declined from 1 to 0 because the military seized control of the country's transitional government in a coup.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 0 / 4 (-1)

The October 2021 coup was led by the SAF and supported by the Rapid Support Forces (RSF) and leaders of armed movements that had signed the JPA. International media organizations reported that General al-Burhan spoke with Egyptian officials prior to the coup, seeking their support for the military takeover. It followed a coup attempt on September 21, 2021, when soldiers loyal to the former regime tried to seize control of the state media building.

Score Change: The score declined from 1 to 0 because the military seized control of the country's transitional government in a coup.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 1 / 4

The interim constitution commits Sudan to a decentralized political system in which citizens are free to exercise their rights without discrimination based on race, religion, gender, regional affiliation, or other such grounds.

Women played an influential role in the 2019 protest movement and have since demanded greater representation at all levels of government and in peace negotiations. Although two women were named to the TSC in August 2019, one resigned in May 2021 protesting military dominance in the Council.

LGBT+ people remain politically marginalized and same-sex sexual relations is still criminalized.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 0 / 12C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 0 / 4

In October 2021, General al-Burhan staged a coup, dissolved the TSC and transitional government, and detained Prime Minister Hamdok and several government ministers and advisors. Following the coup, local and regional government officials were removed and replaced, and General al-Burhan reconstituted the Sovereign Council with himself as chair. Although Prime Minister Hamdok was later released, reinstated, and attempted to replace officials appointed by the coup leaders, the military continued to control the government at the end of the year. The TLC has yet to be formed.

Per the JPA, in April 2021, Sudan Liberation Army (SLA) leader Minni Minawi was appointed governor of the Darfur region.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 0 / 4

Sudan is a signatory to but has not ratified the UN Convention Against Corruption and the African Union Convention on Preventing and Combating Corruption. Transparency International (TI) ranked Sudan 164 of 179 countries in its 2021 global Corruption Perceptions Index.

Following the October 2021 coup, General al-Burhan suspended the ERC, which was created by transitional authorities to investigate financial crimes by former regime officials and their supporters and recover stolen assets, and arrested several of its members. In addition, he established a committee to review and receive the funds recovered by the Empowerment and Removal Committee.

Before the 2021 coup, the ERC froze 500 bank accounts and recovered approximately $140 million in assets from persons accused of money laundering, currency trading, and tax evasion. Other members of al-Bashir's regime, who engaged in corrupt activities, have escaped scrutiny and use their senior government positions to enrich themselves.

In April 2021, the TSC approved the Anti-Corruption National Commission Law that sets forth an anticorruption commission's powers, membership, differences to the Empowerment Removal Committee, and legal and administrative responsibilities, including the drafting of and consultations for anticorruption laws and directives. In September, the minister of justice issued an open invitation for nominations to the commission, though it was not established prior to the coup.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 0 / 4

The interim constitution required members of the TSC and TLC, the cabinet, and governors to file disclosures about their personal assets, but there are no clear mechanisms for enforcement, and compliance is reportedly poor in practice.

ADDITIONAL DISCRETIONARY POLITICAL RIGHTS QUESTIONIs the government or occupying power deliberately changing the ethnic composition of a country or territory so as to destroy a culture or tip the political balance in favor of another group? -2 / 0

Former president al-Bashir faces outstanding arrest warrants from the ICC on charges of war crimes, crimes against humanity, and genocide in Darfur, where an insurgency by members of local ethnic minority groups began in 2003. The transitional government reached an agreement with Darfuri rebel groups in February 2020 to turn over to the International Criminal Court (ICC) five Sudanese suspects accused of war crimes, including al-Bashir, and signed the Juba Peace Agreement with the SRF alliance and another rebel group, the Sudan Liberation Army (SLA) Minni Minnawi faction. In August, the ICC and the transitional government signed a Memorandum of Understanding that allows the international body to open an office in Sudan. Terms for al-Bashir's extradition to The Hague were in discussion at the end of 2021.

The October 2020 Juba Peace Agreement, which was meant to end ethnic insurgencies and alleged government war crimes in South Kordofan and Blue Nile States as well as in Darfur, includes provisions to establish a transitional justice commission, a special court for war crimes, economic and land rights, integration of rebels into security forces and political institutions, and a 10-year, $750 million fund to address social and economic marginalization in the conflict areas and support the return of displaced persons. Implementation of these measures remained uncertain at the end of 2021. Prior to the October 2021 coup, the transitional government continued negotiations with the Sudan's People Liberation Movement-North around issues of unification of their armed forces, ethnic and religious diversity, minority rights, government decentralization, and a secular state. In July 2021, the Council of Ministers approved a draft bill on the Darfur governance system as a Darfur region as opposed to five states.

However, localized ethnic or communal conflict increased across Sudan in 2021. The UN reported 152 documented security incidents between May and August, with the most significant intercommunal clashes and incidents of violence (including sexual violence) occurring between local citizens or displaced persons and rival tribes, RSF soldiers, or government-affiliated militias in North and South Darfur, and South and West Kordofan. In Darfur, fighting also broke out between the SLA and RSF, as well as between SLA factions. UN agencies reported that between January and August, hundreds of people were killed and approximately 410,000 people were newly displaced (mostly in Darfur), a six-fold increase from the same time period in 2020. Violence further escalated between October and December, with hundreds more people killed or injured and more than 83,000 people newly displaced. Displacement levels in Darfur in 2021 were eight times higher than those in 2020.

In response to local conflicts, the government deployed additional security forces, declared states of emergencies, imposed curfews, and engaged in peacebuilding initiatives. In June, the transitional government announced a new National Plan for Protection of Civilians.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 10 / 60 (-5)

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 5 / 16 (-2)

D1. Are there free and independent media? 1 / 4

The interim constitution guarantees freedom of the press, and the transitional government pledged to draft legislation that increases protections for journalists. In August 2021, the Ministry of Culture and Information published draft media reform laws for public consultations. The draft laws address the creation of a commission to support and protect the right to information; the independence of journalists and media organizations; the establishment of a Press Council to protect press freedom and oversee professionalism; and the creation of a Board of Governors of the Radio and Television Corporation. The draft laws were not approved prior to the October 2021 coup and their future remained unclear at the end of the year.

However, throughout 2021, security officers assaulted and arrested journalists and suspended publications under the guise that they violated the criminal code by inciting violence or committing “crimes against the state.” Others were arrested for defaming public officials. Attacks on the press escalated in September, when the Press and Publications Council suspended Al-Intibaha and Al-Sayha newspapers for three days after they published announcements about planned protests in eastern Sudan. The council accused the newspapers of inciting violence or war. One day later, police arrested Otaf Abdelwahab Altom, journalist and director of Al-Naba Center for Press Services, claiming he undermined the constitutional system and waged war against the state; he was being held incommunicado at the end of the year. The Empowerment Removal Committee also dismissed 79 employees of the Sudan News Agency in September, for their connections to the former regime.

Following the October 2021 coup, the Sudanese Journalists Association reported that coup leaders arrested journalists, shut down radio news outlets’ broadcasting stations, and harassed editors, pressuring them to abstain from critical reporting.

The 2018 Law on Combating Cybercrimes increased the prison sentences for crimes such as disseminating false information remains in effect.

Sudan’s population is mostly Muslim, with a small Christian minority. The 2019 interim constitution guarantees freedom of worship and does not give Islam an official status. The TSC pledged to issue clear guidelines for those seeking permission to build new churches, and Christians welcomed the appointment of a Coptic Christian judge to one of the TSC’s civilian seats. In 2019, the transitional government repealed the Public Order Act, which had been used to punish both Muslims and non-Muslims for public behaviors that were deemed indecent or immoral according to the official interpretation of Sunni Islam.

In 2020, the transitional government adopted the Miscellaneous Amendments Act, which repealed the criminalization of apostasy, abolished corporal punishment for blasphemy, and permitted non-Muslims to trade and consume alcohol, among other provisions.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 1 / 4 (–1)

Following the October 2021 coup, authorities arrested deans and professors at al-Gezira University who had criticized the military takeover. In addition, security forces attacked student protesters on university campuses. In November, several universities closed their campuses and suspended classes, citing political instability.

In 2019, transitional authorities moved to disband NCP groups in higher education and dismissed 28 university chancellors and 35 vice chancellors, many of whom were affiliated with the NCP. The administrators were replaced with more independent figures.

Score Change: The score declined from 2 to 1 because universities closed due to the coup, and students and teachers opposing the coup were attacked.

The interim constitution affirmed the right to freedom of expression and privacy, including citizens’ right to engage in private correspondence without interference. The transitional government began to dismantle the surveillance apparatus associated with the former regime, notably by replacing the National Intelligence and Security Service (NISS) with the General Intelligence Service (GIS)—which has more restricted powers and responsibilities—in 2019. The transitional government increased penalties for disseminating false information and other such offenses in July 2020, and officials have arrested and harassed activists for critical speech. In March 2021, activist Waad Bahjat was sentenced to a six-month suspended prison sentence and fined 10,000 Sudanese pounds ($22) after being found guilty of “public annoyance” and “use of criminal force.” She had been arrested in November 2020 after she livestreamed video on her Facebook page documenting women being harassed by police and SAF soldiers. She was initially charged with defamation, insult to a public servant exercising judicial proceeding, publishing false news, and public nuisance under the Sudanese Criminal Act of 1991, though some of these charges were dropped.

After the October 2021 coup, General al-Burhan issued a December decree expanding security forces’ and intelligence agencies’ powers to conduct home raids, surveil citizens, and detain suspects. Neighborhood Resistance Committees (NRCs) and human rights groups have claimed that the decree violates citizens’ rights to privacy and due process.

Ongoing violent conflict by security forces and nonstate actors during 2021 also served to deter unfettered discussion and criticism of the government among ordinary citizens.

Score Change: The score declined from 2 to 1 due to increased targeting of activists expressing antimilitary or anticoup sentiments.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 4 / 12 (-2)

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 1 / 4 (-1)

The TSC reaffirmed the right to assemble in the interim constitution, and citizens regularly participated in demonstrations during 2021, calling for more rapid democratic reforms, the advancement of women’s rights, accountability for a June 2019 massacre of protesters in Khartoum, and more.

However, security forces repeatedly used tear gas, rubber bullets, and live ammunition to break up demonstrations in 2021. In May 2021, army soldiers used excessive force to break up protests at the military headquarters demanding action against perpetrators of the June 3 massacre, killing two and injuring at least 28 others. Violence by the authorities increased following the October coup, when NRCs began to organize regular countrywide demonstrations against the military takeover and demand civilian rule. From October 25 through December, security forces killed 53 protesters and injured hundreds more. Women protesting reported being raped by security officers. Security forces also blocked demonstrators’ access to medical care, including by arresting doctors and patients, shooting tear gas into hospitals, and blocking access to ambulances and hospitals. To prevent demonstrations, authorities shut down the internet, blocked bridges and roads in Khartoum, arrested organizers, and banned unions to prevent them from organizing.

Sit-ins across the Darfur region were common in 2021, as citizens protested ongoing violence in that region, attacks on internally displaced persons (IDPs), and lack of government support. Security forces routinely responded to these acts of protest with excessive and disproportionate violence. For example, in April, joint security forces in Belil used excessive force to break up a sit-in calling for improved governance; one woman was killed and eight injured as a result of the violence.

In East Sudan, demonstrators engaged in months-long protests in 2021 demanding more political and economic reforms for the region and a new negotiated Eastern Sudan Track of the Juba Peace Agreement. The protesters blocked highways, closed ports, and temporarily shut the oil pipeline. The highway blockage was lifted following the October 2021 coup.

Score Change: The score declined from 1 to 0 because the authorities used lethal force to disperse protests before the October coup and sought to repress prodemocracy protests afterwards, including via a communications blackout and by firing live rounds into crowds.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 2 / 4

The transitional government has loosened the restrictions and impediments placed on civil society organizations during the al-Bashir regime. Local nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) are able to register, and organizations that had operated in exile are able to return to and register in Sudan. International humanitarian entities that had been denied access to conflict zones under al-Bashir have similarly been allowed to resume some activities. However, following the October 2021 coup, NGOs have reportedly been increasingly surveilled.

Though the outgoing minister of labor and social development issued a series of regulations in February 2021 that restricted the work of civil society organizations registered under the Sudan Voluntary and Humanitarian Works Act of 2006, the new minister suspended their enforcement a month later until a new legal framework was drafted and approved.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 0 / 4 (-1)

Independent trade unions were largely absent under al-Bashir; his government banned them after taking power in 1989, and instead co-opted the Sudan Workers' Trade Unions Federation (SWTUF). The independent Sudanese Professionals Association (SPA), founded in late 2016, was instrumental in the protest movement that led to al-Bashir's ouster, and it has since played a role in the transitional government, with one of its members named to the TSC.

The interim constitution affirmed workers' right to form and join trade unions. In June 2021, the TSC approved the Trade Unions Law of 2021, after months of consultations, which lays the groundwork for union organizing. As part of the transitional government's efforts to dismantle the former ruling party and affiliated institutions, it controversially dissolved the SWTUF and the Sudan Journalists Union in late 2019. In February 2021, the World Federation of Trade Unions condemned the arrest and detention of union leaders and the creation of government-appointed steering committees to oversee union affairs.

However, following the October 2021 coup, General al-Burhan dissolved all trade unions and professional associations to limit their organizing capabilities. Multiple union and association leaders were detained and assaulted during anticoup protests.

Score Change: The score declined from 1 to 0 due to the systematic targeting of unions by the military following the coup.

F. RULE OF LAW: 0 / 16 (-1)F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 0 / 4 (-1)

The interim constitution envisaged the establishment of an independent judiciary to replace the politically influenced judiciary of the al-Bashir era. In May 2021, the TSC removed Chief Justice Nemat Abdullah Khair and accepted the resignation of Attorney General Taj al-Ser Ali al-Hebr, who complained of a lack of independence. That month, the ERC removed more than 20 public prosecutors from office.

Following the October 2021 coup, General al-Burhan replaced the acting public prosecutor and chief justice with former NCP officials. Al-Burhan's replacement head judge, Chief Justice Abdulaziz Fath al-Rahman Abdeen, issued a directive in December ordering the reinstatement of all judges dismissed by the ERC.

Score Change: The score declined from 1 to 0 due to the removal of the acting public prosecutor and Chief Justice with former NCP officials following the coup.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 0 / 4

Although the interim constitution enshrined the right to due process, it also contained a provision allowing the government to invoke emergency powers and suspend some due process rights. In practice, security forces continued to engage in arbitrary arrests and detentions during 2021, including after the October coup and related protests. Political detainees, activists, and journalists were held incommunicado without access to legal representation and were likely subject to torture and inhumane treatment.

The interim constitution called for the establishment of a new public prosecutor's office, though the public prosecutor appointed in 2019 resigned in May 2021. In August, the new public prosecutor issued Circular No. 1 (2021), a directive that outlines measures to protect witnesses, victims, and others involved in serious criminal cases. Under this directive prosecutors are advised to use pseudonyms for witnesses and victims, include psychiatrists in sensitive interviews, and provide witnesses security if necessary.

In 2020, the transitional government banned forced confessions and the "infliction of torture" on suspects, prohibited the death penalty for defendants under age 18, and abolished the penalty of flogging for some criminal offenses, although flogging and other forms of corporal punishment were still prescribed for other crimes. In August 2021, it ratified the UN Convention Against Torture and the International Convention for the Protection of All Persons from Enforced Disappearances. Court cases to hold perpetrators of state violence accountable continued or were resolved in 2021, and a few leaders of the police force responsible for allowing violence against protesters were dismissed throughout the year.

However, demonstrators protesting the October coup were violently repressed and detained by security forces. Political detainees released following the November 21 agreement to restore the transitional government reported being tortured or experiencing inhumane treatment while in detention. An advisor to former prime minister Hamdok, Faisal Saleh, reported he was held in solitary confinement in a military prison.

In September 2019, Prime Minister Hamdok announced the creation of an independent committee to investigate the June 3 Massacre of 2019; this committee was dissolved following the coup.

Despite the Juba Peace Agreement, civilians continue to be killed and tens of thousands of people were displaced by violence in several parts of the country throughout 2021. Controversies about the disposal of the bodies of victims of ethnic violence were pressing political issues, as mass graves were discovered in Central Darfur in July, following the discovery of other mass graves in Khartoum in 2020. Hundreds of decomposed bodies were found in morgues in April 2021; some believe they are the bodies of people who disappeared during the December Revolution of 2018. In response, the National Commission for Human Rights and the public prosecutor's office both formed investigative committees.

In September and October 2021, security officials cracked down on Islamic State (IS)-affiliated cells in Khartoum, arresting militants and seizing weapons.

The 2019 interim constitution commits the transitional government to upholding the human rights of all citizens without discrimination and ensuring their equal treatment under the law. The charter also calls for accountability for war crimes, crimes against humanity, and other serious violations of human rights.

Despite guarantees of equal treatment in the interim constitution and some legal improvements adopted as part of the July 2020 reforms, women continued to face disadvantages in many areas of the law, and perpetrators of widespread crimes against women—including during armed conflicts—have generally enjoyed impunity. The transitional government in April 2021 ratified the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Women but failed to endorse provisions recognizing equality in marriage, divorce, and parenting.

Same-sex relations are illegal in Sudan, though 2020 reforms eliminated flogging and execution as potential punishments under an antisodomy law that is used to target LGBT+ people. Discrimination against LGBT+ people remains common. In 2021, the Sudanese government continued welcome refugees; the Office of the UN High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) reported that the country hosted more than 1.1 million refugees as of September 2021.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 3 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 1 / 4

The 2019 interim constitution affirms freedom of movement and the right to travel—including overseas—for all citizens, but these rights are still impeded in practice by state security forces and other armed groups across the country, including those engaged in clashes between ethnic communities. Most of the more than 3 million IDPs in Sudan as of July 31, 2021, were concentrated in the long-standing conflict areas of Darfur, South Kordofan, and Blue Nile State.

In 2020, the transitional government abolished the need for exit permits, as well as a rule that had required women to obtain permission from a male guardian to travel abroad with children.

Weak land rights have been a chronic driver of conflict in Sudan. In a succession of opaque deals, al-Bashir's regime leased large parcels of arable land to foreign countries for export crop production. In some cases, local populations were forced from their land or had their water supplies depleted.

The 2019 interim constitution guarantees the right to own property and protects citizens from expropriation by the state without compensation. The government has stated its intention to address land-related grievances, but property seizures by security forces and communal conflicts over land rights continue to be reported.

Women are denied equal rights to property and inheritance under laws based on Sharia (Islamic law) and through discriminatory customary practices.

Although the transitional government ratified the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Women in April 2021, it failed to endorse provisions recognizing equality in marriage, divorce, and parenting, which Sharia-based laws deny women. Among other restrictions, a Muslim woman cannot marry a non-Muslim man. Extramarital sex is prohibited, and those convicted of adultery can face flogging or the death penalty. Child marriage is not outlawed, and roughly a third of adult women were married as minors.

In 2019, the transitional government repealed the Public Order Act, which had been used in part to punish women for dress or behavior deemed indecent. However, the Strategic Initiative for Women in the Horn of Africa, an Indigenous African women's rights advocacy group, reported in September 2021 that women continued to be punished for "morality transgressions."

Sexual violence against women remains a major problem. In March 2020, the government signed a framework of cooperation with the United Nations on preventing and addressing conflict-related sexual violence. A UN report released in August 2021 claimed there were high numbers of incidents of domestic and sexual violence in households; family sexual violence against women, in informal jobs, displaced and refugee women outside of camps, children in Quranic schools, and people with disabilities; forced, arranged, and child marriages; female genital mutilation (FGM); and restricted access to financial resources and educational opportunities. In 2020, the transitional government criminalized FGM.

Bleak economic conditions, mass unemployment, and high prices for basic goods were among the root causes of the revolution that helped topple al-Bashir's regime in 2019. Prime Minister Hamdok's government voiced a commitment to reversing these trends. In 2020, the International Monetary Fund (IMF) approved a 12-month program to support the government in its efforts to eliminate large fuel subsidies, increase spending for health and social programs, increase its tax base, reduce corruption, and improve the business environment. Though the country officially met the requirements to receive debt relief under the Heavily Indebted Poor Countries Initiative (HIPC) in June 2021, international financial institutions paused assistance to the Sudanese government after the October 2021 coup, including $500 million from the World Bank and $150 million from the IMF.

The transitional government took early steps to clamp down on hazardous practices and working conditions in the gold-mining sector. In 2019, it announced a ban on the use of cyanide and mercury in gold extraction, following protests in mining areas in South Kordofan that resulted in a heavy-handed response from the RSF. Despite the transitional government's statements and actions regarding labor exploitation, senior military figures who hold positions in the TSC power structure profited from illicit economic activities, including mining and smuggling operations.

Migrants, refugees, asylum seekers, and IDPs remain especially vulnerable to exploitation, including by criminal networks engaged in human trafficking. Some armed groups in the country have allegedly recruited children as fighters. In August 2021, the Sudanese government launched the 2021–23 National Action Plan to Combat Human Trafficking.

Suriname

Population: 600,000

Capital: Paramaribo

Freedom Status: Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Suriname is a constitutional democracy that holds generally free and fair elections. However, corruption and clientelism are pervasive problems in society and in the government, undermining the rule of law.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- Former president Desiré Bouterse, who was convicted in 2019 and sentenced to 20 years' imprisonment for the abduction and murder of 15 political opponents during his time as a military ruler in 1982, lost his appeal in August. Judges however had not ordered his imprisonment, as the terms of his first conviction stipulate, by the end of the year.
- In December, the security guards of Vice President Ronnie Brunswijk, a former guerilla fighter, assaulted journalist Jason Pinas and illegally seized and damaged his phone after Pinas used his device to take photos of Brunswijk. The Association of Surinamese Journalists (ASJ) called for media workers to cease reporting on Brunswijk and his advisors for at least two months. Later in December, two hand grenades were found stuck together under a car at Pinas's home.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 34 / 40A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 11 / 12*A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The president is chief of state and head of government and is elected to five-year terms by a two-thirds majority of the 51-seat National Assembly. If no such majority can be reached, a United People's Assembly—consisting of lawmakers from the national, regional, and local levels—convenes to choose the president by a simple majority. In July 2020, the freely elected National Assembly chose President Chandrikapersad Santokhi and Vice President Ronnie Brunswijk in accordance with the law.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The 1987 constitution provides for a unicameral, 51-seat National Assembly. Representatives are elected for five-year terms via proportional representation. Observer missions from the Caribbean Community (CARICOM) and the Organization of American States (OAS) described the May 2020 elections as free and fair, despite delays in the vote count, which had fueled speculation about fraud. The OAS also noted some problems with election administration, including ballot misprints and deliveries of ballot papers to the wrong polling stations. Nonetheless, no serious concerns were raised about the announced results, and the Independent Electoral Council (OKB) certified the elections in June. The Progressive Reform Party (VHP) led all parties with 20 seats, Bouterse's National Democratic Party (NDP) followed with 16, the General Liberation and Development Party (ABOP) won 8, and three smaller parties split the remaining 7 seats.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 3 / 4

Electoral laws generally meet international standards of fairness. However, the president appoints the members of the OKB and has the power to fire them, raising concerns about impartiality. In 2019, the National Assembly approved electoral reforms that had been proposed by the Bouterse government in late 2018, including a prohibition on electoral alliances among political parties. The head of the OKB, Jennifer Van Dijk-Silos, acknowledged significant shortcomings in the administration of the 2020 balloting.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 14 / 16B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 4 / 4

Suriname's many political parties, which often reflect the country's ethnic cleavages, generally form and operate freely. However, fierce political competition occasionally includes acts of violence or intimidation.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 4 / 4

The country has experienced multiple transfers of power between rival parties, and the opposition has a realistic opportunity to increase its support or enter government through elections.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 3 / 4

People's political choices are generally not subject to undue coercion. However, opposition parties have raised concerns about campaign financing—which is unregulated and lacks transparency—and the resulting influence that special interest groups can have on parties and candidates. During the 2020 election campaign, the incumbent NDP was accused of engaging in clientelism by distributing food to citizens. Similar tactics, including distribution of money and funding of community projects using politicians' personal wealth, are used by multiple political parties. The Santokhi government continued to appoint family members of high-ranking officials to significant government positions; Santokhi's wife holds a post on the president's cabinet.

The period preceding the 2020 elections was characterized by intimidation of supporters of the opposition. In April 2020, assailants attempted to kidnap an opposition parliamentary candidate, Rodney Cairo, who had criticized the military's role in providing security at gold mining operations. National Security Directorate head Danielle Vieira was accused of ordering the kidnapping. No reported cases of intimidation against political opponents have occurred since Santokhi's inauguration.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 3 / 4

In general, parties are often formed along ethnic lines, meaning most ethnic groups have political representation. Women have historically played a limited role in politics though in 2020, 15 out of the 51 representatives elected were women—more than in the previous election. The Santokhi-Brunswijk cabinet included 6 women among its 17 ministers. The interests of Maroons, the descendants of escaped slaves, are represented by vice president Brunswijk's ABOP party. Brunswijk is the first Maroon to be vice president. Indigenous people are poorly represented in politics, and discrimination against LGBT+ people has resulted in no openly gay politicians in the country.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 9 / 12C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 4 / 4

The country's freely elected representatives determine laws and government policies without undue interference. The Bouterse government used its narrow parliamentary majority to avoid accountability for politically advantageous actions that appeared to exceed its legitimate authority, especially related to state finances and spending. The Santokhi administration has refrained from executive overreach.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 2 / 4

Government corruption is pervasive. In 2017, the National Assembly adopted a new anticorruption law that was yet to be implemented as of 2021. However, the Santokhi government appointed a commission to plan its implementation and funded a special anticorruption unit within the public prosecutor's office that has begun investigating Bouterse-era graft cases. The most prominent corruption case in 2020 involved former finance minister Gillmore Hoefdraad, accused of perpetrating multiple fraud and embezzlement schemes. Hoefdraad fled just after the 2020 elections and was the subject of both a domestic arrest warrant and an Interpol detention request. The former head of Suriname's Central Bank, Robert Van Trikt, was imprisoned for fraud in the same case in February 2020 and remained in custody throughout the year.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 3 / 4

The Santokhi government promised to improve transparency and communication with the public and has conducted somewhat regular press conferences, though the assault of journalist Jason Pinas by the bodyguards of vice president Brunswijk tempered those relations. Officials are not required to disclose information about their finances in practice, despite disclosure provisions in the 2017 anticorruption law.

Suriname does not have laws to facilitate access to public information, and access is limited in practice.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 45 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 15 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 3 / 4

The constitution guarantees press freedom, and the media sector is fairly diverse. The press frequently publishes stories that are critical of the government, though some journalists engage in self-censorship in response to pressure and intimidation from authorities.

The Santokhi government has generally adopted a more open relationship with the media. However, in December 2021, the security guards of vice president Brunswijk assaulted journalist Jason Pinas and illegally seized and damaged his phone, after Pinas used his device to take photos of Brunswijk. Later that month, two activated hand grenades were found stuck together under a car at Pinas's home. Following the assault, the Association of Surinamese Journalists (ASJ) called for media workers to cease reporting on Brunswijk and his advisors for at least two months, requested that the government provide Pinas official protection, and demanded a full investigation into both incidents.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 4 / 4

The constitution guarantees freedom of religion, which is typically upheld in practice.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

Academic freedom is generally respected.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 4 / 4

Freedom of expression is enshrined in the constitution, and there are no formal constraints on the expression of personal views among the public. Government officials' verbal intimidation of perceived critics, which deterred open discussion of sensitive topics in recent years, declined following the 2020 election, as did the overall level of political discord.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 11 / 12E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

The constitution guarantees freedom of assembly, which is generally respected in practice.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 4 / 4

Nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) function freely in Suriname.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 3 / 4

Workers are free to join independent trade unions, which are actively involved in politics. There have been isolated reports of private-sector employers denying collective bargaining rights to unions.

F. RULE OF LAW: 9 / 16F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 2 / 4

The judiciary has enjoyed improved autonomy since the change of government in 2020. However, judicial independence is still undermined by corruption due to a lack of resources and economic pressure.

In addition, a defective air conditioning system in the courthouse as well as public health measures related to COVID-19 cause even longer delays. In civil cases, the wait for a verdict can take anywhere between several months and sometimes even years.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 2 / 4

Obstacles to due process include a lack of capacity and resources that contributes to corruption and trial delays.

The public prosecutor's office often pursues cases selectively; for example, no investigation had been opened into Vice President Brunswijk's involvement in the assault and attempted assassination of journalist Jason Pinas by the end of the year. Low wages for police encourage bribery and extortion. Payments are sometimes made to obtain favorable outcomes in criminal and civil proceedings. There is a backlog of cases involving non-Dutch speakers, as interpreters who have gone unpaid have refused to work additional cases. Pre-trial detention, even for minor crimes, is common and can sometimes last for years.

In 2019, former president Bouterse was convicted and sentenced to 20 years' imprisonment for the abduction and murder of 15 political opponents during his time as a military ruler in 1982. Though Bouterse accepted "political responsibility" for his involvement, he long sought to disrupt legal proceedings against him. His appeal to his conviction was rejected in August 2021, however judges had not ordered his imprisonment as the terms of his first conviction stipulate.

The population is generally free from major threats to physical security. The use of excessive force by law enforcement officials is prohibited although incidental police violence occurs. Some cases of police abuse have been reported, including during enforcement of the lockdown imposed in response to the COVID-19 pandemic in 2020.

Temporary detention facilities are characterized by unhygienic conditions, understaffing, and overcrowding. Suriname lies on a major drug-trafficking route, giving rise to some trafficking-related violence. Several major smuggling cases were uncovered by the police in 2021.

Both former president Bouterse and current vice president Brunswijk have been convicted by Dutch courts in absentia of drug trafficking. Violent crimes such as burglary and armed robbery are common, and police resources are insufficient to address the problem. The gold mining industry, a key export sector, is plagued by organized criminal activity.

The constitution prohibits discrimination based on race or ethnicity. Nevertheless, Maroon and Indigenous people in the hinterland face inequality in areas such as education and employment.

Same-sex sexual relations are legal, though the age of consent differs from that applied to opposite-sex couples. Despite legal protections adopted in 2015, members of the LGBT+ community face societal discrimination, harassment, and abuse by police.

The constitution bars gender discrimination, but in practice, women experience disadvantages in access to employment and education.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 10 / 12

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 3 / 4

The government generally upholds constitutional freedoms of internal movement and residence, though the lack of protections for Indigenous and Maroon lands leaves those communities vulnerable to displacement.

Although Suriname's constitution guarantees property rights, they are sometimes inadequately protected. Corruption can hinder private business activity, especially regarding land policy, government contracts, and licensing. Indigenous and other minority less powerful groups remain exposed to illegal land expropriation, including by illegal logging and mining operations.

Traditional land rights of Indigenous peoples and Maroons are not guaranteed by law, though a draft bill to regulate collective rights was introduced after years of parliamentary discussion in 2020; it was not decided upon in 2021. Women face inequality related to inheritance and property due to discriminatory local customs.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 3 / 4

Individuals are generally free of undue constraints on personal status decisions such as marriage and divorce. Despite efforts of the Santokhi-government to address it, gender-based violence remains a serious problem, and laws that criminalize it are not well enforced.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 2 / 4

Despite government efforts to combat it, trafficking in persons remains a serious problem. Women and migrant workers are especially at risk of sexual exploitation and forced labor in various industries. Construction and mining work often do not receive adequate attention from labor inspectors.

The deteriorating economy in Venezuela has increased the vulnerability of Venezuelan women to sex trafficking in Suriname. Corruption has facilitated the criminal activities of traffickers.

Sweden

Population: 10,400,500

Capital: Stockholm

Freedom Status: Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Sweden is a parliamentary monarchy with free and fair elections and a strong multiparty system. Civil liberties and political rights are legally guaranteed and respected in practice, and the rule of law prevails. Recent challenges include increases in violent crime and reported hate crimes.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- In June, Parliament ousted Prime Minister Stefan Löfven of the Swedish Social Democrats (SAP) in the first successful no-confidence vote in Swedish history. However, Löfven was reelected in July by a two-vote margin. He then resigned in November and SAP leader Magdalena Andersson was installed as the prime minister, the first woman to hold the post.
- Violent crime remains a concern, with authorities recording a historic high in the rate of gun violence. By October, there had been 110 shootings, in which at least 21 people were killed. In September, an explosion in a Gothenburg apartment block injured more than 20 people.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 40 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 12 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The prime minister is the head of government and is appointed by the speaker of the freely elected parliament, or Riksdag, and confirmed by the body as a whole. Prime Minister Stefan Löfven of the SAP was appointed in 2019 following parliamentary elections in 2018. In June 2021, Parliament ousted Löfven in the first successful no-confidence vote in Swedish history. However, Löfven was reelected in July by a two-vote margin. He then resigned in November and SAP leader Magdalena Andersson was installed as the prime minister, the first woman to hold the post.

King Carl XVI Gustaf, crowned in 1973, is ceremonial head of state.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The unicameral Riksdag is comprised of 349 members who are elected every four years by proportional representation. A party must receive at least 4 percent of the vote nationwide or 12 percent in an electoral district to win a seat. Swedish elections are broadly free and fair.

In the 2018 parliamentary elections, neither main bloc won a majority, with the center-left bloc winning 144 seats and the center-right bloc winning 143 seats. The populist, anti-immigrant party, Sweden Democrats (SD), won 62 seats, up from 49 previously. In 2019, after over four months without a government, the SAP formed a coalition with the Green Party, the Centre Party, and the Liberals.

A 2018 report by election monitors from the Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE) stated that although the integrity of the elections was not in doubt, the secrecy of the vote was sometimes compromised.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 4 / 4

Elections are regulated by the Swedish Election Authority, which effectively upholds its mandates. The Election Authority is headed by a government-appointed committee. Members of the board are appointed for a specific period and are not political appointments.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 16 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 4 / 4

Political parties may form and operate without restriction.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 4 / 4

Sweden has a strong multiparty system with a robust opposition. Eight political parties secured representation in the Riksdag in 2018.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 4 / 4

People's political choices are generally free from domination by actors that are not democratically accountable.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 4 / 4

The range of Sweden's religious, ethnic, and immigrant groups are represented in the parliament, as are many women. There are 161 women (out of 349 members) in Parliament; however, some parties maintain more gender parity than others. Magdalena Andersson became the first woman to be prime minister in November 2021. Since 1993, the Indigenous Sami community has elected its own legislature, which has significant powers over community education and culture, and serves as an advisory body to the government. There are calls for greater political autonomy of the Sami Parliament.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 12 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 4 / 4

Sweden's freely elected representatives develop and implement policy.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 4 / 4

Corruption is relatively low in Sweden, and anticorruption mechanisms are generally effective. The country's lively free press also works to expose corrupt officials. Sweden's wide-reaching transparency and access to public administration information policy helps to safeguard against corruption.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 4 / 4

The country has one of the most robust freedom of information statutes in the world, and state authorities generally respect the right of both citizens and noncitizens to access public information.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 60 / 60D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 16 / 16*D1. Are there free and independent media? 4 / 4

Sweden's media are independent. Most newspapers and periodicals are privately owned, and media ownership is extremely concentrated in the hands of a small group of individuals. The government subsidizes daily newspapers regardless of their political affiliation. Public broadcasters air weekly radio and television programs in several minority languages. Threats and intimidation of journalists have been reported, particularly against those who report on organized crime, religion, extremist groups, or other sensitive topics. In a 2021 government survey, 67 percent of women journalists and 41 percent of men journalists reported experiencing online hate speech and abuse.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 4 / 4

Religious freedom is constitutionally guaranteed and generally respected, with the state recording and investigating such crimes. The police force includes a permanent unit trained to handle hate crimes. However, religiously motivated hate crimes often go unreported. The UN Universal Periodic Review of Sweden in 2020 highlighted numerous such incidents, mainly targeting at Muslims and Jews. In March 2021, the government adopted several measures to address hate crimes, including religiously motivated hate crimes.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

Academic freedom is generally respected.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 4 / 4

Private discussion is open and vibrant.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 12 / 12E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

Freedom of assembly is generally respected in law and in practice. To tackle rising COVID-19 infections, Sweden introduced an emergency lockdown law in January 2021, which allowed the government to restrict the number of people in shops, businesses, and public places, and the previous year had banned gatherings of more than 50 people. However, most restrictions have since been removed.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 4 / 4

Nongovernmental organizations of all kinds function freely.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 4 / 4

The rights to strike and organize in labor unions are guaranteed. Trade union federations, which represent approximately 70 percent of the workforce, are strong and well organized.

F. RULE OF LAW: 16 / 16F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 4 / 4

The judiciary is independent under its constitution. Around 70 percent of the population perceives its courts to be independent. Permanent judges are appointed by the government following proposals by the Judges Proposal Board. A permanent judge cannot be dismissed other than in specific instances of corruption or other wrongdoing. Every district court, court of appeal, administrative court, and administrative court of appeal has lay judges. Lay judges are appointed at the local level and are nonpolitical, though they are appointed by political parties.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 4 / 4

The rule of law prevails in civil and criminal matters. Defendants are presumed innocent until proven guilty, and the state must provide legal counsel to people accused of criminal offenses.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 4 / 4

While Sweden is free from large-scale insurgencies, rising street violence has emerged as a growing concern. Deadly shootings, arson attacks, and explosions caused by hand grenades have taken place in many Swedish cities in recent years, mainly in poor neighborhoods with large immigrant populations. By October of 2021, there had been 110 shootings, in which at least 21 people were killed. Though the government announced measures in September 2020 to reduce the violence, including granting police increased search and surveillance powers, the problem has persisted. An explosion in September 2021 in a Gothenburg apartment block injured more than 20 people. Recent statistics also show an increasing number of homicides committed using a firearm.

The government introduced new antiterrorism measures following a 2017 terrorist attack. The law focused on tighter security in public places, greater information sharing between government agencies, and tighter controls on individuals deemed to pose a security threat.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 4 / 4

The Swedish state works to ensure equal protection and rights for all members of the population. An equality ombudsman oversees efforts to prevent discrimination based on gender, ethnicity, disability, and sexual orientation. However, the United Nations has called for the ombudsman's powers to be strengthened and has noted problems with discrimination by police and correctional personnel.

In 2017, the Swedish government voted to place limits on parental leave benefits for immigrants. In 2016, the parliament passed a law that tightened restrictions on asylum seekers, which included limiting family reunification.

In recent years, multiple reports of members of the Sweden Democrats and other parties making antisemitic and anti-Muslim remarks have emerged. Jewish and Muslim community leaders in Sweden have claimed that the far-right is an indirect but real threat to their communities. Government data shows 7,090 offences with an identified hate crime motive in 2018—the most recent year with statistics available—of which 4,865 had a xenophobic or racist motive.

The UN's 2020 Universal Periodic Review for Sweden expressed concern over reports of police profiling of members of minority groups, as well as the lack of explicit legal provisions prohibiting organizations that promote and incite racial hatred. There are persistent accusations of structural racism within Sweden.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 16 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

Freedom of movement is legally guaranteed and generally respected in practice. However, asylum seekers may be assigned to a place of residence, and at times may be forced to change locations. Sweden continues to maintain checkpoints on its external borders that were instituted during the 2015 refugee crisis. Due to the COVID-19 pandemic, the government suspended nonessential travel to Sweden from countries outside of the European Union (EU) in 2020. The ban did not include those who held a Swedish residency permit or those who had family who are residents in Sweden. The ban has been lifted for EU countries but remains in place for most non-EU countries as of December 2021.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 4 / 4

The government respects the rights of individuals to own property and establish private businesses. A 2011 Supreme Court ruling granted Sami reindeer herders common-law rights to disputed lands.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 4 / 4

Same-sex couples are legally allowed to marry and adopt; lesbian couples have the same rights to artificial insemination and in vitro fertilization as heterosexual couples. An individual can legally change their gender identity, though doing so requires a medical assessment.

There are persistently high levels of rape and sexual assault in the country. In 2018, a law was introduced changed the definition of rape to be based on consent. By 2020 rape conviction rates in Sweden had increased by 75 percent.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 4 / 4

People in Sweden generally enjoy equality of opportunity. However, unemployment is higher among immigrants, and particularly immigrant women, than it is among people who were born in Sweden. The United Nations has also noted that the performance gap between foreign-born and native-born children in school remains high.

Sweden is a destination and, to a lesser extent, a transit point for women and children trafficked for the purpose of sexual exploitation, but the Swedish government is proactive in combatting the problem. The government has established antitrafficking working groups and action plans at municipal levels. Nevertheless, the UN has pointed out that Sweden lacks robust methods to prevent individuals, especially unaccompanied immigrant children, from falling victim to human trafficking.

Switzerland

Population: 8,700,000

Capital: Bern

Freedom Status: Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: The political system of Switzerland is characterized by decentralization and direct democracy. The multilingual state is typically governed by a broad coalition including members from four of the largest parliamentary parties. The 26 cantons of the Swiss Confederation have considerable decision-making power, and the public often weighs in on policy matters through referendums. Civil liberties are generally respected in the country, though laws and policies adopted in recent years have reflected a growing wariness of immigration and minority groups, which face societal and systemic discrimination.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- In March, Swiss voters approved a ban on the use of full face coverings, including the burqa, in public. The federal government had argued against the initiative, calling for the issue to be addressed locally.
- In May, the Swiss government ended negotiations on a framework agreement with the European Union (EU), which would have superseded over 120 existing bilateral agreements between Bern and the bloc.
- In September, voters supported a 2020 law guaranteeing same-sex marriage and adoption rights.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 39 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 12 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

Executive power is exercised by the seven-member Federal Council, with each member elected by the bicameral Federal Assembly to four-year terms. The Federal Council represents a consensus-based coalition among most large parties in the Federal Assembly. The presidency is largely ceremonial and rotates annually among the Federal Council's members. Guy Parmelin of the right-wing Swiss People's Party (SVP) served in 2021. Ignazio Cassis of the Free Democratic Party of Switzerland (FDP) was selected to succeed Parmelin in December and will assume the post in 2022.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The constitution provides for a Federal Assembly with two directly elected chambers: the 46-member Council of States, in which each canton has two members and each half-canton has one, and the 200-member National Council, whose seats are apportioned among the cantons based on population. All lawmakers serve four-year terms. Switzerland's electoral process is vibrant and pluralistic, garnering high levels of confidence from the public.

The October 2019 elections presented a minor shake-up in Swiss politics. In the National Council, the SVP remained the largest party but lost ground, taking 54 seats, down from 65 in the last parliament. The Social Democratic Party (SP) won 39 seats (losing 4), the FDP took 28 seats (losing 4), and the Christian Democratic People's Party (CVP) took 25 seats (losing 2). The biggest winners of the election were the Green Party (GPS), which won 28 seats (gaining 17), and the Green Liberal Party (GLP), which won 16 seats (gaining 9). No other party won more than 10 seats.

In the Council of States, the CVP won 13 seats, the FDP secured 12, the SP took 9, the SVP took 6, and the GPS won 5. The GPS made gains, while the SP sustained losses.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 4 / 4

Swiss elections are free and fair, and the Election Commission, which administers them, is considered impartial.

Swiss voters took part in several referendums in 2021. In March, voters narrowly supported an SVP-backed law banning the wearing of full face coverings, including burqas, in public. The federal government had opposed the proposal, calling for the issue to be addressed locally. That same month, voters rejected a bill to introduce a digital identity system but approved a free trade agreement with Indonesia.

In June, voters approved the 2020 COVID-19 Act, which contained pandemic-related measures. They also supported a federal antiterrorism act while rejecting proposals to lower carbon dioxide emissions, ban synthetic pesticides, and address potable water and healthy food concerns.

In September, voters supported a 2020 bill that legalized marriage and adoption rights for same-sex couples. A proposal to tax capital gains was defeated.

In November, voters approved proposal to expand canton-level health-care provisions and an extension of COVID-19 measures, including financial support for companies. An initiative to determine federal judges via a lottery system was rejected.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 15 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 4 / 4

Political parties are free to form and operate, and a wide range of parties are active at the federal and regional levels. The political system, while stable, remains open to new groups. In January 2021, the CVP and the Conservative Democratic Party, which held three lower-house seats, merged to form the Center Party.

Party financing and lobbying are relatively opaque. The National Council did not support a party-finance transparency bill and rejected a lobbying bill in 2020.

While most parties govern together by common agreement in the country's consensus-based political system, they compete vigorously in elections and can gain or lose influence depending on their performance at the polls. Contentious policy issues are decided in referendums.

The seven-seat Federal Council currently comprises two members each from the FDP, the SP, and the SVP, along with one Center Party member. After the 2019 elections, the GPS, which now holds more seats than the CVP and as many as the FDP, petitioned the parliament to change the Federal Council's composition to accommodate their electoral success. The GPS lost a parliamentary vote over the issue but will likely renew their bid should they repeat their strong performance in the next election. A GPS seat was effectively denied based on an interpretation of the “magic formula,” whereby Federal Council seats are distributed according to the approximate strength of the four largest parties in the parliament.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 4 / 4

People's political choices are generally free from domination by democratically unaccountable entities.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 3 / 4

Restrictive citizenship laws and procedures tend to exclude immigrants from political participation. Noncitizens represent a quarter of the Swiss population yet cannot vote in federal elections.

The 2019 elections saw a record number of women elected to the National Council. Women represent 42.5 percent of the body but made up 50.2 percent of the Swiss population as of 2020.

People with disabilities and living under full guardianship have the automatic right to vote on local and cantonal matters in Geneva and can request the right to vote in Ticino and Vaud. However, Switzerland does not fully comply with the UN Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities, which it ratified in 2014. An initiative to expand political rights for people living with disabilities launched in September 2021; supporters intend to collect signatures in 2022.

The rights of LGBT+ people are generally respected.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 12 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 4 / 4

Switzerland's freely elected officials determine and implement national and local policy through a decentralized governance system. The 26 cantons have significant control over economic and social policy, with the federal government's powers largely limited to foreign affairs and some economic matters. Extensively used referendums are mandatory for any federal constitutional amendments, the joining of international organizations, and major changes to federal laws.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 4 / 4

Safeguards against corruption are generally effective. Pierre Maudet, a former Geneva cantonal government head who had accepted benefits from Abu Dhabi's crown prince in 2015, was convicted of receiving an undue financial advantage in February 2021 and received a suspended sentence. In March, Maudet lost a canton-level election in Geneva.

A law to improve whistleblower protection was rejected in 2019 and again in 2020 by the National Council. The failed reform effort came in response to the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD) criticizing Switzerland for failing to fully implement its Anti-Bribery Convention recommendations.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 4 / 4

The government is generally transparent in its operations. In recent years, an increasing number of cantonal governments have passed transparency laws making government data more accessible.

In its June 2021 report, the Council of Europe's Group of States against Corruption reported that Swiss authorities did not fully adopt its previous recommendations regarding legislators' financial declarations and liabilities.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 57 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 14 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 4 / 4

Freedom of the press is generally respected. Switzerland has an open media environment, though the state-owned, editorially independent Swiss Broadcasting Corporation (SRG/SSR) dominates the market. Consolidation of newspaper ownership in the hands of large conglomerates has forced the closure of some smaller newspapers in recent years.

In 2020, the telecommunications committee of the Council of States voted to support a revision to Article 93 of the constitution that would impose preexisting regulations on radio and television outlets to other media. Reporters Without Borders (RSF) criticized the proposal, warning it would impact the freedom of those outlets.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 3 / 4

Freedom of religion is constitutionally guaranteed and the penal code prohibits discrimination against any religion. However, Muslims face legal and practical discrimination. The construction of new minarets and mosques is prohibited as the result of a 2009 referendum.

In 2018, St. Gallen became the second canton to pass its own burqa ban, after Ticino in 2016. In 2020, the National Council disapproved a proposal to ban burqas. In March 2021, however, Swiss voters approved a proposal to restrict their public use nationwide.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

Academic freedom is largely respected.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 4 / 4

Individuals are generally able to express their personal views on political issues without fear of retribution, though the law punishes public incitement to racial hatred or discrimination as well as denial of crimes against humanity.

The Federal Intelligence Service (FIS) was granted wider surveillance powers in 2017, allowing it to monitor internet usage, bug private property, and tap phone lines of suspected terrorists. A 2018 law required mobile and internet service providers to retain user data, including information on which websites users visited, for six months. Both laws faced subsequent legal challenges, although a court decision was still pending at the end of 2021.

In April 2021, the SRG/SSR reported that the FIS regularly delayed responses to requests for information from individuals; nongovernmental organization (NGO) grundrechte.ch warned that the FIS's slow response may discourage political discussion or activity.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 12 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

Freedom of assembly is constitutionally guaranteed and is generally respected, though pandemic-related measures have sometimes affected assemblies. Swiss authorities lifted some restrictions on gatherings in March 2021 but tightened restrictions by December, as COVID-19 cases rose.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 4 / 4

NGOs generally operate without undue restrictions, though some groups face surveillance. In July 2021, Statewatch reported that the FIS monitored Solidarity Without Borders, which advocates for the interests of migrants and asylum seekers, along with other NGOs.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 4 / 4

Workers are generally free to form trade unions and other professional organizations. The right to engage in collective bargaining and strikes is respected. However, the International Labour Organization (ILO) added Switzerland to its list of countries with weak job protection for unionized employees in 2019. While it is improper to dismiss an employee because of union membership or activity, the penalty for such behavior is seen as too low.

F. RULE OF LAW: 15 / 16F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 4 / 4

While the judiciary is largely independent in practice, judges are selected based on a system of proportional party, linguistic, and regional representation in the Federal Assembly. Two Federal Supreme Court members were selected under this system in June 2021. Green and SP judges are underrepresented within the court.

Campaigners advocating for judges to be selected by a lottery collected the needed signatures for their proposal in 2019. The Federal Council rejected the proposal in 2020, and Swiss voters rejected it in November 2021.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 4 / 4

Authorities generally observe legal safeguards against arbitrary arrest and detention. The constitution's due process clause guarantees fair trial proceedings. In 2020, however, parliamentarians approved legislation allowing police to preventively detain and surveil individuals suspected of terrorist activities. Swiss voters approved the legislation in June 2021. Amnesty International heavily criticized the law after it received voters' support, warning it could be employed against children as young as 12 years old and is vague in its definition of terrorism.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 4 / 4

Switzerland is free from war and other major threats to physical security, though violent incidents do occur. Occasional instances of excessive force by police have been documented. Conditions in prisons and detention centers generally meet international standards, and the Swiss government permits visits by independent observers.

Although the law prohibits discrimination on the basis of race, gender, or religion, anti-immigrant attitudes have grown in recent years. A 2016 immigration law included measures meant to curb mass migration from the EU and required employers give preference to Swiss citizens in hiring practices. In 2020, voters rejected an SVP proposal to end the free movement agreement with the EU.

The rights of cultural, religious, and linguistic minorities are legally protected, but minority groups—especially Roma, Sinti, and people of African descent—face societal discrimination. The Federal Commission against Racism counted 572 cases of racial discrimination in Switzerland in 2020.

Women generally enjoy equal rights but face pay and workplace discrimination. In February 2021, the Federal Statistical Office reported that the pay gap increased from 18.1 percent in 2014 to 19 percent in 2018.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 15 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

Freedom of movement is respected, and there are no undue limitations on the ability to change one's place of residence, employment, or education. Movement within Switzerland and with other countries were limited by COVID-19 measures in 2020 and 2021. Quarantine measures were relaxed by the Federal Council in January 2021.

The rights to own property and operate private businesses remain unrestricted.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 4 / 4

Personal social freedoms are protected for most people. In a 2005 referendum, voters approved same-sex civil unions. Recognized since 2007, these unions granted many of the legal benefits of marriage. Limited adoption rights for same-sex civil partners were granted in 2018. Parliamentarians voted to approve same-sex marriage and allow transgender and inter-sex people to update identity documents more easily in 2020. Voters also supported same-sex marriage and adoption rights in a September 2021 referendum. The right to easily update identity documents, meanwhile, was included in the civil code and will take effect in January 2022.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 3 / 4

The Swiss government does not fully comply with international antitrafficking standards according to the US State Department's Trafficking in Persons Report 2021. Swiss authorities made some efforts to support international trafficking investigations during the department's reporting period, but sentencing of convicted traffickers was considered "lenient."

In April 2021, Switzerland signed on to an ILO framework to combat forced labor, modern slavery, human trafficking, and child labor.

Labor regulations are generally enforced, but migrant workers are more vulnerable to exploitation. No nationwide minimum wage exists, though the cantons of Geneva, Jura, Neuchâtel, and Ticino do maintain minimum wages. In June 2021, voters in the half-canton of Basel-Stadt approved a minimum wage.

Syria

Population: 20,400,000

Capital: Damascus

Freedom Status: Not Free

Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: Political rights and civil liberties in Syria are severely compromised by one of the world's most repressive regimes and by other belligerent forces in an ongoing civil war. The regime prohibits genuine political opposition and harshly suppresses freedoms of speech and assembly. Corruption, enforced disappearances, military trials, and torture are rampant in government-controlled areas. Residents of contested regions or territory held by nonstate actors are subject to additional abuses, including intense and indiscriminate combat, sieges and interruptions of humanitarian aid, and mass displacement.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- In May, President Bashar al-Assad won a fourth term in a contest characterized by an uncompetitive slate of challengers, none of whom posed a serious threat to Assad's rule. The vote was further marred by a law that effectively barred exiles living abroad from participating, and ongoing insecurity. Assad won 95.1 percent of the vote, according to the government.
- The regime launched a siege against the old quarter of the city of Daraa in the summer, leading to clashes with rebel fighters. In September, the government took control of the quarter after agreeing to a cease-fire negotiated with Russian assistance.
- Syria was seriously affected by the ongoing COVID-19 pandemic, with cases rising in Aleppo and Idlib Governorates in August and September. An increase in case counts was reported nationwide by October. Government authorities reported 38,809 cases and 2,182 deaths to the World Health Organization (WHO) by year's end.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: -3 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 0 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

The president, who dominates the executive branch, is empowered to appoint and dismiss the prime minister and cabinet. In May 2021, President Bashar al-Assad won a fourth seven-year term, with the government reporting that he won 95.1 percent of the vote. Syrians living abroad largely refrained from voting. Balloting was conducted in government-controlled areas, but not in rebel- or Kurdish-held areas.

The election was affected by an uncompetitive slate of candidates. In early May 2021, the Supreme Constitutional Court allowed only three aspiring candidates, including Assad, to contest the election. Opposition candidates were also affected by a law requiring candidates to have lived within Syria for 10 years, effectively disqualifying those in exile. Major democratic states denounced the election as illegitimate.

In June 2020, Assad dismissed Imad Khamis, who had served as prime minister since 2016, and appointed Hussein Arnous, then the water resources minister, to replace him.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

Elections for the 250-seat People's Council were held in July 2020, though only in areas with a regime presence. These elections were also affected by the widespread displacement of the population. The balloting featured no meaningful competition, as exiled opposition groups did not participate, and the authorities do not tolerate independent political activity in the territory they control. The ruling Baath Party and its National Progressive Front coalition won 183 seats. The remaining 67 seats went to candidates running as independents, though all were considered government loyalists.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 0 / 4

There is no transparency or accountability surrounding the official electoral process. The executive authorities, acting through the military-security apparatus, effectively grant or withhold permission to participate in elections in government-held areas. Although some provisional local councils outside government-controlled areas have organized rudimentary elections since 2011, ongoing attacks by progovernment forces and militant groups have made such processes untenable.

The government and opposition groups have met with the intention of drafting a new constitution, though a UN special envoy reported that an October 2021 round of talks was unproductive.

Kurdish-held areas have a provisional constitution that allows local elections, but the Democratic Union Party (PYD) exercises ultimate control.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 0 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 0 / 4

A 2011 decree allowed new political parties to register but also imposed significant obstacles to party formation and prohibited parties based on religion, regional affiliation, and other criteria. In practice, all legal political groups and independents are either part of, allied with, or heavily vetted by the regime.

In Kurdish-held areas, decentralized governance theoretically allows for political competition. In practice, however, politics are dominated by the most powerful group, the PYD, whose affiliated security forces frequently detain political opponents.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 0 / 4

The Baath Party has governed Syria without interruption since the 1960s, led by Assad or his late father for nearly all of that time. The 2011 decree and 2012 constitutional reforms formally relaxed rules regarding the participation of non-Baathist parties. In practice, the government maintains a powerful intelligence and security apparatus to monitor and punish opposition movements that could meaningfully challenge to Assad's rule.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 0 / 4

In its territory, the regime's security and intelligence forces, militias, and business allies actively suppress the autonomy of voters and politicians. Foreign actors including Iran, Russia, and the Lebanese Shiite militia Hezbollah also exert heavy influence over politics in regime-held areas. In other areas, civilian politics are often subordinated to Turkish-backed armed groups or the PYD.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 0 / 4

The largely Alawite-led regime presents itself as a protector of that and other religious minorities. In practice, political access depends not on sect but on proximity and loyalty to Assad and his associates. Alawites, Christians, Druze, and members of other smaller sects who are outside Assad's inner circle are politically disenfranchised. The political elite includes members of the Sunni sect, but the country's Sunni majority makes up most of the rebel movement and has borne the brunt of state repression as a result.

The opposition's dwindling territory is divided among Turkish-backed rebels, Islamist militias, and radical jihadist militants, with varying implications for ethnic and religious minorities. The PYD nominally ensures political representation for Arabs but has been accused of mistreating non-Kurdish residents.

Women have equal formal political rights, holding 11.2 percent of the legislature's seats after the 2020 elections as well as some senior government positions. However, they are typically excluded from political decision-making and have little ability to organize independently amid state and militia repression. All leadership positions in Kurdish-held areas are reportedly shared between a man and a woman, though they have limited autonomy outside PYD-led structures.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 0 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 0 / 4

De facto authority in government-controlled Syria lies with the president—who is not freely elected—and his political, security, and business allies rather than with formal institutions such as the cabinet and parliament. Foreign states like Iran and Russia also wield considerable influence over regime policy. Opposition forces and Kurdish-led fighters have held large swaths of territory with the help of countries including Turkey and the United States, respectively.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 0 / 4

The regime and its allies are said to control much of the Syrian economy. The civil war has created new opportunities for corruption among the government, loyalist armed forces, and the private sector. Foreign allies have also benefited from government contracts and trade deals. Basic state services and humanitarian aid are reportedly extended or withheld based on recipients' demonstrated political loyalty to the Assad regime. COVID-19-related movement restrictions created more opportunities for corruption, as those with means paid bribes to circumvent the rules.

Individuals in government-held territory who seek to expose or criticize official corruption face reprisals including dismissal from employment and detention.

Corruption is also widespread in opposition-held areas. Turkish-backed militias have been accused of looting, extortion, and theft. Local administrators and activists complain that little of the international aid reportedly given to opposition representatives abroad seems to reach them, raising suspicions of graft.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 0 / 4

The government has long operated with minimal transparency and public accountability, and conditions have worsened during the civil war amid the rise of militias that are nominally loyal to the regime but often free to exploit the population. Officials have broad discretion to withhold government information, and they are not obliged to disclose their assets. Independent civil society groups and media outlets are harshly suppressed and cannot influence or shed light on state policies.

The regime allegedly worked to suppress independent information about the COVID-19 pandemic in Syria when it emerged, in part by warning medical workers not to share their experiences or speak with foreign media outlets. Evidence of strains on the health-care system and an increase in burials suggested much larger numbers of cases and deaths than were reflected in official data.

ADDITIONAL DISCRETIONARY POLITICAL RIGHTS QUESTION

Is the government or occupying power deliberately changing the ethnic composition of a country or territory so as to destroy a culture or tip the political balance in favor of another group? -3 / 0

The Syrian government, Kurdish forces, Turkish-backed opposition forces, and Islamist extremist groups have all sought to alter the ethnic composition of their territories, forcing civilians of all backgrounds to seek safety among their respective religious or ethnic communities and contributing to the demographic shifts wrought by the civil war.

Sunni Arab civilians bear the brunt of attacks by the Alawite-led government and loyalist militias. In 2018, the regime forcibly transferred thousands of civilians—most of them Sunni Arabs—from captured opposition areas to Idlib Governorate after bombing and besieging them. The government targeted Idlib again when it launched offensives against rebel forces there in 2019. As many as 900,000 people were internally displaced.

In late 2019, the Turkish military launched an offensive into northeastern Syria, aiming to create a buffer zone by pushing out its Kurdish adversaries in the area. Turkish-backed militias were subsequently accused of expropriating land and homes.

Sunni Islamist and jihadist groups often persecute religious minorities and Muslims they deem impious. Kurdish militias have been accused of displacing Arab and Turkmen communities in the context of their fight against the Islamic State (IS) militant group.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 4 / 60D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 3 / 16*D1. Are there free and independent media? 0 / 4

The constitution nominally guarantees freedom of the press, but in practice the media are heavily restricted in government-held areas, and journalists who report critically about the state are subject to censorship, detention, torture, and death in custody. All media must obtain permission to operate from the Interior Ministry. Private media in government-controlled territory are generally owned by figures associated with the regime. Media freedom varies in territory held by other groups, but local outlets are typically under heavy pressure to support the dominant militant faction in the area. Journalists are vulnerable to censorship or intimidation over reporting on COVID-19.

Journalists face physical danger throughout Syria, especially from regime forces and extremist groups. According to the Committee to Protect Journalists (CPJ), 139 journalists were killed between 2011 and 2021. Another 9 were missing as of December 2021.

While the constitution mandates that the president be a Muslim, there is no state religion, and the regime has generally allowed different confessional groups to practice their faiths as long as their religious activities are not deemed politically subversive. The government monitors mosques and controls the appointment of Muslim religious leaders. Jehovah's Witnesses are banned, proselytizing is restricted, and conversion of Muslims to other faiths is prohibited. The dominance of extremist groups in opposition-held areas of western Syria has threatened freedom of worship for local residents and displaced people.

IS, which persecuted religious activity that did not conform to its version of Sunni Islam, was militarily defeated in Syria but reportedly remains active as a terrorist and guerrilla force, and it continues to recruit from and intimidate the roughly 62,000 IS suspects and family members held in Kurdish-controlled camps in eastern Syria.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 0 / 4

Academic freedom is severely restricted. University professors in government-held areas have been dismissed or imprisoned for expressing dissent, and some have been killed for supporting regime opponents. Combatants on all sides have regularly attacked or commandeered schools. Groups including the PYD—and prior to its military defeats, IS—have set up education systems in their territories that feature pervasive political indoctrination.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 1 / 4

The government engages in heavy surveillance of private and online discussion and harshly punishes dissent in areas it controls. However, the government has employed its surveillance tools inconsistently in recent years amid deepening criticism from traditionally loyal segments of the population. The environment is somewhat more open in areas where neither the government nor an extremist group has a dominant presence, though the PYD and some opposition factions have allegedly suppressed freedom of speech. During the COVID-19 pandemic in 2020, the regime closely monitored medical staff and warned them against speaking about the outbreak or the government's response.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 0 / 12E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 0 / 4

Freedom of assembly is severely restricted across Syria. Opposition protests in government-held areas have been met with gunfire, mass arrests, and torture of those detained. Jihadist groups, the PYD, and some rebel factions have also used force to quash civilian dissent and demonstrations.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 0 / 4

The regime generally denies registration to nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) with reformist or human rights missions and regularly conducts raids and searches to detain civic and political activists. A variety of grassroots civil society networks emerged in many parts of Syria following the 2011 uprising, monitoring human rights abuses. However, such activists face violence, intimidation, and detention by armed groups and must operate secretly in many cases. NGOs that sought to provide aid during the COVID-19 pandemic attracted the suspicion of regime intelligence agencies, deterring more widespread or open activism.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 0 / 4

Professional syndicates in state-held areas are controlled by the Baath Party, and all labor unions must belong to the General Federation of Trade Unions, a nominally independent grouping that the government uses to control union activity. The war's economic and political pressures have made functioning labor relations virtually impossible across the country.

F. RULE OF LAW: 0 / 16F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 0 / 4

The constitution forbids government interference in the civil judiciary, but judges and prosecutors are essentially required to belong to the Baath Party and are in practice beholden to the political leadership.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 0 / 4

Military officers can try civilians in both conventional military courts and field courts, which lack due process guarantees. Civilians may appeal military court decisions to the military chamber of the Court of Cassation, though its judges are ultimately subordinate to the military. Extremist groups have set up religious courts in their territories, imposing harsh punishments for perceived religious offenses by civilians. The general breakdown of state authority and the proliferation of militias in much of the country has led to arbitrary detentions, summary justice, and extrajudicial penalties by all sides in the civil war.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 0 / 4

An estimated 500,000 people have been killed in the civil war since 2011. While the fighting subsided following the defeat of IS in 2019 and the 2020 Idlib cease-fire, the regime and insurgent groups frequently target civilians, including through indiscriminate bombardment, extrajudicial killings, and torture of detainees, with the government responsible for most abuses. Regime forces have detained and tortured tens of thousands of people since the war began, and many have died in custody or disappeared.

The regime has been accused of repeatedly using chemical weapons on civilian targets, including during its 2019–20 offensives into Idlib Governorate. Those offensives had killed hundreds of people and displaced hundreds of thousands by the time a cease-fire was declared.

Despite a nominal regime victory in Daraa Governorate in 2018, as well as a Russian-brokered reconciliation agreement, violence involving regime forces and local insurgents continued into 2021. The regime launched a siege against Daraa al-Balad, the old quarter of the city of Daraa, in June. Regime and rebel forces engaged in heavy fighting there beginning in July. In September, the government took control of Daraa al-Balad after agreeing to a deal negotiated with Russian assistance. Some 36,000 were internally displaced by the fighting as of September. A general deterioration of the rule of law has also reportedly contributed to violent criminality in the area.

Although IS lost control of its last population center in 2019, the group has since resorted to guerrilla and terrorist tactics to attack security forces and local civilian leaders. Separately, Turkish military operations in northern Syria have displaced tens of thousands of people and posed a serious threat to civilians living in the affected area.

Internally displaced persons (IDPs) are at risk of violence. In September 2021, Save the Children reported on incidents where children in the al-Hol and Roj camps were murdered or sexually assaulted.

Capital punishment can be applied expansively. In October 2021, the regime executed 24 people it claimed were responsible for wildfires in 2020, accusing them of terrorism.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 0 / 4

Families and networks with ties to the ruling elite receive preferential treatment in legal matters, and are disproportionately Alawite, though Alawites without such connections are far less likely to benefit from any special advantages. Similarly, the armed opposition is overwhelmingly Sunni Arab, and members of this group are consequently likely to face discrimination by the state unless they enjoy close ties with the regime.

The Kurdish minority has faced decades of state discrimination, including restrictions on the Kurdish language and persecution of Kurdish activists, though conditions for Kurds have improved dramatically in areas controlled by Kurdish militias since 2011.

Women are subject to legal and societal inequities, including gender-based disadvantages in social benefits and a severe gender gap in labor force participation. Official mechanisms meant to safeguard women's rights are reportedly not functional, and the general deterioration of law and order has left women exposed to a range of abuses, particularly at the hands of extremist groups that impose their own interpretations of religious law.

Syrian law discriminates against LGBT+ people. According to the 1949 penal code, "unnatural sexual intercourse" is punishable with up to three years in prison. Individuals suspected of same-sex relations are at risk of execution in areas held by extremist groups.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 1 / 16

G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 0 / 4

Ongoing combat and the proliferation of regime and militia checkpoints have severely restricted freedom of movement. The regime imposed curfews and other constraints on travel in response to the COVID-19 pandemic in 2020, though enforcement was uneven due to bribery and other factors. Movement restrictions persisted during 2021. In April, the PYD imposed a lockdown within the territory under its control, in an effort to limit the spread of COVID-19 during Ramadan.

The Office of the UN High Commissioner for Refugees reported that 6.7 million IDPs were present in Syria in December 2021. Another 5.5 million Syrians have sought refuge abroad. Some Syrians have begun returning to their homes in areas where fighting has subsided, though the 2019 government offensive in Idlib and the 2021 clashes in Daraa displaced large numbers of residents.

G2. Are individuals able to exercise the right to own property and establish private businesses without undue interference from state or nonstate actors? 0 / 4

Property rights have been routinely disregarded throughout the civil war. Businesses are frequently required to bribe officials to operate and complete bureaucratic procedures. Access to markets dominated by regime members or allies is restricted. Militias also extort businesses and confiscate private property to varying degrees.

Law No. 10 of 2018 allows the state to designate areas for reconstruction and redevelopment by decree; individuals who cannot meet a number of criteria to prove ownership of affected property risk losing it without compensation.

Personal status laws based on Sharia (Islamic law) discriminate against women on inheritance matters, and societal practices further discourage land ownership by women.

G3. Do individuals enjoy personal social freedoms, including choice of marriage partner and size of family, protection from domestic violence, and control over appearance? 1 / 4

Perpetrators of "honor crimes" can receive reduced sentences under the penal code, and rapists can avoid punishment by marrying their victims. Women cannot pass citizenship on to their children. Personal status laws for Muslims put women at a disadvantage regarding marriage, divorce, and child custody. Church law governs personal status issues for Christians, in some cases barring divorce. Early and forced marriages are a problem, with displaced families in particular marrying off young daughters as a perceived safeguard against endemic sexual violence or due to economic pressure. Personal social freedoms for women are uneven in areas outside government control, ranging from onerous codes of dress and behavior in extremist-held areas to formal equality under the PYD in Kurdish areas. However, the defeat of IS, setbacks for other extremist groups, and a decline in the scale of fighting over time has reduced the population's exposure to the most egregious violations of personal social freedoms.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 0 / 4

Many armed groups forcibly conscript or use child soldiers. Displaced people are especially vulnerable to labor exploitation and human trafficking, even in relatively stable government-controlled areas, as access to employment and investment is often dependent on personal, political, or communal affiliations. Working conditions were also worsened by the regime's mismanagement of the COVID-19 pandemic.

Taiwan

Population: 23,500,000

Capital: Taipei

Freedom Status: Free

Electoral Democracy: Yes

Overview: Taiwan's vibrant and competitive democratic system has allowed three peaceful transfers of power between rival parties since 2000, and protections for civil liberties are generally robust. Ongoing concerns include inadequate safeguards against the exploitation of foreign migrant workers, and the Chinese government's efforts to influence policymaking, the media, and democratic infrastructure in Taiwan.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- In the second year of her second term as president, Tsai Ing-wen and her Democratic Progressive Party (DPP) government faced increased pressure from Chinese authorities regarding the island's status, disinformation on social media platforms, and pro-Beijing influence operations targeting Taiwanese media.
- Despite a rise in COVID-19 cases and deaths beginning in May, the government's approach to the pandemic continued to be viewed as one of the world's most successful, and case numbers remained relatively low. While local authorities and factory owners in some areas were criticized for discriminatory treatment of migrant workers in response to the outbreak, the national government was largely able to contain the virus without having to adopt lengthy and severe domestic restrictions, focusing instead on contact tracing, quarantines for overseas travelers, and providing accurate and timely information to the public. A successful vaccination campaign was carried out during the second half of the year.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 38 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 12 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The president, who is directly elected for up to two four-year terms, appoints the premier with the consent of the legislature. The Executive Yuan, or cabinet, is made up of ministers appointed by the president on the recommendation of the premier. In practice, the president holds most executive authority.

Presidential elections have generally been considered credible. In January 2020, President Tsai won a second term in office with 57.1 percent of the vote, defeating Han Kuo-yu of the conservative Kuomintang (KMT), with 38.6 percent, and James Soong of the center-right People First Party, with 4.3 percent. The campaign period featured online disinformation and influence operations that were attributed to the Chinese government, with negative or misleading content targeting Tsai, the DPP, and the democratic process. However, the Taiwanese government, civil society projects, and social media platforms worked to detect and counter the disinformation, which largely failed to shape the election's outcome.

A2. Were the current national legislative representatives elected through free and fair elections? 4 / 4

The unicameral Legislative Yuan has 113 members elected to four-year terms; 73 are directly elected in single-member constituencies, 34 are elected by proportional representation, and 6 are elected by Indigenous voters in two multiseat constituencies. In the January 2020 elections, the DPP secured 61 seats, the KMT won 38, the Taiwan People's Party won 5, the New Power Party won 3, and the Taiwan Statebuilding Party took 1 seat, with the remainder going to independent candidates. The elections were considered free and fair by international observers.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 4 / 4

Elections in Taiwan are administered by the Central Election Commission (CEC). The law mandates that no political party may hold more than one-third of the seats on the CEC, and it operates impartially in practice.

The 2018 Referendum Act lowered thresholds to permit citizen-initiated ballot measures and decreased the voting age for referendums from 20 to 18 years.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 15 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 4 / 4

The multiparty political system features vigorous competition between the two major parties, the DPP and KMT. Smaller parties are also able to function without interference and have played a significant role in both presidential and legislative contests. Taipei mayor Ko Wen-je formed the new Taiwan People's Party in 2019, and it won 5 seats in the legislature in 2020. The Taiwan Statebuilding Party was also new to the legislature that year.

B2. Is there a realistic opportunity for the opposition to increase its support or gain power through elections? 4 / 4

There have been regular democratic transfers of power between rival parties in recent years, and parties in opposition at the national level often control key municipal governments.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 3 / 4

Major business owners with interests in China remain an influential force in Taiwanese politics, largely through their close relationship with the KMT and support for its China-friendly policies. The KMT, which governed Taiwan as an authoritarian, one-party state for decades until democratic reforms took hold in the 1980s and 90s, long enjoyed a considerable financial advantage over rivals like the DPP, which has traditionally placed a stronger emphasis on resisting Beijing's moves toward unification. However, the KMT's advantage has been whittled away in recent years by DPP government investigations into allegations that the KMT improperly acquired public assets during its rule, leading to the freezing of many of its accounts.

Chinese interference in Taiwan's elections, largely through disinformation campaigns and influence over certain media outlets, remains a serious concern. In late 2019, the legislature passed a new Anti-Infiltration Act that prohibits foreign powers from funding or directing lobbying efforts, election campaigns, or election-related disinformation in Taiwan. Violations can draw penalties of up to five years in prison. The KMT opposed the measure, warning that it could be used in a politicized manner and violate fundamental rights, though there were no reports of abusive enforcement as of 2021. Beijing's efforts to undermine public confidence in the political system and to heighten social divisions in Taiwan intensified during the year, with disinformation campaigns focused on the government's handling of the pandemic in particular.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 4 / 4

Taiwan's constitution grants all citizens the right to vote. This guarantee applies regardless of gender, ethnicity, religion, sexual orientation, or gender identity. The constitution and electoral laws also provide quotas for women's representation in local councils and at-large seats in the Legislative Yuan. In addition to the presidency, women won 42 percent of the legislature's seats in the 2020 elections. Audrey Tang, who became Taiwan's first transgender cabinet member in 2016, remained a minister in Tsai's government in 2021.

Six seats in the Legislative Yuan are reserved for Indigenous candidates elected by Indigenous voters. An additional two Indigenous candidates won seats in 2016 through normal party-list voting, but none did so in 2020. Members of Taiwan's 16 Indigenous groups make up roughly 2 percent of the population.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 11 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 4 / 4

Elected officials in Taiwan are able to set and implement policy without undue interference from foreign or other unelected actors, though consideration of China plays a significant role in Taiwanese policymaking.

Escalating pressure from Beijing continues to threaten Taiwan's sovereignty and its open democratic system. Eight countries have severed diplomatic relations with Taiwan since late 2016, largely as a result of financial incentives offered by the Chinese government. At the end of 2021, Taiwan had diplomatic recognition from just 14 countries, including the Holy See.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 3 / 4

Corruption is significantly less pervasive than in the past, but it remains a concern. According to a 2020 survey by Transparency International, 90 percent of people in Taiwan think corruption in government is a problem, and 17 percent of public service users had paid a bribe over a 12-month period. Political and business interests are closely intertwined, leading to malfeasance in government procurement. The current DPP-led government has moved to reduce these practices, including through amendments to the Government Procurement Act that were adopted in 2019.

Corruption charges have been brought against current and former officials from multiple parties in recent years. In 2020, four incumbent lawmakers—two from the KMT, one from the DPP, and one independent—and a former legislator from the New Power Party were charged with taking bribes from business magnate Lee Heng-lung, former chairman of Pacific Distribution Investment Co.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 4 / 4

The 2005 Freedom of Government Information Law enables public access to information held by government agencies, including financial audit reports and documents about administrative guidance. Civil society groups are typically able to comment on and influence pending policies and legislation. In recent years, the open digital platform vTaiwan has gained acceptance among policymakers as a means for the general public to debate and contribute to legislative proposals.

The government's management of the COVID-19 pandemic continued to be widely recognized for its transparency and reliance on scientific data and expertise, as opposed to opaque political or economic interests. Despite a rise in cases that began in May 2021, public trust in the government's efforts contributed to participation in its vaccination drive later in the year.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 56 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 16 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 4 / 4

The news media are generally free, reflecting a diversity of views and reporting aggressively on government policies, though many outlets display strong party affiliation in their coverage.

The Chinese Communist Party (CCP) continues to exert influence on Taiwanese media. Key media owners have significant business interests in China or rely on advertising by Chinese companies, leaving them vulnerable to pressure and prone to self-censorship on topics considered sensitive by Beijing. The National Communications Commission (NCC) has at times blocked the expansion of such media enterprises to ensure competition and pluralism, and it has fined television news channels for airing false reports. In 2020, after repeated warnings and fines issued over several years, the NCC decided not to renew the broadcast license of the pro-Beijing television channel CTi News. The outlet—one of several owned by business magnate Tsai Eng-meng's Want Want Holdings conglomerate, which has strong ties to China—went off the air after courts upheld the decision. Reporters Without Borders (RSF) issued a statement to defend the NCC's move, saying it was not contrary to press freedom.

Under Taiwan's libel laws, those who disseminate a fact that will "injure the reputation of another" can face criminal prosecution, with sentences of up to two years in prison or a fine. The risk of criminal libel charges or demands for compensation could inhibit journalists in their reporting, even if courts ultimately rule in their favor. In March 2021, prosecutors dropped a case against the Financial Times and other outlets after the Want Want China Times Media Group withdrew its complaints, which pertained to a 2019 report alleging that the group received regular orders from the Chinese government about its news coverage.

D2. Are individuals free to practice and express their religious faith or nonbelief in public and private? 4 / 4

Individuals of all faiths can worship freely. Religious organizations that choose to register with the government receive tax-exempt status.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 4 / 4

Educators in Taiwan can generally write and lecture without interference, and past practices—including prosecutions—aimed at restricting academics' political activism have been rare in recent years. However, some university professors have alleged pressure from administrators to curb speech that could offend Chinese students.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 4 / 4

Personal expression and private discussion are largely free of improper restrictions, and the government is not known to illegally monitor online communication. However, the government faces the growing challenge of combating online disinformation emanating from China while upholding freedom of expression. Human rights experts have recommended improvements to laws meant to combat false information, which contain vague terms that have the potential to limit legitimate speech. Such laws are enforced against social media users, though most cases do not lead to convictions, and those found guilty are typically ordered to pay small fines.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 11 / 12E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 4 / 4

The 1988 Assembly and Parade Act enables authorities to prosecute protesters who fail to obtain a permit or follow orders to disperse, and includes some restrictions on the location of protests, but freedom of assembly is largely respected in practice. During 2021, demonstrations were held by workers calling on the government to raise the minimum wage and repair a deficit-ridden pension program, by migrant workers' groups demanding legislation to protect migrant home-care workers, and by civil society organizations condemning local governments and businesses for imposing discriminatory movement restrictions on migrant workers in response to a COVID-19 outbreak.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 4 / 4

All civic organizations must register with the government, though registration is freely granted. Nongovernmental organizations typically operate without harassment or undue interference.

E3. Is there freedom for trade unions and similar professional or labor organizations? 3 / 4

Trade unions are independent, and most workers enjoy freedom of association, though the government strictly regulates the right to strike. Among other barriers, teachers, workers in the defense industry, and government employees are prohibited from striking.

F. RULE OF LAW: 15 / 16F1. Is there an independent judiciary? 4 / 4

Taiwan's judiciary is independent. Court rulings are generally free from political or other improper interference.

In 2020, the legislature adopted the Citizen Judges Act, which will move the country toward a Japan-style system in which professional judges are joined by lay judges from the general public when overseeing trials for serious criminal offenses. Critics of the system continued to call for the introduction of jury trials instead, arguing that juries provide stronger protections against judicial corruption or politicization.

F2. Does due process prevail in civil and criminal matters? 4 / 4

Constitutional guarantees concerning due process and defendants' rights are generally upheld, and police largely respect safeguards against arbitrary detention. Although prosecutors and other law enforcement officials have engaged in abusive practices in the past, particularly in prominent and politically fraught cases, such violations have been less common in recent years.

F3. Is there protection from the illegitimate use of physical force and freedom from war and insurgencies? 4 / 4

Both criminal violence and excessive use of force by police are rare, and attorneys are allowed to monitor interrogations to prevent torture.

The frequency of capital punishment has remained low in recent years, with a total of three people put to death since 2016, and none in 2021. All of those executed were found guilty of murder or other offenses resulting in death, such as arson. Condemned inmates are hooded and sedated before being shot.

F4. Do laws, policies, and practices guarantee equal treatment of various segments of the population? 3 / 4

The constitution provides for the equality of all citizens before the law, although Indigenous people continue to face social and economic discrimination, leading to high unemployment, lower wages, and barriers to education and social services. The 2017 Indigenous Languages Development Act designated the languages spoken by 16 officially recognized Indigenous groups as national languages of Taiwan, and authorized their formal use in legislative and legal affairs.

The constitution guarantees women equal rights, though women continue to face discrimination in employment and compensation. Taiwanese law prohibits discrimination in employment and education based on sexual orientation, and violence against LGBT+ people is adequately addressed by police.

Taiwan's National Human Rights Commission was officially launched in 2020, with a mandate to receive complaints on issues including discrimination, investigate violations, review laws and policies, and work with other entities to promote human rights protections.

Taiwanese law does not allow for asylum or refugee status. The government has worked to provide temporary visas and humanitarian services to tens of thousands of people fleeing persecution in Hong Kong, but it has reportedly been more restrictive in granting requests for permanent residency.

G. PERSONAL AUTONOMY AND INDIVIDUAL RIGHTS: 14 / 16G1. Do individuals enjoy freedom of movement, including the ability to change their place of residence, employment, or education? 4 / 4

Taiwan's residents enjoy freedom of movement, and Taiwanese authorities have gradually eased restrictions on travel between Taiwan and China in recent years. However, despite laws and guidelines meant to protect them, some categories of foreign migrant workers routinely experience illegitimate restrictions on their movement, such as the withholding of travel documents by employers.

While travel and movement constraints enacted by the government in response to the COVID-19 pandemic have generally been regarded as legitimate public health measures, some rules have been applied in a manner that discriminates against foreigners. After case clusters in the spring of 2021 particularly affected migrant workers living in factory dormitories in Miaoli County, local officials ordered all such workers to stay indoors except to go to work. Certain employers also ordered migrant workers who were living in private accommodations to move back into factory dormitories. Although most of these policies were formally in place for less than a month, some workers reported being subject to movement restrictions for several months.

Although property rights are generally respected, urban renewal and industrial projects have been criticized for unfairly displacing residents. Housing advocates have called for legal amendments to clarify residency rights, including protections against forced eviction, and the establishment of an appeals system to review alleged violations.

Indigenous groups argue that recent government efforts to recognize their claims to ancestral lands are inadequate, as the project applies only to state-owned land, excluding large segments of territory that are privately owned.

There are no major restrictions on personal status matters such as marriage and divorce, although people from China who are married to Taiwanese nationals must wait six years before becoming eligible for citizenship, whereas spouses of other nationalities are only required to wait four years. Same-sex marriages have been legal in Taiwan since 2019.

Rape and domestic violence remain serious problems. While the law permits authorities to investigate complaints without victims pressing charges, cultural norms inhibit many women from reporting these crimes to the police. Recent reforms have improved protections for accusers and encouraged reporting of rape and sexual assault, which appears to have increased prosecution and conviction rates.

G4. Do individuals enjoy equality of opportunity and freedom from economic exploitation? 3 / 4

Protections against exploitative working conditions in Taiwan are relatively strong overall, and civil society groups actively expose abuses and advocate for policy improvements. Certain amendments to the Labour Standards Act in 2018 were considered a setback, however, as they allowed employers to require 12 consecutive days of work with breaks of only eight hours between shifts, up from the previous limit of seven consecutive workdays and breaks of 11 hours between shifts.

Many of Taiwan's roughly 715,000 foreign migrant workers are mistreated or exploited by employers in practice, despite 2018 amendments to the Employment Services Act that require employment agencies to swiftly report abuses against migrant workers or face severe fines. The Labor Standards Act notably does cover foreign domestic workers or fishery workers, and there have been widespread accounts of such individuals being subjected to unpaid wages, long working hours, physical and sexual abuse, lack of food or medical care, denial of sleep, substandard safety equipment, poor living conditions, and extortion or fraud by recruitment and brokerage agencies. They are frequently found to be indebted to complex brokerage networks. Abuses are particularly prevalent in Taiwan's fleet of hundreds of long-range fishing vessels, whose remote operations make monitoring and enforcement of basic labor rules difficult. In another form of mistreatment, for-profit universities have reportedly recruited foreign students—especially from Indonesia—and then placed them into exploitative labor conditions under the pretense of educational opportunity.

Tajikistan

Population: 9,700,000

Capital: Dushanbe

Freedom Status: Not Free

Electoral Democracy: No

Overview: The authoritarian regime of President Emomali Rahmon, who has ruled since 1992, severely restricts political rights and civil liberties. The political opposition and independent media have been devastated by a sustained campaign of repression, and the government exerts tight control over religious expression and activity. Wealth and authority are concentrated in the hands of Rahmon and his family.

KEY DEVELOPMENTS IN 2021

- Tajikistani authorities attempted to close the border with Afghanistan after its elected government fell in August but allowed refugees to cross in small numbers. Some 15,000 refugees reportedly resided within Tajikistan as of October.
- Tajikistani and Kyrgyzstani forces fought along the border over two days in April before a cease-fire was declared. Tajikistani authorities reported 19 deaths and 87 injuries from the fighting.

POLITICAL RIGHTS: 0 / 40

A. ELECTORAL PROCESS: 0 / 12

A1. Was the current head of government or other chief national authority elected through free and fair elections? 0 / 4

The president is chief of state and is elected for up to two seven-year terms under current rules, but constitutional amendments ratified in 2016 removed term limits for President Rahmon, who holds the official status of “leader of the nation.”

A presidential election due in November 2020 was held in October. Rahmon of the ruling People’s Democratic Party of Tajikistan (PDPT) won a fifth term with 90.9 percent of the vote according to the Central Commission for Elections and Referendums (CCER). Four candidates from progovernment parties won a combined 7.8 percent, while the Social Democratic Party of Tajikistan (SDPT) boycotted the contest.

The European Council called the election orderly but noted that previous Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE) recommendations on the media and political environment remained unfulfilled. While independent media outlets were largely unable to observe polling stations, Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty (RFE/RL) reported incidents of apparent ballot stuffing and of voters submitting ballots on behalf of family members.

The bicameral Supreme Assembly is composed of an upper house, the National Assembly, and a lower house, the Assembly of Representatives. The National Assembly comprises 25 members chosen by local assemblies and 8 appointed by the president; former presidents are also entitled to a seat. The 63-member Assembly of Representatives is popularly elected through a mixed system of 41 single-member constituencies and 22 proportional-representation seats. Supreme Assembly members serve five-year terms.

In the March 2020 legislative elections, the PDPT won 47 lower-house seats, while pro-government parties divided the remainder. The SDPT did not exceed the 5 percent threshold for representation according to the CCER. OSCE monitors reported that the elections did not meet democratic standards. Media outlet Asia-Plus reported that officials offered multiple ballots to reporters claiming to represent relatives.

A3. Are the electoral laws and framework fair, and are they implemented impartially by the relevant election management bodies? 0 / 4

The CCER is subservient to the government and enforces electoral laws in an inconsistent and nontransparent manner. Despite reforms ahead of the 2015 elections, constituencies vary considerably in population, undermining equal suffrage.

B. POLITICAL PLURALISM AND PARTICIPATION: 0 / 16

B1. Do the people have the right to organize in different political parties or other competitive political groupings of their choice, and is the system free of undue obstacles to the rise and fall of these competing parties or groupings? 0 / 4

The government consistently marginalizes independent or opposition parties, which are excluded from the political process. The Islamic Renaissance Party of Tajikistan (IRPT)—which had been the country’s most significant opposition group—lost its legal registration and was declared a terrorist organization in 2015. The 2016 constitutional amendments banned faith-based parties, effectively preventing the IRPT from reforming. The National Alliance of Tajikistan, a Europe-based refugee opposition coalition, was declared a terrorist organization in 2019.

The authorities continued to harass and arrest current and former IRPT members, their families, and other opponents during 2021. In January, SDPT official Mahmurod Odinaev received a 14-year prison term on hooliganism and extremism charges. His son, Shaikhmuslihidin Rizoiev, was convicted of hooliganism and attempted rape and received a six-year term in February. In June, former IRPT member Mirzo Hojimuhammad was sentenced to five years in prison for his membership, though his family stated he had given up political activism years before.

Tajikistani activists are targeted on a transnational basis; at least 15 have disappeared while living in Russia or have been extradited from there since 2015. Relatives of deceased or imprisoned opposition figures are also targeted at home and abroad. In August 2021, authorities in Russia arrested Barakatullo Ghoziev at Dushanbe’s request; his father, Said Qyomiddin Ghozi, was a popular imam and opposition figure who was kidnapped from Russia in 2017 and died in a prison riot in 2019. Ghoziev faces extradition to Tajikistan and a possible 25-year prison term on charges of high treason and religious hatred.

Tajikistan has no record of peaceful transfers of power between rival parties. Rahmon first became chief executive in 1992, during the country’s 1992–97 civil war, and has held the presidency since the office’s creation in 1994. Under 2016 constitutional revisions, he is entitled to run for reelection indefinitely; can overrule cabinet decisions even after leaving office; and has set up his son, Rustam Emomali, to succeed him. Emomali was named National Assembly chairman that year, placing him second in the presidential line of succession.

Years of unrelenting repression of independent political activity have left opposition parties unable to compete in elections. Many IRPT members and their relatives were beaten, harassed, and imprisoned before the 2015 elections, with some reportedly tortured in custody or killed in prison.

B3. Are the people's political choices free from domination by forces that are external to the political sphere, or by political forces that employ extrapolitical means? 0 / 4

Political affairs in Tajikistan are controlled almost exclusively by Rahmon and his extended family, leaving citizens with few avenues to participate in the political process. Relatives of Rahmon hold numerous public positions and control key sectors of the private economy.

Dushanbe increasingly relies on the Chinese government for external security. In October 2021, RFE/RL reported on the existence of a Chinese-operated base near the Tajikistan-Afghanistan border. Later that month, RFE/RL reported that Dushanbe offered Beijing full ownership of that base while authorizing the construction of another Chinese-operated border facility.

B4. Do various segments of the population (including ethnic, racial, religious, gender, LGBT+, and other relevant groups) have full political rights and electoral opportunities? 0 / 4

No segment of the population enjoys full political rights or electoral opportunities in practice. The regime, which seeks to suppress any genuine dissent, does not permit women, minorities, or religious groups to organize independently to advance their political interests. Women remain underrepresented as voters and as elected politicians.

C. FUNCTIONING OF GOVERNMENT: 0 / 12

C1. Do the freely elected head of government and national legislative representatives determine the policies of the government? 0 / 4

President Rahmon, who is not freely elected, and his inner circle are virtually unopposed in determining and implementing policy and have strengthened their grip on power. The PDPT-controlled legislature does not offer a meaningful check on the executive's expansive constitutional authority. Officials from Rahmon's native Kulob District dominate the government.

C2. Are safeguards against official corruption strong and effective? 0 / 4

Patronage networks and regional affiliations are central to political life. Corruption is pervasive and anticorruption legislation is routinely ignored. Major irregularities have been reported at the National Bank of Tajikistan and the country's largest industrial firm, the state-owned Tajik Aluminum Company.

C3. Does the government operate with openness and transparency? 0 / 4

Government decision-making and budgetary processes lack transparency, and public officials are not required to disclose financial information. Crackdowns on the media, the opposition, and civil society have further reduced independent scrutiny of state operations. In recent years, the government has concluded extensive infrastructure and resource-extraction agreements with Beijing and Chinese companies, with little consultation or transparency.

CIVIL LIBERTIES: 8 / 60

D. FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND BELIEF: 1 / 16

D1. Are there free and independent media? 0 / 4

The government controls most printing presses, newsprint supplies, and broadcasting facilities, and denies independent media access to these resources. The state shuts out independent outlets and encourages self-censorship. Independent journalists face harassment and intimidation. Civil libel charges have been used to cripple outlets that criticize the government. Authorities routinely block critical websites, news portals, and social media platforms, while using periodic wholesale blackouts of internet and messaging services to suppress criticism.

In January 2021, authorities ordered bloggers to register with tax authorities, a demand that observers noted could stifle the few remaining independent voices. In May, Reporters Without Borders (RSF) reported that the Television and Radio Committee (KTR) was imposing “draconian” conditions on broadcast license renewals; the KTR required broadcasters to share their proposed output, increased the cost of licenses, and demanded 1 percent of broadcasters’ profits.

The government imposes severe restrictions on religious freedom, in part by limiting religious activities to state-approved venues and registered organizations. Authorities continue to prosecute individuals for alleged membership in banned religious organizations, including Christian and Muslim groups. Minors are generally barred from attending religious services in mosques, as are women in most cases.

Laws to discourage religious clothing (like the hijab) as well as an unofficial ban on beards for men are arbitrarily enforced. A government-published “guidebook” details recommended dress for women that excludes the hijab and similar garments in favor of “traditional” or “national” alternatives. The government has pressured students to adhere to these dress codes, establishing roadblocks in some areas to search for violators.

In April 2021, Abdulhaq Obidov, a Dushanbe imam, was arrested on suspicion of adhering to Salafism, which is banned in Tajikistan. Obidov, who had eulogized a fellow cleric as “one of the great leaders of the country” before his arrest, was released in June but was stripped of his duties.

D3. Is there academic freedom, and is the educational system free from extensive political indoctrination? 0 / 4

The government exerts significant political pressure on universities and academic personnel. In recent years, international scholars have noted the self-exile of Tajikistani academics who faced harassment and surveillance from security services, scrutiny of scholars who cooperate with foreign colleagues, and pressures to self-censor. Opportunities to study abroad, especially for religious education, are tightly restricted.

D4. Are individuals free to express their personal views on political or other sensitive topics without fear of surveillance or retribution? 1 / 4

Restrictive laws and government surveillance serve as deterrents to open discussion of sensitive topics, including criticism of the country’s leadership. A 2017 law allows authorities to monitor citizens’ online behavior and prescribes fines and prison sentences for those who visit “undesirable websites,” among other provisions. An antiextremism law amended in 2020 allows the government to block websites without a court order. The dissemination of COVID-19-related news deemed false was also criminalized in 2020.

E. ASSOCIATIONAL AND ORGANIZATIONAL RIGHTS: 2 / 12

E1. Is there freedom of assembly? 0 / 4

The government strictly limits freedom of assembly. Local government approval is required to hold demonstrations but is rarely granted.

In November 2021, protesters nevertheless rallied in Khorog, the capital of the autonomous region of Gorno-Badakhshan, after police killed local resident Gulbidin Ziyobekov; officials claimed that Ziyobekov fired on police before he was killed. Two protesters died when security officers fired into a crowd of demonstrators. The protests ended after several days, with officials vowing to investigate Ziyobekov's death. In December, however, a state television program portrayed Ziyobekov as a vigilante. An internet blackout in the region persisted for weeks.

E2. Is there freedom for nongovernmental organizations, particularly those that are engaged in human rights- and governance-related work? 1 / 4

Nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) must register with the Justice Ministry and are vulnerable to closure for minor technical violations. NGOs must disclose funding from foreign sources. Foreign funds must be logged in a state registry before organizations can access them, and the government oversees operations supported by those funds. Under legislation implemented in 2019, NGOs must maintain their own websites and publish reports that comply with vaguely worded financial reporting to prove they have no "terrorist financing" or "money laundering" links.
